The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Constitutional Law
Acknowledgements

The Editors wish above all to thank Elena L. Cohen, Cardozo School of Law JD, 2010, and Doctoral Candidate in Political Science at CUNY Graduate Center, for her multiple, superb, and invaluable contributions to this project. These contributions included research, editing of texts, overall management of all the technical aspects and logistics of the project, and coordination of communication and exchanges among the Editors, the Publisher, and the more than sixty contributors to the Handbook. The Editors also wish to thank The Cardozo School of Law and its Dean, Matthew Diller for the generous financial and institutional support, as well as for the encouragement that they provided to this project over several years. Special recognition and heartfelt thanks are also due to the Floersheimer Center for Constitutional Democracy at Cardozo, which generously supported research and several international conferences that have had an important bearing on the conception and realization of the present Handbook.

Last, but by no means least, the Editors are grateful to Alex Flach, Commissioning Editor at Oxford University Press, for all the key help, useful advice, and sustained cooperation that he provided us throughout all the phases of this project. (p. vi)
Notes on the Contributors

Oxford Handbooks Online

Notes on the Contributors

The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Constitutional Law
Edited by Michel Rosenfeld and András Sajó

Print Publication Date: May 2012  Subject: Law
Online Publication Date: Nov 2012

Notes on the Contributors

General Editors

Michel Rosenfeld is Justice Sydney L. Robins Professor of Human Rights and Director, Program on Global and Comparative Constitutional Theory, Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law

András Sajó is Judge, European Court of Human Rights, Strasbourg and University Professor (on leave), Central European University, Budapest

Contributors

Robert Alexy is Professor of Public Law and Legal Philosophy, Christian Albrechts University, Kiel

Susanne Baer is Justice of the Federal Constitutional Court (Germany), Professor of Public Law and Gender Studies, Humboldt University Berlin and James W. Cook Global Law Professor, University of Michigan Law School

Aharon Barak is Professor of Law, Radzyner School of Law, Interdisciplinary Center (IDC), Herzliya, Israel
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Name</th>
<th>Position and Institution</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Eric Barendt</td>
<td>Emeritus Professor of Media Law, University College London</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sergio Bartole</td>
<td>Emeritus Professor of Constitutional Law, University of Trieste</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Olivier Beaud</td>
<td>Professor of Public Law, University Panthéon-Assas (Paris II) and Director, Institut Michel Villey</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Armin von Bogdandy</td>
<td>Director, Max Planck Institute for Comparative Public Law and International Law</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Anthony W. Bradley</td>
<td>Emeritus Professor of Constitutional Law, Edinburgh University and Research Fellow, Institute of European and Comparative Law, Oxford University</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Manuel José Cepeda Espinosa</td>
<td>Former President of the Colombian Constitutional Court and Director, Program on Public Policies, Constitutional Rights and Regulations, Universidad de los Andes, Law School, Bogotá</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wen-Chen Chang</td>
<td>Associate Professor, College of Law, National Taiwan University</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sujit Choudhry</td>
<td>Cecelia Goetz Professor of Law, New York University School of Law</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>D.M. Davis</td>
<td>Judge President, Competition Appeal Court of South Africa and Honorary Professor of Law, University of Cape Town</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Erika de Wet</td>
<td>Co-Director, Institute for International and Comparative Law in Africa and Professor of International Law, University of Pretoria and Professor of International Constitutional Law, University of Amsterdam</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>David Dyzenhaus</td>
<td>Professor of Law and Philosophy, University of Toronto</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Name</td>
<td>Title</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-------------------------------</td>
<td>-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>K.D. Ewing</td>
<td>Professor of Public Law, King's College, London</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Héctor Fix-Fierro</td>
<td>Senior Researcher, Instituto de Investigaciones Jurídicas, Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México (UNAM)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Günter Frankenberg</td>
<td>Professor of Public Law, Philosophy of Law and Comparative Law, Goethe-Universität Frankfurt</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Stephen Gardbaum</td>
<td>MacArthur Foundation Professor of International Justice and Human Rights, UCLA School of Law</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roberto Gargarella</td>
<td>Professor of Constitutional Theory, CONICET/CMI, Argentina</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jeffrey Goldsworthy</td>
<td>Professor of Law, Monash University, Melbourne</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dieter Grimm</td>
<td>Professor of Law, Humboldt University Berlin and Yale Law School and Former Justice, Federal Constitutional Court of Germany</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Daniel Halberstam</td>
<td>Eric Stein Collegiate Professor of Law, University of Michigan Law School</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gábor Halmai</td>
<td>Professor of Law and Director, Institute for Political and International Studies, ELTE Faculty of Social Sciences, Budapest</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Yasuo Hasebe</td>
<td>Professor of Constitutional Law, University of Tokyo, School of Law</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gedion T. Hessebon</td>
<td>S.J.D. Candidate, Central European University, Legal Studies Department and Assistant Lecturer, Addis Ababa University, School of Law</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Name</td>
<td>Title and Affiliation</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------------------------------------------</td>
<td>--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Stephen Holmes</td>
<td>Walter E. Meyer Professor of Law, New York University School of Law</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vicki C. Jackson</td>
<td>Thurgood Marshall Professor of Constitutional Law, Harvard Law School, and formerly was Carmack Waterhouse Professor of Constitutional Law, Georgetown University Law Center</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gary Jeffrey Jacobsohn</td>
<td>H. Malcolm MacDonald Professor of Constitutional and Comparative Law, Department of Government, University of Texas at Austin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Martin Kaspar</td>
<td>Chief of Staff, City of Schwäbisch Hall, Germany</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Michael Kavey</td>
<td>Associate-in-Law, Columbia Law School</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>János Kis</td>
<td>Professor of Political Science and Philosophy at Central European University, Budapest</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Claude Klein</td>
<td>Professor Emeritus of Law, Hebrew University</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Juliane Kokott</td>
<td>Advocate General, Court of Justice of the European Union</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hoi Kong</td>
<td>Assistant Professor, Faculty of Law, McGill University</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Martin Krygier</td>
<td>Gordon Samuels Professor of Law, University of New South Wales and Adjunct Professor, Regulatory Institutions Network (RegNet), Australian National University</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roderick Alexander Macdonald</td>
<td>F.R. Scott Professor of Constitutional and Public Law, Faculty of Law, McGill University</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Name</td>
<td>Position and Affiliation</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-----------------------------</td>
<td>-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Catharine A. MacKinnon</td>
<td>Elizabeth A. Long Professor of Law, University of Michigan, James Barr Ames Visiting Professor of Law (long term), Harvard Law School and Special Gender Adviser to the Prosecutor, International Criminal Court (The Hague)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Matthias Mahlmann</td>
<td>Professor of Law, Chair of Legal Theory, Legal Sociology and International Public Law, University of Zurich, Faculty of Law</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chibli Mallat</td>
<td>Presidential Professor and Professor of Middle Eastern Law and Politics at the University of Utah and EU Jean Monnet Professor of European Law at Saint Joseph's University, Beirut</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Susanna Mancini</td>
<td>Professor of Law, Law School, University of Bologna and Adjunct Professor of Law, SAIS Johns Hopkins University BC</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jenny S. Martinez</td>
<td>Professor of Law and Justin M. Roach, Jr, Faculty Scholar, Stanford Law School</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Juan E. Méndez</td>
<td>Visiting Professor, Washington College of Law and UN Special Rapporteur on Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Frank I. Michelman</td>
<td>Robert Walmsley University Professor, Harvard University</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Laurence Morel</td>
<td>Professor of Political Science, Université Lille 2 (CERAPS)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jan-Werner Müller</td>
<td>Professor, Politics Department, Princeton University</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vlad Perju</td>
<td>Associate Professor, Boston College Law School</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Richard H. Pildes</td>
<td>Sudler Family Professor of Constitutional Law, New York University School of Law</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Name</td>
<td>Position and Affiliation</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>---------------------------------</td>
<td>------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cesare Pinelli</td>
<td>Professor of Constitutional Law, Università ‘Sapienza’, Rome</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ulrich K. Preuß</td>
<td>Professor Emeritus of Law and Politics, Freie Universität Berlin, and Hertie School of Governance, Berlin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Susan Rose-Ackerman</td>
<td>Henry R. Luce Professor of Jurisprudence (Law and Political Science), Yale University</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Daniel Sabbagh</td>
<td>Senior Research Fellow at Sciences Po, Centre d’études et de recherches internationales (CERI)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pedro Salazar-Ugarte</td>
<td>Senior Researcher, Instituto de Investigaciones Jurídicas, Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México (UNAM)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Judit Sándor</td>
<td>Professor, Faculty of Political Science, Legal Studies and Gender Studies, Central European University (CEU), Budapest and Founding Director of the Center for Ethics and Law in Biomedicine (CELAB)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bernhard Schlink</td>
<td>Professor Emeritus of Public Law and Legal Philosophy, Humboldt University Berlin and Former Justice of the Constitutional Court of the State of Northrhine-Westfalia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ayelet Shachar</td>
<td>Canada Research Chair in Citizenship and Multiculturalism, Professor of Law, Political Science, and Global Affairs, University of Toronto Faculty of Law</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Reva B. Siegel</td>
<td>Nicholas deB. Katzenbach Professor of Law, Yale University</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cindy Skach</td>
<td>Professor of Comparative Government and Law, University of Oxford</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Name</td>
<td>Affiliation</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-------------------------------</td>
<td>------------------------------------------------------------------------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Daniel Smilov</td>
<td>Associate Professor at the University of Sofia, Bulgaria and Programme Director of the Centre for Liberal Strategies, Sofia</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dean Spielmann</td>
<td>Judge of the European Court of Human Rights, Strasbourg</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Alec Stone Sweet</td>
<td>Leitner Professor of Law, Politics, and International Studies, Yale Law School and Department of Political Science, Yale University</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Li-ann Thio</td>
<td>Professor of Law, Faculty of Law, National University of Singapore</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arun Thiruvengadam</td>
<td>Assistant Professor, Faculty of Law, National University of Singapore and Visiting Fellow, the West Bengal National University of Juridical Sciences, Kolkata, India</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Michel Troper</td>
<td>Professor Emeritus, University of Paris Ouest-Nanterre</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mark Tushnet</td>
<td>William Nelson Cromwell Professor of Law, Harvard Law School</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Renáta Uitz</td>
<td>Professor and Chair of the Comparative Constitutional Law Program, Central European University, Legal Studies Department, Budapest</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Richard Vogler</td>
<td>Senior Lecturer in Law, Sussex Law School</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Neil Walker</td>
<td>Regius Professor of Public Law and the Law of Nature and Nations, University of Edinburgh</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jiunn-Rong Yeh</td>
<td>Distinguished Professor, College of Law, National Taiwan University</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kenji Yoshino is Chief Justice Earl Warren Professor of Constitutional Law, New York University School of Law</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>---</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Peer Zumbansen is Professor of Law, Osgoode Hall Law School, York University</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
List of Abbreviations

The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Constitutional Law
Edited by Michel Rosenfeld and András Sajó

Print Publication Date: May 2012
Subject: Law
Online Publication Date: Nov 2012

List of Abbreviations

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Abbreviation</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>ABA</td>
<td>American Bar Association</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>APA</td>
<td>Administrative Procedure Act (United States)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>APP</td>
<td>anti-paternalistic principle</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ASEAN</td>
<td>Association of Southeast Asian Nations</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BVerfG</td>
<td>Bundesverfassungsgericht</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BVerfGE</td>
<td>Bundesverfassungsgerichtsentscheidung</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BVP</td>
<td>Bayerische Volkspartei (Germany)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CC</td>
<td>constitutional court</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CCM</td>
<td>crime control model</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CCP</td>
<td>Chinese Communist Party</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CEDAW</td>
<td>Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CEELI</td>
<td>Central and Eastern European Law Initiative</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Abbreviation</td>
<td>Full Form</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------------</td>
<td>-----------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CFI</td>
<td>Court of First Instance</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CLS</td>
<td>Critical Legal Studies</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CPSU</td>
<td>Communist Party of the Soviet Union</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DDP</td>
<td>Deutsche Demokratische Partei (Germany)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DDR</td>
<td>demobilization, disarmament, and reintegration</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DKP</td>
<td>Deutsche Kommunistische Partei (Germany)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DNVP</td>
<td>Deutschnational Volkspartei (Germany)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DPM</td>
<td>due process model</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DVP</td>
<td>Deutsche Volkspartei (Germany)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ECHR</td>
<td>European Convention on Human Rights</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ECJ</td>
<td>European Court of Justice</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ECtHR</td>
<td>European Court of Human Rights</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EPRDF</td>
<td>Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>EU</td>
<td>European Union</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>FCC</td>
<td>Federal Constitutional Court (Germany)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>FSU</td>
<td>Finnish Seamen's Union</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>GATT</td>
<td>General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>hESC</td>
<td>human embryonic stem cell</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HDR</td>
<td>Human Development Report</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HPAT</td>
<td>Homosexual Policy Assessment Team (United Kingdom)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Abbreviation</td>
<td>Description</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------------</td>
<td>-------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HRA</td>
<td>Human Rights Act 1998 (United Kingdom)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>HRC</td>
<td>Human Rights Council</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IACHR</td>
<td>Inter-American Convention on Human Rights</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ICA</td>
<td>initiative constitutional amendment (United States)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ICC</td>
<td>International Criminal Court</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ICCPR</td>
<td>International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ICESCR</td>
<td>International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ICITAP</td>
<td>International Criminal Investigative Training Assistance Program</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ICJ</td>
<td>International Court of Justice</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IDEA</td>
<td>Institute for Democracy and Electoral Assistance</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ILC</td>
<td>International Law Commission</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ILEA</td>
<td>International Law Enforcement Academies</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ILO</td>
<td>International Labour Organization</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ISAF</td>
<td>International Security Assistance Force</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ITF</td>
<td>International Transport Workers’ Federation</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>IVF</td>
<td>in vitro fertilization</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>KPD</td>
<td>Kommunistische Partei Deutschlands (Germany)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>LGB</td>
<td>lesbian, gay, and bisexual</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>LLP</td>
<td>liberal legitimacy principle</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MMP</td>
<td>mixed-member proportional</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>MP</td>
<td>Member of Parliament</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Abbreviation</td>
<td>Description</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>--------------</td>
<td>-------------</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NATO</td>
<td>North Atlantic Treaty Organization</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NBAC</td>
<td>National Bioethics Advisory Commission (United States)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NCMP</td>
<td>Non-Constituency Member of Parliament (Singapore)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NIE</td>
<td>new institutional economics</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NGO</td>
<td>non-governmental organization</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NMP</td>
<td>Nominated Member of Parliament (Singapore)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NPD</td>
<td>National Democratic Party (Germany)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NSDAP</td>
<td>Nationalsozialistische Deutsche Arbeiterpartei (Germany)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>OBC</td>
<td>Other Backward Class (India)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ODIHR</td>
<td>Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>OIC</td>
<td>Organization of Islamic Conference</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>OIRA</td>
<td>Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs (United States)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>OLC</td>
<td>Office of Legal Counsel (United States)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>OPDAT</td>
<td>Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>OSCE</td>
<td>Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PAP</td>
<td>People’s Action Party (Singapore)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PIL</td>
<td>public interest litigation</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PL</td>
<td>John Rawls, Political Liberalism</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PR</td>
<td>proportional representation</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PSN</td>
<td>principle of state neutrality</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SACC</td>
<td>South African Constitutional Court</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
List of Abbreviations

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Abbreviation</th>
<th>Full Form</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>SC</td>
<td>Scheduled Caste (India)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SCC</td>
<td>Supreme Court of Canada</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SDF</td>
<td>Self-Defence Forces (Japan)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SIAC</td>
<td>Special Immigration Appeals Commission (United Kingdom)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SPD</td>
<td>Sozialdemokratische Partei Deutschlands (Germany)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>SRP</td>
<td>Socialist Reich Party (Germany)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ST</td>
<td>Scheduled Tribe (India)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TEU</td>
<td>Treaty on European Union</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TFEU</td>
<td>Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TJ</td>
<td>John Rawls, A Theory of Justice</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>TRC</td>
<td>Truth and Reconciliation Commission</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UDHR</td>
<td>Universal Declaration of Human Rights</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UN</td>
<td>United Nations</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UNGA</td>
<td>United Nations General Assembly</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UNSC</td>
<td>United Nations Security Council</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>USPD</td>
<td>Unabhängige Sozialdemokratische Partei Deutschlands (Germany)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>VCLT</td>
<td>Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>WTO</td>
<td>World Trade Organization</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

(p. xx)
Introduction

Michel Rosenfeld and András Sajó

The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Constitutional Law
Edited by Michel Rosenfeld and András Sajó

Print Publication Date: May 2012
Online Publication Date: Nov 2012
Subject: Law, Comparative Law, Constitutional and Administrative Law
DOI: 10.1093/oxfordhb/9780199578610.013.0001

Abstract and Keywords

This introductory article first sets out the book’s purpose, which is to provide an overview of the current status of comparative constitutional law as a discipline and an accounting of fundamental constitutional developments, concepts, and debates as they emerge through the lenses of that discipline. The article is organized as follows. Section I provides a brief overview of the history of comparative constitutional law. Section II focuses on the uses and purposes of, and the challenges confronting, comparative constitutional law. Section III addresses preliminarily the key issue of transplantation of institutions and norms from one constitutional system to the next. Section IV discusses in summary fashion some of the most salient methodological issues that have an important bearing on work in comparative constitutional law. Finally, Section V accounts for the structure and organization of the Handbook and briefly situates each of its nine parts in the context of the project as a whole.

Keywords: comparative constitutional law, constitutional system, constitutional developments, methodological issues

I. The History of Comparative Constitutional Law 2
II. Comparative Constitutional Law: Uses, Purposes, and Challenges 9
   1. Uses 9
   2. Purposes 10
   3. Challenges 12

III. Constitutional Borrowing and Transplantation 13
IV. Methodology 16
V. Structure and Organization of the Handbook 19

The purpose of the present volume is to provide an overview of the current status of comparative constitutional law as a discipline and an accounting of fundamental constitutional developments, concepts, and debates as they emerge through the lenses of the said discipline. The field of comparative constitutional law has grown immensely over the past couple of decades. Once a minor and obscure adjunct to the field of domestic constitutional law, comparative constitutional law has now moved front and center. The prominence and visibility of the field, both among judges and scholars has grown exponentially, particularly in the last decade. Even in the United States, where domestic constitutional exceptionalism has traditionally held a firm grip, use of comparative constitutional materials has become the subject of a lively and much publicized controversy among various justices of the US Supreme Court.1

The rapid growth and expansion of the field was propelled by the transitions to constitutional democracy in Eastern and Central Europe after the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989, followed by the making of many constitutions in the 1990s, including in South Africa and in many South American countries. Many of these new constitutions have ‘imported’ constitutional norms from abroad—the South African Constitution explicitly mandates that the country’s
Introduction

Constitutional Court consider foreign law when interpreting the domestic Bill of Rights—and many of the considered foreign constitutions have explicitly refrained from incorporating some of the latter’s provisions into their new constitution.\(^2\)

Another important factor in the growth of comparative constitutional law is the ‘internationalization’ of constitutional law through implementation of the provisions of international (p. 2) covenants such as the European Convention on Human Rights. Though such covenants are not formally or technically constitutions, their provisions—particularly as interpreted by courts such as the European Court of Human Rights—are the functional equivalent of constitutional norms. Moreover, a veritable dialogue among judges has emerged as a consequence of this process of internationalization. Thus, for example, judges on the European Court of Human Rights often consider the national constitutional jurisprudence in the relevant field—for example, free speech—of states that are party to the Convention. Conversely, constitutional judges in the latter states frequently consult decisions of the European Court both for purposes of conforming the respective jurisprudences where feasible and of taking into account valuable judicial insight on the issue at hand.\(^3\)

On the other hand, comparative constitutional law is a subfield of comparative law (and it rates a mere 35-page entry in the 1,400-page Oxford Handbook of Comparative Law). Comparative constitutional law, however, is in several respects a standout subfield that seems more subject to contest and controversy, both on methodological and ideological grounds, than other subfields. Traditionally, comparison in private law has been regarded as less problematic than in public law. Thus, whereas it seems fair to assume that there ought to be great convergence among industrialized democracies over the uses and functions of commercial contracts, that seems far from the case in constitutional law. Can a parliamentary democracy be compared to a presidential one? Or, a federal republic to a unitary one? Moreover, what about differences in ideology or national identity? Can constitutional rights deployed in a libertarian context be profitably compared to those at work in a social welfare context? Is it perilous to compare minority rights in a multi-ethnic state to those in its ethnically homogeneous counterparts?

These controversies add an important dimension to the field of comparative constitutional law and they contribute to carving out a distinct domain of inquiry that displays many links to constitutional law, public law in general, and comparative law while remaining distinct from the latter in several significant respects. Furthermore, the subject matter coming within the sweep of comparative constitutionalism has been analyzed from the various perspectives of many different disciplines beyond law, including political science, political theory, and philosophy. Representatives from all these disciplines are among the contributors to the present Handbook and they complement, supplement, and enrich the insights emanating from within the discipline of law.

In order to place the contributions to this volume in their proper context, this Introduction proceeds as follows. Section I provides a brief overview of the history of comparative constitutional law. Section II focuses on the uses and purposes of, and the challenges confronting, comparative constitutional law. Section III addresses preliminarily the key issue of transplantation of institutions and norms from one constitutional system to the next. Section IV discusses in summary fashion some of the most salient methodological issues that have an important bearing on work in comparative constitutional law. And, finally, Section V accounts for the structure and organization of the Handbook and briefly situates each of its nine parts in the context of the project as a whole.

I. The History of Comparative Constitutional Law

The jacket design of this Handbook reproduces ‘The Ideal City’, a renaissance painting attributed to Piero della Francesca. It represents a harmonious public space, perhaps with reference to Plato’s plan of the lost Atlantis. It is a Utopia: no citizens, no mess. In contrast, in a competing (p. 3) representation of the Ideal City, Fra Carnevale combined idealized Roman and Florentine buildings, again with balanced harmony, but featuring humans populating the space. It is considered an allegory of good government through planning. The ruler takes care of his subjects, and safeguards the composite elements of public order: religion, security, and recreation.

The plan of the city is its constitution. Physical structure and the structure of rules combine under a single master plan, appropriate for the community living together in the public space carved out pursuant to the governing plan. In fact, in Ancient Greece, when a new colony was established, the urban plan went hand in hand with the constitution: both followed the master plan of the mother-city (the metropolis). The physical and political plans of the city were intended to correspond to some (divine) truth or ideal harmony. The plan of the ideal city mirrors that of the ideal metropolis. Cities are not exactly alike, but all conform to a recognizable type. Do not constitutions similarly attempt to emulate the ideal constitution of the ideal metropolis of their time? Cannot comparative constitutionalism be enlisted in the quest to live up to an elusive measure or standard?

The conception of an ideal government can be useful for purposes of comparison with actual governments. Plato's ideal, however, was so unachievable that it did not invite comparison to contemporaneous actual Greek states. Aristotle, on the other hand, was concerned with actual government, and thus meticulously compared abstract forms of government with actual, Real-existierende states in order to find out how best to approximate the relevant ideals. At its beginnings, the science of government concentrated on thorough and exacting comparison: it is quite likely that Aristotle undertook to compile a collection of the constitutions of 158 Greek city states for such reason (albeit that only his analysis of the Athenian Constitution survives). Significantly, it was on the basis of this comparative material that Aristotle developed his theory of government in his Politics.

Notwithstanding the collapse of government and the vanishing of the corresponding political science in antiquity, and notwithstanding the subsequent prevalence of religion and custom in matters of government, the comparative tradition did reemerge with the advent of modern political thought. Notably, Machiavelli's precepts were based on observations grounded in contemporary and historical practices of government. Whereas normative considerations and even extended use of biblical interpretation were common in the formation of modern constitutionalism, the political science of the modern era would be unthinkable without continued reference to a rich anecdotal tradition of comparative work on government practices. Montesquieu's empiricism in the Spirit of the Laws provides perhaps the most notorious example of historical comparison, continuing the tradition of using comparative materials to generate normative conclusions, in this case culminating in the establishment of the foundations of modern constitutionalism.

Comparative constitutional inquiry became particularly relevant in the aftermath of the revolutions in the United States and France. The Founding Fathers and the French revolutionaries had to invent a new organization of the state and they could rely only to a limited extent on pre-existing structures. The empirical evidence offered by comparison was both a source of inspiration and of legitimation. In the Federalist Papers, references to foreign experiences are made for justificatory purposes. In France, the translation of a collection of US state constitutions became one of the most important intellectual sources of reformist and revolutionary political thought, and comparisons with the US and English arrangements were common in the debates of the National Constituent Assembly. In the liberal constitution-making process of the early nineteenth century, comparison with the various French constitutions was standard procedure and Latin American constitution-making often relied on a consideration and comparative analysis of the US constitution. In liberal constitutional theory comparison, in some cases supporting developmental theories continued to be relevant, as was the case with J.S. Mill's Representative Government in matters of election law. Constant, Tocqueville, and Eötvös used constitutional comparison extensively, and Bryce developed a more systematic approach marked by his distinction between rigid and flexible constitutions. However, by and large, constitutional law became at this stage an independent though somewhat narrow subject, and increasingly its consolidation meant the abandonment of comparison.

Characteristically, in Germany before the consolidation of the Empire and of its public law system, comparison was an important source of scholarly and reformist inspiration. In fact, the nineteenth-century German attempt to tame the administrative (police) state necessitated reliance on comparative public law, and the theoretical and practical elaboration of the constitutional theory of the Rechtsstaat was influenced by comparison and had a major impact in Europe through the translations of the concept. Hence, the interest in comparing administrative justice as a freedom enhancing control over the administration. Even Dicey's Introduction to the Law of the Constitution ventured into comparative studies. Interestingly, Dicey's misunderstanding of the French system can be compared to the inspiring errors of Montesquieu regarding checks and balances in Britain, a century earlier. With the establishment of positive constitutional law in the nineteenth century, international comparison lost much of its appeal and legal science and public law practices became increasingly self-referential, as if the existence of a national constitution would have made foreign law irrelevant. This was the age of the exegetes, whose task was not to provide creative solutions but to guide authoritatively and reliably the lawyers and administrators through the maze of an ever-increasing body of laws. It seems that the prevalence of legal positivism successfully devalued all sources of interest other than the text of the positive legal norm. There was little need for comparative inspiration in a legal world where the lawyer is interested in serving existing power rather than the freedom of citizens. Legal science became self-centered and oriented toward systematization and thus its methodological goals did not leave much space for comparison.\footnote{15}{In post-Second World War Europe comparative constitutional law was influenced by the East/West divide. Foreign constitutional systems were often studied as part of Soviet legal studies, and, respectively studies on Western bourgeois state law. Comparative law was understood as the study of foreign systems, with a heavy ideological accent.}

(p. 5) But even in this era dominated by positivism, the academic interest in comparison survived.\footnote{16}{Comparative constitutional law scholarship did not emerge as an academic discipline until after the Second World War.} In this context, comparison of governments became a focus that was intended to satisfy intelligent curiosity, and partly to inspire change.\footnote{17}{In doing so and by also engaging in historical comparison, Friedrich led constitutional theory’s move away from the then prevailing paradigm towards a value-oriented approach. Friedrich summarized the ensuing paradigm shift in the following terms: ‘If constitutional law begins to ask what people actually do under a particular constitution, and not merely what battle of words they engage in for the settlement of conflicts among them, the constitutional lawyer becomes

Georg Jellinek, a leading exponent of legal positivism, developed a theory of the universalism of human rights relying on a comparative methodology.\footnote{18}{Friedrich, while still concerned with power as the central issue for modern political science, used constitutional law comparatively.} For his part, Adhémar Esmein, who also considered the state and its sovereignty a legal phenomenon, stressed the relevance of using some comparison in discussing French constitutional law.\footnote{19}{For Duguit, the ‘foreign’ experience served as an additional social fact that he used to fight juridical metaphysics.} Even Duguit, whose scholarship was to a considerable extent directed against Esmein, continued to include comparative treatises in his work.\footnote{20}{For Duguit, the ‘foreign’ experience served as an additional social fact that he used to fight juridical metaphysics.} For Duguit, the ‘foreign’ experience served as an additional social fact that he used to fight juridical metaphysics.\footnote{21}{Édouard Lambert, on the other hand, instituted (parallel to Henri Capitant) a civil law-based comparative law in France and the first French comparative law institute in 1921. Moreover, Lambert’s description of the US jurisprudence pertaining to labor may be considered a precursor of the treatment of foreign constitutional law as an element comparative law.} In short, whereas legal positivism may not have been particularly favorable to the comparative approach, the latter served the practical needs of public law reform and constitution-making.\footnote{22}{In spite of the existence of a comparative interest in academic constitutional law (exemplified by the first international conference in 1900 and by the establishment of the ‘Société de legislation comparée’ in Paris in 1869), modern comparative law (as a semi-autonomous discipline) originated in the efforts of private law experts. This might be related to international commercial interests and also to the desire to export national civil law codes. Such ‘imperialism’ was certainly present in the promotion of the German Civil Code. The theories of comparative law reflected considerations and concepts of private law, and constitutional law was often neglected in the study of foreign legal systems. The low profile of constitutional law in comparative law may be due to the difficulties in finding universal elements in constitutional law. Nevertheless, already in the period between the two world wars, comparative constitutional law became established as a separate scholarly discipline first and foremost thanks to the scholarship of Boris Mirkine-Guetzevitch. Steeped in the positivist tradition, the latter hoped that the emerging state of law would give expression to democracy in a legal language, and he wished in particular that the post-First World War constitutions would provide for their own protection by deploying judicial review. One can attribute to him the idea of the internationalization of constitutional law in the sense of applying the binding force of international law for purposes of strengthening the constitutions of nation-states.}

In spite of the existence of a comparative interest in academic constitutional law (exemplified by the first international conference in 1900 and by the establishment of the ‘Société de legislation comparée’ in Paris in 1869), modern comparative law (as a semi-autonomous discipline) originated in the efforts of private law experts. This might be related to international commercial interests and also to the desire to export national civil law codes. Such ‘imperialism’ was certainly present in the promotion of the German Civil Code. The theories of comparative law reflected considerations and concepts of private law, and constitutional law was often neglected in the comparative study of great legal systems. The low profile of constitutional law in comparative law may be due to the difficulties in finding universal elements in constitutional law. Nevertheless, already in the period between the two world wars, comparative constitutional law became established as a separate scholarly discipline first and foremost thanks to the scholarship of Boris Mirkine-Guetzevitch. Steeped in the positivist tradition, the latter hoped that the emerging state of law would give expression to democracy in a legal language, and he wished in particular that the post-First World War constitutions would provide for their own protection by deploying judicial review. One can attribute to him the idea of the internationalization of constitutional law in the sense of applying the binding force of international law for purposes of strengthening the constitutions of nation-states.

(p. 6) While issues pertaining to comparative constitutionalism continued to be the subject of discussion within political science as part of government studies,\footnote{23}{Comparative constitutional law scholarship did not emerge as an academic discipline until after the Second World War.} comparison became more popular due to the coming of age of rationalized parliamentarianism, followed upon its collapse by the growth of dictatorship. To a significant degree, interest in comparative constitutionalism was the result of emigration. Constitutional lawyers and legal theoreticians, being forced out of countries under ruthless dictatorship were particularly concerned with the weakness of the liberal state and motivated to find a theoretical answer to the apparent success of totalitarian regimes. The emerging scholarship includes such classic writings at the intersection of comparative constitutional law and political science as Loewenfeld’s articles on Militant Democracy\footnote{24}{For Duguit, the ‘foreign’ experience served as an additional social fact that he used to fight juridical metaphysics.} and Naumann’s Behemoth\footnote{25}{In post-Second World War Europe comparative constitutional law was influenced by the East/West divide. Foreign constitutional systems were often studied as part of Soviet legal studies, and, respectively studies on Western bourgeois state law. Comparative law was understood as the study of foreign systems, with a heavy ideological accent.} and Fraenkel’s Dual State.\footnote{26}{For this group, though Rossiter was born in the United States and had no law degree.} Clinton Rossiter’s 1942 dissertation, Constitutional Dictatorship: Crisis Government in the Modern Democracies,\footnote{27}{For Duguit, the ‘foreign’ experience served as an additional social fact that he used to fight juridical metaphysics.} pertains to this group, though Rossiter was born in the United States and had no law degree.

Comparative constitutional law scholarship did not emerge as an academic discipline until after the Second World War.\footnote{28}{Comparative constitutional law scholarship did not emerge as an academic discipline until after the Second World War.} In post-Second World War Europe comparative constitutional law was influenced by the East/West divide. Foreign constitutional systems were often studied as part of Soviet legal studies, and, respectively studies on Western bourgeois state law. Comparative law was understood as the study of foreign systems, with a heavy ideological accent.

Whereas he was still operating within political science, Carl J. Friedrich, a first class scholar of German constitutional law, gave rise to a paradigm shift, by concentrating on the constitutionalization of modern government and stressing the importance of judicial review.\footnote{29}{Comparative constitutional law scholarship did not emerge as an academic discipline until after the Second World War.} Friedrich, while still concerned with power as the central issue for modern political science, used constitutional law comparatively.\footnote{30}{In post-Second World War Europe comparative constitutional law was influenced by the East/West divide. Foreign constitutional systems were often studied as part of Soviet legal studies, and, respectively studies on Western bourgeois state law. Comparative law was understood as the study of foreign systems, with a heavy ideological accent.} By doing so and by also engaging in historical comparison, Friedrich led constitutional theory’s move away from the then prevailing paradigm towards a value-oriented approach. Friedrich summarized the ensuing paradigm shift in the following terms: ‘If constitutional law begins to ask what people actually do under a particular constitution, and not merely what battle of words they engage in for the settlement of conflicts among them, the constitutional lawyer becomes Édouard Lambert, on the other hand, instituted (parallel to Henri Capitant) a civil law-based comparative law in France and the first French comparative law institute in 1921. Moreover, Lambert’s description of the US jurisprudence pertaining to labor may be considered a precursor of the treatment of foreign constitutional law as an element comparative law. In short, whereas legal positivism may not have been particularly favorable to the comparative approach, the latter served the practical needs of public law reform and constitution-making.

a political scientist (one hopes).\textsuperscript{33}

The shift towards a value-based approach is certainly rooted in the coming to power of totalitarian regimes. It resulted from the discontent with positivism in political science and law as the latter had proved intellectually impotent against totalitarianism. While not explicit, this normative commitment to constitutionalism remains influential in comparative constitutional law, even if this results in the neglect of the study of non-liberal regimes. The interest in \textsuperscript{(p. 7)} comparison motivated by the shift to a value-based approach continued to sustain a comparative interest after the Second World War, as part of Cold War thinking, as liberal democracies defended their system in opposition to communist totalitarianism. The post-war period was characterized by an international human rights revolution, with various waves of state formation and democratization, coupled with increasing judicialization of constitutional law.\textsuperscript{34} Such comparative interest drew further inspiration from the enhanced protection of fundamental rights that issued from the US Supreme Court starting at the beginning of the 1940s. This robust protection was inspired by a political desire to define the United States as a bulwark of freedom in the face of totalitarianism, the arch enemy in the Second World War and in the Cold War. As A.L. Goodhart wrote it in his Foreword to Bernhard Schwartz’s American Constitutional Law, a book with comparative references, as it was written for an English audience:

> The English reader will be interested to find that some of the problems which are now being considered in the United States are also of immediate importance in Great Britain. The first is concerned with the maintenance of our civil liberties at a time of ‘cold war’. To what extent, for example, should freedom of speech be accorded to those who advocate the forcible overthrow of the existing system of government? The second is concerned with the modern development of the administrative process.\textsuperscript{35}

Although Schwartz’s work is a standard constitutional law treatise, it is characteristic that as a source for the study of ‘foreign’ constitutional law, it was considered as possessing lasting importance as part of the political science literature.

It is particularly noteworthy that in the transition from comparative government studies to comparative constitutional law as an academic discipline within the ambit of legal scholarship the interest in the subject matter proved to be primarily ideological. Indeed, a principal intent was to boost liberal constitutionalism against totalitarianism, and the elaboration of this new field was more the result of dissatisfaction with the prevailing positivistic method in law and government scholarship than an attempt to carve out a discipline or subdiscipline within jurisprudence. Comparison was intended to highlight theoretical trends and the object of the comparison became primarily government practice as the source and consequence of public law.

The above phenomena occurred in an international context where the level of state interaction and interdependence contributed to the spreading of more intense and new forms of constitutionalism. These trends created new needs both within law and in government, and these related in particular to constitution-writing as a matter of borrowing and international cooperation. However, according to Mark Tushnet, it was only the transition to democracy beginning in 1989 that has created the field of comparative constitutional law, resulting from the practical needs of constitution-drafting and institution-building, which produced a critical mass of knowledge and experts.\textsuperscript{36}

Furthermore, the preservation of comparative constitutional law as a separate discipline with full-fledged practical relevance requires constitutional adjudication oriented toward comparison. In this respect, the role of international courts, and suggested or mandated comparison as is the case in the Constitution of South Africa which recognizes foreign (p. 8) constitutional law as a legitimate source of constitutional decision-making, play a crucial role. Concurrent with changes in national constitutional law and its internationalization, comparative constitutional law gradually became a rather self-contained discipline with its own methodology. Beyond its descriptive concerns, the discipline is confronted with a fundamental ideological dilemma as the liberal quest for identity across borders clashes against the pursuit of differences among constitutional arrangements.

Comparative constitutional law as an academic discipline has been slowly and gradually integrated into legal education. In the United States, Thomas Franck wrote a path-breaking volume that responded to the experiences of decolonization and resulting state-building that intended to present the transplantation of Anglo-American constitutional law into the newly developing countries of Africa and Asia.\textsuperscript{37} The book (presenting a good number of cases—and reflecting therefore the specificity of modern constitutional law, namely constitutional law as a matter for litigation) was based on the assumption that those nations have accepted these as ‘the traffic rules of the economic-social-political road to modernization’. This was followed by more collections in the late 1970s.\textsuperscript{38} In France, comparative constitutional law as an academic subject was only gradually accepted in the legal curricula, though it was present as a political science subject matter. Like in Germany, the increased interest in comparative constitutional law was originally accommodated within national constitutional law. With the increased juridicization of constitutional law, that is, with the recognition that constitutional problems can be solved increasingly with the adjudicative tools of the rule of law state, legal interest in comparison was increasingly accommodated within a stand-alone discipline.\textsuperscript{39} Comparative constitutional law was often part of the very movement towards the juridicization of constitutional law, as in the case of France where the importance of constitutional adjudication was recognized through comparative studies, in particular thanks to the activities of Louis Favoreu and his collaborators.\textsuperscript{40} The increased interest in case law resulted in a new emphasis on rights, while earlier scholarship was more concerned with structural issues of governance. The use of comparative method was well established in the German legal sphere but it has remained somewhat secondary in the prevailing theoretical study of the state which was not constitution-centred.\textsuperscript{41} Systemic specialized textbooks are still rare and relatively recent.\textsuperscript{42} The recognition of the practical importance of the comparative method is, once again, intimately related to the increased importance of comparison in constitutional adjudication. For German legal science this means a partial paradigm change in legal methodology: comparison is understood as a new (fifth) method of legal interpretation.\textsuperscript{43}
Introduction

While comparison became to varying degrees integrated into domestic constitutional law (in many countries, for the simple reason that their constitutional system became part of a supranational system with its own supranational constitutional law) and therefore it is (p. 9) inherently related to national constitutional law studies, it became an academic discipline in its own right, reflecting not only upon commonalities and differences in national systems, but it is also a reflection upon the interaction of national and supranational constitutional institutions. This current stage of the development and its dilemmas is the subject matter of the Handbook.

II. Comparative Constitutional Law: Uses, Purposes, and Challenges

1. Uses

One can discern four principal uses of comparative constitutional law. Two of these, uses of foreign constitutional materials in constitution-making—broadly understood as encompassing constitutional revision or amendment—and in constitutional interpretation are in the hands of actors or participants in the constitutional arena. The other two uses, providing descriptive accountings and elaborating normative assessments of participant dealings with comparative constitutional materials, in contrast, are primarily reserved for those who assume the role of observers, namely scholars in law and in other relevant disciplines. Examples abound of actual uses of constitutional materials originating in a jurisdiction other than that in which the actual users of such materials carry out official functions in relation to their own constitution. Thus, for example, various constitutions, including the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (Constitution Act of 1982, Pt I), have influenced constitution-making in South Africa, New Zealand, and Hong Kong and the Basic Law in Israel.\textsuperscript{44} Similarly, such uses have also occurred in constitutional interpretation, and are even sometimes explicitly endorsed by constitutions themselves, as in the South African Constitution, which, as noted above, specifically empowers courts to consider foreign law when interpreting the Bill of Rights.\textsuperscript{45} These uses, moreover, have spread to transnational settings, where their constitution-making and their constitutional interpretation dimensions have, on occasion, been combined.

A prime instance of this occurred when the European Court of Justice (ECJ), the EU’s highest judicial body, began filling constitutional gaps at a time when the governing treaties of the transnational unit that is now the EU lacked any fundamental rights-related provisions. In its landmark 1974 Nold decision,\textsuperscript{46} the ECJ stated that in order to safeguard fundamental rights in the context of EU-imposed regulation, it had to start from the common constitutional traditions of the member states. Accordingly, the ECJ ‘cannot... allow measures which are incompatible with fundamental rights recognized and guaranteed by the constitutions of those States’.\textsuperscript{47} What Nold launches is both a piecemeal ECJ-driven constitution-making project relating to fundamental rights and an interpretive agenda depending on constitutional sources extrinsic to the EU (or its treaty-based predecessors). Indeed, what the ECJ imposed on itself (p. 10) in Nold in relation to its interpretation of EU law, was both to refer to the national constitutions of the EU member states and to distill what was common to all of the latter.
In order for constitution-makers and interpreters to make cogent and optimal use of foreign constitutional materials that they either must, or wish to, consider, it is necessary for the latter to gain familiarity with them and to become able to gauge what usefulness any particular foreign referent may have in a given concrete decision-making instance. This is likely to require both an understanding of how a foreign constitutional norm figures in its own institutional setting and how it compares to seemingly similar norms in one’s own and other pertinent constitutional systems. Constitution-makers and judges do make use of institutional models, structures, processes, arguments, and doctrines coming from beyond their own jurisdiction, and they need sufficient familiarity with those materials to justify such use to themselves and to the audiences to which they must remain responsive. Moreover, judges can sharpen their relative knowledge and appreciation of foreign materials through dialogues with constitutional judges from various countries, and through reference to relevant examination, analysis, and comparative assessment of the said materials in the works of comparative constitutional law scholars.

The latter scholars approach the relevant material as observers, and they tackle it from either a descriptive or a prescriptive perspective. From a descriptive standpoint, the scholar examines systematically the comparative constitutional work that participants undertake, performing a number of tasks ranging from classification to critical assessment. For example, a scholar may distinguish between areas or subjects in relation to which much comparison occurs and those that give rise to minimal comparison. Or a scholar may be critical of existing comparisons in a particular area, let us say free speech, upon concluding that constitutional judges base comparisons on superficial similarities while ignoring less apparent but much more important differences. Normative or prescriptive scholarly work, on the other hand, concentrates on what the scholar deems desirable or feasible, depending on the latter's empirical, ideological, or discipline-based position. One may be convinced, for instance, that constitutions are deeply anchored in a particular tradition and that use of foreign material is therefore bound to betray the imperative to maintain the uniqueness of every constitutional system. Or, one may be persuaded that fundamental rights are ultimately universal and that countries with less developed constitutional jurisprudence should always seek to benefit from the experiences of their counterparts with far more developed such jurisprudence.

2. Purposes

The key concern in comparative law as it emerged in the civil law tradition in the late nineteenth and early twentieth century was to find the fonds commun législatif. This was the position of Capitant and Lambert in France, and it fostered the training of foreign lawyers in the national tradition in the name of comparative law. There is an analogous trend in comparative constitutional law emerging from the works of those who posit its principal goal as distilling what is universal or common in all constitutional systems and traditions. Accordingly, comparative constitutional analysis is sometimes animated by a search for the universal on the basis of what can be empirically observed or of conformity to the ideal (liberal, constitutionalist) arrangement through adaptation of manifold particular settings in varying cultural and historical circumstances. This search for the universal goes back to the early comparative law (p. 11) tradition exemplified by Anselm Feuerbach, the early nineteenth-century German scholar who is credited with founding the discipline of comparative criminal law. Also important was the influence of comparative linguistics, pursued by the liberal constitutionalist Wilhelm von Humboldt, which was aimed at generating a universal sense of language based on comparative language studies. This focus on universals is especially salient in comparative constitutional law endeavors to compare national solutions in terms of constitutionalism's search for a political ideal of ordered liberty. Moreover, the strong emphasis on the universality of human rights and the use of comparison in human rights adjudication which are intended to find a measure or standard of universally applicable norms point in the same direction. Some argue, for example, that there is a generally accepted virtually universal method of justification when it comes to circumscribing the scope of fundamental rights: that provided by the standard of proportionality, though judges and scholars differ in their conceptions of this ubiquitous standard. In this context, the study of the constitution of illiberal democracies centers on the reasons for departure from the ideal model, and focuses on the extent to which non-liberal constitutional systems can sustain a well-functioning legal order. Significantly, the influence of the constitution on the legal system in liberal democracies goes well beyond formal institutional settings and definition of legal sources: constitutional values become embedded in the various branches of law and even in private relations.

There is a lack of consensus concerning the proper goals of comparative analysis that is due to broader ideological disagreements about the nature and function of law in general, and of constitutional law in particular. At one end of the spectrum are those who, consistent with the above remarks on universalism, believe that the legal problems that confront all societies are essentially similar and that their solutions are fundamentally universal. Specifically, some argue that basic principles of constitutional law are essentially the same throughout the world. Accordingly, the principal goals of comparative analysis are to identify and highlight the common or universal principles and to determine how particular constitutional jurisprudences do, or may be made to, conform to those principles.

At the other end of the spectrum, are those who maintain that all legal problems are so tied to a society's particular history and culture that what is relevant in one constitutional context cannot be relevant, or at least similarly relevant, in another. This position is encapsulated in Montesquieu's observation that "the political and civil laws of each nation ... should be so appropriate to the people for whom they are made that it is very unlikely that the laws of one nation can suit another." If that were indeed the case, then the only legitimate task for comparative analysis would be to explain how each constitutional system conforms to the singular needs, aspirations, and mores of the particular polity for which it has been designed. Consequently, besides fostering a systematic understanding of how law varies according to the particulars of its socio-political environment, the principal goal of comparison—at least as far as participants are concerned—would be a negative one. Because no two polities are likely to share essentially similar circumstances, there ought to be a strong presumption against use or adaptation of constitutional norms originated beyond one's borders.

Between the two positions described above, there are various other ones. Some believe that the problems confronted by different societies are essentially the same, but that the solutions are likely to be different, owing to varying circumstances that distinguish one society from the next. Hence, the principal benefit of comparative work would stem from its ability to highlight specificities that tend to be taken for granted, and to enhance the knowledge and understanding of one's own system. For yet others, the function of comparative analysis is the development of an even more critical, reflexive analytical capacity. Critical theorists have argued that comparative constitutional law has a colonizing and hegemonic edge, as it tends to project the gloss of a dominant constitutional culture, such as that of the United States or Germany, onto constitutional systems operating in former colonies and other developing polities. Accordingly, both comparativist practitioners and observers work wittingly or unwittingly towards co-opting constitutional development in the latter settings. Consistent with this, moreover, the proper goal for comparative analysis would be the 'debunking' of the hegemonic tendencies spread throughout the discipline. This raises the question of whether the ideological biases attributed by certain critical scholars to comparative constitutional law stand out on their own or whether they are in the end no different than similar biases claimed to be operating in purely domestic fields of public and private law.

3. Challenges

Some claim that comparative analysis, in general, and comparative constitutional analysis, in particular, confront special challenges that do not figure in purely domestic fields of law. Richard Posner thus asserts that for linguistic reasons alone many foreign legal systems are difficult to access. Added to that, in Posner's view, domestic judges and scholars cannot easily attain a sufficient familiarity with foreign legal systems and with the social, cultural, and institutional systems in which the latter are embedded to warrant any confidence in the accuracy or utility of actual comparisons. Furthermore, for those with universalistic tendencies, comparative constitutional law should aim at harmonization and convergence, and search for application of common or functionally equivalent concepts and institutions. Consistent with this, the hope is to achieve common and shared solutions, contributing perhaps to some kind of democratic world order of Kantian world citizens. Writing from a comparative law perspective, Pierre Legrand has cast a particularly stringent criticism on such ambitions:

rules and concepts alone actually tell one very little about a given legal system ... They may provide one with much information about what is apparently happening, but they indicate nothing about the deep structures of legal systems. Specifically, rules and concepts do little to disclose that legal systems are but the surface manifestation of legal cultures and, indeed, of culture tout court. In other words, they limit the observer to a ‘thin description’ and foreclose the possibility of the ‘thick description’ that the analyst ought to regard as desirable.

For Legrand, habits and traditions ('mentalité') play a decisive and divergent role in the interpretation of common rules and concepts. Accordingly, all comparison involves translation, and the current trend to internationalization of constitutional law and to stressing analogies and convergences vastly increases the likelihood of ‘getting lost in translation’.

Another kind of challenge stems from instances in which domestic courts place an implausible interpretive gloss on foreign authorities, apparently for strategic purposes. This may occur in the course of constitutional adjudication in relatively new constitutional democracies, when courts seek to shield controversial and contestable decisions through reference to the constitutional jurisprudence of an established and respected constitutional democracy. For example, several decades ago, the Israeli Supreme Court made reference to American free speech doctrine to justify decisions inconsistent with those of US courts in similar cases. As presumably strategic citation of precedents and authorities also occurs in purely domestic settings—both by advocates and by judges endeavoring to emphasize the soundness of their decisions—a key question is whether the challenge posed by strategic uses of legal authorities is markedly greater in the comparative context as opposed to that of its purely domestic counterpart. One possible answer is suggested by reference to the claim that citation of foreign authorities should be avoided because it is inevitably selective. That is the reason Justice Scalia reproached the US Supreme Court’s majority opinion reference to European jurisprudence in Lawrence v Texas, the case in which the Court held as unconstitutional the criminalization of homosexual sex among consenting adults. Justice Scalia complained that citation of European jurisprudence was selective and thus misleading as in other parts of the world, such as jurisdictions in Asia and South America, the criminalization at issue was deemed constitutional. But by citing these latter jurisdictions, Scalia appears to undermine his assertion that selective citation poses a threat. Actually, familiarity with foreign material allows both promotion and neutralization of selective citations. Arguably, the same can be said for strategic citation.

III. Constitutional Borrowing and Transplantation

Constitutional borrowing and transplantation of constitutional norms, structures, doctrines, and institutions is a fact of life regardless of ideological or theoretical objections to these practices. Furthermore, even those who vigorously object to transplantation in one context may find it entirely appropriate in another. For example, in rejecting the relevance of foreign constitutional experience in the context of adjudicating a dispute concerning the limits of the national government’s powers under US federalism, Justice Scalia emphasized that ‘comparative analysis [is] inappropriate to the task of interpreting a constitution though it [is,] of course, quite relevant to the task of writing one’. Given the proliferation of new constitutions since the end of the Second World War, it would indeed be odd if constitution-makers refrained altogether from looking to foreign constitutions in the course of designing their own. Moreover, as noted, contemporary constitutional adjudicators often consult and cite foreign authorities which inevitably leads to some measure of borrowing or transplantation.

Constitutional ‘transplants’ and influences are thus relevant and important subjects of comparative analysis. However, their evaluation is bound to depend on the particular take one has on the dynamic between similarities and differences across separate constitutional orders. One important variable is how one construes the nexus between constitutional norms and national identity. If the nexus is weak, then transplants may be relatively unproblematic. For example, in advocating implantation of Western-type private property rights and against constitutionalization of social rights in new constitutions for formerly socialist East European polities in transition to market economies, one commentator observes:

It is often said that constitutions, as a form of higher law, must be compatible with the culture and mores of those whom they regulate. In one sense, however, the opposite is true. Constitutional provisions should be designed to work against precisely those aspects of a country’s culture and tradition that are likely to produce harm through that country’s ordinary political processes. There is a large difference between the risks of harm faced by a nation committed by culture and history to free markets, and the corresponding risks in a nation committed by culture and history to social security and general state protection.

Some have argued that the link between a country’s constitution and its national identity may vary greatly. Thus, Mark Tushnet has contrasted the Indian Constitution, which he characterizes as quite removed from the country’s identity, to the US Constitution, which he claims expresses the national character. Does this mean that a country like the United States should be less susceptible to constitutional transplants than one like India? Or does it simply suggest that countries are open to different kinds of transplants, depending on how closely their constitution is linked to their national character?

Constitutional influence or transplants can be either positive or negative. As Andrzej Rapaczynski specifies in the context of borrowing from the United States:

By ‘positive influence’ I mean the adoption or transformation of a legal concept, doctrine, or institution modeled in whole or in part on an American original, where those responsible are aware of the American precedent and this awareness plays some part in their decision. An example is the adoption of the American type of federalism in Australia, or the influence of American First Amendment doctrines on the free speech jurisprudence of Israel. ... By ‘negative influence,’ I mean a process in which an American model is known, considered, and rejected, or in which an American experience perceived as undesirable is used as an argument for not following the American example. Examples of this kind of influence are provided by the Indian decision not to include a due process clause in the Indian constitution, or the portrayal of judicial review as a reactionary American institution in preventing its establishment in France in the first half of the twentieth century. ... 72

In any case, influences and transplants tend to reflect transformation rather than mere copying. For example, the Indian rejection of a due process clause stemmed from a considera (p. 15) tion of the US experience in enshrining substantive property norms in the early twentieth century. 73 Although this interpretation of the Due Process Clause was repudiated in the United States in the 1930s, 74 the Indian framers, acting in the late 1940s, considered the US experience and specifically opted to exclude property due process rights from their new constitution to ensure against repeating the US Lochner experience. 75

Perhaps the most daunting task confronting the comparativist is that of properly evaluating similarities and differences. Initial appearances may not prove accurate. 76 In part, as critical theorists have warned, comparativists may overestimate similarities for ideological reasons. Günther Frankenberg has criticized mainstream comparativists as ‘Anglo-Eurocentric’ paternalists prone to imposing Western hegemonic approaches on the subject and has characterized comparative law as ‘a postmodern form of conquest executed through legal transplants and harmonization strategies’. 77 On the other hand, the comparativist may overemphasize differences and thus fail to focus on more relevant similarities. And the latter failure may either be due to a failure of interpretation because of an insufficient grasp of a foreign constitutional culture or to an ideological bias. For example, reliance on US exceptionalism 78 to refuse to adhere to nearly complete worldwide condemnation of use of the death penalty as punishment for murders committed by juveniles as dissenting justices in Roper v Simmons 79 did, is arguably proof of ideological blindness to a worldwide moral consensus.

Once grafted onto a different constitutional system, transplants can grow, evolve, or atrophy. Growth and evolution are customary within domestic constitutional systems and it is therefore unsurprising that an imported constitutional unit or complex should do likewise while adapting to the new soil into which it has been implanted. Atrophy, in contrast, may stem from a transplant being a mistake or mainly strategic with the importing polity having designs altogether different from those established in the exporting polity. A striking example of atrophy, that may have originally rested on mistaken identification and often later opportunistically appropriated for strategic purposes, is the nearly verbatim importation of US separation of powers and federalism by some Latin American countries. Strikingly, these transplants of a system devoted to a division and decentralization of powers to preserve ‘checks and balances’ have on many occasions been stirred toward virtual presidential dictatorship with full centralization of all powers. 80

In sum, constitutional transplants, both positive and negative, play a central role in constitutional design and deployment. A proper handle on the subject is therefore essential for both participants and observers engaging in comparative constitutional analysis.

(p. 16) IV. Methodology

As the question of methodology is comprehensively and systematically addressed in this Handbook—Chapter 2 by Vicki Jackson is entirely devoted to the subject, and many others touch upon it in many different ways—our purpose here is quite limited. Indeed, there would be no need to address this subject here except for two specific reasons: methodological issues are both central and particularly controversial in comparative constitutional law; and, our organization of this Handbook, which will be explained in Section V below, makes proof at least implicitly of certain methodological assumptions and commitments which fit within an overall framework. Consistent with this, we will discuss very generally what is distinct about methodology in comparative constitutional law and provide some specific comments on various positions on methodology within the field that we hope will shed light on the contents and organization of the present volume.

There are factual and normative issues regarding methodology and though the two are conceptually distinct, they are often linked in practice. For example, if one is of the view that 'constitutional essentials' \(^{81}\) ought to be the same across all constitutional systems, then one may be naturally inclined to treat apparent similarities and differences among various constitutional jurisprudences in ways that depart significantly from similar inquiries launched from the perspective that each constitution is exclusively \textit{sui generis} and that it can only be understood in a purely contextual manner. With this in mind, it becomes apparent that a large number of methodological issues confronting comparative constitutional law are no different than those that confront domestic constitutional law. For instance, in the United States there is an ongoing controversy between originalists—those who believe that the Constitution should be interpreted consistently with the intent of, or the meaning it had for, the framers\(^ {82}\)—and those who maintain that the Constitution should be interpreted in terms of the needs of each successive generation within the democratic polity.\(^ {83}\) Originalists, therefore, will be more prone to concentrate on historical analysis and will therefore be confronted by the methodological issues associated with the latter. Non-originalists, in contrast, will be preoccupied with how best the Constitution can be adapted to fit the needs of the current generation, and the methodological hurdles they will face will therefore be more akin to those encountered in political science or sociology rather than to those found in history. In short, as these two examples illustrate, there is an extent to which methodological divergences within comparative constitutional law seem no different in kind than those present within domestic constitutional law.

On the other hand, the key methodological differences between the two aforementioned fields center on comparison itself. Is comparison feasible, cogent, or useful? What are its dangers or pitfalls? What special skills does it require? Moreover, methodological issues relating directly to comparison seem likely to be compounded when added to them are issues common to comparative and non-comparative analysis. For example, whatever methodological issues may be triggered by comparing constitutional interpretation in the United States and Germany, would they not have to be supplemented by those raised by the split between originalists and non-originalists alluded to above?

Comparison consists in sorting out and accounting for similarities and differences among units that figure as objects of comparison. What ought to count as a relevant similarity or \(\text{(p. 17)}\) difference and the import of such similarity or difference are at the root of the most vexing methodological issues. There are two extreme positions concerning similarities and differences which make comparison trivial or superfluous. At one end of the spectrum is the view that there are no relevant similarities among constitutions and constitutional systems: both are exhaustively and inescapably context-dependent and no two contexts are meaningfully alike. In that case, comparison may still be worthwhile for purposes of adding to the recording of diversity among human institutions and practices, but would seem completely incapable of contributing anything of value to legal practitioners or scholars. At the other end of the spectrum, in contrast, is the view that in spite of all apparent differences, all constitutions are or ought to be similar. They all confront the same problems and offer, or clearly should offer, the same solutions. Consistent with this, comparison would be purely nominal and bereft of any functional role. Debates within comparative constitutional law would be substantively equivalent to those within domestic constitutional law. For example, there would be no relevant difference between debating whether the constitutional jurisprudence of country A strikes a better balance than that of country B between free speech and protection against terrorism and a similar debate among judges on the constitutional court of country C who disagree among themselves along the same lines.

In between these two extremes, however, comparison seems bound to be meaningful and the framing of relevant similarities and differences as well the determination of the latter's import methodologically contestable. Much of the debate focuses on striking a proper balance between identity and difference. Thus, Ruti Teitel argues that comparative constitutional law functionalists tend to overemphasize identity at the expense of difference;\(^ {84}\) that critical legal studies scholars do the opposite;\(^ {85}\) and that a proper balance is most likely to be struck through a dialogical process involving judges and scholars.\(^ {86}\) It may well be that critical scholars fear that exaggeration of similarities can serve hegemonic purposes as Frankenberg claimed in the passage cited earlier.\(^ {87}\) And it may make it easier for functionalists if similarities were to abound.
Upon further reflection, however, neither of these two positions depends on overemphasis in order to remain coherent. A sophisticated functionalist need not gloss over difference in order fruitfully to compare constitutions in terms of functions. Indeed, constitutions can serve a range of functions and these can make use of, or relate to, different configurations of the interplay between identity and difference depending on the circumstances. It may be, for instance, that all constitutions need to afford some bundle of fundamental rights protection in order for the overall scheme that they set to remain in good working order. It may also be that in one constitutional setting greater emphasis on individual rights would be functionally optimal, whereas in another greater promotion of group rights would be. A good functionalist comparativist would have to identify the relevant similarities and differences and analogies and disanalogies, assess their functional import, and do so in terms of the distinct respective overall constitutional schemes involved. Similarly, a thorough critical theorist may be led to conclude that overemphasis of difference may be as effective a tool as overlay of similarities for purposes of invoking constitutional protections better to screen domination and hegemonic designs. The debate on ‘Asian values’ in the context of international human rights provides an apt illustration here. The claim made by proponents of Asian values was that the spreading of international human rights was a political attempt by Western powers to impose their world-view and hegemonic designs worldwide thus trampling on traditional Asian culture and values. However, since the proponents of these claims were closely associated with authoritarian regimes, one could plausibly claim that invocation of difference in this context was designed to evoke the pursuit of liberty and self-determination while in fact boosting a regime bent on the exact opposite.

There are, of course, many other conflicts that arise in comparing constitutions, such as the one that apparently sets function against identity. To the extent that constitutions are expressions of national identity, a mere functional approach to comparison would be misleading. But so would be an exclusively identitarian account. As Vicki Jackson suggests, it may be optimal to combine a functional and identity-based approach. That as it may, whereas there may be room for reasonable disagreement concerning where to draw the line between functional and identitarian concerns, it seems plain that a sound methodology would require some integration of both.

Finally, it is also important to stress that, even assuming consensus on the function versus identity divide, not all comparisons are likely to be the same or to have identical purposes or uses. One may, for instance, assume that euthanasia raises similar kinds of constitutional issues across most Western democracies, but that federalism inevitably varies significantly from one setting to the next. Thus, it may be that comparative work on euthanasia in Canada, Germany, Switzerland, and the United States can safely assume that sufficiently similar conditions in terms of medical science, societal values, and relevant constitutional jurisprudence prevail, so as to make direct comparison and even borrowing easily justifiable. In contrast, no similar comparison seems warranted concerning the respective federalisms adopted in those countries. The purposes and institutional arrangements of these structurally different federalisms differ sufficiently so as to raise substantial questions regarding direct comparison. But even if direct comparison is unwarranted in the context of adjudication, it may still be useful in terms of constitutional design or of a political science assessment of the relation between various institutional arrangements and democracy. More generally, there seems to be a wide range of potentially useful and productive opportunities for comparison at varying levels of abstraction. These start at the concrete doctrinal level as envisioned by Armin von Bogdandy who refers to the construction of a European (Union) public law doctrine built upon common elements emerging from the respective national constitutional jurisprudences of the EU member states. These opportunities extend, moreover, all the way to abstract theoretical inquiries concerning constitutional justice and its relation to delimitation of an optimal interplay between identity and difference.

V. Structure and Organization of the Handbook

Consistent with the preceding observations regarding methodology, the structure and organization of this Handbook is informed by the ongoing dynamic generated through interaction and conflict among the following intersecting and overlapping sets of polarities: similarity and divergence; function and identity; (level of) abstraction and context; theory and application; and (constitutional) law, politics, and (philosophical) criteria of justice and legitimacy. As we have seen, there is widespread disagreement regarding the handling and implications of each of these sets of polarities, and undoubtedly the actual and plausible interactions among the latter are likely to be subject to even greater contestation. We proceed on the assumption that the polarities in question do matter and that interaction among them does, can, and in some cases should, occur. Overall, this dynamic provides some fixed points of reference (eg all comparison encounters axes of similarity and axes of difference) and many overlapping arenas of contestation (eg at what level of abstraction is a comparison of different federalisms warranted?). We seek to account for the latter dynamic as much as possible both within each part and among all parts of the Handbook. Moreover, we aim to link this complex and multifaceted dynamic that encompasses a multiplicity of competing views on comparison to the established pillars of constitutional law: structure, process, rights, and the rule of law. This design, we hope, will best highlight the potential for dialogue emanating from the various contributions made from within a wide array of perspectives originating in several scholarly disciplines and associated with the principal positions within the comparative constitutional law wars.

Specifically, the Handbook is divided into nine parts. Part I, entitled ‘History, Methodology, and Typology’, provides a systematic as well as a historical and contextual account of the principal subjects linked to methodology and to typology. The focus is on the content and context of comparison. The focus on methodology proper is apportioned between analysis in two actual constitutional regimes (Chapter 1) and a systematic account offering a critical appraisal of the principal contending positions (Chapter 2). Typologies are considered from a systemic viewpoint (Chapter 3) and are placed in context through a history of ideas of constitutional designs and conceptions of constitutionalism (Chapter 4). Moreover, as much comparative constitutional analysis relies predominantly on reference to the constitutional systems of Western democracies, this raises the question of whether much that is taken as universally applicable in terms of methodology or typology holds once one moves away from the customary frame of reference. To address this question, examinations of constitutionalism in illiberal polities (Chapter 5) as well as in polities with pervasive poverty (Chapter 6) are provided. Finally, constitutionalists, whether comparative or not, frequently tend to treat constitutional law as all pervasive. But that is most often not the case, and in some settings it is even less so than others. To put all this in perspective, one needs to take a close look into the place of constitutional law in the legal system (Chapter 7).

At once unifying and divisive, some key concepts pervade the constitutional domain. These key concepts are ubiquitous and inherently contested and this becomes magnified and intensified when constitutions are approached comparatively. Part II, ‘Ideas’, tackles the most important among these key concepts: constitutionalism (Chapter 8); constitution (Chapter 9); rule of law (Chapter 10); democracy (Chapter 11); the state (Chapter 12); rights and liberties as concepts (Chapter 13); the public/private divide (Chapter 14); state neutrality (Chapter 15); the constitution and justice (Chapter 16); sovereignty (Chapter 17); dignity and autonomy (Chapter 18); and gendered visions of the constitution (Chapter 19). No cogent account of constitutional law, let alone comparative constitutional law, can dispense with these concepts. They at once erect a conceptual framework, anchor a common vocabulary and grammar, and (p. 20) break into a multitude of warring conceptions. They are all meant to provide a common currency, but each can yield more than one currency that may qualify as a candidate to become the common one. Consistent with this, each of these concepts is tackled by an author who, while referring to the plurality of relevant interpretations at stake, carves out his or her own distinct conception of the concept under study.

Part III, ‘Process’, zeroes in on the dynamics inherent in, and projected by, the constitution. It deals both with the constitution as process and with the processes launched or molded by the constitution. Constitution-making most clearly casts the constitution as process (Chapter 20), but so do, at least in part, emergencies (Chapter 21) and secession (Chapter 23) in as much as they relate to the continuation, suspension, or cessation of the constitution as well as being susceptible of figuring as processes provided for, and regulated by, the constitution. There are also processes grounded in, and shaped by, the constitution. Chief among these are: war powers (Chapter 22); referenda (Chapter 24); and elections (Chapter 25).

Process goes hand in hand with structure, but we have named Part IV ‘Architecture’ to convey that constitutions need and endeavor to construct more than mere structures. Architecture requires conception, planning, designing, and giving expression to a particular objective in terms of designated functions and in conformity with a distinct aesthetic design. The architect needs to integrate structure, function, and aesthetics in a proportionate and harmonious manner. Reliance on the concept of architecture, moreover, facilitates comparison as one can focus on how different architectural designs accommodate similar functional needs and on how architecture can be used to accommodate different functions and uses. Focus on architecture also allows for fruitful inquiry into the relation of the part and the whole and on the structural conjunctions between parts and between the latter and the whole. Included are analyses of: horizontal structuring (Chapter 26); vertical structuring (Chapter 27); internal ordering of the unitary state (Chapter 28); presidentialism (Chapter 29); parliamentarism (Chapter 30); and the regulatory state (Chapter 31).
Constitutions are expressions of the visions and goals of the polity to which they are attached. They project the identity of the latter while at the same time acquiring and developing an identity of their own. Constitutions at once interpret (the needs and aspirations of those they are designed for) and must be interpreted (both in whole and in part). Constitutions are endowed with meaning and at the same time are meaning-endowing. They also acquire texture as they accumulate the imprints of historical deployment in a particular socio-political setting. Part V, ‘Meanings/Textures’, deals with these subjects which at once greatly benefit from, and afford sharper insights into, comparative analysis. Indeed, concentration on meanings and textures highlights the relationship between poles of identity and poles of difference, both within a constitutional culture and across several different ones. Meanings and textures are front and center in interpreting the constitution (Chapter 32). Moreover, a particularly propitious comparative window into meanings and textures emerges in the context of proportionality. As already mentioned, some have claimed that proportionality has become the common currency throughout the entire constitutional domain. Accordingly, proportionality should allow for a systematic staking out of all that which is essentially similar across constitutional systems as well and at the same time providing the necessary tools to determine the exact thrust and import of every difference that ought to count. Yet, there are sharp disagreements as to the meaning and scope of proportionality which have prompted us to include two contending views on the subject. Proportionality I (Chapter 33), presents a rather restrictive conception of the proper role of the proportionality standard, whereas Proportionality II (Chapter 34) adopts a much more expansive view of it. As constitutions produce meaning, this raises the question of whether each constitution can develop a distinct identity of its own which (p. 21) differs from that of other constitutions and from the other relevant extra-constitutional identities, such as national identity, within the polity within which the constitution in question is embedded (Chapter 35).

Finally, constitutions can and do incorporate values and principles that yield determinate meanings and textures (Chapter 36).

Constitutional order depends on the presence and proper functioning of institutions that attend to maintenance of the requisite integrity of structures, processes, to vindication of fundamental rights, and to the safeguard of the rule of law. Part VI, ‘Institutions’, concentrates on some of the most important institutions and institutional issues relating to maintenance of an optimal constitutional order: insuring constitutional efficacy (Chapter 37); constitutional courts (Chapter 38); judicial independence (Chapter 39); the judiciary (Chapter 40); and political parties (Chapter 41).

The next two parts of the Handbook are devoted to fundamental rights under the constitution. The division into two parts is motivated by the recognition that some rights, such as liberty or equality, are better conceived as distinct self-enclosed units, whereas others, such as abortion, as involving an overlap among a number of distinct rights, including liberty, equality, and privacy. From a comparative standpoint, rights appear to occupy a privileged position as both similarities and differences, convergences and divergences, seem immediately apparent, and explanations for these often strike one as being readily available (though further inquiry may at times prove initial impressions misleading). It thus seems evident that all religiously pluralistic polities need deployment of a constitutional right to freedom of religion, and yet a canvassing of such polities reveals that the right in question comes in many significant variations ranging from strict secularism to the recognition of an official state religion. More generally, there seems to be a widespread need for a bundle of the same rights across constitutional cultures and a different treatment of these rights depending on the particulars of each of the constitutional cultures involved. Part VII, ‘Rights’, addresses: freedom of expression (Chapter 42); freedom of religion (Chapter 43); due process (Chapter 44); associative rights (Chapter 45); privacy (Chapter 46); citizenship (Chapter 48); social rights (Chapter 49); and rights in the economic life (Chapter 50). Part VIII, ‘Overlapping Rights’, in turn addresses: abortion (Chapter 51); rights based on sexual orientation (Chapter 52); group rights (Chapter 53); affirmative action (Chapter 54); and, rights arising out of bioethics (Chapter 55).

Part IX, ‘Trends’, culs together relatively new constitutional movements and tendencies and others that are nascent but seem poised in all likelihood to assume a greater role in the future. What unites all these trends is that they are jointly and severally altering and expanding the boundaries of constitutionalism and of constitutional regimes. Also, these trends suggest greater interrelation and interpenetration among different constitutional regimes operating along both vertical and horizontal axes. Whereas on the surface these trends may seem to pull towards greater common identity, upon further consideration they seem more likely to reorient the dynamic between identities and differences than to foster uniformity across ever vaster expanses. The specific subjects covered are: the internationalization of constitutional law (Chapter 56); the European Constitution (Chapter 57); the constitutionalization of public international law (Chapter 58); the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights and its effects on the constitutional systems of Europe (Chapter 59); militant democracy (Chapter 60); constitutional transformation and transitional justice (Chapter 61); Islam and constitutional ordering (Chapter 62); constitutional borrowings and transplants (Chapter 63); and the use of comparative constitutional law in constitutional adjudication (Chapter 64). (p. 22)

Notes:

(1) See Rosenfeld, Chapter 1B.

(2) See Halmi, Chapter 64.

(3) See Spielmann, Chapter 59.

(4) See eg Thomas Hobbes, Leviathan (1651); John Locke, Two Treatises of Government (1689); on the early natural law tradition, see Hugo Grotius, De iure belli ac pacis (1625).

(6) See Louis-Alexandre La Rochefoucauld d’Enville, Constitutions des treize États-Unis de l’Amérique (1783); Nicolas de Condorcet, De l’influence de la révolution d’Amérique sur l’Europe (1786).

(9) See John Stuart Mill, Considerations on Representative Government (1861).

(10) See Henri-Benjamin Constant de Rebecque, The Liberty of Ancients Compared with that of Moderns (1816); Alexis de Tocqueville, Democracy in America, vol I (Henry Reeve trans, 1835); József Eötvös, The Influence of the Nineteenth Century’s Dominant Ideas on the State (1851, 1854).

(11) See further Grimm, Chapter 4.

(13) A.V. Dicey, Law of the Constitution (1885); see Krygier, Chapter 10.

(15) See von Bogdandy, Chapter 1A.

(16) Ibid.

(17) See Frederic Austin Ogg, The Governments of Europe (1913), VIII.

(19) Adhémar Esmein, Éléments de droit constitutionnel français et comparé (1899). Esmein was also the founder of Nouvelle revue historique du droit français et étranger.

(20) See Léon Duguit, Law in the Modern State (Frida Laski and Harold Laksi trans, 1901).

(22) See eg Édouard Lambert, Le Gouvernement des juges et la lutte contre la législation sociale aux États-Unis. L’expérience américaine du contrôle judiciaire de la constitutionnalité des lois (1921).

(25) Ogg (n 17); Herman Finer, in The Theory and Practice of Modern Government (1932) continued the tradition of comparing governments while adding a theoretical-constitutionalist dimension. This was a lasting tradition: the last reprint of Finer's 1949 revised edition was published in 1970.

(28) Ernst Fraenkel, The Dual State (1941).

(29) Published in 1948.

(31) Carl J. Friedrich, Constitutional Government and Democracy: Theory and Practice in Europe and America (1941); see also Carl J. Friedrich, Constitutional Government and Politics (1937).

(32) Though closer to political philosophy, Friedrich von Hayek’s The Constitution of Liberty (1960) fits into this tradition.

(33) Friedrich, Constitutional Government and Democracy (n 31), 505.

(35) See Bernhard Schwartz, American Constitutional Law (1955), X. The book is full of comparative references, as it was written for an English audience.

(39) In Italy, Giuseppe De Vergottini had already published his Diritto costituzionale comparato in 1981 (7th edn, 2010).

(40) Cours constitutionnelles européennes et droits fondamentaux (1982).

(41) Georg Jellinek, Allgemeine Staatsrechtslehre (1905); for the reliance on comparative material see eg Georg Jellinek, Das Recht des modernen Staates (1900).

(45) See Margaret A. Burnham, ‘Cultivating a Seedling Charter: South Africa’s Court Grows its Constitution’ (1997) 3 Michigan Journal of Race and Law 29, 44 (concerning the use by the South African Constitutional Court of comparative jurisprudence as a means for South Africa to claim ‘its place among the world’s constitutional democracies’); and State v Mhlugu, 1995 (3) SALR 867, 917 (CC) (according to Justice Sachs, South Africa’s constitutional jurisprudence must take its place ‘as part of a global development of constitutionalism and human rights’).

(47) Ibid.

(49) See eg Édouard Lambert, Étude de droit commun législatif, la fonction du droit civil comparé (1903).

(53) Compare the respective chapters in this volume by Bernhard Schlink (Chapter 33) and Aharon Barak (Chapter 34).

(54) See Thio, Chapter 5.

(55) On horizontal effects see Gardbaum, Chapter 7.

(58) See Montesquieu (n 14), 8.

(60) See Mary Ann Glendon, Comparative Legal Traditions (2nd edn, 1994), 10.

(68) 539 US 558 (2003).

(73) See Lochner v New York 198 US 45 (1905) (New York law limiting number of hours of work of bakery employees held to violate due process property rights of employers and employees).

(74) See Nebbia v New York 291 US 502 (1934) and West Coast Hotel Co v Parrish 300 US 379 (1937).

(78) See Rosenfeld, Chapter 1B.

(85) Ibid 2582.

(86) Ibid 2595–6.

(87) See n 77.

(89) See Jackson, Chapter 2.

(90) See eg Washington v Glucksberg 521 US 702 (1997) (in deciding that there was no US constitutional right to assisted suicide, the Supreme Court referred to several Western jurisdictions that had already judicially dealt with the issue).
(91) See eg Printz v United States 521 US 898 (1997) (Justice Scalia and Justice Breyer disagreeing on the relevance of delegation of implementation of federal regulation to local federated state authorities under German federalism for purposes of determining the constitutionality of similar delegation under US federalism).

(92) See von Bogdandy, Chapter 1B.

(93) See Gargarella, Chapter 16; Rosenfeld, Chapter 35; Jacobsohn, Chapter 36.

Michel Rosenfeld
Michel Rosenfeld is Justice Sydney L. Robins Professor of Human Rights and Director, Program on Global and Comparative Constitutional Theory, Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law

András Sajó
András Sajó is Judge, European Court of Human Rights, Strasbourg and University Professor (on leave), Central European University, Budapest
Abstract and Keywords

This article presents an analysis of comparative constitutional law. This study compares some elements of the development of constitutional scholarship in Europe. The emerging European constitutional scholarship as a form of comparative constitutional law scholarship cannot be understood without looking at the traditions of scholarship at the level of national constitutional law. In the continent, the decisive form of scholarship can be described as one of doctrinal constructivism. Doctrinal constructivism represents a singular combination of theory and practice, and stresses the practical importance of constitutional scholarship in many European countries.

Keywords: comparative law, constitutional regimes, constitutional European scholarship, doctrinal constructivism, United States, constitutional adjudication

I. Premises, Object, and Purposes 26
II. The Evolutionary Paths 27
   1. The ‘Positivist Legal Method’ 28
   2. Expansion I: Reality, Theory, and Great Narratives 29
   3. Expansion II: Seizing the Crown 30
III. Europeanization within the European Legal Area 31
    1. Diagnosis: Crisis and Opportunity 31
    2. Prognosis: Ius Publicum Europaeum by Comparative Constitutional Law 34

(p. 26) I. Premises, Object, and Purposes

New dimensions open up for comparative constitutional scholarship due to European integration, not least because it shakes traditional ways of undertaking constitutional scholarship. One challenge is the project of creating a European research area, including the humanities, social sciences, and legal scholarship, in order to foster research through new opportunities and increased competition, as it happened with the Single European Market. More contact and more confrontation imply more comparison, and the establishment of the new area leads to questioning established topics and methods, publication and career patterns, reputation hierarchies, and even identities. The overwhelmingly national organization of constitutional scholarship is coming under pressure.

A second challenge stems from the rapid development of the European legal area with ever more issues of constitutional importance, often tightly interlinked with international legal phenomena. This undermines the established scholarship’s usual focus on one single source: the national constitution. Whereas the constitution was formerly conceived as creating a normative universe, it is now increasingly understood as being but a part of a normative pluriverse, pushing towards comparison.
A third challenge is occasioned by leading US institutions which considerably participate in the formation of future academic leaders for the European research area. As varied as legal research is in these institutions, it almost always contrasts with the usual way of carrying out legal research in Europe. In a globalized system of legal research, the sheer prestige of these institutions, but also the competition for winning the best minds and influence abroad, call for a stocktaking of constitutional scholarship in Europe.

In light of these challenges, this contribution will compare some elements of the development of constitutional scholarship in Europe. The emerging European constitutional scholarship as a form of comparative constitutional law scholarship cannot be understood without looking at the traditions of scholarship at the level of national constitutional law. In the continent, the decisive form of scholarship can be described as one of doctrinal constructivism. As the focus of the discipline, this is defining its roles and identity. Doctrinal constructivism represents a singular combination of theory and practice, and stresses the practical importance of constitutional scholarship in many European countries.

When Ernest Gellner asserts: ‘The foundation of the modern social order is not the executioner, but the professor’, this statement appears particularly suited for legal scholarship. Although not everyone would agree with this categorical assertion of theory’s superiority to practice, no one would deny that legal scholars have a key role in the legal order of the member states of the European Union. Legal scholarship not only describes from an external point of view, it also shapes from within. One can even recognize the identity of a public law system as being grounded in scholarship’s conceptual creations, illustrations of which are the concepts of Staatssouveränität for Germany, service public for France, or parliamentary sovereignty for Britain. Legal scholarship develops and often even devises the fundamental concepts and structures, elucidates and legitimates the current law in light of general principles, inspires (p. 27) and criticizes legal developments, and shapes the next generation of jurists. Many legal scholars, often on the basis of scholarly reputation, also act directly as legal practitioners: as legal experts, advisors, counsel, or, in consummation of an academic career, as judges. A thorough understanding of a legal order is hardly conceivable without a familiarity with its legal scholarship.

This analysis presents legal scholarship as a science, at least in the meaning of the German concept of Wissenschaft. Granted, the use of the label ‘science’ is problematic, especially regarding academic writing presenting the law construed as legal doctrine, for various reasons. Distinctions between truth and falsity here have only limited relevance; there is only rudimentary methodological reflection on how to construe doctrine; and the active participation of many legal scholars in legal practice hardly seems to represent scientific neutrality. It is certainly arguable that doctrinal analysis—the main field of legal scholarship in Europe—forms part of the (legal) practice rather than of the world of science. Tellingly, the terms Verfassungsrecht, diritto costituzionale, and constitutional law denote not only the object, the constitutional law in force, but also the corresponding scholarly discipline.

Nevertheless, this observation need not undermine the conception of legal scholarship as a science, a Wissenschaft: legal scholars are members of institutions within the ‘scientific system’, dedicating thought, lectures, and publications to systematic exposition of public law, in a professionalized scheme and ‘unburdened’ by the need to decide cases. So it comes as no surprise that legal scholarship is institutionalized at universities. Accordingly, it is covered by the constitutional guarantee of a freedom of science (Wissenschaft), and not only by the more general freedom of speech. Indeed, historically, the law faculty has from the beginning been one of the basic elements of the (continental) European university. Accordingly, most continental constitutional scholars conceive constitutional scholarship as a science, but few as a social science. Geisteswissenschaft or the stand-alone term of legal sciences (the plural is due to the dualism of canon law and civil law) embodies the predominant understanding. This corresponds well with the importance of doctrinal constructivism.

An examination of legal scholarship should not limit itself to examining the research. In perhaps no other Wissenschaft are research and teaching so closely connected. The development of material for instruction constitutes one of the central tasks of research in legal science: across Europe, the leading treatises and textbooks receive significantly more scholarly attention than in most of the other academic disciplines.

II. The Evolutionary Paths
A legal dispute necessarily relates back to the actions of a constitution-maker, a lawmaker, or a court. Although this backward-looking dimension is an inherent aspect of law and legal scholarship, many legal scholars seem nonetheless forgetful of their discipline's history. Comparative constitutional law scholarship cannot be understood without looking into the national histories of constitutional law scholarship. Seldom is a concept or doctrinal proposition traced back to its originator and its original context. What seems to matter most is a concept's acceptance in current legal discourse. This masking of the course of development need not cause alarm: forward-looking problem-solving, based on established positions, is a hallmark of a self-confident science. But such a stance does not eliminate the prior evolution: the historicity of all cultural and social phenomena, their 'path dependency', has been acknowledged since Vico, Montesquieu, and Romanticism.

1. The ‘Positivist Legal Method’

In the development of Europe's diverse systems of constitutional scholarship, one can distinguish between synchronous and asynchronous milestones. Certain milestones were reached simultaneously by most scholarly systems. This type includes especially those of the ‘positivist legal method’. Other milestones signify similar substantial achievements with comparable consequences, but different legal orders reach them at different points in time. Examples include the scholarly developments triggered by the progression to liberal and democratic constitutions or by the establishment of a constitutional court, or by Europeanization.

Nonetheless (or perhaps therefore), the ‘positivist legal method's’ disciplinary approach still informs the research of most public law scholars in Europe; this holds true cum grano salis even in the United Kingdom. This approach aspires to provide a comprehensive survey of relevant legal material, to develop structuring legal concepts, and to arrange the material accordingly. At the same time, it needs to be noted that scholarship is not as it was 100 years ago but has evolved on account of critique and a changing context. For example, consequentialist reasoning and balancing of interests are far more important today. Without a doubt, the way a 'legal system' is understood has also changed; such understanding is of formative importance for the understanding of the subject matter of comparison in comparative constitutional law scholarship. Previously, a system tended to be crypto-idealistically understood as inherent in the law, whereas today systems are more often (and correctly) seen as construed instruments for the ordering and managing of the law. Similarly, the understanding of what a system can accomplish in the law in general and in legal practice in particular has changed, thereby reducing its role. This, though, does not diminish the system-orientation of scholarship as such. Given the problems of the concept of positivism and this transformed and reduced understanding, doctrinal constructivism might be a more suitable terminology. This development has happened, however, within the discipline as it was founded then. The defining elements are the quest for systematicity through the development of general concepts and structures and the perception of these as ‘internal’ and operative within the legal system.

'Constitutional court positivism' (Verfassungsgerichtspositivismus) leads the agenda of the ‘positivist legal method’ forward into a new era, characterized by constitutional courts’ fundamental rights decisions and the attendant materialization and expansion of constitutional law. This approach is again taken over as granted in comparative constitutional law scholarship, and is reinforced by the judicial use of the comparative method. This positivism systematizes constitutional jurisprudence and thereby upholds the original doctrinal agenda in times of balancing-happy constitutional courts.

The general, pan-European success of this agenda in the early twentieth century did not lead to total uniformity of academic practice; actually, the scope of implementation of the agenda is quite varied.

The realization that the law should be grasped and handled not only as a set of given rules, but also as the object and result of societal conflict, did not bring about an abandonment of the systematic working mode, any more than did the discipline's increasing socio-technological dimension. This facet should not be underestimated in terms of its significance for the possibility of a common, Europe-wide scholarship of law. This working profile also distinguishes European legal science from its US-American counterpart, where the 'legal positivist' or 'doctrinal' approach has been largely abandoned, at least in leading institutions, because of the impact of so-called legal realism, but also due to ethical conceptions along the lines of Ronald Dworkin. Although casuistry, ‘case law’, has become more important in Europe, nowhere does legal scholarship operate as though a 'case law'-orientation could ever replace a conceptual-doctrinal orientation. One can also formulate this as an ethical argument: fostering and maintaining systematic coherence undergirds the ideas of legal certainty, equality, and, thereby, justice. These broad issues might constitute the future agenda of comparative constitutional law scholarship.

2. Expansion I: Reality, Theory, and Great Narratives

Most manifestations of the positivistic agenda lead to a division of the normative from the empirical, a separation of the law from social reality. Many consider this division constitutive of the discipline's autonomy; it is even conceived as an ontological datum. However, some constitutional scholars worry that this division may leave them out of touch with reality and may prevent them from doing justice to the ‘life’ which law and legal scholarship are supposed to serve. Precisely for this reason, the positivistic project faced vehement criticism from the very beginning—with remarkable delay in Austria due to Kelsen’s overwhelming influence. In response to the establishment of the positivistic agenda, the call for an integration of ‘reality’ and ‘fundaments’ into constitutional and public law studies rang almost everywhere, albeit with significant variation in volume and pitch.

This disciplinary agenda to ‘integrate reality’ expands the discipline of constitutional law into other areas after its successful establishment. The expansion permits the discipline to reflect on its foundations and to exchange—and compete—with other disciplines which also strive to analyse and interpret social reality. Today, many continental scholars could subscribe to some bland and broad form of realism. The expansion becomes more justifiable the less weight one ascribes to the positivistic distinction between law and fact: the more one understands law as part of the societal whole, the better one can use legal expertise as the basis both for assertions about societal reality and for opinions on its development.

In contrast to the success of the agenda of the ‘positivist legal method’, the ‘integration of reality’ and theoretical reflection fail to conjoin into a common disciplinary platform: here, as opposed to the doctrinal sphere, the relevant insights are often incommensurate.

3. Expansion II: Seizing the Crown

For the formation of comparative constitutional law and its science, the expansion of constitutional law and scholarship with the intention of enthroning it as the supreme discipline among the ranks of legal scholarship (‘seizing the crown’) is of decisive importance. Constitutional scholarship tries to develop constitutional law’s formal supremacy into a towering substantive influence of constitutional arguments in legal discourse in general. The metaphor ‘seizing the crown’ comprises diverse lines of development in both the legal order and constitutional scholarship over the past 50 years: strengthening of fundamental and human rights, constitutional judicial review, constitutionalization of the legal order (i.e., the orientation of the entire legal order towards constitutional principles), an accordant ethos among legal practitioners, the comprehension of constitutional principles as social values, and the perception of constitutional law as a vehicle for social integration. Comparative constitutional law is often used to demonstrate that these phenomena are part of a global trend and therefore have the legitimacy of normalcy.

Granted, I argue this development not only from the perspective of constitutional law, but additionally from a German point of view. For some systems of constitutional academia, an ascent to supreme discipline is more wishful thinking than current praxis. The relevant phenomena appear at different points in time and with varying intensity. Nonetheless, such developments occur in most legal orders in Europe, at times with the aid of European law. In this sense, Article 4(2) of the Treaty on European Union as amended by the Treaty of Lisbon even grounds the member states’ identities in the basic features of the national constitution. If the premises of this assumption are sound, then the constitution forms the core of the identity of the national legal order, which necessarily means it plays a role well beyond its merely formal supremacy. Article 4(2) can also be seen as the expression of political consensus on such an understanding of constitutional law among all member states; such a view falls in line with the concept of ‘seizing the crown’. To put it another way, if there can be a supreme discipline within legal scholarship at all, then in Europe the crown can only belong to constitutional law.

The basis of this expansion is made up of fundamental and human rights and constitutional judicial review: more conflict, more cases, more constitutional law. The more the constitutional law, the more the available matter for comparison. After the Second World War, European legal orders procedurally and substantively bolstered their fundamental rights, most importantly by way of judicial review of statutes. In some instances this took place directly and massively, as a reaction to authoritarian or even totalitarian experiences (Germany, Greece, Italy, Poland, Spain, or Hungary); in other instances, it was in the course of (p. 31) strengthening the rule of law (France, the United Kingdom, the Netherlands, Sweden, or Switzerland).17 These developments invite scholarly comparative law reflections. In certain constitutional orders, international law plays a crucial role in this latter line of development: in France, the Netherlands, Switzerland, and the United Kingdom, the rights in the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) provide the foundation for this development; this even includes Austria's legal tradition, which is sceptical of balancing. Ultimately, constitutional scholarship succeeds in appropriating these rights as its own subject matter, even, as in the United Kingdom, under the premise of separation of constitutional law and human rights.

The body of law that sets up the state's structure is distinct from fundamental rights, inter alia, in that the former is a closed set. Fundamental rights, by contrast, can become relevant in an unforeseeable number of conflict constellations, usually covered by statutes and other legal acts ranking below the constitution. This relevance triggers a constitutionalization of the legal order, which is to say, an orientation of the entire legal order towards paramount constitutional principles, which in turn leads to a corresponding pre-eminence for the science that deals with this material. In the process, constitutional law is elevated above the mere status of one subject matter among many. To the extent human rights stand above the national setting, they necessitate a comparative scholarly approach.

Constitutionalization is especially intensive where the legal order provides for constitutional judicial review of judicial decisions, of cases. Due to the possibility of individual applications against court decisions under Article 34 ECHR and the corresponding expanding jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, the various developments are increasingly framed within the common legal framework of the ECHR. Such constitutionalization sometimes leads to significant conflict, as exemplified by the continuous struggle between the Spanish Constitutional Court and the Spanish Supreme Court.18 Widely varying motives may underlie this struggle—from the self-interests of certain disciplines and institutions to divergent conceptualizations of order and justice.19

III. Europeanization within the European Legal Area

1. Diagnosis: Crisis and Opportunity

The opening of national legal orders to supra- and international law, especially the law of the European Union and perhaps also the ECHR, has triggered a process of change, not only in national constitutional law, but also in its scholarship. Many believe that national constitutional law has even entered a new era.

This change is, first of all, of a thematic nature: new provisions in national constitutional law, such as integration clauses, have attracted the attention of constitutional scholars, and (p. 32) traditional teachings, for example on sovereignty or democracy, have been rethought in light of the challenges of European law.20 The change is also structural, wherein lies its true nature: thus, the discipline frees itself from the exclusive linkage to a specific source of law, that is, the domestic constitution; it develops new perspectives; comparative law gains in importance; a European level for institutionalized scientific exchange, career, reputation, and publication unfolds; and a European area of constitutional scholarship appears on the horizon.

However, as definite as the existence of change may be, the diagnoses remain unsure as to what exactly is changing, what recommendations should be made, and how one should react; and the prognosis is unclear as to what gestalt will permit the discipline to restabilize within the European legal area. One can already observe changes in scholarly styles, distribution of attention, public and private institutions, the media, reputational dynamics, and career paths, and perhaps even changes in loyalties and scholarly, political, and social identities. One can state that the advent of a European legal area inspires innovative constitutional theories and strengthens interdisciplinarity.

Because, in principle, the law of the European Union has uniform effect in each member's constitutional order, one can expect here to observe the most advanced Europeanization in constitutional scholarship. In fact, constitutional scholarship everywhere is aware of this challenge, and Union law has been integrated everywhere as part of mandatory university coursework. Usually, Union law is not only offered in an introductory specialized class, but also integrated in the teaching of various bodies of law. It would be worthwhile to study whether this instruction in its present form fosters a European identity in the future bar.21
Many constitutional scholars were not satisfied with merely retracing the developments. Instead, constitutional scholarship provides a platform for many voices critical of Europeanization, calling for a slowing or redirecting of the process. This fulfills both the discipline's societal function of contemporary critic and its practical function of intervening in the law's course of development. Often, categories of constitutional law, such as sovereignty or democracy, provide terminological points of reference for public discourse on the implications of European integration. In some states, only constitutional law, prepared by scholarly articles, could ultimately enable the formation of political opposition, which otherwise could find no voice in the political establishment. In a pluralist democracy, this scholarly engagement confirms the public role of this body of scholarship, thereby strengthening its functional legitimacy.

The constitutional impact of the ECHR is quite different for two main reasons. First, some states derive much of their domestic fundamental rights protection from the ECHR's provisions, whereas in other countries the autonomous fundamental rights of the national constitution fulfill this role. Secondly, the legal status of the Convention varies under different national constitutions: the ECHR does not—in contrast to Union law—determine its own status in domestic law. As a consequence, its role in research and university instruction among the member states is quite heterogeneous.

For example, the ECHR has difficulty in finding its place in Germany along the spectrum of scholarly attention, and it stands at the periphery of the required legal curriculum. Here, though, Germany appears to be rather the exception that proves the rule: most domestic scholarship incorporates the ECHR in constitutional doctrine relating to national fundamental rights. And this holds true, a fortiori, when the ECHR's provisions substantively fulfill the role of constitutionally guaranteed fundamental rights: then academic study of the ECHR is (p. 33) not reserved to international law scholarship but becomes one of the main objects of constitutional scholarship.

From the perspective of the European area of research and that of the European legal area, the question arises: have the rights of the ECHR, the jurisprudence that deals with them, whether in the European Court of Human Rights, the European Court of Justice, or national courts, and the relevant legal scholarship begun to form a lingua franca in the discourse on fundamental rights in the European legal area? This, in turn, confronts domestic constitutional scholarship, wherever the ECHR does not yet have a leading role, with a crucial question: should it continue its specific path of conceptual, doctrinal, and terminological development, guarding its identity, or instead join the European convoy for purposes of European cohesion, not least in order to gain a voice? Because fundamental rights have such a central role, the answer to this question will have deep implications for each and every part of constitutional law and the legal order in general.

At least as varied as the respective role of the ECHR is the role of comparative law in the national systems of constitutional scholarship. In German constitutional law after the Second World War, some of the most important works had recourse to the law of the United States. Comparative law's minimal influence may also be partially due to the occasionally held conviction that Germany's constitutional law is the best in the world: if so, little can be learned from foreign law. It is no accident that only as late as 2005 was a German-language textbook on comparative constitutional law published (having been penned by an Austrian!). A parallel situation unfolded in the United Kingdom, where both of the fundamental texts celebrate British constitutional law as the world's best: Bagehot with respect to the Constitution of the United States, and Dicey with French public law in mind. In Sweden, as well, right up to the threshold of European Union membership, constitutional scholarship remained under the spell of the national constitution.

In the early 1990s, the situation began to alter. The 'second phase' of German public law saw an increase in the importance of intra-European comparative constitutionalism. Comparative law also made gains in the United Kingdom, albeit with less of a European connection than an interest in English-speaking, common law countries. The Swedish accession to the European Union even led to an international reorientation of Swedish public law, both as to content, for instance a new emphasis on separation of powers, and as to formal aspects, such as an increase in English-language publications.

In most other states, comparative law has for a much longer period played an important role in national constitutional studies, counting as an essential part of proper constitutional scholarship. Comparative law has been constitutive of both Greek and Polish public law since the early nineteenth century, with an accordingly strong academic emphasis. France's new system of constitutional scholarship includes a constituent comparative law component, facilitating a distancing from the dominant tradition of thought which has emphasized administrative law.\textsuperscript{26} Thus, an epoch of comparative law is dawning in the European legal area. This leads to the prognoses.

2. Prognosis: \textit{Ius Publicum Europaeum} by Comparative Constitutional Law

The above diagnoses permit the prognosis that comparative constitutionalism in the European legal area will increase in importance—and will increase in importance as a standard component of scholarship rather than as a separate discipline. It is more difficult to predict whether this will bring about a common public law, a new form of \textit{ius publicum europaeum}.

The prognosis that the European Union's constitutional orders will not meld into a unitary system appears safe; rather, each constitutional order will integrate European influences into its existing lines of development preserving its own respective gestalt, both formally and substantively. Yet this does not rule out a \textit{ius publicum europaeum}. This will require, in accordance with the term's dual meaning, first, a common constitutional law and, secondly, an integrated scholarship.

Historically, the term \textit{ius publicum europaeum} describes both a common system of scholarship and a body of law assembled from diverse components, in particular the law of the Holy Roman Empire, the rights of the Territories, and a set of norms that would now be conceived of as international and natural law. In this sense, definite parallels can be drawn with the current legal situation in the European legal area, suggesting that reference back to the old term may prove useful.\textsuperscript{27} The European legal area emerges from multiple masses of law, conceptualized simultaneously as interwoven and independent. These include Union law, the ECHR, and the various corpora of national public law. Inasmuch, there already is a \textit{ius publicum europaeum}.

The situation is different in academia. The historical \textit{ius publicum europaeum} implied an integrated scholarly culture. In nineteenth-century Germany, one even finds a public law discipline without an underlying, solid foundation of constitutional law,\textsuperscript{28} in many aspects similar to legal studies in nineteenth-century Poland.\textsuperscript{29} Today's situation is almost the inverse. (p. 35) Europe shares two solidified layers of public law, each with constitutional elements: the law of the European Union and the law of the Human Rights Convention. But no European constitutional scholarship has similarly solidified in parallel. The systems of constitutional scholarship in Europe are still a long way from any common constitutional scholarship. The differences reflect the diversity of national scholarly styles and cultures. This evidences the obvious fact that a \textit{ius publicum europaeum}, in the sense of a solidified European context for discussion and reception, currently still exists only in fragments.

Should there be such an overarching scholarship at all? Against the backdrop of the discipline's self-conception, as varied as its given manifestations may be, the answer can hardly be anything but in the affirmative. Such progression is beneficial beyond the discipline's own interests: there is a close nexus between a well-developed constitutional scholarship and a strong democracy.

What might such a scholarly field look like? Very probably, the research landscape will be differentiated even further. Far from drying out, national constitutional scholarship on the various domestic constitutions would, rather, be enriched. It seems anything but certain that the area of research most promising for reputation and career will always be that of the \textit{ius publicum europaeum}; one must be careful not to underestimate the resiliency of the national systems.

With respect to the discipline of a \textit{ius publicum europaeum}, one can expect the knowledge of its scholars to be fragmentary and heterogeneous: no one will know the law and the scholarly output in the European legal area to any similar extent as in a national legal area. Yet, a \textit{ius publicum europaeum} will require more than occasional ‘irritation’ (understood in terms of system theory) of national production. At the same time, the litmus test for a common European scholarship should not be the emergence of comprehensive doctrinal patterns. It appears to be quite possible to respond to the heterogeneity of the legal material with a strengthening of theoretical components, as shown by the US research landscape, which encompasses 51 different legal systems.\textsuperscript{30} This could lead to stronger recourse to legal philosophers who are considered part of the common European heritage, from Aristotle and Hobbes to Habermas and MacCormick, but also to the formation of disparate and separate transnational scientific communities, engaging in specific discourses on legal theory. Yet, the strong doctrinal component of most scholarly traditions in Europe makes a general substitution of doctrine by theory unlikely. The mindset of a lawyer educated in the tradition of doctrinalism is very different to that of a lawyer taught to believe that doctrines are more or less an illusion. Accordingly, the various doctrines could evolve by thickening the comparative component. A European comparative doctrinal discourse can distil legal arguments that are of general use when construing constitutional law under the various constitutions. Of great importance along this path will be legal education; its Europeanization, in the sense of a ius publicum europaeum, is still in a very early stage. Can such a project of a ius publicum europaeum as a ‘thick’ scholarly discourse succeed? The road ahead is long, and the journey will be arduous: the language issue, the immensity of the research and publication landscape, and the myriad aspects of the European economic and legal area come immediately to mind. Nonetheless, in less than a century the discipline of constitutional scholarship has advanced from the periphery of the academic court to a leading role, perhaps even to the position of supreme discipline. In light of this successful legacy, one (p. 36) may dare to make the prognosis: constitutional scholarship in the European legal area can successfully reposition itself, focused on, but not limited to, doctrinal constructivism with a strong comparative element. That comparison within the European legal area is likely to develop numerous specificities as its context is so distinctive, in particular compared to comparative constitutionalism on a global scale.\footnote{31}

Bibliography

Rudolf Bernhardt, ‘Eigenheiten und Ziele der Rechtsvergleichung im öffentlichen Recht’ ['Peculiarities and Objectives in Public Law'] (1964) 24 Zeitschrift für ausländisches öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht 431

Léontin-Jean Constantinesco, Rechtsvergleichung [Comparative Law] (1971)

Harold Cooke Gutteridge, Comparative Law (1949)

Giulio Napolitano, ‘Sul futuro delle scienze del diritto pubblico: variazioni su una lezione tedesca in terra Americana’ (2010) 1 Rivista trimestrale di diritto pubblico 1

Notes:

(1) Presidency Conclusions, Barcelona European Council point 47 (15 and 16 March 2002); the Lisbon Treaty of 2007 Art 179 para 1 TFEU explicitly mandates the Union to create a ‘European research area’.

(2) See Chapter 56.

(7) For an ironic description of this genre see Somek (n *), 426ff. For the teaching of comparative constitutional law as an academic discipline see Chapter 1B.

(8) In the United States the situation appears to differ as far a constitutional law is concerned due to the importance of originalism.

(9) For an outstanding explication to an American audience see Somek (n *), 431ff.

(10) On this term see Bernhard Schlink, ‘Bemerkungen zum Stand der Methodendiskussion in der Verfassungsrechtswissenschaft’ (1980) 19 Der Staat 73, 89–92.

(11) See Chapter 64.

(12) Strong evidence suggests that German scholarship has spun an exceptionally intricate web of autonomous doctrinal concepts, providing an exceptionally thick layer of constitutional doctrine—due in no small part to the German language's peculiarly high capacity for creation of new nouns and compound words. This comes with a price: abstraction and conceptual creativity tend to obscure original context, a particular problem of German scholarship as is especially apparent from an external point of view.

(15) See Chapter 36.

(16) The provision states: ‘The Union shall respect the equality of Member States before the Treaties as well as their national identities, inherent in their fundamental structures, political and constitutional, inclusive of regional and local self-government.’

(18) On this conflict: Guerrero in von Bogdandy, Villalón, and Huber (n *), Vol I, §11, para 37; for a similar problem in Poland, see Tuleja in von Bogdandy, Villalón, and Huber (n *), Vol I, §8 , paras 42–5, 57.

(19) See Chapter 16.

(20) See Chapters 16 and 11.

(21) See Chapter 35.
(22) See Chapters 38 and 59.

(23) See Chapter 64.

(24) Comparative public law appears most developed in Italy with numerous professors dedicated to this topic, see, as an outstanding example, Alessandro Pizzorusso, Il patrimonio costituzionale europeo [The European Constitutional Heritage] (2002). For Germany, see Léontin-Jean Constantinesco, Rechtsvergleichung [Comparative Law] (1971); Peter Häberle, Europäische Rechtskultur [European Judiciary Culture] (1997), 9–32; the online public access catalogue (OPAC) of the Max Planck Institute for Comparative Public Law and International Law includes catalogues of monographs and volumes under the notations ‘Rvgl: IX Aa’ to ‘Rvgl: IX Ae’. See (http://www.mpil.de/inthome/ww/de/int/intranet/opac.cfm) (last accessed 22 March 2010). Bibliographic references for articles on comparative constitutional law are available in the articles catalogue under the notations ‘Rvgl 2.1’ to ‘Rvgl 2.7’. See (http://www.mpil.de/ww/en/pub/library/catalogues_databases/doc_of_articles/comp_law.cfm). When searching with these notations, the ‘Field to search’ should be set to either ‘Notation (books)’ or ‘Notation (articles)’. Otherwise, German comparative legal study focused mostly on the law of socialist states.

(25) Bernd Wieser, Vergleichendes Verfassungsrecht [Comparative Constitutional Law] (2005). This may also have much to do with the fact that other legal orders have a subject along the lines of comparative law, droit comparé, diritto costituzionale comparato etc., whereas the German term Rechtsvergleichung refers, rather, to an activity, ie, ‘comparing’, than to a separate subject matter, which militates against its disciplinary establishment with separate textbooks. See Harold Cooke Gutteridge, Comparative Law (1949), 17.

(28) On German state and public law, see generally Michael Stolleis, Geschichte des öffentlichen Rechts in Deutschland [History of the Public Law in Germany] (1992), 322–80.

(29) Lipowicz in von Bogdandy, Villalón, and Huber (n *), Vol 2, §34, paras 10–15.

(30) For the pull towards an American-style constitutional law, see Bernhard Schlink, ‘Abschied von der Dogmatik’ [‘The Demise of Doctrine’] (2006) 60 Merkur 1125; the American scholarship certainly provides a viable, even attractive alternative path, see Post (n *), 420ff.

---

Armin von Bogdandy
Armin Von Bogdandy Director, Max Planck Institute for Comparative Public Law and International Law, Heidelberg, Germany, and Professor, Goethe University, Frankfurt, Germany.
B. Comparative Constitutional Analysis in United States Adjudication and Scholarship

Oxford Handbooks Online

B. Comparative Constitutional Analysis in United States Adjudication and Scholarship
Michel Rosenfeld
The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Constitutional Law
Edited by Michel Rosenfeld and András Sajó

Print Publication Date: May 2012
Online Publication Date: Nov 2012
DOI: 10.1093/oxfordhb/9780199578610.013.0003

Abstract and Keywords

This article presents an analysis of comparative constitutional law. This study deals with United States adjudication and scholarship. It discusses the current American controversy over citations to foreign legal authorities in US constitutional adjudications. It assesses the implications of the use and study of comparative constitutionalism in the context of current American conceptions of constitutional adjudication and scholarship.

Keywords: comparative law, constitutional regimes, constitutional European scholarship, doctrinal constructivism, United States, constitutional adjudication

I. On the Uses of Comparative Constitutionalism: Comparing Observer and Participant Perspectives 38
II. The Scholarly Controversy over the Proper Uses and Scope of Comparative Constitutionalism 41
III. The American Controversy over Citation of Foreign Authorities 43
   1. The American Unenumerated Rights Tradition and the Dispute over Homosexual Constitutional Rights 43
   2. The Battle over Citations to Foreign Law in Bowers and Lawrence 44
   3. The Controversy over Foreign Authorities in a Broader Context 45
IV. The Implications for Comparative Constitutionalism of the American Controversy over Citations to Foreign Legal Authorities 48
V. Conclusion 51

I. On the Uses of Comparative Constitutionalism: Comparing Observer and Participant Perspectives

Comparative constitutionalism, a branch—albeit a particularly fragile one—of comparative law, has increasingly affected domestic constitutional law because of a marked intensification of transnational crosscurrents. On the one hand, as constitutions are typically deeply embedded in national psyches and cultures making comparisons seem hazardous. For example, whereas it stands to reason that there be convergence on the subject of commercial contracts among industrialized democracies, unsurprisingly similarly phrased free speech provisions have resulted in widely diverging scopes of protection. On the other hand, in spite of these difficulties, there has been an increasing use of comparative constitutional materials over the last couple of decades by both constitution-makers and constitutional adjudicators. The United States, however, has long resisted this latter trend, both in the context of constitutional adjudication and in that of constitutional scholarship. This is undoubtedly due mainly to the country's strong strains of constitutional exclusivism and exceptionalism, and to widespread perceptions of the US Constitution and constitutional adjudication as superior and unique.\(^3\)
B. Comparative Constitutional Analysis in United States Adjudication and Scholarship

More recently, the United States has apparently begun to change course, by opening up to foreign constitutional influences. Instances of reliance on foreign materials go back centuries,\(^4\) but only recent references to foreign authorities by a closely divided US Supreme Court in cases involving highly contentious issues such as the death penalty\(^5\) and the rights of homosexuals\(^6\) have ignited a fierce debate among judges and constitutional scholars. Moreover, the debate in question has framed American perceptions concerning the proper role of comparative constitutionalism in the context of constitutional adjudication and scholarship.

There are obvious differences between the uses of comparative constitutional materials by adjudicators and the study of such materials by comparativists. The uses in question are often strategic, as an adjudicator may seek to enhance legitimacy by reference to a longer established constitutional jurisprudence, or to temper reaction to a controversial decision by presenting it as consistent with widely respected foreign doctrine.\(^7\) The comparativist, in contrast, is supposed to examine, within the bounds of accepted standards of scholarship, whether and to what extent similar provisions in different constitutions provide a basis for fruitful comparison. In other words, there seems to be a sharp dichotomy between adjudicators who become participants in the spread of comparative constitutionalism (or in resistance to such spread)\(^8\) and scholars meant to engage the subject as observers. Consistent with this dichotomy, scholars should be in a position to cast a critical glance at strategic judicial uses of comparative constitutional materials and to elaborate criteria for principled judicial recourse to them. For example, it seems appropriate for a constitutional (p. 40) adjudicator dealing with the constitutional status of assisted suicide for the first time to look to countries with accumulated experience on the subject;\(^9\) but not for a constitutional adjudicator to cast an illiberal constitutional decision in the rhetoric of borrowed liberal constitutional doctrine.\(^10\)

Upon further scrutiny, the above-mentioned dichotomy between participant and observer does not hold neatly or consistently. Participants do use the material strategically, but observers do not approach it neutrally. Their observations are inevitably ideologically grounded, and just as the strategic choice of a given participant is conditioned by one of the many plausible objectives open to that participant, the observer's perception is filtered through one of the many available ideologies allowing for a cogent grasp of comparative constitutional material. Put differently, the task of the participant is circumscribed by a contestable goal whereas the insights of the observer are framed by the essential dictates of a contestable ideology.

Because the current American controversy over the propriety of citations to foreign authorities in the context of constitutional adjudication sharply divides both American judges\(^11\) and American scholars,\(^12\) it affords a privileged vantage point for critical examination of the dynamic between participants’ strategic uses of comparative constitutional materials and observers’ ideological grasp of it. Some judges believe that foreign materials are helpful; others, that their use is obfuscatory and illegitimate.\(^13\) For their part, some scholars believe that functional similarities and parallels among distinct constitutional jurisprudences predominate; others, that contextual differences are far more important than structural or functional convergence.\(^14\)

This American controversy is particularly revealing from the standpoint of assessing the proper role of comparative constitutionalism in constitutional adjudication and scholarship. Not only does this controversy afford a unique highly concentrated glimpse into the respective dynamics of participants and observers as well as into that between those two groups; but it also does so in the especially instructive setting provided by the common law system, in which American constitutional adjudication is embedded. Traditionally, the common law relies on accumulated judicial experience through consideration of precedents. Consequently, American judges within one state often consider decisions by judges from other states (which do not have precedential value in the first state) for their instructiveness and persuasiveness, thus engaging in a veritable comparative enterprise.\(^15\)

To best frame this current American controversy and to best assess its implications for the use and study of comparative constitutionalism, Section II below provides a brief bird’s eye view of the main current scholarly positions on the scope and limitations of legitimate comparative legal analysis in the field of constitutional law. Section III undertakes a critical analysis of the current American controversy over citations to foreign legal authorities in US constitutional adjudications. Finally, Section IV assesses the implications of the use and study of comparative constitutionalism in the context of current American conceptions of constitutional adjudication and scholarship.
II. The Scholarly Controversy over the Proper Uses and Scope of Comparative Constitutionalism

The debate among scholars concerning the legitimate scope of comparative work in constitutional law centers around three broadly defined positions. Proponents of the first of these maintain that both the problems of constitutional law and their solution are, or ought to be, essentially the same across the spectrum of full-fledged constitutional democracies.¹⁶ Advocates of the second position agree that the problems of constitutional law are the same for all, but are convinced that the solutions to these problems are likely to differ from one constitutional polity to the next.¹⁷ Finally, partisans of the third position assert that neither the constitutional problems nor their solutions are likely to be the same for different constitutional democracies.¹⁸ The first position tends towards constitutional universalism, and turns to comparative constitutionalism to elucidate the proper standards and to spotlight deviations from the latter. The second position is poised to highlight differences and to place them in their proper context, thus shedding light on how different one constitutional system is from the next, and why such constitutional systems—including the comparativist's own system—differ from one another. The third position leads to the conclusion that comparisons are most likely to be ultimately arbitrary, and that the comparativists choices and analyses are bound to be driven above all by ideology. From the standpoint of the comparativist's own constitutional system, the first position offers a standard of identity that allows for determination of conformity with the prescriptions of constitutionalism.¹⁹ The second position provides a standard of differentiation pointing to how and why one's own constitution is distinct. Finally, the third position affords the means to refer selectively to apparent similarities and differences among constitutional jurisprudences to imprint a particular ideological gloss upon the comparativist's own.

All three positions are at least in part persuasive, and a dynamic conception of the interplay among them provides a credible insight into the true potential of comparatism. It is reasonable to reject the highly implausible hypothesis that comparison in the realm of constitutional law is either altogether impossible, or that its findings are bound to be utterly irrelevant. It follows from this that any hypothesis concerning the utility and the potential of comparison in (p. 42) this field must recognize that there must be both identities and differences among systems. Moreover, it should become evident that the latter are relevant for purposes of comparison even if the exact relevance of particular identities or differences or concerning what ultimately ought to count as a relevant similarity or difference remains in dispute.

Whether or not comparativists necessarily are ideologically biased may be a more controversial matter, but that seems of little consequence for present purposes. Indeed, critical theorists regard not only comparative constitutionalism but also domestic law as ideological.²⁰ Therefore, the crucial divide is not between comparativists and scholars focused solely on domestic law, but between those who maintain that law, judges, and scholars cannot escape being ideologically biased and those who reject that position.

There may be, however, different types of ideological biases bearing on one's approach to law. There may be philosophical or political biases: one may be a Marxist or a free market champion, a social democrat or a conservative, and each of these biases seems bound to be reflected in its respective proponents' approach to law. Moreover, there is no reason to suspect that these biases will not equally affect the comparativist and the scholar exclusively devoted to domestic law. Nevertheless, there is one bias, the national²¹ one, that does seemingly set the comparativist apart. Regardless of internal domestic ideological divisions, scholars, judges, politicians, and citizens within the same country may share a national bias that sets them apart from their counterparts in other countries. The American ideology and legal culture is thus different from the French, German, or Russian one, and the American scholar will most likely be unable to shed his national identity when dealing with foreign legal materials. This seemingly inevitable national bias may even be stronger when dealing with constitutional law, which is likely to be closer to the core of national identity than other fields, such as a commercial law.

The key question concerns the importance rather than the existence of this national bias. Whereas more extensive consideration of this question will be postponed until Section IV below, it should be emphasized from the outset that this bias is not as important as it may at first appear for two principal reasons. First, the national bias is one among many that spreads across borders and that may be equally relevant from the standpoint of the comparativist. For example, regardless of national biases, judges and scholars in many jurisdictions confronting the threat of international terrorism divide over whether, or to what extent, civil liberties should be curtailed to enhance security.²² Secondly, once aware of the national bias, one can take steps to mitigate it even if one can never eradicate it. One can explore the political and cultural context in which foreign constitutional law is embedded, read the foreign country's domestic scholarship, enter into dialogue with foreign comparativists, domestic constitutional law scholars, etc. In short, the comparativist is like a person who needs to learn and use a foreign language to function in an alien land. The person in question will never dominate the foreign language as she does her native one or shed her non-native accent in her newly acquired language. Nevertheless, she will manage to be understood and will in turn be able to learn much about her hosts and their way of life.

(p. 43) III. The American Controversy over Citation of Foreign Authorities

The American controversy is primarily among judges, though it has generated a significant secondary literature among scholars, and primarily among those in American constitutional law.23 The plight of the comparative scholar discussed in Section II above is, however, quite relevant to the current quarrel among American judges. If the comparativist scholar can be a veritable observer-translator, then the relationship between observer and participant, scholar and judge, would not be essentially different when dealing with foreign law from that when dealing with domestic law. This is particularly true in the United States where federal judges must be ready to deal with 51 different bodies of law (the federal one and that of each of the 50 states). On the other hand, if the comparativist scholar is hopelessly trapped in his own national ideology, then the observer/participant line blurs, translations become entirely unreliable, and judges' recourse to foreign materials seemingly completely arbitrary.

Turning to the actual controversy, it has arisen in cases dealing with highly divisive issues such as the death penalty for juveniles24 or the mentally impaired25 and the rights of homosexuals.26 These issues divide American judges and the larger polity along moral, political, religious, ideological, and constitutional grounds. In what follows, I will focus exclusively on the controversy regarding the rights of homosexuals because they arise in the context of a particularly contested area of constitutional law, namely that pertaining to unenumerated rights. American judges and jurists have long divided over whether the protection of fundamental rights under the US Constitution ought to extend to unenumerated rights in general and to the rights of homosexuals in particular. This divide is in large measure ideological, reflecting deep differences concerning morals, politics, culture, and the nature and role of the US Constitution. Accordingly, the cases dealing with homosexual rights are particularly apt to reveal whether, and to what extent, the ideological wars over citations to foreign legal authorities in constitutional adjudication differ from the ideological wars over recognizing unenumerated constitutional rights.

1. The American Unenumerated Rights Tradition and the Dispute over Homosexual Constitutional Rights

American unenumerated rights derive principally from two clauses within the US Constitution. The first is the Ninth Amendment (1791) which provides that "The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." The second is the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment (1868) which provides that no state 'shall deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law'. The Fourteenth Amendment is a less obvious source of unenumerated rights than is the Ninth, as 'due process' may be understood in purely procedural terms. Nevertheless, in many decisions, the US Supreme Court has given a 'substantive' interpretation to due process, recognizing fundamental liberty, property, and privacy rights.27 In its 1965 Griswold decision,28 the US Supreme Court recognized an unenumerated constitutional right to privacy and held that it protected the right of married couples to use artificial contraception. The Court later extended that right to cover unmarried heterosexual individuals in Eisenstadt29 and to afford protection to a woman's decision to obtain an abortion in Roe v Wade.30 The Court has been divided over the legitimacy of recognizing an unenumerated constitutional right to privacy, and the various opinions filed in Griswold afford a representative glimpse of the various positions among the justices. In his majority opinion, Justice Douglas derived a general right of privacy from incidents of it found in individual provisions of the Bill of Rights; Justice Goldberg from the Ninth Amendment; and Justice Harlan from the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. On the other hand, the dissenting justices refused to recognize either a general right to privacy or the legitimacy of unenumerated rights.31

It is in this context that in its 5–4 decision in Bowers v Hardwick32 the Court refused to extend privacy protection to homosexual sex. Seizing on the Court's elaboration since Griswold of a jurisprudence that predicated recognition of unenumerated rights on whether they were deeply steeped in tradition and ranked as fundamental to the achievement of justice or 'ordered liberty',33 the majority in Bowers held that homosexual sex was not entitled to constitutional protection. The majority concluded that there was no tradition of protection of homosexual intimacy in the United States and accordingly upheld the constitutionality of a state statute that criminalized homosexual sodomy, and provided for up to 20 years' imprisonment as punishment.34

Bowers was overruled 17 years later in the 2003, 6–3 decision in Lawrence v Texas.35 As we shall see, in both Bowers and Lawrence, reference was made to foreign law. In Bowers, it caused little controversy; in Lawrence, very substantial controversy.

2. The Battle over Citations to Foreign Law in Bowers and Lawrence

The vivid invocation of traditional reprobation of homosexuality in Bowers, relying significantly on foreign authorities, is found in Chief Justice Burger's concurring opinion. After referring to strong condemnation pursuant to Judeo-Christian morals and Roman law,36 the Chief Justice cited Blackstone's eighteenth-century characterization of homosexuality under English law as 'the infamous crime against nature', an offense of 'deeper malignity' than rape, 'the very mention of which is a crime not fit to be named'.37 In his opinion for the Court's (p. 45) majority in Lawrence, Justice Kennedy found, as had the dissenters in Bowers, that homosexual intimacy among consenting adults formed part of a larger deeply embedded tradition whereby an individual's choice of a partner to share 'enduring bonds'38 is a deeply private matter that must remain beyond the reach of the state. Moreover, in the course of his opinion Justice Kennedy cited foreign law for two distinct purposes. The first was in order to demonstrate that Chief Justice Burger's sweeping conclusions relying on the foreign authorities he invoked were one-sided and misleading.39 The second purpose, which proved much more controversial, was to provide additional authority—not in the sense of binding precedent but in that of a better emerging tradition—for the Court's decision to afford constitutional protection to homosexual sex. In Justice Kennedy's words,

The right the petitioners seek in this case has been accepted as an integral part of human freedom in many other countries. There has been no showing that in this country the governmental interest in circumscribing personal choice is somehow more legitimate or urgent.40

Specifically, Justice Kennedy referred to European norms through citations to decisions of the European Court of Human Rights.41 This unleashed a vehement reaction leading to calls for Justice Kennedy's impeachment42 and to proposals for legislation prohibiting federal judges from citing foreign legal authorities while adjudicating constitutional cases.43 These developments stand in sharp contrast to the virtually complete lack of reaction to the fact that Chief Justice Burger cited foreign authorities in Bowers.

Within the Court itself, Justice Scalia's dissent in Lawrence proffered a scathing rebuke to Justice Kennedy's reliance on foreign authorities. First, Justice Scalia asserted that the 'Bowers majority opinion never relied on values we share with other civilizations'.44 Secondly, and more generally, Justice Scalia made clear that,

The Court's discussion of ... foreign views (ignoring of course, the many countries that have retained criminal prohibitions on sodomy) is therefore meaningless dicta. Dangerous dicta, however, since this Court ... should not impose foreign moods, fads or fashions on Americans.45

In short, for Justice Scalia the common traditions Americans share with others (mainly Europeans to the extent that Judeo-Christian mores and Roman and English law are involved) are irrelevant from a constitutional standpoint—even though reference to tradition has played a crucial role in the elaboration of a jurisprudence of unenumerated rights. Furthermore, any reliance on foreign views in the course of elaborating constitutional norms is, for him, downright dangerous.

3. The Controversy over Foreign Authorities in a Broader Context

Why reference to foreign law and mores by justices in the majority of Bowers did not cause an uproar comparable to that occasioned by similar references by Justice Kennedy in Lawrence (p. 46) 17 years later is an important question. The reasons for the remarkable shift between 1986 and 2003 may well be manifold but, for our purposes, two of them stand out above all others. The first is the global spread of constitutionalism and its effect on American constitutional identity; the second, the dramatic exacerbation of a long-standing split regarding America's national identity. These two reasons are closely intertwined, moreover, because American constitutional identity figures prominently in the country's national identity.46
B. Comparative Constitutional Analysis in United States Adjudication and Scholarship

The year 1989 marks a major turning point in the worldwide spread of constitutionalism much as, two centuries earlier, 1789 saw the dawn of modern constitutionalism with the entry into force of the US Constitution. After the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989, constitutionalism promptly spread throughout the formerly communist polities in Europe, followed by rapid expansion into other politics throughout the world, including South America, and many countries in other parts of the world. This trend towards constitutional rule throughout the globe started after the Second World War when Germany and Japan turned into constitutional democracies, but it accelerated enormously after 1989. Furthermore, this trend not only brought constitutional democracy to an ever-increasing number of polities, but it also led to the proliferation of constitutional adjudication by courts extending to all corners of the world.

These developments had two salient consequences for American constitutionalism. They put an end to American constitutional hegemony and they yielded a rich and varied judicial constitutional jurisprudence available to be mined for various purposes involving either identification or differentiation between American and non-American approaches and results with respect to similar issues.

Concurrently with the spread of constitutionalism, and particularly after the United States became the only superpower upon the dissolution of the Soviet Union in the early 1990s, there was an intensification of the divide among the respective proponents of two opposing visions of America. The first of these is the exclusivist vision. In the exclusivist view, the United States is a country with a unique destiny, exemplary values and ideals, and it serves as a model for the rest of the world. Under the second, universalist view, on the other hand, the United States is a diverse cosmopolitan nation which is as much influenced by trends and developments coming from abroad as the rest of the world is influenced by it. The exclusivist view fosters a national identity focused on divergences; the universalist view, one centered on convergences. Furthermore, the divide over these views became much more contentious after George W. Bush became president, reaching its peak in 2003, the year Lawrence was decided, because of the rift over going to war in Iraq between the United States and many of its traditional European allies such as France and Germany.

In their current incarnations, the exclusivist view is mainly held by political conservatives; the universalist, by progressives. Moreover, for the exclusivists, the US Constitution must remain purely American and free from foreign influence or contamination. For the universalist, in contrast, there is a convergence of norms and values, at least among advanced constitutional democracies, which makes constitutional cross-fertilization attractive and often useful. The split between these two constitutional visions is sharp and seemingly irreconcilable.

It is understandable that the aforementioned rift is particularly acute in the context of spelling out the tradition associated with unenumerated rights. Indeed, that task requires reprocessing elements of national identity—core elements at that—for purposes of elaborating key aspects of constitutional identity. The convergence of political ideology, conceptions of national identity, constitutional philosophy, and inferences from the dramatic historical changes since 1989, goes a long way in explaining the differences concerning references to foreign authorities between Bowers and Lawrence as well as those within Lawrence. Largely because of this convergence, moreover, these differences are overdetermined.

What most obviously accounts for the different impact of references to foreign authorities in Bowers and Lawrence is the change in historical circumstances and its effects on American self-perception. Bowers was decided before the end of the Cold War and before the explosion and proliferation (at least within sight of the American legal and judicial community) of foreign constitutional adjudication. At the time of Bowers, the geopolitical order was based on the balance of the United States versus the Soviet Union, with Western Europe largely on the side of the former. At the time of Lawrence, the United States, as the lone superpower, stood at odds with much of Europe over, among other things, Iraq. In addition, in Bowers, justices whose constitutional conclusions were most compatible with conservative politics relied on foreign authorities, whereas in Lawrence it was the opposite—the majority judicial position was aligned with progressive politics. This is important since progressives, tending to be universalists, are much less likely to object to the use of foreign references as such. Finally, and this is greatly magnified in relation to defining tradition, Bowers refers mainly to ancient and historically distant foreign sources that emphasize religious morality at least as much as law. Lawrence, on the other hand, relies primarily on the contemporary jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights. Accordingly, Bowers can be viewed as asserting that America's deepest traditions have roots in religious, moral, and legal values that it shares with the broad Judeo-Christian vision as it emerged throughout the Western World. Lawrence, in contrast, can be portrayed as having bowed to foreign contemporary legal precedent. Moreover, although Justice Kennedy makes it clear that he regards European judicial decisions as evidence of the relevant tradition (above all to refute the Bowers Court's erroneous account of that tradition), to an exclusivist what Lawrence does may seem worse than simply following foreign precedent. It may be, in part, the functional equivalent of following foreign precedent, but it also uses the latter to define the relevant tradition. For that reason, for the exclusivist such use of foreign precedents not only subverts America's constitutional jurisprudence, but it also pollutes its self-perception at the level of national identity.

The clash between the majority and the dissent in Lawrence replicates the basic rift between Lawrence and Bowers, but it does so against an altered backdrop. The universalist, progressive majority looks to Europe to elaborate further the evolving tradition issuing from Griswold, and relies on decisions of the European Court of Human Rights, not as precedents, but as examples of successful progressive judicial resolutions of the very issue before the US Supreme Court. The exclusivist conservative minority, on the other hand, rejects the example of Europe, and insists upon confining the relevant tradition to that already present in the United States at the time of the founding. Within this setting, what seems most puzzling is Justice Scalia’s flat denial that Bowers relied on any foreign values, let alone foreign legal authorities, and his characterization of the European jurisprudence cited by the Court's majority as the product of ‘moods’, ‘fads’, and ‘fashions’. Indeed, even from a most exclusivist standpoint, American exceptionalism does not call for rejection of the Judeo-Christian heritage but, on the contrary, for its adoption and its perfection. For the same reason, it would seem sufficient for an exclusivist to reject European, or for that matter any other, jurisprudence on the conviction that it can neither be authoritative nor become part of any relevant tradition on which it would be legitimate to rely in the course of adjudicating unenumerated rights cases.

The above puzzle can be solved, however, if one considers that European jurisprudence stands for what is most enlightened and most advanced in modern constitutionalism, and what therefore ought to be ideally embraced by all constitutional democracies. This last conclusion is consistent with the universalist position and implicit in Justice Kennedy’s majority opinion. An exclusivist arguing against this universalist position cannot simply reject foreign authorities because they are foreign. What is needed instead, and Justice Scalia does exactly that, is both to challenge the uniqueness and exemplarity of the European jurisprudence and to trivialize its importance and aspirations to universality. This Justice Scalia seeks to accomplish by reminding the United States that many non-European countries continue to criminalize homosexual sex, and by belittling the potential attractiveness of the European jurisprudence by labeling it a ‘fad’ and a ‘fashion’.

Exclusivists and universalists sketch out different conceptions of national identity and of constitutional identity, though in both cases the former is closely intertwined with the latter. This raises the question of whether it would be more accurate to speak in the plural of competing national and constitutional identities rather than in the singular. Moreover, if the answer were in the affirmative, then it would seem that at both the national level and the constitutional one a clash of identities would be more likely than would the consolidation of a commonly shared identity.

IV. The Implications for Comparative Constitutionalism of the American Controversy over Citations to Foreign Legal Authorities

The preceding analysis reveals that the US Supreme Court is divided concerning both the legitimacy and scope of unenumerated rights under the Constitution, and the propriety of referring to foreign legal authorities in the course of adjudicating American constitutional cases. Moreover, on the question of the rights of homosexuals, the divide on the Court is over what ought to count as a relevant similarity or identity, what as a relevant difference, and over clashing ideologies regarding the legitimate boundaries of civil liberties and of the state's constitutional powers to regulate private morality. What is particularly salient for our purposes, is that the divisions involved seem no different whether one focuses on the clash over foreign authorities or on the purely domestic debate over which, if any, unenumerated rights ought to be constitutionally recognized, and to what extent. Moreover, whether the relevant ideological conflict is over the narrower issue concerning the proper canons of constitutional interpretation or the broader moral issue that pits liberal followers of John Stuart Mill against social conservatives, the domestic controversy and that over recourse to foreign materials mirror one another.

Once ideological conflict is regarded as inevitable concerning issues over which the broader polity is deeply divided, then the difference between participant and observer noted at the outset seems much less decisive than it might have at first. Neither participants nor observers can be truly neutral, and even if the former act in a purely strategic result-oriented way and the latter do not, it would still be the case that neither group could act in conformity with the dictates of uncontested or uncontestable norms.50

The American scholarly debate over the propriety and desirability of citations to foreign authorities in constitutional cases closely tracks that among judges.61 This suggests again that ideological differences play a more important role than those between users and observers. Scholars, like judges, differ over the proper canons of constitutional interpretation as well as over whether the state ought to be entitled to intervene within the sphere of private morality.

The debate among American scholars and that among American judges centers around the same three principal issues: the possibility of doing competent comparative work; the utility of comparisons in the realm of constitutional law; and the legitimacy of relying on such comparisons in elaborating one's domestic constitutional jurisprudence. With respect to the first of these issues, scholars have to play a different role than judges. American judges are sufficiently familiar, and hence comfortable, with the jurisprudence of the various American states, but often lack any basic familiarity with foreign jurisprudences. They are accordingly reluctant to refer to the latter lest they misinterpret and misuse them.62 Scholars, on the other hand, can thoroughly examine foreign jurisprudences and can place them in their proper context even if they cannot overcome their national bias. In addition, because of this, comparative scholars can help judges to remedy their lack of familiarity with foreign jurisprudences. Indeed, the more good comparative scholarship there is, the more both litigants and judges will be in a position to become prepared to gauge the similarities and differences between diverse jurisprudences.

On the question of the utility of comparing constitutional jurisprudences and on appropriate occasions for drawing lessons from foreign jurisprudences, scholars and judges divide along the same lines. Exclusivists stress the uniqueness of the US Constitution, and consequently conclude that foreign experiences could not be relevant. Universalists, in contrast, expect sufficient convergence between the leading jurisprudences as to be confident that foreign jurisprudences can provide useful frames of reference, and, in some instances, worthy insights that may be of great value in the elaboration of novel areas of domestic jurisprudence.63

Even if one accepts the exclusivist thesis, it does not seem to follow that comparativism would have virtually nothing to contribute to constitutional adjudication. At an absolute minimum, comparisons in the fundamental rights area could reinforce understanding of the exclusivists’ conception of these rights and sharpen the contours of their self-perception as exclusivists.64 At a maximum, on the other hand, comparison could better legitimize exclusivism and highlight its virtues. In a similar vein, the Canadian Supreme Court has been very effective in its endorsement of a free speech jurisprudence that is self-consciously distinct from its US counterpart after having acutely analyzed the latter and found it wanting in relation to Canadian constitutional objectives.65 This stands in sharp contrast to Justice Scalia’s exclusivist response in the Roper case dealing with the death penalty for juveniles to Justice Kennedy’s pointing out that only in the United States and in Somalia was the punishment in question still in force. Justice Scalia responded as he did in Lawrence by asserting that the US judiciary should not follow the latest ‘trends’ or ‘fashions’.

The question of the legitimacy of comparison also divides exclusivists and universalists. This question, moreover, is greatly sharpened in the context of unenumerated rights, particularly as the latter are correlated to deep-seated traditions within the polity. The more narrowly a tradition is framed, and the less the evolution of that tradition is taken into account, the less it would seem that comparative analysis would be helpful, at least to the judge.66 At the extreme, consistent with American originalism, which confines legitimate constitutional interpretation to discovery and implementation of the Framers’ intent, comparativism is downright illegitimate, a position embraced by Justice Scalia.67

Universalists, in contrast, may well find foreign authorities and common traditions shared with foreign polities’ legitimate interpretive resources in the elaboration of an unenumerated rights jurisprudence. The broader the framing of the tradition, and the more it is conceived as an evolving one, the greater it would seem that comparative considerations would be fruitful.
B. Comparative Constitutional Analysis in United States Adjudication and Scholarship

Since the 1960s, American originalists have mostly been politically conservative. This may explain why there was no great uproar concerning the citation of foreign authorities, such as the Bible, in Bowers. On the other hand, in Lawrence, originalists and social and political conservatives were on the same side against the Court’s decision and against the European pro-homosexual rights jurisprudence relied upon by Justice Kennedy.

One of the fiercest arguments against comparativism in the unenumerated rights area made by exclusivists—including Justice Scalia as well as some scholars—is to the effect that looking beyond the shores of the United States when inquiring about the relevant tradition at play is undemocratic. Specifically, the charge seems to boil down to the proposition that foreigners should not be given a vote concerning what ought to count as a deep moral conviction of the American citizenry. Those who, like Justice Scalia, make this charge seem to assume that the deepest moral convictions embedded in the polity’s very fabric are, or ought to be, the exclusive product of the democratic processes within the country. If this assumption were warranted, then reliance on foreign authorities would be completely illegitimate, not because it might be useless or obfuscatory, but because it would open the door to a form of imperialism or colonialism coming from distant shores.

This argument from democracy seems paradoxical if one remembers that the appeal to unenumerated rights ordinarily occurs in the context of an attack against democratically enacted laws supported by the relevant majorities. Thus, the anti-sodomy laws at stake in Bowers and Lawrence were the products respectively of democratic majorities in Georgia and Texas. This suggests that the relevant traditions that lend support to an unenumerated right must lie somewhat deeper than the arena for ongoing majoritarian politics. Consistent with this, moreover, whether it is legitimate to consult foreign sources in the course of determining the proper present contours of a deeply rooted tradition depends primarily on whether or not that tradition is widely shared with others beyond the country’s borders. Exclusivists and universalists simply disagree on whether American traditions are virtually completely sui generis or whether they overlap and share much with certain traditions prevalent in other polities.

Ultimately, the preceding inquiry reveals that comparativism in constitutional adjudication can play an important positive role. This is because there are enough similarities, differences, and ideological issues with respect to constitutional adjudication and constitutional scholarship, and because these are contested and contestable. Paradoxically, were similarities, differences, and ideological biases obvious and fixed, there would be less of a need for comparativism. In that case, the coordinates of the relevant universes would remain immutable, and each could largely focus on their well-delimited turf. However, because the interplay between identities and differences and the irruption of ideological bias are constantly in a state of flux, the relationship between one’s turf and the broader universe of which it is a part must be constantly re-examined.

V. Conclusion

In the last analysis, the controversy between exclusivists and universalists reveals that both American national identity and constitutional identity are dynamic, conflictual, and multifaceted. Exclusivists and universalists, however, are ultimately dialectically linked as they represent two distinct competing facets of America’s self-perception as a country of destiny called upon to set an example for the rest of the world. For the exclusivists, the United States can only accomplish this by strictly adhering to what makes it different. For the universalists, on the other hand, overemphasis on such differences led the United States to lag before the most advanced constitutional democracies in certain respects, thus requiring that it catch up to them before it can legitimately reassert its leadership role. Overall, exclusivists and universalists provide two different means to the same end, but in the course of aiming at that end, they each seem to reinvigorate the very obstacle that the other seeks to overcome. Hence, the vehemence among the two, and the significant contribution that the conflict among them makes to the contemporary delimitation of America’s national and constitutional identity.

Consistent with this, universalists readily incorporate comparative constitutionalism in constitutional adjudication and scholarship to overcome perceived competitive disadvantages with a view to straightening the course to perfection to which they are committed as citizens in a country of destiny. Universalists are thus guided by a paradoxical amalgamation of universalism and exceptionalism. They look to foreign authorities, not simply to emulate them, but to incorporate them in their unique drive to perfection.

Exclusivists, in contrast, would ideally make no use of comparative constitutional material, with one minor qualification. To the extent that exclusivists are originalists, they would deem it proper to have recourse to comparative constitutional analysis for purposes of ascertaining the constitutional intent of the framers of the constitution. Thus, if the American Framers relied on English law in the context of constitutionalizing a right to ‘due process of law’, then that would make it proper to refer to relevant English materials in existence at the time of the American framing, but not to any such materials generated subsequent to that framing. Ironically, in spite of the exclusivists’ strong aversion to contemporary comparative constitutional materials, they have been forced to refer to them in order to undermine the universalists’ positive reliance on the latter. For example, as already mentioned, Justice Scalia referred to the constitutional jurisprudence of non-European countries that refuse to afford protection to homosexual conduct in order to cast Justice Kennedy’s reliance on European jurisprudence as purely arbitrary. In sum, at present, both exclusivists and universalists integrate comparative constitutionalism in American constitutional analysis. The former do so negatively and concentrate on differences; the latter approach the task positively and seek to emphasize identities. Neither, however, seeks to blend foreign and domestic constitutionalism as they both in the end remain steadfast to American exceptionalism.

Bibliography

Mary Ann Glendon, Comparative Legal Traditions (2nd edn, 1994)

Michel Rosenfeld, The Identity of the Constitutional Subject: Selfhood, Citizenship, Culture and Community (2010)

Mark Tushnet, ‘Referring to Foreign Law in Constitutional Interpretation: An Episode in the Culture Wars’ (2006) 35 University of Baltimore Law Review 299

B. Comparative Constitutional Analysis in United States Adjudication and Scholarship

Notes:

(1) See Frederick Schauer, ‘Free Speech and the Cultural Contingency of Constitutional Categories’ in Michel Rosenfeld (ed), Constitutionalism, Identity and Difference and Legitimacy: Theoretical Perspectives (1994), 353.

(4) Ibid.

(7) See eg Gary J. Jacobsohn, Apple of Gold: Constitutionalism in Israel and the United States (1993), ch 6 (discussing the Israeli Supreme Court's use of American free speech doctrine to justify decisions inconsistent with those of US courts in similar cases).

(8) See eg the scathing criticism against citations to foreign sources by Justice Scalia in his dissenting opinions in Roper 543 US 551 and Lawrence 539 US 558. The latter dissent will be discussed at greater length below. See Section III.2. See also Chapter 64.

(11) See eg Roper 543 US 551 at 608 (Scalia J dissenting); Lawrence 539 US 558 at 598 (Scalia J dissenting).

(14) See Section II below for discussion of these respective positions.

(15) See eg Van Daele v Vinci 51 Ill III 3d 389 (Supreme Court of Illinois 1972) (private law case in which the Illinois court cited cases from New Jersey, Florida, and Missouri).

(19) See Chapter 35.
B. Comparative Constitutional Analysis in United States Adjudication and Scholarship

(21) I use ‘national’ here broadly to encompass a political collectivity that shares a common identity, thus potentially including transnational groupings such as the European Union or Western democracies.

(26) Lawrence 539 US 558.

(27) See Lochner v New York 198 US 45 (1905) (constitutionalizing fundamental property and freedom of contract rights) and Griswold v Connecticut 381 US 479 (1965) (constitutionalizing a fundamental right to privacy). See also Chapter 44 on due process generally; see Chapter 46 on privacy more generally.

(28) Griswold 381 US 479.

(31) In his dissenting opinion, Justice Black argued that the Ninth Amendment was intended to assure the states that the Federal Bill of Rights was not meant to supersede or prohibit state-granted rights, nor to allow for the recognition of additional federal rights: 381 US 479 at 520.

(33) Ibid 191.

(34) Ibid 196.

(35) Ibid 196–7. On sexual orientation in constitutional law in general, see Chapter 52.

(36) Ibid 197.

(37) 478 US 186 at 197 (citing Blackstone, Commentaries, 215).

(38) 539 US 558 at 567.

(40) Ibid 577.

(41) Ibid 576.

(44) Lawrence 539 US 558 at 598.

(45) Ibid, emphasis added.
B. Comparative Constitutional Analysis in United States Adjudication and Scholarship

(46) See Michel Rosenfeld, The Identity of the Constitutional Subject: Selfhood, Citizenship, Culture and Community (2010), 73, 160–2. See also Chapter 35.

(48) See Dorsen (n 3), 1–2.

(50) See Dorsen (n 3), 2.

(52) Ibid.

(54) See Tushnet (n 51), 310–11.

(55) ‘A Conversation Between Scalia and Breyer’ (n 13), 521, 525. One way to exclude present-day foreign influences systematically is by adhering, as Justice Scalia does, to originalism (ibid).

(56) Ibid 528–9.

(57) See n 44.

(59) A less sweeping though consistent variant would be that Europe best exemplifies Western culture and tradition of which the United States is a part.

(60) This is not to say that there is no difference between knowingly acting purely strategically and without scruples for the sole purpose of gaining an advantage or imposing one’s will and doing one’s best to understand complex legal phenomena without being able to avoid adherence to contested or contestable norms. There is certainly a crucial difference between the two from the standpoint of social responsibility and professional ethics. Nevertheless, both remain normatively contestable, and subject to condemnation or repudiation by a significant proportion of those affected by them.

(62) See Posner (n 61).

(64) The same may not equally apply to the structural areas of a constitution as it may be difficult, eg, to draw useful comparisons for purposes of adjudication between a presidential system and a parliamentary one. See Chapters 29 and 30.

(65) See eg R v Keegstra [1990] 3 SCR 697 (Canadian Supreme Court).

(66) The scholar could still use comparison better to highlight the uniqueness of a domestic tradition.

(67) See ‘A Conversation Between Scalia and Breyer’ (n 13), 535–6. Strictly speaking, even for an originalist, comparativism may still be legitimate to the limited extent that the framers intended that American rights be understood by reference to foreign jurisprudences. Even in that case, legitimate reference would only extend to foreign authorities, as they existed at the time of the making of the US Constitution.

(68) This was not always the case. See Lochner v New York 198 US 45 (1905) (Holmes J dissenting) (using originalist argument to counter constitutional enshrinement of fundamental property and freedom of contract rights interpreted as barring social-welfare legislation).

(69) See ‘A Conversation Between Scalia and Breyer’ (n 13).

(70) See eg Posner (n 61), 88–9.

(72) See US Constitution, Amendment 5 (1791).

(73) See above n 44.

---

Michel Rosenfeld

Michel Rosenfeld is Justice Sydney L. Robins Professor of Human Rights and Director, Program on Global and Comparative Constitutional Theory, Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law
Abstract and Keywords

Methodologies of constitutional comparison vary at least as much as, if not more than, methodologies more generally in comparative law. Methods vary in what they aim to do and in who is engaged in comparisons, particularly if the comparative enterprise is defined broadly to include doctrine produced by courts, features of government, and the processes of constitution-making and adoption. This article discusses the different communities of comparative constitutional analysis and identifies some methodological challenges of comparative constitutional analysis.

Keywords: constitutional comparison, comparative constitutional analysis, comparative constitutional scholarship, methodological challenges

I. Comparative Constitutional Scholarship 55
   2. Historical Work and the Migration of Constitutional Ideas 58
   3. Universalist Search for Just or Good Principles 60
   4. Functionalism and Consequentialism; Positive and Normative 62
   5. Contextualism, Expressivism, and Self-Reflection 66

II. Courts 67
   1. Doctrinal Demands, Self-Reflection, and Expressive Comparisons 68
   2. Scholars and Courts 68

III. Constitutional Legislators 68

IV. Methodological Challenges 69
Comparative Constitutional Law: Methodologies

or constitutional amendments—quite commonly engage in comparative constitutional examination. Although constitutional adjudicators and constitutional legislators often draw from the work of constitutional scholars, their context and goals at times frame distinctive methodological orientations. This chapter will briefly discuss the different communities of comparative constitutional analysis and will close by noting some methodological challenges of comparative constitutional analysis.

I. Comparative Constitutional Scholarship

The world of comparative constitutional scholars includes several broad classes of methodological approach, which this chapter describes as (1) classificatory, (2) historical, (3) normative, (4) functional, and (5) contextual. Each of these categories may overlap with others in scholarly practice. Moreover, within these categories, different techniques may be used, as diverse as detailed analysis of one or more foreign constitutions’ development, or constitutional courts’ doctrine, on a matter of domestic interest, to case studies of one or two countries across historical and/or doctrinal development, to explorations of judicial self-understanding of role, to overtly comparative case studies by country of particular issues, to large-N statistical analyses of particular phenomena. Some of these techniques may be associated with particular kinds of inquiries; for example, large-N works tend to ask causal, functional questions; detailed case studies tend to have historic and/or contextual focuses; normative work may be pursued through a number of different techniques. I illustrate these points below.

Much work in comparative law generally has been concerned with the classification of different legal systems into what has sometimes been described as ‘families’ of law. In comparative constitutional law, a number of contemporary works have explored the significance of the different ‘families’ of constitutional law, notably the divide between civil and common law legal systems, and between ‘centralized’ or ‘decentralized’ constitutional review. Allan-Randolph Brewer-Caraís, for example, has analyzed the logical, as well as empirical, differences and similarities between constitutional review in civil and common law countries and its ‘hybrid’ forms in South America, challenging conventional assumptions that common law and civil law countries will consistently differ along the same axis in how they structure judicial review. More recent scholarship has examined convergences as well as differences between centralized constitutional review in specialized constitutional courts and judicial review in more general Supreme Courts. There is considerable scholarly work classifying domestic constitutional regimes as ‘monist’ or ‘dualist’ for purposes of international law; increasingly, these categories are being recognized as inadequate descriptors of the far more complex array of relationships national constitutions take towards the role of international sources of law in the domestic order.

‘Area’ studies also contribute to efforts at classification, or better understanding of possible classification, of constitutional systems. A key question is whether there are distinctive features of constitutional development in a region, either because of conquest or colonial influences, common religious or cultural heritage, or other aspects of the geopolitical legal environment. Although area studies depend on the distinctiveness and cohesiveness of geographic association, some ‘area’ work might be thought of as deconstructing its own analytic foundation, for example by denying claims of certain distinctly Asian forms of constitutionalism, while remaining conscious of the question of the effect of the regional characteristics. Some work focuses on other regional constitutional characteristics, as in studies of presidentialism in Latin America or Africa, or of the relationships between state, rulers, people, and religion in Arab or Muslim countries.

A wide literature exists on whether Europe has a constitution, and what this means. This literature, often abstract and conceptual, at times seems to lack a self-consciousness of the possibility of understanding the query as one of ‘area studies’. The literature is not concerned so much with exploring what is distinctive about the European setting but rather with characterizing what that setting is; indeed, some of this literature suggests that the legal conceptualizations called forth in Europe may be of use more generally to the rest of the world. Nonetheless, there is a sense in which much of the literature concerned with the question of whether and what kind of ‘constitution’ Europe has, or may have, could be seen as a classificatory form of area studies.

Other forms of classificatory studies, conducted largely by political scientists, focus on particular attributes of constitutional systems, for example the classification of presidential and parliamentary systems, or of electoral... systems, or of federal or more consociational forms of organization. Some classificatory studies identify new and emerging categories of constitutional systems or phenomena. The literature on European constitutionalism has some of these characteristics, as does work identifying and analyzing such new developments as ‘weak form’ judicial review, or ‘commonwealth constitutionalism’. So, too, does the work, often done by those with training in political science, analyzing emerging typologies of organizing executive and legislative power, or identifying other constitutional phenomena previously overlooked.

In addition to comparative work focused on large structural issues, there is a considerable amount of comparative scholarship that explores emerging trends in doctrine and interpretive methodology. Consider here the work being done examining doctrine in different countries around the methodological approach of proportionality or balancing as compared with formalism, or originalism, as efforts to understand ‘families’ of interpretive approaches, rather than ‘families’ of overall systems.

Finally, there are revisionist or cautionary forms of classificatory or emergent phenomena, comparative constitutional scholarship, such as on the entrenchment of investment regimes that limit the regulatory and fiscal capacities of domestic governments. We might likewise include work on increased executive, vis-à-vis legislative, power resulting from national and international responses to terrorism and other global problems, as a challenge across many countries for constitutionalism, with a wide range of potential normative ramifications.

So classificatory scholarship can be backward-looking in historical or intellectual ways; it can be concerned with defining a relatively stable framework for classification and analysis. In its more historical forms focused on colonial relationships, it can also be concerned with identifying a normatively doubtful legal basis for constitutional phenomena, in order to explain existing circumstances or lay a foundation for change. Yet classificatory scholarship can also be forward-looking, concerned with identifying and analyzing new phenomena. Stable and emergent classification can coexist in the same work. And for some scholars, classificatory work is a predicate for their functional conclusions.

2. Historical Work and the Migration of Constitutional Ideas

Classificatory work is closely related to historical work. Historical work is concerned with understanding the development of constitutional law or constitutional systems over time. There may be both ‘genetic’ forms of connections between systems, based on the influence one has on the development of another, and ‘genealogical’ forms of connection, where one (or more) constitutional system(s) grew out of another, typically in countries emerging out of colonial relationships. Scholarly work may proceed by examining how two systems that originate in a common legal system, or one system that originates in another, develop over time in similar or different ways. It may also examine how a legal concept that exists in one system influences or migrates to another, focusing not only on the path of ideas but also on how those ideas are transmitted, for example as through graduate study abroad. Historical work concerned with the influence and movement of constitutional ideas across national boundaries often exhibits a degree of skepticism about strong claims of ‘transplants’ found in the more general comparative literature. Another form in which this work on migration of ideas occurs is one that identifies the historical role of transnational legal influences on a single constitutional system.

An important development in this field is Choudhry's concept of ‘migration’ of constitutional ideas—an idea that represents a broader range of influences on a broader range of actors than much of the pre-existing literature reflected. Yet ‘the migration of constitutional ideas across legal systems is rapidly emerging as one of the central features of contemporary constitutional practice’, with far more complex cross currents than reflected in early work on the influence of the US Constitution. More recent literature, for example, tracks the German constitutional influence on India's ‘basic structure’ doctrine, the relative influence of German and US constitutional ideas in newer constitutional systems, or the changing relationships between international law, foreign constitutional law, and domestic constitutional development.

A cautionary note is sounded by Mark Tushnet's argument that comparative study of constitutions reveals a degree of ‘bricolage’, that is, of more or less random adaptation of what is ‘at hand’ in ways that contribute to a certain eclecticism within individual constitutions that poses challenges to interpretive theories founded on the coherence of legal instruments. Migration may appear random and adventitious, as is generally appreciated in the comparative law literature, and may also reflect competitive efforts among the universities of the world for...
Comparative Constitutional Law: Methodologies

foreign students.

Historical or positive analysis of the development or operation of a particular constitutional system, or set of systems related by region or history, may be explored through a framework that seeks both to understand it internally and to make it accessible to readers from other legal systems. Such works are either explicitly or implicitly comparative, engaged both in analytical description and translation of national contexts for readers from other systems; at the same time, these works usually rest on implicit, or draw explicit, normative and/or functional conclusions.

Although scholarship in this vein is not typically quantitative, the field of ‘citation studies’ does employ empirical methods to attempt to analyze the role or influence of foreign or international law in domestic constitutional decisions. Thus, quantitative studies have sought to focus on the behavior of particular national constitutional courts in referring to transnational sources of law, how often the court refers to foreign law as compared to international law, or on the influence of particular courts in the jurisprudence of other coun (p. 60) tries. As its most sophisticated practitioners recognize, such studies provide only a partial and potentially misleading guide to influence; courts may be influenced by ideas from foreign or international legal systems without acknowledging the debt by citation. Both ‘silent dialogues’ and ‘prudential silences’ may result in noncitation of foreign material of which judges were aware and which influenced decision. At the same time, citations to foreign or international law may be more ‘decorative’ or supplementary in character, not analytically significant in the underlying decision. Citation studies thus provide only a partial picture, as they suggest trends in the courts’ willingness to manifest an awareness of comparative or international law.

3. Universalist Search for Just or Good Principles

An important, yet at the same time controversial, form of comparative analysis is the effort, in Donald Kommers’ words, to discover through comparative study, ‘principles of justice and political obligation that transcend the culture bound opinions and conventions of a particular political community’. For a similar normative aspiration expressed by another constitutional scholar, consider A.E. Dick Howard’s view that ‘comparative studies can ... nourish our search for principles of ordered liberty and for theories of a just society’. This approach has been termed a ‘universalist’ approach to comparative constitutional study.

Much comparative work—even work that is ‘classificatory’, ‘historical’, or ‘functionalist’—is motivated by a search, implicit or explicit, for transcendent principles—of the good, or the just—in constitutional theory, institutions, and doctrine. There is a literature—in comparative government, in philosophy, and in political science—about theories of the good society, work that may be informed by knowledge of constitutional practices in various countries. Yet foreign legal sources in such work may be examined, not with a view to understanding their comparative setting, but rather with a view towards constructing a general theory, using various legal sources as examples to help to refine, and to clarify, the analytics of a general problem in democratic or political theory, for example the relationship of equality to legitimacy, or of judicial review and democracy.

(p. 61) In other work on constitutional theory by those who identify themselves as constitutional scholars, there is more attention to comparative analysis as a central means of trying to answer important jurisprudential or philosophical questions. Recent examples would include Michel Rosenfeld’s scholarship exploring ‘essential jurisprudential characteristics of the respective conceptions of the rule of law in three different legal traditions’; the German conception of the Rechtsstaat; ... the French notion of the Etat de droit; and ... the Anglo-American common law based elaboration of the idea of “the rule of law” to analyze the role of law's role in legitimating constitutionalism in democracies, or work by social scientists theorizing the relationship between constitutionalism and democratic politics based on selected comparative case studies. Moreover, ideas drawn from comparative constitutional study about the nature of constitutionalism itself have begun to influence scholarly discourses in international law, international organization, and global legal studies, with volumes devoted to the possibilities for ‘world constitutionalism’.

In addition to large-scale theories about justice and the nature of constitutions and constitutionalism, there is a middle level of theorizing towards good or just principles that is an important strand in this literature, focused more on specific doctrine and specific institutions. Comparative analysis is deployed to criticize the implications of domestic constitutional doctrine for presumptively shared or universal norms of equality, or democracy, or human dignity. Such discussions are found on a wide range of issues, including the legitimate scope of punishment, defenses to defamation, criminal sedition, whether hateful speech can be prohibited or must be protected, the permissible scope of campaign finance laws, or the constitutionality of actions that have the effect, but not the purpose, of harming disadvantaged groups. An interesting body of literature explores comparative approaches to social rights, or horizontal effects of constitutional rights. This work is typically characterized by doctrinal analyses. Scholars’ exploration of the varying assumptions, and interpretive approaches, of comparator countries may serve self-reflective normative purpose—at once trying to understand other systems and identify improvements of one’s own.

Comparative work in this vein can focus not only on reform in the sense of identifying normatively more attractive and justice-seeking approaches but also on what Kim Scheppele has aptly described as ‘aversive precedent’, exploring in normative terms the role of comparative examples as the antithesis of what countries properly committed to shared or universal values (of democracy, limited government, or the like) should aspire to. This method may be contrasted, for example, with that of Choudhry’s analysis of the negative impact of Lochner on Canadian constitution-making and constitutional law, that approach is more positive and historical, than normative or reformist, even though some of the techniques of investigation—including close analysis of doctrinal development—may be similar.

As has been observed, universalist justice-seeking approaches to comparative constitutional law most typically, though not inevitably, entail comparative work on rights, often linked with literature on human rights. By contrast, functionalist approaches, discussed below, are often deployed in analyzing structural issues, for instance different forms of federalism, or presidentialism, or voting structures. For this reason, universalist scholarship about rights has tended to bring together work on comparative constitutional law with work on international law and especially international human rights and humanitarian law. Yet the search for ‘just principles’ of human rights law may be no more theoretical or universalist than the search for ‘good’ principles of government design, even though the reasoning used in connection with the latter search usually, though not always, sounds more in methods of functional consequentialism.

4. Functionalism and Consequentialism; Positive and Normative

Perhaps the dominant method of comparative analysis, in constitutional law, as in other fields of law, is functionalist. The scholar may identify an institution that exists in multiple constitutional systems and explore its function(s); or the scholar may identify one or more functions performed by constitutions or constitutional institutions or doctrines in some societies, and analyze whether in fact the constitutional institution or doctrine believed to perform a valid function does so, or may analyze whether and how that function is performed elsewhere. Sometimes the work is positive, concerned not with questions of normative superiority but, for example, with how different institutions may perform roughly equivalent roles, or how differences in institutional design may correspond with broader differences in political society or behavior. Sometimes the approach is more normative, as where the scholar seeks to identify what constitutional designs or doctrines are better suited to producing consequences that are normatively valuable. Sometimes the scholar may consider whether consequences asserted to flow from some institution or doctrine, questioned in normative grounds, in fact lead to or avoid the consequences its defenders identify. The goals of functional comparison may be as normative and universally theory-seeking as others described earlier, but the techniques used focus more on specific functional comparisons and questions of causation, rather than on the moral, principled appeal of comparative approaches.

Functional comparisons can be advanced through several techniques, including conceptual functionalism, detailed case studies, and large-N studies. Conceptual functionalism is a form of analysis that overlaps with the classificatory category: scholars hypothesize about why and how constitutional institutions or doctrines function as they do, and what categories or criteria capture and explain these functions, drawing examples from some discrete number of systems to conceptualize in ways that generate comparative insights or working hypotheses that can be tested through other methods. Thus, for example, Bruce Ackerman explained:

My aim is to identify (a) one or another common problem confronting different ‘constitutional courts,’ and then follow up by specifying (b) different coping strategies these courts have adopted as they have tried to solve the problems. Once we have gained some clarity on these two issues, we may hope for a deeper insight into the comparative value of competing coping strategies.\textsuperscript{57}

In this same article, Ackerman asked whether there are ... patterns that repeat themselves in the successful establishment of written constitutions'.\textsuperscript{58} This is a positive historical question, but with a functional orientation (and normative underpinning). Ackerman's technique is not quantitative, but a method of drawing insights about functional questions from comparative case studies, a form of 'concept thickening'.\textsuperscript{59}

Some of the best work in comparative constitutional law is done in this vein. Consider Mark Tushnet's work, in which a constitutional institution—judicial review—is subjected to critical comparative analysis, both as to its value (in producing the positive consequences its proponents assert) and in terms of how it may in fact work differently depending on its legal status and other mechanisms available in different systems. Or consider Martin Shapiro's analysis, based in part on US experience, of the possible need to 'serve[e] the have nots' and of focusing on administrative law before constitutional law in countries with weak rule of law commitments as possible 'conditions for the success of constitutional courts' (as measured by courts' willingness to rule against governments).\textsuperscript{60} or Ackerman's conceptual work on parliamentary and presidential forms of government.\textsuperscript{61} Likewise Victor Ferres Comella compares centralized and decentralized constitutional review in functional terms and then, in a normative turn, makes recommendations for change in the (p. 64) way in which centralized review is conducted;\textsuperscript{62} Gerald Neuman considers the functions of overlapping systems of constitutional and international human rights protections.\textsuperscript{63}

Conceptual functionalism might also include economic or behavioral models of constitutional design, models that may be entirely theoretical, or derived from a single country, but that could, in theory, be tested against different comparative examples. This work may be concerned not only with the relationship between different constitutional designs and various forms of economic success, but also with the relationship between constitutional design and other goods more conventionally thought of as legal, such as protection of minority rights.\textsuperscript{64}

Secondly, functional analyses may be reflected in more detailed case studies of how a constitutional institution or doctrine actually functions in two or more societies. They may differ only in degree from the more conceptual functionalism, which draws on case studies but of a more limited level of density. Scholars may be attempting to analyze the functional consequences, for good or bad, of a particular institution, as in studies of the effects of constitutional federalism in different countries in affecting social movements for equality of opportunities for women and minorities,\textsuperscript{65} in managing ethnic conflict,\textsuperscript{66} or to test more rigorously the positive association between an institution or doctrine and its purported positive, or negative, effects. Comparative functional inquiries may also examine the causal relationships between the operation or development of a legal institution, such as judicial review, and other conditions in the political system.\textsuperscript{67}

The choice of comparators is relevant to the utility of the effort: comparator countries to be studied may be limited by the languages the scholar is familiar with, or the accessibility of the legal information. As Hirschl has suggested, comparator countries for case studies may be chosen using different techniques, for example those that are 'most similar' (except for the particular doctrine or institution at issue) or those that are 'most different' but seem to have a similar institution or doctrine. And, as Cheryl Saunders has suggested, even within the constraints of language and availability, there are standards of selection that ought to be applied with consistency.\textsuperscript{68}

A benefit of the case study method in the comparative setting is the ability to explore how different features of the system may interact with and affect the operation of seemingly similar institutions or doctrines, that is, to see particular institutions or doctrines 'in action' in their own legal contexts. Kent Greenawalt proceeds on the assumption that US and Canadian free speech law is functionally comparable, and then analyzes the differences and relates them to differences in constitutional text and to differences in history.\textsuperscript{69} Studies of US and European constitutionalism,\textsuperscript{70} or in specific areas (such as free speech\textsuperscript{71} or property law\textsuperscript{72}) have drawn on comparative perspectives for purposes of both understanding US doctrine and sometimes arguing for its improvement. Even single-country case studies may contribute to functional understandings of constitutional law or institutions. While detailed case studies are able to explore a broader range of variables in a particular setting, the greater the detail, the smaller the number of comparable entities to validate results in the form of more general statements.\textsuperscript{73}

Increasingly, scholarship has turned to the creation of what one might call structured comparative case studies, where scholars are asked to explain and analyze, on a country basis, a selected set of issues, so that the resulting volume provides a set of comparative perspectives on how seemingly similar issues are (or are not) addressed in different constitutional systems. Goldsworthy’s volume on constitutional interpretation focuses on interpretive questions and the role of constitutional courts in six countries.²⁴ Useful two-country comparisons exist as well.²⁵ Baines and Rubio Marín’s collection focuses on gender equality and related issues;²⁶ others focus on social welfare rights²⁷ or on doctrines addressing the horizontal implications of constitutional norms for private actors and private law.²⁸

Thirdly, functional analysis is increasingly associated with large-N studies designed to reveal correlational or causal associations between some constitutional feature (institution or doctrine) and some other phenomena, desirable or undesirable. The literature on the effects of presidentialism vs parliamentary democracy is an example, albeit situated in the less ‘law’- and more ‘institution’-focused world of comparative government.²⁹ Elkins, Ginsburg, and Melton’s work on constitutional longevity is exemplary of a more ‘legally’ oriented form of empirical, functional scholarship.³⁰ The authors compiled a database of constitutions around the world, developed criteria for defining longevity (e.g., what kinds of changes would be treated as a new constitution rather than as an amendment), and then analyzed, in some detail, what features of constitutions were associated with longevity. The authors were careful to note that longevity may or may not have normative value; but their work, as a positive matter, suggested that the longevity of constitutions was associated with the right degree of flexibility, the right degree of specificity, and the availability of judicial enforcement mechanisms; their study packs considerable normative work—assuming political stability of constitutions is a desideratum—into the framing of positive categories, and in the classification of the events studied. Similarly, Jennifer (p. 66) Widner’s database of constitution-making processes, analyzed to explore relationships between process and outcomes, is another example of a relatively new form of quantitative scholarly work focused on comparative constitutionalism, that also contributes to understandings of the very different measures by which ‘success’ in constitution-making can be measured.³¹

Large-N studies of causal connections between constitutions and constitutional law and effects in society have rarely focused on doctrine and reasoning, perhaps in part because of the difficulty of reliable coding, in part because of the disciplinary assumptions (focused on results as outputs, fairly narrowly understood) of the political scientists who typically conduct large-N studies. Consider the various studies of the relationship, vel non, between various ‘rights’ protecting provisions in constitutions and respect for those rights ‘on the ground’.³² Large-N studies, however, may also be used not for functional purposes but for classificatory or historical ones, as in the spate of studies analyzing ‘citations’ to foreign or international law.³³ Also of note are efforts by economists to explore relationships between different forms of constitutional government and economic well-being.³⁴

Although functionalism (both positive and normative) represents a dominant approach in comparative constitutional study, it has been subject to serious critique. A number of scholars have cautioned against the misleadingly homogenizing and obscuring perils of functionalism. It is all too easy, scholars such as Günter Frankenberg suggest, for a comparativist unconsciously to assume the categories of legal thought with which she is familiar, and thus to see foreign law only as either similar or different, without being able to grasp the conceptual or sociological foundations of other legal orders.³⁵ Professor Bomhoff, in a similar vein, has shown how doctrines with a similar name and seemingly similar function actually mean quite different things in a practice that is shaped by more particular contexts.³⁶

5. Contextualism, Expressivism, and Self-Reflection

These critical cautions might be understood to argue for a form of contextualism in scholarly work. Public law, it has been argued, is particularly path dependent on initial institutional choices, and thus requires attention to particular systems operating in their own context.³⁷ (p. 67) And much scholarly work can be understood as an effort to learn, from outsider perspectives, more about the particular context of one’s own system, whether its functional ‘packages’ of features, or its particular socio-legal self-understandings or self-expressions.

Many studies of comparative constitutional law are concerned with questions of context and particularity. Without embracing the idea, advanced by some comparativists, about the necessary particularity of each legal system,³⁸ scholarship in this vein does emphasize either the ways in which particular institutional contexts may limit the ability to draw conclusions from the practices of other systems, or the expressive functions of constitutions or constitutional law within particular national contexts. Contextual approaches problematize the sense of ‘false necessity’ that may emerge from functional or universalist approaches. So, for example, Tushnet has suggested that even in the realm of understandings of rights, the particular national and institutional context matters to an understanding of constitutional doctrine. Thus, with regard to hate speech and libel, he suggests that institutional factors, including the decentralization of enforcement, may affect analysis of the desirable scope for constitutional protection even of hateful speech.\textsuperscript{99} Such functional contextualism must be distinguished from more normative arguments about national identity, even though the latter may also assume empirical benefits, or harms, from particular national constitutional features.

Some contextually oriented scholarship seeks to elicit more intense understanding of how particular paradigmatic social or political concerns shape or are reflected in constitutional law. Gary Jacobsohn's work on constitutional identity perhaps epitomizes this school, which is necessarily associated with close analysis of particular countries, and particular institutions and doctrines.\textsuperscript{90} Yet, as work on the role of politics in reshaping constitutional law suggests,\textsuperscript{91} the content of a country's expressive identity may be complex and multi-stranded, and may shift over time;\textsuperscript{92} Rosalind Dixon's work, among others, might be understood to raise cautions about the tendency of expressivist approaches to assume a fixed national identity.\textsuperscript{93} Considering the plurality of understandings and interpretive possibilities within a single national constitutional culture may yield important degrees of nuance, complicating and perhaps defeating efforts to generalize from particular cases.

II. Courts

Courts' approaches to comparative methodology overlap considerably, though not entirely, with those of scholars. Some jurists argue for comparative constitutional consideration as a form of consequences-focused "functionalism."\textsuperscript{94} For still others, consulting foreign law is an ordinary part of what it means to be a thoughtful jurist, especially in interpreting constitutional (p. 68) provisions with a common genetic or genealogical root, but more generally, insofar as greater knowledge of other legal systems helps judges to strengthen their own.\textsuperscript{95} Some constitutions themselves require interpretation in light of international law, which may invite comparative analysis of how other domestic courts have interpreted the same international provision.

1. Doctrinal Demands, Self-Reflection, and Expressive Comparisons

When facing an open issue, judges may benefit from knowledge that expands the range of interpretive options considered in implementing their own constitution. But there are also doctrinal demands that may require resort to foreign constitutional law, as when limitations clauses (such as Canada's) refer to government practices that can be justified in 'a free and democratic society' and thus contemplate resort to foreign practice. Judges' consideration of foreign or international sources can serve as a self-reflective check on constitutional judgment, as the national constitutional ethos is defined by comparison, positive and negative, with others.\textsuperscript{96}

2. Scholars and Courts

In scholarly work, contextualism and expressivism may function as a prism for analyzing how a particular constitutional context or identity is developed in a particular country. Expressivism in judicial decisions may be somewhat different: scholars work to contribute to knowledge or understanding; judges give judgments, creating winners and losers. Part of the task of courts is to issue decisions that are likely to be complied with. For this and other reasons, courts may consider or be influenced by comparative constitutional law even when they do not openly refer to it.\textsuperscript{97}

At least three factors are relevant to judicial decisions whether to engage in comparative analysis. The first is the nature of the domestic issue. Some constitutional issues arise within well-settled fields of domestic discourse, or may concern a distinctive and unusual constitutional text, such as the US Second Amendment. Secondly, the nature of the transnational source will affect its relevance. International law might have a particular salience in some cases, but sometimes comparative constitutional law might have more persuasive value than international law.\textsuperscript{98} Thirdly, judges need to consider the comparability of contexts. On these issues, the courts are generally going to be dependent on the infrastructure of knowledge that scholars develop.

III. Constitutional Legislators
Comparative Constitutional Law: Methodologies

Constitutional legislators are, most fundamentally, persons having authority to propose a new constitution, which can then be ratified.\textsuperscript{99} Considering comparative constitutional approaches is quite a common aspect of such constitution-making enterprises, as one sees in the drafting of both national and subnational constitutions. James Madison, an influential framer of the (p. 69) US Constitution, made himself conversant with foreign constitutions, both ancient and contemporary. Modern constitution-making often takes place under more or less explicit forms of international monitoring or supervision, with widespread consultation of experts.\textsuperscript{100}

Although scholarly work in recent years has begun to focus more attention on legislators both as constitution-makers and as constitutional interpreters,\textsuperscript{101} empirical work has not kept pace with theoretical developments. There are few studies of a comparative nature that explore how actual legislators, or members of constituent assemblies, behave and view their work. One leading scholar has suggested that foreign models or advice have little to contribute, given the dominance of local contexts in influencing conditions for successful constitution-making;\textsuperscript{102} others offer cautious praise for foreign technical assistance and expertise, as compared to more active forms of intervention.\textsuperscript{103} In some instances, it appears that foreign experts, bringing knowledge of their own constitutional systems, have been given key roles in the drafting process, in an effort both to harness expertise and to provide a form of legitimacy that only outsiders (of a particular sort) could do.\textsuperscript{104}

A major scholarly effort is now focused on questions of institutional design in divided societies,\textsuperscript{105} as the benefits of federalism, consociationalism, or other forms of recognition, accommodation, or power sharing are analyzed and modeled. Some of this scholarly work is intended to influence constitutional design decisions on the ground, though rarely do actual constitutional processes follow singular templates and models, instead displaying a ‘mix and match’ approach in which small differences in institutional design may yield large differences in outcomes. Scholarly work on normatively or functionally desirable constitutions sometimes gives insufficient attention to a consideration of actual “upstream” or “downstream” constraints on decision-makers.\textsuperscript{106} For such knowledge to be usable by constitutional legislators, more study of the processes and political economy of constitutional change would be helpful to future decision-makers in being able better to link normative and functional goals with understandings of the political economy of constitutional change.

IV. Methodological Challenges

In concluding, this chapter addresses some of the special methodological challenges of comparative constitutional law, an issue that can only be addressed by understanding the goals of comparison.\textsuperscript{107} A first goal is simply to develop a better intellectual understanding of one or (p. 70) more other systems. For this purpose, the challenges include time, the need to develop expertise, language barriers, and the need to understand the broader context—both legal and social—in which law operates. All these challenges are about the risks of error or oversimplification. However difficult it is to become bilingual, bilegalism is even harder to achieve. Not only is it necessary to understand foreign languages, or find reliable translations of foreign legal materials, but in order to understand one doctrine or institution of another legal system it is necessary to have at least some understanding of the broader canvas on which it exists.

Each of these risks raises another kind of challenge for scholars and that is the ‘opportunity costs’ of maintaining expertise in more than one system. What will scholars give up in order to develop this expertise? For judges, the opportunity costs might be framed differently: is there a risk of losing what Karl Llewellyn might have called a ‘situation sense’ about their own constitutional system if they spend considerable time developing expertise on others?\textsuperscript{108}

A second goal for comparative constitutional study is to enhance capacity for self-reflection, to develop a better understanding of one’s own system. In this regard, there are all of the challenges set out above, plus the following. While ‘the unnoticed in our practices may become visible in the contrast with other cultural practices of law’, which ‘can help us to understand who we are’, comparison alone ‘cannot … tell us whether we should remain what we have been’.\textsuperscript{109} Distinguishing ‘true’ from ‘false’ necessities is a distinct challenge.

A third purpose of comparative constitutional study goes beyond simple self-reflection and aims to develop an understanding of normatively preferable ‘best practices’—whether from a ‘universalist’ perspective about rights or a more functional perspective about general political truths about well-designed constitutions.\textsuperscript{110} There are at least three additional challenges in pursuing this goal. First, implicit is the need to identify a notion of the normative good, or of just results. Second, not only does this inquiry require a normative baseline of the good or just, it also depends on implicit notions of causality, that is, of the relationship between law and/or legal structures and good and/or just results in society; yet being able to make general statements of causal relations confronts the general problem of identifying relevant variables.\textsuperscript{111} A related challenge is how to select cases for purposes of causal analysis in comparative constitutional law.\textsuperscript{112}

A fourth goal may be to answer questions, asked by domestic constitutional doctrine or text, that are comparative in nature. For example, in Europe, the case law of the European Court of Justice resorts to the common constitutional traditions of the member states to help to protect fundamental rights.\textsuperscript{113} One might think that the question of ‘commonality’ is a relatively simple empirical question. But determining what is common has a normative element as well. More relaxed standards for what counts as a common tradition may reduce the space for diversity and for localized democratic decision-making; more rigorous criteria for identifying the ‘common tradition’ will allow more space for diverse practices. So whether to adopt (p. 71) a narrow or broad definition of commonality of constitutional tradition has important normative impacts in this context. Similarly, in applying the comparative inquiry about the practices of ‘free and democratic’ societies, translating from what is demonstrably justified in one free and democratic society to another may not be so easy a matter.\textsuperscript{114}

Is there anything distinctive about the methodological challenges of constitutional comparisons as opposed to other kinds of legal comparisons? Limitations of time and resources, limitations of language and contextual understanding, are challenges that apply to any kind of comparative legal study; they can arise whether one is looking at contract law, tort law, or constitutional law in a comparative setting. Three other, possibly distinctive methodological challenges in comparative constitutional law are discussed below: the challenges posed by the complexity and path dependence of the historical context and the interdependence of constitutional provisions one on the other; the tendency in constitutional law and theory to conflate the normative and positive; and the expressivist aspects of constitutional law.

First, constitutions are made and then interpreted in complex and distinctive historical contexts; constitutional provisions are often interdependent, designed to create an overall system or balance, as in most federal systems. Comparisons on federalism issues are especially challenging because federal bargains are always historically contingent and arise out of particular deals struck by particular holders of power in society at one time.\textsuperscript{115} But the degree to which these characteristics are distinctive to constitutional law is unclear. Substantive contract law’s practical meaning, for example, may depend on the broader legal context, including the procedural rules for litigation, such as who pays attorney’s fees, or the practical availability of lawyers or of other means of dispute avoidance or resolution. Nonetheless, the degree to which historic evolutions of particular public institutions influence public law,\textsuperscript{116} of which constitutional law is a part, may differ (at least in degree) from analogous influences on other fields, such as contracts.

A second feature that might be considered distinctive is the tendency to conflate normative with positive claims about what is and is not constitutional. In constitutional systems such as the United States, where the Constitution is deeply entrenched and the system thus depends heavily on interpretation, there is a fairly strong tendency in both judicial opinions and scholarly literature to blend normative claims about what the Constitution should be understood to mean, and positive claims about what the courts are now doing or what the Constitution requires. This feature, while perhaps distinctive, may not be true for all constitutional systems, or even for all that depend strongly on interpretation; and there might be other areas of the law where this tendency to conflate also exists.

A third possibly distinctive feature that may affect comparative methodology is the expressivist role played by constitutions and constitutional law.\textsuperscript{117} Constitutions serve as a form of public law that is particularly likely to be used to express, or help to constitute, or to influence, national identity. Constitutional preambles make this clear. Thus, Iraq’s constitutional preamble asserts, ‘We are the people of the land between two rivers, the homeland of the apostles and prophets, … pioneers of civilization … Upon our land the first law made by man was passed … ’.\textsuperscript{118} This is a claim about who the people are. The preamble of the Constitution of (p. 72) China reads like a tract on national history and the accomplishments of a collective people.\textsuperscript{119} The French Constitution announces its commitment to the declaration of rights of man and proclaims France an indivisible, secular, democratic, and social republic.\textsuperscript{120} The German Basic Law asserts Germans’ responsibilities before God and man.\textsuperscript{121} The Irish Constitution invoked the ‘Most Holy Trinity’.\textsuperscript{122}
These are not claims about function and purpose; these are claims about identity and self-expression. The point here is the degree to which the expressive components of constitutions may complicate efforts to do comparative analysis, especially at the functional level. Whether a country sees religion as helping to constitute the state, or whether it sees government as instrumental to a specific social and economic vision, may be understood to influence both constitutional meaning and national identity. Correct, incorrect, better, best, functional, or not, is beside the point; the point from this perspective is that these are situated and embedded in layers of meaning of which the constitution is representative of deeper social and self understandings.

But should functionalism be seen as in some ways an opposite to expressivism? Good comparative analysis tries to reconcile rather than choose between them, though a contextualized functionalism. Contextualized functionalism requires a willingness to question whether functions, concepts, or doctrines that appear similar may in fact be quite different in different societies; an attention to how seemingly separate institutions or legal practices are connected to, and influenced by, others; and a commitment to be open to noticing how legal rules or doctrines may be affected by the identitarian or expressivist aspects of the constitution. It is in this vein that more important scholarly work in the future remains to be done, drawing on both qualitative and quantitative methods of analysis.

Bibliography

JOHN BELL, ‘Comparing Public Law’ in Andrew Hardy and Esin Oruç (eds), Comparative Law in the 21st Century (2002)

ZACHARY ELKINS, TOM GINSBURG, and JAMES MELTON, The Endurance of National Constitutions (2009)

VICTOR FERRERES COMELLA, Constitutional Courts and Democratic Values: A European Perspective (2009)

STEPHEN HOLMES and CASS SUNSTEIN, ‘The Politics of Constitutional Amendment in Eastern Europe’ in Sanford Levinson
Comparative Constitutional Law: Methodologies

VICKI C. JACKSON, Constitutional Engagement in a Transnational Era (2010)

GARY JEFFREY JACOBSOHN, Constitutional Identity (2010)

MATTIAS KUMM, ‘The Cosmopolitan Turn in Constitutionalism: On the Relationship between Constitutionalism in and beyond the State’ in Jeffrey Dunoff and Joel Trachtman (eds), Ruling the World?: International Law, Global Governance, Constitutionalism (2009)

ALEC STONE, The Birth of Judicial Politics in France (1992)

(74) STEFAN VOIGT, ‘Positive Constitutional Economics II: A Survey of Recent Developments’ (2011) 146 Public Choice 205

NEIL WALKER, ‘Reframing EU Constitutionalism’ in Jeffrey Dunoff and Joel Trachtman (eds), Ruling the World?: International Law, Global Governance, Constitutionalism (2009)

Notes:
(1) The term ‘large-N’ is used here to refer to studies with a large enough set of comparators and factors to be subject to quantitative, statistical analysis designed to test and explore correlations and associations. Widely described as a valuable tool to test hypotheses generated by qualitative research, such studies, it is claimed, can also reveal magnitudes of effects and interactions not revealed by other methods. See eg Michael Coppedge, ‘Theory Building and Hypothesis Testing: Large- vs Small-N Research on Democratization’, Paper prepared for presentation at the Annual Meeting of the Midwest Political Science Association, Chicago, Illinois, April 25–27, 2002, available at (http://www.nd.edu/~mcoppedg/crd/mpscacopp02.pdf). See also Joachim Blatter, ‘Case Studies’ in Lisa M. Given (ed), The Sage Encyclopedia of Qualitative Research Methods (2008), vol 1, 68–9 (suggesting, inter alia, that case studies are more likely to produce ‘theoretical innovation’, while large-N studies help ‘control the empirical scope of new theoretical concepts’; that large-N studies tend to focus on causal claims, while case studies tend to be more descriptive or interpretive; and that large-N statistical studies are associated with establishing external validity, while case studies are more associated with constructing internal validity).

(13) Giovanni Sartori, Comparative Constitutional Engineering: An Inquiry into Structures, Incentives and Comparative Constitutional Law: Methodologies

(21) Okoth-Ogendo (n 9), 65–84; Nino (n 8).

(27) See eg Vicki C. Jackson, Constitutional Engagement in a Transnational Era (2010), 103–16.
(28) Choudhry (n 20), 13.

(29) See Henkin and Rosenthal (n 2).

(31) Law and Chang (n 25).

(32) Jackson (n 27), 255–79.

(38) Jackson (n 27), 192.

(41) Choudhry (n 23).

(42) See eg Wojciech Sadurski, Equality and Legitimacy (2008), 93–146.

(46) Ronald MacDonald and Douglas Johnston (eds), Towards World Constitutionalism: Issues in the Legal Ordering of the World Community (2005); see also Dunoff and Trachtman (n 12).

(48) See eg Vicki C. Jackson, 'Review of Laws Having a Disparate Impact Based on Gender' in Mark V. Tushnet and Vikram David Amar (eds), Global Perspectives on Constitutional Law (2009), 130–45.

(53) For a more deontological argument about institutional design, see Waldron (n 43), 1374–5.

(56) See eg Cass Sunstein, Designing Democracy: What Constitutions Do (2001). Normative value here might be defined by nonmaterial conceptions of justice and morality, or by a normative commitment to utilitarianism in its various forms.

(57) Bruce Ackerman, ‘The Rise of World Constitutionalism’ (1997) 83 Virginia Law Review 771, 794. See also ibid:

    Much of the best comparative scholarship follows a similar method, first defining a common problem—for example, the protection of freedom of speech—and then considering different doctrinal solutions proposed by different courts, before passing a considered judgment on the best approaches.

(58) Ibid 775.

(61) Ackerman (n 16).

(62) Ferreres Comella (n 4).

(64) For a recent review of developments in ‘positive constitutional economics’, see Stefan Voigt, ‘Positive Constitutional Economics II: A Survey of Recent Developments’ (2011) 146 Public Choice 205.

(71) Krotoszynski (n 52).

(79) See eg Linz (n 8).

(83) See n 36.

(84) See Voigt (n 64).

(87) John Bell, ‘Comparing Public Law’ in Andrew Hardy and Esin Oruç (eds), Comparative Law in the 21st Century (2002).

(89) Tushnet (n 47).

(92) See Resnik (n 37).

(96) See eg Griswold v Connecticut 381 US 479 (1965) (negative contrast with totalitarian governments); Lawrence v Texas 539 US 558 (2003) (positive comparison with Europe).

(98) Jackson (n 27), 168–78.

(99) One may also conceive of those who may initiate or enact amendments to a constitution as constitutional legislators.

(103) Miller (n 100).

(104) Ibid 616 (discussing Namibia).

(106) For discussion of these constraints, see Jon Elster, ‘Forces and Mechanisms in the Constitution-Making
This section of the chapter, and one earlier paragraph, draw from my previously published article, Vicki C. Jackson, ‘Methodological Challenges in Comparative Constitutional Law’ (2010) 28 Penn State International Law Review 319.

Kommers (n 39), 691–6.

On the problems of ‘omitted variables’ in comparative constitutional analysis, see Tushnet (n 33).

See Hirschl (n 59).

That is to say, for example, that limitations on expression that may be ‘demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society’ with a history of Nazism may not be quite so readily ‘demonstrably justified’ in societies without that history.

Jackson (n 27), 227–30.

Bell (n 87).

Tushnet (n 33).

Grundgesetz für die Bundesrepublik Deutschland (federal constitution), Preamble, May 23, 1949 (Federal Republic of Germany).

Irish Constitution, 1937.

Vicki C. Jackson
Vicki C. Jackson is Thurgood Marshall Professor of Constitutional Law, Harvard Law School, and formerly was Carmack Waterhouse Professor of Constitutional Law, Georgetown University Law Center
Abstract and Keywords

This article outlines and assesses the role of ‘typologies’ in comparative constitutional thought. It discusses the transnational context of comparative constitutionalism, constitutionalism in world society, the form and substance of constitutionalism, and the law’s troubled relation to society.

Keywords: comparative constitutionalism, transnational law, world society, societal constitutionalism

I. Introduction: The Transnational Context of Comparative Constitutionalism 75

2. Methodological Orientation 77

II. Constitutionalism in World Society: Post-National, Post-Territory, Post-State? 84

1. Space 87

2. Time 90

3. Governance in Space and Time 91

III. The Form and Substance of Constitutionalism 92

IV. Societal Constitutionalism: Law’s Troubled Relation to Society 94 interpret recognizable differences in the design, practice, and culture of constitutional design. In fact, much suggests that the foundations on which we can base the identification and demarcation of distinct constitutional systems pertains more to historic than systematic evidence. In other words, we need to ask whether or not the increasing ‘migration of constitutional ideas’, the phenomenon of ‘judicial globalization’, and the impregnation of constitutional cultures through ‘foreign’ norms and principles, while reflecting on a considerable degree of transformation, opening, and ‘internationalization’, still leaves the systematic structure intact. Not unknown from the field of comparative law in general, and constitutional comparisons, too, are plagued by a great degree of methodological uncertainty and theoretical indeterminacy. But, while ‘[c]onstitutionalism is sweeping the world’, evidenced for example by ‘at least 110 countries around the world’ engaged in constitution writing or reform since 1990, this evidence is itself extremely varied. Both causes and forms of constitutional change are anything but uniform and thus belie all claims regarding a worldwide and universal trend to a specific set of constitutional values or rights. Rather, the intensity of constitutional creation, reform, and discourse around the world is illustrative of the complexity of this process. The search, thus, for an analytical architecture of typologies across these myriad and continuously evolving constitutional cultures must reach deep into the constitutive elements of legal and political cultures, where the places, forms, and scopes of democracy continue to be ‘unsolved riddles’.

1. Methodological Orientation

In this chapter, I adopt the view that the above-described influences illustrate the difficulties of a comparative framework focusing on ‘typologies’ and ‘differences across systems’. In light of the fundamentally changing environment of constitutionalism and constitutionalization, I suggest the adoption of an alternative perspective and argue for the need for a methodology of transnational constitutionalism. The importance here lies in the combination of transnational and constitutionalism, with each term taken to be hiding more than it is revealing. Importantly, the term ‘transnational’ does not merely signify the extension of—however institutionalized or formalized—normativity across borders, say, of nation-states or other jurisdictional confines. Instead, the term ‘transnational’ identifies an intricate connection of spatial and conceptual dimensions: in addressing, on the one hand, the demarcation of emerging and evolving spaces and, on the other, the construction of these spaces as artefacts for human activity, communication, and rationality, the term transnational is conceptual. To declare an activity transnational is not just the result of an empirical observation, say, of a border-crossing commercial transaction. Instead, the term ‘transnational’ prompts a closer scrutiny of the definitional work that has gone into the description of the space before transnationalization. This line of questioning is of crucial importance as it reveals that the drawing of boundaries and the demarcation of ‘spaces’ is a conceptual undertaking. Seen in this light, the imagery of ‘constitutionalism beyond the state’ is open for a conceptual inquiry as to the irreplaceable or alternative-less inscription of constitutionalism within the state. To investigate the transnational nature of institutions or processes, in other words, is a methodological inquiry into the very structure of the language with which spaces of activity, regulation, or governance are constructed.

Thus, when speaking of transnational constitutionalism, we should not think of a normative order that emerges autonomously outside the confines of the nation-state and, as such, encompasses a distinct space of global governance with no relation to the world of states and the correlating measurements of law, namely national and international. Instead, transnational constitutionalism expresses the continuing evolution of constitutional principles, instruments, and doctrines as a particular form of legal evolution today. Transnational constitutionalism radically challenges but does not negate the distinction between the domestic and the international legal order. As suggested already in the 1950s by scholars in public and private law, the idea of ‘transnational law’ could aptly capture the emergence of norm creation and enforcement outside the confines of both private and public international law. These propositions, which have over time resonated in different areas of law, predominantly in commercial law and other subject areas of ‘private’ law, have furthermore inspired a host of theoretical and conceptual work around legal pluralism, human rights law, and transnational legal theory. Central to these approaches are two insights, one relating to the overwhelming evidence of norm creation which occurs outside the state’s lawmaking apparatus, the other connected to a particular understanding of law’s relation to society. From this point of view, law is a particular form of societal communication, as such contributing to the overall totality of society, but not occupying a privileged or hierarchically superior vantage point. This approach, which is most closely associated with the systems theory account of society developed by the late German sociologist Niklas Luhmann, posits society as one ‘without centre or apex’. In such a society, the state represents a particular emblematic form of political organization the emergence (and fate) of which is historically embedded and thus contingent. That the centre (or, the top) of societies should be occupied by the state is—thus—both historically and geographically variable.

This has tremendous consequences for an understanding of law. While Western legal thought has over a considerable time span learned to associate law with the state, it is by omission and a narrowing of one's gaze, that this nexus came to be universalized. Today's interest in 'law and globalization' should thus be seen as a welcome and most timely return to insights into the legal pluralist nature of law, which legal sociologists and anthropologists had already purported a long time ago. Aiming for an understanding of society today through a legal lens, then, might not be the worst approach, as law can be seen as impressively reflecting the changing structure of society. The crucial step, which can be made at this point, is to perceive of society as one in which many communicative forms and rationalities come together, and thus as a society in which states are but historically and geographically identifiable emanations of political organization. This opens an important vista on the 'history', the 'histories', and the 'non-history' of the state, while it allows us to conceive of society as 'world society'. Understood in this vein, society becomes the backdrop and context for our iterations of law and, by consequence, for all ensuing attempts to engage in any form of comparative law. While it is true that 'constitutions are made and then interpreted in complex and distinctive historical contexts', comparative law in a pluralistic world society forms the larger context for any attempt to identify and isolate constitutional typologies.

But, here is the moment where we need to pause. This is required if only to take appropriate notice of the considerable anxieties that accompany today's assertions of a world society, of global governance, or global constitutionalism. How have we arrived at this point? Much suggests, that—at least in the West—a pertinent obsession with the state lies at the root of the alluded-to globalization anxiety, an anxiety that might at least be partially abated through the insistence on constitutional comparisons. For, the very possibility of such comparison would allow a return, as it were, to known demarcations and confined realms of societal, political, and legal order. Such realms are always in motion. A categorization of constitutional qualities and characteristics and the complementing mapping of their distribution across time and space must take into account the fact that historical and present-day depictions of this or that constitutional order are placed in a discursive field. In other words, rather than 'going out to see', comparative constitutionalism is confronted with and engaged in a discursive struggle of contentious statements about the political order at a given time. This has long preoccupied scholars of comparative political thought, an area which underlies and informs much of comparative constitutionalism today. At the centre of such work we find efforts to adequately identify, to interpret, and to label instantiations of 'change'. Bearing the problem of bias and viewpoint in mind, that we are likely only seeing what we set out to see, any act of comparison continues to be haunted by grave doubts as to perception and method. At the same time, the very dynamic of societal change itself seems to resist any comparative assessment, if not undertaken 'from within', that is on the grounds of a solid understanding of 'the times' and informed by an adequately sophisticated theory of society. Hence, the proximity of constitutional studies and historical political analysis, as illustrated by early 'comparativists' such as Montesquieu, Burke, or Tocqueville.

While the attempt to discern architectural determinants, frameworks, and patterns of politico-constitutional organization is central to the comparative study of constitutional laws, the underlying motivations are highly divergent. While for some, the 'functional' comparison of working legal institutions and structures is at the forefront of the comparative enterprise, others pursue a discernibly more normative agenda. And yet, the overlapping of political and constitutional analytical lenses can easily blur the lines between universalist and functionalist analysis, and it is under our very eyes that the studied legal culture dissolves into a dizzying map of ambiguous assertions and directions. Yet, as we have learned, historical change does not reveal itself 'as such', offering itself for straightforward analysis and 'lesson-drawing'; rather, the experience of 'progress' is one of a future coming upon us with accelerated velocity and unknown quality.

Constitutions, we learn, fall with and rise from events of political tumult and overturn. 'Revolutions', then, can be read either to confirm the longest established, but not materialized freedoms or to bring about the death of those wrong forms of liberty existing at the time. 'The very idea of the fabrication of a new government', noted Edmund Burke in his Reflections on the French Revolution, 'is enough to fill us with disgust and horror. We wished at the period of the Revolution, and do now wish, to derive all we possess as an inheritance from our forefathers.' In this context, Burke famously posits that:
The institutions of policy, the goods of fortune, the gifts of Providence, are handed down, to us and from us, in the same course and order. Our political system is placed in just correspondence and symmetry with the order of the world, and with the mode of existence decreed to a permanent body composed of transitory parts; wherein, by the disposition of a stupendous wisdom, moulding together the great mysterious incorporation of the human race, the whole, at one time, is never old, or middle-aged, or young, but in a condition of unchanged constancy, moves on through the varied tenour of perpetual decay, fall, renovation and progression.\textsuperscript{38}

As noted by J.G.A. Pocock in his discussion of Burke, 'the history of ideas may legitimately, though not exclusively, be viewed as the history of the modes of explaining the world and its behaviour which have from time to time existed.'\textsuperscript{39} In this context, Reinhart Koselleck remarked that the notion of revolution, which was first derived from the natural movement of the stars and thus introduced into the natural rhythm of history as a cyclical metaphor, henceforth attained an irreversible direction. It appears to unchain a yearned-for future while the nature of this future robs the present of materiality and actuality. ... \textsuperscript{40} 'To the extent that the past can be experienced only insofar as it contains an element of what is to come (and vice versa), the political existence of the state remains trapped within a temporal structure that can be understood as static mobility.'\textsuperscript{41}

This is an observation of crucial importance for the purpose of the task here at hand. As aptly presented by the historians of political ideas and semantics, the discursive context in which the depiction of the meaning of revolution occurs is but all-decisive. It is the eternal, immovable, inscrutable nature of the state as an all-encompassing entity and sphere, which appears to underlie and to inform the understanding of the revolution and of the political order which it brings into view. As the anchoring point for the liberties of those living within its confines, the state is indeed placed above the political order to which—in modern political parlance—it adheres. Whether or not the state can in fact predate and precede the very idea of a certain political order, becomes irrelevant in the moment in which the state is seen to become the personification of a long-standing, historically evolved political order. The state now becomes—because it arguably has been—the guardian of liberties, and as such the representation of the constitutional order.\textsuperscript{42}

The state/constitutional order nexus would later become deeply steeped in a positivist depiction of the nature of the legal order itself.\textsuperscript{43} Associated with the state, the constitutional order becomes a product emitted from and depending on the state.\textsuperscript{44} From this perspective, comparative constitutionalism would thus be an exercise in comparing state legal orders with a particular focus on the regulation of fundamental liberties. A quest for typologies and ‘differences across systems’ seems to suggest the continuation of this precise inquiry. But, is it still adequate?

\section*{2. The Influence of Transnational Law on Comparative Constitutional Law}

There is today prolific evidence of comparative constitutional studies ‘in action’, as courts around the world—with differing degrees of deference\textsuperscript{45}—consider drawing on alternative, ‘foreign’ viewpoints in preparing and rendering their decisions.\textsuperscript{46} This view of ‘foreign’ constitutional law as both a guidance to local decision-making and as a ‘work of art’\textsuperscript{47} has been the subject of significant development and change. The causes of such change, in turn, may be identified as mainly originating out of two core developments: one is the fundamental transformation of what we might want to call the reference space for comparative constitutional law. The renewed advent of globalization in the twentieth century\textsuperscript{48} is marked by a far-reaching change in the position and status of states and sovereign political actors. The rise in importance of regional associations, such as the European Union from its beginnings in the post-Second World War context to its present form (and woes) at the beginning of the twenty-first century, echoes the complexity of transformation that—in an admittedly decentralizing direction—the former Soviet Union has undergone over the last 30 years or so.\textsuperscript{49} The changes brought about for statehood since the Second World War, through decolonization and regionalization, reunification and emancipation\textsuperscript{50} have drastically changed the anchoring and reference points for comparative constitutional studies: ‘The transformation of statehood shatters the former unity of territory, power, and people, and challenges the constitution’s ability comprehensively to encompass the political entity of the state.’\textsuperscript{51} From the perspective, then, of the constitution’s close association of the constitution and constitutionalism with the state, the prospects of comparative constitutional law seem to be tightly connected to the fate of comparative law in a globalized world, where the contours of statehood have become porous.\textsuperscript{52} Arguably, the relevance of the concept of ‘constitutionalism’—as...
Carving Out Typologies and Accounting for Differences Across Systems: Towards a Methodology of Transnational Constitutionalism opposed to ‘constitution’—lies in its potential to build bridges between the constitutional law discourses within the nation-state and the investigations into legitimacy of global governance in the ‘post-national constellation’.53 At the same time, the diminishing effect of constitutions on the global plane and the rise in importance of a rights- and entitlements-based concept of constitutionalism and constitutionalization for transnational human conduct give considerable cause of concern. The ‘emergence of private authority in global governance’54—as expressed in areas such as trade agreements,55 rating agencies,56 product safety,57 standardization,58 or the lex mercatoria59—(p. 83) constitutes a significant challenge for constitutional thought. These regulatory regimes in the transnational arena reflect, on the one hand, on a fundamentally changed role of the state in the exercise of ‘public’ governance,60 the origins of which have to be seen, first, in a transformation of the inter-national context61 and in the inner-state shift ‘from government to governance’.62 Secondly, these changes are associated with the emergence of norm-making processes, institutions of rule creation, implementation, and adjudication which scholars have not yet been able to re-categorize. Negotiating their allegedly ‘autonomous’ nature63 ‘without’64 or ‘beyond’65 the state, legal scholars, political philosophers, and sociologists are equally faced with the following question:

Is constitutional theory able to generalize the ideas it developed for the nation state and to re-specify them for today’s problems? In other words, can we make the tradition of nation-state constitutionalism fruitful and redesign it in order to cope with phenomena of privatization and globalization?66

A present inquiry into the possibilities of ‘carving out typologies’ unfolds against the background of the two contexts of transformation—the international and the national one. That the field of comparative (constitutional) law, despite pertinent enterprises to scrutinize its methodological foundations,67 still lacks satisfactory theorization, has been remarked by scholars all around.68 More importantly and substantively more fruitfully, scholars have highlighted the importance of a forceful engagement with the methodological challenges arising from any comparative legal project today.69 This chapter embraces these insights and highlights, in particular, the importance of treating both terms—transnational and constitutionalism—as unknowns, as terms that need to be unfolded in order for us to gain a better understanding of their (p. 84) traction today. Section II will provide a brief account of the changes in international relations and state sovereignty in the current era of globalization and argue for the emergence of ‘transnational constitutionalism’ as a methodological framework for comparative constitutional law, which incorporates the alluded-to transformation of the international and domestic contexts, in which we have been referring to the constitution. Section III further investigates the notion of constitutionalism and argues for the term’s fusion of form and substance. In conclusion, Section IV exposes constitutionalism as an expression of law’s exposure to conflicting regulatory and ordering rationalities.

II. Constitutionalism in World Society: Post-National, Post-Territory, Post-State?
Sociologists have long emphasized the need to conceive of society as a functionally differentiated, highly complex set of communications and processes.70 In that context, states would count less as expressions of a territorially bounded, specifically peopled and governed space and, in turn, as natural reference points for (comparative) constitutional thought. Instead, the sociologist would see states with all of their characteristics as historically developed and particular instantiations of political power that can be found in different forms and shapes and at different places around the world and through time. While such time keeping has traditionally been seen to have begun in the seventeenth century with the creation of the ‘Westphalian’ order, it is the respective connotation of Westphalian statehood with ideas of law, rights, democracy, on the one hand, and with the concept of the constitution, on the other, which has given rise to a number of contestations. First, the nexus between the state and a particular form of political and legal rule has been rejected as inadequately excluding alternative forms of political/legal organization from view.71 Secondly, the focus on the state as the decisive organizing entity gives undue primacy to the political form of societal organization, thereby turning a blind eye to the manifold forms of societal order.72 Mirroring the constantly increasing level of differentiation in society as perceived against the contingent yet pertinent background of particular local contexts, there is a rapidly expanding space of functional differentiation beyond the confines of the nation-state. Security, the environment, financial organization, or work have attained the status of complex regulatory and organizational spaces, the institutional and normative scope of which it is no longer possible to grasp through concepts of the state or through the nineteenth-century distinction of ‘state’ and ‘market’.73 Thirdly, the focus on the Westphalian state as the prime entity of political organization has been accompanied by a connotation of sovereignty, which over time has become both decontextualized and ahistoricized. As a result, the present era of globalization is presented as an aberration, erosion, and transformation of state sovereignty due to the perceived increased interdependence among states. This depiction, however, rests on a very partial representation of the international history to this day, a history which has been marked by a distinctly uneven (p. 85) distribution of political and economic powers. In turn, sovereignty, even when portrayed today as ‘challenged’ and ‘transformed’, for example by the rise in importance of non-state actors, claiming new subjectivity in international law or driving constitutional rights creation in parts of Asia, still tends to hide the underlying dynamics of inclusion and exclusion, the stark divide between ‘core’ and ‘periphery’ and the persistent discrimination of the ‘other’.

Apart from a radically relativized status of the state from the point of view of a world society concept, human relations are being considered in an entirely new light as well. In the eyes of the legal and political philosopher, the ‘civil society subject’ (bürgertliches Subjekt) at the beginning of the modern constitutional era, which morphed into the subject of the twentieth-century ‘mass society’, has meanwhile been replaced by today’s ‘cosmopolitan subject’, which is ‘above all smart. It regards the world as resource for interesting projects’. But, this leaves little room—nor need—for the capacity to political judgment, if the ‘historical a priori is not a communal space encompassed by the state, but functionally differentiated, transnational problem solving processes’.

And the sociologists and philosophers of the risk society, which now spans the globe, observe, that:

Everybody, whether they want it or not, is shaped by the individualism and rationality of a single global culture which includes human rights culture as well as the culture of individualized suicide bombing. All cultural differences are now in the same society and of individualized persons who have to organize and reorganize, construct and reconstruct their ego and their personal and collective identity lifelong, and in order to do that they rely only on the (weak or strong) means of their own autonomy. Yet, as ‘free men’ we are not looking with Sartre into the abyss of nothingness, but are acting against a dense and common background of relatively abstract, highly general and formal, thoroughly secular, nevertheless global knowledge that is implicit in the global social life-world. This is so simply because traditional identity formations no longer and nowhere are available without a permanently growing and changing variety of alternative offers, in Teheran as well as in New York, in the Alps of Switzerland as well as in the mountain regions of Afghanistan, Pakistan, or Tibet.

(p. 86) Comparative constitutional law scholars, hence, face a conundrum. Where they turn towards states in the international arena in order to depict particular types and forms of constitutional order, they find themselves in a ‘new world’. Searching for institutional familiarity or, at least, complementarity, they are increasingly faced with the fluidity of the institutional and procedural frameworks that so far marked the anchor points for comparison, something which has been guiding the Canadian comparativist H. Patrick Glenn in his refutation of comparative studies that aim at circumscribing ‘systems’ through the association with static and fixed boundaries. It also inspires the groundbreaking project of a transnational group of constitutional scholars in their efforts to explore the openness of ‘global legal traditions’. The changed transnational landscape, then, reflects a distinct transnationalization in the form of an emerging multilevel constitutional universe pushing for an open-ended reconfiguration of constitutional and interpretative competences. A US court wishing to engage with the constitutional law of, say, France or Germany, will—despite a good understanding of the particular nature of constitutional review in both countries—find itself confronted with the European Court of Human Rights’ effect on what has long become a complex interplay of different levels of norm creation and compliance.

Substantively, this altered landscape appears to elude claims of deliberation, reciprocity, and ‘engagement’ as risk management, ‘hedging’, and knowledge-driven assessments assume the dominant places in societal providence. Faced with this ‘mismatch between societal complexities and the means and modes of governance’, the constitutionalist is prompted to reconsider her perspectives and options. It is thus not surprising that comparative law scholars, in light of the porous confines of national constitutional orders, have been directing their view towards differently construed architectures of constitutional ordering. This is aptly reflected in the emergence of comparative constitutionalism, present today, for instance, in vibrant discourses around the ‘migration’ of constitutional ideas and ‘transnational constitutionalism’. Yet—despite the intensity of such endeavours—it still appears as if ‘[c]onstitutionalism is one of those concepts, evocative and persuasive in its connotations yet cloudy in its analytic and descriptive content, which at once enrich and confuse political discourse. Accordingly, an inquiry into the methodological foundations of comparative constitutional law cannot avoid a serious engagement with the notion of constitutionalism.

The transnational transformation of international political sovereignty is characterized by the overlap and the intersection of historical associations of nineteenth-century governmental design and liberal political theory, on the one hand, and the insight into the tedious tension between legislative prerogatives and fundamental rights, on the other. Constitutionalism unites the nexus between ‘state’ and ‘constitution’ by positing an inner connection between the form and substance of government. In breaking down the complementary association between the state and the constitution, the concept of constitutionalism recreates opportunities to conceive of different foundations and ties of constitutional norms. Herein lies its great promise—and also its risk. Taking an optimistic view, constitutionalism can be seen as law's unveiling of its emancipatory potential: constitutionalism frees constitutional norm thinking from any given institutional framework and instead provides a space in which such a framework can or rather, must, first be designed. From a more sceptical vista, however, the accompanying notions of ‘limiting’ government tend to propel a normative assessment of the state’s ‘proper business’ rather than merely demarcating the extent of its regulatory arm. This focus on limiting, or placing constraints on, government powers, has arguably been part of what scholars have referred to as ‘traditional constitutionalism’.

1. Space

This limiting function of constitutional frameworks has, as we saw, been a crucial element in the evolution of politico-constitutional theorizing. It comes as little surprise, then, that a certain ‘gist’ is attributed to this history. Harking back to canonical texts of comparative legal theory, the underlying assumption of progress, often coupled with a strong plea for progress, continues to have a strong impulse for the recognition and elaboration of border-crossing normativity. But, in the transnational context, this implication of normative progress—allegedly expressed, for example, (in the Western understanding) by the ‘progress’ in human rights law, has tremendous consequences for a critique of emerging legal structures. In the heated discussion around an emerging ‘global’ legal order, two features in this context are particularly worthy of being highlighted. The first concerns the question of the connection between a global legal order and the domestic legal system. This question, then, turns on the degree of autonomy of one from the other. Arguably, claims of an emerging global legal order have been put forward precisely not only to illustrate the autonomy of global law from the (nation-)state, but in addition to underscore the distinct nature of the emerging body and system of norms.

The second strand in the cluster of arguments in favour of an emerging globality of law concerns the question of legitimacy. Here, again, the discussion has become considerably differentiated: while scholars in the context of assessing the prospects of public international law in the face of global terrorism, climate change, and unilateralism, argue for the increasing materiality of constitutionalist thinking outside the nation-state, other scholars have been taking a closer look at the intersection between international law and political philosophy, scrutinizing the chances for a cosmopolitan legal order. It is within the larger debate about cosmopolitanism, that some of the long-standing challenges of constituting a pluralistic, democratic political order become visible and open to scrutiny—from the perspectives of law, philosophy, and political science. What, on the one hand, differentiates but, on the other, also reconnects this strand of debate with the one focusing on global constitutionalism, is the distinct widening of the perspective from a predominantly legal inquiry towards one which places the constitution of a legal order within a comprehensive discussion of the legitimacy concerns of such an order. Finally, a third strand in the context of assessing the challenges of a global legal order approaches the problem from a distinctly procedural angle. Arguing for the relevance of administrative law rules to further the legitimacy of global governance institutions, scholars in this field have been mobilizing the idea of a ‘global administrative law’. Over the span of a few years, this research has met with far-reaching attention, pressing for a further clarification and elaboration of central premises such as the comparative status of constitutional law concerns within the administrative governance orientation of the Global Administrative Law Project or the prospects of the concept of the Rule of Law within the continuing debate around the institutional and normative pillars of global governance.

This differentiation of the debate around an emerging global legal order is, as we have seen, intimately tied into questions of boundaries and legal or, regulatory ‘spaces’ (national/domestic vs ‘global’), on the one hand, and questions of legitimacy, accountability, representation, on the other. This overlapping of inquiries into the status and nature of the evolving legal order has been contributing to a further approximation of legal theoretical discourse and parallel scholarly pursuits in disciplines such as geography, sociology, anthropology. These disciplines have been of crucial importance in illuminating and emphasizing the methodological complexity of global governance discourses and are central to a redefinition of constitutionalism, (p. 89) as we will develop in greater detail in the concluding section. Meanwhile, they offer important echoes and re-instantiations of the type of questions raised by legal pluralists over the course of the twentieth century. Legal pluralism, arguably, has been concerned with critiquing the demarcation lines between ‘official’ and ‘ unofficial’ rule systems, in other words with the identification and scrutinizing of the justifications offered to distinguish between law and ‘non-law’. In the context of analysing the nature of ‘global law rules’, the legal pluralists’ interest in laying bare the political and ideological choices involved in differentiating spheres of rule-making proves to contribute a crucial perspective on the applied analytical lenses and methodological approaches.
Carving Out Typologies and Accounting for Differences Across Systems: Towards a Methodology of Transnational Constitutionalism

Against this background, it becomes questionable whether one may aptly characterize the above-mentioned approaches in studying global law as spatial. This adjective would be justified to the degree that the metaphor of space continues to function as a helpful tool for the identification of constituted spheres of rule creation, enforcement, and political order. At the same time, it becomes less pervasive when applied in the context of an inquiry into the nature of evolving legal norms, which grow out of border-crossing, ‘privatized’, and transnational norm-making processes. Space, then, ceases to demarcate an identifiable, confined realm, and instead points to the ambiguity and relative openness of reasons given for the constitution of space.

Despite a well-reasoned scepticism towards the metaphor of space in understanding the ‘location’ of global law, legal scholars have been insisting on the continued importance of making spatial metaphors part of the legal methodological calculus in order further to scrutinize the challenges—and shortcomings—of spatial representations of legal normativity. From this perspective, references to space as well as to ‘levels’ of regulatory authority continue to be important in the context of global governance analysis, even where they are explicitly contested. What should be retained, then, from this consideration of the significance of spatial metaphors in legal reasoning in the context of global governance, is the ‘framing’ nature of these metaphors in legal discourse. As impressively illustrated by the unending inquiry into the promises and fallbacks of federalism, legal theory today can no longer confine itself to a juxtaposition of either-or choices, as between federalism or unity, regulatory competition or harmonization. The crux of these order paradigms lies in their inconclusiveness: just as a system arguably resting either on principles of horizontal unity and equity or of hierarchical supremacy, a federalist system does not offer—on its own—answers to questions touching on the substance of the regulatory issue to be decided. Hence, whether or not a regulatory challenge is a matter of federalism does not carry any weight for the resolution of the underlying substantive issue. And yet, the existence or non-existence of a federal system (or, of a non-federalist one) has distinct consequences for the evolution and application of constitutional rules in a particular system, which in turn is of relevance for the identification of comparative typologies.

2. Time

The spatial dimension of law, elaborated on in the previous section, is arguably complemented by a temporal one. This dimension begins to unfold when one takes into consideration the transformation of the legal systems under comparison. Stark expressions of such transformations become visible, of course, in cases of dramatic regime and system change, for example at times of ‘transitional justice’ or post-conflict regime-building. The transformation of a legal system, in such instances, is embedded in and inseparable from a much more comprehensive change of the political, socio-economic, and even day-to-day system. As such, a legal system’s history is always part of and tied into a significantly more complex history of change.

The most salient feature of the post-colonial model is that both ... the constitutional order and identity of the newly independent former-colony are elaborated in a dialectical process involving an ongoing struggle between absorption and rejection of the former coloniser’s most salient relevant identities.

The consideration of change over time, however, still needs to take into consideration the contested nature of what comes into view, what lies at the surface, and what is lurking in the background. As famously elaborated by Yerushalmi in his study of Jewish remembrance, a chronology of events is likely to be remembered as a chronology of experiences, the latter being both ‘out of time’ and yet embedded in a comprehensive narrative of collective identity. The post-conflict context evokes, to be sure, a set of comprehensive and intricate demarcations concerning the nature and quality of ‘things changed’. While post-conflict, retroactive, or transitional justice identifies perspectives on legal and political regime change following a fundamental breakdown, rupture, or decay of an existing order, a wider perspective still would take into view the historical period in which the studied transformations occur. This certainly makes for an overwhelming panorama. Hence, the need to draw out the connections between the spatial and the temporal axis between which the present observations are being made. This ‘reminder’ of sorts, however, points to the considerable dilemma, which is underlying the task at hand. This dilemma results from the attempt to provide for a reasonable account of the evolution of political-constitutional structures, but there are non-negligible problems associated with such an undertaking.
Carving Out Typologies and Accounting for Differences Across Systems: Towards a Methodology of Transnational Constitutionalism

3. Governance in Space and Time

Placing cases of state transformation, regime change, and transitional justice in a larger historical context, inevitably requires that we first clarify the location of a particular instance within the identified historical period (eg ‘decolonization’), but moreover that we identify the boundaries of the period itself. To stay with the example of decolonization, historians have regularly called into question a straightforward, historic demarcation of both beginnings and ends of this ‘period’. This has to do, inter alia, with the immensely intricate and layered context in which such a demarcation would have to be made. Surely, the context of state formation and political emancipation in North Africa in the 1960s is a different one than that of the post-1989 political independence movements in Eastern Europe. In other words, such an exercise would first have to find convincing answers to questions such as: ‘When did decolonization begin, when did it end—if it ever did?’ Advances in comparative constitutional law point, however, to growing anxieties among scholars to suggest such answers. For example, comparative scholarship focusing on South East Asia, highlights the great diversity in ‘post-colonial’ development. Similar problems of classification arise through the lens of legal transplants, which might be applied in order to trace the respective normative and institutional ‘migrations’ of legal instruments through time and space. Here, again, we see that the story is anything but straightforward.

Yet another problem in the context of applying a ‘governance’ lens to the comparative study of constitutional cultures arises from the extreme volatility of normative regimes today. A governance view on these developments would at first glance reveal such volatility, in other words, the fragile balance between ‘hard’ and ‘soft’ institutions in the (re-)formation of a legal-political system, in the context of ‘developing’ nations. It should not come as a surprise here that scholars engaging in the study of so-called ‘new institutional economics’ would find this hybridity of the emerging ‘economics of governance’ not too daunting, as it would only underline the ordinary tension between individual/collective societal activity, on the one hand, and state intervention/ regulation, on the other. New institutional economics (NIE) scholars have been focusing on this tension with greater emphasis in constellations of ‘lawlessness’, arising, for example—but not only—in contexts of state transformation. Rather than being attributions made in the context of post-conflict situations or fundamental regime change, NIE scholars’ observations of lawlessness are also based on a normative assessment of ‘state failure’. The latter is affirmed where the state fails short of providing the appropriate regulatory framework for private activity; hence the NIE scholars’ insistence on the need of ‘private ordering’. It is important to recognize that the analysis of lawlessness does not exhaust itself or grow out of studies of development contexts. Instead, the analysis unfolds very powerfully in the midst of mature and, as such, highly regulated nation-state environments, where the target of NIE scrutiny is the state’s assertion of regulatory authority over what would allegedly be better left to the self-regulatory capabilities of private actors. The assignment of law to set but the formal framework for societal self-regulation draws on legal sociological insights into the normative pluralism of complex societal settings, but gives this analysis a conservative twist by drawing a line between the spheres of the ‘state’ and the ‘market’ and between the ‘public’ and the ‘private’, despite a longstanding refutation of such simplifying, and thus misleading, distinctions.

This brief allusion to the themes of ‘lawlessness’ and ‘private ordering’ suggests an altogether ambiguous concept of the constitution, which is at work both in the context of developing states but also mature welfare states. Whereas the term constitution could refer to a—written or unwritten—text or set containing the ground rules of state conduct and civil rights, the struggle over the place of law in the evolution of political orders, then and now, suggests a much more comprehensive concept of the constitution. Such a concept becomes discernible from a political economy perspective, from which—since Adam Smith—the constitution has been referred to as the framework of state–market relations. From that perspective, constitution captures the organization and normative ordering of a particular society. Where from the vantage point of the earlier depiction rendered by the NIE scholars, the constitution would refer to the rules and principles setting out the rights of both the state and the people living within it, a political economy perspective on the constitution would seek to capture all regulation and self-regulation to be part of the constitutional structure.
Carving Out Typologies and Accounting for Differences Across Systems: Towards a Methodology of Transnational Constitutionalism

As a result, a historical periodization of constitutional phases in different parts of the world would face the choice of either having to assume at least a basic form of constitutional standards and ground rules, against which such changes could be measured, or giving up entirely on the idea of historical periodization for the purpose of comparative studies of constitutional developments in light of the complexity and particularity of each individual case.

III. The Form and Substance of Constitutionalism

But how, we must ask, can this complex background be encompassed and adopted by the notion of constitutionalism? This ambivalence is implied by constitutionalism's fusion of form and substance of government, and it is here that we can already recognize the vulnerability of constitutional design to an usurpation by normative motivations, which are themselves removed from scrutiny, because they hide a qualitative dimension ('what should states do?'; 'what do we mean by state?') underneath an allegedly quantitative measurement in terms of the Lochnerian: 'Where to draw the limits of state intervention?' In turn, this association of constitutionalism with the notion of 'limiting' government remains politically innocent and vulnerable for just about any inscription of what governments should or should not do: by reorienting what is really a normative decision about the goals of politics to the quantifiable measurements of state action, the fact that at the outset we were concerned with a normative question is effectively invisibilized.

But herein rests its great vulnerability, as constitutionalism—stripped of its institutional embodiment, on the one hand, and relatively defenceless in its reliance on its commitment to 'limiting government', on the other—is exposed to normative usurpation. Such usurpation can originate from just about any corner of society, perceived as functionally differentiated and structured by a—disharmonious—concert of different communicative rationalities. 'The administrative individualism of optimizing a rational conduct of life and the global moral missionary consciousness are two sides of the same coin.' But, then again, the usurpation will not come from just any force of societal rationality, or simply originate out of functional differentiation without particular pulls and dynamics. In a knowledge society, marked by the ubiquitous presence of 'experts', practical judgment can tend to become clouded. Meanwhile, certain 'rationalities', foremost the economic one, have become particularly influential and 'expansive'. As has repeatedly been noted by sceptics of the 'new constitutionalism', this has tremendous repercussions for the use of the concept to depict emerging forms of societal order on the transnational plane. In accordance with the ubiquitous triumph of economic rationality, myriad forms of private authority and empowerment, based on property rights and contractual freedom, have become the driving forces in a fast-expanding transnational space of market 'self-regulation'. It is here, at least from a Western perspective, that the concept of constitutionalism merges with processes of 'constitutionalization'. In the grey zone between constitutionalism and constitutionalization, the former is above all associated with the erosion of institutionalized, accountable exercises of political authority, while the latter appears to capture the formative but disembedded driving forces of constitution-making. In this juxtaposition, constitutionalism still rings of the, if embattled and contested, glory of a constitutional promise, a text and its adversaries, while constitutionalization no more than ironizes particular places of constitutional culture. In an evolving, transnational space, constitutionalization is the driver, wake-up call, and désenchanteur of a reliable constitutional culture.

In a multivocal and extremely fragmented and diversified universe of beliefs, traditions, and knowledge bodies, the constitutionalism which grows out of the constitutionalization of societal practices, has little in common with the world of 'comparative' constitutional law. Constitutionalization, in the transnational space, depicts the dynamic forces of constantly newly emerging functional and specialized fora of rule-making. In this new environment, constitutionalism's central task to bring about a new fusion of form and substance of government, is always at risk of normative hijacking. In other words, by giving up the intricate tension within the constitution as both emancipating and limiting, the normative core of constitutionalism, so understood, can easily be oriented this way or that, through just about any dominant normative concept, the substance of which has never been subjected to a legitimizing process.

And thus, it comes as no surprise that the intricate nature of this inner connection between form and substance of government must remain ambivalent. One way of addressing this situation has been to distinguish between constitutionalism and democracy. The latter serves as both a yardstick for an assessment of the procedural and institutional safeguards of constitutionalism and a normative counter-position to the ambiguous openness of constitutionalism. But, how convincing is this move in light of the fact that the contours of democratic government have become elusive in a world society without world government?

IV. Societal Constitutionalism: Law’s Troubled Relation to Society

Today, constitutional scholars must address questions of constitutional design, including the negotiation of political power and fundamental rights against this background of a rapidly changed and changing regulatory environment. The general transformation of state sovereignty from ‘above’ must be seen in tandem with what the sociologist Saskia Sassen has coined the erosion of sovereignty from ‘below’, namely the alteration of formerly hierarchically conceived patterns of political and legal order through an increasing fusing of the state and market spheres of norm creation, implementation, and enforcement. This bi- and multi-polar transformation of state functionality poses significant challenges for constitutional theories, which—as we have observed in Western legal thought—were largely developed against the background of a state-based system of political organization. As these societies are continuing to experiment with responsive, participatory, and substantively more open-ended forms of regulation, constitutional law becomes a crucial intersection forum for highly differentiated interests and demands from various sectors of society.

But, the same dynamics which characterize and shape power relations, access, and accountability on the global level under the guise of constitutionalization and ‘good governance’, have their counterparts within domestic legal cultures—something that renders commitments to ‘mutual respect’ and ‘trust’ as core ingredients of an integrative constitutionalist culture considerably aspirational. With a view to the transformation of the state, depicted through notions such as the ‘rule of law’, the ‘social’, ‘welfare’, or ‘post-regulatory’ state, the realm of constitutional law has long begun to become unbounded. Especially in fast-capitalizing, Western nation-states, we can look back at a long history of crucial challenges to the regulatory nature of constitutional law. The history and experience of constitutional law in these societies is of greatest importance precisely because it provides for such a rich archive and mine of engagements with problems of inclusion and exclusion, access and redistribution, public and private power, which so markedly haunt global governance today. Strikingly, however, hardly anything of this varied history, full of ambiguity, violence, frustration, and compromise, finds its way into the global constitutional imagination. The assertion of, say, Global Administrative Law’s ‘constitutional modesty’ is hardly convincing. At the core we are concerned with the transfer of administrative law principles and concepts, which historically have evolved in the context of constitutional contestation, into a sphere, that would allegedly allow a separation of the procedural rules of political administration of highly diversified interests and power relations from underlying constitutional conflicts.

The fluidity of institutional structures in the emerging ‘network society’ suggests that constitutional law, based either on a text or emerging from historical common law practice, is best seen as a forum through which an endless number of linkages are constantly created, processed, changed, rejected, and affirmed, between law and politics. ‘Constitution’, then, becomes an anchoring point and reference perspective for the collision of existing and emerging legal semantics of society’s self-governance. But, as such, the constitution is no longer a ‘public law’ text, emanating from state authority and sitting at the pinnacle of a pyramid of legal normativity. Instead, constitutions—written or unwritten—and constitutional law must facilitate the intersection of law and politics in a radically heterarchic, modern society. As a consequence, the strict confines of the traditionally conceived subject matter of constitutional law itself have long begun to elude us.

What does this mean, however, for the task undertaken by comparative constitutionalists? Comparative constitutional law has itself become fundamentally affected by a change in law’s self-perception of its foundations, instruments, and institutions. Rather than with the ‘laws’ of, say, jurisdiction A and jurisdiction B, comparative lawyers, and notably comparative constitutional law scholars, find themselves confronted with a complex, multilayered, and hybrid structure of norms. Taking their cue from Zweigert and Kötz’s instruction in functional comparisons, such comparativists are today caught in a web of official and unofficial, ‘hard’ and ‘soft’ norms, that render a comparison of legal instruments and regulatory regimes much more challenging. At the heart of comparing legal cultures now lies an unavoidably interdisciplinary study of legal and non-legal norms, routines, and social practices.\textsuperscript{160} It is here, where the comparativist cannot fruitfully proceed without drawing on the insights from ‘neighbouring’ as well as complementing disciplines—both from outside and inside law. Through the interaction and engagement with political scientists, anthropologists, administrative law, and legal pluralism scholars, to mention only a few, comparative constitutionalists will be poised to draw a much more accentuated map of constitutional culture and change. It is here where we can catch a glimpse of what a turn towards an interdisciplinary understanding of functionalist comparisons might mean. Law’s exposure to the myriad, conflicting rationalities and tendencies in a differentiating society throws law back upon itself. It must thus reflect on its own constitution. As legal doctrines, principles, and regulatory standards become crisscrossed, captured, alienated, and constantly turned on their head by economic, political, or religious contentions of efficiency, legitimacy, or truth, the very function of law becomes questionable. It becomes a constitutional question. One that is no longer answerable with reference to established patterns of hierarchy or authority, but in a radically open, undetermined way. Law’s operation with the legal/illegal distinction is its existential self-assertion, its claim to take on board the pains of this world. It can only do so in its raw exposedness to competing regulatory rationalities, emerging from economics, politics, religion. Meanwhile, the constitutional ‘subject’ itself is too often constituted from within a known, unscrutinized, and closed context.\textsuperscript{161} (p. 97) Breaking these frames, the subject emerges as a fragile and vulnerable space of attribution, domination, and suffocation, one that can only be adequately studied in reaching beyond confines and treacherous ‘inheritances’.\textsuperscript{162} Comparative constitutional law, then, withers away as a field focusing on ‘comparison’, on ‘constitutions’, and on ‘law’, only to re-emerge as a critical enterprise in scrutinizing law’s relation to a complex world society.

Bibliography

Carving Out Typologies and Accounting for Differences Across Systems: Towards a Methodology of Transnational Constitutionalism

Europäischen Union (2011)

Notes:

(*) Canada Research Chair, Osgoode Hall Law School, York University, Toronto. I am grateful to Isabel Feichtner and Alexander Kemmerer for insightful feedback and comments and to Elena Cohen for precious editorial work.

(5) But see Sujit Choudhry, ‘Globalization in Search of Justification: Toward a Theory of Comparative Constitutional Interpretation’ (1999) Indiana Law Journal 819, 941: ‘A court’s choice of interpretive methodology will affect more than the outcome of the particular case before it. It will also likely affect the broader constitutional culture of the interpreting court’s jurisdiction.’

(8) Ibid.

(9) See Chapter 36.

Carving Out Typologies and Accounting for Differences Across Systems: Towards a Methodology of Transnational Constitutionalism

(30) For a discussion of the ‘four “i”s’ (inappropriate, inconceivable, improbable, or illegitimate), see Walker (n 13), 520–5.

Carving Out Typologies and Accounting for Differences Across Systems: Towards a Methodology of Transnational Constitutionalism

(35) Cappelletti and Cohen (n 1); Basu (n 1); Konrad Zweigert and Hein Kötz, An Introduction to Comparative Law (3rd edn, 1996).

(38) Cited in ibid 211.

(39) Ibid 204–5.

(40) Koselleck (n 36), 23.

(41) Ibid 22.

(42) Pocock (n 37), 212.

(44) Walker (n 13), 521: ‘The invocation of the ideas and practices of constitutionalism involves a distinctive way of thinking about the world—an epistemic horizon and political imaginary that presupposes and refers to the particular form of the state.’

(54) R. Hall and T. Biersteker (eds), The Emergence of Private Authority: Form of Private Authority and their Implications for International Governance (2001).

(64) Teubner (n 16).

(66) Gunther Teubner, ‘Fragmented Foundations: Societal Constitutionalism beyond the Nation State’ in Dobner and Loughlin (n 51), 328.

(67) H. Patrick Glenn, ‘Comparative Legal Families and Comparative Legal Traditions’ in Reimann and Zimmermann (n 32), and Professor Glenn’s groundbreaking textbook, soon to be published in its fifth edition.

(69) Miller (n 6), who draws on Patrick Glenn’s concept of legal traditions to argue that ‘the answer must be that legal tradition need not be the object of a comparative undertaking, but instead might be part of the inquiry to be made in better understanding the laws or legal institutions that eventually become the objects of comparison.’

(71) Ehrlich (n 24), 465ff; Merry (n 19); today: Teubner (n 66), 331.

(72) Merry (n 16).

(80) Ibid 142.

(81) Ulrich Beck, World at Risk, orig in German Weltrisikogesellschaft (Ciaran Cronin trans, 2009).

(82) Hauke Brunkhorst, ‘Constitutionalism and Democracy in the World Society’ in Dobner and Loughlin (n 51), 186–7.

(84) An-Naim et al (n 6).

(87) Tomuschat (n 85).

(88) Willke (n 73), 39.

(90) Dorsen et al (n 1).

(91) Choudhry (n 2).

(92) Excellent: Dobner (n 51); and Walker (n 13), 525ff.

(93) Thomas C. Grey, ‘Constitutionalism: An Analytic Framework’ in J. Roland Pennock and John W. Chapman (eds),
Carving Out Typologies and Accounting for Differences Across Systems: Towards a Methodology of Transnational Constitutionalism

Constitutionalism: NOMOS XX (1979), 189.

(96) Ibid 17–18.

(97) Jiunn-Rong Yeh, ‘The Emergence of Asian Constitutionalism: Features in Comparison’ (2009) 4 National Taiwan University Law Review 39, 41. Professor Yeh has argued that this type of constitutionalism has been succeeded by ‘transitional constitutionalism’, marked by a high degree of dynamic change, future empowerment, and contingent constitutional arrangements, which are likely to be changed and adapted later. The last stage in this development he depicts as ‘transnational constitutionalism’, marked by the emergence of supranational constitutional frameworks (eg the EU), the tension between ‘domestic’ and ‘transnational’ constitutional norms, and the increasing institutional borrowing and judicial dialogue. Ibid 44.

(98) Zweigert and Kötz (n 35), 43ff.

(99) For a critique, see only Upendra Baxi, The Future of Human Rights (2002).

Carving Out Typologies and Accounting for Differences Across Systems: Towards a Methodology of Transnational Constitutionalism

(114) On federalism generally, see Chapter 27.

(121) See eg Osterhammel and Petersson (n 48).

(123) Choudhry (n 5).

(126) Oliver E. Williamson, ‘The Economics of Governance’ (2005) 95 American Economic Review 1; for a discussion see Calliess and Zumbansen (n 16), ch 2, part III, C i. (113–19).

(128) Williamson (n 124); Williamson (n 126).
Carving Out Typologies and Accounting for Differences Across Systems: Towards a Methodology of Transnational Constitutionalism

(130) Ehrlich (n 24); Sally Falk Moore, Law as Process (1978); Arthurs (n 24); Griffiths (n 107); Merry (n 19).

(133) Somek (n 79), 145.

(134) ibid.

(137) Compare with Yeh (n 97), 47–9, stressing the ‘thin understanding of liberal constitutionalism’, whereby constitutional change in Asia in recent decades has—different to the transitional context in Eastern Europe—not been focused on market transformation, but on the simultaneous, non-oppositional development of liberal and social rights.

(138) On point: Martin Loughlin, ‘What is Constitutionalization?’ in Dobner and Loughlin (n 51).

(140) Waldron (n 95), 40:

Constitutions are not just about restraining and limiting power; they are about the empowerment of ordinary people in a democracy and allowing them to control the sources of law and harness the apparatus of government to their legitimate expectations. That is the democratic view of constitutions, but it is not the constitutionalist view.

(141) Carl Schmitt, Constitutional Theory (Jeffrey Seitzer trans, orig in German, [1928] 2008).

(142) Saskia Sassen, ‘The State and Globalization’ in Nye and Donahue (n 61).

Carving Out Typologies and Accounting for Differences Across Systems: Towards a Methodology of Transnational Constitutionalism

(147) Teubner (n 66), 341: ‘one can only be amazed at the naivety of participatory romanticism’.

(154) Nico Krisch (n 105); for a critique see Somek (n 139) and Alexander Somek, ‘Administration without Sovereignty’ in Dobner and Loughlin (n 51), 267ff.

(155) For further elaboration see Kingsbury (n 106).

(156) Luhmann (n 143); Luhmann (n 20).

(157) Waldron (n 95).

(158) Zweigert and Kötz (n 35), 34ff.

(160) Glenn (n 83); Annelise Riles, ‘Comparative Law and Socio-Legal Studies’ in Reimann and Zimmermann (n 32); Peer Zumbansen, ‘Comparative Law’s Coming of Age? Twenty Years after “Critical Comparisons” ’ (2005) 6 German Law Journal 1073.

(161) Bruno Latour, We Have Never Been Modern (Catherine Porter trans, 1993).

Peer Zumbansen

Peer Zumbansen is Professor of Law and Canada Research Chair in Transnational Economic Governance and Legal Theory, Osgoode Hall Law School, York University, Toronto.
Abstract and Keywords

This article presents a history of ideas of constitutional designs and conceptions of constitutionalism. It discusses the problem with typologies, identifying the object, the constitution as law, constitutions as expressions of political ideas, and national and international constitutions.

Keywords: constitutional design, constitutionalism, typologies, national constitution, international constitution

I. The Problem with Typologies 98
II. Identifying the Object 100
III. The Constitution as Law 105
   1. The Legal Character of the Constitution 105
   2. Specialized in Regulating Public Power 108
   3. Comprehensive Regulation 109
   4. Supremacy 109
   5. Legitimating Principle 114

IV. Constitutions as Expressions of Political Ideas 115
   1. Liberal-Democratic Constitutions 116
   2. Liberal Non-Democratic Constitutions 119
   3. Non-Liberal Democratic Constitutions 122
   4. The Social or Welfare State Constitution 124
   5. Socialist Constitutions 128

V. A New Distinction: National and International Constitutions 129

I. The Problem with Typologies

Typologies of constitutions are not at the centre of the rapidly growing literature on constitutionalism. If typological considerations appear at all, they form a by-product rather than the main concern of constitutional research. Moreover, the criteria for typifying constitutions vary from author to author. Although other criteria are easily conceivable, the question why some were chosen and others not remains mostly unanswered. But is this really surprising? The criteria according to which constitutions can be typified are innumerable. A choice has to be made and the choice is guided by the research interest that a scholar of constitutionalism pursues. Typologies are not ends in themselves. They help to answer other questions.

(p. 99) Someone who is interested in the legal and political relevance of constitutions may find a typology according to degrees of effectivity appropriate. 1 Someone who wants to understand the emergence of what has become ‘constitutionalism’ over time may distinguish between ‘constitutionalism ancient and modern’. For the purposes of comparative constitutionalism, a distinction on the basis of generic and particular or original and derivative constitutions comes to mind. If the inquiry is into the ‘subject of constitutional identity’, one may distinguish constitutions according to the source of constituent power. A scholar interested in the adaptation of constitutions to changing demands will emphasize the distinction between rigid and flexible constitutions.

All these and many other typologies can be found in the legal literature. But law is not the only discipline interested in constitutions. A philosopher may distinguish between just and unjust constitutions; a political scientist between integrative and disintegrative constitutions. For economists, the emphasis will be on the choices that constitutions have made with regard to the economic system. A scholar in religious studies will perhaps classify constitutions according to whether and how they refer to God or incorporate divine (natural) law. An art historian might be interested in the iconography and typography of constitutional documents.

These examples suffice to show that a search for one typology of constitutions would be in vain. There are but various kinds of typologies and each draws its plausibility from the purpose of the research project in which it is embedded. This describes, at the same time, the risk of a chapter on types of constitutions that stands for itself. A choice is inevitable, yet not linked to a special topic the choice may seem more or less arbitrary. With this risk in mind, I will concentrate on two aspects that hopefully serve the objective of this volume. One is more systematic, the other more historical.

The first aspect concerns the constitution as law; to be more precise, a law with a special function and object, and the typological consequences that follow from its peculiarity. The second aspect concerns questions of content, namely the leading ideas, the governing principles, or regime-defining character, which influence the way constitutions try to fulfill their function. This attempt should not, however, be confused with a classification according to various institutional arrangements like monarchy or republic, federal or unitary system, parliamentarian or presidential government, unicameral or bicameral parliament, militant or acquiescent democracy etc. These are types of governmental systems established by constitutions rather than types of constitutions.

Neither is the difference between living and constant constitutions a suitable criterion to classify constitutions. David Strauss calls a living constitution ‘one that evolves, changes over time, and adapts to new circumstances, without being formally amended’. But this language is not quite accurate. The change he speaks of is not brought about by the constitution itself. There is not one group of constitutions with an inherent force to evolve and another group that lacks this force. Rather, the change is a result of interpretation. ‘Living’ or ‘static’ are not qualities of constitutions but different ways of expounding constitutions. They characterize types of constitutional interpretation, not types of constitutions.

II. Identifying the Object

Typologies presuppose clarity about their object. So, what is a constitution? Or what is constitutionalism? There are, of course, many answers to this question as well. The complexity can, however, be reduced if one recognizes the fundamental difference between ancient and modern constitutionalism. This chapter will deal only with modern constitutions as they emerged in the late eighteenth century from the American and the French Revolutions, were subsequently adopted in other countries, and, after many struggles and backlashes, had gained almost universal recognition by the end of the twentieth century. Yet, the characteristics of modern constitutions appear more clearly if compared to what was understood by ‘constitution’ or is seen as having functioned as ‘constitution’ before those revolutions. Both levels have to be taken into account in order to mark the difference: the semantic level as well as the level of realities.

The term ‘constitution’, or its equivalent in other languages, existed long before modern constitutions emerged. But it designated a different object. Originally used to describe the state of the human body, it was soon applied to the body politic, yet not in a normative sense but as a description of the situation of a country as determined by a number of factors such as its geography, its climate, its population, its laws etc. In the eighteenth century, the meaning was often narrowed to the state of a country as determined by its basic legal structure. But still the notion ‘constitution’ was not identified with those laws. Rather, the term continued to describe the state of a country insofar as it was shaped by its basic laws. The basic laws themselves were not the ‘constitution’ of the country. ‘Constitution’ remained a descriptive, not a prescriptive, term.
If the term was used in a legal sense, it usually meant a certain type of laws, usually enacted by the Emperor, and often criminal codes, such as the Constitutio Criminalis Carolina of 1532 or the Constitutio Criminalis Theresiana of 1768, hence, laws that regulated individual, not governmental, behaviour. Certainly, laws the object of which was the exercise of public power did exist, even in the absolutist period; but they were not perceived as ‘constitution’. They were called ‘fundamental laws’, ‘governmental compact’, and the like. Some were relics of the medieval order in which the ruler had been submitted to a law that was believed to be of divine origin and therefore not at his disposition. Others had a contractual origin and emerged from negotiations between the monarch and influential groups in society, mostly the nobility.

It was characteristic of these laws that all of them presupposed the right of the ruler to rule. The fundamental laws only modified the right in this or that respect and, due to their contractual origins, only in favour of the privileged classes of society that were parties to the contract. They had neither constitutive force nor did they furnish a complete regulation of government. Only after the emergence of the modern constitution were they retroactively called a (p. 101) ‘constitution’, first by the defenders of the old order who wanted to demonstrate that the country not only had a constitution but had a better one than the artificial product of a revolution, later by historians who got into the habit of describing the old political order in terms of a ‘constitution’.

In England, which is often called the motherland of constitutionalism, things were slightly different. Also in England, ‘constitution’ initially meant a formal law enacted by the King. With the growing participation of Lords and Commons in legislation, it was replaced by the term ‘statute’. Cromwell’s written document that constituted a republican government after the revolutionary break with the House of Stuart, and is often regarded as the first modern constitution, was not called a ‘constitution’, but an ‘instrument of Government’. Laws that concerned the organization of public authority were called a ‘form of government’. But the term ‘constitution’ began to appear, mostly in the plural, as an equivalent to ‘leges fundamentales’ or ‘fundamental laws’.

After the Glorious Revolution in 1688, ‘constitution’ in the singular gained ground and meant the basic rules concerning the government. Yet, since the revolution restored the monarchy, albeit with a power shift towards Parliament, these rules did not gain constituent force. What was now called the ‘British Constitution’ shared with its continental equivalents the characteristic that it did not establish a new, but only modified an existing, public authority. A constituent power was, and to a large extent still is, absent in Britain. It was absorbed by the principle of parliamentary sovereignty. The rules forming the ‘British Constitution’, including the ‘rights of Englishmen’, were fundamental, but not supreme. The ‘constitution’ lacked supremacy.

What, then, was new about the modern constitution? Apparently neither the name nor the capacity to bind the ruler with the force of law. The connection between the birth of modern constitutionalism and the two revolutions offers a clue. These revolutions differed from the many upheavals and revolts against rulers in history, including the Glorious Revolution, in that the revolutionary forces did not content themselves with replacing an oppressive ruler with another one. Rather, they set out to establish a new political system that differed fundamentally from the one they had accused of being unjust. In order to achieve this, they devised a plan of legitimate rule and endowed it with legal force before rulers were called to power and authorized to rule according to the legal framework.

In order for this to work, the constitution had to be distinguished from ordinary law. As an act that constituted legitimate public power in the first place, the constitution could not emanate from the ruler himself. It needed a different source. In both countries, this source was found in the people who had decided to form a polity and to whom the constituent power was ascribed. The legitimating principle of the modern constitution was popular sovereignty instead of monarchial or parliamentarian sovereignty. But unlike the sovereign monarch or the sovereign parliament the people were incapable of ruling themselves. They needed representatives to govern in their name. Democratic government is government by mandate and as such stands in need of being organized.

In addition, the mandate was not conferred upon the representatives unconditionally. In contrast to the unlimited power of the British Parliament and the French King, the revolutionaries wanted to establish a limited government, limited in substance and limited in form. The first was a decision in favour of individual freedom that gained primacy over the raison d’état and found legal expression in catalogues of fundamental rights. The second followed from the conviction that freedom could best be secured if governmental power was not concentrated in one hand but distributed among various branches of government. The limits in scope and time as well as the separation of powers also required determination in the form of legal rules.

All this was by no means an original idea of the American and French revolutionaries. The idea that only the consent of the people could legitimate governmental power had older roots and gained widespread recognition when religion no longer served as the basis of the social order after the Reformation and gave rise to the construction of a social contract. The content of this contract varied over time and space. But more and more the conviction gained ground that the ruler’s task was the protection of individual freedom. From the mid-eighteenth century, the treaties of natural law filled with growing catalogues of fundamental rights which the state was obliged to respect and to protect.

Although these theories contained all the ingredients that later appeared in the constitutions, they were not pushed forwards to the postulate of a constitution by the philosophers. For them, they functioned as a test of the legitimacy of the political system. A political system was deemed legitimate if it could be considered as if established by a consensus of the governed. With the sole exception of Emer de Vattel, no author required a written document or a popular decision. The social contract served as a regulative idea. It was not considered to be the result of a real process of consensus building. Its authority was based on argumentation, not on enactment. No pre-revolutionary ruler had been willing to adopt it, and most rulers had explicitly rejected it. Natural law and positive law contradicted each other.

Only after the revolutionary break with traditional rule were these ideas able to become a blueprint for the establishment of the new order which filled the vacuum of legitimate public power that the successful revolutions had left behind. The ideas migrated from the world of intellectual discourse into the world of political action. Hence the important contribution of the American and French revolutionaries was to turn the ideas from philosophy into law. Only law had the capacity to detach the consensus as to the purpose and form of government from the historical moment and the actual participants and transfer it into a binding rule for the future, so that it no longer rested on the power of persuasion but on the power of a commitment.

There was, however, the problem that, after the collapse of the divinely inspired medieval legal order, all law had become the product of political will. Law was irreducibly positive law. Nothing else could be true for the law the function of which was to regulate the establishment and exercise of political power. This gave rise to the question how a law that emanated from the political process could at the same time bind this process. The problem was solved by tak (p. 103) ing up the old idea of a hierarchy of norms (divine and secular) and re-introducing it into positive law. This was done by a division of positive law into two different bodies: one that emanated from or was attributed to the people and bound the government, and one that emanated from government and bound the people. The first one regulated the production and application of the second. Law became reflexive.

This idea of a dualist democracy, as Bruce Ackerman calls it, presupposed, however, that the first body of law took primacy over the second. The revolutionary thinkers had a clear notion of this consequence of constitution-making. The Americans expressed it in terms of ‘paramount law’ and deployed the distinction between master and servant or principal and agent, while Sieyes conceptualized it in the dichotomy of pouvoir constituant and pouvoir constitué, the former setting the terms for the latter. Without this distinction and the ensuing distinction between constitutional law and ordinary law and the subordination of the latter to the former, constitutionalism would have been unable to fulfil its function.

This legal framework was now called ‘constitution’. Constitution thereby turned from a descriptive into a prescriptive notion. It differed from the older legal regulations of public authority in various respects. The most important one is that the constitution claims to establish legitimate government instead of only modifying the conditions for a pre-existing government that derives its legitimacy from sources other than the constitution. Moreover, it regulates the establishment and exercise of public power systematically and comprehensively. And it applies generally, not only in favour of some privileged groups. While every political entity had (or more precisely, was in) a constitution in the descriptive sense, a constitution in the prescriptive sense was a novelty that not every polity possessed.

Constitutionalism is therefore not identical with legalization of public power. Everyone who asserts that constitutionalism ‘means little more than the limited state’ misses the point. It is a special and particularly ambitious form of legalization. There are, however, many ways to realize the project. Although the new instrument of legitimation and limitation of government was justified in universal terms by its founders, it had to be applied to a situation where political power was organized in the form of sovereign states with different traditions, conditions, and ideals. Therefore, it was realized in each state in a particular way. Constitutionalism originated in the form of national constitutions. For this reason, it seems more appropriate to describe it in functional rather than substantive terms.

These functional characteristics can now be summarized:²⁴

(1) The constitution in the modern sense is a set of legal norms, not a philosophical construct. The norms emanate from a political decision rather than having their source in a pre-established truth.

(2) The purpose of these norms is to regulate the establishment and the exercise of public power as opposed to a mere modification of a pre-existing public power. Regulation implies limitation.

(3) The regulation is comprehensive in the sense that no pre- or extra-constitutional bearers of public power and no pre- or extra-constitutional means to exercise this power are recognized.

(4) Constitutional law is higher law. It enjoys primacy of all other laws and legal acts emanating from government. Acts incompatible with the constitution cannot claim legal validity.

(5) Constitutional law finds its origin with the people as the only legitimate source of power. The distinction between pouvoir constituant and pouvoir constitué is essential to the constitution.

If all these elements are present, we speak of the achievement of constitutionalism.²⁵ Constitutions with these characteristics rule out any absolute or arbitrary power of man over man. By submitting all government action to rules, a constitution makes the use of public power predictable and enables the governed to anticipate government behaviour vis-à-vis themselves and allows them to face government agents without fear. A constitution provides a consensual basis for persons and groups with different opinions and interests to resolve their disputes in a civilized manner and enables peaceful transition of power. Under favourable conditions the constitution can even contribute to the integration of society.

At the same time, it becomes clear that the achievement of constitutionalism rests on a number of preconditions, without which the constitution would not have emerged. The disappearance of these preconditions would not leave their functioning unaffected.²⁶ As a decision by a society on the purpose and form of its political unity, the constitution could not have emerged if questions of public order were not open to discussion. This facet was lacking wherever the public order was presumed to be given by God, for example in the Middle Ages. Under these circumstances, public authority had the duty to enforce the pre-established order, but had no right to change it or replace it by a different one.

Yet the medieval society did not have and could not have had a constitution for still another reason. It lacked an object capable of being regulated in the form of a constitution. No autonomous political sphere had yet developed and no public power specialized in governing a given territory existed. Only when, in an attempt to overcome the devastating religious wars and to pacify a rifted society, the princes started to concentrate the dispersed public powers in their hands, condensing them into a single, comprehensive public power and claiming the right to make law independent of the contested religious truth, did an object capable of being constitutionalized emerge. In continental Europe, this object was from the beginning in the sixteenth century perceived as the state, while in the Anglo-Saxon world it was long described as government and only in recent decades as the state.

(p. 105) Historically, the emergence of the modern state, or its equivalent, was a necessary condition of the modern constitution. It was, however, not a sufficient condition. In order to fulfill its historic mission of pacifying a society divided by religious wars, the state claimed absolute power over society. Absolutism is the opposite of constitutionalism. Only when the mission had been fulfilled did absolute rule lose its plausibility. The demand for limited government based on the consent of the governed appeared as a further pre-condition for constitutionalism. The revolution was needed as a breakthrough for this idea, not as a pre-condition for the constitutions which followed.

The corollary of the gradual emergence of the modern state was the successive privatization of civil society. Public and private, still indistinguishable in the medieval world, became distinct spheres. The constitution did not question the concentration of public power in the hands of the state. Rather, it was this concentration that created the need for constitutionalism. The constitution's aim was to tame public power in the interest of individual freedom. The distinction between public and private was therefore constitutive for constitutionalism. If public power were in private hands the constitution could not fulfill its function. Conversely, if the state enjoyed the same freedom as private individuals it could not reach its aim.
Types of Constitutions

Of equal importance is another borderline, that between outside and inside. As public power was organized in the form of states when the constitution emerged, the power of each state ended at its territorial borders. Beyond its borders there were other states with their public power. A constitution could fulfill its function only if the state held the monopoly of public power within its borders and was not submitted to any external power. Every submission to an external power would have meant a power that escaped the regulation of the constitution. The principle of territoriality was constitutive for the constitution.

III. The Constitution as Law

The term ‘achievement’ should not be misunderstood as an ideal type of constitutionalism that in the real world can only be reached by way of approximation. Constitutions that show all the characteristics of achievement did exist in history and do exist today. ‘Achievement’, however, also implies that there may be documents designated or understood as constitutions which lack some or most elements of a full-fledged constitutionalism. As a matter of fact, once invented the constitution could be instrumentalized for purposes other than the original ones, adopted only in part or even as a mere form. Nevertheless, achievement sets the standard for constitutionalism and just for this reason furnishes a basis for a typology.

1. The Legal Character of the Constitution

Written or unwritten—constitutions in the sense of achievement are enacted as law or even as ‘hard law’ as Van Alstyne insists, adding that ‘nearly everything else depends on [this]’. Enactment in the form of a law is nowadays the way in which new constitutions are set up everywhere, no matter who enacted them and which procedure preceded the enactment. Enactment (p. 106) as law usually means that the constitution takes the form of a written document. When unwritten constitutions are mentioned, it is mostly in connection with the British Constitution. As a matter of fact, this Constitution consists to a large extent of conventions for which no authoritative textual source exists and which date back to the era of pre-modern constitutionalism.

But Eric Barendt reminds us that part of what is regarded as the British Constitution consists of statutes, some old like the Bill of Rights of 1689, some more recent like the Human Rights Act of 1998. Barendt therefore introduces the distinction between written and codified. Most modern constitutions are indeed codified, that is, their norms are more or less coherently contained in a single document. But here again differences appear. Israel is often said to have no written constitution because the first Knesset, which was elected as a constituent assembly, did not discharge this task. Yet Israel has various Basic Laws that, according to a landmark decision of the Israeli Supreme Court, form the constitution of the country. But they leave open many questions that usually find an answer in a constitution. The constitution is fragmentary.

Yet, here again, the differences seem to be gradual rather than principal. Austria has a codified constitution, but this constitution is surrounded by a number of additional constitutional laws that formally have a separate existence. In many countries, not all the rules pertaining to the organization and exercise of public power are contained in the codification. Some remain outside. In France, the category of lois organiques exists. It describes laws that rank between the constitution and ordinary laws, regulate a constitutional matter, and are provided for in the constitution and enacted in a special procedure. Similar categories can be found in other countries (ley organica, legge constituzionale, leis complementares, etc).

However, sometimes the notion ‘lois organiques’ is used for ordinary laws the content of which is of constitutional importance. In this sense, the notion corresponds with the distinction between the constitution in a formal and in a substantive sense. The first one includes all norms that are part of the legal document called the ‘constitution’, regardless of whether they concern a matter of constitutional importance. The second includes norms which, although their object is constitutionally important, are not contained in the document called the ‘constitution’ but in a statute. In Germany, for instance, the election law is a constitutional law in the substantive, but not in the formal, sense.

These considerations show that the difference between written and unwritten constitutions should not be overestimated. For typological purposes the distinction between a modern legal (prescriptive) and a pre-modern non-legal (descriptive) constitution matters more. ‘Law’ and ‘unwritten’ are not mutually exclusive although the unwritten form of a ‘constitution’ is an indicator of a constitution in the older sense of the term, which could subsist along with the existence of laws that regulate government. Barendt himself admits this when he says that, under the British Constitution, it is difficult to determine whether government conduct is constitutional or not.34

Effective or ineffective—what seems much more important is that enactment in the form of a law does not guarantee legal effectivity. If today only a handful of the nearly 200 states in the (p. 107) world are still without a constitution we may conclude that the constitution is universally accepted as a pattern of legitimation and organization of public power, but not that all constitutions matter.35 Many remain on paper. They are often called symbolic constitutions.36 In some cases, constitutions may be intended as mere window-dressing from the very beginning. In other cases they are suspended soon after enactment. Many are routinely disregarded when their norms enter into conflict with political plans or measures.

Karl Loewenstein therefore deems a typology based on the legal impact as most important. He distinguishes between normative, nominal, and semantic constitutions.37 The decisive criterion is the degree to which the political reality conforms to the norms of the constitution. Normative constitutions are effective constitutions in the sense that the political process takes place within the constitutional framework and political actors usually comply with constitutional requirements. According to Loewenstein, a constitution in this sense depends on a socio-political environment where the value of constitutionalism has been internalized by both governors and governed.

In a nominal constitution, the constitutional norms find their limits in the given power structure, political as well as economical. The existing socio-economic conditions prevent the constitution from being applied faithfully, regardless of the interests of the power-holders. Insofar as a conflict between these structures and the norms appears, the norms will remain ineffective. According to Loewenstein, former colonies or feudal-agrarian societies are particularly prone to nominal constitutions. However, he concedes an educational function to constitutions of this type: they may aim at becoming normative constitutions.

Semantic constitutions are constitutions that are in line with the political reality, but only reflect this reality without imposing binding rules on it. Loewenstein tends to include all constitutions of dictatorial or totalitarian regimes in this category. Henkin portrays them as merely describing the existing system of government.38 The term ‘descriptive’ is here not meant in the sense used to characterize pre-modern constitutionalism. It refers to a document that has been enacted in the form of a law, but without the intent to bind political behaviour. Others characterize this type of constitutions as ‘instrumentalistic’ or ‘ritualistic’.39

2. Specialized in Regulating Public Power

Foundational or modifying—a constitution in the sense of ‘achievement’ is specialized in regulating the establishment and exercise of public power. ‘Establishment’ could be read as ‘organization’. Understood in this way, the criterion would have little capacity to distinguish between various types of constitutions. There are constitutions in the modern sense that confine themselves to determining the organizational structure of a state, naming its organs, laying down their powers, regulating the relation among them, and prescribing the procedure they have to follow in discharging their tasks. The constitution of the second German Empire of 1871 and Australia’s constitution are examples. But there is no constitution that refrains from regulating the organizational structure of the state.

‘Establishment’ as used here has a wider meaning. The constitution as an achievement is foundational. It constitutes a legitimate government rather than simply modifying a government that precedes the constitution and derives its legitimacy from elsewhere. Constitutions that follow a successful revolution are usually constitutive in this sense. But this does not mean that a revolutionary origin is a pre-condition of a full-fledged constitution. A new beginning, for instance after a lost war, can produce the same effect, as in Japan, Italy, and Germany after 1945. Radical shifts are also possible without a revolution, as in South Africa in 1994. The Swiss Constitution of 2000 owes its existence to the conviction that the constitution of 1874 no longer met the challenges of the twenty-first century.

Yet, although all constitutions regulate government, not all regulate its establishment. Still, a number of constitutions limit themselves to regulating the exercise of public power, not its creation. This was already the case shortly after modern constitutionalism emerged in the eighteenth century. As a matter of fact, once invented the modern constitution became immediately attractive outside the countries of origin. Constitutional movements emerged and requested constitutions without the ability to overthrow the existing political system and to establish a new one based on constitutional values. In that vein, a number of traditional rulers thought it wise to accommodate the popular wishes in order to prevent a revolutionary change.

Usually this meant the establishment of parliamentary representation based on elections by the people or its wealthy and educated classes. Often it also meant the introduction of a bill of rights. But it did not mean that the legitimisation of public authority shifted from parliamentary sovereignty as in North America or from monarchical sovereignty as in France to popular sovereignty and thus to a system where the monarch no longer ruled by God's grace but by the people's grace. Hence, these constitutions, unilaterally granted by the ruler as they usually were, lacked the constitutive force of the prototypes. They merely modified the existing government, albeit in constitutional forms.

It was even possible that the rulers were not prepared to accept binding rules at all, but nevertheless found it advisable at least to purport that they ruled in accordance with a constitution. These constitutions can be understood as expressions of pseudo-constitutionalism. The history of the nineteenth century can be described as a struggle for constitutionalism in the sense of the achievement. It could well happen that a constitution that fell short of achievement developed into a full-fledged constitution over time, in the same way that full-fledged constitutions regressed to weaker forms of constitutionalism.

Formal and substantive—regulation always implies a certain degree of limitation. Unlimited government is the opposite of constitutionalism. Forms and degrees can vary. There are constitutions that confine themselves to formal and procedural limitations and constitutions that contain substantive limitations as well. The American Founding Fathers believed in the beginning that organizational and procedural rules would suffice to limit government and protect the citizens efficiently. The French revolutionaries found substantive limits so important that they enacted the Declaration of Rights even before the constitution was drafted. The US Bill of Rights was added to the Constitution four years later.

Both countries of origin were convinced that only a limitation in the form of separation of powers is compatible with the idea of a constitution. Article 16 of the French Declaration reads: ‘Toute société dans laquelle la garantie des droits n’est pas assurée, ni la séparation des pouvoirs déterminée, n’a point de constitution.’ As a matter of fact, the idea of limited government tends towards some separation. A total lack of separation is an indicator of deficient constitutionalism. But one can imagine rather weak borderlines between the various powers as compensated for by strictly competent and substantive limitations.

3. Comprehensive Regulation

This element has nothing to do with the question of how short or how detailed the establishment and exercise of public power is regulated. Likewise, it is not about gaps in a constitution. Sometimes gaps are the price that has to be paid for a constitution to be ratified. The requirement rather concerns the degree to which public power is submitted to law. We can speak of a full-fledged constitution only if all public authority is derived from the constitution and has to be exercised within the framework of the constitution. But the framework may leave ample room for politics. It only excludes extra-constitutional power-holders and unconstitutional ways and means of exercising the power.

This is by no means always guaranteed. All political systems where the right to rule precedes the constitution and is only modified by it cannot be comprehensive in this sense. Wherever a constitutional regulation is missing it will be the ruler who, by virtue of his pre-constitutional legitimation, is competent to act according to will. Constitutions of this type can be called semi-constitutionalism. They were and are frequent in number. All German constitutions of the nineteenth century were semi-constitutions in this sense. Not gained after a revolutionary break with traditional rule, they did not touch the pre-existing right of the ruler to rule. Rather, the traditional rulers agreed to limit their hitherto absolute power voluntarily by a constitution.

4. Supremacy
Types of Constitutions

Higher or ordinary law—the constitution can fulfil its promise only if it enjoys supremacy. This means that all acts of public authority have to conform to the provisions of the constitution. Although the importance of supremacy was fully understood in constitutional theory from the beginning, constitutional practice hesitated long before following. Such practice did not deprive the constitution of its quality as law. If a constitution completely lacks legal effect, the question of its supremacy does not arise. Supremacy presupposes the legal validity of the constitution. The question is not whether it is law, but whether it is higher law. If not, the functioning of the constitution will be severely hampered. Recognition or negation of the higher law quality of the constitution is therefore a typological difference of highest importance.

As to the extent of the loss, various degrees are possible. Lacking supremacy of constitutional law will usually not affect the organizational structure of government. The organs of the (p. 110) state are likely to exist in the form prescribed by the constitution. However, constitutions not only claim to regulate the organization, but also the exercise of public authority. It is this exercise that can legally evade the control of the constitution if constitutional law is not supreme. Here, again, different degrees are possible. In the past, most European constitutions were understood in a way that the bills of rights did not bind the legislature. This meant that their impact was reduced to a prohibition of infringements by the executive without a basis in law. The law itself was not submitted to fundamental rights.

In reaction to this weakness of fundamental rights in the nineteenth and even the twentieth century, a number of younger constitutions explicitly declared fundamental rights to be directly applicable law and to bind all branches of government, explicitly so in Article 1(3) of the German Basic Law. Canada in its Charter of Rights and Freedoms of 1982 does not mention the judiciary among the powers bound by fundamental rights and thus causes difficulties when it comes to applying the Charter in private law litigation. A far-reaching provision is contained in the South African Constitution, according to section 8 of which the Bill of Rights ‘applies to all law, and binds the legislature, the executive, the judiciary and all organs of state’. Under certain conditions, fundamental rights even bind natural and juristic persons.

In the Weimar Republic, the rule that the constitution could be amended by way of a two-thirds majority in favour of such legislative amendment, was interpreted such that every ordinary law passed with a two-thirds majority could set aside the constitution. A prior amendment was not regarded as necessary. Hence, the higher law quality was acknowledged, but the threshold could easily be transgressed. After the Second World War the Basic Law explicitly excluded this possibility in Article 79(1). Setting aside the constitution was even easier in states where the constitution ranked on the same level with ordinary law. In this case the rule applies that the more recent law supersedes the older law.

This attitude towards the higher law element of constitutions was facilitated by the formalist understanding that became dominant in the course of the nineteenth century in Europe and continues to prevail in a number of countries today. From a formalistic perspective, the special quality of constitutional law as opposed to ordinary law lies not in its function or importance, but exclusively in the requirement of a super-majority for amendments. It was Carl Schmitt who tried to rectify this position. For him, the special quality of the constitution is not a consequence of the increased quorum for amendments. On the contrary, amendments are made more difficult because of the special quality of constitutional law. It is the fundamental decision of a people as to the nature and form of its unity on which all further decisions are based, the law of the laws.

Rigid or flexible—as these observations show, there is a relation between the rank of constitutional law and the rules for constitutional amendment. If a constitution allows for amendments by way of ordinary legislation, that is, without requiring a super-majority, its quality as higher law is seriously hampered. The sense in requiring a super-majority is, inter alia, to furnish a consensus basis for political adversaries and a framework in which the political competition can take an orderly and peaceful route. If a simple majority can change this framework, the function of the constitution is put at risk. It becomes a tool in the hands of the majority and ceases effectively to protect the minority or the opposition.

(p. 111) This is less so when a super-majority is required for a constitutional amendment. However, if the constitution endows parliament with an amendment power it is relatively easy for the main political actors to shape the constitution according to their needs. This is why many constitutions remove the amendment power from actors in the routine political business and entrust it to other organs, or require a referendum or prescribe a procedure other than the procedure for ordinary lawmaking. The frequency of amendments depends to a large extent on the difficulty of the procedure.\textsuperscript{44} The frequency of amendments depends to a large extent on the difficulty of the procedure.\textsuperscript{45}
Types of Constitutions

Some constitutions completely exclude certain provisions from abolition by way of amendment. The US Constitution exempts in Article V the equal suffrage of every state in the Senate from amendment without the consent of the affected state. In Italy and France, the republican form of the state is not subject to amendment. A far-reaching clause is contained in the German Basic Law. It is the post-war reaction to the experience that the democratic principle of the Weimar Constitution was abolished by democratic means after Hitler had taken power in 1933. Article 79(3) declares the principle of democracy, the rule of law, the principle of the social state, and the federal structure as well as the guarantee of human dignity as unalterable by amendment.

The same solution was introduced in India by a landmark decision of the Supreme Court without a textual basis in the constitution.\textsuperscript{46} Behind this ruling one can discover Carl Schmitt's distinction between constitution and constitutional law.\textsuperscript{47} According to Schmitt, the constitution is the decision of the constituent power, usually the people, about the nature and form of its polity. In Schmitt's view, this decision precedes the drafting of constitutional law and does not require or even allow a formal act. Constitutional law, in turn, concretizes the fundamental decision and may add to it provisions of a less fundamental character, even provisions of a non-constitutional character. As a consequence only constitutional law is open to amendment whereas the constitution can only be altered by the holder of the constituent power himself.

The rules on constitutional amendments vary greatly. Typologically one usually distinguishes rigid and flexible constitutions. Between these two poles many solutions are possible. The best-known example of a rigid constitution in this sense is the US Constitution (Art V). As a consequence formal amendments have been extremely rare in the United States.\textsuperscript{48} On the other hand, the Japanese Constitution has never been amended although it is not rigid. Even more rigid than the US Constitution was the first French Constitution of 1791. A proposed amendment had to be voted on by three consecutive parliaments and affirmed by the fourth, which for that purpose was augmented by additional members. Since a parliamentary term was two years, an amendment could enter into force only seven years after the initiative (Title VII).

This inflexibility caused the early death of the constitution. Later constitutions made amendments easier; but the idea that the parliamentary assembly, which desires and votes for a constitutional amendment, should not have the final say, still characterizes a number of cur (p. 112) rent constitutions. Often the consent of the next parliament is necessary so that an election lies between the preliminary and the final vote. This gives the sovereign an opportunity to express its will (eg Belgium, Denmark, the Netherlands). A number of countries allow constitutional amendments only by way of referendum (eg Ireland).

\textit{With or without judicial review}—in spite of its higher rank, constitutional law is more vulnerable than ordinary law. While ordinary law emanates from the government and binds the people, constitutional law is attributed to the people and binds government. This fact entails a fundamental difference between the two types of law when it comes to enforcement. Law enforcement is one of the major tasks of government. If private persons violate the law the government has the duty as well as the coercive means to enforce the law. Since constitutional law binds the government, the addressee of the rules and the enforcer are here identical. This is one of the explanations for the rather small impact of constitutional law in the past and still today in many countries.

Many of the constitutions in the nineteenth century tried to solve the problem of non-compliance with the constitution by means of criminal law. Members of the government, but not the monarch, could be tried in court for an intentional violation of the constitution. In most countries special courts rather than the usual judiciary were competent to decide in cases of indictment of ministers. Since the procedural hurdles were usually very high and penal law principles required criminal intent, the number of cases in which members of government were eventually convicted remained small. Today criminal law is usually regarded as an inadequate means to solve this problem.

Only in the United States was constitutional law enforceable from the very beginning. But since the question whether the judiciary could declare acts of the legislature unconstitutional and therefore null and void had not been explicitly answered in the text of the constitution; it needed the landmark decision of the Supreme Court in \textit{Marbury v Madison}, decided in 1803, and the acceptance of this decision in the United States to establish judicial review. This became a characteristic feature of American constitutionalism, although significant enforcement of fundamental rights only began in the twentieth century and the so-called counter-majoritarian difficulty still remains a concern in the political and legal discourse in the United States today. Still, the American solution remained singular for a very long time. Meanwhile, the judiciary in almost all common law countries and some civil law countries (eg Brazil, Japan, the Nordic countries) has the power to review laws, although some courts, such as the Japanese Supreme Court, make little use of it. But there were and still are other countries that explicitly prohibit judicial review, as with all French constitutions before the present constitution of 1958. At present, courts are prevented from reviewing the constitutionality of laws in the Netherlands and of federal laws (not cantonal laws) in Switzerland. In the United Kingdom the Civil Rights Act of 1998 allowed for judicial review but decisions are not binding on parliament. Likewise, Canada’s Charter contains an override clause (section 33).

A new and very influential element in judicial review came with the Austrian Constitution of 1920. It established a specialized constitutional court with the exclusive power to review laws as to their constitutionality. A similar regime was adopted in Czechoslovakia. After the Second World War, this model entered the new constitutions of Italy and Germany—two of the defeated parties in the war (while the third, Japan, under strong American influence adopted the US model)—and countries with a dictatorial past which were determined to (p. 113) prevent a repetition of the experience. In this context the idea of an independent guardian of the constitution played an important role.

Although first established in Austria (after an unsuccessful attempt in Germany during the revolution of 1848) judicial review by a specialized constitutional court is now widely known as the ‘German Model’. The reason may be that the powers of the German court were far more numerous than those of the Austrian or the Italian court. In addition, the German court established itself as a very powerful court by developing a jurisprudence that gave high relevance to constitutional law, secured the court a strong backing in society, which, in turn, guaranteed an unusually high degree of compliance by the political branches of government.

The last quarter of the twentieth century brought a breakthrough for constitutional adjudication. It was no longer an exception but the rule. The movement is so strong that the Israeli Supreme Court felt entitled to interpret the Basic Law: Human Dignity and Liberty of 1992 as having opened the door to judicial review although the text did not explicitly say so. It argued that, today, adopting fundamental rights means adopting judicial review as well. ‘The Twentieth century is the century of judicial review. Although it is not generally true that constitutional adjudication is a necessary consequence of constitutionalism, as Hans Kelsen believed, or that constitutions whose rules cannot be invoked in court are not law, as Van Alstyne asserts, history and contemporary experience show that in countries without a deeply rooted rule of law tradition constitutionalism is of little value in the absence of a special enforcement mechanism. Especially when it comes to enforcing the primacy of constitutional law vis-à-vis politics, institutions matter. This does not mean that every newly established constitutional court is as influential as the German court. Just as there are weak constitutions, there are weak constitutional courts. Political attempts to discipline constitutional courts are numerous. Yet, for typological purposes, the difference between constitutions with and without constitutional adjudication has become one of particular importance.

Inclusive or exclusive—without supremacy constitutional law has little relevance. But there is also an opposite danger. Constitutions can go too far in entrenching rules and thereby undermine the difference between constitutional and ordinary law from the opposite end of the spectrum. Everything that has been regulated in the constitution is no longer subject to (p. 114) political decision. Yet, the task of the constitution is not to make politics superfluous but to regulate the political process procedurally as well as substantively. It must leave room for political decisions and political change. The more detailed a constitution, the more difficult political change will be and the less elections will matter.

This explains the typological difference between exclusive and inclusive constitutions. Certainly, every constitution is to a certain extent exclusive. The democratic constitution excludes a system without participation of the people. A constitution with fundamental rights excludes a totalitarian system. ‘Anything goes’ is no constitutional maxim. Some constitutions even exclude certain options absolutely. They are not open to constitutional amendment. But this must be distinguished from constitutions that entrench the ideology or the programme of one political competitor so that all other competitors have no chance to realize their programme even after winning an election.
A certain inclusiveness as to ideologies and interests, political parties and their various programmes is therefore a pre-condition of a functioning constitution. If, on the contrary, the constituent power is used in order to entrench the political programme of the majority and thus exclude the programmes of competing political forces, an important benefit of constitutionalism, namely the possibility of peaceful change, is put at risk. The excluded parties are forced to use revolutionary means to realize their plans or to write a completely new constitution after coming to power. This is not only a theoretical danger, but an often occurring experience, and not only in countries with a one-party system.

5. Legitimating Principle

Truth or consensus—whether and to what extent a constitution is normative, nominal, or semantic in Loewenstein's terminology and whether it is comprehensive or allows extra-constitutional powers and extra-constitutional acts of public authority depends to a large extent on the principle on which the legitimacy of a political system is based. The decisive line runs between systems based on a supra-individual absolute truth, on the one hand, and systems that give primacy to individual autonomy, regard pluralism as legitimate, and base their legitimacy on consensus, on the other.

The absolute truth can be a religious truth, a value that is believed to be God-given. It can also be a secular truth, a vision of the perfect society, the final goal of all historical development. Whatever this absolute truth is, it always entails subordination of the constitution to the truth. The truth precedes the constitution and prevents it from being a comprehensive regulation of public power. The person or group of persons who embody or represent the truth, be it a priest or a group of clerics, be it a monarch or an avant-garde or a single political party that claims superior insight in the common best, remains above the constitution.

The legal impact of a constitution is limited by the absolute truth and the pre-constitutional right of the rulers who regard themselves as the embodiment or the guardian of the truth. Their mission is the enforcement of the truth. Any constitutional limitation in fulfilling this mission would be regarded as a betrayal of the truth. Law, constitutional law included, is reduced to an instrumental role. It regulates, limits, and guides the behaviour of the individuals and the inferior agents of the political system, not its leadership.

If political systems based on an absolute truth adopt constitutions, which most of them do, be it for pragmatic or for opportunistic reasons, they usually lack those institutions that a full-fledged constitution contains in order to limit governmental power. They do not recognize the separation of powers. If the constitution provides for a division among various branches of government, the division is levelled by a uniform party that appears behind the facade of every branch and dodges the dividing lines. The same is true for the rule of law. It may serve as an instrument in the hands of the leaders, but they are not willing to submit themselves to law.

If constitutions of such political systems contain a bill of rights, as they also often do, it has a meaning that differs from the meaning fundamental rights have in full-fledged constitutions. The rights do not establish a sphere where, in principle, individual will prevails over governmental interests and limitations of the rights require a specific justification. Freedom of this kind would always imply the possibility of evading the requirements of the truth, to place individual above collective interests. Vis-à-vis the truth, freedom of speech, to use this example, would mean a right to express and propagate falsehood and cannot therefore be tolerated.

This shows at the same time why democracy or popular sovereignty is a necessary element of the achievement of constitutionalism, not just one way among others to establish constitutional rule. While the choice between a federal and a unitary system or between a one-cameral or a bi-cameral parliamentarianism can be made without the achievement of constitutionalism being affected, a legitimating principle other than democracy endangers the achievement. The legitimating principle, whatever it may be, will prevail over the constitutional guarantees and thus devaluate constitutionalism as such.

Reason or will—this distinction should not, however, be confused with the distinction between reason and will, justice, and legitimacy that is made by Paul Kahn and may sound similar at first glance. The distinction between truth and consensus marks a difference between democratic and non-democratic constitutions, while Kahn's distinction is a distinction within democratic constitutionalism. Both elements are present in full-fledged democratic constitutions. They do not exclude each other, but they are in tension. For Kahn, 'the fundamental problem of constitutionalism is to negotiate the relationship between reason and will.60
Types of Constitutions

Depending on how this tension is resolved in a particular constitution, the constitutional order favours democracy over rights or vice versa.61 This has a number of consequences. One of them is the different attitude towards universalistic claims. Another one is the role-perception of courts with constitutional jurisdiction. When a constitutional court speaks: ‘Does it speak in the voice of the popular sovereign or in the voice of reason?’62 In this distinction, Kahn finds an explanation for the differences between US and European constitutionalism. The US Supreme Court, according to Kahn, is primarily concerned with legitimacy, not justice, while the courts in Europe expand along the dimension of reason.

IV. Constitutions as Expressions of Political Ideas

Although inspired by theories of natural law, the modern constitution is positive law. It is the part of the law that regulates political decision-making. But this cannot save it from being a product of political will itself. As such, it is open to changing content. The content, in turn, is contingent on different conditions and different ideas of a just order. Competing ideas of justice may lead to different constitutions in different states or in one and the same state over time.63 Social change may produce new challenges for constitutional law that provoke the enactment of new constitutions or the adaptation of old ones. In view of the fact that constitutionalism is now in its third century and has gained almost universal recognition it would be surprising if this had not led to different types of constitutions, according to the various principles to which they give legal expression. Since different principles can be combined or overlapping there is, however, little hope for clear-cut notions. The boundaries between the various types are fluid.

1. Liberal-Democratic Constitutions

Once again I start with the prototypes of modern constitutionalism. They can be characterized as liberal-democratic or democratic and rule of law-oriented (rechtsstaatlich). Both components had their roots in the theory of the social contract.64 The idea of a social contract came to the fore when the transcendental legitimation of political power had been undermined by the Reformation of the sixteenth century. Yet, it did not come as a political postulate, but as an intellectual experiment. In search for a principle that could replace divine revelation as the legitimating ground for rulership, the contemporary philosophers placed themselves in a fictitious state of nature. In this state everyone was by definition equally free. The question, then, was what might cause reasonable people to leave this state and submit themselves to a government entitled to exercise power over them.

The answer was the fundamental insecurity of equal liberty in the absence of government. Entering into a state of rulership thus became a dictate of reason. Given everyone’s equal freedom in the state of nature, this step presupposed a mutual agreement to form a government. Whatever the precise content of this agreement, the consent of the governed became the precondition of legitimate rule. The origin of government could be but democratic. The idea of an original contract raised the question under which conditions free individuals would be willing to form a government, or more precisely: which abandonment of natural freedom was deemed necessary in order to gain the security that was missing in the state of nature.

The answer to this question depended largely on the perception of a state without rule, and this perception was, in turn, influenced by the historical circumstances under which and for which the theory of the social contract was developed. In the period of the civil wars following the religious schism it might seem reasonable to exchange all natural liberties for the security of life, limb, and property that only an omnipotent ruler could guarantee. The monopoly of legitimated use of force was conceived and placed into the hands of a monarch who had the right to use it without limitation.

In this Hobbesian version only the original act of founding a body politic and establishing government was democratic. In a deeply rifted society with fundamental disagreement over absolute truths, the political system so established was not. The government had to be independent of societal consent and could not recognize any natural liberties without endangering its mission to re-establish internal peace. In its original version, the theory of a social contract justified the absolute state. A political system based on this theory was neither democratic nor liberal or rechtsstaatlich.
pluralism, the constitution would cease to belong to the liberal-democratic type. Of similar opinions and interest is also accepted as legitimate. If one group were successful in suppressing pluralism, pluralism of individual opinions and interests is accepted as legitimate, and the organized representation of the driving forces within government. Consequently, liberal-democratic constitutions are always constitutions of interest groups which try to influence government behaviour from outside, while political parties are the driving forces within government. Consequently, liberal-democratic constitutions are always constitutions of individual that entitled him to self-determination, and the Smithian and physiocratic ideas that individual freedom and, as its consequence, an economy based on market mechanisms were a better guarantee of justice and welfare than feudal, corporate, and mercantile structures.

In this form, the theory became a guideline for revolutionary action in North America and France. While in philosophy the social contract had been as fictitious as the state of nature, it now took the shape of a constitution understood no longer as a description of reality, but as distancing itself from reality and, instead, making normative demands on reality. Democracy was the legitimating principle of the state. The people not only held the constituent power. Democracy was also the principle for the organization of government. Those who governed received their mandate through the democratic act of popular election. The majority had the right to rule; but remained accountable to the electorate for the exercise of power.

The system was liberal insofar as majority rule did not apply absolutely. Rather, the natural rights were transformed into legal limitations of governmental power. Government did not lose the monopoly of legitimate force, but the purposes for which its power might be used were reduced to the protection of individual freedom and societal self-regulation in the form of market mechanisms and an analogy to market mechanisms in the political sphere where freedom of opinion and speech established a ‘market place of ideas’ and different opinions and different interests could compete on the best way to pursue the common weal. Furthermore, the ruler was bound to rule by law and according to law.

The consequence was a transformation of the social order from duties to rights, or, as it has been famously described by Maine: from status to contract, as well as a clear distinction between the spheres of state and society. The state no longer derived its legitimacy from the task of maintaining and enforcing a pre-established common weal against which no one could claim freedom. Rather, the state enjoyed freedom in fulfilling its task, while society was subject to bonds. Now the distribution of freedom and bonds changed. Free were the individuals and the limits of their freedom could be justified only in order to protect the freedom of others. Bound was the state in order to prevent it from pursuing goals other than protecting individual freedom and societal self-regulation.

Yet, the system was also liberal in the sense that it favoured the propertied classes: indirectly, insofar as it placed special emphasis on the protection of property (‘un droit inviolable et sacré’, as Article 17 of the French Declaration put it) and its corollary, freedom of contract; and directly, insofar as only proprietors enjoyed the right to vote and could thus promote their interests through legislation. Being a pre-industrial concept, liberalism in this understanding was based on the assumption that, in a system where all feudal bonds had been dissolved and all were equally free, everyone had the chance to acquire property and become a voter.

The institutional arrangement corresponded with the leading ideas. A key role was given to the law and together with it to the rule of law. Limitations of individual liberties required a basis in law. Laws were made by the representation of the citizens. The executive was bound by the law. An independent judiciary had the power to control whether the executive complied with the law. The separation of powers that corresponded to these functions diminished the risk of abuses of public power. The rule of law guaranteed that the democratically formed public will prevailed in executive action and at the same time that the liberal limitations of government were respected so that altogether ‘a government of laws and not of men’ was established.

Although not foreseen by the framers of the early constitutions, the liberal-democratic type of constitutions sooner or later led to the emergence of political parties which competed with and fought against each other. It also led to the creation of interest groups which try to influence government behaviour from outside, while political parties are the driving forces within government. Consequently, liberal-democratic constitutions are always constitutions of pluralism. Pluralism of individual opinions and interests is accepted as legitimate, and the organized representation of similar opinions and interest is also accepted as legitimate. If one group were successful in suppressing pluralism, the constitution would cease to belong to the liberal-democratic type.
The internal differentiation between constitutions of this type depends on how the tension between the democratic and the liberal or rule of law component is dissolved. Systems without judicial review develop a tendency towards the democratic pole of the scale. If fundamental rights cannot be enforced, the will of the democratically elected branches of government prevails. The reverse conclusion that systems with judicial review tend towards the liberal pole would not be correct. Judicial review can be exercised with this or that tendency. Here Kahn's differentiation between reason and will takes effect. It is a differentiation between liberty and democracy.

The distinction is also helpful to explain certain difference between the United States and Europe. While the United States leans more towards the democratic pole of the scale, the European states have developed an inclination towards the liberal or rule of law pole. Certainly, there are European states such as the Netherlands whose constitution bars courts from checking the constitutionality of laws. But this prohibition has been undermined by the power of courts to review domestic laws as to their compatibility with the European Convention on Human Rights. These tendencies are, of course, to a large extent a matter of constitutional interpretation and of judicial activism or deference, but not only. They have roots in the constitutions themselves. Countries with the experience that democracy can fail are prepared to grant the judiciary more power than countries with an uninterrupted democratic record.

Moreover, the function of fundamental rights varied according to the circumstances. While the American colonists lived under English law, which was generally regarded as the most liberal law of the time, France had preserved the feudal system and exercised rigid control over the economy. These differences could not remain without impact on the revolutions in the two countries and consequently on the constitutions that emerged from the revolutions. The revolutionary goal of the American colonists was external and political in nature. They fought for self-government after being treated unequally by the motherland, whereas the goal of the French revolutionaries was internal and social in nature. They wanted to liberalize the social and economic order, which, after many failed attempts to achieve this by reforms, presupposed a break with the political system.

This contextual difference found expression in the function of fundamental rights. Vis-à-vis an already liberal legal order, the US Bill of Rights could content itself with guaranteeing individual freedom against intrusion by the government including the legislature. This was the difference from England. Fundamental rights functioned as negative rights. In France, the Declaration was adopted in opposition to the existing legal order. This order had to be liberalized, and fundamental rights functioned as tasks and guidelines for the legislature in the complicated and long-lasting process of law reform. Before being able to function as negative rights they were positive rights. They had a programmatic function.

While the adoption of the US Constitution brought the revolutionary process to an end, the adoption of the French Constitution of 1791 set a revolutionary process in motion. It soon turned out that the constitution was not able to control this process. Rather, it became a victim of the process. With the expectations that the revolution had roused, every new wave of revolutionary activity carried the existing constitution away and replaced it by a new one. It was only Napoleon's rise to power that brought this process to a halt, albeit at the expense of the constitution. The various Napoleonic constitutions preserved the form of constitutional rule, but were not intended to limit the power of the ruler.

However, even when the monarchy was re-established in 1804 Napoleon did not touch upon the civil achievements of the revolution. An aristocracy was created, but the feudal order was not re-introduced. On the contrary, Napoleon consolidated the liberal order, and the most important instrument was the Civil Code which, other than the Constitution, remains in place today. A liberal private law regime coexisted with an authoritarian public law regime. Individual liberty was confined to the private sphere and found its field of activity in the economy while political liberties and participatory rights were curtailed. With the Napoleonic constitutions France departed from the liberal-democratic path.

2. Liberal Non-Democratic Constitutions

The rest of Europe became acquainted with constitutionalism through the Napoleonic conquests. Constitutions used to follow the French army. They served as an instrument to win over the population of the conquered territories where the desire for constitutions was greater than the power to gain them by one's own force. The constitutions enacted or demanded by Napoleon promised liberalizing reforms, economic freedom, elected representations of the people, and equal rights vis-à-vis the state. Although they marked progress compared to the traditional order, they did not live up to the standard set by the American and French Revolutions.

The possibility of semi-constitutions also guaranteed the survival of constitutionalism after the French hegemony in Europe had come to an end. The Napoleonic constitutions had convinced many European monarchs that it was possible to adopt a constitution without adhering to the full programme of constitutionalism. As a consequence, many constitutions came into being that did not affect the princes’ right to rule but required only some limitations on their hitherto absolute power. The loss of power was reconciled with the principle of monarchical sovereignty by a distinction between possession and exercise of public power that appeared for the first time in the restorative French Constitution of 1814. According to this Constitution, the monarch remained the exclusive holder of public power whereas on the level of its exercise he limited himself to the consent of parliament in certain matters.

The typological characteristic of these constitutions is the separation of the democratic and the liberal or rule of law component. Since the pre-democratic legitimation of the ruler remained uncontested, the constitutions were not enacted by a vote, popular or parliamentary, but by a decision of the ruler, who ‘granted’ them to his people as the documents usually read. In a number of cases the text of the constitution was negotiated by the ruler and a representation of the people. But never were the people regarded as the origin or ultimate source of political power. On the other hand, although having freely decided to grant a constitution, the monarch was not entitled to repeal it unilaterally. Where this happened it was regarded as a breach of the constitution.

The constitutions were liberal insofar as they abolished the feudal system and the regulation of the economy or at least charged the state with the task of gradually altering the system. The recognition of fundamental rights was also liberal, albeit due to the origin of these constitutions not as human rights but as citizens’ rights and, due to the non-democratic character of the constitution, sparing with political rights. Liberty was confined to the private sphere. The impact of these rights depended largely on the question whether they were endowed with derogatory effect vis-à-vis pre-constitutional law that was incompatible with the bill of rights. Most of them lacked this effect. Where they had derogatory effect the enforcement was weak as judicial review was usually regarded as incompatible with the monarchical principle.

The establishment of representations of the people was eventually liberal, usually based on census suffrage. In many cases, an unelected Upper House existed, designed to give the privileged classes of society additional political weight and to check the powers of the Lower House. Parliament always had a share in legislation and mostly the right to approve the budget, but rarely an influence on the formation of the cabinet. However, the executive was bound by the rule of law. The administration had to respect and enforce the statutes, and eventually the judiciary acquired the power to review the legality of administrative acts.

This type of constitution became the norm in Europe after 1815. The only democratic constitution that survived after that year was that of Norway. The leading constitution during the first, largely restorative, period was the French Charte Constitutionnelle of 1814. The greatest influence after 1830 is usually attributed to the Belgian Constitution of that year. This is true with regard to the formulation of the bill of rights and the organizational structure of the state. It is not true, however, with regard to the legitimating principle. The Belgian Constitution, the product of a successful revolution, was based on popular sovereignty for which most other European states were not yet prepared. The French Constitution of 1830, itself a product of a revolution, left the question open.

With reference to the discussion of a European Constitution, it has been suggested that there are two equally legitimate types of constitution, the democracy-oriented type and the rule of law-oriented type. While it is true that these have coexisted in history, and to a certain extent still coexist today, it is, however, not the case that they are equally legitimate. While the democracy-oriented type included the rule of law, the rule of law-oriented type excluded democracy. Because of this difference, the liberal constitution was commonly regarded as a deficient type of constitutionalism. The achievement of constitutionalism rests on a combination of both. Democracy alone cannot even secure that part of individual freedom on which democracy depends. Liberalism alone cannot guarantee that all citizens get a fair chance to articulate their opinions and interests in the political process.

Much of the constitutional struggle in the nineteenth century and later was about full-fledged constitutions that recognized both components. Attempts to create them were undertaken almost everywhere in Europe in the revolutionary year of 1848. Democratic movements already went along with social demands of the so-called Fourth Estate, the class of manufacturing and industrial workers and peasants. The revolution failed in almost all countries, to a large extent because of the different revolutionary goals of the bourgeoisie and the working classes. However, a number of still absolutist monarchies were now turned into constitutional states. Yet far from being based on popular sovereignty, the constitutions were not constitutive in nature, but simply modified the pre-existing rule.

In this form, constitutionalism arrived in East Asia. Constitutions had been unheard of in this part of the world until the middle of the nineteenth century. But with the opening to the West in the 1860s, constitutionalism became a subject of interest. Japan adopted its first constitution in 1889. The Prussian Constitution of 1850 served as model,74a As with the Korean Constitution of 1899, it was based on the principle of monarchical sovereignty. The motivation for both constitutions can be found more in foreign policy considerations than in internal needs. As a consequence, different from the European model, the liberal elements of these constitutions remained largely on paper.

Where a constitution was still absent, the political system could not be called democratic. But this is not equally true for liberalism. The democratic and the liberal component have a different relationship with constitutionalism. It is difficult to conceive of democracy without a constitution. The reason is that in a democracy ‘the people’ is regarded as the sovereign, but cannot govern itself. This is true for both representative and plebiscitarian democracy. Even in a plebiscitarian democracy, the people have the decision-making power only in certain but not all matters. Because of the inevitable difference between those who govern and those who are governed, democracy is in need of being organized. This is what constitutions do.

The liberal component is less dependent on a constitution. The government can respect individual freedom and obey the rule of law without being constitutionally obliged to do so. The United Kingdom before the Civil Rights Act is an example. In Germany the rule of law had already emerged in the period of enlightened absolutism in the second half of the eighteenth century, independently of the American and French Revolutions. In the nineteenth century, the modernization of societies in the spirit of liberalism was not necessarily combined with constitutionalism. It could rely on the state's interest in a strong national economy. As the Napoleonic experience shows the liberalization of social and economic life could develop within an illiberal political environment. To a certain extent, private law can substitute for constitutional law.75

The difference between constitutional and non-constitutional liberalism lies not necessarily in the content of the law, but in the degree of the entrenchment. Self-limitations can be reversed at any time. Laws can be repealed or amended. It is the constitution, provided that it enjoys supremacy, that furnishes the degree of durability and certainty that is desirable for such fundamental elements as freedom, equality, rule of law etc. Entrenchment functions as a barrier against attempts to abolish or reduce these guarantees. The full benefits of liberal democracy can only be obtained through a constitution.

3. Non-Liberal Democratic Constitutions

Just as it is possible that a constitution is liberal without being democratic, it is likewise conceivable that a constitution is democratic without being liberal. This seems possible in two quite different forms. One form is radical democracy. Here only the majority principle counts, and the constitution is confined to rules that regulate the decision-making process. Fundamental rights are regarded as anti-democratic because they stand in the way of majority decisions and by the same token constitutional review comes under the verdict of being anti-majoritarian. The rule of law is reduced to the obligation of the executive branch of government to implement the law. But the rule of law does not have any influence on the formation of the law.

Radical democracy was already on the agenda when the first constitutions emerged. In the debate of the French National Assembly on the Declaration of Rights 1789, the representative Crénière argued in a Rousseauian manner that there is but one fundamental right, namely the right of every citizen to participate in the formation of the general will.76 In the early years of North American constitutionalism, the parliaments of the former colonies claimed for themselves the same sovereign power that the British parliament enjoyed and did not feel bound by the Bills of Rights they had only recently adopted. It needed the Philadelphia Convention to clarify that sovereignty belonged to the people, not the people's representatives.77
Radical democracies may seem particularly democratic. But they are not immune to majoritarian absolutism and they are threatened by an inherent tendency toward self-destruction. If the elected majority is omnipotent, it can use the majority vote to discriminate against the minority, tailor the rules of political competition in a way to prevent loss of power, restrict critical speech, and ultimately even abolish majority rule by a majority vote. This tendency remains latent as long as the system rests on a set of shared values which prevent the competitors from mutually regarding themselves as enemies and which function as non-legal limitation to majority decisions. When the moral basis erodes the constitution can, however, easily pervert.

For the latter, the Weimar Constitution of 1919 is often used as an example. And, indeed, what happened in 1933 in Germany was not a revolution against the democratic system but a self-destruction of democracy through democratic procedures. Afterwards no new National Socialist Constitution was adopted. Nazi rule was the opposite of constitutionalism. However, it would be incorrect to call the Weimar Constitution a constitution of the radically democratic type. It contained an elaborate bill of rights as well as a number of checks to parliamentary power and it provided for an, albeit rudimentary, constitutional court. Rather, it was a formalistic interpretation that regarded the events of 1933 as compatible with the Weimar Constitution.

One might expect all democratic constitutions without a bill of rights to belong to the radical democratic type. But this is not necessarily the case if democracy is not reduced to mere majority rule. Australia, for example, has deliberately renounced a bill of rights because it deemed individuals best served by ensuring to each an equal share in political power.78 Nevertheless, Australia still accepts that the decision in favour of democracy implies the recognition of some unwritten fundamental rights, such as freedom of speech, without which democracy would lose its sense. Consequently, the Australian High Court declared a law null and void on the ground that it violated freedom of expression, which it regarded as being implied in the notion of democracy.79 In this context, it is not without interest that all other states of the old Commonwealth (Great Britain, Canada, and New Zealand) have recently adopted bills of rights.

The second form of democratic non-liberal constitutionalism consists of constitutions that are based on the principle of popular sovereignty, but give little weight to the people’s interests and opinions in the course of day-to-day politics. They put the emphasis on executive power and have low regard for the separation of powers and fundamental rights of the citizens. They often go along with a strong affiliation of the ruling elites with a religious creed and give special protection to the Church that represents and propagates this creed. The distinction between general laws and religious norms is low, the degree of accepted pluralism small.

This type of constitution played a big role in the Latin American countries after they had freed themselves from Spanish or Portuguese rule.80 These two colonial powers themselves had deviated from the mainstream constitutionalism in Europe in 1820 when the struggle for independence in Latin America began. Since the constitutions were exclusive in the above-mentioned sense,81 every power shift between the liberal and the restorative forces led to the abolition of the existing constitution and to the adoption of a new one. For the same reason, the frequent change of constitutions repeated itself in Latin America, although with a few exceptions: the third Chilean Constitution, for instance, was in force from 1833 to 1925.82 Altogether, this continent saw more than one hundred constitutions in the nineteenth century alone and nor was constitutional stability reached during most of the twentieth century.

The vast majority of these constitutions are described as democratic in origin, but autocratic in practice, defending political elitism and moral perfectionism under the guidance of the Catholic Church.83 In opposition to this type of constitution, some radical democratic constitutions were drafted, albeit with little success, and the same is true for liberal constitutions. Only Brazil differs to a certain extent from countries in the Spanish tradition.84 All constitutions after the Imperial Constitution of 1824, with the exception of two dictatorial constitutions (1937 and 1967/69), were enacted by an elected constitutional assembly and contained growing catalogues of fundamental rights—the current one beating all records with its almost 150 rights.

Constitutions that look like liberal-democratic ones but tend to be democratic-non-liberal are quite frequent throughout the world. This is not to say, however, that the democratic component is well developed. As a matter of fact, it often finds itself in a rudimentary stage, although more advanced than the institutions of legal control and adjudication whose failure is often evident. This situation should, therefore, not be confused with that in the United States where the democratic component enjoys a certain prevalence over the rule of law component.
This statement concerns a constitutional order which not only belongs clearly to the liberal-democratic type but also possesses highly developed institutions of legal control.

4. The Social or Welfare State Constitution

Liberalism fulfilled its promise only in part. While the productivity of a liberalized economy, and with it the wealth in society, increased considerably, the societal self-regulation did not result in a just order. The wealth was distributed unequally, and instead of the old feudal structures a division according to classes spread out in society. The liberal constitution, whether democratic or not, contributed to this development, although the text does not always reveal this. The bills of rights were formulated in universal terms and even when they protected only citizens they applied to all of them equally. Yet, this did not prevent the United States and other countries such as Brazil from upholding slavery; and it did not prevent any liberal state in the nineteenth century and thereafter from treating men and women unequally.

The more general problem was, however, that the equal rights applied to unequal conditions. All enjoyed freedom of property, but this freedom was useful for proprietors only. All enjoyed freedom of contract. No one could be compelled to conclude a contract that he deemed onerous or unjust. But for those whose only property was their capacity to work, there remained little choice but to accept any condition set by employers, landlords, etc. Thus, equal freedom, applied to unequal factual conditions, did not lead to a balance of interest but to exploitation. In the societal sphere that had been freed from state regulation, private suppression developed. Formal equality applied to situations of substantive inequality cements the status quo.

This was the situation in many constitutional states, and it was aggravated by the Industrial Revolution. Political redress was less likely the more liberal the constitutions were. When it came to the right to vote the constitutions openly favoured bourgeois interests. The electoral system was based on census, and the census was even stricter with regard to eligibility. Thus, attempts to alleviate the situation of the working classes through legislation usually failed in the liberal parliaments. Disconnected from its original aim to secure justice, liberalism and its insistence on formal equality with the material pre-conditions of freedom left aside became doctrinal. A revision of liberal constitutionalism seemed necessary.

The year 1848 was a turning point in this respect. Marx and Engels published the Communist Manifesto. The French February Revolution was no longer a revolution of the middle classes against absolutism and feudalism as in 1789 or against the Bourbon restoration as in 1830, but a revolution of the working classes. The right to work was proclaimed. A new constitution, passed in November 1848 by a national convention emanating from general elections, promised in its preamble a more equitable distribution of burdens and advantages and in its bill of rights guaranteed free education, equality in labour relations, public work for the unemployed, (p. 123) albeit no right to work, state aid for the sick and the elderly if they were unable to support themselves.

In spite of the short life of this constitution a new element was now on the constitutional agenda: the social. Put forward in reaction to the manifest deficits of liberalism, it came in two forms, a moderate and a radical one. In the first form, the social element was designed to complement, not to negate, the liberal element. The state should again assume responsibility for a just social order, guarantee a minimal standard of welfare, and prevent abuses of economic liberties. The constitutional devices were social and economic rights that the state had to implement. The second mode was anti-liberal and expected progress not from modifications, but from a replacement of liberalism. It ultimately led to socialist constitutions.

The route from the early attempts to infuse social elements into the constitutions to the realization of the project was long. In some countries nothing changed on the constitutional level. In others changes arrived late. The US Constitution is an example of the first alternative. After the Civil War, the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments abolished slavery and guaranteed every person equal rights regardless of colour and race. But the Constitution did not react to the social problems of a rapidly industrializing society. The same is true for the European constitutions in the second half of the nineteenth century and for most constitutions in other parts of the world.

However, this did not necessarily mean that governments completely abstained from coping with the social problem. Although the French Constitution of 1848 was soon abolished, Napoleon III, the heir of the failed revolution, introduced a number of social programmes, but daily working hours did not fall below 12 and unions and strikes remained forbidden. Germany was the first country to introduce a comprehensive social security system in the 1880s that insured workers against illness, invalidity, and unemployment and provided old-age pensions. This shows that the welfare state, just like liberalism and the rule of law, does not depend on constitutional guarantees. These initiatives can be introduced on the legislative level.

Yet, even in the absence of explicit social provisions the constitutional setting is not irrelevant. Germany’s backwardness in terms of constitutionalism facilitated its progressiveness in social matters. The non-democratic monarchical state had never understood liberalism as an end in itself but as a means to promote economic growth. Likewise, it had never completely relinquished its responsibility for general welfare. Bismarck succeeded in getting support for his social security programme from a not fully liberal parliament whereas social measures were usually voted down in the parliaments of countries such as France.

The constitutional progressiveness of the United States, in turn, impeded measures of social policy for a certain time. While in Europe government measures that addressed the social problem could not be challenged in court, this was possible in the United States. The Lochner decision of 1905, which declared unconstitutional a law that limited the weekly working hours of labourers to 60, became characteristic for a whole period of dogmatic liberalism and stopped President Roosevelt’s New Deal programme until he got the chance to appoint new justices to the Supreme Court who were willing to overrule Lochner.87

Since the United States never added social elements to their liberal-democratic constitution, the admissibility of social policy measures always remained a question of constitutional interpretation. In a number of other constitutional systems, the turn towards welfare state (p. 126) constitutions gained momentum after the First World War. The Weimar Constitution of 1919 added social and economic rights and directives regarding the economic order to the classical liberties. Dignity appeared as a constitutional notion in the sense of a right to lead a dignified life, secured by entitlements to shelter, food, and clothing, and in a similar sense dignity was mentioned in the Irish Constitution of 1934. A comprehensive chapter on the economic and social order characterizes the Brazilian Constitution of 1934.

While Germany in its current constitution replaced the Weimar catalogue of social and economic rights by a general clause that Germany is a social state, many constitutions of former socialist countries and a number of post-colonial constitutions in countries with severe social differences, based on caste as in India or on race as in South Africa, contain chapters with social and economic rights or directives for legislation with the goal of creating equal conditions for the population. Affirmative action, a constant problem under the liberal US Constitution, is admitted and even prescribed in these countries. The guarantees of the classical liberties often contain notwithstanding clauses in favour of affirmative action. India’s constitution is full of them; and the Brazilian Constitution of 1988 comprises a veritable social policy programme.88

Likewise, the social element is of great importance in the post-war constitutions of Japan (1946) and Korea (1949). Both constitutions contain a right to work. According to Article 25, every Japanese citizen has the right to lead a life based on a minimum standard of health and culture. According to Article 34, all Korean citizens have the right to a dignified life. Both constitutions obligate the state to promote social welfare and social security. When these countries adopted those clauses they were under strong US influence, although it was not the US Constitution that could serve as a model in this respect. Japan and Korea constitutionalized Roosevelt’s New Deal programme that had been implemented on the legislative level in the country of origin.

Just as a liberal-democratic constitution has to negotiate the relationship between democracy and liberty, social constitutions that attempt to correct the deficits of liberalism have to negotiate the relationship between liberty and equality. Constitutions belonging to this type can therefore be differentiated according to their preference for either liberty or equality. Generally speaking, countries with a discriminatory past (homemade as in India or externally imposed as in South Africa), which the constitution wants to overcome, tend to give considerable weight to equality. The same is true for countries without a strong liberal tradition and a culture not primarily based on values of individual autonomy as with the East Asian states.

On the contrary, countries in the Western tradition tend to subordinate equality to liberty. It is equal freedom that the various constitutions seek to achieve. Social and economic rights are primarily understood as guarantees of the material foundations of liberty. The social constitution thus breaks with a merely formal understanding of equality that prevailed under the liberal constitution, but in the interest of a deeper understanding and securing of liberty. Even in a constitution like the German one that does not contain social and economic rights, but the general principle of a social state, this principle is used to give the classical liberties a social content.\(^\text{90}\)

(p. 127) The impact of the social component would be misunderstood if seen only as an addition of a new content layer to the constitution. It entails a structural change. Social and economic rights are a consequence of waning confidence in the self-regulation capacity of society. Social justice becomes again a concern of the state. As in the pre-liberal era, it is a goal that has to be actively pursued, but in a different way from the earlier period and not through illiberal means. Social and economic rights as a way to pursue this aim therefore differ considerably from classical liberties. These are primarily negative rights limiting the government. They are fulfilled through non-action. Social and economic rights, on the contrary, are positive rights the fulfilment of which requires state action.\(^\text{91}\)

This has a double consequence. While there is only one way to comply with negative rights, namely to omit certain actions, there are various ways to fulfil positive rights. The government has a choice. Because of this difference negative rights correspond with entitlements of the rights holder, positive rights do not. Secondly, while the duty to omit certain actions does not create a scarcity problem, the duty to render services or distribute benefits does. For both reasons, social and economic rights are in need of legislative concretization and specification before they can entitle their beneficiaries and be enforced by courts.

This difference gave rise to the assumption that, despite their name, social and economic rights are not rights, but merely expressions of political intent without legal relevance. This is particularly, but not only, the case in common law systems where it seems difficult to conceive of a right without a corresponding remedy. However, it would be a mistake to assume that these rights are not justiciable at all. Courts in countries with positive rights may obligate the legislator to enact laws that give a concrete meaning to these rights and create entitlements for the individual on the legislative level. In some cases the obligation of the state to distribute benefits has even been derived directly from the constitution if laws were missing.\(^\text{92}\)

Social and economic rights were a constitutional answer to the social problem that originated in the nineteenth century in the wake of industrialization. But this is no longer the only field where active state intervention in society takes place. Over time, the state again assumed comprehensive responsibility for the welfare and development of society. Government is, within the limits of its capacity, responsible for economic growth, infrastructural modernization, protection against the risks inherent in scientific and technological progress and its commercial use.

Not all of these tasks can be fulfilled by giving orders. The state is compelled to use indirect means like financial incentives to reach its aims. To the same extent that the state resorts to soft law instead of hard law it became dependent on the willingness of private actors to comply with demands. As a consequence, multilateral bargaining processes replace the traditional unilateral command. Private actors advance from societal forces that try to influence government decision to participants in decision-making. They gain an informal share in public power. The borderline between public and private is blurred.

All this is not without consequences for the constitution of welfare states. It finds expression in so-called third generation rights, such as the right to a healthy environment, clean air and water, etc. It is, however, difficult to individualize these collective goods and to formulate them in the language of rights. In many constitutions, therefore, they are not part of the bill of rights, but form a separate category, namely objectives of the state. As such, they claim binding force for government. Consequently, total neglect would amount to a violation of the constitution. But the measures to be taken in order to implement the objectives cannot be derived from the constitution. They are left to political will, according to the agenda of the ruling party and the financial capacity of the country.

Furthermore, the social type of constitution can no longer confine itself to limiting public power. It also adopts a programmatic function. Appellative and aspirational norms supplement the traditional prescriptive rules. The constitution expresses the values in which a society believes. They are not just solemn assertions, but they are understood as legally binding guidelines, for example for the interpretation of the bill of rights as section 9 of the South African Constitution requires. These constitutions are not limited to the sphere of the state, but formulate an overarching consensus for the political and the societal sphere. This goes along with more and more informal practices that replace or undermine the formal institutions and procedures. What is gained in range is lost in normativity.\(^\text{93}\)
5. Socialist Constitutions

Socialist constitutions equal the type of constitutions discussed above in that they are also a reaction to the deficits of liberalism. They differ from these constitutions in that they break with liberalism altogether. Their attitude is not illiberal but anti-liberal. Karl Marx taught that fundamental rights are an instrument of exploitation and Ferdinand Lassalle extended this to constitutions in general: they conceal power structures, and power always prevails over law. As a consequence, the limitations that are part of the liberal project are rejected: fundamental rights, separation of powers, rule of law, judicial review. If provisions are found in socialist constitutions that look like these limitations they usually have a different meaning and fulfil different functions. This can be explained by a look to the second element of modern constitutions, democracy. Are the socialist constitutions democratic?

The self-description of most socialist countries, past and present, says so: the People’s Republic of China, the German Democratic Republic. In the constitutional texts this is usually explained by attributing all public power to the people. But this power is exercised in the form of a dictatorship, ‘the People's Democratic Dictatorship’ (Art 1 of the Chinese Constitution). Subject to this dictatorial power is not the people as such, but one class of the people, the ‘working class’ of workers and peasants. This class acts through an avant-garde, the Communist Party. The Communist Party is usually the only party. If other parties exist they are not competitors but cooperators.

The party exercises the power in accordance with the principle of democratic centralism, that is to say, top-down. The leadership, usually the politburo, is the avant-garde within the avant-garde. Its position is legitimized by superior insight in the ultimate aim of history and the true interest of the people. The legitimation principle is not consensus of the people, but an absolute truth. Consequently socialist constitutions are not constitutions of pluralism. If we find mechanisms that resemble democratic mechanisms in democratic constitutions, such as elections, they again have a different meaning and a different function.

Since in socialist systems political power is legitimized by an absolute truth, everything that has been said about truth as legitimating principle applies to socialist constitutions. They are subordinated to this truth. Their function consists in serving this truth. This means that they cannot acquire primacy over governmental acts. A rule such as Article 5(1) of the Chinese Constitution must be read in light of the fact that the Communist Party is the sole authoritative interpreter of the Constitution and the laws. The Constitution rather assists the government in achieving the pre-existing purpose of political rule. Elections may offer a limited choice among candidates, but not among programmes or views of the common best.

The separation of powers does not acknowledge independency of state organs. It is a mere administrative utility principle, a division of labour, not of powers. The rule of law, understood as ‘socialist legality’, applies to the inferior agencies of the state, but does not bind the highest authorities. Fundamental rights do not open spheres of self-determination of the individual. All rights are under the condition not to disrupt the truth. ‘Disruption of the socialist system by any organization or individual is prohibited’ (Art 1 of the Chinese Constitution).

Behind this perception lies the assumption that, with the abolition of capitalism, the antagonism between the individual and the state has disappeared. In the socialist system the interests of society and the interest of the individual are objectively in harmony, although not every member of society may subjectively be aware of this. In comparison with the objective situation, the subjective view of the individual deserves no legal protection. It can be disregarded and, if necessary, suppressed. The distinction between state and society, public and private is obsolete. The legal system is based on duties instead of rights. Fundamental rights no longer guarantee a private sphere free of state intervention, but guarantee the individual participation in the collective endeavour as well as the means necessary to render his or her service in the reproductive process of society.

Basicly the same is true for constitutions in every political regime that legitimizes itself by an absolute truth. It is in particular true for theocratic regimes whose foundation is not a secular, but a divine, truth. The question is therefore whether it is justified to regard these constitutions as a type of constitutionalism. If the measure is what was called here the achievement of constitutionalism, all essential characteristics of constitutions are missing. The other types discussed may have been closer or farther away from the achievement, but they could all be accepted as species of the genus ‘modern constitution’. Socialist constitutions are the anti-type to these.

V. A New Distinction: National and International Constitutions
The modern constitution is a particularly ambitious and a particularly successful means to submit public power to law. When it emerged, public power was in the hands of states. They held the monopoly of public power on their territory. As a matter of fact, only the concentration of the numerous dispersed powers that coexisted on a given territory made the constitution, understood as a law that comprehensively regulated the establishment and exercise of public power, possible. A polity where this concentration existed was regarded as a state. The constitutions were state or national constitutions. The modern state was the precondition of the modern constitution. Earlier polities had laws and even fundamental laws that applied to power holders, but no constitution.

Beyond the state, no object capable of being constitutionalized existed. The only actors on the international scene were states. They were characterized by an attribute that no other entity had, namely sovereignty. Sovereignty meant that they held the supreme power within their territory and had no external powers above them. The law that regulated the relationship among sovereign states was international law. But because of the sovereignty of the states and the corresponding absence of an international public power, let alone an international legislation, legal bonds among states could only stem from voluntary agreements. International law was contractual law. It consisted of treaties. Treaties were not constitutions. In the absence of an international public power they could not be enforced if a party was in breach of a mutual agreement.

This situation lasted for almost 300 years, from the Westphalian Treaty of 1648 to the foundation of the United Nations after the Second World War in 1945. The United Nations differs from the many leagues and alliances that had existed before 1945, including the League of Nations, which had been founded after the First World War, in that the member states of the United Nations not only renounced the use of force in international relations (with the exception of self-defence), but that they transferred the power to enforce this commitment against aggressors, if necessary with military force, to the UN. After the founding of the United Nations no member state is as sovereign as states had been in the Westphalian order. There is now a public power above them.

In the meantime, other international organizations were created globally and regionally to which the member states transferred sovereign powers that are now exercised by these organization, potentially against the will of the member states. The most far-reaching organization of this type is, of course, the European Union. But other powerful international actors have also emerged: the European Council with the European Court of Human Rights; the International Criminal Court, whose legal basis is not a treaty but a legislative act of the UN Security Council and whose powers are not limited to signatory states; the World Trade Organization; to a certain extent also the International Monetary Fund, etc. In addition, public international law has brought forth a ius cogens that binds states independent of their consent. The borderline between inside and outside is blurred.

The erosion of traditional statehood that goes along with this development cannot leave the constitution unaffected. If nation-states no longer hold the monopoly of public power, but share it with international organizations the national constitution looses the capacity of comprehensively legitimating and regulating all public power that claims validity within the national territory. The national constitution may still determine the transfer of powers to international organizations. But the use these organizations make of their powers is no longer subject to national constitutional law. The constitution is reduced to a partial order that regulates public power only insofar as it remains state power.

This gives rise to the question whether the decline of the national constitution can be compensated on the international level. After all, what is in need of being submitted to law is not the state, but public power, regardless of the entity through which it is exercised. The widely accepted answer to this question is constitutionalization. Unlike the making of a constitution, constitutionalization does not designate an act by which a constitution acquires legal force, but a process that eventually leads to a constitution. The objects of this process are the treaties and charters of international organizations such as the United Nations, the European Union, the World Trade Organization, the various human rights pacts, sometimes public international law in general, and even self-organization and self-regulation processes of globally operating private actors, all objects for which the term ‘constitution’ was not in use until recently.

If all this is correct, a new type of constitution is emerging: the international constitution as opposed to the national constitution. Whether or not it is indeed correct depends largely on the meaning of ‘constitution’. If the term is understood in the sense of the achievement described earlier, the international world is relatively far from it. With the exception of the European Union, the international level still lacks an object capable of being constitutionalized.
in the sense of that achievement. International public power is fragmented; it lies in the hands of a few entities, most of which are specialized in exercising one singular function—such as regulation of commerce, protection of the environment, enforcement of human rights—and therefore endowed with one single public power, so far not integrated in a coherent system.

Undoubtedly, all these entities are submitted to law. But legalization and constitutionalization are not the same. Because of their legal nature the treaties, charters etc fulfil a number of functions that constitutions fulfil in states. However, they all lack the democratic element and are confined to the rule of law element of constitutionalism. In terms of the achievement of constitutionalism they lag quite far behind. Yet, this was and is true for a number of national constitutions as well. For typological purposes it should not matter. Typologies help to distinguish between phenomena that are treated under the same name. This is their value also when it comes to national and international constitutionalism.

Bibliography

Dieter Grimm, Die Zukunft der Verfassung (3rd edn, 2002)

Karl Loewenstein, Political Power and the Governmental Process (1957)

Michel Rosenfeld, The Identity of the Constitutional Subject (2010)

Carl Schmitt, Verfassungslehre (1928). In English: Constitutional Theory (Jeffrey Seitzer ed and trans, 2008)

Notes:

(4) Michel Rosenfeld, The Identity of the Constitutional Subject (2010), 149ff. See also Chapter 35.

(11) McIlwain (n 2); Dieter Grimm, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte (3rd edn, 1995), 10ff.

(14) Grimm (n 11).

Types of Constitutions

(27) Saskia Sassen, Territory, Authority, Rights (updated edn, 2008).

(28) Michel Rosenfeld ‘What is a Constitution?’ in Norman Dorsen et al (eds), Comparative Constitutionalism (2nd edn, 2010), 36.

(32) Francis Hamon and Michel Troper, Droit constitutionnel (31st edn, 2009), 41f.

(33) For the first time in Carl von Rotteck, Lehrbuch des Vernunftrechts und der Staatswissenschaften (1840), vol 2, 172ff; today common in German constitutional theory, see Bryde (n 1), 59.

(34) Barendt (n 30).

(36) Bryde (n 1), 27. ‘Symbolic’ is here understood as having no impact in the real world. It should be noted, however, that there is also an understanding of ‘symbolic’ as an additional, extra-legal effect that constitutions may develop when they succeed in symbolizing the aspirations, the unity of a polity, and thus contribute to the integration of societies. For a meaning of ‘symbolic’ in this sense see Dieter Grimm, ‘Integration by Constitution’ (2005) 3 International Journal of Constitutional Law 193; both meanings are used by Marcello Neves, Symbolische Konstitutionalisierung (1998), 79ff. For the US Constitution see Michael Kammen, A Machine that Would Go of Itself. The Constitution in American Culture (1986); Edward S. Corwin, ‘The Constitution as Instrument and Symbol’ (1936) 30 American Political Science Review 1071.

(37) Loewenstein (n 1), 147ff.

(39) ‘Instrumentalistic’ meaning that the constitution is exclusively used in the interest of the government or the power-holders, see Neves (n 36), 92f; ‘ritualistic’ meaning that the rules of the constitution are seemingly applied while the substantive processes take place elsewhere and are completed when the ‘ritual’ starts, see Bryde (n 1), 29ff.

(40) Wahl (n 22).

(41) Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union v Dolphin Delivery Ltd [1986] 2 SCR 573.

(42) Paul Laband, Das Staatsrecht des Deutschen Reiches (4th edn, 1901), vol 2, 34; Jellinek (n 19), 534.

(43) Schmitt (n 19), 18.

(44) See Chapter 24.

(47) Schmitt (n 19), 20ff.

(48) Levinson (n 45).

(49) Alexander M. Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch (1962). See also Chapter 40.

(50) See Chapter 39.

(51) David Robertson, The Judge as Political Theorist. Contemporary Constitutional Review (2010) calls the German Constitutional Court ‘the most important of all’, 11, and affirms that ‘so important is this court that any synoptic discussion [of various courts] will depend on frequent mentions of the German approach’, 79. See also Georg Vanberg, The Politics of Constitutional Review in Germany (2005), 17, 61; Donald P. Kommers, ‘The Federal Constitutional Court in the German Political System’ (1994) 26 Comparative Political Studies 470; Oliver W. Lembcke, Hüter der Verfassung (2007).

(53) United Mizrahi Bank (n 31).

(57) Pasquale Pasquino, Majority Rules in Constitutional Democracies (forthcoming), 17, distinguishes between ‘consensual constitutions’ and ‘coup de constitution’-constitutions.

(58) See Chapter 41.

(60) Ibid 2703.

(61) Here similarities appear to Bruce Ackerman's distinction between dualist democracy and rights foundationalism, cf Ackerman (n 20), vol 1, 7ff, 10ff.

(62) Kahn (n 59), 2703.

(63) See Chapter 16.

Types of Constitutions

(67) Henry Sumner Maine, Ancient Law (1861), chapter V, end.

(69) John Adams, Thoughts on Government (1776), Works, vol IV (1850), 106; Constitution of Massachusetts, Art 30; Marbury v Madison 1 Cranch 137 (1803).

(70) Kahn (n 59).

(72) Hannah Arendt, On Revolution (1963); Jürgen Habermas, ‘Naturrecht und Revolution’ in Habermas, Theorie und Praxis (1963), 57; Dieter Grimm, Recht und Staat der bürgerlichen Gesellschaft (1987), 192; Grimm (n 26), 67.

(75) Grimm, Recht und Staat (n 72) 192, 212.

(76) Les déclarations des droits de l’homme de 1789. Textes réunis et présentés par Christine Faure (1988), 127. Marat replied that without a limited power there would be no constitution, see 278, and Demeunier rejected the idea by calling it ‘le système de Hobbes, rejeté de l’Europe entière’, see 331.

(81) ‘Inclusive or exclusive’, above at 113.

(84) Paulo Bonavides and Paes de Andrade, Historia Constitucional do Brasil (8th edn, 2006).

(85) See Chapter 47.

(86) Grimm (n 72), 138.

(87) Lochner v New York 198 US 45 (1905); West Coast Hotel v Parrish 300 US 379 (1937).

(88) On affirmative action, see Chapter 54.

(2005), 137.

(91) See Chapter 49.

(95) See Chapter 25.

(99) Grimm (n 24).

Dieter Grimm

Dieter Grimm is Professor of Law, Humboldt University Berlin and Yale Law School and Former Justice, Federal Constitutional Court of Germany
This article examines constitutionalism in illiberal polities. It discusses the range of constitutionalisms, liberal constitutionalism and its discontents, anatomy of constitutionalism in an illiberal polity, mixed constitutionalism, theocratic constitutionalism, communitarian constitutionalism, and the possibility and limits of constitutionalism in illiberal polities.

Keywords: illiberal constitutionalism, illiberal polity, mixed constitutionalism, theocratic constitutionalism, communitarian constitutionalism

I. Illiberal Constitutionalism as a Category 133
   1. The Range of Constitutionalisms: The Generic and the Particular 133
   2. Liberal Constitutionalism and its Discontents 134
   3. Anatomy of Constitutionalism in an Illiberal Polity 136
   4. Mixed Constitutionalism 137

II. Illiberal Constitutionalisms: A Typology 138
   1. Theocratic Constitutionalism 138
   2. Communitarian Constitutionalism: Cultural Imperatives, Developmentalist Priorities 142

III. Constitutions and Constitutionalism: The Possibility and Limits of Constitutionalism in Illiberal Polities 148

I. Illiberal Constitutionalism as a Category

1. The Range of Constitutionalisms: The Generic and the Particular

The idea of ‘constitutionalism in illiberal polities’ appears oxymoronic, insofar as constitutionalism is considered the antidote to tyranny, and illiberalism its instrument. Walker proposed the existence of a category of ‘non-liberal constitutionalism’, to dismiss this as hostile to the constitutionalist enterprise is oversimplistic but unsurprising, as the dominant model of liberal constitutionalism is often treated as synonymous with constitutionalism itself. This occludes pre-liberal versions of ‘ancient’ constitutionalism and extant non-liberal models.

Constitutionalism resists arbitrary power, whether located in despotic rule or imposed absolutist principle; descriptively and analytically, its content remains ambiguous. While every polity has a constitution, not all practise constitutionalism. Constitutions as foundational instruments publicly articulate a polity’s political identity and normative architecture, its values and structural distribution of power, defining inter-institutional and government-citizen relations. In being objectified and independent of the political agencies creating it, constitutions provide norms for evaluating the legitimacy of political action. Constitutionalism is sited where ‘national history, custom, religion, social values and assumptions about government meet positive law’.
Constitutionalism in Illiberal Polities

The primary objective of ‘generic constitutionalism’ is to regulate state power through rule of law commitments and institutions, simultaneously empowering and restraining government action. Given form and purpose, ‘power is not free to be anything and everything at any time’. Liberal constitutionalism is a particular expression of this broader phenomenon, associated with the separation of powers, democratic elections, and judicially enforceable rights. Purposively, both liberal and non-liberal constitutionalist forms regulate power through ‘the legal limitation on government’.

Many countries today are not liberal societies nor are liberal norms embraced without reservation. ‘Illiberal’ polities are ‘varied and competing’, encompassing illiberal, pre-liberal, non-liberal, or semi-liberal societies, producing ‘communitarian’ or ‘theocratic’ forms of constitutionalism. Degrees of ‘illiberalism’ are measured against the features of liberal polities. The ‘uniformity’ of non-liberal theory consists of a few basic assumptions and most importantly, ‘a common enemy’—liberal constitutionalism. To interrogate the idea, features, and role of constitutionalism in illiberal polities, the concepts of constitutionalism and liberalism must be disentangled.

2. Liberal Constitutionalism and its Discontents

There is no singular liberalism, but many liberalisms. No settled list of liberal values, rights, or interpretive methods exist, as ‘liberalism is defined less by a set of fixed characteristics than by its struggle against illiberalism’.

Put simply, liberal societies rest on two main pillars. First, the meta-liberal value of normative individualism, which prioritizes individual autonomy, secured through constitutional rights. Secondly, the ‘neutral’ state which does not espouse a shared conception of the good, with individuals free to pursue their own conceptions. Arguably, the liberal state is disinterested in its citizens’ character. In contrast, illiberal societies prioritize community interests and actively promote a particular vision of communal life.

Aside from structural limits on power, Rosenfeld identifies two distinct features of ‘modern constitutionalism’. First, ‘the protection of fundamental rights’; Murphy further declares that constitutionalism’s central principle is ‘respect for human worth and dignity’, which imposes substantive constraints even where government represents popular will. The legitimating standard derived from human dignity reflects what Katz considers the core of the ‘basic Western notion of liberal democratic constitutionalism’, reflecting the ‘rationalist Enlightenment manner’ in American and European constitutional thought. Generic constitutionalism ‘does not imply a comprehensive or overriding commitment to individual rights’. Secondly, ‘a levelling of status-based hierarchies’ to establish the egalitarian premise that all persons carry ‘an inherent capacity for moral choice, self-respect and dignity’. This denotes a shift from feudal subjecthood to citizenship, circumscribing ‘the number of possible legitimate orderings of relevant identities and differences’. Thus, liberal norms give rise to a court-centric rights-based constitutionalism.

‘Modern’ constitutionalism corrected traditional constitutionalism’s defect: the absence of effective limits on power. Where the sole limits on governors in traditional settings were drawn from vague norms derived from traditions, custom, and natural law, compliance turned on the goodwill of political rulers, as the only external sanction for interfering with liberties or undermining public weal was revolution, consistent with Lockean and Confucian philosophies.

Two political developments transformed traditional constitutionalism: first, popular sovereignty became the fount of constitutional authority, limiting political absolutism. Secondly, as natural law became unfashionable and the divine right of kings withered, the shift to modern constitutionalism was marked by the state becoming secular and later, liberal, separating the public/political from the private/social. As Ghai observed, ‘Constitutionalism, with its constituent concepts of the secularization, nationalization, separation and limitation of public powers emerged in Europe as part of bourgeois revolutions’.

However, liberal precepts predicated on universalist principles of freedom and equality of all today lack self-evident status; liberal constitutionalism has been criticized for its conceptions of the self, polity, and secularity as organizing ideals, and the constraint-oriented liberal state’s inability positively to address multiculturalism and development issues. First, liberal individualism flows from a reductive approach towards human knowledge and faith in Western rationalism, producing what communitarians consider a false view of the atomistic person as the source of value, who sees identity as self-constructed and revisable; instead, the individual participates in and owes allegiance to a given community.
Constitutionalism in Illiberal Polities

Secondly, liberalism does profess a theory of what constitutes a just, proper order, scepticism towards the a priori or Rawlsian comprehensive doctrines notwithstanding. Communitarians, critical race scholars, and feminists have criticized liberal neutrality for its homogenizing universalism, covert exclusions, and coercive injustice in imposing partisan substantive values that displace its predecessors, determining which freedoms and values to tolerate and privilege. Liberal constitutionalism bears a close correlation with ‘a conception of the good that embeds a form of market capitalism and laissez faire economics into the political and legal structures that are found in society’; it does not liberate but rather forms an autonomous, experimental choice-oriented disposition in citizens, which is defective in valorizing choice over what is chosen; in such settings, non-liberal groups find themselves ‘legally privatized and socially on the defensive’. In a ‘procedural republic’, public life is animated by rights-based liberal ethics which may spawn adversarial hyper-individualism, precipitate social decay, and preclude reasoned discussion and compromise over public issues. Liberalism may lack the normative resources to sustain group solidarity and a viable political community. Given its focus on negative liberties, liberal constitutionalism is unable to implement social programmes proactively to address issues of poverty, development, and environmental degradation, at odds with the ‘social constitutionalist’ model associated with Latin American countries, fuelled by Marxist and indigenismo ideology.

Last, liberal neutrality struggles to accommodate popular desires to accord public status to an official religion or ethno-national identity, given its focus on individuals, rather than corporate identity. Liberalism is resisted where seen as a competing universalist logic which thwarts loyalties to the divine or where the liberal constitutionalist goal to create a universal, rationalist human association espouses an anti-religious rather than anti-theocratic secularism which seeks to privatize and purge ‘illiberal’ religion from the public square; such ‘hyper-liberalism’ is as anti-constitutionalist as fascist rule. Notably, constitutionalism simpliciter does not require ‘moral or metaphysical scepticism’. More moderate liberal visions recognize the legitimate role of religious convictions in public debate, subject to ‘public reason’, which some consider an appeal to subjective preferences. From the religionist’s perspective, government indifference towards religion is tantamount to government promotion of ‘religious relativism’ such that state ‘religious neutralism’ operates as a ‘civil religion’. Liberal counter-arguments assert that liberalism’s exclusions are less dangerous than those of authoritarian, paternalistic illiberalisms, claiming that liberalism’s exclusions are less dangerous; liberalism has evolved and accommodates some forms of ethnocultural diversity. Further, liberalism does not privatize morality; rather, liberal rights and values ‘constitute a public morality’; and forms, rather than supplants, valuable communities.

3. Anatomy of Constitutionalism in an Illiberal Polity

Unlike anti-constitutionalist regimes, illiberal polities do not lack limiting constitutive norms; constitutions in non-liberal polities may not primarily rely on individual rights but resort to methods such as federalism or separated powers to constrain public power. The state is expressly non-neutral, privileging a substantive vision of the good, informed by ethnicity, religion, or communal morality.

(p. 137) 4. Mixed Constitutionalism

The dominant position of the liberal-constitutionalist paradigm has been challenged by the existing variety of non-liberal and semi-liberal constitutions celebrating the community, sometimes against minority interests, as within Israel or American tribal societies.

All societies have a mix of liberal and illiberal practices, as ‘the liberalty of a culture is a matter of degree’. Given the absolutizing tendencies of both liberal and non-liberal principles such as individualism and nationalism, Walker proposed their reconciliation through a ‘mixed constitution’ which ‘juxtaposes liberal and non-liberal principles (and institutions)’ to moderate the absolutism of either side through acknowledging the ‘defeasibility of all rival justice principles’. Arguably, mixed constitutions which explicitly prefer non-liberal communal values are more respectful of difference than ‘either wholesale liberalism or illiberalism’, as partial establishment supports some truth claims while tempering absolutist truth claims through respecting dissent and public truth-seeking. This vindicates the purpose of constitutionalism: to temper any form of absolutism, royal, liberal, or illiberal.
Breslin considers ‘nonliberal or semi-liberal constitutions’ as ‘not wholly modern’\(^3\) though they may best suit the political regime desired. Mixed constitutions, blending individual protection and communal values with countering institutions, are reflected in various post-Communist East European constitutions, as a moderating strategy. Nonetheless, he argues these are not ‘objective’ constitutions in that they do not exist independently of the empowering institutions, nor do they impose discernible limits on the sovereign. The German Basic Law is categorized as semi-liberal, being external to the German polity, and it is considered more objective than the governing charter of the unwritten Israeli Constitution.\(^3\) The Israeli state sponsors a particular communitarianism founded on a vision of Jewish statehood the mission of which is promoting Jewish culture—embodied in the norms governing symbols and language; the Law of Return benefitting diaspora Jews; vesting state functions in religious bodies; and the absence of civil marriage—within a non-theocratic state with a secular judiciary. While the Israeli polity protects individual rights such as religious freedom, this is subordinate to Jewish unity, which legitimates restrictions on anti-Jewish speech or action; thus, communitarian priorities may ‘suppress the liberal inclinations of its citizens’.\(^3\) While non-Jews enjoy individual rights within a plural democracy where ‘egalitarian norms are determined by a logic of pluralism’ and ‘cultural autonomy takes precedence over assimilation’,\(^3\) they are ‘barred from meaningfully contributing to Israel’s common good’,\(^3\) reflecting qualitative tiers of citizenship. Notably, constitutions committed to a secular liberal democracy may also deploy illiberal measures, such as restricting the associational rights of political parties advocating the introduction of Islamic law, which challenges Turkish laïcité.\(^3\)

German rights clauses are classified as ‘semi-liberal’ in blending ‘liberal declarations with undeniably communitarian ones’.\(^3\) While individual rights and the inviolability of human dignity comport with liberal individualism, the right of persons freely to develop their personality must not violate other rights or offend ‘the constitutional order or the moral law’.\(^3\) This ‘critical nonliberal component’ may temper ‘the hyperindividualism tendencies of predominantly liberal regimes’.\(^3\) The critical point is that non-liberal rights clauses in securing communal values ahead of liberal ones do not restrain majority will or limit government power as effectively as an individualist reading of a liberal right. The ‘community-based component’ in the form of duties owed to the state allows decision-makers to counterbalance individual entitlements against ‘competing ideological values of possibly equal constitutional import’,\(^3\) derived from history or tradition, such as the German tradition of Sozialstaat, a blend of Christianity, liberalism, and socialism which considers citizen welfare paramount.\(^3\) The West German Constitutional Court stated that the Basic Law rejects the notion of the ‘isolated sovereign individual’; in adjudicating rights, the court seeks to relate ‘the citizen to the community ... without detracting from his individuality’.\(^3\)

Further along the ‘illiberal’ end of the scale are rights preceded by a clause authorizing restrictions that the legislature considers ‘necessary or expedient’ on stipulated grounds, as in Malaysian and Singaporean free speech guarantees. The instrumental criterion of ‘expediency’ permits more state discretion than a substantive restraint which only legitimates limits ‘necessary in a democratic society’, after the European human rights model.

The relational dimension of identity, apart from autonomy, is particularly important in multicultural societies. These grapple with the distinct issue of whether and how a liberal polity, founded on political individualism, should ‘tolerate’ or accommodate illiberal groups defined by indigeneity, ethnicity, culture, or religion within the broader polity, and the capacity of constitutionalism to ‘transform the unfathomable power of the ethnos into the responsible authority of the demos’.\(^3\)

II. Illiberal Constitutionalisms: A Typology

1. Theocratic Constitutionalism

Insofar as religion is considered an illiberal force in the public realm, it challenges liberalism’s ‘rational and tolerant ethos’,\(^3\) conflict occurs where religious and secular liberal values compete to be the sole source of authority governing social relations.

Modern constitutionalism rejects non-secular authority; secular constitutionalism marks a shift from divine to human or popular sovereignty. The ideal of a liberal secular state operating upon a dichotomous ordering of the temporal/spiritual or public/private is alien to religions such as Islam where religion and politics are indivisible and only God is sovereign. While the equal treatment of religions by a constitutionally secular state is considered the best solution to religiously diverse societies, this alienates those wanting a religious basis to the constitutional order, and resentful of how liberal secularism marginalizes religion from public life. An aggressively anti-theistic secularism can operate like a theocratic republic in sacrificing pluralism to secure ‘its transcendent goal of secular modernity’. 44
Constitutionalism in Illiberal Polities

In an increasingly re-enchanted world, religion is a powerful force in shaping constitutional orders. There exists a range of state-religion models, manifesting varying degrees of state separation, cooperation, and sponsorship of religion. These reside between two polar extremes: first, pure theocratic systems where supreme religious and political leadership is unified, such as the former Hindu Kingdom of Nepal or Saudi Arabia, where the Quran and Sunnah are the constitution;45 secondly, strict separationist systems, as in France where religion is largely privatized. Where a constitution accords religion a public role, status, or otherwise privileges religion(s), which may be inequalitarian and illiberal, the challenge is to realize ‘a functional governmental structure’ where ‘religious norms constitutionally balance with human rights and democratic norms’.46 This is faced by all constitutions which refer to a religion as a source of national identity or law, establish religions, or permit public religious expression. An intermediate category of theocratic constitutionalism may be identified which defies both strict separation and union of religion and state; here, religious authority and political authority are formally separated and their officials operate within the constitutional framework, which must provide sufficient institutional checks and rights guarantees to prevent autocratic rule, religious or otherwise.

Constitutions address the status of religion(s) variously: they may simultaneously affirm popular sovereignty while recognizing an official religion(s) integral to ‘the polity’s national meta-narrative’.47 without precluding the coexistence of other religions. The Sri Lankan Constitution affirms the state’s obligation to foster Buddhist doctrine while safeguarding other religions’ rights.48 The current Thai Constitution declares that the state ‘shall patronise and protect Buddhism’ as the majority religion, as well as other religions, and ‘encourage the application of religious principles to create virtue and develop the quality of life’.49 Drawing on religious values to articulate a common good is considered illiberal. Theocratic constitutions may designate religious law as the or a source of state law relevant to legislation and adjudication. Further, legislation inconsistent with religious law, like syariah, may be prohibited, as under Article 67 of the Maldivian Constitution.

Islamic constitutionalism is the most frequent type of theocratic constitutionalism examined, minimally involving the incorporation of Islamic principles within a constitutional scheme of limited powers, where the constitutional text identifies religious law—itself an internally diverse category—as a source of state law.50 Jurists as interpreters of Islamic law continue their historic guardianship as ‘a type of Fourth Branch to an Islamic constitutional government’,51 with constitutional provisions ranging from government duties to consult jurists in legislative or judicial processes, to according jurists final interpretive authority.

(p. 140) In theocratic constitutional orders, political authority is not exclusively derived from a divine source, operating within a constitutional framework committed to secularism or some form of democratic process. Constitutions may resort to legal pluralism through institutionalizing religious authority to implement religious law, which may uneasily coexist with civil courts, clashing over issues of overlapping jurisdiction or judicial hierarchy and supervision.

Some reject the idea that religion may be a possible normative basis for constitutional orders. Hirsch considers the prospect of constitutional theocracy defective and dangerous, as religious affiliation transcends national bonds, rendering unavailable consociational or power-sharing mechanisms which mitigate chauvinistic ethno-nationalist impulses.52 While to be respected, religion must be subordinated, with constitutional courts as the guardians of secularism, lest religious institutions supervise government activity. Constitutionalism cannot exist where transcendent concerns ground public decisions, as secularism insists ‘on the possibility of a reason-based political society’.53 The countervailing view is that all decision-making, based on religious or non-religious grounds such as perception and intuition, rests on someone’s privileged insight, including a liberal state’s assumption of neutrality between competing gods, which ‘rests on untestable faith’.54 Religion has been argued to be a rational discipline, as revelation is an evolving understanding of the moral universe, mediated through human interpretation.55 Excluding religion from the liberal public sphere is an act of self-impoverishment, unfairly burdening religious citizens.
Constitutionalism in Illiberal Polities

Liberal constitutionalism’s commitment to equality is incompatible with a system where religious affiliation governs membership and capacity to participate in a polity, as where Maldivian non-Muslims cannot be citizens. The danger is that members of the recognized religion may treat other religionists unequally. A concern with ‘Islamic constitutionalism’ is the perpetuation of historical syariah’s structure of religious discrimination, between men/women and superior believers/inferior non-believers, or dhimmis, who paid poll taxes in submission to Muslim sovereignty. The inability to accord full citizenship to all would perpetuate tensions in plural societies and constitute religious tyranny, not religiously grounded constitutionalist government.

The converse view admits the possibility that theocratic constitutionalism may be a ‘normatively different’ but legitimate form of ‘preferred values-based constitutionalism’. The Iranian Constitution falls within this category, as it constitutes a religious state and organizes it through law. This provides some measure of direct accountability, as opposed to the Saudi Arabian polity whose powerful executive is ‘circumscribed only by historical practices and Islamic ideas of governance’, a self-regulatory model.

The Iranian government is structured on the basis of separating the legislature, judiciary, and executive, supervised by the religious leadership. Democratic elements exist: the people elect the President and Islamic Consultative Assembly. Assembly deliberations are public. A qualified religious scholar heads the judiciary which dispenses Islamic justice and has in practice sustained clerical rule by upholding restrictive laws and suppressing dissent. Jurists composing the Guardian Council review legislation for consistency with Islamic tenets.

In post-Khomeini Iran, political and religious authority were de facto separated when the criteria for the Leader (faqih), the ‘just and pious’ jurist who wields supreme authority, were broadened to include non-religious qualifications such as ‘political and social perspicacity’ and administrative competence; he is chosen by experts elected by the people. Thus, the polity seeks to realize Quranic justice and God’s will under a religious guardianship which pursues a constitutionally mandated religious conception of the good; the government is tasked with cultivating value, securing political freedoms and a just economic system, and with strengthening universal Islamic brotherhood, for instance. The exercise of constitutional rights such as association and assembly does not have to be detrimental to Islamic principles; the citizen’s right to seek justice through judicial recourse is preserved. The government must respect the human rights of recognized religious minorities, provided they do not conspire against the Islamic Republic.

Here, power is structured, not unbounded; this can produce a constitutional order whose ‘internal logic’ is rooted in ‘theories of right and justice, permitting accountability and limiting discretion’. Nonetheless, government by guardians possessing ‘unique knowledge, wisdom and virtue’ in deeply religious societies, poses a perennial challenge to liberal democracies where judicial review operates as an external accountability check. The danger ‘strong religion’ poses to liberal constitutionalism is evident where religion seeks to govern social life contrary to human rights standards and where the insufficient separation of religion and state hampers competitive politics and pluralism.

Theocratic constitutionalism can rest on two different foundations of religious and liberal values. Such constitutions may contain justiciable fundamental rights, acknowledge popular sovereignty, and frame a national identity; the Egyptian Constitution constitutes an Arab nation and contains a ‘constitutional Islamicization’ clause recognizing ‘principles of the Islamic sharia’ as the ‘principal source of legislation’. In such polities, the degree to which rights such as religious freedom and equality are enjoyed depends upon secular court jurisprudence. The Egyptian Constitutional Court acts as de facto interpreter of religious norms, having developed a creative interpretive technique which enables it to construe syariah law consistently with human rights, as part of the broader government objective of securing human welfare. Judicial review, by providing authoritative interpretation and meaningful restraint on government power, advances rule of law values within illiberal polities.

Conversely, courts in polities with constitutional Islamization clauses may undermine constitutionalism, where secular judges import personal conceptions of religious law into constitutional interpretation, rendering individual rights nugatory and legitimating unequal treatment towards religious minorities. A case in point concerns how the explosive issue of apostasy of Muslims in Muslim-majority Malaysia is handled. The courts have treated religious conversions not as a function of voluntarist religious choice, but as a public order issue. In restrictively construing the scope of the recognized right to profess and practise religion, the High Court in Lina Joy v Majlis...
Constitutionalism in Illiberal Polities

Agama Islam Wilayah\textsuperscript{70} referenced Article 3, which identifies Islam as the Federation’s religion, to underscore the government’s duty to promote and defend Islam in recognizing its ‘special position’ as ‘the main and dominant religion’, and to emphasize qualifications to religious liberty. At inception, Malaysia was understood to be a secular nation;\textsuperscript{71} the constitutional reference to Islam was meant to be ceremonial, not substantive; its judicial invocation was not to buttress liberal readings of the right to have or not have a religion, as some Islamic schools of thought allow; rather, it read religious freedom down, highlighting the Islamic community’s concern towards losing a member. An affidavit from a formerly Muslim Malay woman who had become Christian was inadequate, as the court insisted that the issue was not governed by personal choice but by religious law, as unilateral conversion would precipitate chaos and confusion. She was directed to seek a declaration of apostasy from the syariah courts, which have never issued one to a living Malay; indeed, apostates may be preventively detained at religious rehabilitation centres, rendering the right to leave Islam under syariah law illusory. The court held that religious freedom did not contain the right to free conscience or religious choice, contrary to human rights standards, further asserting that the Malys could never leave Islam given the constitutional definition of a ‘Malay’ as a person ‘who professes the religion of Islam, habitually speaks the Malay language, conforms to Malay custom’. This constitutional assignment of an apparently immutable religious identity, conflating ethnicity with religious affiliation, is oppressive and falls below the Rawlsian standard of ‘decent nonliberal peoples’\textsuperscript{72} in precluding exit from the non-liberal group. Islamic constitutionalism is not monolithic, as the interpretation of syariah law is a contested terrain, but this example illustrates a conflict with liberal constitutionalism.

Where religion as meta-ideology defines right and justice, apostasy may be viewed not as an exercised right to religious freedom, but as a grave political act. As a state founded on religious imperatives requires a community of believers for sustenance, losing a member diminishes the community and threatens public order, as apprehended by an Islamic polity. Religious freedoms for Muslims are not individual entitlements, but interests subject to Islamic requirements. Only non-Muslims have religious conversion rights, as the attenuated religious rights of Malays are subject to laws protecting the religious community.

2. Communitarian Constitutionalism: Cultural Imperatives, Developmentalist Priorities

Within liberal polities, socio-political organization is founded on the impersonal application of universal legal norms and democracy is associated primarily with rights. This leads to an asymmetric neglect of civic duties, responsibilities, and the common good which non-liberal communitarian polities prioritized. Where communitarian constitutionalism is practised, insiders esteem group interests like social harmony and national loyalty as co-equal if not pre-eminent, to autonomist values. The socially embedded rather than unencumbered self is the adopted vision where the community plays a role in forming personal identity and moral choice, with the state committed to equipping citizens to participate in self-rule.

(Courts tend to play a secondary rather than counterbalancing role to democratic processes in adjudicating rights; in rejecting rights-based liberalism, a more balanced approach favours a relational framework predicated on mutual responsibility which seeks to optimize interdependence, individual rights, and public good. Political, rather than legal, constitutionalist forms are relied on to secure accountability by achieving a balance of political power through consensus-seeking schemes of participatory democracy.

As the government determines collective interests, the constitutionalist quality of communitarian polities depends on whether institutional structures conduce to an authentic representation of community will in discussing internal communal values, beyond majoritarian or elite will. Breslin argues that communitarian constitutions exist ‘only in premodern forms’\textsuperscript{73} lacking strong accountability mechanisms and objectivity insofar as they defend internally derived political values and lack the self-conscious articulation of constitutional constraints.\textsuperscript{74}

Communitarianism can too easily be invoked to promote statist values or constitutional authoritarianism, where the constitution is conceived as a tool of control, as associated with instrumentalist analysis of how communist parties utilize socialist constitutions to advance their agenda. To rein in its collectivizing impulse, community norms should realize some ‘overarching values’\textsuperscript{75} to allow some distance between the individual and the group; such polities should be pluralist to avoid perpetuating the exclusion of ‘historically marginalised groups’.\textsuperscript{76}

Prioritized collective interests may provide the justification for sustaining a ‘strong state’, where law facilitates effective government. The collective interest may be framed as protecting particularist communitarian cultures, often against the negative effects of Western liberal individualism; it may relate to promoting a national ideology or constitutional patriotism of sorts, in defining a diverse polity or constructing a nation by invoking common ideals or a shared future, in the absence of a historical nation.

The collective interest may be cast as an agenda for economic growth and development, requiring centralized state power able to maintain discipline and public order necessary to attract foreign investment and trade, which fuels economic take-off. This process is associated with the ‘Asian values’ model of law and development which economically successful East and South East Asian developmentalist states such as China, Singapore, and Malaysia, have articulated. This model, built on a thin rule of law which protects economic interests rather than political rights, posits that Western-style human rights and democracy be restricted until a certain level of development is attained as these are thought to flow sequentially rather than simultaneously through mutual reinforcement. Developmentally oriented authoritarian rulers aloof from interest-group politics are better able to provide long-term stability by securing compliance with predictable rules.

Arguably, constitutionalism may facilitate economic reform and continued economic activity in rapidly developing societies by offering citizens and investors reliable transparency and consolidating democracy, which promotes orderly debate and informational flows essential for efficient markets.

Economic liberalization has in some cases given way to political liberalization, as in Japan, South Korea, and Taiwan where culture influences the workings of liberal constitutionalist imports. For example, South Korean courts, in choosing to declare legislation ‘non-conformable’ with the constitution rather than inconsistent and void, have manifested a ‘Confucianist (p. 144) constitutionalism’ in seeking to enter into dialogue with the President and Assembly to urge legal reform, rather than to act confrontationally. This reflects the mode of remonstrance by which scholars sought to check the Emperor, who wielded indivisible powers, when he acted contrary to li or ritual propriety.

However, many Asian states with communitarian traditions are gradually liberalizing, while remaining committed to protecting a particular culture or religion. While constitutionalism is about constraining power, democracy is about accumulating power; ‘elections and authoritarianism’ combined have produced a form of illiberal democracy which perpetuates the strong state. That ‘decades of authoritarian governance in Africa … have yielded economic ruin, not development’ indicates that discipline and order alone do not produce economic growth; wise rulers, an anti-corruption culture, and ‘Asian values’, in the form of hard work, thrift, education, family—a kind of Protestant work ethic sans Western accent on individualism—are also required. This was the corrective to the egoism, dysfunctional families, and disrespect for public authority in the West.

Non-liberal religious and racially diverse polities like Malaysia and Singapore which inherited the British legacy of parliamentary democracy have drawn on culture, at least selectively, to construct a unifying national ideology. The brand of constitutionalism practised in Singapore is instructive in illustrating how rights, democracy, and national identity are addressed within non-liberal post-colonial constitutional orders driven by cultural imperatives and overriding economic priorities. The context is that of a strong, if not hegemonic, executive operating within a dominant party parliamentary system which has yet to experience political turnover, post-Independence; the dominant People’s Action Party (PAP) is able to amend the supreme Constitution at will, as it commands more than the required two-thirds super-majority. Singapore’s preferred ideological moorings are constructed by selective reference to traditional values and contained in a White Paper on ‘shared values’; this is a form of ‘soft constitutional law’ which, while not legally binding, has some legal effect in defining the polity’s character through hortatory norms, and appears to be reflected in judicial reasoning. Three points bear mention.

First, the communitarian bent of ‘nation before community and society above self’ is contrary to liberalism’s commitment to limited government and maximized individual freedoms. The White Paper rejects the American distrust of concentrated powers, rooted in the Humean view that men are knaves. Instead, neo-Confucianist influences are evident in asserting the ‘concept of government by honourable men (junzi)’, who are duty-bound to act rightly for the people who trust and respect them, ‘fits us better than the Western idea that a government should be given as limited powers as possible, and should always be treated with suspicion unless proven otherwise.’ Within the context of an elective democracy, the Confucian idea of rule by a trustworthy, virtuous, educated elite bears resonance, distinct from liberal constitutionalism’s preoccupation with external modes of accountability. This idea appears consistent with the heightened judicial valuation of the reputation of public men in political libel cases. Singaporean jurisprudence rejects the public figure doctrine and does not impute a heightened value to political speech; nor has free speech been fully theorized as serving democratic purposes through robust public debate. In balancing speech rights with reputational interests, two things have been emphasized. First, the common interest in providing sufficient protection to ‘sensitive and honourable men’ to ensure they are undeterred from seeking public office, where they may incur strong criticism. Secondly, the primacy of reputational interests; the High Court referenced Isocrates in underscoring the ‘utmost importance’ of character and an honourable name in inspiring trust and the ability to persuade one’s listeners. If the plaintiffs, who held high ministerial office, were not publicly vindicated of libellous accusations, this would immensely damage ‘their political reputation and moral authority as leaders’. As defamation law presupposes an image of how people are relationally situated, the conceptualization and valuation of reputation affects the scope of free expression. The Singaporean approach seems consonant with the treatment of reputation as a form of honour, which is associated with a ‘deference society’ where individuals in a stratified setting are unequal; here, honour is not an individual attribute or attainment but flows from an ascribed social status. Since it involves shared social perception, it is a public good; defamation law seeks to restore honour, which damages cannot comprehend. However, the award of onerous, punitive damages for political libel chills speech and discounts the value of political speech to democratic flourishing. Human dignity and the inviolability of personal honour outweighs liberal, free-speech conceptions, as embodied in US doctrine based on the marketplace of ideas and rational discourse.

Secondly, the value of ‘consensus instead of contention’ has manifested in the government's preferred brand of politics, the quality of democracy embodied in institution-making, and the role of the press. The idea of consensualist rather than adversarial politics is not unique to Singapore's brand of 'paternal democracy'—Indonesian President Sukarno rejected Western-style democracy in favour of a 'gotong royong democracy', which advocates cooperation and mutual agreement in decision making. However, the question of the inclusiveness of this process cannot be ignored. The Singaporean Constitution was amended to reconfigure the electoral system from single-member constituencies to include Group Representation Constituencies in 1988, contested by teams of between three and six; one member must belong to a stipulated minority community. The ostensible object was to enshrine multiracialism through an ethnically-based legislative quota, although the scheme was subsequently amended to add local governance functions through managing town councils, each headed by an elected parliamentarian. This motive was to curb voter irresponsibility, expressed through casting anti-PAP protest votes, by inducing voter sobriety in selecting not a demagogue but an effective representative able to run a town estate. This would stabilize the political system and, not coincidentally, buttress PAP political dominance. Reminiscent of colonial tutelage schemes, the government argued that the opposition, which won six of 87 elective seats in the 2011 General Elections, should first learn how to run an estate, before aspiring to run the state.

Additionally, two classes of unelected parliamentarians were created: the Non-Constituency (NCMP) and Nominated (NMP) Member of Parliament, both with diminished voting powers. The NCMP was uniquely designed to ensure a minimum number of parliamentary representatives not from the governing party. Up to three NCMP seats would be provided to the top three losing opposition candidates, provided none won a seat outright. They would form the adversarial component of the House. Conversely, the NMP scheme would produce a source of ‘constructive dissent’, where nine individuals with no party-political affiliation and who were distinguished in their fields would be selected by a parliamentary committee to provide ‘a range of independent and non-partisan’ views. Their expertise would enhance parliamentary debates as the PAP has regularly affirmed, subtly undermining opposition politicians. Both schemes have been cast as the PAP-guided evolution of the political system as society matures and a more educated citizenry wants to debate national matters, while preserving good governance in the form of a government representing the varied interests in a plural society but able to act decisively.

In this managed democracy, parliamentary institutions fostering a wider range of views may promote consensus-seeking and minimize confrontation, particularly through co-opting politically unaligned voices. However, having alternative views does not translate into the crucial political check of an alternative government; in fact, these institutions may consolidate the political status quo of a ‘strong state’, as the constitutional provision of up to 18 unelected parliamentarians (and 84 elected seats) might sate the desire for oppositional politics. If so, the legislative within such ‘electoral autocracies’ cannot effectively check an executive which controls an overwhelming majority of parliamentary seats.

In a democracy, the press wields tremendous power to influence public opinion without itself being accountable. The government's rejection of the press as the Fourth Estate or adversarial watchdog is also designed to mute... contention, being a realistic posture against journalistic bias, sensationalism, and profit motive. The Singaporean government has issued informal guidelines instructing the press to report the news as a ‘neutral medium’ rather than to advance political agendas. The executive urges a doctrine of responsible journalism, where the press acts as an instrument of nation-building rather than a check on political power, in explaining government policies in a consensus-building manner; criticisms must be constructive, not combative. The Court of Appeal has stated there is no room in Singapore for investigative journalism ‘which carries with it a political agenda’.93

Thirdly, ‘rights talk’ has become almost synonymous with liberal constitutionalism, where judicial review restraints government by excluding appeals to collective goals or utilitarianism to justify limiting rights. This suggests a prioritization of interests which constitutional rights are supposed to secure, which is not reflected in Singaporean communitarian jurisprudence. Rather than immunizing individual entitlement from collective welfare claims, rights in non-liberal polities may be qualified where government intervention and the social meaning this expresses is consistent with the polity’s character and priorities. While the shared values affirm the importance of ‘regard and community support for the individual’, the assertion that Asian societies like Singapore weigh group interests more heavily than individual ones tempers this. Thus, restricting individual due process, privacy, or equality rights in entrapment operations to curtail drug trafficking are justified by the social value of anti-drug-trafficking laws.90 Property rights are not personal entitlements but have a ‘public’ dimension carrying social obligations; individual rights must give way to the public weal, effectuated by compulsory land acquisition laws with minimal compensation.91

(p. 147) Rights are defeasible; ‘public order’, broadly construed, apparently trumps constitutional rights. Rights may be more usefully conceived structurally as ‘channeling the kinds of reasons government can invoke when it acts in certain ways’.92 Rights do not serve atomistic interests but realize common goods.

Preserving racial and religious harmony in multiracial and religiously diverse polities like Malaysia, Sri Lanka, and Singapore is an integral aspect of ‘public order’, a ground for restricting rights. Given the history of race riots in Peninsular Malaya and the position of the Chinese majority city-state of Singapore in a Malay-Muslim region, the ‘especial sensitivity’ of race and religion has domestic and geopolitical ramifications. The prospect of disrupting racial and religious harmony presents a bright line signalling the limits of free speech. Individuals making pejorative remarks against racial or religious minorities, particularly Malay-Muslims, have been successfully prosecuted under sedition laws for promoting feelings of ill-will or hostility between different races. Free speech is balanced against the interest of another’s ‘freedom from offence’ and the broader public interest, considering the potential harm to one racial group and society at large. A commitment to pluralism obliges Singaporeans to refrain from acts which incite ‘racial strife and violence’;93 thus, free speech is severely restricted where balanced against, or overwhelmed by, co-equal or prioritized communitarian concern in maintaining inter-religious peace and promoting the civic virtue of civility.

The fundamental imperative of ‘racial harmony’ stultifies public debate over sensitive issues, preventing a ‘deep understandings, and cultural boundary-crossings as befitting a liberal conceptualization of “multiculturalism”’.94 An individual-centric rights-oriented political culture is rejected in favour of a responsibilities- and public good-oriented discourse. While communitarian interests may legitimately define the contours of individual rights, without denuding them of content, the danger is that appeals to communitarianism guise the imposition of statist values in the name of expediency or efficiency. For example, a Singapore court justified a blanket ban rather than a proportionate targeted restriction on Jehovah’s Witnesses’ publications, because their beliefs oppose compulsory military service, as ‘any order other ... would have been impossible to monitor administratively’.95 This religious group had been deregistered under the Societies Act as their pacifist beliefs were considered ‘prejudicial to public welfare and good order’. Rather than requiring the demonstration of a substantial risk to public order to justify restricting constitutional liberties, the court structured the balancing process in terms of ascertaining whether the right had a tendency to detract from the ‘sovereignty, integrity and unity of Singapore’96 which was extra-textually declared a paramount constitutional mandate. The court’s statist orientation is also evident where, speaking in terms of rights limits, it conflated ‘public order’, which applies to general situations, with ‘national security’, which is reserved for exceptional situations relating to anti-subversion and emergency powers.97 Liberty interests are insufficiently protected where appeals to ‘public order’ in the balancing process are determinative, such that the prospect of any meaningful restraint on power is remote, and that of non-constitutionalist government, clear and present.
Constitutionalism in Illiberal Polities

III. Constitutions and Constitutionalism: The Possibility and Limits of Constitutionalism in Illiberal Polities

Human societies are shaped by unique sets of values and institutions which are expressed in a constitution as the fundamental law; functionally, constitutionalism is “the ideal of establishing some form of effective and regularised restraint on the government”,98 through procedural or substantive limits. Constitutions may adopt non-liberal approaches towards empowering and restraining governments as constitutionalism, in securing ‘the political conditions necessary to a relatively decent human life’ is essentially ‘not about individual rights but fettered power’.99

Liberal or modern constitutionalism which delineates state structures in ‘distinctly rationalist terms’ has been criticized for its inability to handle non-individualist societies or to engage in more honest discussions of the vision of good a state promises, constraining ‘our social and political possibilities’.100 As Katz observed, forms of constitutionalism have been ‘conceptualised and practised outside of the western democracies’; until the end of the Cold War, socialist constitutionalism was the dominant competing model. This has declined in importance outside China, Vietnam, and Cuba,101 whose constitutions do not effectively constrain but place power at the Communist Party’s disposal to service its constitutionally accorded leading role.102 The dangers of nominal constitutionalism notwithstanding, the Third World seeks ‘starkly alternative varieties of constitutionalism’.103

Reminiscent of Huntington’s clash of civilizations vision, theocratic and communitarian constitutionalism present alternative trajectories of constitutional orderings in non-liberal settings where cultural and religious identities or group moral solidarity is central to the polity’s character. While the constitutional recognition of communal identity may be legitimating in the eyes of the governed in illiberal polities, care must be taken to impede their ‘more worrisome expressions’104 where governors seek to implement principles drawn from an exclusive ethnico-religious or ideological regime in absolutist fashion. Non-liberal constitutionalism must not degenerate into becoming an anticonstitutionalist ‘darling of fascists’.105 This danger is apparent in certain types of communitarian societies where people with shared ends fulfill socially assigned roles derived from culture, religion, or totalizing ideology, as in caste-based, fascist, or communist systems. It also exists in post-colonial patrimonial states where developmentalist imperatives justify recentralizing state power through various mechanisms, which may be constitutionally specified, such as judicial ouster clauses or anti-subversion preventive detention laws which may be abused to quash political dissent. Such ‘constitutional dictatorships’ utilize constitutional forms to legitimate and effectuate their rule, to justify maximum state discretion while minimizing legal and political forms of accountability.106

(p. 149) An exclusive focus on the dominant view of liberal constitutionalism which is closely aligned with the judicial enforcement of a binding ‘higher’ law, runs the risk of insularity oblivious to the varieties of legal culture and the possibilities of alternative constitutionalisms. Hahm, for example, in taking culture seriously, directs attention to the importance of civic virtue, not only institutions and rights, in the proper functioning of constitutionalism. He examines the role of ‘li’, or ritual propriety, in Confucianist East Asian settings and argues that the state has a non-neutral interest in inculcating li not only through the political education of its citizens, but also in its constitutionalist application in disciplining rulers. Historically, this was buttressed by institutional mechanisms such as the constant surveillance of rulers by court historians who recorded what a king as a ‘rites-bearer’ during the Korean Choson dynasty said or did. The focus on internal forms of restraint is a reminder of the ‘importance of the human dimension in political order’.107

Within illiberal polities, unusual routes towards democratization and constitutionalism in terms of regulated power, may also be observed from developments in intra-party democracy in China, even though the Community Chinese Party (CCP), in assuming total political power, would fall without the liberal understanding of party. While multipartyism is rejected, developments within the party have ensured some measure of accountability and representation, a socialist rule of law distinct from Western-style democracy or the trichotomy of powers. The CCP has become more inclusive in opening membership to capitalists; in 2000, Jiang Zemin advocated the idea of sange daibiao (‘three represents’), to ensure the CCP represented the entire nation. Downplaying the CCP’s revolutionary nature as the workers’ party, the CCP presents itself as faithfully representing the majority of Chinese people, the requirements of the most advanced forms of production, and the most advanced culture.108

A form of constitutionalism is evident in the creeping popular consciousness galvanizing the assertion of claims based on non-judicially enforceable rights in socialist constitutions. For example, citizens in Hanoi, Vietnam, joined in a popular outcry against an ‘unconstitutional’ police regulation allowing each citizen to register only one motorcycle, which was assailed as violating constitutional property rights. Through populist pressure with the aid of the media, the national assembly eventually supported the annulment of these rules. This notable vindication of individual rights did not threaten the political status quo; its focus on economic interests opened the space for a ‘safe constitutionalism’. 109

The self-restraint of virtuous rulers, intra-party democracy, and the populist path towards constitutionalism have inherent limitations, not least, the lack of effective legal remedies for constitutional violations. Communitarian and theocratic constitutional orders in their search for identity and authority may not sufficiently restrain abuses of public power or articulate a substantive articulation of the good and common life which is satisfactorily inclusive. Nonetheless, engaging these situations lends insight into the functions and possibilities of constitutions and how they frame politics in non-liberal polities; it tempers parochialism by cautioning against too easily considering one constitutional model inevitable, desirable, and generally transplantable, thereby contributing to the development of more pluralistic conceptions of constitutionalism in a postmodern and plural world.

Bibliography

Constitutionalism in Illiberal Polities

Mark D. Rosen, ‘“Illiberal” Societal Cultures, Liberalism and American Constitutionalism’ (2002) 12 Journal of Contemporary Legal Issues 803

Michel Rosenfeld (ed), Constitutionalism, Identity, Difference and Legitimacy: Theoretical Perspectives (1994)

Constitutionalism in Illiberal Polities

Charles Taylor, A Secular Age (2007)

Li-ann Thio, ‘Jurisdictional Imbroglio: Civil and Religious Courts, Turf Wars and Article 121(1A) of the Federal Constitution’ in Andrew Harding and H.P. Lee (eds), Constitutional Landmarks in Malaysia: The First 50 Years (2007) (p. 152)

Li-ann Thio and Kevin Y.L. Tan (eds), Evolution of a Revolution: 40 Years of the Singapore Constitution (2009)

Juinn-Rong Yeh and Wen-Chen Chang, ‘The Emergence of East Asia Constitutionalism: Features in Comparison’ (2011) 59(3) American Journal of Comparative Law 805

Notes:

(1) On constitutionalism more generally, see Chapter 8.
Constitutionalism in Illiberal Polities

(3) Anti-liberal Carl Schmitt considered that constitutions were illiberal in nature, appreciating that state preservation sometimes requires suspending the legal order: Constitutional Theory (1928).

(14) Beer (n 4), 14.

(15) Rosenfeld (n 11), 502, 508.

(21) See Chapter 43.

(22) Walker (n 2), 170–1.

(23) Ibid 176.

(26) Ibid 201.
(27) Walker (n 18), 315, 319.
(29) Ibid 327.
(31) Ibid 188.
(32) Ibid 186.
(34) Breslin (n 30), 187.
(36) Breslin (n 30), 186.
(37) Art 2(1), Grundgesetz, GG.
(38) Breslin (n 30), 184.
(40) Ibid 200–1.
(41) BVerfGE 12 (7 July 1970).
(49) Thai Constitution, sec 79 (2007).
(50) On Islam and the constitutional order, see Chapter 62.
(51) Rabb (n 46), 577.
Constitutionalism in Illiberal Polities

(56) Constitution of the Maldives, Art 9(d).

(58) Ibid 131.

(60) Constitution of Iran, Art 57.

(61) Tezcur (n 44), 486.

(62) Constitution of Iran, Art 91.

(63) Ibid Art 5.

(64) Ibid Art 3.

(65) Ibid Arts 19–42.

(66) Cata-Becker (n 57), 155.

(68) Constitution of Egypt, Arts 1, 2, 3.

(70) [2004] 2 MLJ 119 (High Court).

(73) Breslin (n 30), 149.

(74) Ibid 181.

(91) Li-ann Thio, ‘Protecting Rights’ in Li-ann Thio and Kevin Tan (eds), The Evolution of a Revolution: 40 Years of the Singapore Constitution (2009), 193, 200.

(95) Colin Chan v PP [1994] 3 SLR 662, 687C.

(96) Ibid 684.

(97) See Chapter 21.

(99) Walker (n 2), 164.

(100) Butler Ritchie (n 17), 30–2.

(101) See n 14.

(103) See n 13.

(104) Walker (n 2), 155.

(105) Ibid 177.

(107) Chaihark Hahm, ‘Constitutionalism, Confucian Civic Virtue and Ritual Propriety’ in Daniel Bell and Chae-bong...

Li-Ann Thio
Li-Ann Thio is Professor of Law, Faculty of Law, National University of Singapore
I. Introduction 153
II. Impoverishment and its Pervasiveness 155
III. The Imperatives of Development and Poverty Eradication: Skepticism about Constitutionalism and the Appeal of ‘Developmental States’ 156
IV. The Symbiotic Relationship between Development and Freedom: Sen’s Scholarly Work and Empirical Assessments 159
V. Country Case Studies: Ethiopia and India 162
   1. Ethiopia 162
   2. India 165

VI. Conclusion 168

I. Introduction

We live in times that are simultaneously marked by unrivaled opulence and extreme forms of suffering and deprivation. This has led the contemporary philosopher, Thomas Pogge, to fervently argue that the occurrence and persistence of global poverty is the great moral wrong and injustice of our time.¹

(p. 154) Combating impoverishment² has been the focus of several disciplines and fields, but has not attracted sufficient attention from scholars of constitutional and comparative constitutional law. We believe that this has happened for at least two reasons. The first arises from a tendency internal to constitutional law and scholarship, which has long treated social and economic rights—that seek to address the issues underlying impoverishment—as being outside the proper domain of constitutional law. A number of scholars have persuasively argued against this conventional wisdom and have demonstrated how and why socio-economic rights are properly within the realm of constitutional law and adjudication.3

Our contribution focuses on the second—and perhaps more fundamental—reason for the absence of issues of impoverishment on the horizon of constitutional scholarship. This arises from skepticism towards the idea that the discipline of constitutional law has anything to contribute to the project of eliminating impoverishment. In this view, a prerequisite for the practice of constitutionalism is a minimum level of economic, political, and social development, making issues of basic poverty lie beyond the pale of constitutional discourse. Advocates of such a form of ‘sequencing’—who recommend focusing on economic development and institution-building before promoting democracy and freedom—have a long historical pedigree even within liberal thought. So, for instance, J.S. Mill's ideal of a liberalism that secured the conditions for the flourishing of individuality rested on having reached a degree of civilizational progress ‘when mankind have become capable of being improved by free and equal discussion’.4 After examining this view at some length in the first section of this chapter, we shift our focus to scholars who argue against such a view, by advocating for the simultaneous pursuit of constitutionalism and poverty eradication. They argue that a focus on impoverishment is essential because issues that underlie impoverishment are inextricably linked to other social problems emanating from inequality in general, asymmetric distribution of wealth and power, inadequate access to basic services and needs, and forms of institutional corruption. Most of these problems are in one form or the other very much the concern of mainstream constitutional discourse.

Our principal purpose, therefore, is to explore and ascertain the relevance and application of principles of constitutionalism for issues of impoverishment. We conclude from our survey that there is a deep connection between them, and seek to explore how constitutionalism can be—and has been—harnessed to eradicate impoverishment in meaningful ways. Through our case studies, we also seek to highlight precise ways in which the existence of deep and pervasive impoverishment poses real challenges for attaining the ideals of constitutionalism. We believe that a wider acknowledgment of this connection can lead to productive exchanges across more jurisdictions on ways in which poverty reduction can be accelerated through the use of constitutional institutions and principles.

(p. 155) It is necessary to explain what we mean by the term ‘constitutionalism’. The classic definitions of the term focus on ways by which political authority exercised through the agencies of the state are to be limited, constrained, and contained.5 However, in the case of constitutions that were drafted more recently, and especially in countries that were grappling with problems of impoverishment, there was a keen awareness that states had to be empowered to undertake programs for the eradication of impoverishment and the crippling socio-economic conditions that accompany it.6 In our conception of the term, constitutionalism aims at simultaneously constraining and facilitating the state in its attempts at advancing the negative and positive freedoms of its citizenry, which are the ultimate goals of constitutional institutions and principles.

II. Impoverishment and its Pervasiveness

Our understanding of ‘poverty’ and impoverishment as used in this chapter is shaped by the capability approach, initially devised by Amartya Sen.7 Sen developed the capability approach to draw contrasts between the utilitarians (who focus on individual happiness or pleasure) and mainstream economists (who assess a person's advantage in terms of his or her income, wealth, or resources), both of which, in Sen's view, inadequately capture the real-world impact of impoverishment. Sen’s capability approach focuses, instead, on ‘a person's capability to do things he or she has reason to value.’8 Elsewhere, Sen has explained that ‘What the capability perspective does in poverty analysis is to enhance the understanding of the nature and causes of poverty and deprivation.’ This is achieved ‘by shifting primary attention away from means (and one particular means that is usually given exclusive attention, viz, income) to ends that people have reason to pursue, and, correspondingly, to the freedoms to be able to satisfy these ends.’9

Poverty is a widespread phenomenon. Pogge cites statistics to show that nearly a quarter of the world’s population—estimated at 6.8 billion at the time of writing—is living in life-threatening poverty. As he emphasizes in a recent work:

1020 million people are chronically undernourished; 884 million lack access to safe drinking water; 2,500 million lack access to improved sanitation; 2,000 million lack access to essential medicines; 924 million lack adequate shelter; 1,600 million lack electricity; 774 million adults (p. 156) are illiterate; 218 million children are child labourers; ... and about 18 million deaths annually, or nearly one-third of all human deaths, are due to poverty-related causes.¹⁰

Not surprisingly, the challenge of impoverishment is sharpest in the Global South. In many of these nations, there is a strong need to combat impoverishment at a domestic level. This is where notions of constitutionalism become relevant, especially for countries in Asia, Africa, and South America, which face the gravest levels of impoverishment.

III. The Imperatives of Development and Poverty Eradication: Skepticism about Constitutionalism and the Appeal of ‘Developmental States’

Questions of addressing impoverishment are inextricably linked with issues relating to the appropriateness of societal goals and avenues to pursue them. Whether societal justice in relation to issues such as poverty elimination is better achieved by state intervention or by individuals acting for themselves has long been a focus of academic debate in social and political theory and in developmental economics.¹¹

In the aftermath of the Second World War and the decolonization movement, several states across Asia and Africa experienced nationalist movements and leaders who promised to pursue socio-economic development and eradicate poverty. Yet, six decades later, relatively few of these states have succeeded. While several reasons have been identified, scholars of developmental studies have focused on the state of politics in many post-colonial nations—especially the politics of their systems of bureaucratic appointments—that resulted in discontinuity and uncertainty in their bureaucratic capacity, which in turn subverted the achievement of developmental goals.

More recently, especially in the second half of the twentieth century, the ‘developmental states’ in East Asia (including Japan, Korea, Taiwan, and Hong Kong) and South East Asia (Singapore, Malaysia, and more recently Indonesia and Thailand) have garnered attention for achieving spectacular growth, reducing or eliminating impoverishment, and building strong welfare systems. The term ‘developmental state’ was first used by Chalmers Johnson in the early 1980s to refer to the Japanese state.¹² Johnson identified some crucial features of the developmental state in Japan, the first of which was the intimacy of its relationship with the private sector, and the intensity of its involvement in the market. Another significant feature was the power, continuity, and autonomy of the elite bureaucracy.

In contrast with the failures of many post-colonial developing nations within Asia and Africa in achieving developmental goals, the Asian developmental states have been able to extract capital; generate and implement national plans; manipulate private access to scarce resources; coordinate the efforts of individual businesses; target specific industrial projects; resist political pressures from popular forces such as consumers and organized labour; insulate their domestic economies from extensive foreign capital penetration; and, most (p. 157) especially, carry through a sustained project of ever-improving productivity, technological sophistication and increased market share.¹³

The nature, scale and speed of the transformation can be demonstrated by focusing on a single country: Singapore. In 1970, Singapore’s per capita GDP was less than half that of the United Kingdom. Within three decades, this situation had transformed: in 1998, Singapore’s GDP per capita was greater than that of the United Kingdom and was much closer to that of the United States. Looking at factors beyond income, the 1990 Human Development Report (HDR) notes that between 1960 and 1987, Singapore was one of the countries that made the “fastest progress” towards increasing the average life expectation of its citizens.¹⁴ Singapore also scores highly on other indices such as rates of adult literacy and home ownership, access to safe water, educational and health services, and basic goods, while simultaneously securing one of the lowest infant mortality rates in the world.

Nevertheless, it must be emphasized that these developmental states fare quite poorly on measures highlighted by most models of constitutional democracy. In general, nations in East and South East Asia have had a poor to middling record on issues of civil and political rights. In many of them, there has been a substantial concentration of political, ideological, and military power in the hands of the state. In several countries, this has been achieved or exacerbated by the continuity of a single, dominant political party. As a logical corollary, civil society and media have traditionally been weak (although this has changed in some, such as Taiwan and South Korea) and... opportunities for public participation in crucial decisions are inhibited. The state adopts a highly interventionist role in most matters relating to individual autonomy and freedoms, and has avoided attempts at making it transparent and accountable. Several of these states have made extensive use of emergency powers and preventative detention laws to suppress opposition movements and assert the dominance of the ruling political parties.\textsuperscript{15}

While a few of the developmental states in East and South East Asia have made strides towards constitutional democracy, some others have expressed great hostility towards such notions. Leaders such as Mahathir Mohammed in Malaysia and, perhaps more famously, Lee Kuan Yew in Singapore, have argued quite forcefully that their impressive achievements on economic development and poverty elimination have been secured by explicitly repudiating the standard norms, practices, and expectations of constitutional democracy. These leaders have argued for the virtues of ‘development before democracy’ and have espoused a strong, culturally based ‘Asian Values’-approach to governance.\textsuperscript{16} According to this view, freedoms and rights hamper economic growth and development. Such ideas justifying a ‘soft authoritarian’ state run against many of the axioms of constitutionalism because, as noted by scholars in the region, ‘the ideas of separation of powers, limited government and fundamental rights appear to be cast to the wind’.\textsuperscript{17}

(p. 158) The notion of the developmental state is also witnessing a revival in the discourse of contemporary African states. More specifically, the dominant ruling parties in South Africa\textsuperscript{18} and Ethiopia\textsuperscript{19} have endorsed the developmental state paradigm as the model to emulate.

What has made such a stance salient is that China seems to be following suit—indeed, this is the argument of a leading China scholar, Randall Peerenboom, who uses the term ‘East Asian model’ to capture the experiences of some of the Asian developmental states that we have covered above. According to Peerenboom, the East Asian model consists of several stages.\textsuperscript{20} In the early stages, there is ‘an emphasis on economic growth, rather than civil and political rights’ which results in ‘a period of rapid economic growth occurring under authoritarian regimes.’ This stage is also characterized by a pragmatic approach to economic reforms, along with simultaneous investment in human capital and institutions. As Peerenboom asserts, this model requires the postponement of democratization in the sense of freely contested multiple-party elections for the highest levels of political office until a relatively high level of wealth is attained. Relying on the cases of South Korea and Taiwan, Peerenboom asserts that as overall income levels in society rise, gradually authoritarianism will give way to constitutionalism and its institutions and principles, including the protection of civil and political rights. In Peerenboom's analysis, China and Vietnam are at the relatively early stages of this model, and are consequently less democratized. A considerable part of Peerenboom’s argument relies on the strides that China has made in eradicating impoverishment, especially when compared to other developing nations. As Peerenboom notes, China has secured a stunning rise in wealth that has ‘lifted over 150 million people out of poverty in less than a decade, and improved the quality of life of hundreds of millions more.’\textsuperscript{21}

Peerenboom does concede, however, that there are genuine concerns about the numbers being impoverished as a result of state policies in China, including the plight of migrant workers and the effects on the availability of health services once the Chinese state withdrew its protective policies.\textsuperscript{22} Moreover, Przeworski et al note that such spectacular successes are quite rare when viewed against a much larger set of cases.\textsuperscript{23} Declaring categorically that they ‘did not find a shred of evidence that democracy need be sacrificed on the altar of development’, Przeworski et al provide reasons to doubt the viability of the East Asian model as a prescriptive formula for developing nations that are seeking to eradicate impoverishment.\textsuperscript{24}

This discussion necessitates a reference to the ‘law and development’ movement which has more recently focused on ‘rule of law’ projects as a way of tackling problems of development in countries in the Global South.\textsuperscript{25} The end of the Cold War witnessed a resurgence of the previously discredited idea that reforming the law and legal system was essential for bringing about social and economic progress. Consequently, there was a revival of large-scale projects involving huge sums of money: according to one analysis, the World Bank has supported 330 rule of law projects in over a 100 countries between 1990 and 2006, spending about $3.8 billion since 1993.\textsuperscript{26} The phase since the 1990s has been described as the ‘new’ law and development movement, to distinguish it from the ‘original’ movement, which lasted from the 1950s to the 1970s.\textsuperscript{27}

These rule of law projects typically encompass a range of policy objectives and have included reforming public institutions, rewriting laws, upgrading the legal profession, and increasing legal access and advocacy. These in turn have covered a vast array of subjects including judicial reform, legislative strengthening, retraining prosecutors, police and prison reform, bolstering public defenders, introducing alternative dispute resolution, modernizing criminal laws, updating civil laws, introducing new commercial laws, strengthening bar associations, improving legal education, stimulating public interest law reforms, and many others.\textsuperscript{28} It would seem, therefore, that the term ‘rule of law’ is perceived as a flexible concept which allows reformers to bring in both macro and micro elements that they believe would suit their overall purposes. There is by now a vast and sophisticated literature underlining the essentially indeterminate, amorphous, and contested nature of the concept of the ‘rule of law’.\textsuperscript{29}

Despite their scale, the achievements of these projects are not considered spectacular, even by their most ardent supporters. While many reasons for such failure have been identified, one line of criticism notes that meaningful legal reform requires not so much a focus upon foreign models or institutional goals, but ‘close attention to, genuine respect for, and detailed knowledge of the conditions of the receiving society and its pre-existing mechanisms of social order.’\textsuperscript{30}

The concept of the rule of law is generally regarded as one of the tenets of constitutionalism. However, the failure of rule of law projects does not suggest a failure of constitutional projects as a whole, because a commitment to constitutionalism requires taking the local context and legal culture seriously, while also enabling local voices to play a prominent role, which does not appear to have been the case in most such projects.

IV. The Symbiotic Relationship between Development and Freedom: Sen’s Scholarly Work and Empirical Assessments

As seen in the previous section, the notion that development and constitutionalism are competing ideas has a fairly old pedigree. Responses to this notion, which emphasize the symbiotic rather than adversary relationship between these ideas, are also not new. Writing around (p. 160) the time that the ‘Asian Values’ discourse was beginning to be articulated in the early 1990s, the American scholar Louis Henkin argued that just as there cannot be any freedom or dignity without development, there could not, equally, be any authentic development without freedom.\textsuperscript{31}

The work of Amartya Sen has powerfully built on this idea of the symbiotic relationship between development and freedom by developing it within the discipline of economics and relying on wide-ranging empirical studies.

In his 1981 book, Poverty and Famines, Sen made his famous claim about the role of democracies in preventing famines by showing, through detailed empirical analysis, that there has never been a famine in a functioning multi-party democracy. Sen based his argument on the political incentives generated by elections, multiparty politics, and investigative journalism. He argued that in non-democracies, political leaders do not have to suffer the consequences of their failure to prevent famines. By contrast, in democracies, leaders have political incentives to prevent situations that threaten to generate famines. Moreover, the processes of democracy—a free press and news media (which is unabashed in exposing embarrassing facts about governance) and strong opposition parties—provide vital information that enable governments to act decisively in a pre-emptive manner. This has led Sen to argue that ‘a free press and an active political opposition constitute the best early-warning system a country threatened by famines can have.’\textsuperscript{32}

As argued in Sen’s classic work, Development as Freedom:

Development requires the removal of major sources of unfreedom: poverty as well as tyranny, poor economic opportunity as well as systematic social deprivation, neglect of public facilities as well as intolerance or overactivity of repressive states. ... In still other cases, the violations of freedom result directly from a denial of political and civil liberties by authoritarian regimes and from imposed restrictions on the freedom to participate in the social, political and economic life of the community.\textsuperscript{33}

Sen argues that even affluent citizens living in authoritarian regimes are subject to impoverishment, and asserts that ‘the significance of the instrumental role of political freedom as means to development does not in any way reduce the evaluative importance of freedom as an end of development.’\textsuperscript{34} Sen contends that dismissing civil and political rights misses both their instrumental and constructive roles. As an example, he notes that Indian states (like Kerala) have achieved greater success in moderating population growth by using methods such as public education and discussion among women than comparable policies of coercion in China on the one-child policy.
have garnered. These normative arguments can be interpreted as making the case for a robust constitutional democracy that prioritizes social justice issues and moves towards eradicating impoverishment. While Sen acknowledges the importance of well-functioning institutions, he is careful to argue that ‘democracy has to be judged not just by the institutions that formally exist but by the extent to which different voices from diverse sections of the people can actually be heard.’\textsuperscript{35} We believe that this fits well with the more robust form of constitutionalism that is required to tackle issues of impoverishment at a fundamental level.

Is there empirical evidence to assess whether freedoms and rights do in fact hamper the achievement of economic growth and development?

\textit{\textsuperscript{p. 161}} For this chapter, we conducted a study of the ten poorest countries in the contemporary world, as ranked by the 2010 HDR.\textsuperscript{36} These countries, ranked 169th to 160th in ascending order, are: Zimbabwe, Democratic Republic of Congo, Niger, Burundi, Mozambique, Guinea-Bissau, Chad, Liberia, Burkina Faso, and Mali. Some of these countries are landlocked, sparsely populated, and in arid localities. These and a host of related demographic, geographic, political, as well as external factors create some form of ‘poverty trap.’\textsuperscript{37} Debate regarding causes of extreme poverty in these nations has focused on whether external, as opposed to internal factors such as ‘destiny’ or ‘policy’, are to blame.\textsuperscript{38} The state of constitutionalism in these countries has not received much attention as a factor that might have contributed to the prevalence of impoverishment.

From our perspective, it is significant that all these countries have had dismal records of constitutionalism. Recurrent coup d’états, civil wars, military and civilian authoritarian dictatorships, and one-party regimes have been the norm in these countries for the greater part of the second half of the twentieth century. Constitutions in these nations have been routinely abrogated and disregarded.\textsuperscript{39} The cavalier attitude towards constitutionalism is best illustrated by the case of the Democratic Republic of Congo (the former Zaire) which experienced 21 legal instruments dubbed as constitutions during a 40-year period, under the kleptocratic autocracy of Mobutu Sese Seko.\textsuperscript{40} While these facts do not necessarily imply that the absence of constitutionalism leads to poverty, they show that there is a significant correlation between governments which are not subject to constitutional restraint and arbitrariness, economic mismanagement, and corruption which in turn beget poverty.

This correlation between the virtual absence of constitutionalism and extreme poverty is extremely consistent. ‘Poor people are much more likely to be ruled by dictators.’\textsuperscript{41} Part of the reason why constitutionalism failed in these countries concerns their economic situation. Nevertheless, it seems that the lack of constitutionalism has also contributed to the economic disasters in these countries.

Studies also show that in low-income countries where there is ethnic diversity, dictatorial rule is extremely detrimental to the economy. Focusing on the experience of African countries, the economist Paul Collier argues that autocrats in poor, ethnically diverse African countries are forced to make dysfunctional choices in order to appease their ethnic bases.\textsuperscript{42} He therefore argues that ‘judged by economic performance, ethnically diverse societies need democracy more than those that are homogeneous’.\textsuperscript{43} This is so because, although autocrats often claim to transcend ethnic divisions, in reality, at least in Africa, they have a narrow ethnic base which they try to strengthen through networks of patronage detrimental to the \textit{\textsuperscript{p. 162}} national economy.\textsuperscript{44} This observation is relevant for our analysis in the next section of this chapter, where we focus in greater detail on two nations that have had to tackle impoverishment against the backdrop of diverse, heterogeneous populations.

\textbf{V. Country Case Studies: Ethiopia and India}

Ethiopia and India are the second largest nations in their respective continents. We chose them primarily because of our own respective familiarity with these countries. Nevertheless, we believe that their contrasting experiences hold important lessons for those interested in exploring the connections between constitutionalism and impoverishment.

\textbf{1. Ethiopia}

Ethiopia’s current constitution, adopted in 1995, sought to address persistent and endemic poverty by adopting some radical programs that were given constitutional sanction. As our analysis of the Ethiopian case will show, while constitutionalism offers promise for eradicating impoverishment (even if negatively, by demonstrating the perils of autocratic, non-constitutional government), the persistence of impoverishment also presents fundamental challenges for securing constitutionalism.
Constitutionalism and Impoverishment: A Complex Dynamic

Ethiopia is the second most populous nation in Africa, with a current population of 85.2 million. Its political history has been marked by long periods of monarchical rule, a brief period of foreign rule under the Italians (1936–41), the return of the monarchy (1941–74), rule by a military regime that had the backing of the Soviet Union (1974–91), and an embrace of constitutional government (1991–present) that is still incomplete and remains politically fragile. In large part because of its long history of feudalism and political instability, Ethiopia is one of the poorest countries in the world, and ranks 157th out of 169 countries in the 2010 UN Human Development Index.

Prior to the adoption of the current Constitution, Ethiopia had three different constitutions. Much of the political instability in the last five decades has been caused due to the recurrence of large-scale famines and attendant problems of acute poverty. The first written constitution of Ethiopia was adopted in 1931 which, like the 1955 Revised Constitution, enshrined an absolute monarchy. After the 1974 ‘Revolution’ and rule through decrees by a ‘Provisional Military Administration Council’ (Deurge) that lasted for 13 years, a new constitution instituting a ‘People's Democratic Republic’ was adopted in 1987. This Constitution lasted only for four years and was replaced by a Transitional Charter adopted in 1991 when rebel forces triumphed over the military regime and took power. The Transitional Charter laid the foundations for the adoption of the current Constitution in 1995, called the Constitution of the Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia (FDRE Constitution).

The 1995 Constitution sought to provide the foundation for a federal democratic republic. It instituted a federal form of state with nine ‘regional states’ (most of which are formed on the basis of ethnicity), provided for a parliamentary form of government at the federal level, and included an extensive catalog of rights. There are, however, some unusual features of the Constitution. First among these is the state/public ownership of all land, which is provided for in Article 40(3) of the FDRE Constitution. Significantly, state ownership of all land and the prohibition of private ownership of land precede the current Constitution. When it assumed power in 1974, one of the first decrees issued by the Provisional Military Administration Council related to the nationalization of land. During the 1974 Ethiopian Revolution, Marxism was the dominant ideological outlook among the politically active sections of the population, most of whom were students. The Military Council, reflecting the ideological leanings of the political movement that ushered in the revolution, opted for state ownership of land by abolishing the feudal land-holding system set up by the ancien regime. The Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) is the political party that overthrew the military regime in 1991, and was the principal proponent of the current constitution. Its genesis lies in the student movement of the early 1970s because of which its political orientation is strongly to the left. The EPRDF argues that given the absence of a middle class and a large, autonomous, strong, and vibrant private sector, liberal democracy is not a feasible option for Ethiopia in the foreseeable future. Not surprisingly, therefore, the need for Article 40(3) has been defended by the EPRDF as justified and necessitated by the impoverishment and vulnerability of peasants.

This argument has been challenged by other Ethiopians, including most of the opposition parties, who contend that the need to ensure economic growth and food security makes it necessary to introduce private ownership of land. Advocates of this view note that unless farmers enjoy the security of tenure that only ownership can guarantee, they would be unable to make the investments needed to improve the productivity of the land. Since the livelihood of more than 80 per cent of the population is based on land, and given the gravity of food insecurity in Ethiopia, the Constitution's position on land ownership is both crucial and controversial. The insistence of the Ethiopian state on maintaining state ownership of land is, however, unusual within the continent of Africa where many nations had similar land tenure systems.

Although the FDRE Constitution guarantees the enjoyment of civil and political rights, constitutional practice over the last decade has shown this to be illusory. Freedoms of expression, the press, association, and assembly are routinely violated. The generous guarantees of constitutionalized socio-economic rights have proved to be irrelevant in the practice of Ethiopian constitutionalism, as has the provision guaranteeing the right to development. The promise of democratic governance embodied in the Constitution has yet to be realized after three largely uncompetitive elections and one competitive but controversial general election. The elections held in 2005 were marred by post-election violence that led to the arrest and conviction of the leaders of the major opposition party coalition, human rights NGOs, and journalists on charges of treason and outrage against the Constitution. Politically motivated arrests and charges of terrorism against members of certain ethnic groups occur at alarming
Constitutionalism and Impoverishment: A Complex Dynamic

The general picture is one where constitutionalism seems imperiled.

(p. 164) The causal link between Ethiopia's poverty and the bleak state of its constitutionalism is difficult to determine with any certainty. However, given the fact that some African countries (including Benin, Mali, and Ghana) have managed to maintain a working constitutional democracy despite a high level of poverty, the misfortune of impoverishment in Ethiopia cannot be considered in and of itself as having doomed constitutionalism to failure.

The Ethiopian case also enables us to assess, in line with the 'developmental state' logic, whether the dismal state of constitutionalism might have given Ethiopia an advantage in bringing about economic growth. Looking at relevant comparators, it is clear that Ethiopia has not enjoyed an advantage over similarly situated African countries. Ethiopia's progress towards meeting the Millennium Development Goals has not been superior to that of Mali or Ghana, for instance. These comparisons show that the exercise of power without constitutional restraints and democratic accountability does not necessarily give a state an edge in reducing poverty. If anything, it makes corruption, instability, and conflict more likely, thereby derailing prospects of development.

Ethiopia's history also allows us to reflect upon the detrimental effect of unlimited and unaccountable power upon development. Development is more often than not possible only when violence is reduced. There is a clear causal link between human rights abuses, severe corruption, discrimination, and ethnic, religious, and regional competition and violent conflicts. These factors are more likely to contribute to the eruption of violence in a state where the constitutional system has failed to curb abuse of power. The long civil wars that have immensely contributed to poverty in Ethiopia attest to this fact. Therefore, it seems safe to assert that, far from hampering development, constitutionalism could foster it by staving off violent conflicts. At least in the Ethiopian context, arguments in favor of benign authoritarian governments that are unconstrained by constitutional limits, while still advanced regularly, seem less and less convincing.

We have hitherto sought to use the Ethiopian case to provide support for our normative argument, relying on Sen's work, that constitutionalism is a potential ally for societies struggling with challenges of impoverishment. We must equally emphasize, however, that poverty makes it very difficult to realize the ideal of constitutionalism. In this regard, we can derive three important lessons from the Ethiopian experience. The first is that when citizens are economically impoverished, they are more vulnerable to pressures by the state than they would otherwise be. The poorer citizens are, and the more the state controls resources needed for survival, the easier it is for the state's relative economic might to be turned into an instrument of political repression. In Ethiopia, at any given time, at least a few million or so citizens suffer from food insecurity and are dependent on state programs for their survival. Since all land is state-owned and could be subject to redistribution, possessors of the land receive only a nominal compensation. This is particularly true in rural areas where the overwhelming majority of the population lives. In urban areas, the state is the main provider of employment, education, housing, and often the principal client for many key private businesses. All of these positions of the state as the sole landlord, as a major aid distributor, as provider of jobs, business, and social services on top of its coercive and regulatory powers enable it to wield enormous control over the lives of ordinary citizens. The economic standing and might of the state in relation to its citizens is such that ordinary constitutional constraints in the form of a bill of rights and separation of powers seem to provide precious little restraint on the Leviathan.

A second way in which the ideal of constitutionalism is undermined by poverty relates to the inability of people who are suffering under the weight of poverty, malnourishment, malaria, and illiteracy to assert their rights or sustain a meaningful degree of civic engagement. These conditions are hardly ideal for constitutionalism. In a situation where 39 per cent of the population lives on less than $1.25 per day and where 64 per cent of the population is illiterate, few citizens are inclined to patronize newspapers or financially support civic associations. So, even if the Ethiopian state were to abide by constitutional limitations on power, the space for social and individual endeavor opened by these limitations might not be optimally utilized due to the constraints of poverty, illiteracy, and disease.

Ethiopia also provides evidence of a third way in which poverty impedes the attainment of constitutionalism. Since resources are scarce, and economic prospects in the private sector independent of the state are quite dim, a high premium is placed on gaining political power for the unique opportunity it affords to gain wealth. As Yash Ghai has noted, "the combination of the dominance of ethnicity and the centrality of the state for accumulation leads to intense competition for the capture of the state. In a divided society where there is already competition between different ethnic groups, this intensifies the contention for power, and is hardly conducive to constitutionalism.

2. India

India has been continuously engaged in a fascinating experiment with constitutional government since it gained independence from British colonial rule in 1947. Taking nearly three years, Indians drafted an indigenous constitution that contained many bold provisions, including the granting to all Indians (the majority of whom were illiterate and racked by desperate poverty) the right to universal adult suffrage. This flew in the face of liberal thought since the time of J.S. Mill, and resulted in Indians having the right to vote at a time when more developed countries continued to deny women and minorities this important right. The acceptance of universal adult franchise, along with the adoption of many other classic elements of liberal constitutionalism, committed India firmly to the path of democratic governance. In 2011, India completed 64 years of democratic constitutional rule, marred only by a brief period of internal emergency (1975-77). India has many of the hallmarks of a robust constitutional democracy: a vibrant political culture marked by the presence of diverse political parties, an assertive and free media which does not shirk from sharp criticism of governmental figures, independent constitutional institutions (including the Election Commission, the judiciary, and the office of the President) that act as real constraints on those holding executive and legislative power, and a vibrant and diverse group of civil society organizations that seek to promote important causes between elections. In the last two decades, India has gained (p. 166) the focus of the world business community for the high rates of growth of its economy, leading to its being termed as an ‘emerging superpower’. In a country that was under colonial rule for more than two centuries, has a recurring history of communal violence, deep-rooted social problems, and endemic poverty, this is a considerable achievement.

Scholars who have focused on the reasons for India’s relative success as a constitutional democracy have identified a host of issues, some of which are specific to India. A more general conclusion has relevance for our analysis of the Ethiopian case study. It has been asserted that India’s success is a function of having accomplished, within the framework of a centralized state, a moderate accommodation of group demands (especially demands of ethnicity and some decentralization of power), which has ensured that its constitutional model of governance has endured and survived. This insight ties in well with the third lesson that we drew from the Ethiopian case, of addressing the competition for scarce resources among ethnic groups in a polarized, heterogeneous society.

While the achievements of constitutional democracy in India are commendable, what is deeply troubling is the persistence of problems of impoverishment that have historically beset the nation, and at alarming rates. The 2010 HDR ranks India 119th among 162 countries. The report shows that much of India’s population—which stands at 1.21 billion currently—continues to suffer from widespread illiteracy, avoidable morbidity, premature mortality, and deep-seated inequality of opportunity, and its rates for these factors are below even those of other South Asian nations. China, the only other country which is comparable in terms of population, ranks at 89th and has, as emphasized by Peerenboom, far more respectable figures for these categories. India is thus an example of a nation that has had reasonable success with establishing a constitutional democracy but has not been able to eradicate poverty substantially. One reason has been endemic political instability at both the federal and state levels of Indian politics that has resulted in what Khilnani describes as ‘precarious governments dependent upon fragile and often obstructive coalitions’. Khilnani asserts that as a result of these developments, ‘Indian democracy faces the absence of any mechanisms to bring together into a coherent form a representative political will, which speaks of a crisis of and in political representation.’

The vacuum in Indian governance has led to attempts by other institutions to step in. One constitutional actor which has expressly used the interests of the poor as a justification for its actions is the Indian judiciary. The Indian judiciary is by design more powerful than regular courts in common law countries and has sought to expand its powers by acting in the name of the poor and marginalized sections of Indian society. Starting in the late 1970s and early (p. 167) 1980s, the judiciary began entertaining public interest litigation (PIL) that enabled the Court eventually to exercise a robust and all-encompassing form of judicial review which sought to provide access to justice to the most underprivileged sections of Indian society. The judiciary’s espousal of the rights of the poor and marginalized sections of Indian society in the initial phases of PIL suited the populist policies of the Indira
Constitutionalism and Impoverishment: A Complex Dynamic

Gandhi (1980–84) and Rajiv Gandhi (1984–89) governments. In a series of cases decided during the 1980s and early 1990s, the Supreme Court broke new ground by judicially creating rights to livelihood and housing, health and education for Indians and by issuing orders designed to implement these rights. What is striking about the conduct of the Court in many PIL cases is that it seeks to move away from an adversarial process to one where the parties work collaboratively to find workable solutions.62

In recent years, the Supreme Court has invoked its PIL jurisdiction to tackle enduring issues, most famously in the case of PUCL v Union of India, or the right to food case. The case arose when the petitioner organization, a civil rights group, approached the Supreme Court in 2001 arguing that the Indian government was failing to prevent famines and violating its constitutional duties. In a process lasting more than ten years, the Court has overseen the implementation of previously announced government programs, while also ordering new executive measures. It has done so by appointing an expert committee, and adding its imprimatur to the recommendations of the committee which, in turn, consulted government bodies, expert groups, and other institutions to evolve very specific measures and schemes. Gauri and Brinks have focused on this as well as similar decisions issued by courts in Brazil, Colombia, Indonesia, and South Africa to argue that there is a distinct but similar pattern in such judicial interventions. They contend that in these cases, courts are seeking to bring a measure of ‘communicative rationality’ to the process of governance, and are using their authority to structure a public forum of communication between various actors whereupon they compel implementation of policies to secure effective results for poor and marginalized sections in these societies.63

As detailed by Judge Dennis Davis in Chapter 49 of this volume, there are several objections to the adoption of such interventionist roles by judges, some of which carry great weight. The fact remains, however, that in at least some cases, judicial decisions have been able to have a discernible impact on the ground. The right to food case is a good example, because the actions of the Court over the last decade have both galvanized and provided support to civil society groups that have now started a campaign to have a federal law that guarantees food security.64 Some scholars have argued that these moves by courts should be supported because in acting carefully and in coordination with a host of other constitutional actors, they are advancing the ideals of democracy and public reasoning that have the potential of producing enduring solutions to seemingly intractable social and economic problems.65

The high and persisting rates of poverty in India lead, as they do in Ethiopia and other nations in the Global South, to frequent calls for the adoption of more authoritarian forms of governance, which are, it is argued, more insulated from pressure groups. Dreze and Sen have countered this line of reasoning by noting that many of the problems relating to the poor in India have arisen because of the political marginalization of the underprivileged. As they astutely note, this problem cannot be solved ‘by marginalizing them even more by further concentration of political power’. They have therefore argued for improving the existing arrangements for constitutional governance, by making them more participatory, accountable, and capable of delivering the real freedoms which are essential to eradicate impoverishment.66

VI. Conclusion

Our principal focus has been on examining broad constructs that have hampered the development of a robust discourse of constitutional scholarship on issues of poverty. Two recent works that are motivated by ideas similar to those we have emphasized, focus instead on grounded studies of micro issues that affect analyses of poverty issues.67 Our hope is that mainstream constitutional scholars will be inspired to undertake close analysis of these and related issues in the future, given that eradicating impoverishment is one of the most pressing moral issues of our age.

Bibliography

Bibliography

Abhijit Banerjee and Esther Duflo, Poor Economics: A Radical Rethinking of the Way to Fight Global Poverty (2011)
Notes:

(*) We thank Michael Dowdle, Varun Gauri, András Sajó, Ronojoy Sen, Mahendra P. Singh, Victor Ramraj, and Nick Robinson for constructive inputs and Timothy Liau for exemplary research assistance. The usual caveat applies.

(2) Although we use the terms ‘impoverishment’ and ‘poverty’ somewhat interchangeably, we bear in mind Upendra Baxi’s powerful insight that the term ‘poverty’ has a passive connotation whereas using ‘impoverishment’ draws attention to the fact that poverty is not a natural state, and is often the result of dynamic processes adopted by governments and agencies at the national and international levels. Upendra Baxi, ‘Introduction’ in Upendra Baxi (ed), Law and Poverty: Critical Essays (1988), vi–viii.

(6) Uday Mehta argues that this is the principal difference between the making of the US and the Indian Constitutions. While the former, according to Mehta, focused exclusively on containing the state, the framers of the Indian Constitution also sought to

- imply an activist and capacious state, responsible for the eradication of poverty, undoing the stigmas of discrimination, building large industry, facilitating communication, fostering national unity, and, most broadly, creating conditions for the exercise of freedom.

(7) Sen’s earliest reference to the ‘capability approach’ is in Amartya Sen, ‘Equality of What?’ in S. McMurrin (ed),
Constitutionalism and Impoverishment: A Complex Dynamic

Tanner Lectures on Human Values, vol 1 (1980). Later, Martha Nussbaum and Sen jointly edited The Quality of Life (1993) which developed this further. For a recent elaboration of Nussbaum's ideas on this issue, see generally, Martha Nussbaum, 'Capabilities as Fundamental Entitlements' in Bina Agarwal et al (eds), Capabilities, Freedoms and Equality (2007).

(9) Amartya Sen, Development as Freedom (1999), 90.

(10) Thomas Pogge, ‘Responses to the Critics’ in Allison M. Jaggar (ed), Thomas Pogge and His Critics (2010), 177.

(15) See Chapter 21.

(16) In his writings, Lee Kuan Yew has disputed the importance of a free and vibrant press for securing development or social harmony. See generally Lee Kuan Yew, From Third World to First (2000). Also see Fareed Zakaria, ‘Culture is Destiny: A Conversation with Lee Kuan Yew’ (1994) 73 Foreign Affairs 109.

(21) Ibid 129.

(22) According to Dorothy Solinger, regardless of the progress made towards diminishing poverty in recent years, China will continue to confront impoverishment for many years to come: ‘A Question of Confidence: State Legitimacy and the New Urban Poor’ in Peter Hays Gries and Stanley Rosen (eds), Chinese Politics: State, Society, and the Market (2010).

(24) Ibid 271.

(25) On the rule of law more generally, see Chapter 10.

Constitutionalism and Impoverishment: A Complex Dynamic

(32) Ibid (n 9), 181.

(34) Ibid 37.

(35) Sen (n 8), xiii.

(37) Paul Collier, The Bottom Billion: Why the Poorest Countries are Failing and What Can Be Done About It (2007), 17–79.

(41) Przeworski et al (n 23), 269–70.

(42) Paul Collier, Wars, Guns, and Votes (2009), 64.

(43) Ibid 62.

(44) Ibid.

(47) See the Democracy index of the Economist where Ethiopia was previously classified as having a hybrid regime and is now reclassified as having an authoritarian regime. ‘Democracy Index: Democracy in Retreat’, Economist Intelligence Unit, p 18, available at (http://graphics.eiu.com/PDF/Democracy_index_2010_web.pdf).

Constitutionalism and Impoverishment: A Complex Dynamic

(52) Ibid.

(53) For an extensive documentation of how the Ethiopian state uses the resources and services under its control for political repression, see ‘Development without Freedom How Aid Underwrites Repression in Ethiopia’, October 2010, Human Rights Watch, 34–66.

(57) These include: the establishment of a relatively centralized state under British colonial rule and the introduction of proto-democratic institutions; the maturity and creativity exhibited by Indian nationalists who consolidated the gains of independence through sagacious political and constitutional choices; the genuine commitment to democracy displayed by India's founding Prime Minister, Nehru, who stayed in power for a significant period (1947–64); a well-functioning civil service; and a popular ruling party, the Indian National Congress, which led to political stability in the founding years. See generally Atul Kohli, ‘Introduction’ in Atul Kohli (ed), The Success of India's Democracy (2001).

(58) Kohli (n 57), 19.

(64) Gauri and Brinks (n 63).

(65) For a comprehensive catalogue of their views on improving the practice of constitutional democracy in India, see the final chapter of Jeab Dreze and Amartya Sen, India: Development and Participation (2002), 347–79.

Arun Thiruvengadam
Arun Thiruvengadam is Assistant Professor, Faculty of Law, National University of Singapore and Visiting Fellow, the West Bengal National University of Juridical Sciences, Kolkata, India

Gedion Hessebon
Gedion T. Hessebon is S.J.D. Candidate, Central European University, Legal Studies Department and Assistant Lecturer, Addis
Abstract and Keywords

This article begins with discussions of what constitutional law is and general views on the place of constitutional law. It then considers the role of constitutional law versus ordinary law, and the political process that makes and executes it in certain specific and contested areas. In particular, it discusses rights protection and the structure of government; private law and the conduct of private individuals; and entitlements to state protection and socio-economic benefits.

Keywords: constitutional law, ordinary law, political process, rights protection, private law, state protection, socio-economic benefits

I. What is Constitutional Law? 170

II. General Views on the Place of Constitutional Law 173

III. The Place of Constitutional Law in Specific Parts of the Legal System 175
   1. Rights versus Structure 176
   2. Constitutional Law and the Private Sphere 177
   3. Constitutional Law and Positive Rights 181

If one takes a broad, panoramic perspective on comparative constitutional law, the now familiar narrative of the rise of world constitutionalism\(^1\) suggests a fairly straightforward and uniform answer to the most general question of the place of constitutional law in a legal system, at least as a formal matter. So, too, the logically prior question of what constitutional law is. The 'post-war paradigm'\(^2\) posits in its essential features, first, that constitutional law is the law codified in a country’s written constitution, mostly establishing the ground rules of government and protecting certain basic or fundamental rights, and second, that this law sits at the apex of its legal system. It is the supreme law of the land, entrenched to reflect and preserve its primacy, and authoritatively interpreted and applied by a high court with the power to set aside conflicting non-constitutional law and legal acts. To be sure, there continue to be outliers from this dominant model as a whole and from one or other of its typical characteristics, none of which is strictly-speaking necessary, but in itself this is insufficient to undermine or complicate the straightforward answers.

Zooming in, however, on the theory and practice of constitutionalism in certain specific contexts and countries reveals that both questions have recently become interestingly more complex and the answers provided more nuanced and diverse. There has been fresh input that (p. 170) enriches and transcends this standard, relatively formal and positivistic, conception of constitutional law and its place in a legal system. So, for example, what constitutional law is and the line between it and other law, what forms it can take and the judicial techniques it may employ, have been helpfully complicated by the development of theories of both the common law constitution and the statutory constitution in various English-speaking countries in recent years, including the ‘big-c’ constitution United States. Similarly, three quite different views of the general place of constitutional law in a legal system have been defended or described in different contexts, which when put together and contrasted with each other form a helpful spectrum running from political constitutionalism, to legal constitutionalism, and finally to what may be called ‘total constitutionalism’.

Less globally, and perhaps also more familiarly, there are robust ongoing practical and scholarly debates about the place of constitutional law in certain specific areas of a country’s legal system. Thus, the old question of the relative importance and centrality of constitutional law to issues of rights protection, on the one hand, and governmental structure, on the other, has been raised in a surprising variety of contexts and with interestingly different conclusions in recent years. The issue of the scope of constitutional law within the sphere of private conduct/private law has been a prominent one in recent bouts of constitution-making and judicial implementation, triggering much scholarly interest. Similarly, the debate about the role of constitutional law versus legislative politics in securing social and economic welfare has been enlivened and extended by recent experience, particularly in South Africa and Eastern Europe, and the scholarly attempt to digest it.

Overall, this increasingly rich literature suggests the importance of a genuinely comparative perspective that takes contextualized constitutional discourses seriously and results in distinct and broader conceptions of constitutional phenomena than provided by either purely domestic constitutional law or more abstract, philosophical reflection. Here, as elsewhere, focus on both sameness and difference, on paradigm and particularity, seems to offer the most useful and illuminating general methodology for the discipline.

I. What is Constitutional Law?

Taking a position on the general place of constitutional law in the legal system also involves, at least impliedly, taking a position on the place of ordinary or non-constitutional law. For it is the place of constitutional law in contrast with this latter that is mostly being considered. Accordingly, it is necessary as a threshold matter to have a fairly clear sense of what constitutional law is and where the line between it and all other law falls. At the comparative level, several separate but overlapping discourses in recent years have rendered this question interestingly more complex and the resulting answer significantly less formal and uniform.

The traditional view is that constitutional law has a primary and a secondary meaning corresponding to the well-known two meanings of the related term ‘constitution’. Thus, the first and primary meaning is ‘big-c’ constitutional law: the law contained in a written, codified constitution or plausibly inferred from it. Typically, although not necessarily, this law has the three characteristics referred to above of being supreme, entrenched, and enforced through (p. 171) the power of judicial review. Although contemporary constitutional law in this primary sense also has a typical content—establishing the relatively concrete ground rules of government and proclaiming a rather more abstract set of basic or fundamental rights—it is not the content or subject matter that determines its status as constitutional law. Indeed, there is no restriction on content. Any law that satisfies the formal criteria for becoming part of a big-c constitution qualifies. Hence the possibility of a constitutional amendment prohibiting the manufacture, sale, or transportation of alcohol.

The second—and very much secondary—traditional meaning of constitutional law corresponds to the Aristotelian concept of a ‘small-c constitution’. That is, constitutional law is the subpart of the aggregate body of rules, practices, and understandings determining the actual allocation of power in a polity (and the limits on it) that have formal legal status. Historically, this meaning of the term has mostly been limited to legal systems lacking a big-c constitution, such as the United Kingdom. Here, the more inclusive term ‘the British Constitution’, or just ‘the Constitution’, traditionally refers to the entire small-c constitution and ‘constitutional law’ the subset with common law or statutory status—the subset that is legally enforceable. But, in principle, this secondary meaning could also be employed in legal systems with big-c constitutions, and just as differences and even contradictions may arise between a system’s big and small-c constitutions, so too between a system’s big and small-c constitutional law. Indeed, as we will see, this is in effect what has been posited by theorists of common law and statutory constitutionalism in the United States. Unlike the first meaning, small-c constitutional law is largely determined by subject matter and function. Laws concerning prohibition, for example, could not easily be part of constitutional law in this sense.

This conventional and fairly straightforward understanding of the line distinguishing constitutional and ordinary law has become a little more complicated recently as the result of at least four separate and mostly unrelated discourses taking place in a variety of different, particularized constitutional contexts. The first of these is the work of certain constitutional theorists in the United States just referred to who have challenged the traditional, exclusively big-c conception of constitutional law with its sharp line between the law contained (one way or another) in the venerable US Constitution and all other law. This challenge has taken the form of developing theories of both an unwritten, common law constitution, focusing on the importance of precedent, conventions, extra-textual principles, and incremental styles of constitutional reasoning, and a supplementary statutory constitution of certain super-statutes, such as the Civil Rights Act of 1964, which are effectively entrenched and treated as higher law.

The second is recent practice and theory in the United Kingdom. The practice is the enactment and subsequent evolution of the Human Rights Act of 1998, a statutory bill of rights which is sometimes recognized and referred to as a ‘constitutional statute’ in ways that transcend the traditional small-c sense of the term and largely corresponds to the ‘super-statute’ meaning in the United States. Some commentators have argued that even though it does not empower courts to invalidate inconsistent statutes, the Human Rights Act has ushered in a system of constitutional review of ordinary legislation and executive acts that in substance, if not form, is little different from that in the United States or Germany. On the theory side and pre-dating the Human Rights Act, a robust theory of common law constitutionalism has been developed that also permits judges to review legislation and executive acts, here against rule of law principles such as due process and equality that are claimed to be an inherent part of the common law. Here, constitutional limits applied by courts may help to determine the meaning and even the validity of a statute. Both developments provide examples of constitutionalization without a big-c constitution.

A somewhat different example of this phenomenon is provided by the recent rise of international constitutionalism as a leading approach to international law, primarily within Europe and especially Germany. Although there are almost as many theories of international constitutionalism as theorists, the common core of the enterprise has been the attempt to co-opt the concepts and success of domestic constitutionalism and constitutional law at the international level. To the extent there is meaningful international constitutional law in various contexts, particularly that of the international human rights regime, this is also claimed to be mostly in the big-c sense—sharing its main characteristics as higher law—but without the big-c constitution. Within this account, international human rights treaties are in many ways perceived as international constitutional or super-statutes.

Finally, a theory of the ‘total constitution’ presented as an interpretation of modern German constitutional practice, but which arguably could be applied to several other contemporary constitutional systems—including South Africa and certain Latin American countries—effectively erases the line between constitutional and non-constitutional law altogether. This is because a total constitution, one that answers or strongly influences virtually all legal and political conflicts in a society, tends to constitutionalize all law by requiring it to be not merely consistent with, but superseded by, the big-c constitution.

As a result of overlapping developments such as these, the dominant and relatively specific comparative paradigm is beginning to erode and there may be no single account of what constitutional law is to replace it, except perhaps at a significantly higher level of generality. So, in one direction, constitutional law is increasingly perceived as not limited either to written constitutions themselves or the legal systems that have one, but can also be found generally in statutory and common law forms. Accordingly, as the notions of a common law and statutory constitution have become more mainstream, it may soon be necessary to talk of a ‘constitutional constitution’ to distinguish this form from the other two. Most importantly, as a result the general understanding of what constitutional law is has begun to shift to stress the substantive over the formal aspects. That is, regardless of precise source or status, constitutional law is functionally higher law that may be entrenched in several different legal and non-legal ways (and not only through a formal, super-majoritarian amendment process) and enforced by various techniques of constitutional review (and not only a formal judicial invalidation power). Subject matter is also more important than under the purely formal status approach of the traditional primary meaning, but also not sufficient as under the second, small-c meaning; rather there are higher law and perhaps also constitutional review implications of ascription. In other words, there is some merging of the two existing senses of constitutional law into a distinct and more general third sense that may be particularly important in comparative constitutional law. Within this third, more comprehensive sense, big-c constitutional law will be one important type of constitutional law but not the exclusive one, either across legal systems or within a particular one.
Constitutional law is also spreading in another direction, however, so that it does not necessarily presume a sphere of ordinary law at all but may be the only true norm-generating source in a legal system. This suggests perhaps a different, traditional separation of powers-defying division between higher and lower law, in which constitutional law alone performs the legislative function and all other law, including that enacted by the legislature, is essentially administrative in nature—executing, specifying, and applying the constitutional norms.

II. General Views on the Place of Constitutional Law

Taking this expanded, less formal conception of constitutional law into account, and looking comparatively at the theory and practice of constitutionalism in various particular contexts, there are currently three competing general accounts of the place of constitutional law in a legal system. These three accounts form a spectrum running from a non-existent to a comprehensive role for constitutional law.

The first position has come to be known as ‘political constitutionalism’ in the United Kingdom, where it has become a well-theorized and articulated response to the perceived trend towards its opposite, ‘legal constitutionalism’, in recent years. The position itself, however, is a familiar one elsewhere, although increasingly more in theory than practice. In response to the general question of what type or number of moral/political/legal issues and conflicts in society should be resolved by constitutional law in either the big-c or newer, more comprehensive sense, the answer of political constitutionalism is essentially zero. All such conflicts should be resolved politically, through ordinary, non-constitutional laws made and executed by political actors who remain fully accountable for them to the electorate. More specifically, the constraints on legislatures in particular should be political and not judicially administered ones, with office holders held to account through political processes and in political institutions rather than legal ones. Similarly, according to political constitutionalists, removing rights from democratic politics, as legal constitutionalism typically does, is both an ineffective and illegitimate method of upholding and protecting them. Although aiming to secure constitutionalism’s traditional negative function of limiting political power, albeit by exclusively political rather than legal means, political constitutionalism also aspires to provide space for the more positive function of promoting constitutionalist values, such as individual autonomy and equal concern and respect. As a normative theory with strong roots in republican conceptions of democracy, political constitutionalism is to be distinguished from empirical theories concerning the phenomena of formal constitutions and constitutional law that exist on paper but do not in fact determine any of the issues they purport to.

The binary opposite position of legal constitutionalism can take a number of particular forms, as the previous section clarifies. Indeed, to a significant extent, the development and refinement of political constitutionalism in the United Kingdom has been in response to the common law and statutory forms of legal constitutionalism—of constitutional law—that have evolved in both theory and practice in recent years. Nonetheless, of course, legal constitutionalism remains most familiar comparatively in its big-c, written constitution sense. Whatever form or forms it takes, however, legal constitutionalism’s characteristic answer to the underlying general question is that constitutional law should (that is, its function is to) resolve some moral/political/legal issues and conflicts in society—typically those that might otherwise undermine or destabilize it—while leaving others to be resolved politically. Of course, justifying this answer and determining the precise boundary between the two has quite properly been a major focus of scholarly effort, and important parts of the boundary question form the topic of the following section. But the basic idea that constitutional law both takes some issues off the political agenda and leaves others on it, has been central to its appeal in an era that has seen the rise of world constitutionalism alongside, and as part and parcel of, the rise of world democracy.

Although in its multiple guises and manifestations, the debate between political and legal constitutionalists often seems to suggest that these two options exhaust the terrain, the two answers they provide to the general question—constitutional law should resolve no moral/political/legal conflicts and some conflicts—appears to leave open the possibility of a third. That possibility has now been realized with the development of an interpretation of German constitutional practice that has been termed ‘the total constitution’. For, mirroring the total state, what is ‘total’ about the constitution in this position is that it essentially resolves—or strongly influences—virtually all moral, legal, and political conflicts in a society. Through an expansive interpretation of constitutional rights so that almost any governmental action triggers one or more, a broad conceptualization of the impact of constitutional law on private law, and a robust set of protective duties on the state, there are few issues on which the Basic Law is silent and so relatively little that is left to the free, unmediated play of political forces. Something like this conception of the enlarged place of constitutional law in a legal system and society is arguably also held at least in part elsewhere. Post-apartheid South Africa has a similar broad conception of constitutional rights and long list of protective duties, supple (p. 175) mentioned in its case by certain enforceable social and economic rights. Certain Latin American countries, such as Colombia and Argentina, whose constitutional courts have creatively filled legislative vacuums by directly enforcing constitutional rights against private actors, may also be said to fit this model of total constitutionalism. Under it, constitutional law is not only supreme but comprehensive; it does not simply resolve a few potentially destabilizing issues or render certain more extreme or unreasonable policy options beyond the pale of permissible political choices, but specifies almost all outcomes. In this way, ordinary law and the political process that enacts and administers it loses its autonomous normative power and becomes in effect applied constitutional law.

These three positions—political, legal, and total constitutionalism—still do not quite fully occupy all possible territory, all possible positions on the general place of constitutional law versus ordinary law and politics in a legal system. Although the debate between political and legal constitutionalists tends to be conducted as if the choice is an either-or one, in reality most legal systems have elements of both even where one or the other is predominant.

Thus, a paradigmatically legal constitutionalist regime such as the United States still has swatches of putatively constitutional law that are typically politically rather than judicially enforced, such as separation of powers. Australia is perhaps the best example of a formally ‘mixed regime’, with a legal constitutionalist treatment of structural issues—federalism and, to a lesser extent, separation of powers—and a mostly political constitutionalist treatment of rights. But in addition to the prevalence of such formally or informally mixed regimes that apply one or other model to different substantive areas, there is also a separate and distinct model that attempts to blend political and legal constitutionalism across the board. This is variously known as ‘the new Commonwealth model of constitutionalism’ (based on where the model has taken hold), ‘weak-form judicial review’, ‘the Parliamentary rights model’, and ‘the dialogue model’ of judicial review.

At least according to some of its commentators, the distinctive feature of this new model is the attempt to incorporate both legal and political modes of accountability by combining some form of constitutional review by courts with a legislative power of the final word.

III. The Place of Constitutional Law in Specific Parts of the Legal System

The previous section discussed what might be thought of as macroconstitutionalism, differing views on the place of constitutional law in general. Is there a place for it at all and, if so, what should its general scope be compared to ordinary law and political accountability? In this section, I turn to microconstitutionalism. What is and should be the role of constitutional law versus ordinary law and the political process that makes and executes it in certain specific and contested areas? In particular, those to be discussed are (1) rights protection and (p. 176) the structure of government; (2) private law and the conduct of private individuals; and (3) entitlements to state protection and socio-economic benefits.

Of course, the answers to these more micro or specific issues are relevant to, and in some cases determined by, the broader brushes of the macro positions discussed in the previous section. Thus, political constitutionalism's macro-no, as it were, implies negative answers to all three more micro-issues, and total constitutionalism's macro-yes the opposite. Indeed, it is the expansive answers given in precisely these three areas that underlie this interpretation of German constitutional practice. So in this sense, the debate here is conducted exclusively within the terrain of legal constitutionalism as a major part of the boundary issues determining the precise scope of constitutional law versus politics, the line between the 'some' issues to be decided by one and the other. Nonetheless, most of the scholarship on these three issues has been conducted at the micro-level, in that it has treated the three topics in a relatively self-contained and autonomous manner rather than as mostly implications of a general macroconstitutionalist position.

1. Rights versus Structure

The first more specific issue is whether, as a descriptive or normative matter, constitutional law has a greater or more essential role to play in matters of governmental structure or in matters of rights. Although the issue has not always been discussed explicitly in terms of these two alternatives, it has been a recurring one over the years in different contexts and there have been major paradigm shifts on it. Indeed, it has been argued that a new one is now taking place.

Prior to the end of the Second World War, constitutional law tended to focus on the ground rules of government, and democratic constitutions, in particular, on the essential framework of electoral politics. Rights were typically either not included at all or deemed non-justiciable. This focus on structure at least in part reflected the normative concerns about rights famously and influentially expressed by Hans Kelsen and institutionalized in his prototype European constitutional court in inter-war Austria. Indeed, these concerns continued to dominate constitutional law in that country, which had no bill of rights until recent domestic incorporation of the European Convention on Human Rights, and still do in Australia.

By contrast, in the multiple waves of constitutionalization since 1945, the incorporation of a bill of rights into constitutional law—with its usual characteristics of supremacy, entrenchment, and judicial enforceability—has been a standard feature, one we now associate with a ‘normal’ state. This is what has been referred to as the ‘rights revolution’. Indeed, it is not only that rights are now typically or presumptively present, as part of constitutional law, but their protection has come to be viewed as the central and primary function of constitutional law. From the post-Nazi Federal Republic of Germany, to post-communist states in Central and Eastern Europe, post-junta democracies in Latin America, and to post-apartheid South Africa, the entire post-war paradigm and rise of world constitutionalism is inexplicable apart from the central position that rights protection has assumed. This centrality is commonly given expression by the location of a bill of rights at the very beginning of modern constitutional texts, and is also manifested by the fact that it is specifically bills of rights that have been (p. 177) deemed to form statutory constitutions in countries like New Zealand and the United Kingdom. As one (skeptical) commentator puts it:

Central to legal constitutionalism is the idea of constitutional rights. Constitutions do many other things beyond enshrining rights. But probably nothing has been so influential in driving constitutionalism along the path of legal rather than political thought than the emphasis on rights ...

This development in domestic constitutionalism parallels, and of course reflects the same zeitgeist as, the similar one over the same period at the international level with the rapid development of international human rights law.

The centrality of rights in contemporary constitutional law is also evidenced by the normative debate over constitutional or judicial review in that almost all arguments, both for and against, have focused exclusively on rights protection rather than issues of structure. This is so even though it is widely acknowledged that as a historical matter, the need for a relatively neutral umpire to referee disputes among political institutions over vertical and horizontal allocations of government power—and particularly federalism—was an important factor in the rise of judicial review in the United States and elsewhere, and has continued to be in institutions such as the European Union. In the United States, and notwithstanding this history, there is a well-known argument justifying this centrality in that issues of constitutional structure can safely be left to political constitutionalism while rights protection cannot.

Within comparative constitutional law as a whole, however, it is possible that things may be turning full circle. For it has been argued that following the rise, we are now witnessing the decline of rights-based constitutionalism, at least in many contemporary post-conflict states, including Iraq, Bosnia, Kosovo, Sri Lanka, and Northern Ireland. In this context, structural issues concerning the allocation of power among rival ethnic or religious groups, and not bills of rights, have been at the heart of constitutional law and politics.

2. Constitutional Law and the Private Sphere

The second more specific issue is the place of constitutional law within the sphere of non-governmental or non-public conduct and the (private) law that regulates it. Within comparative constitutional law this issue is generally known under the rubric of ‘vertical’ and ‘horizontal effect’. These alternatives standardly refer to whether constitutional law regulates only the conduct of governmental actors in their dealings with private individuals (vertical) or also relations among private individuals (horizontal).

The traditional animating idea informing the vertical approach is the perceived desirability of a public-private division in the scope of constitutional law, leaving civil society and the private sphere free from the uniform and compulsory regime of constitutional regulation. The well-known justifications for this division lie in the values of autonomy, privacy, market (p. 178) efficiency, and federalism (where relevant). A constitution’s most critical and distinctive function, according to this general view, is to provide law for the lawmaker not for the citizen, thereby filling what would otherwise be a serious gap in the rule of law.30

The general arguments for the opposite, horizontal approach express an equally well-known critique of the ‘liberal’ vertical position. First, to the extent the function of a constitution is viewed as expressing a society’s most fundamental and important values, they should be understood to apply to all its members. Secondly, both the conceptual coherence of the public-private distinction and the practicality of applying it are questionable, especially given the widespread recent privatization of much governmental activity. Thirdly, constitutional rights and values are threatened at least as much by extremely powerful private actors and institutions as by governmental ones, yet the vertical approach automatically and unjustifiably privileges the autonomy and privacy of such citizen-threateners over that of their victims. Moreover, since the vertical position does not prevent private actors from being regulated by non-constitutional law, it is unclear why autonomy is especially or distinctively threatened by constitutional regulation.31

The issue of horizontal effect has sparked great interest among comparative constitutional law scholars in recent years. The reasons are, I think, twofold. First, it has become of enormous practical importance in the wake of the spectacular burst of constitution-making that has taken place around the world since 1989. Along with such other basic choices concerning the structure of constitutional rights as whether to include positive as well as negative rights, constitution drafters have had to decide whether, how, and to what extent private individuals are to be subject to new constitutional rights provisions. Secondly, the very range of situations with which these new constitutions have been designed to deal—from post-apartheid and post-military junta to post-communism—has challenged scholars to think anew about the nature and functions of constitutions. Are they merely law for the lawmakers or normative charters for reborn societies? Hobbesian social contracts between rulers and ruled, or Lockean ones among equal citizens? In this context, the issue of horizontal effect has been a central one, provoking fresh consideration of how constitutional law differs from other types and sources of law.

One of the major contributions that comparative constitutional law scholars have attempted to make to these real-world transformations has been to clarify the somewhat complex and confusing conceptual framework of the issue and to develop a coherent and user-friendly menu of options so that informed choices can be made. This became necessary because the simple and straightforward bifurcation between vertical and horizontal effect proved too crude to explain the different ways in which constitutional law can impact private actors or to capture the most common types of current constitutional practices. As only a little scratching beneath the surface soon reveals, the fact that under the vertical approach (where it applies) private individuals are not bound by constitutional law in no way entails that it does not govern their legal relations with one another,32 and thereby determine what they can lawfully be authorized to do and which of their interests, choices, and actions may be protected by law. Rather, the traditional vertical position merely forecloses the most direct way in which a constitution might regulate private individuals, by imposing constitutional duties on them.33

Accordingly, in order to attain a richer understanding of the scope of constitutional law in any given system and to appreciate the actual/potential range of answers, it is necessary to supplement the most basic question of vertical or horizontal effect (are individuals as well as governmental actors bound by constitutional law?) with the following three additional ones. First, even with respect to governmental actors, do constitutional rights provisions bind all such actors or only some; and, if only some, which? In particular, do they bind the legislature and the courts? Secondly, does constitutional law apply to private law (and, in common law jurisdictions, to common law) as well as public law? Thirdly, does constitutional law apply to litigation between private individuals?

There is a range of answers to these supplementary questions in practice, with the consequence that the broader question of horizontal effect—the impact of constitutional law on private individuals—is not a simple yes or no issue but rather a matter of degree. Typical legal areas in which this impact occurs include defamation, invasion of privacy suits, and employer–employee law. So, for example, on the first, even though neither the German Basic Law nor the Canadian Charter imposes constitutional duties on private individuals, the Supreme Court of Canada (SCC) has held that Charter rights do not bind the country’s courts.34 By contrast, the German Federal Constitutional Court (FCC) has held that the rights in the Basic Law do bind the courts; indeed, the vast majority of successful constitutional complaints in Germany are against the lower courts. Under the statutory bills of rights... enacted in the United Kingdom and both the Australian Capital Territory and state of Victoria, the rights are expressly stated not to bind the legislature, so as to maintain the essential core of parliamentary sovereignty—although the one enacted in New Zealand does—and in the United Kingdom and New Zealand, but not in the two Australian bills of rights, the rights also bind the courts.

On the second question, the issue of whether private law (and especially the Civil Code) is subject to the Basic Law was the cause of a major and prolonged debate in Germany before the FCC fixed its position in the landmark and influential Lüth decision of 1958. The common law was held to be subject to Charter rights by the SCC in the case of Dolphin Delivery but, as we shall see shortly, not as fully or equally as private statute law. In South Africa, the common law is subject to both ‘direct’ (under section 8) and ‘indirect’ (under section 39) application of the Bill of Rights. Both Australian jurisdictions have excluded the common law from being subject to their statutory bills of rights, and this issue has not yet been definitively resolved in the United Kingdom.

Finally, on the third question, because the Charter applies neither to private individuals nor the courts, the SCC also held in Dolphin Delivery that Charter rights do not apply to common law litigation between private individuals where the only official action is a court order. By contrast, the major argument in the United Kingdom that the Human Rights Act does apply to such litigation stems from the inclusion of the courts among the ‘public authorities’ bound to act consistently with Convention rights. In South Africa, the Bill of Rights can apply directly to such suits, although it can also apply indirectly—as in Canada—by developing the common law in line with its ‘spirit, purport and objects’.

Moreover, those countries that impose constitutional duties on private actors also do so in different ways and to differing degrees. So, for example, in Ireland, the ‘constitutional tort action’ has been implied by the courts from a general textual duty on the state to protect and enforce the rights of individuals. By contrast, in South Africa, horizontality is the express, if partial and complex, mandate of sections 8(2), 8(3), and 9(4) of the Constitution. On degree, the constitutional courts of Argentina and Colombia have perhaps subjected private actors to constitutional rights most consistently and extensively.

One principal scholarly achievement in this area has been the creation and refinement of a concept that describes an intermediate third position in between the polar positions of vertical and horizontal effect. Originating in the FCC’s landmark Lüth decision, this concept is known in German as ‘mittelbare Drittwirkung’ and more generally as ‘indirect horizontal effect’, as distinct from the ‘direct’ horizontal effect of the second polar position. In essence, this intermediate position is that although constitutional rights apply directly only to the government, they nonetheless have some degree of indirect application to private actors. More precisely, the distinction between direct and indirect horizontal effect is that between subjecting private conduct to constitutional rights on the one hand (direct), and subjecting private laws to constitutional rights on the other (indirect). In other words, there are two different ways in which constitutional rights might regulate private actors, that is, have horizontal effect: (1) directly, by governing their conduct; or (2) indirectly, by governing the private laws that structure their legal relations with each other and that they rely on or invoke in civil disputes. This second, indirect method of regulation limits what private actors may lawfully be empowered to do and which of their interests, preferences, and actions can be protected by law. Indirect horizontal effect has been further subdivided into stronger and weaker forms. The former means that private law is fully and equally subject to constitutional law; the latter that courts have a duty to take constitutional law into account in interpreting and developing private law.

A second focus of comparative scholarship has been exploration of the connections between the structural issue of the scope of constitutional rights and the substantive issue of their content. Given that, as we have seen, indirect horizontal effect subjects (all or most) private law to constitutional rights scrutiny, in any country adopting this position—or, of course, direct horizontal effect—the actual consequences for private individuals turns wholly on the substance of those rights. So, for example, broad substantive constitutional equality or free speech norms (such as incorporating disparate impact or incidental burdens on speech) would result in much traditional contract, property, and tort law being unconstitutional or significantly altered to cohere with constitutional norms, and so have greater impact on individuals. Narrower substantive norms (such as prohibiting only intentional government discrimination or content-specific speech regulation) would not. Indeed, this connection has led Tushnet to argue that the threshold ‘state action’ issue is conceptually equivalent to the issue of constitutional social and economic rights: the more extensive a commitment to social and economic rights, the more easily courts will lower barriers of scope; the greater the resistance to such substantive rights, the more courts will employ verticality as a threshold defense technique.\textsuperscript{45}

Similarly, scholars have explored the subtle connections between jurisdictional, institutional, and procedural differences among certain highest courts—whether they are specialist constitutional or generalist courts, whether they have jurisdiction to interpret and apply private, common, or state/provincial law—and the operation of indirect horizontal effect in those countries.\textsuperscript{46} Indeed, Kumm and Ferreres Comella have argued that given the particular constellation of these factors in Germany, there is effectively no practical difference between direct and indirect horizontal effect.\textsuperscript{47} Particularly in countries with relatively little private law to interpret, however, as in certain Latin American jurisdictions where courts have stepped in to help to fill legislative vacuums, this is not the case.\textsuperscript{48}

3. Constitutional Law and Positive Rights

A third important specific issue is the role of constitutional law versus ordinary law/politics in the bestowing of entitlements from the state. To what extent is and should constitutional law be confined to imposing duties of forbearance on (mostly) government action as contrasted with imposing affirmative obligations or duties of action? In other words, should there be constitutional entitlements or only political ones?

Modern constitutional law around the world contains two main types of such entitlements, or positive rights. The first is social and economic rights as, for example, the rights to education, health care, housing, social security, and work.\textsuperscript{49} The second is protective rights, the right to protection or security from the state against certain types of action by fellow-citizens, such as violence and theft. Constitutions may and do contain both types of positive rights, one type but not the other, or neither.

As ‘second generation’ rights, social and economic constitutional rights are primarily the product of one of the two great modern bursts of constitution-making, the first after 1945 and the second after 1989. The 1947 Italian and the 1996 South African Constitutions are perhaps (p. 182) paradigmatic in this regard. At the same time, however, overall the constitutions of the newly liberated countries of Central and Eastern Europe and South Africa, as well as those of developing nations, more consistently contain significant numbers of social and economic rights than either West European countries or common law jurisdictions.\textsuperscript{50}

Whereas where granted, social and economic rights are typically expressly contained in a constitutional text, constitutional rights to protection are a little more evenly divided between text and judicial implication. So, for example, the constitutions of South Africa, Greece, Switzerland, and Ireland contain express rights to state protection.\textsuperscript{51} Elsewhere, protective duties have been implied by the judiciary from certain textual rights that seem on their face negative. Thus, the best known and most important protective duties (\textit{Schutzpflichten}) in Germany concern the right to life and freedom of expression. The FCC famously interpreted the former in the \textit{First Abortion Case} to require the state to protect the lives of fetuses against such private actors as their mothers, presumptively through the criminal law.\textsuperscript{52} The right to freedom of broadcasting was also interpreted by the FCC to require state regulation to ensure the protection of citizens’ access to the full range of political opinions necessary for them to make informed decisions at elections.\textsuperscript{53} Although admittedly an international court, the European Court of Human Rights has been particularly active in inferring protective duties—though not social and economic rights—from the seemingly negatively phrased civil and political rights contained in the European Convention.\textsuperscript{54}

Unlike the case generally with negative constitutional rights, the practical impact of both types of positive constitutional rights is sometimes significantly reduced either by express statements that some or all such rights are not judicially enforceable or by judicial practice to similar effect. Starting with social and economic rights, the constitutions of Ireland, India, and Spain (in the latter case, apart from the right to education) expressly distinguish between rights proper and ‘directive’ or ‘guiding principles’ of social and economic policy that are intended to guide the legislature but are not cognizable by any court. Similarly, apart from the rights to primary education and to ‘aid in distress’, the Swiss Constitution contains a set of ‘social goals’ that is expressly declared to be non-justiciable.

Even where judicially enforceable, constitutional courts have generally been cautious about the scope of their review of social and economic rights and have tended to grant legislatures wide discretion at to the means of fulfilling their affirmative obligation. Accordingly, a reasonableness test has been the norm. In South Africa, this reasonableness standard—relative to available resources—is contained in the text as defining the positive obligations of the state with respect to most of its social and economic rights, and the constitutional court has as a result rejected the proposition that such rights entitle individuals to be provided with ‘a minimum core’. As is well known, however, in the important cases of Grootboom and Treatment Action Campaign, the South African Constitutional Court (SACC) held that government policies in the areas of housing for the desperately needy and combating mother-to-child transmission of HIV were unreasonable and thus unconstitutional. Moreover, in the latter case, the SACC ordered the government to change its restrictive policy on access to the drug Nevirapine. Both the Japanese and Korean supreme courts have subjected textual rights to minimum living standards to highly deferential reasonableness tests under which government programs were upheld, although both acknowledged that government failure to act at all to promote the constitutional objective would amount to an unconstitutional abuse of discretion. The Italian Constitutional Court has also generally interpreted the many social and economic rights contained in the 1947 Constitution as imposing a reasonableness test on government policy in the relevant areas. These differences have led Tushnet to classify social and economic rights into three types: (1) merely declaratory; (2) weak substantive rights; and (3) strong substantive rights.

Similarly, the level of judicial scrutiny to which constitutional rights to protection are subject is typically lower—more deferential—than that afforded to negative rights within the same constitutional regime. Accordingly, protective rights generally grant to governments greater discretion in doing what they must do than negative ones grant in what they cannot. Constitutional rights are typically protected by a proportionality test under which the intensity of scrutiny varies, among other things, with the importance of the right in question. Even the relatively less important rights, though, are subject to the second, minimal impairment prong that provides additional protection above and beyond the first, rationality prong. Protective rights, however, are generally subject only to a form of reasonableness test, rather than the usual proportionality test. That is, courts typically ask only whether the state has reasonably fulfilled its positive duty, a usually lenient and deferential test that rarely results in findings of failure. The reasons for this more lenient test are the standard reasons for wariness about including positive rights in constitutions that we will briefly canvass in the next subsection: that in telling the elected branches of government what they must do, the judiciary lacks institutional expertise and assumes control of the public purse. In Germany, the FCC has not held that the government violated its protective duty with respect to the right to life and health in any case other than the two concerning abortion.

Apart from descriptive work on particular countries, and here South Africa and the former Soviet-bloc nations have been the major subjects, more general or structural scholarship on positive constitutional rights has mostly focused on the following two issues. First, certain scholars have called into question the distinction between negative and positive rights, and others, while accepting the distinction in theory, have argued that the difference between them in practice is far smaller than assumed. Secondly, there has been a robust debate on whether constitutions should contain positive rights and to what extent, if any, socio-economic rights guarantees in particular make much difference in practice.

Although not the first to do so, Cass Sunstein has expressed skepticism towards the general distinction between negative and positive constitutional rights in that (1) ‘most of the so-called negative rights require government assistance, not governmental abstinence’, giving the examples of the creation and dependence of private property, freedom of contract, and criminal procedure rights on law and courts, and (2) ‘[a]ll constitutional rights [and not only positive ones] have budgetary implications; all constitutional rights cost money’. More specifically on practical differences between the two, David Currie pointed out that the effect of common general constitutional anti-discrimination provisions, such as the US equal protection clause, is to create ‘conditional affirmative’ duties of protection and provision of government services. ‘[I]f government undertakes to help A, it may have to help B as well.’ That is, governmental omissions sometimes amount to unlawful discrimination. Moreover, given the practical impossibility of abandoning certain protective laws (such as the criminalization of murder and theft) and government welfare programs, the effect of such anti-discrimination provisions will often be the same as if there were an absolute affirmative constitutional duty to enact the laws or program. Currie's point explains, for example, why in the United States, even absent a constitutional duty to protect the right to life of a fetus as exists in Germany, a finding that a fetus is a ‘person’ for constitutional purposes would probably entail in practice that the state must protect its life along with the other persons it chooses to protect. Failure to do so would likely amount to unconstitutional discrimination.
A second area that has attracted a good deal of scholarly attention is the issue of whether or not constitutions in general—and particularly the new constitutions of countries seeking to make the transition from centralized to market economies in Central and Eastern Europe—should include social and economic rights. Most of the arguments, for and against, have focused on pragmatic or instrumental concerns rather than theoretical, moral, or intrinsic ones. Arguments against such rights include that they either become meaningless promises and thereby threaten to undermine negative rights and the rule of law or are ruinously expensive for poorer countries, and that they unduly interfere with the attempt to create market economies and hobble the creation of civil society. More generally, it has been argued that pragmatic understanding of the operation of government and particularly the judicial system dooms any hopes that the recognition of positive rights will improve the lives of the intended beneficiaries. A more general argument, although perhaps an increasingly naive one as the role of money in politics advances everywhere, is that given whom they benefit—typically the majority of citizens—the standard reasons for constitutionalizing rights rather than leaving them to the ordinary legal and political process do not obviously apply.

One argument for such rights is that court decisions on social rights can bolster elected politicians’ ability to stand up to international financial institutions preaching ‘market fundamentalism’ and thereby enhance public support for democracy. Another is that failure to include such rights would be viewed by the people as an attempt by the ruling elite to deprive citizens of their acquired rights and fatally undermine popular support for the new regime.

Whether and how positive rights in general and social and economic rights in particular are justiciable and enforceable has always been a major part of this issue. Two developments in the past decade have enriched this aspect of the scholarly debate. First, both the fact that the SACC declared the final constitution’s social and economic rights to be judicially enforceable and the manner in which it enforced two of them in the Grootboom and Treatment Action Campaign cases mentioned above had a substantial impact on this issue, even persuading some academic commentators partially to change their minds. It has also provided fresh evidence and insights on the questions of whether and how social and economic constitutional rights make any real difference to the lives of the poor. Second, the recent establishment and growth of what has variously been termed ‘weak-form judicial review’ and ‘the new Commonwealth model of constitutionalism’ has provided a new form of judicial review—in which the legislature has the legal power of the final word—that may be particularly appropriate for social and economic rights.

Bibliography

Thomas C. Grey, ‘Do We Have an Unwritten Constitution?’ (1975) 27 Stanford Law Review 703
Aileen Kavanagh, Constitutional Review under the UK Human Rights Act (2009)
The Place Of Constitutional Law in the Legal System

Adam Tomkins, Our Republican Constitution (2005)

Notes:

(3) In a few specific contexts, eg the impact of EU law on domestic constitutional rights, some courts and scholars have also addressed the issue of the relative place and position of constitutional law and international law within a national legal system.

(4) Putting to one side the possibility of unconstitutional constitutional amendments.

(16) Bellamy (n 13).

(18) Kumm (n 12). It should be noted that having coined this term, Kumm himself believes it is preferable to refer to ‘complete constitutional justice’.

(20) See Bellamy (n 13); Tom R. Hickman, ‘In Defence of the Legal Constitution’ (2005) 55 University of Toronto Law Journal 981–1025, 1016; Gee and Webber (n 14).

(25) Bellamy (n 13), 15.

(29) Choudhry (n 23).

(34) Because s 32, the application clause, refers only to legislatures and ‘government,’ with the latter meaning the executive branch only. Retail, Wholesale & Dep’t Store Union v Dolphin Delivery Ltd [1986] 2 SCR 573.

(35) BVerfGE 7, 198 (1958).

(36) Frank Michelman, ‘On the Uses of Interpretive “Charity”: Some Notes on Application, Avoidance, Equality and Objective Unconstitutionality from the 2007 Term of the Constitutional Court of South Africa’ (2008) 1 Constitutional Court Review 1.

(37) At the same time, the SCC stated in Dolphin Delivery that Charter rights are not entirely irrelevant to such private litigation. Rather, ‘the judiciary ought to apply and develop the principles of the common law in a manner consistent with the fundamental values enshrined in the Constitution’: [1986] 2 SCR at 605. This distinction between the direct application of Charter rights and the general influence of Charter values in private, common law litigation has been maintained by the SCC ever since, and it elaborated on the practical significance of the distinction in Hill v Toronto [1995] 2 SCR 1130. Arguably, however, more recent cases in which courts have modified the common law in line with Charter values, such as Grant v Torstar Corp [2009] SCC 61 (creating a new defense in common law defamation actions of ‘reasonable communication on matters of public interest’), have rendered the distinction a very fine one in practice.

(38) Michelman (n 36).

(39) Irish Constitution, Art 40.3.1 (1937); see eg Meskell v Coras Iompair Eireann [1973] IR 121.

(40) ‘A provision of the Bill of Rights binds a natural or juristic person if, and to the extent that, it is applicable, taking account of the nature of the right and the nature of any duty imposed by the right’: South African Constitution, s 8(2). Section 9(4) imposes a duty on private individuals not to discriminate against others on the same comprehensive set of grounds applicable to the state.

(41) See Rivera-Perez (n 19).

(44) Gardbaum (n 33); Tushnet (n 42).

(45) Tushnet (n 42).

(46) Ibid; Mattias Kumm and Victor Ferreres Comella, ‘What is So Special about Constitutional Rights in Private Litigation? A Comparative Analysis of the Function of State Action Requirements and Indirect Horizontal Effect’ in Sajó and Uitz (n 42), 241–86; Michelman (n 36).

(47) Tushnet (n 42).

(48) Rivera-Perez (n 19).

(49) Not all social and economic rights are positive rights. Eg the right to choose an occupation and the right to educate one’s child privately—where recognized by constitutional law—may (but need not) be exclusively negative in scope, requiring only governmental forbearance from prohibiting business entry and banning private schools.

(51) See eg South African Constitution, s 12(1): ‘Everyone has the right to freedom and security of the person, which includes the right … to be free from all forms of violence from either public or private sources.’

(52) BVerfGE 39, 1 (1975).

(53) BVerfGE 12, 205 (1961).

(54) X and Y v The Netherlands, 91 ECHR (Ser A) (1985); Plattform ‘Ärzte für das Leben’, 139 ECHR (Ser A) (1988).

(55) Republic of South Africa v Grootboom, 2002 (1) SA 46 (CC).

Stephen Gardbaum

Stephen Gardbaum is MacArthur Foundation Professor of International Justice and Human Rights, UCLA School of Law
Democratic theory conventionally defines a constitution as a ‘higher law’ that cannot be changed through normal lawmaking procedures in a popularly elected assembly.\(^1\) Exceptional legal entrenchment is said to insulate constitutional rules from the majoritarian controls that purportedly govern ordinary legislation. In this way, a constitutional text strives to make fast the form of government (a presidential or parliamentary, a unitary or federal republic), the limits of government (inviolable rights and immunities), and the goals for which the government is empowered to act (to ensure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, and promote the general welfare).

With this rough understanding of a democratic constitution in mind, constitutional theorists routinely plunge into a heated debate over the counter-majoritarian dilemma, namely the question: Why would constantly renewed generations of voters remain committed to an inherited arrangement that was intentionally crafted to be difficult to change?\(^2\)

The so-called counter-majoritarian dilemma, however, is both politically fraught and analytically confused.
American liberals, for example, have an incurably schizophrenic attitude toward counter-majoritarian institutions. On the one hand, they favor rigid restraints on racially bigoted majorities but, on the other hand, they oppose rigid restraints on economically redistributive majorities. American conservatives are no more consistent. A theoretically coherent and nonpartisan approach to counter-majoritarian institutions is nowhere to be found.

The very idea of counter-majoritarianism suffers from a deeper flaw, moreover. The lex majoris partis is one of those decision rules that allow a population of human beings to make collective decisions for the first time. It may be a rational rule, but it is nevertheless a rule that is presupposed by, not produced by, collective choice, and that includes the choices attributed to an imaginary popular sovereign. Unless such a constitutive rule is already in place, the nation or the people cannot hammer out the kind of ‘constitutive will’ that could subsequently be thwarted or betrayed.

This consideration reveals the flaw in Jon Elster’s much-discussed but abortive attempt to explain, by drawing an analogy between constitutional conventions and Ulysses ordering himself to be bound to the mast of his ship, how a democratic people could impose a constitution on itself. That this eye-catching parable does little to illuminate the origins, survival, and function of democratic constitutions (by which democratic peoples purportedly bind themselves) is by now widely acknowledged, even by Elster himself. The main defect of the analogy is that Ulysses operated as a coherent decision-maker, capable of issuing authoritative commands and being duly obeyed, prior to ordering his sailors to lash him to the mast. Only the acknowledged captain of a deferential crew, not a politically amorphous population operating without pre-established decision rules or a clearly demarcated boundary between members and nonmembers, could play such a constitutive role.

Unlike hundreds of thousands of independent villagers and subsistence farmers strewn across a lengthy Atlantic coastline, compact political elites have a pre-constitutional capacity to create, amend, interpret, and enforce constitutional rules that favor their real or imagined interests. But this does not necessarily mean that ‘constitutionalization’, as neo-progressives continue to urge, is ‘driven primarily by political interests to insulate certain policy preferences from popular pressures’.

Political, social, and economic elites have reasons to bind themselves that are related only incidentally to parrying majoritarian demands. This issue has been muddled in US historiography because the Contracts Clause was obviously inserted in the Constitution by creditors and their allies to resist the demands of debtors and tax delinquents. But governments (p. 191) routinely commit to repaying loans not only to resist the Sirens’ songs of tax relief and paper money but also in a bid to become a Siren. By making credible commitments to pay back loans, a government can entice money, at relatively low interest rates, from the pockets of money-lenders in a way that unbound borrowers cannot easily do. The unlocking of foreign and domestic credit by governments that have established a reputation for creditworthiness is a good example of elite self-binding for the elite’s own advantage. It suggests that the powerful can have a strong incentive to make their behavior predictable even in the absence of popular pressures. But this is only one example among many.

Historically, political, social, and economic elites have proved themselves willing to impose grueling discipline on their own membership, including years devoted to arduously honing uncommon physical, intellectual, and technical skills, to maintain their group’s superior status over time. They have also accepted binding rules that facilitate the nonviolent resolution of intra-elite conflicts that, if not rapidly patched up, might risk opening the door to domestic insurrection or foreign conquest. And they have willingly offloaded time-consuming responsibilities in order to specialize on more lucrative tasks as well as to insulate themselves from annoying clientalistic demands.

But for constitutional theory, starting with ancient writings on the mixed regime, the most ‘democratic’ reason why elites have proved willing to impose limits on themselves is that such limits help to mobilize the voluntary cooperation of non-elites in the pursuit of the elite’s most highly prized objectives, especially revenue extraction and victory in war, but also information gathering and the timely correction of potentially fatal errors of judgment. Even John Locke, that liberal saint, invoked raison d’état in his defense of constitutional restraints on power:

> that Prince, who shall be so wise and godlike as by established laws of liberty to secure protection and incouragement to the honest industry of Mankind, against the oppression of power and narrownesse of Party will quickly be too hard for his neighbours.

No power-wielder is so powerful that he never requires voluntary cooperation from members of society weaker... than himself. To obtain a sufficient ‘supply’ of men and money, enthroned kings once convened prominent taxpayers in parliaments and listened to their grievances. Today, even governments elected by universal suffrage spend more resources protecting the rights of citizens whose cooperation is essential to governance, such as investment-bank presidents, than they spend protecting the rights of citizens whose cooperation is worth little or nothing, such as homeless veterans. Full-fledged democracy has always been and will always remain more an aspiration than a reality; but genuinely democratic episodes occur when powerful actors discover, as they sometimes do, a palpable advantage in popular participation, government transparency, protections for minorities, and uncensored debate.

II. Realism and Idealism in Constitutional Theory

Those who disparage democratic constitutionalism as a well-meaning ideology do not mean to deny that constitutions are an observable reality. Polities have always been ‘constituted’ in the etymological sense of organized for collective defense and hierarchical domination. As (p. 192) already suggested, dominant social groups have occasionally agreed to impose regularized restraints on their members in order to sustain, with a minimum of force, their group’s privileges over time and to mobilize the cooperation of lower-status adult males for the sake of collective endeavors, especially war. Constitutionalism, by contrast, emerged only in the age of democratic revolutions, during the last three decades of the eighteenth century. It involved not any possible organization of political life but an ideal form of organization that subordinated political incumbents to a higher law that they were forbidden, in principle, unilaterally to change. Especially novel in the new conceptualization was the fiction that a republican constitution should not be revised by ordinary lawmaking procedures because it embodied the ‘reflection and choice’ of the nation or the people.9

No constitution has ever lived up to the promise of democratic constitutionalism, aligning the interests of the rulers with the interests of the ruled. Nor has any constitution ever protected all citizens equally, without regard to the robust or tattered social networks within which different citizens were variously embedded. Idealists who imagine that really-existing constitutions could perform miracles of this sort have to explain how such morally just arrangements could possibly have emerged historically and why they would have survived. After all, powerless individuals with few allies are those who, by definition, are unable to impose their will on others, while the capacity to amass privileges and shift burdens onto others is exactly what characterizes social elites who are plugged into strong social networks.

Realism suggests that constitutional checks on political power emerged and survived, whenever they did, because they served, or appeared to serve, the interests of individuals associated with well-organized social forces. One of the best organized of all social forces, of course, is the government itself. If we want to examine constitutional limits with fresh eyes, therefore, a good place to start is with the advantages that governing elites might reap from accepting legal restraints on their freedom of action. The sustainability of constitutional restraints is difficult to understand if their primary purpose is to benefit the weak by disabling the strong.10 On the other hand, if constitutions, for example, make it possible for powerful actors to cast off unprofitable or risk-laden or self-defeating forms of power and thereby make it easier for them to achieve their principal aims, the authority of constitutions, at least to those who inhabit and control the commanding heights of political power, is much easier to understand.

Some general remarks about rules will also prove helpful before we explore this theme in greater detail. What is true for renowned constitutional principles such as freedom of speech and the press is true for rules generally, namely that they can be enabling as well as disabling. A moment’s thought about the rules of grammar will make this clear. The rules of grammar do not hinder but rather facilitate the ability to communicate, and that includes the ability to communicate surprising, unnerving, rude, unpopular, and even anti-constitutional ideas. It would obviously be inaccurate, therefore, to conceptualize such rules merely as don’ts, prohibitions, barriers, injunctions, no-trespass signs, or purely negative limitations on permissible behavior. True, the rules of grammar introduce certain rigidities into ordinary language. But rigidities, for a variety of reasons, can be prodigiously enabling.

Dissolving all rigidities would decrease rather than increase available options. For example, if human beings had no bones, they would be unable to walk. My initial, somewhat but not (p. 193) entirely frivolous proposal, therefore, is that we analogize constitutional rules not to the incapacitating rope with which Ulysses had himself tightly bound to the mast to prevent him from yielding to an uncontrollable impulse, but to the facilitating grammar that enables human communication, to rules of a game that make it possible for players to compete, or perhaps even to the skeletons that facilitate nimble locomotion in vertebrates. But analogies with grammatical rules and animal skeletons are but the vaguest of gestures. Decision-making procedures, such as majority rule, bring us closer to where we want to be. They reveal how binding rules, rather than rendering fatal impulses inoperative in the manner of Ulysses’ shackles, can facilitate cooperative action, provide access to hitherto unavailable possibilities, and even make an assemblage of individuals capable for the first time of collective choice.

We misunderstand the appeal of constitutional rigidities if we focus solely on the flexibilities they prevent while ignoring the flexibilities they simultaneously create. I want to begin, therefore, by looking at the emergence and institutionalization of enabling constraints in pre-democratic and pre-liberal societies where socio-economic hierarchy was embraced without embarrassment by ruling groups. This is not a detour. To explore the origins, survival, and function of ‘primitive constitutions’ in societies where the rights of the weak were routinely trampled and their voices unheard, will help us to bring into focus the value of constitutional restraints from the viewpoint of ruling groups in liberal and democratic societies as well.

III. A Preliminary Example

Even when the ruled are too busy feeding their families to try to impose constitutional restraints upon their rulers, these rulers have found reasons of their own voluntarily to accept selective restraints on their power. Among modern monarchies, Machiavelli singles out France, where none of the kings who are ‘born under such constitutions’ (nascono sotto tali costituzioni) can ‘break the brake that can correct him’ (rompere quel freno che gli può correggere). This is an extraordinarily interesting formulation. To concretize what Machiavelli means by a constitutional freno (brake) that can rectify the prince’s mistakes and prevent him from making new ones, we should study Machiavelli’s French disciple, Jean Bodin, arguably the greatest theorist of non-democratic constitutional restraints, that is, of constitutional restraints freely adopted by a powerful monarch with the aim of enhancing his power.

A work well known to the American Framers, The Six Books of the Republic (1576) contains a fascinating discussion of how constitutional restraints can help solve the principal–agent problem. The French king, Bodin observes, has an extremely difficult time learning what his provincial agents are doing in his name. He cannot easily solve this monitoring or oversight deficit bureaucratically, by assigning a second set of officials to keep tabs on the first. The solution chosen, observes Bodin, is parliamentary immunity, that is, an absolute limit to the king’s discretionary power. Representatives in the Estates General have the right to complain loudly about the behavior of any of the king’s agents, and to do so without any fear of punishment. Legally exempt from any liability for accusations leveled in the Estates General, representatives provide the king with information vital to his rule but which he would otherwise have no way of obtaining. Here is what occurs in the assembly, to whose members, while the body is in session, the royal power to punish does not extend: (p. 194) > there are heard and understood the just complaints and grievances of the poor subjects, which never otherwise come unto the prince’s ears; there are discovered and laid open the robberies and extortions committed in the prince’s name, whereof he knoweth nothing.

A grant of immunity to those who lodge complaints against royal officials was expressly devised, in Bodin’s account, to allow the principal to monitor his agents. Because the assembly’s members could not be penalized for speaking freely, they could provide the king with vital intelligence about his own operatives that would otherwise remain hidden from him. A formally unlimited monarch embraced a proto separation-of-powers system in order to solve his principal–agent problem, that is, to unlock information he needed to enforce his will effectively. This institutional structure, while serving as a freno on the king’s discretion in one sense, helped to correct his misapprehensions in another sense, allowing him to control his agents and ensuring that they operated in his interests rather than in their own interests while invoking his name.

Already in 1576, in other words, and in a monarchical system commonly (although inaccurately) called ‘absolute’, parliamentary immunity was described as a core principle of constitutional government, crafted explicitly to serve the interests of the powerful. It was a restraint on a powerful individual engineered to enhance his disposable power, by allowing the king to keep an eye on his agents and make sure that they were carrying out his instructions even when they operated in remote localities. A king allowed himself to be bound by this rule, or tied to this mast, because the exposés loosed by his self-limitation were palpably useful to his exercise of power. If he had insisted childishly on the crown's unconstrained prerogative to censure political speech, by contrast, the monarch would have been inadvertently helping his subordinates conceal secrets from himself.

This preliminary example, drawn from a pre-democratic constitution, suggests the political utility to the powerful of credible restraints on their own power. Bodin's explanation of parliamentary immunity (a narrowly tailored precursor to universal freedom of speech) implies that political elites can be brought to accept restrictions on their natural impulse to choke off irritating speech for the sake of expected benefits to themselves, even when there is no 'popular sovereign' to set the terms of the constitution or enforce its restrictions with the threat of insurrection. This example, therefore, provides anecdotal evidence for the hypothesis that constitutional restraints emerge and survive when they serve the interests not of all citizens equally but of those individuals whose lives are woven into a community's dominant social networks.

IV. Drill and Discipline

The original meaning of 'to constitute' is neither to constrain political power for the sake of individual liberty nor to force government to obey universal moral norms. What 'to constitute' signifies, in the first instance, is to set up. The word 'constitution', according to Diderot's Encyclopédie, 'signifie en general établissement de quelque chose.' For the Latin writers of the classical age, to constitute (constituere) a republic meant to found and organize it for duration, prosperity, mutual assistance, common defense, and territorial aggrandizement. When he referred to the republican constitutio, Cicero meant the morphological structure and operating code of Rome's republican government, the system of major and minor magistracies, the scheduling and organization of elections and judicial trials, the citizens' right to appeal to a popular tribunal against penalties meted out by magistrates in peacetime, the interweaving of Senatorial deliberation, popular approval, and consular action, the legendary power-sharing agreement between the few and the many, and the policy of granting citizenship rights to conquered cities in exchange for military service. McIlwain identified Cicero's haec constitutio as the first recorded use of the word 'constitution' in the sense of a frame of government. The Latin constitutio also implied an array of other connotations that remain pertinent to constitutional theory today. These include: making a pact or agreeing to act in concert, strengthening defenses in preparation for an enemy attack, fixing a future date for a group meeting, arranging to pay or repay an amount due, appointing someone to a position, and preparing a legal case or lodging an accusation before a tribunal.

As these connotations suggest, constitutio broadly referred to an ordering that serves a purpose. Cicero brought this point home when he discussed the constitution of the human body, postulating that nature constituted human beings to walk upright so that they could see the sky and thereby have a chance to know the gods. Rome itself was constituted, more by historical accident than by deliberate design, for military expansion and domination. Another book well-known to the American Framers, Polybius's Histories, argues that Rome's military and political successes were due to its political institutions, that is, to 'the form of the state's constitution [politieia]' The entire Mediterranean world fell under Rome's sway because Rome was politically organized for domination. Polybius's association of constitutionalism with military success seems surprising to readers today only because we tend to think of a constitution as an instrument for controlling overbearing and self-dealing elites, not as an instrument for creating, consolidating, and increasing the power of a collectivity and enhancing the glory of its military commanders. But the liberal-democratic view of constitutions is of recent coinage and provides little help in understanding why constitutions first emerged and historically endured.

The primary function of the ancient constitutions was not to limit preexisting power but to create power out of powerlessness. The legendary constitution-makers or Great Legislatore of antiquity were worshiped as religious figures not because they protected minority rights but because they organized their communities for military defense and conquest. In its most primitive form, the challenge facing any perilously besieged collection of human beings was to turn a disorganized rabble into a fighting machine. Part of the answer, obvious to any student of ancient Rome's stunningly rapid imperial expansion, was relentless discipline and drill. Military hierarchies, alternative combat formations or orders of battle, principles of engagement and so forth include rules and roles of a primitive military constitution. One of the meanings associated with the Latin constitutio, in fact, was the way troops were deployed, stationed, drawn up, or set in battle formation. For example, ‘Caesar stationed the legion’ is ‘Legionem Caesar ... constituit’.21 Machiavelli continued to use constituire in this sense.22 A closely related usage survived into America’s Founding period in references, for example, to the small professional army that the new federal government needed to repress insurrections and fight the Indians as ‘a force constituted differently than the militia’.23 The constitution of a fighting force included instructions for each soldier to maintain his place in the ranks as well as directives, drilled into troops to the point of automaticity, about how to reassemble quickly and reform a defensive perimeter after a line was broken and a massed formation was dispersed chaotically by a surprise attack.

Situated in an international environment inhabited by armed enemies and dubious allies, entire political communities had to be intelligently organized, or constituted, if they were to stay viable and flourish. Darwinian selection guaranteed that the early societies that managed to survive in the midst of marauding predators were those that had successfully subjected young males to rigorous military discipline. But it makes little sense to describe this discipline simply as a restriction on the freedom of those being subjected to its rigors. If they had not accepted the drill and discipline, as they presumably well knew, the inhabitants of such early societies would not have been free but, on the contrary, enslaved or dead. Loosed from all such restraints, early political societies would have quickly disintegrated under the hooves of better organized enemy forces.

The ancestors of the American Framers, the first settlers in the New World, understood this implicitly. They survived and flourished collectively, not individually. To them, individual freedom from all community obligations in the extreme libertarian sense would have meant the ‘freedom’ of the defenseless straggler to be scalped on the frontier. Later, after Independence, it would have meant the ‘freedom’ of the commercial seaman to be dragooned at musket-point into the Royal Navy. The hard experience of organizing collective self-defense in an unforgiving environment, therefore, predisposed eighteenth-century Americans to sympathize with the ancient idea of a constitution. The constitutions they created after 1776, including the federal Constitution of 1787, had many functions. But they were all meant to help struggling communities to maintain their boundaries, coherence, and resilience in a dangerous world.

The American Framers undoubtedly wished to design their new commonwealth for territorial expansion and annexation. The amply documented influence of Machiavelli’s praise of Rome on their thinking should therefore also be reconsidered in this context. Machiavelli used constituzione exactly as Cicero had used constitutio, that is, to describe the institutional (p. 197) set-up of a republic that was frequently at war. He compared and contrasted the constitutions (constituzioni) or forms of government of Athens, Sparta, and Rome, for example, to evaluate their relative military strengths and weaknesses.24

But Machiavelli’s central contribution to the constitution-making project of the American Framers involved his own unrealizable or at least unrealized project for constitution-making in Italy. The constitutional solution that Machiavelli proposed for that humiliated land, where foreign superpowers conducted proxy wars, was basically a league among the Italian republics to fend off military domination of the peninsula by two great foreign monarchies, Spain and France. If the Italian city-republics did not successfully band together into a Union, Machiavelli reasoned, then those outsized neighboring monarchies would exploit conflicts among the Italian republics and thereby impose their will on the disunited and therefore defenseless mini-states. Only a robust Union among the republics, based on a sense of common destiny, could lead the Italian republics to pool their efforts and counteract the foreign superpowers’ predictable strategy of divide and rule. The required sense of common nationhood could not thrive under a prince, he argued, but only if all Italy was organized as a republic—indeed as a republic of republics.

Machiavelli’s proposed United Republics of Italy was ill-starred because Italy was not protected from the great European monarchies of his day by the Atlantic moat; and the various Italian republics were not drawn together by the alluring prospect of jointly seizing an immense and fertile continent from its essentially defenseless aboriginal occupants. Hamilton’s and Madison’s proposed Union was more luckily situated. All innovations duly noted, however, the United States was designed on Machiavelli’s model to solve Machiavelli’s problem, namely to prevent European monarchies of vastly superior power from using salami tactics to pick disunited republics off one at a time.

This Machiavellian perspective reminds us why so much of the Federalist is devoted to ‘the safety of the people of America against dangers from foreign force’.25 As the revolutionary break with Great Britain drew near, the Continental Congress urged the colonies to enact written constitutions in order better to organize the coming military confrontation with British forces. The drive for Union, a decade later, was led by the Framers and their allies in large part because they believed that ‘weakness and divisions at home would invite dangers from abroad’. Historically, the shortest-lived federations were those, such as the members of the Amphytonic league who, even in wartime, ‘never acted in concert’. Unless the states struggling to defend themselves under the loose federation designed by the Articles would accept a tighter Union, they would be unable, Madison warned, to escape ‘the chains of Macedon’. The semi-sovereign states must renounce a degree of autonomy for mutual assistance, to avoid being played off against each other and to create common front against foreigners. If they united their forces, in fact, the American republics might eventually ‘soar to a dangerous greatness’.

The authors of the Federalist chose to rally support for the proposed Constitution by emphasizing that a ‘combination and union of wills, of arms and of resources’ could provide the states with ‘a formidable state of defense against foreign enemies’. The sales pitch seems to have been persuasive. Common enemies dictate a common or collaborative defense, which implied, at the time, that the state militias had to be placed ‘under one plan of discipline’. It is a small leap to consider the proposed Constitution itself as, among other things, a unified plan of discipline for coordinating otherwise militarily unimpressive states. For political elites within the states, the benefits of defensive and annexationist power apparently provided sufficient compensation for the cost of becoming small fish in a big pond.

V. The Paradox of Limited Power

The organization of political systems for military defense and offence has always been, and remains today, a major purpose of constitutional organization. But constitutions serve many other goals that are equally appealing to society’s dominant forces without any particular regard to democracy or the rights of the weak.

The paradox that limited power can be more powerful than unlimited power probably provides the best explanation for why elites have sometimes, if not invariably, submitted themselves to constitutional restraints even when no popular movement or deadly urban riot has been looming on the horizon. The surprising contribution of self-restraint to the augmentation of power is what accounts, alongside the need for concert and cooperation in war, for the most notable successes that constitutions have enjoyed for more than two millennia. If limited power never produced greater power, constitutions would never have played the important role that they have so obviously played and continue to play in political life.

Social elites impose restraints upon themselves, when they do, to gain something they want, such as more security, more wealth, more territory, more cooperation, or more power. To pursue purposes of this sort, well-organized social groups can intentionally choose to impose new limits upon themselves, including limits that are subjectively experienced by individual group members as irritating fetters or burdens. This, for instance, is one way to make sense of the willingness of occupants of supreme executive power to submit periodically to the will of the electorate, that is, to a public tournament that they might possibly lose.

Why would a powerful incumbent accept periodic elections rather than insisting upon life tenure? One reason is that life tenure gives the rivals of the incumbent, who want to remove him from office, a strong incentive to remove him from life. The brutally terminal methods that were used to impose term limits on several generations of ‘life-tenured’ Roman Emperors brings this point home. Periodic elections mitigate the frustration of the Outs by offering the hope that they will eventually join the Ins. The prospect (or certainty when constitutions limit elected leaders to one term only) of a potential end-point to the current ruler’s incumbency reduces the felt need to eliminate him by violence; it will suffice to wait. The periodic chance to throw the rascals out may also allow for the periodic venting of popular discontent, protecting the dominant classes from a revolutionary explosion where elite heads are indiscriminately wedged onto the pointed ends of sticks.

Celebrated athletes, musicians, inventors, and other popular idols have invariably subjected themselves year after year to relentless physical and mental discipline to hone their skills and achieve a professional excellence unattainable by anyone who lounges about hedonistically, living day to day. In a fascinating passage on oligarchic constitutions, Aristotle explains how political elites can impose similarly self-toughening and survival-enhancing regulations on themselves:
The devices adopted in [these oligarchic] constitutions (ἐν τοῖς πολιτείας) for fobbing the masses off with sham rights are five in number. They relate to the assembly; the magistrates; the law courts; the possession of arms; and the practice of athletics. As regards the assembly, all alike are allowed to attend; but fines for non-attendance are either imposed on the rich alone, or imposed on the rich at a far higher rate. As regards the magistrates, those who possess a property qualification are not allowed to decline office on oath, but the poor are allowed to do so. As regards the law courts, the rich are fined for non-attendance, but the poor may absent themselves with impunity; or, alternatively, the rich are heavily fined and the poor are only fined lightly.

To sustain their caste’s superiority over time, that is to say, the upper-caste framers of such rules impose a personally unpleasant but politically strengthening discipline on their own caste members while dispensing individually irresistible but collectively weakening exemptions to the lower classes. And Aristotle continues:

In some states a different device is adopted in regard to attendance at the assembly and the law courts. All who have registered themselves may attend; those who fail to attend after registration are heavily fined. Here the attention is to stop men from registering, through fear of the fines that they may thus incur, and ultimately to stop them from attending the courts and assembly as a result of their failure to register. Similar measures are also employed in regard to the possession of arms and the practice of athletics. The poor are allowed not to have any arms, and the rich are fined for not having them. The poor are not fined if they absent themselves from physical training: the rich are; and so while the latter are induced to attend by the sanction of a fine, the former are left free to abstain in the absence of any deterrent.35

Rational members of an oligarchy can impose burdens (including hefty fines) on themselves while granting exemptions and immunities to commoners in order to maintain the dominance of their social caste over time. For the oligarchy in a Greek polis to think up and implement such a system, it must already be organized as a tight-knit corporate entity where obedience to leaders and the emotional-moral identification of caste members with each other can be taken for granted. Individuals within the oligarchic caste must willingly accept personal burdens in the present for the sake of future benefits that will accrue, in the future, to the oligarchic order understood as an entity that endures across generations. For their part, poorly organized commoners, unable to act in concert for temporally remote purposes, will accept the offered exemptions because the immediate benefits to individual commoners seem more salient than the long-term weakening of their already weak-knit group.

Aristotle disapproved of such one-sidedly oligarchic constitutions for various reasons, including the likelihood that commoners will not fight passionately for their city if the constitution gives them no political voice or honorable status in the city’s life. This brings us back to what I previously called the most ‘democratic’ reason why elites have willingly imposed limits on themselves, namely to mobilize the cooperation of non-elites in the accomplishment of the elite’s most pressing goals. With the military function of constitutions in mind, Aristotle therefore recommended the following: ‘we must both pay the poor for attendance and fine the rich for non-attendance. On this plan, all would share in a common constitution.’ Guaranteed a stake in the system, the urban poor will willingly fight against hostile cities, something they may not do if ‘the constitution belongs to one side only’.36

(p. 200) The idea that a ‘balanced’ constitution of this sort could help social elites to manage dangerous class conflict by giving non-elites a palpable stake in the regime’s successes was transmitted to modern constitution-makers by ancient theorists of the mixed constitution. Cicero, for example, argued that a constitution should grant ‘freedom to the people in such a way as to ensure that the aristocracy shall have great influence and the opportunity to use it,37 thereby denying that there was a zero-sum relation between popular rights and elite power. In response to the typical aristocratic complaint that the Tribunes of the Plebs have been granted too much power, Cicero responded that ‘the power of the people ... is sometimes milder in practice because there is a leader to control it’.38 Viewed superficially, the Tribunes were hostile to Roman elites; but they also provided these elites with recognizable negotiating partners able to make and keep bargains between the rich and the poor. The Senatorial class was wise enough to restrain its own natural impulse to monopolize power, Cicero went on to argue, and, instead, adhered to the creation of the Tribunate, thereby sharing a modicum of power with the Plebs. By such remarkable self-restraint Rome’s elite gained much more than it lost:

consider the wisdom of our ancestors in this matter. When the Senate had granted this power to the plebeians, conflict ceased, rebellion was at an end, and a measure of compromise was discovered which
The classical idea of a mixed constitution provides an important clue to the origins and fate of constitutional democracy. In specific historical contexts, large numbers of citizens are granted participatory rights because their voluntary cooperation seems essential to achieving the strategic goals of ruling elites. If political dominant groups can see far enough ahead to impose burdens on their members for the sake of maintaining their privileges, they can also (with improved foresight) see the advantage of sharing power with commoners for the sake of gaining the cooperation they need in order to defend themselves as well as their privileges against the threat posed by hostile cities.

VI. Monarchical Constitutions

In non-republican systems, strategic constitutionalism will lead to forms of elite self-discipline entailing few participatory rights for non-elites. This brings us to Thomas Hobbes, who was neither a liberal nor a republican and who railed consistently against ‘mixarchy’, his denigrating term for a mixed constitution. When he wrote of the ‘constitution of sovereign power’ Hobbes meant, among other things, the way in which monarchies could and should be organized to enforce unquestioning obedience from a politically passive population. A brief look at monarchical constitutions, therefore, will bring us back to the thesis that constitutional restraints can be embraced by power-wielders for purposes of their own without any serious pressure from the people who, throughout most of history, have been in no position to threaten to withdraw cooperation needed by ruling elites.

A credible succession formula is an essential element in any monarchical constitution. This was already true for the medieval kingships from which Europe’s early-modern monarchies emerged. The most important element in monarchical constitutions, commonly called the fundamental laws of the realm, was the order of succession, clarifying sequence and eligibility (p. 201) of heirs to the throne and, ideally, specifying uniquely who will become king when the incumbent monarch expires. These rules of succession could privilege either sons or brothers (think of Hamlet), could exclude or include female heirs (think of la loi Salique), and so forth. That monarchical rules of succession were incomplete, not covering all cases—such as exhaustion of the male line—as well as ambiguous enough to embolden pretenders to the throne, goes without saying.

So why were such orders of succession widely viewed as binding, even in monarchical regimes where the king often claimed to be legibus solutus? The answer, which involves the shared desire of all powerful political forces to avoid a power vacuum or violent factional struggle for the throne (which might also expose the state to foreign invasion), tells us something important about voluntarily accepted constitutional constraints in modern democracies as well.

Orders of succession confirm the idea that every constitution is, in part, an emergency constitution. The unexpected death of the king inevitably delivers a profound shock to the political system. It creates a crisis or emergency, throwing into question the political pecking order among courtiers and royal kinsmen that prevailed when the now-deceased monarch was still alive, thereby enflaming the ambitions of blood rivals.

Such an emergency can be managed most effectively by ‘if-then’ rules elaborated in advance and stockpiled in reserve, allowing the surviving courtiers, when the time comes, to ‘discover’ the dead king’s true successor. These rules constitute the king’s supernatural body, representing the ‘perpetuity of the sovereign rights of the whole body politic’. The king’s ‘immortal’ body, codified in the order of succession, was engineered even to survive assassination and to help a deceased king’s entourage to coordinate quickly on an heir to the throne. This will happen if the otherwise quarreling courtiers and blood relations share a desire to avoid settling the succession question by a resort to violence, which might expose the entire system to civil war and, as a consequence, to an external attack potentially devastating to all. Precommitment to specific rules of succession was meant not to guard an individual from weakness of the will, or uncontrollable impulse, but to guard a group against the absence of any coherent will and thus against deadlock, paralysis, regime meltdown, and a resort to perhaps spiraling violence to settle on an heir.

A credible succession formula is not a restriction on the power of the head of state. It is eminently ‘constitutional’ but cannot be accurately described as a ‘limitation on government by law’. Rather, it is an outstanding example made the more humble believe that they were accorded equality with the nobility; and such a compromise was the only salvation of the State.39 of strategic constitutionalism. It is an instrument by which political elites can coordinate quickly to install a new head of state before the last one's body grows cold. Such provisions are certainly not restrictions imposed on the powerful to protect the weak. Instead, they are scripts to help the powerful coordinate quickly on a pathway out of a crisis that they know will eventually come even though they cannot be sure when.

Containing a monarchical residue, presidential systems share with monarchies some of the challenges of avoiding chaos or maintaining continuity of government during an interregnum—challenges that parliamentary systems handle in a different way. The Twenty-Fifth Amendment to the US Constitution, in fact, can be understood as the US President's supernatural body, made not of flesh and blood but of protocols and rules. Introduced in 1965, in the wake of the Kennedy assassination (and ratified in 1967), the Twenty-Fifth Amendment was crafted to avoid a prolonged succession crisis, or power vacuum, in case the President, after an assassination attack or perhaps a stroke, survived in a vegetative state. The scenario by which a Vice President could step into the role of a disabled President was evidently not spelled out in the original Constitution with enough specificity to guide uncertain actors in an inherently stressful situation. By 1965, it had become clear that such a state of affairs could no longer be tolerated, not in the atomic age where split-second executive decision-making might be necessary at any time.

Section 4 of the Twenty-Fifth Amendment is an emergency protocol, detailing what to do and how to do it. It is definitely not a mere prohibition of undesirable action. It is not a restriction imposed on the powerful to protect the weak. Indeed, it is not any sort of manacle, check, barrier, or limit. Exactly like the succession formulas embedded in the Golden Bull of 1356 and other pre-democratic ‘constitutions’, it is a script to help power-wielders coordinate quickly in a crisis.

If we think of constitutional rules as scripts, rather than ropes (and the US Constitution provides many other examples), it is easier to understand why powerful actors, looking for protocols to facilitate rapid coordination, might be willing to incorporate them into their motivations as obligatory principles of conduct. They are not incapacitating but capacitating. They are not shackles making unwanted action impossible, but guidelines making wanted action feasible. Seen in this way, their ‘binding power’ becomes more commonsensical than mysterious.

VII. Cognitive Constitutionalism

One of the American Founders’ basic assumptions was that the executive branch will, on balance, perform better if compelled to provide both Congress and the courts with plausible reasons for its actions. If a government stops being compelled to provide plausible reasons for its actions, it is very likely, in the relatively short term, to stop having plausible reasons for its actions. Liberating policy makers from the discipline of justification before independent tribunals routinely generates incoherent and self-defeating policies. This is just as true in oligarchies as in democracies.

Viewed from this perspective, America's eighteenth-century Constitution is based on three still-valid principles: all people, including political elites, are prone to error; all people, especially political elites, dislike admitting their blunders; and all people, especially political elites who are currently in opposition, relish disclosing the miscalculations and missteps of their bureaucratic or political rivals. The Constitution attempts to operationalize these principles, roughly speaking, by assigning the power to make mistakes to one branch and the power to correct these mistakes to the other two branches and to the public and the press. Its structural provisions, when combined with certain basic rights (such as freedom to examine the government and freedom of political dissent), set forth a series of second-order rules, that is, rules specifying the process by which concrete decisions and first-order rules are to be made and revised. If America's eighteenth-century Constitution remains helpful in dealing with twenty-first-century problems it is largely because its second-order rules embody a distrust of false certainty and a commitment to procedures that facilitate the correction of mistakes and the improvement of performance over time.

Constitutions help to organize the process of decision-making to disfavor the unconsidered or impulsive judgments of incumbent politicians. If the constitution forces decision-makers to submit to an adversarial process of some sort, then their natural impetuosity, false certainty, tunnel vision, and rank prejudice can ‘speedily give place to better information, and more deliberate reflection’. We know in advance that ‘the legislature will not be infallible’ and that ‘impressions of the moment may sometimes hurry it into measures which itself, on mature reflection, would condemn'. One solution to this problem is to make sure that various institutionally independent members of the political elite examine the question being discussed from a variety of angles: ‘The oftener the measure is brought under examination, the greater the diversity of the situations of those who are to examine it, the less must be the danger of those errors which flow from want of due deliberation.’

That political power is a magnet for disinformation is also worth remembering. Shadowy groups with private agendas regularly feed lies and half-truths to power-wielders in the hopes of manipulating them into acting contrary to the interests of the rulers themselves. Judicial independence emerged and survived in part because professional judges, trained to sift truth from error, were valued for their ability to shield powerful politicians from manipulative disinformation. For this and other reasons, to be discussed in the next section, independent courts provide another illustration of strategic constitutionalism. Insulated from the confirmation bias of executive officials keen on action, independent judges can strengthen the executive function by filtering out witness malice and other misleading falsehoods. That at least is Montesquieu's thesis. He argued that a king who acted as a judge, and thereby violated the constitutional separation of executive and judicial power, would easily become a plaything of malicious witnesses and other parties trying to steer public power into serving illicit private or factional purposes:

The laws are the eye of the prince: by them he sees what would otherwise escape his observation. Should he attempt the function of a judge, he would not then labour for himself, but for impostors, whose aim is to deceive him.

The echo here of Bodin's theory of parliamentary immunity is unmistakable. Confronted by no organized body capable of exercising critical judgment, free from fear of reprisal, unconstrained or unilateral power is much more likely to be duped by disinformation than a power that is compelled to submit to independent monitoring. The great literary mise-en-scène of this elementary constitutional truth is Shakespeare's Othello. When Othello was accused by Desdemona's father of seducing her with drugs, the false accusation was tested before an independent tribunal, the Council of Venice, which told the father that ‘to vouch this is no proof’. Eventually dismissing the charges after allowing Othello and Desdemona to tell their side of the story. But later, when Iago, speaking untruth to power, persuades Othello of Desdemona's infidelity, Othello does not say ‘to vouch this is no proof’. He does not allow Desdemona to tell her side of the story, nor does he submit the case to an independent tribunal. He huighty plays both le juge et la partie. As a result, Othello loses rather than gains autonomy. His refusal to submit himself to an institutional mechanism for the correction of errors, far from making him free, renders him completely rudderless. Othello's wrongful murder of his innocent wife is therefore a standing reminder of the vulnerability of political elites, when their powers are unilateral and unchecked, to manipulation by malicious purveyors of false information. Admittedly, being publicly corrected can sting the vanity of power-wielders. But such mighty individuals are likely to drive off cliffs if they disable the brakes that can correct them.

VIII. Insulation through Abdication

If we assume that the powerful never feel that they have enough power and that they are ceaselessly laboring to accumulate more, then voluntary abdications of power seem genuinely incomprehensible. But the mystery is dispelled, at least to some extent, if we start from the premise that power is not homogeneous and that some forms are much less attractive than others. No one is surprised that today's White House and Congress pay no attention to a child custody case, nor does anyone ask why politicians would 'cede power to judges' in such a context. Politicians cede this power because they do not want it and they do not want it because they have better things to do. Any sensible political ruler will want to delegate the donkey work. He will 'get off my case', that is to say, he will, once again, support the independence of the judiciary.

Abdications of judicial power can empower the government by insulating it not only from manipulative disinformation but from all manner of unwelcome chores and pressures. Delegations of power can be shrewdly strategic if they prevent organized interests from hounding officials into furthering factional ends. Shedding power is an appealing technique for fending off annoying supplicants and time-consuming petitions for redress of grievances. Focusing on their understudied deflecting or protective function can help us see constitutional 'limits' on power in a different light.

If the ruler pulls strings behind the curtains, people will notice where ultimate decision-making power lies, and, according to Montesquieu, the steps of the ruler's palace will resound 'with the litigious clamours of the several parties’ hoping to influence upcoming decisions of the royal court. Keeping the judicial power in his own hands would reduce the king’s power, on balance, because ‘the courtiers by their importunity would always be able to extort his decisions’.\textsuperscript{55} To avoid these pressures, a shrewd prince will respect the independence of judges from executive power, one of the keystones of any moderate constitution.\textsuperscript{56} In a republic, too, the legislature can insulate itself from supplicants seeking favorable verdicts by genuinely renouncing all power to influence judges.\textsuperscript{57}

The powerful, moreover, can often be persuaded to jettison powers that are likely to excite lasting hatred and resentment. To exercise judicial power is to create winners and losers. Winners may or may not feel appreciative; but losers almost certainly feel aggrieved. It is dangerous to wield judicial power because the powerful are eye-catching targets for the vengeance of those whom court decisions have really or supposedly harmed.\textsuperscript{58}

(p. 205) While a shrewd prince will forfeit powers that are resented, such as punishment, he will simultaneously retain powers that engender gratitude, such as the power to pardon. Montesquieu recognized the political benefits of separating the power to pardon from the power to condemn or acquit,\textsuperscript{58} as did Machiavelli before him: ‘Princes must make others responsible for imposing burdens, while handing out gracious gifts themselves.’\textsuperscript{59} Loyalty and political support are excited by gifts that are totally undeserved, not by ‘just’ outcomes that seem legally compelled. The far-seeing ruler, for this reason too, will create a genuinely autonomous judicial body for whose actions the political branches receive neither credit nor blame. Independent tribunals will specialize in punishing malefactors and dispensing justice, while he, the prince, will retain for himself the discretionary power to issue pardons and confer other unjustifiable benefits, which presumably stir gratitude in, and secure political support from, the lucky beneficiaries who understand that they are receiving more than they rightly deserve.

And just as princes can empty their In Boxes and increase their most valuable capacities by deferring to independent courts, legislatures can protect themselves from a military coup by deferring to a semi-independent executive. Montesquieu justified the legislature’s delegation of power to the executive on just these grounds: ‘When once an army is established’, he wrote, ‘it ought not to depend immediately on the legislative, but on the executive, power.’ One reason is that ‘its business consist[s] more in action than in deliberation’. But that was not the most urgent consideration, from a republican point of view. Montesquieu’s principal argument, instead, concerned the way in which civilian control of the military itself could be fatally weakened if the legislature tried to retain managerial control of the army:

It is natural for mankind to set a higher value upon courage than timidity, on activity than prudence, on strength than counsel. Hence the army will ever despise a senate, and respect their own officers. They will naturally slight the orders sent them by a body of men whom they look upon as cowards, and therefore unworthy to command them. So that as soon as the troops depend entirely on the legislative body, it becomes a military government.\textsuperscript{60}

Soldiers are naturally contemptuous of ‘talking chambers’. Therefore, to help the legislature to avoid a military coup, a liberal constitution will place operational control of the army in the hands of someone whom military men are likely to salute and obey. This should be a single commander-in-chief who will nevertheless still operate under the eye of, and within guidelines set by, the legislature. The impeachment power should remain ‘a bridle in the hands of the legislative body upon the executive servants of the government’.\textsuperscript{61} But the chief executive must possess enough independent presence and prestige to command the respect of the troops. Not only the legislature’s power, but its very survival as an independent political actor hinges on its willingness to abdicate power in this specific respect. Or so argues the most famous strategist (not only the most famous theorist) of the constitutional separation of powers.

\textbf{IX. Joint Agency and Corruption}\n
When Madison wrote that a good constitution should oblige the government ‘to control itself’,\textsuperscript{62} he meant that it should prevent individual incumbents from yielding to the temptation to prefer their private interests to the interests of the government and thereby ‘to betray (p. 206) the solemn trust committed to them’.\textsuperscript{63} This happened whenever office holders passed laws, created policies, or delivered judicial decisions in exchange for private payments from interested parties. The importance of this problem to the Framers is clear from the reference to ‘bribery’ in the Constitution’s Impeachment Clause. Making bribery into an impeachable (as well as a prosecutable) offense was one way of discouraging incumbents from betraying their colleagues, if not their country, for a consideration.

Given the political context of the late eighteenth century, the greatest threat of bribery came from ‘foreign gold’ or ‘the desire in foreign powers to gain an improper ascendant in our councils’. Hamilton, for example, explicitly contemplated the possibility that ‘a few leading individuals in the Senate’ could ‘have prostituted their influence in that body as the mercenary instruments of foreign corruption’. Serious precautions had to be taken because ‘One of the weak sides of republics, among their numerous advantages, is that they afford too easy an inlet to foreign corruption.’

The constitutional requirement that the President obtain the Senate's consent to treaties is meant to make it more difficult and costly for foreign powers to purchase treaties biased against US interests. It eliminates the convenience of one-stop shopping for foreign purchasers of America's willing collaborators. Both Hamilton and Madison saw the anti-hijacking function of ‘partial agency’ as essential to maintaining American autonomy in foreign affairs. They returned repeatedly to ‘The security essentially intended by the Constitution against corruption and treachery in the formation of treaties’. For instance, ‘The joint agency of the Chief Magistrate of the Union, and of two thirds of the members of a body selected by the collective wisdom of the legislatures of the several States, is designed to be the pledge for the fidelity of the national councils in this particular.’ The requirement of ‘concurrent agency’ in treaty-making also obstructs bribery by making more difficult the air-tight secrecy that it requires.

Members of the ruling elite normally exhibit an ingrained loyalty to the prominent network that provides them favors and protection. There is nevertheless ‘a degree of depravity in mankind which requires a certain degree of circumspection and distrust’, and gives constitution-makers reason enough to anticipate worst-case scenarios. These include defections from ruling circles and collusion between disgruntled and alienated members of the elite, on the one hand, and European diplomats and undercover agents, on the other. An ‘ambitious’ and ‘avaricious’ member of the political elite will occasionally ‘make his own aggrandizement by the aid of a foreign power’. When explaining how often enemy gold ‘contributed to the ruin of the ancient commonwealths’, Hamilton made clear that this threat had by no means disappeared, citing Holland as a recent example.

Hamilton’s insistence that the separation of powers can provide some protection against foreign corruption confirms once again the American Framers’ commitment to strategic constitutionalism. Constitutional structures can be embraced by political elites, even in the absence of popular pressure, simply to protect the interests of the elite itself, in this case from rogue officials who might willingly betray their fellow office holders for that perennially irresistible piece of silver.

(p. 207) X. Constitutionalism and Democracy

To argue that constitutions, as they function in practice, reflect and perpetuate asymmetries of power in society is not to obliterate all distinctions between autocratic and democratic political systems. On the contrary, it is to say that constitutions are more or less democratic to the extent that power in the underlying society is distributed more or less widely and evenly. The way power is distributed in society can, in turn, be influenced at the margins by political institutions but, short of totalitarianism, will be shaped mostly by demographic, technological, cultural, economic, and other developments that operate relatively unconstrained by constitutional politics. In any case, when broad swaths of the population can credibly threaten to withdraw the voluntary cooperation indispensable to political and economic elites, the democratic implications of a constitution will wax. When, on the contrary, elites manage to liberate themselves from any need for the cooperation of most citizens (in oil-extraction economies, for instance, or when mass armies have been replaced by small volunteer professional forces operating push-button weapons), the democratic implications of the constitution under which they jointly live will wane. Historical inquiry strongly supports the hypothesis that the democratic effects of a single constitutional text will expand and contract in tandem with the extra-constitutional leverage of the citizens at large.

For a brief period at the end of the eighteenth century, the word ‘constitution’ shook off its association with the status quo and become a rallying cry for revolutionaries. Thomas Paine, for example, wrote at the time that ‘The constitution of a country is not the act of its government, but of the people constituting its government.’ It followed for Paine that ‘A constitution is a thing antecedent to a government, and a government is only the creature of a constitutions and Constitutionalism

The same distinction between the constituting people and the constituted government, implying against immemorial tradition that leaders in palaces would henceforth defer to subjects in cottages, was elaborated in France, around the same time, by the Abbé Sieyès. He described the government as a delegated authority or \( \text{le pouvoir constituée} \), with no right to revise the rules of the game under which it was elected, and the people or the nation as \( \text{le pouvoir constituant} \) who promulgated those rules which the government had no right either to disobey or unilaterally to revise.\(^{81}\)

True, even traditionalists like William Blackstone admitted that political incumbents could be constitutionally punished for unconstitutional actions. For instance, Parliament had the right and duty to impeach the king’s ministers whenever his ‘prerogative is exerted in an unconstitutional manner’.\(^{82}\) What Blackstone emphatically denied, however, was that an Act of Parliament itself could be either unconstitutional or constitutionally overturned. He could not accept, or perhaps even understand, what the revolutionary generation that followed him was zealously to allege, that there was a lawmaking authority legally higher than the lawmaking authority of the duly constituted legislature. In 1785, Blackstone’s position was aggressively defended against the revolutionary constitutionalists of that decade by the British progressive, William Paley, who argued that ‘An act of parliament in England can never be unconstitutional, in the strict and proper acceptation of the term.’\(^{83}\)

(p. 208) The contrary and revolutionary concept, that legislative acts can be unconstitutional, has obscure origins, but one of its most important sources is Bolingbroke’s \textit{Dissertation upon Parties} (1733–34) which defined ‘constitution’ as a system for promoting the public good under which the community has voluntarily agreed to be governed.\(^{84}\) The political authority of the people, for Bolingbroke, trumps the political authority of the government:

constitutionalists by which our princes ought to govern at all times; government is that by which they actually do govern at any particular time. One may remain immutable; the other may, and as human nature is constituted, must vary. One is the criterion by which we are to try the other; for surely we have a right to do so, since if we are to live in subjection to the government of our Kings, our Kings are to govern in subjection to the constitution; and the conformity or nonconformity of their government to it, prescribes the measure of our submission to them, according to the principles of the Revolution, and of our present settlement.\(^{85}\)

If the government violates the constitution under which its subjects have agreed to be governed, then these subjects may legitimately withdraw their obedience and submission.

Most shocking was Bolingbroke’s claim that statutes legally enacted by Parliament can sometimes be unconstitutional. He focused particular attention on the Septennial Act of 1716, by which the Parliament elected in 1715 unilaterally extended its term until 1722. This Act was unconstitutional in an elemental sense, according to Bolingbroke, because the Triennial Act of 1694, far from being just another statute, was a codification of the revolutionary settlement of 1688–89. Paine and other members of the revolutionary generation were to echo Bolingbroke’s point here, singling out the unconstitutionality of the Septennial Act\(^{86}\) when arguing for the superiority of revolutionary settlements over ordinary legislation. And of course they uniformly took issue with Blackstone, who had stubbornly argued that Parliament ‘can change and create afresh even the constitution of the kingdom and of parliaments themselves; as was done by the act of union, and the several statutes for triennial and septennial elections.’\(^{87}\)

This debate provides an essential backdrop for \textit{Federalist} 53 where Madison famously explained American exceptionalism as rooted in the unique thinking about constitutions that developed in the colonies as they broke away from British control:

The important distinction so well understood in America between a Constitution established by the people and unalterable by the government, and a law established by the government and alterable by the government, seems to have been little understood and less observed in any other country.\(^{88}\)

A constitution unalterable by the government is a historically unprecedented departure, according to Madison, because previously: ‘Wherever the supreme power of legislation has resided, has been supposed to reside also a full power to change the form of government.’ And he continues:

Even in Great Britain, where the principles of political and civil liberty have been most discussed, and where we hear most of the rights of the Constitution, it is maintained that the authority of the Parliament is transcendent and uncontrollable as well with regard to the Constitution as the ordinary objects of legislative provision.99

(p. 209) To illustrate the principal difference between the traditional British and the new revolutionary concept of a constitution, in other words, Madison again invokes the Septennial Act of 1716, exactly like Bolingbroke decades before and Paine shortly thereafter.

Bolingbroke used the Septennial Act to exemplify unconstitutionality not because it violated private rights but because it overrode the right of the electorate to purge the House of Commons of those members who had succumbed to the allure of place, privilege, favoritism, and money handed out by the crown in exchange for legislative servility. Madison, like the other members of the revolutionary generation, was an heir to this outrage. Echoing the centrality which Bolingbroke attributed to ‘the frequent returns of new elections’,90 Madison identified ‘the restraint of frequent elections’91 as the core institution of constitutional government: ‘A dependence on the people is, no doubt, the primary control on the government.’92 Indeed, Madison consistently wrote about ‘free government, of which frequency of elections is the cornerstone’,93 placing the essence of constitutionalism in the separation of powers but in fixed-calendar elections which political incumbents cannot safely, without risking ouster or overthrow, delay or suspend. Rulers who are ‘created by our choice, dependent on our will’94 have a strong incentive to act in the interest of the ‘the great body of the people of the United States’.95 That was the idea, or at least the hope.

Speaking of unrealistic hopes, the democratic constitutionalism of the revolutionary era aimed, by means of regular elections, to prevent ‘the elevation of the few on the ruins of the many’.96 With hindsight, of course, we can see that the success of democratic constitutionalism in this regard was occasional and erratic at best. What remains significant for constitutional theory is that the limited effectiveness of the restraint of frequent elections did not go unnoticed at the time. Even when arguing most forcefully that periodic elections, entrenched in the Constitution, could align the interests of legislators with the interests of citizens, Madison indirectly revealed his underlying doubts:

the House of Representatives is so constituted as to support in the members an habitual recollection of their dependence on the people. Before the sentiments impressed on their minds by the mode of their elevation can be effaced by the exercise of power, they will be compelled to anticipate the moment when their power is to cease, when their exercise of it is to be reviewed, and when they must descend to the level from which they were raised; there forever to remain unless a faithful discharge of their trust shall have established their title to a renewal of it.97

Feelings of dependency on the people, elicited by periodic elections, can be effaced by the mere exercise of power! As Hamilton put the point, ‘It is a misfortune incident to republican government, though in a less degree than to other governments, that those who administer it may forget their obligations to their constituents, and prove unfaithful to their important trust.’98 Political experience had taught both Hamilton and Madison the inherent weakness of the electoral mechanism. But they learned the same lesson from their reading of Locke. Even when raised to high office by periodic elections, Locke had famously explained, public officials will ‘come to have a distinct interest from the rest of the Community, contrary to the end of Society and Government’.99 This is an arresting claim, and a central one to the entire liberal tradition.

Following Locke’s suggestion, Madison agreed that holding power, however it was achieved, affects not only a person’s opportunities but also his motivations. This political alchemy guarantees that the dominant or driving motives of power-wielders, even if elected and facing re-election, will deviate substantially from the leading motives of the rest of society. Even under the restraint of frequent elections, Hamilton would add, ‘the representatives of the people’ will be tempted to view themselves as ‘superior to the people themselves’.100

Without contesting the republican principle that government must be based on the consent of the people,101 Madison expressed strong doubts about the ‘input’ side of democracy. He understood perfectly well ‘the vicious arts by which elections are too often carried’;102 He also wrote about how men of factious tempers could ‘obtain the suffrages’ by ‘intrigue’ and ‘corruption’ or by playing on ‘local prejudice’.103 The American Framers knew nothing of political marketing or the application of advertising techniques to political campaigns. But they were perfectly aware that the will of the people does not always develop autonomously but is frequently shaped and manipulated by the dissemination of false rumors and other species of strategic disinformation. The chimerical accountability of the rulers to the ruled, moreover, even when frequent elections are constitutionally required, depends on the electorate's willingness and ability to gather information about the rival candidates and pay close attention. No constitution, however, can do much about the 'supineness' and 'ignorance' afflicting 'unwary and uninterested' voters.\textsuperscript{104}

Asymmetry of information makes it difficult, if not impossible, for citizens to control politicians. If elected officials, once in office, can use administrative and other resources to misinform voters and keep them in the dark, then they, the incumbents, can successfully liberate themselves from the restraint of frequent elections, even without resort to vote-rigging and other more blatantly anti-democratic methods. The most common technique by which office holders have traditionally eluded accountability is probably the simplest: shameless lying. Because incumbents know things that the voters need to but do not know, periodic elections alone do not, as it turns out, allow citizens to hold politicians to account.

To supply this gaping defect in the electoral mechanism, as is well known, Madison offered a variety of 'auxiliary precautions',\textsuperscript{105} all of which involve multiple delegates who will supposedly keep an eye on each other. To prevent office holders from misusing their delegated powers in secret and thereby escaping electoral reprisal, the constitution should give them the capacity and the motivation for mutual whistle-blowing as well as the capacity and motivation for mutual cooperation. These officials must play no role in each others' appointments or remuneration, but each must have an incentive to warn the electorate, between elections, when they spot rival politicians betraying the public trust.

As these passages suggest, the Framers advertised checks and balances as a republican version of divide et impera, this time designed to discourage corrupt self-dealing by public officials. Plural agency would ideally allow the electorate, which cannot make politics into a full-time job, to play various elected officials off against each other. Occupants of the various (p. 211) departments of government, including magistrates elected at the state level, could be constitutionally incentivized to 'sound the alarm to the people'\textsuperscript{106} in case the occupants of rival branches begin to treat public resources as private assets. In such a system, periodic accountability to the electorate would be supplemented between elections by a form of peer review by rival delegates of the electorate.

It all sounds promising. But, at this point, the Framers' strategic constitutionalism met its Waterloo. Madison's constitutional engineering did not succeed in supplying the defect of periodic elections. His checks and balances proved unable, in the end, to align the interests of the government with the interests of the governed. The separation of powers could not even prevent 'a mercenary and pernicious combination of the several members of government'.\textsuperscript{107} Members of formally separated branches had little trouble colluding in cloakrooms. Some democratic theorists argue that it was the rise of political majorities, able to dominate the legislative and executive branches simultaneously, that made the doctrine of checks and balances 'anachronistic' to the point that it 'just makes no sense'.\textsuperscript{108} But, writing before the emergence of modern political parties, Madison was already fully conscious that 'the dispensation of appointments' could serve as a 'fund of corruption' providing the executive with a power of 'subduing the virtue' of Congress.\textsuperscript{109} Such a purchase of legislative support by executive largesse, in fact, was exactly what Bolingbroke had had in mind when he spoke of the 'unconstitutional dependency'\textsuperscript{110} of the House of Commons on royal patronage. Such theoretically disallowed but practically ubiquitous collusion was to make a mockery of the plural agency on which the dividing and ruling of the inattentive electorate were supposed to depend.

It is worth noting here that American Progressives, hostile to the anti-reform bias they ascribed to the US Constitution, were especially critical of the separation of powers. Not only did it insulate the rulers from the legitimate demands of the ruled, they argued. It also promoted rather than prevented corruption. They assumed, writing in an age of dizzying economic growth, that the Constitution, with its elaborate barriers to the exercise of effective governmental power, suited very well the aim of that group of flourishing big-business men who where to dominate politics in the latter part of the nineteenth century, giving to it the character of the age of the tycoon.\textsuperscript{111}

Checks and balances, they argued, introduced so many easily captured veto points into the system that a status quo bias, beneficial to the rich, was inevitable. This diagnosis is ironic, given Madison's hope that the separation of powers would render corruption and state capture more difficult if not impossible. Contradictory as they are, both
The formal enactment and informal nullification of the Fourteenth Amendment, in the decades after the Civil War,

The formality and enactment of the Fourteenth Amendment, in the decades following the Civil War, people and of the government. These latter forces, he wrote, provide ‘the only solid basis of all our rights’.¹¹⁸

For reasons that remain somewhat obscure, prominent members of the revolutionary generation, at least in America, quickly became convinced that effective governance would be possible even if judges occasionally overturned the decisions of elected assemblymen. According to Hamilton, writing in 1788, ‘whenever a particular statute contravenes the Constitution, it will be the duty of the judicial tribunals to adhere to the latter and disregard the former’.¹¹³ He did not invent the idea of judicial review out of whole cloth, needless to say. Already in 1783, for example, James Iredell, who would later become an Associate Justice on the Supreme Court, had written of ‘a Republic where the Law is superior to any or all the individuals, and the Constitution superior even to the Legislature, and of which the Judges are the guardians and protectors.’¹¹⁴ And earlier precedents of contested relevance can also be exhumed from the archives. In any case, only a few years after the Constitution was ratified, Justice Marshall immortalized the claim that judicial remedies are available in the case of an unconstitutional act of the elected legislature. In a shrewd stroke of strategic constitutionalism, he overturned a law (the Judiciary Act of 1789) that had granted the Supreme Court a power that the Court did not want and could not safely wield.¹¹⁵

But what can we learn about constitutions and constitutionalism from the history of judicial review in the presumed land of its birth?

First, the vast majority of laws overturned by the US Supreme Court throughout its history have been state laws. This suggests that judicial review has advanced the purposes of the federal government more often than it has obstructed them. Really-existing judicial review, like the really-existing constitution to which it belongs, is perfectly capable of enhancing the power of the powerful. When evaluating the trompe l’oeil image of the Supreme Court as an adversary rather than ally of the powerful, as a result, the tactical uses of deception should therefore be kept in mind.

And which rights have the US Supreme Court more consistently protected: the rights of the weak or the rights of the strong? Before trying to answer this wholly rhetorical question, we need to examine, at a higher level of generality, the ‘rights’ that the Supreme Court is allegedly devoted to defending. Focused on strengthening the government, the American Framers famously considered and rejected the proposal to add a Bill of Rights to the Constitution.¹¹⁶ They eventually agreed to do so only to head off anti-Federalist demands to reduce the powers (p. 213) vested in the federal government by the proposed Constitution. Their initial reluctance is revealing.

Hamilton argued in Federalist 78 that it was the duty of federal courts to declare null and void all legislative acts contrary to the manifest tenor of the Constitution. He was no doubt thinking primarily of state laws, expecting that the federal bench would side with the other federal branches against what supporters of a strong national government viewed as the contumacy of the states.¹¹⁷ But he did not imagine that the Supreme Court would overturn statutes, state or federal, based on the justices’ interpretation of airy moral platitudes. Indeed, he mocked the kind of splendid generalities later inscribed in the Bill of Rights as ‘aphorisms’ which ‘would sound much better in a treatise of ethics than in a constitution of government’ for the simple reason that they ‘leave the utmost latitude for evasion’, altogether depending for their binding power ‘on public opinion’ and ‘on the general spirit of the people and of the government’. These latter forces, he wrote, provide ‘the only solid basis of all our rights’.

The formal enactment and informal nullification of the Fourteenth Amendment, in the decades after the Civil War, illustrate nicely the primacy of partisanship and power over ideal justice in constitution-making and especially in the constitutional interpretation of grand libertarian generalities. Power includes not only the power of social and economic elites, it should be said, but also the power of public opinion, now called popular constitutionalism, when enflamed by racism or revenge. When adopted, the Fourteenth Amendment was seen in the South as a blatant expression of victor's constitutionalism. The result of violent conquest, it soon became the legal face of military occupation.

No one can dispute the core of truth in this bitter perspective of the defeated South:

> What was politically essential was that the North's victory in the Civil War be rendered permanent, and the principles for which the war had been fought rendered secure so that the South, upon readmission to full participation in the Union, could not undo them.\(^{119}\)

But the broad and expansive language of the Amendment opened up, as times changed, wide avenues for opportunistic reinterpretation. The ‘amorphous, moralistic, rhetorical categories of liberty and equality’ and ‘the hazy “privileges and immunities” language’\(^{120}\) of the Amendment invited judicial interpretations in line with shifting public and especially elite opinion.

After the withdrawal of Northern troops from the South in 1877, even half-hearted attempts to protect blacks from denigration, subjugation, and physical cruelty were effectively abandoned.\(^{121}\) Finally, in Plessy v Ferguson,\(^{122}\) the Supreme Court effectively nullified the Fourteenth Amendment as a higher law meant to protect black Americans. Revealing just how ‘justice’ can be constantly redefined in line with partisan politics and the interests of the powerful, this episode is typical not exceptional. Equal rights for black Americans in the South, to the extent that they were enforced, were enforced by Northern soldiers. When the troops withdrew, these rights were not worth the paper on which the Fourteenth Amendment had been printed. After the Northerners had grown weary and bored of punishing the South, the real Supremacy Clause of the post-Civil War Constitution reasserted itself, namely White Supremacy.

\(^{(p. 214)}\) In 1952, law clerk William Rehnquist wrote a defense of Plessy, arguing that ‘in the long run it is the majority who will determine what the constitutional rights of the minority are’.\(^{123}\) His motives may have been unsavory but his observation was essentially Hamiltonian. The only solid basis for the rights of black Americans resides in the general spirit of the people and the government. If this spirit is rotten with racial bigotry and libido dominandi, these rights will be violated with impunity.

As interpreted and applied, constitutions are never impartial. They never treat the powerful and the powerless in the same way. Nothing out of the ordinary happened, therefore, when, twisting the original meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment, ‘the Court turned its back on the claims of blacks and opened its arms to those of corporations’.\(^{124}\) Equal protection gave way to Corporate Supremacy alongside White Supremacy. Crudely speaking, the late nineteenth-century Supreme Court granted ample discretion to state legislatures whenever they hurt blacks but little discretion when they threatened to hurt businesses.

Through the history of the Supreme Court, it should be remembered, Justices have always been appointed by politically partisan Presidents and confirmed by politically partisan Senators. Why would judges who came to the Court by such a route be inclined to interpret vague libertarian generalities in a wholly non-partisan way? In the period under discussion, the amorphous right to ‘liberty’ guaranteed in the Fourteenth Amendment was opportunistically seized upon by American corporations and their allies to fight state attempts to regulate labor contracts in a way favorable to workers. The Supreme Court concurred, interpreting Fourteenth Amendment ‘liberty’ selectively to mean economic liberty, especially freedom of contract between consenting adults beyond the reach of state legislatures.\(^{125}\) The Court thereby replaced the legislators’ judgment of what was reasonable with its own judgment of what was reasonable, which, in turn, happened to correspond to the economic interests of the Captains of Industry whom the Justices may or may not have admired.

XII. Conclusion

When studying Plessy, Lochner, and related cases, we should recall Aristotle's claim that ‘the part of a state which wishes a constitution to continue must be stronger than the part which does not’.\(^{126}\) Power in every known society is distributed unequally. Law, including constitutional law, necessarily reflects these asymmetries of power. When these asymmetries of power shift and rearrange themselves over time, laws, including constitutional laws, are amended or reinterpreted or enforced selectively in new ways. Far from being neutral and impartial, law is soaked through with partiality and favoritism. This is just as true of constitutional law as of statutory law.
Constitutions and Constitutionalism

Constitutions emerge and survive because, with a little help from their judicial friends, they serve the perceived interests of the best organized and therefore most powerful social forces. When the powerful discover the advantages they can reap from making their own behavior predictable, they voluntarily submit to constitutional constraints. When non-elites gain leverage, one way or another, elites respond opportunistically by granting legal protections and participatory rights in exchange for cooperation indispensable to elite projects. What we think of as democratic constitutions, as a result, emerge and survive as long as the best organized and therefore most powerful social forces find that they can promote their own interests most effectively by simultaneously promoting the interests of, and sharing political influence with, less powerful but not utterly powerless swaths of the population. That is the lesson taught by the ancient theorists of the mixed constitution. Their hypothesis was that constitutional restraints wax and wane, among other reasons, when non-elites gain and lose leverage over their social superiors. This ground-up approach to constitutionalism is superior to top-down normative approaches because it explains, as normative theorists cannot, why voters gradually lose the ability to control politicians when technological change, economic globalization and other dramatic developments reduce the observable dependency of the rich on the poor and the powerful on the weak.

Constitutional norms are ‘binding’ only when supported by organized interests. This is not a cynical observation. It is rather an instruction. If you wish a constitutional norm to govern the way politicians behave, you need to organize politically to give ruling groups an incentive to pay attention and accept restraints on their own discretion for their benefit and yours. No strategic constitutionalist would delegate such a daunting task to nine justices presiding loftily in a marble hall.

Bibliography

James Bryce, ‘The German Constitution’ in The Holy Roman Empire (1950)

Marcus Tullius Cicero, De natura deorum (H. Rackham trans, 1933)

Marcus Tullius Cicero, De officiis (Walter Miller trans, 1913)

Marcus Tullius Cicero, De re publica and De Legibus (Clinton Walker Keyes trans, 1928)

Denis Diderot et al, ‘Constitution’ in Encyclopédie ou dictionnaire raisonné des sciences, des arts et des métiers (1794), vol 4

Constitutions and Constitutionalism

Ernst Kantorowicz, The King’s Two Bodies: A Study in Medieval Political Theology (1957)
John Locke, Two Treatises of Government (Peter Laslett ed, 1965)
Niccolò Machiavelli, Discourses on Livy (Harvey Mansfield and Nathan Tarcov trans, 1996)
Charles Howard McIlwain, Constitutionalism Ancient and Modern (1947)
Polybius, The Rise of the Roman Empire (1979)
Giovanni Sartori, ‘Constitutionalism: A Preliminary Discussion’ (1962) 56(4) American Political Science Review 853
Abbé Sieyès, Qu’est-ce que le tiers état (1982)

Notes:

Constitutions and Constitutionalism

(9) See Chapter 20.

(11) The Federalist Papers (n 8), no 18, 121.

(15) For Cicero's explicit reference to the constitutio rei publicae, see De re publica, in Cicero, De re publica and De Legibus (Clinton Walker Keyes trans, 1928), 2.21.37, 144–5; see also De re publica, 1.45.69, 104–5; 2.31.53, 162–3; 3.16.70, 104–7; and De legibus, 2.16.23, 398–9; 3.18.42, 508–9.

(18) Cicero, De natura deorum (H. Rackham trans, 1933), 2.56.140, 256–7. An analogy between anatomical constitutions and political constitutions was taken for granted in antiquity: even though a good constitution can prolong and improve the life of a community, the analogy implied, no constitution, however excellent, can prevent the ultimate onset of political decomposition any more than the healthiest regimen of exercise and diet can make a well-disciplined individual immortal.

(20) According to Andrew Lintott,

Polybius’ association of Rome's phenomenal military success with the excellence of her constitution may surprise twentieth-century readers, but it was almost self-evident for a Greek intellectual from within the governing class of the period.

(22) Machiavelli (n 12), 1.14, 42.

(23) The Federalist Papers (n 8), no 28, 175, emphasis added; for an important ‘constitutive’ document in this sense, see Baron von Steuben's Revolutionary War Drill Manual (1985). This is a facsimile reprint of the 1794 edition.

(24) Machiavelli (n 12), 1.2, 13.

(25) The Federalist Papers (n 8), no 4, 40.

(27) The Federalist Papers (n 8), no 5, 45.

(28) Ibid no 18, 119.

(29) Ibid no 18, 120.

(30) Ibid no 11, 80.

(31) Ibid no 5, 47.

(32) Ibid no 4, 42.

(33) See Chapter 25.

(34) I borrow this illuminating example from Elster (n 4, 93–4), who nevertheless insists that ‘in politics, people never try to bind themselves, only to bind others’ (ix).

(36) Ibid 187.

(38) Ibid 3.10.23, 484–5.

(39) Ibid 3.10.24, 487.

(40) Thomas Hobbes, Behemoth (1990), 116.

(42) See Chapter 21.

(43) Ernst Kantorowicz, The King's Two Bodies: A Study in Medieval Political Theology (1957), 383.

(44) The utility of constitutional restraints for keeping elite conflicts within bounds supports Jeremy Waldron's criticism of the Ulysses analogy, namely that constitutionalism assumes not agreement but disagreement among the political decision-makers. Jeremy Waldron, Law and Disagreement (1999), 271.

(45) McIlwain (n 16), 22.

(46) See further Chapter 29 on presidentialism and Chapter 30 on parliamentarism.

(48) Provisions for filling vacancies in Congress, for executive vetoes and Congressional overrides, for admitting new states, for impeaching judges, for electing the President and Vice President if the Electoral College system fails and so forth.

(49) The Federalist Papers (n 8), no 78, 468.

(50) Ibid no 73, 442.

(51) Ibid.

(52) See Chapter 39 on judicial independence as a constitutional virtue.

(54) To vouch this is no proof,
Without more wider and more overt test
Than these thin habits and poor likelihoods
Of modern seeming do prefer against him.

(55) Montesquieu (n 53), bk 6, ch 5, 78.

(56) Ibid 77.

(57) The Federalist Papers (n 8), no 48, 307.

(58) Montesquieu (n 53), bk 6, ch 21, 92–3.

(60) Montesquieu (n 53), bk 11, ch 6, 161.

(61) The Federalist Papers (n 8), no 65, 396.

(62) Ibid no 51, 319.

(63) Ibid no 55, 341.

(64) Ibid no 55, 342.

(65) Ibid no 68, 411.

(66) Ibid no 66, 404.

(67) Ibid no 22, 145.

(68) Ibid no 75, 449–50.

(69) Ibid no 47, 299.

(70) Ibid no 66, 404.

(71) Ibid no 66, 404.

(72) Ibid no 67, 409.

(73) Ibid no 22, 145.

(74) Ibid no 55, 343.

(75) Ibid no 75, 450.

(76) Ibid no 75, 450.

(77) Ibid no 22, 145.

(78) Ibid no 22, 145.

(79) On democracy more generally, see Chapter 11.

10, 88.

(85) Ibid.

(87) Blackstone (n 82), vol I, ch 2, 156.

(88) The Federalist Papers (n 8), no 53, 328.

(89) Ibid.

(90) Bolingbroke (n 84), letter 13, 125.

(91) The Federalist Papers (n 8), no 57, 350.

(92) Ibid no 51, 319.

(93) Ibid no 53, 329; the British have no ‘Constitution’, according to Madison, because Parliament, at the time, had the legal right to perpetuate itself beyond the term for which it was elected:

The important distinction so well understood in America between a Constitution established by the people and unalterable by the government, and a law established by the government and alterable by the government, seems to have been little understood and less observed in any other country [outside the American states].

(94) Ibid no 25, 162.

(95) Ibid no 57, 349.

(96) Ibid no 57, 348.

(97) Ibid no 57, 350.

(99) Locke (n 7), sec 143, 410.

(100) The Federalist Papers (n 8), no 78, 466.

(102) Ibid no 10, 77.

(103) Ibid no 10, 78.

(104) Ibid no 64, 389.

(105) Ibid no 51, 319.

(106) Ibid no 26, 168.

(107) Ibid no 55, 342.

(109) The Federalist Papers (n 8), no 55, 342.

(110) Bolingbroke (n 84), letter 13, 124–5.

(112) Blackstone (n 82), vol I, ch 3, 90–1.
(113) The Federalist Papers (n 8), no 78, 467.

(114) James Iredell, ‘Instructions to Chowan County Representatives’ in Don Higginbotham (ed), The Papers of James Iredell [[September 1783] 1976], vol 2, 449; cf Commonwealth v Caton (1782), 8 Virginia (4 Call), 5; cf Hamilton’s description five years later of federal judges as the ‘guardians of the Constitution’ (The Federalist Papers (n 8), no 78, 469).

(117) The Federalist Papers (n 8), no 80, 474–5.

(118) Ibid no 84, 514.

(120) Ibid 52, 57.

(121) In United States v Cruikshank 92 US 542 (1876), the Court had already given a green light to KKK massacres of black Americans presumably because the public officials who organized the killings were not acting in their official capacity and were not dressed as state actors.

(122) Plessy v Ferguson 163 US 537 (1896).

(126) The Politics of Aristotle (n 35), 1296b, 185.

Stephen Holmes

Stephen Holmes is Walter E. Meyer Professor of Law, New York University School of Law
This article examines three topics that have persistently arisen in connection with discussions of constitutions: What is the relation between a constitution and a ‘nation’ or a ‘people’, understood as those who reside within the territory for which the constitution is a constitution? What is the relation between written and unwritten principles of a constitution? And, to what extent must constitutions and their constituent elements be more permanent than ‘ordinary’ legal rules, and by what mechanisms is the requisite degree of permanence maintained?

Keywords: constitution, nation, constitutional law, legal rules the appropriate exercise of sovereign power.

Definitions of the term constitution tend to circularity. Dicey's definition uses the term sovereignty. Tracing that term through the Oxford English Dictionary, we find it defined as ‘supremacy in respect of power, domination, or rank; supreme dominion, authority, or rule’.\(^5\) Supreme is defined in turn as ‘highest in authority or rank; holding the highest place in authority, government, or power’.\(^6\) Authority as ‘power or right to enforce obedience; moral or legal supremacy; the right to command, or give an ultimate decision’,\(^7\) right as ‘a legal, equitable, or moral entitlement’,\(^8\) and, finally, entitle as ‘to give (a person or thing) a rightful claim’. Circularity of this sort is probably inevitable. Terms like constitution are more used than defined, and understanding them means knowing how they are used. The term constitution is used to identify fundamental institutional arrangements, mostly but not always dealing with the distribution of political power, that are more entrenched than is ordinary law. To understand the term, we have to see what people do when they describe something as fundamental, or entrenched, or as implicating political power.

Like all definitions, these rest upon some presuppositions, for example, that terms like sovereignty and authority are perspicuous. Attempting to make the terms used in the definitions precise rapidly gets into deep jurisprudential waters. Defining authority as a ‘right to enforce obedience’ immediately raises standard jurisprudential questions about the distinction between a power to enforce a command and a right to so do, or, perhaps equivalently, about the distinction between (mere) compliance and obedience. A complete understanding of how the term constitution functions in the discourse of constitutional law might require exploration of those and similar jurisprudential issues, and even an introduction to the subject will have to at least touch on those issues.

This chapter examines three topics that have persistently arisen in connection with discussions of constitutions as such: What is the relation between a constitution and a ‘nation’ or a ‘people’, understood as those who reside within the territory for which the constitution is a constitution (Section I)? What is the relation between written and unwritten principles of a constitution (Section II)? And, to what extent must constitutions and their constituent elements be more permanent than ‘ordinary’ legal rules, and by what mechanisms is the requisite degree of permanence maintained (Section III)?

\[I. \textbf{Must a Constitution be Autochthonous?}\]

The view that law, including constitutional law, resulted from a nation's ‘spirit', itself the product of economics, geography, and path-dependent histories, emerged early in the development of comparative law as a subject of study. For Hegel, ‘A constitution ... is the work of centuries; it is the idea, the consciousness of rationality so far as that consciousness is developed in a particular nation.'\(^9\) Understood as a descriptive map of the relations of power that (p. 219) regulate the exercise of public power, a constitution might be thought almost necessarily autochthonous, generated by arrays of power that inevitably differ from nation to nation. In 2010 Singapore's Constitution, in a descriptive sense, gave an important role to Minister Mentor Lee Kuan Yew, who occupied a position created by executive order for him alone; no other nation is likely to have such a position, and it may well disappear with Lee Kuan Yew's passing. Yet, to the extent that a nation's constitution has some stability, one might observe constitutional structures that have migrated across national boundaries.

\[1. \textbf{Constitutions and the Demos}\]

Another version of the idea that constitutions must be autochthonous, suggested for example by Hegel's reference to 'a particular nation', brings the idea of a constitution together with ideas of ethnonationalism. A nation’s constitution, it might be said, constitutes the nation's people, in the sense that it ratifies—and perhaps ossifies—the identification of a demos (or, depending on the nation's self-understanding, an ethnos) with a state. France’s commitment to laïcité, Israel's self-identification as a ‘Jewish and democratic state' in its Declaration of Independence, and Kemalist secularism in Turkey are all versions of the idea that a nation's character qua nation is intrinsically connected to the idea that a nation has a constitution. The proposed Treaty for a Constitution for Europe elicited a substantial discussion of whether having a constitution presupposed the existence of a demos for which the Treaty would be a constitution, as have related discussions of the 'constitution' of the international community.\(^10\)

One argument for the proposition that a constitution requires a demos rested on the conceptual point that a costitution must be created by a constituent power, which, so the argument goes, must preexist the exercise of the power to create a constitution. Constitutions might simultaneously presuppose and constitute a citizenry of some sort, though not necessarily an ethnos. Consider written constitutions: answering the question, Who may participate in the ratification process?, presupposes that there is some group for whom the constitution will be a constitution. At the same time, that group might not be tightly bound together before ratification; the decision to participate in ratification and to respect the outcome of the ratification process may tie groups together, at least provisionally. Indeed, constitution-writing at least, and perhaps reorganizing the descriptive constitution more generally, might occur only when the community for which the constitution is designed faces problems that might be characterized as putting into question the existence of a demos.
Constitution

The conceptual connection between the existence of a demos (and even more, of an ethnos) and the descriptive constitution may be even weaker. In the basic, descriptive sense, the international community has a constitution even though it may not be a sovereign in the classic, state-oriented sense, because that community has organized methods of exercising whatever powers it has. Similarly, some—perhaps all—subnational entities have descriptive constitutions (and some have written constitutions), but not all subnational entities have a distinctive demos, being organized for mainly administrative purposes. Further, the connection between a descriptive constitution and an ethnos might not be as tight as the purely conceptual argument about constituent power suggests. Experience in some constitutional systems such as Canada and theorizing by Jürgen Habermas on constitutional patriotism suggest in contrast that a writ (p. 220) ten constitution can provide an identity around which a nation can form. Limited to entities that have sovereignty in the classic sense, a descriptive constitution may exist only with respect to a territorially defined nation-state, although one can imagine, perhaps only with a great deal of effort, a descriptive constitution for diasporic communities or the Islamic umma.

Further, written constitutions and even descriptive constitutions generally need not be the focal point for national identity. Ethnic origins and religious identities might be more fundamental to that, with the descriptive constitution playing a minor role. Even in the legal domain, one might think that the Civil Code in France serves to create that nation's legal identity much more than any of its constitutions has done.

2. Constitutional Borrowing

Scholars of general comparative law have examined the issue of autochthony under the heading of 'transplants' or 'borrowings'. Measures of success for transplants are themselves contested. Some scholars believe that transplants are rarely successful because they tend to be incompatible with the 'spirit' of a nation's laws; others believe that transplants may succeed when they fulfill functional needs within a legal system whose specific resolution is a matter of indifference to those wielding power. That latter qualification suggests a view common in discussions of transplants—that however transplants work in private law fields, they work differently, and almost certainly less well, in constitutional law.

Most discussions of transplants deal with specific institutions and rules, and to that extent are predicated on the emplacement of the transplant into some written portion of a nation's constitution. Yet, constitutional ideas can be borrowed, and those ideas need not have a canonical verbal statement. No matter the form of the transplant, skepticism about the potential for success might be justified along these lines: a nation's constitution describes the way in which existing power relations regulate the exercise of government power. A transplant might disrupt those power relations, in which case power-holders will respond either by ignoring the transplant or by transforming it so that it maintains rather than alters existing power relations. In the latter situation the transplant's form remains but its substance has been hollowed out. Alternatively, the transplant might not have any effect on existing power relations. Then, however, the transplant would seem to have nothing to do with the nation's constitution in the descriptive sense. Finally, a transplant might reinforce power relations, for example by giving the most powerful in society the ability to exercise their power more effectively. Here the transplant is successful, but one might question whether the phenomenon should be described as a transplant rather than as an institutional innovation produced by a general search for more effective means of exercising power.

Assuming that we have a decent metric of success—perhaps something combining measures of persistence and effectiveness at achieving intended goals—some degree of skepticism about constitutional transplants does seem justified. Constitutional ideas and structures might migrate, but in the process they might well be transformed to conform to the local spirit of the laws. 'Proportionality' has been described as a 'universal rule of law', and ideas of proportionality and even parallel doctrinal formulations of proportionality tests occur in (p. 221) several legal systems, but what they mean in each system appears to vary, at least to some extent, because of national traditions.\textsuperscript{16}

At the same time there are enough examples of successful transplants to caution against overly strong assertions about the viability of constitutional transplants or borrowings. Miller has argued, for example, that the drafters of the Argentine Constitution of 1853 explicitly used the US Constitution as a model, down to the level of minute details.\textsuperscript{17} He argues that the domestic constitution succeeded in achieving most of its drafters’ aims, for at least a few generations, because the constitution gained legitimacy from its emulation of the widely admired US model. One might treat this as a version of an autochthonous constitution because domestic drafters chose the model to use in light of their goals and their understanding of how the adopted model would operate within the existing array of power. The example suggests that autochthony and borrowing, even extensive borrowing, are not necessarily incompatible.

Purely imposed constitutions present another variant. These constitutions may be imposed by a conquering nation on a defeated adversary. The post-1945 constitutions of Germany and Japan are typically offered as examples of successful imposed constitutions. An important feature of imposed constitutions is that the pre-imposition array of power has been massively disrupted, and those formerly holding power might be unable to reproduce to any significant extent their role in the constitution-as-power-map, which might explain these examples. Yet, even in these cases the degree of imposition, while quite substantial, can be overstated. The German Basic Law drew upon long-standing traditions of liberal constitutionalism in Germany, which had been suppressed during the National Socialist regime but which re-emerged after 1945.\textsuperscript{18} The MacArthur-drafted Japanese Constitution of 1949 retained the position of Emperor in a concession to still-important power-holders, and the occupying forces allowed domestic legislators to devise the imposed document's translation into Japanese, giving the legislators at least a minor role in specifying the document’s content.\textsuperscript{19}

Constitutional transplants may well disrupt existing power relations without fully displacing them. They are in this sense an irritant to the descriptive constitution, and power-holders will respond to the disruption. Importantly, some of those with some power might find the disruption advantageous and the transplant a useful weapon in their ongoing efforts to transform the constitution-as-power-map, to expand their own power or limit their opponents’. Perhaps transplants are successful when they disrupt the existing array of power enough to provide openings for transformation, and also give some set of power-holders incentives to stabilize the transplant, perhaps adapted slightly, within a new descriptive constitution.

II. The Constitution’s Boundaries

Until the late twentieth century, a recurrent topic for discussion was the distinction between a written constitution, for which the US Constitution of 1789 with its amendments was the paradigm, and an unwritten one, for which the constitution of the United Kingdom was the (p. 222) paradigm. The wave of constitution-making in the last half of the twentieth century substantially reduced the salience of that distinction in its usual form. Constitutions embodied in a single written document—which can incorporate both other documents by reference and amendments adopted by methods prescribed in the document itself and appended to or integrated within the document—or at least embodied in a well-defined set of a relatively small number of documents came to be seen as almost essential to identifying a nation as an actor on the international stage. Adopting such a constitution eased the path to recognition of statehood under developing norms of international law, such as the European Community Declaration on the ‘Guidelines on the Recognition of New States in Eastern Europe and in the Soviet Union’. Because a constitution can provide a ‘focal point for political cohesion’ of a nation or of a people,\textsuperscript{20} one might note here a tension between the idea that a constitution, written or not, is necessary for recognition of a state on the international scene, and the idea that a constitution, again, written or not, constitutes a nation in the ethno-nationalist sense, a tension arising from the distinction between state and nation upon which ethnonationalism rests. Further, constitutional review exercised by courts or court-like institutions, which spread throughout the world during the same period, seemed to require a foundation in a written constitution, although judicial decisions finding some constitutional amendments unconstitutional on substantive grounds seem defensible only if the courts are enforcing some unwritten ‘preconstitutional’ norm.\textsuperscript{21}
By the beginning of the twenty-first century it could be plausibly contended that the United Kingdom, New Zealand, and Israel were the only nations in the world without written constitutions. And, it could be plausibly contended that Israel and New Zealand had constitutions that could be identified by ‘stapling together’ a number of written documents such as the Basic Laws in Israel or fundamental statutes and executive directives in New Zealand, or that the Human Rights Act 1998 completed the process of writing a British constitution by making it legally impossible to modify any of the other fundamental statutes by ordinary legislation, a topic addressed in more detail in the following section.

If the salience of the distinction between written and unwritten constitutions has diminished, the conceptual issues raised by that distinction remain important. The legal philosopher John Gardner described one such issue in asking, ‘Can There be a Written Constitution?’ The question was of course a provocation, playing off the more common question, Can there be an unwritten constitution? Gardner drew on the positivist tradition in analytic legal philosophy, specifically H.L.A. Hart’s argument that all law, including constitutional law, rested on a ‘rule of recognition’ that in the end could not be reduced to words. Rather, the ultimate rule of recognition could be found not in any document but only in the regular practices of officials orienting themselves to their actions with a specific cast of mind.

Frederick Schauer offered a striking example of why the ultimate rule of recognition cannot be written, or more precisely why the rule of recognition resides in social practices rather than in any written words. Suppose one thought that the ultimate rule of recognition in the United States was the written Constitution, which does declare its own supremacy over all other law. Then consider a scenario in which one person approaches another with two documents in hand: one labeled ‘The Constitution of the United States’, which contains a provision saying that whatever the person carrying it says, is the supreme law of the land, and the other a document labeled ‘Law directing the transfer of all property to the bearer’. The person with the two documents demands that the other turn over all her property to him. She refuses, questioning whether the self-designated ‘Constitution’ is the real Constitution of the United States. The disagreement between the two parties will be resolved through law (as distinct from resolution through sheer physical power) by identifying other people in the society who are generally regarded as officials charged with enforcing and interpreting the law and finding out which document they treat as the US Constitution. Much in this account needs to be unpacked; for example, the qualification ‘generally regarded as officials’ is designed to deal with the problem that would arise were the person carrying the self-designated ‘Constitution’ to deny that someone whose opinion was sought, was indeed a public official. Still, the Hartian idea that the ultimate rule of recognition—and by inference the constitution—cannot be written seems plausible enough. One taking this view can even agree with the natural-law challenge to Hart, for on many accounts the natural law or the moral prescriptions that control the content of what can count as law (or as the ultimate rule of recognition) are themselves unwritten and perhaps cannot be written out in enough detail to cover all the contingencies to which the prescriptions will apply.

1. Constitutional Usages and Conventions

Gardner’s argument applies high legal theory to constitutional law. Identifying unwritten constitutions, or unwritten portions of constitutions, raises questions on a lower level. The paradigmatic unwritten constitution—the classical British Constitution—consists of fundamental statutes such as Magna Carta, the 1689 Bill of Rights, the Acts of Union with Scotland and Ireland, and more than a handful of others, and, more important for present purposes, a group of practices generally referred to as constitutional conventions, or sometimes as usages (to avoid confusion with constituent assemblies). All constitutions have conventions and usages within them. The principle of civilian control of the military is written nowhere in the US Constitution, there being no constitutional bar to an active-duty military officer serving as President and so commander-in-chief of the armed forces, yet it is as fundamental to the organization of the US government as is the rule that each state has two Senators. The United States may have a convention against secession as a result of the Civil War’s outcome, and the Canadian Supreme Court, acting in a related context, identified constitutional conventions in that nation against unilateral secession and for a duty to negotiate the terms of secession in good faith when one or more provinces indicated by substantial majorities an interest in seceding. The next section addresses whether and how fundamental statutes and usages can change.

Two preliminary questions arise in connection with usages and conventions: (1) how can we identify whether a practice is a convention rather than an empirical regularity that happens to exist but has no normative force and (2) how do constitutional conventions and usages (p. 224) arise (and, relatedly, how can we identify which statutes are so fundamental as to be part of the constitution)? For both questions the general account resembles Hart's account of the ultimate rule of recognition. We know that a convention is in place when officials generally comply with it without reflection, feel some obligation to explain their deviations from the ordinary practice by offering arguments invoking fundamental values such as the nation's preservation when under attack, and are likely to incur some substantial political cost when they do deviate from the ordinary practice. This account suggests that there might be fundamental statutes as well. Such statutes have characteristics similar to usages: officials rarely propose significant modifications to them, seek to justify such modifications by invoking equally or more fundamental values, and run significant political risks from merely proposing significant changes in the statutes. The statutes that are parts of the unwritten British Constitution almost all involve the political process, which Dicey's definition describes as 'the distribution or exercise of the sovereign power of the state'. Statutes that advance substantive policies such as civil rights, protection of the environment, and the like, might also be fundamental. As these observations suggest, there is no algorithm for identifying a constitutional convention or usage as distinct from a practice that is followed because it generally is convenient but whose observance is unaccompanied by any normative weight, or for identifying fundamental statutes as distinct from long-standing ones that happen to be functionally effective even in the face of substantial changes in their social context.

2. The Constitution 'Outside' the Constitution

In systems in which the written constitution dominates, these fundamental statutes might be described as 'The Constitution Outside the Constitution'. Where courts exercise the power of constitutional review, fundamental statutes of this sort are different from the written constitution. No court will invalidate a later statute as 'unconstitutional' if a litigant contends that the later statute is inconsistent with a statute located in the constitution-outside-the-constitution, even if the reviewing court agrees that the later statute is indeed inconsistent with the earlier one. Fundamental statutes may have legal effects flowing from their 'fundamentality' nonetheless. Courts may construe later statutes to be consistent with the fundamental statutes, sometimes torturing or even departing from otherwise controlling methods of statutory interpretation. They may construe later-enacted fundamental statutes to be implied repeals or modifications of earlier statutes, again even when doing so is contrary to otherwise controlling interpretive rules.

The constitution-outside-the-constitution consists in fundamental statutes. Cass Sunstein has identified another phenomenon, which he calls 'constitutive commitments'. These commitments are the principles that underlie the statutes that make up the constitution-outside-the-constitution. Sunstein's concept clarifies the legal status of such statutes by making it easy to reject the view that mere amendments to them, such as ones that tinker with details or modify the statutes to make them more effective in achieving their goals (at least in the eyes of the amenders), are potentially unconstitutional. That view might be plausible were we to take the constitution-outside-the-constitution to be on a par with the constitution itself, but it is implausible in principle. What remains unclear is whether a legislature could lawfully simply repeal a statute reflecting constitutive commitments, at least without acknowledging that it was engaging in a quasi-revolutionary transformation of the nation's constitution.

All the ideas discussed in this section raise questions about the boundaries of the descriptive constitution. Carl Schmitt's identification of the 'state of exception', while directed at normative constitutionalism, suggests the possibility that the descriptive constitution can have no boundaries. Schmitt argued that liberal constitutions were inevitably incomplete because they could never fully deal with what he called the 'state of exception', more recently denominated 'emergencies' threatening the life of the nation as identified by some important political actors. The conditions creating such emergencies could never be fully specified in advance, which meant, to Schmitt, that provisions in written liberal constitutions aimed at regulating the exercise of power in emergencies would always fall by the wayside—and this would be true even were some political actors to contend that the constitutional provisions actually dealt with the situation at hand, because other political actors could always pick out characteristics of that situation that made it different from the ones the constitution addressed. Schmitt argued that the only political actor well positioned to declare a state of exception was the executive, and he appears to have assumed that executives would always have strong incentives to do so when they found their major initiatives frustrated by political opposition. That is clearly wrong as a description of political reality, because executives might have reasons both moral and political for accepting constraints on their ability to pursue even major initiatives. Reframed as arguments about possibilities and probabilities, Schmitt's claims have found substantial support in worldwide experience. Though framed as a challenge to liberal constitutionalism, Schmitt's treatment of the state of exception applies to descriptive constitutions as well. The only difference is that, with respect to the descriptive constitution, the political actor claiming that a state of emergency exists is offering an institutional innovation to deal with the problem at hand, not 'violating' the descriptive constitution.

Some UK constitutional scholars have argued that that nation's constitution is political, in the sense that its provisions—including its protections of human rights—are only partially enforced by the courts but receive full enforcement through politics (or perhaps more precisely through civil society, which typically acts through politics). The idea that there might be fundamental statutes and constitutive commitments that courts might not directly enforce even in systems with robust constitutional review suggests that at least portions of a nation's constitution must be political in the sense used by these scholars, and might support the conclusion that the distinction between a legal constitution and a political one can readily be overdrawn.

3. Operative and Sham Constitutions

As written constitutions became nearly universal, a distinction more closely connected to the idea of constitutionalism than to the idea of a constitution as such became more salient. Normative constitutionalism provides the ground for distinguishing between a 'sham' constitution and an operative one. Sham constitutions, of which the Soviet Constitution of 1937 is the paradigm, embody the normative values associated with constitutionalism in their texts but in operation fall dramatically short of actualizing those values, whereas operative ones actualize them to a reasonably high degree (though inevitably not perfectly). A descriptive constitution of course cannot be a sham in this sense, because the descriptive constitution simply is what it is. Some written constitutions reject normative constitutionalism on their face, for example by lodging all power in the hands of the chief executive or, as in the People's Republic of China, in the hands of the National People's Congress and its Standing Committee, ‘under the leadership of the Communist Party’. Still, the distinction between sham and fully operative constitutions may highlight the fact that a constitution can be fully operative and inconsistent with normative constitutionalism. Further, some constitutions that seek to be constitutionalist as well can contain provisions that unintentionally obstruct the flourishing of constitutionalism. Typically these provisions give substantial power to the executive ('presidentialism') or deal with the exercise of power during ill-defined emergency situations, although Carl Schmitt argued that emergency powers necessarily conflict with constitutionalism. Finally, sometimes descriptive constitutions contain elements that are not even intended to be fully actualized, at least in the short run. Such elements can be shams, but sometimes they identify national aspirations; examples might be the Directive Principles of Social (or State) Policy in the Irish and Indian Constitutions.

III. Constitutional Stability

Analytic clarity requires that the descriptive constitution be distinguishable from the ordinary law that happens to be in place at any one time. As the Oxford English Dictionary puts it, ‘it is assumed or specifically provided that the constitution is more fundamental than any particular law, and contains the principles with which all legislation must be in harmony’. The most obvious candidate for distinguishing between a constitution and ordinary law is that the constitution is more stable—is both less likely to change and more difficult to change—than ordinary law. Constitutions, it is thought, are more entrenched than are ordinary laws. So, for example, without additional argument one would not want to say that coalition governments were part of the entrenched British Constitution in 2010. Yet, the criterion of entrenchment may be difficult to apply. Should the dominance of social democratic parties in the Nordic countries for most of the second half of the twentieth century be treated as part of the descriptive constitution, even though those parties could have been displaced in a single election? During the same period corporatist bargaining between peak organizations of employers and workers mediated by state officials usually determined major social policies. Should corporatism be treated as part of the descriptive constitution? And, from the other direction, one can easily identify ordinary laws that have proven more stable than a nation's constitution, the French Civil Code being the most obvious example—a single statute that has persisted as one written constitution has replaced another.
1. Incentives for Stability

The analysis of the descriptive constitution must address two separate questions about stability: How are the fundamental arrangements embodied in the descriptive constitution maintained over time? and How are the mechanisms for maintaining them different from those that produce some degree of stability even in ordinary legislation? One potential answer lies in attention to the incentives political actors have: a practice may be sufficiently stable if political actors have reasonably strong incentives to restore the practice when one or a few actors deviate from it and as a result political actors have few incentives to try to alter the practice. Yet, sometimes ordinary law will have this characteristic. Politicians who propose to take away a widely distributed benefit will suffer political damage, yet only some such benefits—the general social safety net, for example—are plausible candidates for the label ‘fundamental’, whereas others, such as some tax deductions, are not, unless they can fairly be described as part of the general social safety net.

Perhaps we could supplement attention to incentives with attention to the grounds for deviating from existing practices. The ordinary law in place at any specific time is stable because those with the requisite degree of political power agree with that law, but it can be displaced if approval changes to disapproval, subject to a modest amount of inertia in the lawmaking process. Perhaps the descriptive constitution is stable enough when innovations are proposed for the purpose of achieving specific political outcomes because there are those who oppose the anticipated outcomes on the merits. Perhaps the descriptive constitution is less stable when innovations are proposed so as to restructure the descriptive constitution itself, and the reason may be that no one can be confident in predicting the innovation’s results. Of course, the lack of confidence reduces the incentives anyone has to offer this type of change.

Separation-of-powers systems and judicial review exemplify mechanisms for producing stability in fundamental arrangements. In well-designed separation-of-powers systems, the members of different branches are selected by different processes, and for that reason are likely (it is thought) to seek to implement different policies. Each branch, personified, is alert to efforts by another branch to aggrandize itself because that kind of aggrandizement will interfere with the first one’s ability to implement the policies it prefers. Judicial review stabilizes institutional arrangements more directly, when the courts enforce the bargains struck either in the written constitution or in long-standing usages. These mechanisms, and others with a similar structure, stabilize the descriptive constitution by creating institutions within which repeated interactions can occur, at some times advantaging one group, at others another. If political actors understand that though some have an advantage at the moment their advantage might disappear relatively soon and that current political disadvantages might be only temporary, everyone might choose to operate within a stable decision-making structure giving them some chance to succeed in the foreseeable future, especially because instability imposes its own costs on everyone’s ability to achieve their desired policy goals.

Yet, a question bedevils this argument as well. Why should political actors operate within a status quo political structure that disadvantages them for the moment with respect to the policies they prefer if they have the power to replace that structure with another one that would allow them to implement their policies immediately? So, for example, in systems with judicial review why do political actors comply with court orders rather than defy them, or replace the sitting judges, or restructure the system of judicial review immediately? ‘[H]ow [do] political arrangements become “institutionalized” ‘ in the relevant sense?38

One possibility is that normative value attaches to status quo practices as such, sometimes described as ‘the normative power of the actual’. One must describe this phenomenon with some care. Normative power must attach to status quo practices not merely because they promote (or impede) the adoption of substantive policies, and must be different from the efficiency associated with continuing to do things as they have been done and from the costs associated with devising and implementing a new way of doing things. Yet, it remains unclear why normative power would attach to the actual as such. Perhaps the status quo somehow places cognitive limits on those who would otherwise design institutional alternatives: they simply cannot imagine doing things much differently. Notably, scholars of comparative law, including constitutional law, often offer as a benefit of their study an expanded imagination for institutional design. A related point is that people gain experience in operating within the status quo institutions, and learning how to operate within newly created institutions is costly, perhaps more costly than the losses with respect to substantive policies that emerge from the status quo institutions.39
Drawing on the US experience, Bruce Ackerman has argued that fundamental institutional arrangements persist because they are adopted in periods of heightened public deliberation over constitutional fundamentals. This argument may explain why constitutional arrangements have greater normative force than ordinary law, but it does not explain why constitutional arrangements are more firmly entrenched than ordinary law. When the ‘constitutional moments’ of heightened public deliberation have passed, the people acting in their quotidian way would have no reason, from their present point of view, to retain the institutions they chose earlier if they believe that those institutions are impeding their ability to adopt the policies they prefer. Perhaps more important here, Ackerman’s argument might have some purchase in connection with some kinds of democratic constitutions and to normative constitutionalism, but it is obviously inapplicable to constitutions as such.

A final possibility invokes the argument about repeated interactions, this time on the institutional level. Consider a political actor disadvantaged by existing judicial mechanisms of constitutional review, such as long terms for judges. She might want to ‘pack’ the court with supporters. But, she might realize that her opponents might pack the court themselves were conditions to change, thereby making her institutional victory short-lived. The difficulty with this argument arises from the time-horizon over which political actors consider their prospects. It is one thing to accept an institutional arrangement that is currently producing undesired results, when those results can be changed within a few years through the status quo mechanism, but another thing to accept institutional arrangements that systematically produce undesired results simply because new institutional arrangements might be displaced after what is likely to be a significant longer period. The logic here is straightforward: with respect to ordinary legislation produced by the status quo institutions, people are willing to wait a while to see if they can get what they want; but with respect to institutional arrangements people will ‘take the money and run’, that is, change the arrangements and get whatever they can from them as long as they persist.

2. Constitutional ‘Regimes’ and their Persistence

These and similar questions typically fall within the domain of political science and sociology, but constitutional law must advert to them. Focusing on the US experience, political scientist (p. 229) Stephen Skowronek has helpfully analyzed the existence of a succession of constitutional ‘regimes’. These regimes consist of relatively stable institutional arrangements coupled with relatively deep programmatic commitments on the part of leading political actors, set within a relatively unchanging written constitution or within a relatively unchanging set of conventions and usages. Suitably adapted to the political arrangements in other nations, Skowronek’s approach seems a promising one for analyzing the distinction between a constitution and ordinary law. So, for example, one might speculate that the economic and social conditions of advanced democracies in the early twentieth century conducive to divided government or cohabitation in separation-of-powers systems and coalition governments in parliamentary ones. If so, one could treat coalition government as part of the British Constitution during the present time. Supporting that speculation would require insights and evidence drawn from empirical social science.

Generalized, Skowronek’s insight is that political actors seek advantage by using the status quo constitutional arrangements—where the term refers to the descriptive constitution—to advance their ambitions and programmatic goals. If they succeed, they innovate institutionally, altering the descriptive constitution to stabilize and deepen their political support. Their opponents operate within the status quo arrangements, though, and they may resist the institutional innovations. Skowronek suggests that institutional innovation becomes more difficult the longer institutional arrangements are stable, as the beneficiaries of the status quo arrangements use the political power they have gained from those arrangements to impede change. Skowronek’s insight could be applied to descriptive constitutions anywhere, including, notably, authoritarian constitutions that fall outside the concerns addressed by normative constitutionalism.

3. The Stability of Constitutional Usages and Conventions

Constitutional conventions and usages present a particular problem in this setting. Horwill describes several constitutional usages in the United States that have simply disappeared, and how they disappeared is worth note. At one time there was a convention that the US President would not travel outside the nation’s territory, as exemplified by meetings the US President held with his Mexican counterpart on a bridge joining the two nations. After Thomas Jefferson decided to send his annual address to Congress in writing, believing that delivery in person had monarchical resonances, a convention developed that the US President would not address Congress in person. Woodrow Wilson ‘defied’ both conventions, presenting his address in person in 1913 and attending the peace conference in Versailles after the armistice ending the First World War. Wilson’s actions shattered the conventions, which simply disappeared from the unwritten portion of the US Constitution thereafter. If a convention can be displaced so easily, why should it be treated as a convention rather than as a mere habitual practice? Here too incentives might matter: no political actor had a strong incentive to counter Wilson’s deviation from the prior practices through some sort of political challenge to what Wilson did, so the custom or convention that Wilson breached disappeared.

Seen from another perspective, though, ‘breaches’ of conventions sometimes occur not because political actors do not oppose the deviation from prior practice but rather because they do, or more precisely because some political actors see the possibility of gaining advantage (p. 230) by altering existing practices. They therefore contend that the practice they challenge has no normative force—is not a convention at all—but merely an ordinary practice that can be changed at will. Constitutional events in Australia in 1975 illustrate the point. On most accounts of Australia’s constitutional conventions, the nation’s prime minister—occupying a position not mentioned by name in Australia’s written constitution—retained the position as long as he or she had the confidence of a majority in the lower house. In 1975 the Governor-General dismissed a prime minister who did have majority support in the lower house, citing governmental paralysis resulting from the prime minister’s inability to get a budget adopted in the face of persistent opposition from the upper house.42 Was this a breach of the constitution’s conventions, as most commentators suggest, or action taken in novel circumstances not encompassed within the convention as previously understood? One can hear Schmittian themes in the background of these events.

The foregoing observations are brought into focus by studies measuring the ‘lifespan’ of constitutions.43 The typical written constitution is in place for roughly two decades. Although these studies do not compare the lifespan of constitutions with that of ordinary legislation, it is hard to believe that the latter is much different from the former. Legislatures generally do not wipe the slate clean even after large electoral shifts—and when they do we tend to think that a constitutional revolution has occurred. Most ordinary laws, that is, are as stable as the descriptive constitution. The reason is clear. All the mechanisms that produce institutional stability with respect to the descriptive constitution are available with respect to ordinary legislation. Nor is it obvious why the mechanisms would be systematically stronger in connection with the constitution than with ordinary legislation. For example, why would we get greater stability across a wide range of institutional arrangements from the prospect of repeated interactions than we would get across a similarly wide range of ordinary legislation? The same question arises with respect to all the mechanisms that produce constitutional stability. Without an answer, we cannot distinguish, with respect to the entrenchment that is said to characterize the descriptive constitution, between it and the laws that happen to be in place at any specific moment.

IV. Conclusion

Distinctions pervade discussions of descriptive constitutions: between unwritten constitutions and those written in single documents, between constitutions codified in numerous written documents and those with important uncodified components ‘outside’ the codified constitution, between constitutions and fundamental statutes of near-constitutorial stature and constitutive commitments on the one hand and ordinary laws on the other, between real and sham constitutions, between constitutions adopted by design and those that simply evolved, and more. Much important work is simply taxonomic, in trying to identify a specific descriptive constitution’s characteristics. Yet, closely examined many of the distinctions are unstable: some ordinary laws are more stable than some constitutional provisions and even entire constitutions, for example. Even so, the classifying exercise can be important. Careful attention to the various categories regularly leads to anti-necessitarian conclusions: one can (p. 231) find a counterexample for every characteristic said to be necessary for understanding descriptive constitutions. And such attention can be particularly valuable when it discloses a specific constitution’s unexpected features. Examining those features then contributes to understanding the nation’s constitution even if the concepts used to pick the out of the entire descriptive constitution might themselves dissolve when closely scrutinized.

Bibliography
Bibliography

Bruce Ackerman, The Future of Liberal Revolution (1992)
Bruce Ackerman, We the People: Transformations (1991)

Herbert W. Horwill, The Usages of the American Constitution (1925)

Reference re Secession of Quebec [1998] 2 SCR 217

(p. 232) Carl Schmitt, The Concept of the Political (George Schwab trans and ed, 2007)

Notes:

(6) ‘Supreme’ in ibid vol 17, def 2.a.

(7) ‘Authority’ in ibid vol 1, def 1.a.

(8) ‘Right’ in ibid vol 14, def 9.b.

(12) See also Chapter 64 on constitutional transplants, borrowing and migration.

(13) On constitutional efficacy, see Chapter 37.

(24) See Gardner (n 22).

(29) For a good example, see R v Secretary of State, ex p Anufrijeva [2003] UKHL 36, where Lord Steyn's comments can be read as suggesting that a statute could be ‘construed’ even against its plain meaning so as to make the statute consistent with fundamental law.

(31) For a hint that it could not, see Bruce Ackerman, ‘The Living Constitution’ (2007) 120 Harvard Law Review 1737, 1753-4 n 38.

(34) On constitutionalism more generally, see Chapter 8.

(36) See Schmitt n 32. See also Chapter 21 on states of emergency. On presidentialism, see Chapter 29.

(37) See n 3, comment on def 7.

(39) Ibid.

(40) Bruce Ackerman, We the People: Transformations (1991); for an application to constitutional development outside the United States, see Bruce Ackerman, The Future of Liberal Revolution (1992).

(42) For an extended discussion, see George Winterton, Parliament, the Executive, and the Governor-General: A

---

Mark Tushnet

Mark Tushnet is William Nelson Cromwell Professor of Law, Harvard Law School
This article explores the theory of rule of law. It asks the question: What else is required if it is not enough for the rule of law that law should rule. Conventional accounts usually start with so-called ‘anatomical’ characterizations of the rule of law. That is to say, they stipulate elements of legal institutions, rules, and practices, and sometimes achievements, that are seen as adding up to the rule of law. Such accounts are contrasted with an expressly ‘teleological’ approach, which starts with reflection on immanent purposes and values of the rule of law, what it is for, and only then moves to spell out how such ends might be attained. That spelling out is likely to be more variable in content, and refer to many things besides legal institutions, than are familiar rule of law anatomies. It all depends on what is needed in particular places and times which themselves vary, to achieve the ends of the rule of law. The discussion here begins with some influential anatomies, and moves on to teleology.

Keywords: rule of law, anatomies, teleology, institutions, rules, practices

I. Introduction 233
II. Anatomies of the Rule of Law 235
   1. Institutions 235
   2. Rules 237
   3. Procedures 239
III. What's the Point? 240
IV. Negative or Positive? 242
V. The Administrative State 246
VI. Contexts and Conclusions 247

I. Introduction

Rule of law is one of a number of overlapping ideas, including constitutionalism, due process, legality, justice, and sovereignty, that make claims for the proper character and role of law in well-ordered states and societies. Among these, ‘rule of law’ has in recent times come into its own. It is lauded by international agencies, pressed upon conflictual, post-conflict, and ‘transitional’ societies, and of course talked up by politicians and lawyers, particularly judges, all over the world. It is examined in political theory and jurisprudence, and also, though less often, has been subjected to sociological investigation. It used to be much criticized by Marxists and others on the Left, including by members of the Critical Legal Studies movement, but these criticisms are less audible today.

Beneficiary of such praise, called upon for so many purposes, examined in so many ways, deployed in so many domains, not only its virtues but also its meaning tend to swell in the telling. So underlabour needs to be done to clarify the concept, even though no amount of effort will clear away all doubts and differences among those who employ it. We can start with the phrase itself. Is it necessary for the rule of law that law rule? Is it sufficient?

Starting with necessity, it would be an odd rule of law without law. And so, one way a society could lack the rule of law is for its rule to be by means other than legal ones. In such a society, and of course I exaggerate to make the point, law would not be engaged in the exercise of (p. 234) power, which takes place without legal authorization, excuse, or form. This is the thought that underlies the old distinction between limited, even if authoritarian, government and tyranny. Thus Montesquieu, late in a long tradition, distinguished between monarchies, ‘in which one alone governs, but by fixed and established laws’, and ‘despotic government [in which] one alone, without law and without rule, draws everything along by his will and his caprices’. He favoured the former.

At the other extreme are societies where no one rules but many fight. Such is Hobbes’s ‘state of nature’, ‘solitary, poore, nasty, brutish and short’. Life in John Locke’s natural state is less brutal, less solitary, and perhaps longer, but still inhabitants are minded to leave it, because

First, there wants an establish’d, settled, known Law ... Secondly, ... there wants a known and indifferent Judge, with Authority to determine all differences according to the established Law [and] Thirdly, ... there often wants Power to back and support the Sentence when right, and to give it due Execution.*

Remedy those three defects, and you have moved some way toward the rule of law. Similar reasoning applies to the anarchic ‘failed states’ common in the contemporary world. Again, and obviously, law does not rule in a failed state.

As to rule: whatever the character of the laws themselves and the will of political authorities to abide by and apply them, if law in a particular society is routinely trumped by, say, raw legally unauthorized exercise of power by gangsters, conmen, or more generally legally unauthorized power-wielders, it makes little sense to speak of the rule of law. Similarly, the political authority might speak through law and act within it, but no one listens because other authorities drown out what it says or make its pronouncements irrelevant to, or powerless against, ways life is lived and expected to be lived. Then it is not the law that rules, and so not the rule of law.

Thus, as long as we adopt a sufficiently flexible notion of ‘rule’, a necessary condition of the rule of law is that law must rule. Flexibility is important since, contrary to lawyers’ conceits, law never rules in anything other than a socially mediated fashion. This affects the character and extent of law’s rule, and not always in ways that lawyers find easy to imagine. Law is no unmoved mover, self-starting and brooking no attenuation or modification or interpretation, on the way to those whom it seeks to rule. Even at its most ruly, which is in any case always a matter of degree, the rule of law is a qualified and variable thing, depending for its effectiveness on many social, legal, and political forces and agencies being ‘in sync’.

Whatever the case with necessity, however, the mere existence and use of law are by themselves not sufficient for the rule of law. Common in the literature is a distinction between rule of and rule by law. In the second phrase, political power is exercised by legal means but key elements of the rule of law are lacking, two in particular. One is that governments not merely rule by law but are reliably and effectively constrained by it as well. In many states, law has been a very useful vehicle (and at times equally useful camouflage) for authoritarian exercise of power. Where this is so, though rule might be by, it is not of law. Again, it must be stressed, we speak of differences of degree, not categorical distinctions of kind.

(p. 235) Of course, this is always partly so. Much law serves as an instrument for the achievement of governmental administrative and regulatory goals in every modern state. Today’s governments are not sporting umpires, simply enforcing inherited and rarely changing rules of a game made elsewhere and elsewhere. They are active in pursuing their own purposes, and make laws to serve them. However, where the state is framed and constrained by effective and independent legal institutions, professions, and traditions, and typically these days written, effectively binding and relatively fixed constitutions, we are a world away from a polity, such as the former Soviet Union, where regular legal constraint on the power of the Communist Party was for long periods not merely non-existent but unthinkable. Indeed, it was illegal given the ‘leading role’ constitutionally accorded the Party. So even though this polity was not lawless, since there was plenty of law about, its legal subordination to a supra-legal authority vitiated the feature that makes the rule of law distinctive and precious: constraint by law on the ways in which power can be exercised.
Secondly, though governments may rule by what they call law, this law might fail in some respects to be of a character that warrants use of the phrase, ‘rule of law’. If the laws are secret, retrospective, contradictory, impossible to know, to understand, to perform, it has often been said, as we will see, they do not add up to the rule of law. Nor would they even if the government obeyed them.

If it is not enough for the rule of law that law should rule, what else is required? Conventional accounts usually start with what I have elsewhere called ‘anatomical’ characterizations of the rule of law. That is to say, they stipulate elements of legal institutions, rules, and practices, and sometimes achievements, that are seen as adding up to the rule of law. I contrast such accounts with an expressly ‘teleological’ approach, which starts with reflection on immanent purposes and values of the rule of law, what it is for, and only then moves to spell out how such ends might be attained. That spelling out is likely to be more variable in content, and refer to many things besides legal institutions, than are familiar rule of law anatomies. All depends on what is needed in particular places and times which themselves vary, to achieve the ends of the rule of law. I begin here with some influential anatomies, and move on to teleology.

II. Anatomies of the Rule of Law

1. Institutions

Some writers, particularly lawyers, see the rule of law as inhering in particular features of legal institutions. Those who believe they have the rule of law often identify it with their own institutions; emulation is recommended for those benighted enough to lack them and envious enough of the rule of law to want them. The most influential account in English, that of the constitutional theorist Albert Dicey, is of the first sort; contemporary experiments in ‘transitional’ societies are often of the second kind. According to Dicey, the rule of law depends on three characteristics of English law, lacking elsewhere. The first is a system of government which excludes ‘the exercise by persons in authority of wide, arbitrary, or discretionary powers of constraint’. The second is universal subjection to ‘the ordinary law of the realm and amenable to the jurisdiction of the ordinary (p. 236) tribunals’. The third is a system whereby the ‘general principles of the constitution’ are developed as the result of judicial decisions determining the rights of private persons in particular cases brought before the courts; whereas under many foreign constitutions the security (such as it is) given to the rights of individuals results, or appears to result, from the general principles of the constitution.

Each of these elements has a sting in its tail. Opposition to ‘wide, arbitrary, or discretionary’ powers implies that each adjective identifies dangers of the same order to the rule of law. However, whether wide or discretionary powers are incompatible with the rule of law depends on whether they inevitably bear some defect inconsistent with it; the most likely conjecture being that they allow or even promote arbitrariness. But must they? It is obvious that they could, if the powers were so wide that power-holders could do anything they wished in any way they chose, or discretion so untrammeled that, again, power was quite unconstrained and its manner of exercise able to be capricious and unpredictable. Dictatorships often frame their laws in such ways, and some imagined slippery slope in this direction appears to have underlain the fear of many opponents, among them Dicey, of the welfare state’s expansion of governmental powers and discretions. However, it is not self-evident that discretion is of its nature illimitable or width unframeable, or either unreviewable or unaccountable. Width and discretion might indeed be necessary for flexibility in many circumstances of governance, and for many legitimate ends. If they can be effectively framed and subjected to principles and to review, must one assume that they will involve arbitrariness, which is the real foe of the rule of law? Eliding them all, however, does make it easier to oppose an active state.

Secondly, the notion that the rule of law depends on subjection of all to ‘the ordinary law ... [and] tribunals’ rules out both continental public law and a great deal of public law in the Anglosphere as well. That is to rule out very many countries of the developed world.

Finally, it appears from Dicey that the rule of law is only consistent with ‘common law constitutionalism’, as it bubbles up from court decisions and not with a constitution derived from ‘general principles’, perhaps as set out in a written constitutional document. It is not clear that this accurately describes even the English Constitution of Dicey's time.\textsuperscript{11} It certainly makes the rule of law rather a rare commodity today, rarer than is commonly imagined. Many people, after all, believe traces of it might be found even outside New Zealand, Israel, and pre-EU Britain, exemplary though these countries' unwritten constitutions might be. So if the concept of the rule of law is to lend itself to comparative use, rather than just to identify a peculiar even if apparently blessed eccentricity, Dicey will not be of much help.

The point is larger than one thinker. Institutions are products of particular histories and circumstances; the more detailed their specification, the more particular such products are likely to be. They often travel poorly. A lot that matters about the ways they work where they have grown—conventions, inherited understandings, shared but tacit knowledge among initiates and inheritors of local tradition—are not always easily identified, let alone packaged and shipped. They are easily overlooked and left behind. And a lot that matters where the institutions land is strange too, and not always supportive. To the extent that the rule of law is identified with just one way of doing things, therefore, it is unlikely to move very far or very well. If it does travel it will change, unless the indigenous recipients of its beneficence are overwhelmed or destroyed in the process, which, of course, has happened. That does not mean that the rule of law can only exist where it was born, however. For conceived as an ideal or cluster of ideals rather than a specific arrangement of particular institutions, routes to the rule of law might vary, without that rendering it unapproachable.

2. Rules

Legal philosophers tend to focus on more abstract features of legal orders than did Dicey. Particularly prominent have been certain formal characteristics of legal rules, which H.L.A. Hart called 'principles of legality',\textsuperscript{12} and Lon Fuller describes as the 'internal morality of law'.\textsuperscript{13} These features of the character of laws, rather than the substantive content of law are often equated with the rule of law. Fuller famously listed eight of them and others have further elaborated that list.\textsuperscript{14} According to Fuller, the internal morality of law requires that it be expressed in general rules, rather than simply ad hoc pronouncements; publicly available to affected parties; prospective not retrospective; comprehensible; not contradictory; not requiring the impossible; not so changeable that they cannot provide guides to action; be administered in ways that conform to their terms. No legal system achieves perfection in any of these dimensions, nor is perfection a salutary ideal for a practical art. All depends on degree, and overachievement is not necessarily superior achievement. However, a 'legal' system that does systematically poorly in any of these ways suffers degradation and degeneration in the character of its institutions and its output. The integrity of legal forms, captured in these eight 'principles of craftsmanship', according to Fuller, is denied by such laws, and with that denial, in extreme forms, so too the moral ground for obeying them. This, Fuller insists, is true quite apart from the substantive goals governments seek to achieve.

Two apparently simple assumptions underlie this and similar sorts of catalogue. One is that the rule of law, which involves law being a source of guidance to its subjects, depends upon people being able to know the law that applies to them when they are choosing how to act. The second is that these principles are necessary for people to be able to do so. Even if you accept these assumptions, what follows from them?

Legal positivist critics of Fuller accept the list and the assumptions but deny that there is anything intrinsically moral about his internal 'morality'. They are, they say, just principles of efficacy, necessary for the law to serve any purpose, but open equally to moral and immoral uses.\textsuperscript{15} Though common, this is an odd argument. Tyrants often have good reason to conceal what they do from, among others, those to whom they do it. Their purposes may not rely on subjects' ability to know the provisions of the law, understand precisely what it prohibits and permits, plan their lives according to it, still less know what to do to avoid its sanctions or object to abuses of it. It might be enough that they are terrified, knowing that whatever is done to them cannot be resisted, or that rulers have maximum flexibility and/or subjects maximum uncertainty. Evil regimes rarely will have reason to use laws that embody law's internal morality, at least when they do their worst.\textsuperscript{16} Conversely, denial of Fuller's principles, often systematic, can help them to attain their purposes, and they have not been unaware of it.\textsuperscript{17} Nor was Fuller.

This is a dramatic example of a more general point. Fuller insists on a distinction between 'managerial direction', a 'one-way projection of authority, originating with government and imposing itself upon the citizen',\textsuperscript{18} and law properly so called, which depends upon interaction between law-giver and citizen. The manager wants jobs done at least cost to best effect; efficacy refers to the degree of success in achieving managerial goals. Elements of institutional character are subservient to such goals, and are therefore contingent; appropriate to, and only to, the extent to which they help in the achievement of centrally directed goals. If it would help achievement of such goals to keep things quiet, allow unfettered discretion to decision-makers, or change rules rapidly, there is no intrinsic managerial reason to object. Interaction has a different logic. For law to provide a reliable basis for reciprocal (not to mention mutually respectful) interaction between law-giver and legal subject, the trade for their obedience must be that the latter are able to predict and rely upon the routine ways in which power is exercised. Unlike managerial direction, interaction requires substantial adherence to the internal morality of law as a matter of principle, Fuller believes, not merely contingent and revisable practice.

And finally, this distinction between ways in which governments treat citizens in turn rests upon a less instrumental, more deontological, moral claim. It has to do with what Fuller calls ‘the view of man implicit in legal morality’. Here again the objection to deviation from the internal morality has in the first instance not to do with the external substantive purposes that might be pursued. Rather it concerns whether one treats persons with respect:

> Every departure from the principles of the law’s inner morality is an affront to man’s dignity as a responsible agent. To judge his actions by unpublished or retrospective laws, or to order him to do an act that is impossible, is to convey to him your indifference to his powers of self-determination.\(^\text{20}\)

‘Indifference’ is a good word to use here, since it can span both intentional oppression or repression and well-meaning authoritarian direction. Even where the former is absent, there is a lot of the latter in modern societies, even those governed with the best of intentions and with a large measure of the rule of law. But there are also many elements that affirm and reaffirm human dignity: a high degree of the internal morality of law, defences in criminal law, provisions concerned with due process, publicity, rights, including rights of appeal, and so on.\(^\text{21}\) These features are not all captured, however, by this list of formal features of the rules. They inhere in legal procedures characteristic of the rule of law. We move to these now.

\(^{21}\) See p. 239

3. Procedures

One reason why analytical legal philosophers commonly adopt such a thin and formal account of the rule of law as the preceding, is the fear that loading wide-ranging substantive ideals into the concept melts it into everything else we might like, and renders a separate and distinct concept otiose. As Raz expresses the point, > if the rule of law is the rule of good law then to explain its nature is to propound a complete social philosophy. But if so the term lacks any useful function. We have no need to be converted to the rule of law just in order to discover that to believe in it is to believe that good should triumph.\(^\text{22}\)

That seems to me a serious reason to be cautious about overly thickened substantive conceptions of it. However, there is arguably an important point between ‘thin’, purely formal accounts of the rule of law and those so ‘thick’ that they simply equate it with the good, the attainment of human rights, or the doing of justice.\(^\text{23}\) That point has to do with values specifically associated with the operations of law. As we have seen, there are already values that underpin the selection of Fuller’s eight characteristics of legal rules. But these are not the only values peculiarly (though not exclusively) relevant to legal orders.

Accounts of the rule of law of the Fullerian sort concentrate primarily on the centrifugal force of law, on the formal qualities of the messages legal institutions send out to citizens. However, law also draws citizens in, whether it is police picking them up on the street and delivering them to gaol, or when they come in to courts and other official institutions to do combat with other citizens or with the state. How the law treats them at such points, where other means of resolving differences have not prevailed and the stakes are therefore often high, is a particular concern of many legal traditions.

Whereas Dicey had a lot to say about relationships between this key aspect of law and the rule of law, legal philosophical treatments of the rule of law are rather light on in this respect. And yet, as Jeremy Waldron stresses, when ordinary citizens think of the rule of law, they are more likely to have this in mind than the formal quality of legal rules.\(^\text{24}\) And in relation to this, as Neil MacCormick also emphasizes, ‘law is an argumentative discipline’\(^\text{25}\) and that is not through accident or misadventure. Nor is the argument left unstructured by the law. People with legal interests at stake need to be able to speak for those interests, whether they accuse or are accused. This requires a good deal of provision from legal orders, by way of procedures that require impartial third party hearings, defences, ability to speak, examine witnesses, present evidence, see evidence relied upon by the other side, and so on. As Waldron emphasizes:

"Argumentation (about what this or that provision means, or what the effect is of this array of precedents) is business as usual in law. We would be uneasy about counting a system that did not exhibit it and make routine provision for it as a legal system. ... Courts, hearings and arguments—those aspects of law are not optional extras; they are integral parts of how law works; and they are indispensable to the package of law's respect for human agency. To say that we should value aspects of governance that promote the clarity and determinacy of rules for the sake of individual freedom, but not the opportunities for argumentation that a free and self-possessed individual is likely to demand, is to slice in half, to truncate, what the (p. 240) Rule of Law rests upon: respect for the freedom and dignity of each person as an active intelligence."

Respect for freedom and dignity are good things in general, of course, and there are many ways to manifest and deny them that have nothing to do with law. However, given that law is, in Fuller's words, an 'enterprise of subjecting human conduct to the governance of rules', that enterprise is liable to impinge directly and even dramatically on these values. It is no accident, then, as Waldron stresses, that they are:

in a deep and important sense associated foundationally with the idea of a legal system—that law is a mode of governing people that treats them with respect, as though they had a view of their own to present on the application of a given norm to their conduct or situation. Applying a norm to a human individual is not like deciding what to do about a rabid animal or a dilapidated house. It involves paying attention to a point of view and respecting the personality of the entity one is dealing.

Both the unpredictability or unreliability of the exercise of power, and the inability to challenge it, are obnoxious for several of the same reasons as having one's own perspective silenced or ignored. For the rule of law is sought in opposition to arbitrariness, and that can come in many guises.

III. What's the Point?

According to Max Weber, "Sociologically, the state cannot be defined in terms of its ends. ... Ultimately, one can define the modern state sociologically only in terms of the specific means peculiar to it, as to every political association, namely, the use of physical force." Is Weber's general point applicable to the rule of law? Certainly, there has long been dispute between natural lawyers and legal positivists over whether the concept of law itself is to be understood in this way or rather is 'a concept like hospital rather than a concept like state (in Weber's sense)', one that necessarily incorporates some reference to what it is for. Whatever the case with the concept of law, the rule of law is a more clearly compelling candidate for teleological understanding. The rule of law is not a natural entity, simply awaiting scientific description; it too needs to be understood in terms of what it is for. While such a purpose could in principle be value-neutral or even harmful, the rule of law is commonly thought valuable, an ideal for law. If we value that ideal we should seek to identify what might generate it. But without some principle of selection even if only tacit, we will not find a bunch of legal bits and pieces waiting 'out there' and neatly recognizable as the rule of law. As Rosenfeld has observed,

"Like the concepts of 'liberty' or 'equality,' the descriptive meaning of 'the rule of law' is dependent on the prescriptive meaning one ascribes to it; in the context of complex contemporary polities there likely will be vigorous disagreements concerning the relevant prescriptive standards at stake."

(p. 241) This is evident, if implicit, even from the anatomical accounts we have just discussed. Thus Dicey did not merely choose three characteristics at random among the many that English law possesses. Rather, he believed them to be the specific sources of 'a trait of national character which is as noticeable as it is hard to portray'. But what if he were wrong in that portrayal? Or, counterfactually, what should he have said if he could be persuaded that similar 'trait[s] of national character' could be found elsewhere with a completely different set of legal conventions, practices, and institutions? Would he deny that they had anything to do with the rule of law, or might he have to concede that he had misunderstood the sources of the rule of law, or at least been mistaken in suggesting that there were no other ways to the same end?"
Similarly, there is nothing purpose-neutral or, indeed, value-neutral about Fuller’s ‘principles of legality’ or MacCormick’s and Waldron’s stress on procedural requirements for the rule of law. The rule of law is a purposive and normative concept, not just a happenstance collection of legal-institutional characteristics. We might avoid many false steps were we to start by articulating the valued ends we associate with the rule of law, and only then move to speculate about how they might be approached. It is more common, however, to proceed the other way around.33

What is that valued state of affairs, which allows us to speak of the rule of law existing in a society? Here I would propose a distinction between external and immanent values of the rule of law. Thus, according to the World Justice Project, the rule of law is ‘the foundation for communities of opportunity and equity ... the predicate for the eradication of poverty, violence, corruption, pandemics, and other threats to civil society.’34 This extravagant list is of external consequences that flow, if they do, from the presence of the rule of law, rather than immanent ones, in the sense of this distinction. They are things we might value as elements in a good society, and presumably would still value, if we were handed them on a plate, whether or not we needed the rule of law to achieve them.

What ends are immanent in this sense? Here there is great room for argument, though we are not flying blind, since there are enduring themes in rule of law traditions. Even if my own specific proposal is rejected or augmented, however, I would urge the first point of this section: start with ends, so to speak, whatever you take them to be; do not jump too hastily to means.

One recurrent theme in rule of law traditions35 is a contrast between the rule of law and arbitrary exercise of power. Institutionalizing ways of reducing arbitrary power is an immanent rule of law value, whatever else flows from it. The concept of arbitrariness is complex and insufficiently theorized. However, a good starting point is Philip Pettit’s definition:

An act is perpetrated on an arbitrary basis, we can say, if it is subject just to the arbitrium, the decision or judgement, of the agent; the agent was in a position to choose it or not choose it, at their pleasure.36

It is such unconstrained exercise of arbitrium that partisans of the rule of law have opposed and sought to eliminate. Unpredictable exercise of power is one way of treating its targets arbitrarily; another is its exercise, whether predictable or not, that takes no account of the perspectives of those whom it would affect.

(p. 242) Why does arbitrariness matter? Because it tends ineluctably to: threaten the liberty of anyone subject to it; generate reasonable and enduring fear among them, even if arbitrary power happens pro tem not to be exercised in fearful ways, as long as it might be at any time; and deprive citizens of sources of reliable sources of expectations of, and coordination with, each other and with the state. And, as Fuller and Waldron have emphasized, it threatens the dignity of all who find themselves mere objects of power exercisable at the whim or caprice of another. These are four good reasons to value reduction of the possibility of arbitrary exercise of power.37 To the extent that the rule of law can help to deliver such reductions, this is reason to value it. This is not, of course, merely a negative matter of removing evils, but can be expressed positively. A society in which law contributes to securing freedom, confidence, coordination, and dignity, is some great and positive distance from many available alternatives. There are other things we want from law, and many more things we might want in a good society, but ways of serving these values are goods immeasurably harder to attain without institutionalizing constraints on arbitrary exercise of power.

There is nothing original or even lonely in nominating opposition to arbitrariness as a fundamental concern of the rule of law. However, taking the point seriously and starting with it has a number of implications that have not always been noted. The most important is that the utility of the anatomical accounts above depends on how adequately they capture what is necessary to secure this value. To the extent they do, they have aided us in identifying what the law needs to be like to serve the end of the rule of law. To the extent that they do not, however, it is not at all clear why we fix on them so, still less try to extend them to places where they might merely have parodic roles. The challenge for the rule of law is not primarily to emulate Dicey, Fuller, or Waldron, but to reduce the possibility of arbitrary exercise of power.

Taking this ambition seriously, moreover, may not only require different legal rules and practices from those we know, particularly in places we do not know, but also the recognition that many of the most significant sources, goods, and dangers to the rule of law are to be found in the wider society, not merely in or even near the obvious...
Rule of Law

institutional centres of official law. There are numerous societies in which arbitrariness flows as much or more from extra-state exercises of power, sometimes aided by suborned official agencies, sometimes opposed to them. Sources of power are many, and possible constraints on it may come, or fail to come, from many domains of social life.

IV. Negative or Positive?

Many thinkers have combined a high regard for the rule of law with a negative view of it. This is only an apparent, verbal, paradox. For it is common to understand the rule of law as good less for what it creates than for what it might prevent. On this understanding, the rule of law is pre-eminently concerned to block the possibility of unruly power, to curb, restrain, and channel power’s exercise.

This is not a new development. Thus the historian John Philip Reid emphasizes, of the English legal tradition imported to the United States, “From time immemorial the legal heritage of Europe beyond the pale of Roman law had been law as restraint, not law as command.” He quotes Bracton’s revealing metaphor from the thirteenth century, of law as ‘the bridle of power’, by which a just king, as distinct from a ‘tyrant’, must ‘temper his power’. Again, Judith Shklar, partisan of ‘damage control’, as the first goal of political arrangements, insists that the prevention of evil, rather than a quest for the good, is the signal and precious virtue of the rule of law.

Whereas for Shklar the rule of law acts negatively to priceless effect, the legal philosopher Joseph Raz also construes its significance as negative, and though he praises it, the praise is relatively tepid (two cheers). He describes it as ‘a purely negative value ... merely designed to minimize the harms to freedom and dignity which the law might cause in its pursuit of its goals however laudable these might be.’ Shklar does not share Raz’s lukewarm tone, and there are two mistakes here that she would be unlikely to make. First, the harms for which the rule of law is a suggested antidote are abuses of power, not merely of law. There are many ways in which power can be exercised, used, and abused, even by the state, without the intervention of law. The rule of law is intended to exclude all those other ways from the start. More is necessary, but that exclusion is no small matter where the dangers of arbitrary power are a concern. Secondly, what of all those power-holders outside the state, that might abuse power, though not through law? Constraining them by law is no small matter. Nevertheless, Shklar and Raz agree at least that the value of the rule of law lies in what it rules out rather than what it rules in; what it restrains and prevents, rather than what it generates and encourages to flourish.

A more complex way of characterizing the ambition to constrain and channel power by law that is simultaneously an instrument of power, is old in the English tradition of the rule of law. It was well described by Charles McIlwain, and its rationale has recently been recovered and re-articulated by Gianluigi Palombella as central to the rule of law. According to this tradition, the point of the rule of law is “to prevent the law from turning itself into a sheer tool of domination, a manageable servant to political monopoly and instrumentalism.” It requires that, besides the laws that tend to the will of governments, “another” positive law should be available, which is located somehow outside the purview of the (legitimate) government, be it granted by the long standing tradition of the common law or by the creation of a ‘constitutional’ higher law protection, and so forth. The common law writers spoke of a balance between the sovereign’s untrammelled right to pursue the ends of government (gubernaculum) and legal protection of the right (jurisdiccion). The former must not overwhelm the latter, even if it is unlimited in its own sphere.

The solution was found in the common law, viewed not just as a moral limit but a binding legal one. Written and binding constitutions are more recent examples of such an ambition. In all these the ruler is constrained by something that is truly law but not his to rule, not able to be bent to his will. Such a conception, such a duality, Palombella argues, was missing, until the last century’s spread of constitutions, from the continental European Rechtsstaat, which many, wrongly in his view, assimilate to the rule of law. Without this duality, a state may commit to Fuller’s criteria of non-arbitrariness as its form of rule, without any overarching constraint that renders anything beyond its power. Its ultimate goals might have nothing to do with reduction of domination, fear, indignity, or confusion. They might simply amount to tidy, reliable, and controllable ways for officials to extend state power and transact matters of state. On Palombella’s view, the rule of law goes further than this. It lawfully sets limits on even a sovereign’s lawful powers.

Even in this version the stress is on constraint as the distinguishing feature of the rule of law. Not everyone agrees.
One way to disagree is to say there is more to the rule of law than constraint on power. Another is to redescribe the significance of rule of law constraints themselves. Ronald Dworkin and Philip Selznick disagree in the first way; Stephen Holmes in the second.

Dworkin is sceptical of conventional ‘rule book’ conceptions of the rule of law, which insist that so far as is possible, the power of the state should never be exercised against individual citizens except in accordance with rules explicitly set out in a public rule book available to all ... Those who have this conception of the rule of law do care about the content of the rules in the rule book, but they say that this is a matter of substantive justice, and that substantive justice is an independent ideal, in no sense part of the ideal of the rule of law.45

He, by contrast, regards the rule of law as an ideal and an eminently positive and substantive one, ‘the ideal of the rule by an accurate public conception of individual rights’.46 On this view, the rule of law is the rule, in ‘law’s empire’, of Dworkin’s theory of law.

Selznick has written more, and more variously, on the rule of law than Dworkin, and his views are more complex. On the one hand, he understands the appeal of the negative conception, and he has often emphasized its importance. Thus, he agrees with those political realists who stress the importance of legality as a restraint on, and see the rule of law as a precious protection against abuse of, power.47 On the other hand, there is a ‘larger promise of the rule of law’, and this thicker, more positive vision speaks to more than abuse of power. It responds to values that can be realized, not merely protected, within a legal process. These include respect for the dignity, integrity, and moral equality of persons and groups. Thus understood, the rule of law enlarges horizons even as it conveys a message of restraint.48

This threatens to breach Raz’s opposition to giving a concept so much work that it fails to do any useful job, but it need not. Selznick is particularly insightful about the dynamic pressures that a legal order will tend to generate, both when it fails to satisfy subjects’ expectations as when it succeeds. Unusual among writers on the rule of law, Selznick was a distinguished sociologist, and in part his objection to a purely limited conception of legality is that:

We cannot really separate the negative and positive aspects of the rule of law. Indeed it would be highly unsociological to try to do so, for we would then miss the moral and institutional dynamics which create demands for justice, and which induce rulers to accept accountability. ... we should not reduce the rule of law to its most rudimentary forms.49

There is yet another sense in which the rule of law can be understood to be a positive achievement, one which does not deny that it is primarily a matter of constraints but interprets differently the significance of those very constraints. Thus, Stephen Holmes elaborates on the (p. 245) empowering consequences of legal constraints, as elements of what he calls ‘positive constitutionalism’. The ‘paradoxical insight’ of this tradition, that:

constraints can be enabling, which is far from being a contradiction, lies at the heart of liberal constitutionalism. ... By restricting the arbitrary powers of government officials, a liberal constitution can, under the right conditions, increase the state’s capacity to focus on specific problems and mobilise collective resources for common purposes.50

As he goes on to show:

constitutions not only limit power and prevent tyranny, they also construct power, guide it toward socially desirable ends, and prevent social chaos and private oppression, immobilism, unaccountability, instability, and the ignorance and stupidity of politicians. Constitutions are multifunctional. It is, therefore, a radical oversimplification to identify the constitutional function exclusively with the prevention of tyranny.51

On this second view, like an athlete who learns techniques and disciplines to marshal raw energy, so the power of a state to concentrate its powers where it should is enhanced by constraints which, among other things, deny it power to disperse them where it should not.

These are particularly important points in the context of contemporary anxieties about terrorism, and Holmes has applied his thought to that context. He argues that, so far from being a reason to discard the constraints of law, emergencies are precisely times when such pre-tested constraints are typically most needed. He is critical of the very common attempts by governments to ‘release the shackles’ of the rule of law in situations seen as emergencies—to rule without open, calculable rules, to dispense with safeguards of procedural fairness, suspend habeas corpus, diminish or discard the ordinary protections and contestatory opportunities traditionally associated with legal hearings. Such attempts pay no heed to the positive, enabling, competence-protecting role of the rule of law, and particularly to the dangers of panicked flailing about, over-inclusion, plain unaccountable incompetence, ignorance, and lack of exposure to tests of the reliability of information, that often attend the acts of power-wielders acting in secret and on the fly. To ignore this ‘liberal paradox’ is to ignore the powerful constructive significance of the rule of law.52

In making these arguments, Holmes speaks of constitutionalism as often as he does of the rule of law. Clearly he believes the arguments apply to both. More generally, it is clear that there is overlap both in the ends and means of constitutionalism and the rule of law, but they are not the same.53 They are closer perhaps in ends than in means. Both seek to staunch possibilities of arbitrary power, but not every aspect of the rule of law is a constitutional matter, and not everything likely to be found, in a modern constitution at any rate, is part of the rule of law. Constitutions focus on states; they are central elements of public law. On the argument developed here, the rule of law has broader reach, since it deals not merely with acts of state but also with other sources of social power, and the law that affects them. This must include private law. On the other hand, constitutions typically say a good deal about the content of law, whereas many versions of the rule of law limit it more austerely to matters of form and procedure. And finally, constitutions primarily set frameworks for legally permissible government, (p. 246) whereas the rule of law has a great deal to do with the character of laws. But if they are not identical they are inseparably conjoined. And both of them have crucial negative and positive contributions to make.

V. The Administrative State

One of the major developments of the twentieth century was the welfare state, and with it unprecedented expansion of state activity, even after neoliberal attempts to ‘roll it back’. Much of this governmental activity has been increasingly directed to regulatory and distributive goals, which administrators, well supplied with open-ended legislative provisions, regulatory discretions, and particularized decisions to make, are mandated to achieve. Many writers have been concerned that however well meaning the motives of such activity, their pursuit exacts a high price, even if their goals are likely to be achieved, which many such critics also doubt. A significant part of the cost of the pursuit, it has often been alleged, is borne by the rule of law.54

Friedrich von Hayek had great influence here. He took the modern welfare state’s ‘instrumentalization’ of law, purportedly in the interests of social justice, both to be the pursuit of a mirage, since social justice was a nonsense concept, and to threaten the end of the rule of law because of the style of law it generated. For him the notion that law must flexibly ‘respond’ to myriad social ‘needs’—other than basic ones such as providing a clear framework of rules for individuals to guide their actions and interactions—emanates from a flawed social theory and presages a damaged polity. It pretends to a knowledge that no individuals but only markets, which aggregate more than anyone separately has, can possess. And the efficiency of those markets depends on clear, stable, general rules of the game, interpreted and enforced by independent arbiters, not on open-ended policy directives, increasingly vague and unspecific in their terms, and implemented by centrally determined goal-directed bureaucrats. Bad goals generate bad means, laws that do not guide, frameworks that keep being adjusted, prescriptions too vague and malleable to be followed, but altogether labile in the hands of their wielders.

Even by those who do not share Hayek’s political or economic analysis have analysed changes in legal form in similar ways. Roberto Unger saw a flat contradiction between the transformations in the form of law generated by the welfare state, and the rule of law. For him, welfare state efforts to render law ‘purposive’ and responsive, engender ‘policy-oriented discourse’ that ‘forces one to make explicit choices among values’, the ‘pursuit of procedural or substantive justice [that] requires rules be interpreted in terms of ideals that define the conception of justice’, and an ‘escalating use of open-ended standards and a swing toward purposive legal reasoning and procedural or substantive approaches to justice.’ Together these trends ‘repeatedly undermine the relative generality and the autonomy that distinguish the [autonomous] legal order from other kinds of law, and in the course of so doing they help discredit the political ideals represented by the rule of law.’55 Eugene Kamenka and Alice Erh Soon Tay (p. 247) offered a similar diagnosis to Unger's, but their evaluation was closer to Hayek's. They detected 'a crisis in the form of law, the result of its inability, on its existing form and principles, to accommodate the new content and role being demanded of it.'

Lest such apprehensions all seem a thing of the pre-neoliberal past, Brian Tamanaha has recently argued that contemporary understandings of 'law as a means to an end' present a pervasive 'threat to the rule of law'. These anxieties have not died. Though these issues are too complex to deal with adequately here, there is one implication of this discussion which might be mentioned: it is impossible even to assess such apprehensions without more attention than is common to the contexts, including 'extra-legal' social contexts, in which they occur.

VI. Contexts and Conclusions

The historian E.P. Thompson, long time a Marxist and always a man of the Left, enraged erstwhile comrades with his encomium to the rule of law at the end of his, for this reason controversial, Whigs and Hunters. Nonetheless, that his was a book about laws that he condemned, he concluded that 'the rule of law itself, the imposing of effective inhibitions upon power and the defence of the citizen from power's all-intrusive claims, seems to me to me an unqualified human good.'

In insisting on the 'obvious point' that 'there is a difference between arbitrary power and the rule of law', it might be noted, Thompson starts with the point of the rule of law rather than with the particular institutional forms in which it might be found. Indeed, he noted that legal institutions were constantly being 'created ... and bent' by 'a Whig oligarchy ... in order to legitimise its own property and status'. Still, that oligarchy could not do as it wished; its hands were often tied by the law it sought to exploit. How did Thompson show this? By describing the character of legal institutions and norms, or the experience of litigants, or internal legal balances? No. Rather, he called in aid facts such as that law was a definition of actual agrarian practice, as it has been pursued 'time out of mind' ... 'law' was deeply imbricated within the very basis of productive relations, which would have been inoperable without this law. And ... this law, as definition or as rules (imperfectly enforceable through institutional forms) was endorsed by norms, tenaciously transmitted through the community.

If it were possible to construct a scale of conditions for the rule of law, the eighteenth-century English legal order, as Thompson describes it, would score inordinately well, as Dicey already observed. Not everyone is so lucky. Legal orders differ greatly in the extent to which values, institutions, and practices that support the rule of law are strongly embedded, 'imbricated', and interwoven within them. Many are less strongly embedded in institutions, professions, legal and popular culture, and social structure.

Many Western legal orders are bearers of value, meaning, and tradition laid down and transmitted over centuries, and not only among lawyers. Prominent among the values deeply entrenched in these legal orders are rule of law values, and these values have exhibited considerable resilience and capacity to resist attempts to erode them. Perhaps that is why first-world legal and philosophical writing evinces so little concern with contexts. For many of the most difficult problems that might be found there have been taken care of, if not by them. They may well, of course, want to improve what they have, but since the underlying threats to legal effectiveness are to a considerable extent neutralized by law, they are often right to concentrate on legal institutions. That is not because they live in a different world, however, but because some universal problems have been dealt with in their part of it, and the character of the law counts there in ways it may not elsewhere.

In these circumstances of relative luxury, moreover, the options open to partisans of the rule of law are also more open than is sometimes acknowledged. Conservatives in rule of law rich countries, suspicious of any falling-off from some idealized version of it, often overreact to, say, injection of any substantive concerns into adjudication or discretionary authority in administration, indeed to any number of welfare state incursions on an idealized rule of Fuller-full-formal laws. These are interpreted as dangers to the existence of the rule of law as we know it, whereas they might be dangers only in circumstances where legality is already weak, and has no other resources with which to defend itself. Such reactions show little reflection on what the rule of law really depends upon, what it would be like to really threaten what they have of it, and what it would really mean to lack it. Radicals in the same societies, on the other hand, who treat some indeterminacy in appellate decision-making as testimony to fraudulence or at least absence of the rule of law, exhibit a similar frivolousness about what it might really be to have to live without a good measure of it.\textsuperscript{61}

Perspective is all; here as elsewhere. As Selznick again has argued:

the very stability of the rule of law, where that has been achieved, makes possible a still broader vision and a higher aspiration. Without disparaging (to say nothing of trashing) our legal heritage, we may well ask whether it fully meets the community's needs. … So long as the system is basically secure, it is reasonable to accept some institutional risks in the interests of social justice.\textsuperscript{62}

That suggests that not every potential source of threat to the rule of law will be equally salient in different legal orders: some will be much threatened, others less so, by the same things. It also suggests that different threats might require different defences. Not to mention that we might want to do more than ward off threats. Of course, the rule of law can be seriously threatened even where it appears to be in good shape. If we needed to recall it, the war on terror reminds us of that, as it does of the dangers of complacency in such circumstances. Yet there is still a lot to draw on, even there, which is unavailable in a tyranny, a failed state, illiberal democracy, and so on.

Rule of law promoters in transitional and post-conflict societies, by contrast, too often talk as though establishing the rule of law where it has not existed or is being shot to pieces, at times quite literally, is in principle the same sort of legalistic job requiring the same tools, if harder and more dangerous, as cultivating it where it has long grown and has deep roots, and where its presence is an often unreflected-upon ingredient of everyday life. A moment’s comparative reflection on the extra-legal contexts of such ambitions make it hard to see why anyone would think that.

The conclusion is not that the rule of law can only thrive where it has thrived, and that where it has thrived it must continue to thrive. There is no compelling reason to support either (p. 249) of these determinist prophecies.\textsuperscript{63} On the other hand, the rule of law is so complex an achievement, dependent on so many factors in so many domains, that it is peculiarly miscast by lawyers’ often solipsistic understandings and renditions. For as Amartya Sen has observed,

Even when we consider development in a particular sphere, such as economic development or legal development, the instruments that are needed to enhance development in that circumscribed sphere may not be confined only to institutions and policies in that sphere. … If this sounds a little complex, I must point out that the complication relates, ultimately, to the interdependences of the world in which we live. I did not create that world, and any blame for it has to be addressed elsewhere.\textsuperscript{64}

Bibliography

Albert Venn Dicey, Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution (10th edn, 1959)

David Dyzenhaus (ed), Recrafting the Rule of Law (1999)

James Fleming (ed), Getting to the Rule of Law (2011)

Lon L. Fuller, The Morality of Law (1969)

José María Maravall and Adam Przeworski (eds), Democracy and the Rule of Law (2003)

Notes:

(2) John Locke, Two Treatises of Government (Peter Laslett ed, 1963), 396.

(7) Ibid 193.

(10) For the distinction between ‘the flexible and the arbitrary’ as a key insight of the American Framers, see Stephen Holmes, ‘In Case of Emergency: Misunderstanding Tradeoffs in the War on Terror’ (2009) 97 California Law Review 301, 322.

(17) See my ‘Hart, Fuller and Law in Transitional Societies’ in Peter Cane (ed), The Hart–Fuller Debate in the Twenty-First Century (2010), 107–34. The rest of this section draws on that article. See also Chapter 61 on constitutionalism and transitional justice.

(18) Fuller (n 13), 207.

(19) Ibid 162.

(20) Ibid 162–3, emphasis added.

(21) On human dignity and autonomy in modern constitutional orders, see Chapter 18.

(22) Raz (n 14), 211.

(23) Accounts of the rule of law are often distinguished according to the normative commitments they are asked to carry, in these terms. See eg Randall Peerenboom (ed), Asian Discourses of Rule of Law (2004).

(27) Fuller (n 13), 96.

(28) Waldron (n 26), 23–4.

(32) Dicey (n 6), 187.

(34) Rule of Law Index (2010), 1.

(37) I discuss these four reasons more extensively in Krygier (n 33).

(38) Reid (n 35), 12.

(41) Raz (n 14), 228.

(44) Ibid 31.

(46) Ibid 11–12.

(49) Ibid 25–6.

(51) Holmes (n 50), 6.

(53) On constitutionalism, see Chapter 8.

(55) Roberto Mangabeira Unger, Law in Modern Society: Toward a Criticism of Social Theory (1976), 195, 197.

(56) Kamenka and Tay (n 54), 127.

(58) Ibid 266.

(60) Ibid 261.

(61) I have particularly in mind Critical Legal Studies, a now dated movement but which has occasional echoes.

(62) Selznick (n 48), 464.

Abstract and Keywords

Democracy has oscillated between individualist, collectivist, and organicist notions since the revolutionary era. Similarly, throughout history, democratic movements have agonized over what the power of the people should mean and how it could be exercised democratically. Today, models prevail that transform the fictive will of the people by elective procedures into regimes of (limited) majority rule based on the representational transmission of power, some representative regimes are complemented by forms of direct popular participation. And, consequently, the various narratives of democracy mirror until today the theoretical and practical-institutional attempts to limit majority rule in order to lend some credibility to the idea and ideology that minorities may become majority and vice versa — an interplay that qualifies democracy as legitimate popular self-rule. This article discusses the varieties of constitutional democracy and the dangers posed by democracy.

Keywords: constitutional democracy, majority rule, self-rule, power

I. Histories 250
II. Varieties of Constitutional Democracy 252
   1. Direct Democracy 252
   2. Representative Democracy 253
   3. Deliberative Democracy 255

III. Dangers and Precautions 256
   1. Tyrannical Majorities 257
   2. Political Extremism 259
   3. States of Emergency 260
   4. Secrecy 262

IV. Perspectives 264

I. Histories

The conceptual histories of democracy span more than 2,500 years and refer to a variety of normative orders, institutional arrangements of political decision-making, social and economic structures, and basic values of a community. In bypassing pre-classical proto-democracies, as for instance in India and in Sumerian city-states, mainstream historiography generally traces the prehistory of popular (or self-) rule—very much like the development of other fundamental principles of modern limited, just, or lawful government—back to its initial circumstances in Greek city-states. The concept of dēmokratía, a composite of demos (people) and kratos (power) or krator (rule), denoted the rule of the people, respectively by the many, was developed in political philosophy (Plato, Aristotle) and practiced in the Greek, notably the Athenian, pólis characterized by membership (including only male citizens of age), autonomy, and equality before the law. If one keeps aloof from idyllic notions of the pólis—and, incidentally, also from Cicero's idealizations of the Roman Republic—then classical philosophy and the pólis come into view as addressing the 'democratic question' still relevant today despite (p. 251) the differences of context and culture: How can societies govern themselves by establishing procedures and institutions for authoritative, participatory, egalitarian, and effective decision-making?
Democracy

A different narrative reconstructs the English path to democracy by shifting the accent from membership and autonomy to sovereignty, representation, liberty, and, ultimately, equality as fundamental democratic values embodied in a peculiar institutional setting and constitutional framework. Liberty is seen to be rooted in the restrictions on the power of the monarch originally laid down in the Magna Carta (1215) explicitly protecting certain rights of the king's subjects, notably freemen, and later displayed in a series of constitutional documents—the Petition of Right (1628), the Habeas Corpus Act (1679), and the Bill of Rights (1689)—as preconditions of a limited and lawful government that, in retrospect, was qualified as constitutional democracy. The constitutional conflicts and civil wars of the seventeenth century focused on the concept and location of sovereign power and in the end led to a unique compromise that captures the gist of English constitutionalism and democracy: the formula of 'King-in-Parliament' symbolizes the reduction of both popular and monarchic/absolutist claims to power and established parliamentary sovereignty. As a matter of consequence, the franchise and the struggles over its structure and scope took centre stage in English political history as well as constitutional and democratic theory and practice. The development towards representative democracy is mirrored by the gradual increase of the franchise and steps towards its uniformity, in particular when the so-called 'rotten boroughs', with a handful of voters electing a member of parliament, were eliminated by the Reform Acts of 1832 and 1867. With the gradual extension of the franchise Parliament became the dominant political actor, whereas the monarch was reduced to a largely ceremonial figurehead. Democracy developed as a constitutionalized regime of competition for power that, according to the optimistic vision, guaranteed the periodical exchange of the powers that be and representatives and, according to the pessimistic perception, was reduced to competitive elitism privileging expert government over popular sovereignty.

It remains one of the mysteries of democracy that the term finally overcame the negative connotations it had been accompanied by for more than two thousand years and experienced a remarkable comeback when it gradually replaced the republic, a more moderate and prudent ideal and self-description, under what are generally referred to as the conditions of modernity. Where the English concept of self-rule invoked tradition and reform and relied on conventions, the 'Great Democratic Revolutions' in the New England states and France at the end of the eighteenth century introduced democracy as a revolutionary neologism to capture the new way of imagining political reality and as a symbolic dispositif that crystallized around the agency of the individual as 'citizen' and/or the political existence of a social collective as 'people', 'nation', or 'state' as well as the values, objectives, structures, and ideologies of self-rule as the prototypical limited, legitimate, and effective government based on foundational constitutional documents. As distinct from the Greek demos gathered in the popular assembly, the people conveys a plurality, whereas its European equivalents—peuple, populo, Volk—denote a (fictitious) organic whole lending itself to holistic interpretations and translations and directing the focus on the problem of inclusion. Hence, since the revolutionary era, democracy has oscillated between individualist, collectivist, and organicist notions. Similarly, throughout history, democratic movements have agonized over what the power of the people should mean and how it could be exercised democratically. Today, models prevail that transform the fictive will of the people by elective procedures into regimes of (limited) majority rule on the basis of the representational transmission of power, some representative regimes are complemented by forms of direct popular participation. And, consequently, the various narratives of democracy mirror until today the theoretical and practical-institutional attempts to limit majority rule in order to lend some credibility to the idea and ideology that minorities may become majority and vice versa—an interplay that qualifies democracy as legitimate popular self-rule.

II. Varieties of Constitutional Democracy

Democracy, an 'essentially contested concept', has established itself—in conjunction with 'constitution', 'human rights', 'popular sovereignty', and 'republic'—as 'one of the major structures of ideological ambivalence' within the pool of cultural representations of modernity. Ambivalence (of ideology/theory) and indeterminacy (of the semantics) have not prevented democracy from proliferating worldwide: it has come to be globally understood as designating the basic institutions and procedures of a polity shaping the form and mode of government. Due to its philosophical pedigree and the experience with non- and anti-democratic regimes—dictatorship and monarchy—democracy established its reputation as being better suited than any rival form of political will-formation and decision-making to reconcile the discordant elements of self-interest and common weal, wealth and poverty, class and community, liberty and equality. Democracy's political career, however, produced a variety of institutional arrangements together with the accompanying ideologies. The following overview briefly discusses only the most influential specimens from the perspective of constitutional law.

1. Direct Democracy

Direct democracy anchored in the ancient past, kept alive by republicanism in theory and social movements demanding participation in practice, appears as the counterpart of the polis and the closest approximation to genuine democracy. As far as it refers to the whole demos present in the assembly, direct (or literal) democracy is characterized by a fairly homogenous social basis (demos) and a focus on the exercise of power through collective decision-making within the social fabric of face-to-face relationships in small polities. From a constitutional point of view, it is remarkable that, due to the notion of the polis as a unitary entity not separated from civil society, no constitutional rights protected the citizens against interferences from the part of government. The only quasi-constitutional guarantee for citizens was originally based on their status as members of the (sovereign) assembly.

During the longue durée when the Greek polis and democracy fell into oblivion, their idea and ideology somehow survived and resurfaced under the guise of New England town-meetings, popular assemblies in Swiss cantons, revolutionary councils, and more recent projects of direct democracy propagated by new social movements. Such modified replica of the polis or rather naive novelties were and are taken to prove the Rousseauvian point, in defense of ‘assembly politics’, and widespread assessment that the possibility of direct democracy requiring super-activism on the part of its members is limited to the small-scale republics, communes, or city-states.

Under the conditions of the ‘mature modernity’, the classical project of autonomy that had been modified and propagated by republicanism was rejuvenated for the purpose of regenerating democracy by opening up ossified political power structures and preventing civil desertion from the public sphere. Proposals for a ‘strong’ or responsive democracy shifted the accent from the exercise of power to enhancing popular participation in politics: they advocated the introduction of referenda, popular legislative initiatives, and extended rights of political communication, thus reviving the ideal of assembly democracy. While some of these proposals seek to redress the deficits and pathologies of parliamentary representation, others such as the project of ‘inclusive democracy’ extend democracy beyond the limits of politics by including economic, social, and ecological decision-making.

Feminist authors and movements focused their critique of established democratic regimes on the social conditions of domination and politics in patriarchal democracies, the public–private distinction, and the Aristotelian notion of equality. Therefore, their proposals to unsettle the male-dominated—direct democratic and parliamentary—tradition have a more transformative thrust.

2. Representative Democracy

Representative democracy is generally identified with liberal democracy, in spite of the fact that the term covers a plurality of different institutional designs—parliamentary and presidential systems, constitutional monarchies, authoritarian-populist regimes, centralized and federal states, one- or two-chamber parliaments, etc—and a diversity of electoral systems. It is true, though, that most of them re-invent the community of fate underlying theories of direct democracy as a community of wills and interests and that, according to Marx's dictum, citizens represent themselves and need no longer to be represented. The representative model and the variations it allows owe their reputation as the only practical and freedom-preserving transposition of self-rule into efficient political decision-making procedures in mass societies to both the assumed and real deficits of direct democracy and the blatant pathologies of and harms caused by autocratic regimes. Whether ‘strictly a capitalist phenomenon’ or at least entertaining a problematic relationship with capitalism, liberal democracy, despite critiques of political liberal theory and the uneasiness concerning the justification of majority rule, succeeded in transgressing the borders of the Western-capitalist hemisphere from where its ideology, rhetoric, and institutions proliferated globally and recently resurfaced, somewhat surprisingly, in Arabian countries presumed to be and remain strongholds of autocratic regimes.

Parliamentary democracy ‘operating under a good constitution’ transfers everyday political decision-making from the sovereign self to the elected representatives and governors and appointed administrators who operate within a scheme of division of labor demarcating, more or less clearly, the functions of legislature, executive, and judiciary. Thus the ‘self’ of the project of self-rule is constitutionally fragmented and its power divided into competencies, which are then dispersed, pursuant to the logic of either separation (focusing on demarcation of functions to prevent abuse of power) or checks and balances (privileging cooperation and control of power), among different institutions and office holders. Within the framework of constitutional-liberal democracy self-rule is thus translated into law-rule according to the formula of a ‘government of laws and not of men’, that is, the conjunction of the democratic sovereign with the rule of law (Rechtsstaat, état de droit). Regimes of political representation transform the popular sovereign into (1) a citizenry invited, permitted, or only gently hampered to exercise its political freedoms by participating in public debates—euphemistically: the plébiscite de tous les jours—and (2) an electorate that, under the terms of liberal ideology, by casting their vote produce a rough matrix for the politics thereafter to be freely pursued by the representatives in accordance with the dictates of their conscience protected by the ideology of the free mandate or rather, realistically speaking, of their party's guidelines.

Liberal or representative democracy received much praise for processing diverse political agendas, professionalizing politics, and concentrating expertise in parliamentary commissions and executive and administrative agencies to be controlled by parliaments and courts. The comments changed once it became apparent that parliaments and deputies were hardly able adequately to grasp and handle, in particular, the explosion of fact in industrial societies and the complex problems of steering the course of social-economic development and therefore had to rely on non-transparent networks of experts operating beyond the horizon of democratic control. Nevertheless, parliamentarianism has proven superior to autocratic and centralized systems of government because of its capacity to correct political mistakes and damages and of the systemic opportunities for periodic change and recall of incompetent office holders as well as its record of promoting prosperity, albeit selective, and peace. These advantages become somewhat ambivalent once weighed against the corresponding drawbacks of representation, in particular the formation of oligarchies, lobbying, and corruption. A similar ambivalence taints both Tocqueville's observation that democracy inspires the people with the feelings and habits required for good government and Lefort's interpretation of parliamentary democracy as shifting social controversy to the arenas of representation, thus deferring and civilizing conflicts and the passions they generate. These diagnoses and interpretations are called into question by less favorable, sociologically informed assessments that attribute to the practice of indirect democracy political disaffection, alienation, and apathy on the part of the citizens as well as opportunism, careerism, and populist strategizing on the part of the political class, and come to the conclusion that many consolidated democracies are reduced to ‘electoral’ democracies.

3. Deliberative Democracy

Deliberative democracy, unlike direct or indirect democracy, does not designate a specific institutional arrangement but picks up, on the level of normative theory, liberal democracy's claim to legitimacy based on reasons—as distinct from a situationally contingent acceptance—and connects its key focus, not on a predetermined will but on the process of its formation, with participatory democracy's claim to popular participation. Deliberation is introduced as a device for people to develop, discover, and articulate their proper interests, needs, and preferences through a process of discussion, thus trying to solve the problem of 'enduring disagreement' and group polarization. Privileging discourse transgresses the limits of 'adversary democracy' and may incidentally thwart the secular trend towards electoral democracy insofar as political decision-making relies on discursive procedures and popular consultation rather than voting. Theories of deliberative democracy contain a republican element because they intend to reactivate the citizens, revitalize the public sphere, and structure their political institutions so that deliberation (or discourse) may become the decisive factor. They further contain an implicit or explicit constitutional project insofar as they call for a commitment to the pluralism of values and aims within a polity, require each member to recognize and respect the other members’ deliberative capacity, and not only advance a theory of democratic legitimacy but also a theory of rights based on achieving the ideal of free and equal deliberation. Freedom implies that deliberation is (or should) not be bound by whatever external authority but only by the preconditions and results of the discursive procedures. Formal equality implies that anyone may put forth a proposal or criticize or support measures taken after deliberation and is complemented by the principle of substantive equality guaranteeing that no one be restrained by the distribution of power and resources or by norms counteracting the framework of free deliberation among equals. Freedom and equality are jointly to warrant that deliberation may reach its aim of a rationally motivated consensus. Protagonists of discursive procedures emphasize their rationality and openness to scientific knowledge, the approximation of impartiality, and the likelihood of moral correctness of decisions reached by deliberation as well as the greater emphasis placed upon settings and procedures of preference formation. Critics charge the theory of discursive democracy with not addressing the problem of voting and the ideological bias in favor of liberal democracy. They argue that the deliberative project is based on unattainable conditions following highly abstract rules and therefore may work in theory whereas, due to its abstractness and moral absolutism, the project is bound to fail in practice because, very much like the theories of representative democracy, its normative maximalism negates the structures of inequality and domination in industrial societies and the constraints they place on actors willing to participate in public discourse. Moreover, deliberation is likely to end not in consensus but disagreement, hence, for deciding the problem one has to turn back to majority rule again.

III. Dangers and Precautions

Democracy's triumph and global proliferation has left non-democratic regimes without strong arguments in support of their legitimacy and attractiveness. Moreover, dynastic, fascist, state socialist, and military versions of political authoritarianism are wanting in attractive narratives of justification clearly on the retreat. Theocratic regimes in the Islamic world have yet to prove their viability and efficiency over time; and dramatic uprisings of civil society challenge political authoritarianism in Tunisia, Egypt, and other Arabian countries. In the absence of convincing alternatives, democracy and majority rule have consolidated their position as the primary form of government in the realm of politics, confirmed by constitutional documents, and in theoretical debates. Nevertheless, both consolidated and transitional democracies are plagued by a number of endogenously and exogenously induced problems some of which qualify as dangers that may lead to crises threatening their stability, performance, and output (social peace, prosperity) or even their legitimacy (acceptance, consensus).

1. Tyrannical Majorities

Tyrannical majorities have always been the quintessential fear accompanying, like a dark shadow, the development of democracy since ancient times until the rise of the liberal-democratic paradigm to ideological hegemony. Participants in the long-standing debate concerning majoritarianism basically agree that permanent or structural majorities block the rules and procedures of competition and therefore discredit and delegitimize democracy. However, they agonize over (1) where to locate such majorities—on the political or societal level; (2) whether to qualify them numerically or politically by their capacity to outvote or dominate even numerical, yet non- or underrepresented majorities of society; and (3) how to prevent tyrannical majorities or control and remedy their effects. As regards the first question, it seems plausible within the context of democratic participation and decision-making to turn to the ‘magistrates’ and look for manifestations of majoritarian despotism within the regime of representative government. This also answers, at least predetermines, the second question because both the rule of the many over the few and the rule of the few over the many come into view as potentially abusive forms of democratic power. Ever since Madison's authoritative statement that removing the causes of tyranny would imply abolishing liberty, the discussion in democratic and constitutional theory has been preoccupied with controlling possibly hazardous effects of majority rule. While the discourse on ethical or behavioral antidotes, such as virtues, civil religion, and public spirit conducive to a democratic culture of ‘accommodation’ and self-restraint, flourished in the nineteenth century, democratic theory and practice have since been more (and more importantly) concerned with developing a constitutional-legal design that would guarantee the interplay between majority and minorities and thwart majoritarian despotism.

Some proposals, like James Madison's option for a federal structure of the Union or John Stuart Mill's argument privileging liberty over equality, failed squarely to address the problem of how to prevent the emergence of and then effectively control tyrannical elites. In general, however, the discourse on precautions against the majoritarian abuse of power has relied on the following procedural, institutional, and substantive checks on majority rule and has rooted them in the constitutional framework.
2. Political Extremism

As distinct from tyrannical majorities, politically extremist associations or parties are generally distinguished from the various brands of political radicalism by their aim to overthrow democracy from within or from without, if need be with violent means, by utilizing democratic procedures, institutions, and rules to gain popular support. Rather than participating, however vigorously, in public debate and trying their luck in the struggle for power, which also implies accepting defeat, political extremists transgress the limits of competition for power and, once in power, discard the democratic method of persuasion (as ‘bourgeois’, ‘capitalist’, ‘imperialist’, ‘corrupt’, or whatever). They pursue a political agenda that, as a rule, is connected with claims to absolute truth or necessity to which they assert to have privileged access. Unlike other associations of civil society, however radical, they reject the theory of conflict underlying and justifying democracy based on horizontal relationships among citizens, which therefore requires their mutual recognition as equals and abstention from enemy rhetoric and violence. In sharp contrast to the logic of democratic competition, political extremists operate on the basis of a Schmittian enemy/friend distinction and the corresponding normative grammar that allows for violent strategies, such as persecution and, if need be, killing of enemies, witch hunts, or ethnic purges. The spectrum of extremism ranges from Jacobin and anarchist groups in the nineteenth century to Leninist–Stalinist cadres and parties, fascist movements in the twentieth century, and more recently fundamentalist organizations pursuing a political agenda in defense of religious or political orthodoxy or ethnic ‘purity’ against the modern heresies of secularism, liberalism, capitalism, or multiculturalism. Whereas they may propagate different political goals, they are united by the pursuit of some kind of normative absolutism justifying, in general, violation of the physical integrity of others.

Political extremism of whatever brand invokes the question how to deal with ‘the enemies of freedom’ (Abbé Sieyès). The discourse on precautions to be taken for the protection of democracy has focused on two basic options: tolerance or repression of extremism, each allowing for a plurality of institutional-legal concretizations. Tolerance characterizes the libertarian approach that mandates the abstention from establishing a protectionist regime and relies instead on strengthening democratic institutions and civil society.\textsuperscript{72} The ‘protection by promotion’ strategy focuses on civic education, encouraging political participation, strengthening local government, enhancing constituency-building, and promoting pluralism.\textsuperscript{73} Accordingly, extremist acts are treated like any other behavior and sanctioned—as duress, bodily injury, etc.—according to the provisions of ‘normal’ criminal law, which implies that ‘tolerant democracy’, generally speaking, accepts anti-democratic views and methods as long as they stay within the bounds of non-violence. This strategy, however, becomes entangled in the almost hopeless venture to define ‘violence’.
Democracy

(p. 260) Most—and in particular non-consolidated—democracies, however, shift the accent from promotion to protection and tend to draw the line more restrictively: one of the constitutional options could be to entrench the republican-democratic form of government.\textsuperscript{74} Or else protection could be delegated to criminal law and there complementing the regular criminal offences and sanctions with a list of ‘political crimes’ penalizing political behavior and views, such as incitement to violence, defamation of the form of government or high-ranking office holders, etc.\textsuperscript{75} for the sake of the stability of the (democratic, republican, national, secular, or religious) political order. A different logic—namely the protection of minorities—dictates the sanctioning of ‘hate speech and incitement to racism as criminal offences’—a logic that has to cope with drawing the line between ‘actions’ and ‘words’.

3. States of Emergency

As a reaction to ‘the totalitarian adventure’\textsuperscript{77} and/or the defeat of democracy by authoritarian regimes,\textsuperscript{78} numerous countries, from Germany to South Korea, from Spain to Namibia, tried to anticipate political crises and prepared against political dangers by integrating provisions regulating states of emergency, such as war, state of siege, catastrophes, political uprisings, etc.\textsuperscript{79} The concepts range from the instruments and institutions of a militant democracy\textsuperscript{80} to regimes of constitutional dictatorship.\textsuperscript{81} While the latter generally provide for the temporary and partial suspension of the constitution, regimes of militancy tend to mask their exceptionalism behind the attire of normalcy: they provide for organizations and parties deemed dangerous to be outlawed, their organization dissolved, and their property confiscated; some also contain the forfeiture of political rights of individuals or severe restrictions on the freedoms of political communication. Short of destroying the constitutional fabric of a democratic polity, these precautionary provisions of risk aversion still insert explicit or implicit emergency clauses\textsuperscript{82} in the constitutional text and normalize, in the name of security, situations and the vocabulary of political emergency.\textsuperscript{83}

Constitutional self-protection, according to the logic of emergency or militancy, raises a number of tricky questions, notably (1) who or which institution is entitled to demarcate the limits of the permissible, (2) how far can one go in protecting democracy without compromising democracy’s fundamental legitimacy as self-rule and experimentalism, (3) what could be adequate rules for excluding organizations and individuals from the political process, and (4) what effect do emergency provisions have on the ‘normal’ constitution.\textsuperscript{84} Suspending democratic experimentalism undoubtedly calls into question the normative claims and constitutional provisions of self-rule, pluralism, and free interplay among majorities and minorities. This strategy runs the risk of falling prey to the Schmittian romantic logic of the political as a combination of political existentialism plus preference for the state of emergency.\textsuperscript{85}

Militancy may look less dictatorial but requires a democratic justification that, to be at least minimally plausible, has demonstrated how to rein in the excess tendency of this strategy to transform democratic experimentalism into a disciplinary regime privileging the political juste milieu and quietism. Basically three paradigms of justification appear to be available.

(1) The original (Cold War) institutionalization of and reasoning for militant democracy as a precautionary strategy against all brands of political extremism fail to pass the minimal plausibility-and-restraint threshold because the generalized idea of stabilizing order introduces a concept of abstract protection that does not even require a concrete danger. More importantly, this justification construes anti-extremism as a ‘dangerous supplement’—not assisting but always already permeating and undermining the ‘normal’ constitution.

(2) ‘Negative republicanism’,\textsuperscript{87} a narrower concept of militant democracy, changes the thrust from general anti-extremism to confronting, directly or indirectly, organized attempts to re-install a previous authoritarian or totalitarian regime, such as National-Socialism in Germany, Fascism in Italy, Francoism in Spain, apartheid in South Africa, or the Ba’ath party in Iraq. Therefore, militancy informs a counter-constitution specified by the national context in question and meant to prevent the resurrection of a defeated historical system of injustice and authoritarianism. Within this paradigm the perspective changes dramatically from stability of the system to the political-legal responsibility of a polity, deriving from and founded upon a specific historical experience, owed to victims and survivors.

The civil society paradigm of militancy claims to secure the agonistic democracy by focusing on groups and associations that severely violate the most fundamental rules of conflict and democratic life-forms. This paradigm seriously increases the danger of generalization and has to deal with the indeterminacy of the very fundamental rules it seeks to defend.

4. Secrecy

Somewhat paradoxically, democracies rely, almost everywhere, on institutions which are not democratically structured and do not at all or only marginally operate according to democratic rules—in particular, military forces, the police, and intelligence agencies, in short: the security services. As a matter of fact, especially the activities of agents, informers, spies, and infiltrators as well as the methods of technical surveillance, sabotage, secret files and records, not to mention ‘rendition’, detention, and deportation, can hardly be accommodated with the constitutional grammar of democracy. While military and police command-and-obey structures, despite the lack of deliberation and reasoning, may still be adapted, albeit rudimentarily, to an overall democratic design, secrecy of operations and the special claims of intelligence officials to legitimacy qua expertise reside beyond the democratic horizon. The latter is demarcated by the claim that decision-making and measures may not be left to the darkness of deals and resolutions of uncontrolled security ‘powers that be’ but, for the sake of accountability, have to be made accessible to public control.

The democratic farewell to arcane politics is directed against what Kant called the ‘perfidiousness of shady politicians’ and requires that the practices of deputies, governors, and administrative agencies pass the publicity test as a matter of consequence and of liberal ideology, deviations from the path of publicity and transparency have to remain the exception from the rule and call for a justification related to the specificity of the subject matter concerned or the deliberative process. Accordingly, parliamentary debates and in particular the adoption of laws have to be public, whereas the deliberation of parliamentary committees may, by way of exception, take place behind closed doors. Similarly, court trials, rulings, and reasons and also administrative decisions, as a rule, have to be made public; however, the public is closed out from the preceding deliberation. As distinct from parliaments, courts, and administrative agencies, security services operate partly (the police), to a great extent (the military), or systematically (intelligence agencies) behind the veil of secrecy. It would be naive and mean negating the functional modality of, particularly, the military forces and secret service agencies to call for, in the name of democracy, an end to their clandestine operations.

Nevertheless, constitutions do have to cope with adjusting secrecy to the political and normative claims of democratic regimes. Constitutional elites have indeed developed different strategies of dealing with the security complex. (p. 263)

1. Silencing the issue of secrecy and not mentioning the intelligence services or camouflaging the discrepancy between publicity and secrecy behind the shield of executive privilege or a generalized national interest and relying on the logic of necessity lacks constitutional-democratic style and, moreover, invites public distrust.

2. A less modest but still minimalist strategic option, normatively speaking, grants the security services a legal mandate or elevates the security services to the constitutional level, where their institutional existence is recognized, their commanders named, and their functions and powers laid down in general terms.

3. A more demanding option is illustrated by constitutional documents which integrate the security (particularly, intelligence) services, more or less explicitly, in emergency regimes and, at best, define its functions, demarcate its constitutional (or legal) mandate—self-defense against external threats, stability of the internal order, assistance in times of emergency and (natural) catastrophe, and averting the dangers and controlling risks of life in society—and provide for principles of action and mechanisms of (parliamentary) control\textsuperscript{99} to ascertain political accountability and public responsibility.\textsuperscript{100} The strategy to bring democracy—or at least parliamentary commissions—back in was embraced by the German Federal Constitutional Court when it defined the armed forces as a ‘parliament’s army’ and required that out-of-area operations be approved by the Federal Diet rather than left to (secret) considerations of the executive branch.\textsuperscript{101} Similarly, the German Basic Law provided for the parliamentary control of secret service activity (Art 45d) to be concretized by secondary legislation, which inspired the scholarly proposal of a ‘graded publicity’.\textsuperscript{102} The South African Constitution demonstrates a somewhat stronger democratic spirit or wariness by affirming the security services’ public responsibility and placing them under parliamentary control and civic monitoring. Egypt’s Constitution of 1971, on the contrary, placed the decision concerning the state of emergency (Art 74), without any procedural or other qualifications, into the hands of the head of state (President) who also happened to be the military and police commander. No wonder then that the constitution had been suspended since 1981.

(p. 264) Whatever moderate advances may have been made on the road to controlling—not even democratizing the democratizeable aspects of—the security establishment, they have been compromised and some even rolled back, in many countries, during the last decades to the benefit of the war on terror.\textsuperscript{103} On the one hand, ruling majorities in several countries have tried to bar representatives of the opposition from sitting in on hearings and/or having access to material concerning matters of national security or anti-terrorism. Thus, security concerns took precedence over parliamentary protection of minorities. On the other hand, the categorical imperative of the war on terror corresponds to the extension of emergency powers for the police, the creation of various forms of institutional and informational cooperation between the police and intelligence agencies—implying multiple, overlapping areas of competence, the establishment of interconnected informational networks and surveillance operations. Both trends testify to the emancipation of the security complex from public, parliamentary, and constitutional control. They also illustrate that the vocabulary of danger, fear, and apocalyptic scenarios is quite obviously more suited to stimulate the institutional imagination than is the sober rhetoric of democracy.

IV. Perspectives

Despite liberal democracy’s ideological hegemony it would be rash to proclaim the end of democratic development. For, on the one hand, the dynamics of democratic experimentalism and, on the other, current challenges to democracy argue against any ‘endism’ whatsoever. The former has always undermined attempts to ‘canonize’ one or the other set of values or institutional arrangements as a kind of democratic orthodoxy and has kept the discourse open for transformative ideas and practices.

Today, democratic experimentalism thrives on internal critiques and projects that aim at improving different aspects of democratic regimes: First, the practitioners of democracy have barely begun to translate the reform proposals made by delibertarians\textsuperscript{104} into preconditions of democratic participation, especially civic education programs and the enhancement of associationalism, and institutional-procedural provisions of deliberative, radical democracy, such as deliberative polls and referenda.

Secondly, participatory democracy has been advanced worldwide by numerous e-democracy programs.\textsuperscript{105} Projects of ‘digital democracy’\textsuperscript{106} comprise various strategies that extend both direct democracy (e-voting, e-protest, e-activism, e-consultation etc) and indirect democracy (e-information, e-parliament, e-access to representatives and governmental agencies etc) to the cyberspace in order to facilitate bottom-up initiatives, representation, and top-down governance. As long as the democratic possibilities of information technology have yet to be exhausted and its risks to be fully assessed, the end of non-e- and e-democracy is not even by a long shot in sight. More importantly, practices of e-democracy have quite obviously bypassed such a risk assessment. Recent uprisings of oppositional movements and, much to the surprise of Anglo-European (p. 265) political analysts, of the civil society in Iran and in countries of the Arab world were facilitated by the availability and popular use of e-democracy instruments and open social fora (Twitter, Facebook, collective blogs) where information could be deposited and spread immediately to mobilize and organize protest.\textsuperscript{107} It appears to be both an irony of history and the cunning of electronic reason that the erstwhile decision of the Mubarak government to provide the people of Egypt with free access to the internet not only created a crucial condition for civil-societal networking and digital activism but also helped to dodge the mechanisms of censorship and, in the end, helped to overthrow the authoritarian regime.
Thirdly, the re-entry of cosmopolitanism, inspired by Kant's Perpetual Peace (1795), into the theoretical discourse is likely to stimulate further normative development. Two differently accentuated projects of normative political theory have recently become prominent both starting from what has been labeled 'the postnational constellation' or, similarly, 'the post-Westphalian era' in international relations. The project of global democracy features the geographic extension and organizational design of democracy. It presents the utopian vision not of a world government as a centralized form of global self-rule but a more flexible form of governance where the individual units are said or hoped to be committed to the participation of citizens’ associations and the rule of law in the absence of a coercive power of last resort. Such ‘cosmopolitan’ proposals aim at restructuring international institutions (in particular, the General Assembly of the United Nations, international criminal courts, World Trade Organization, International Monetary Fund, and World Bank) and organizations (United Nations, European Union) and at strengthening the associations of the global civil society. Whereas rendering interstate relations more democratic and entrenching democratic values on the transnational level have the dignity of certainly noble agendas, protagonists of geo-democracy, however, seem to be less concerned with institutional realism (the problem of fair representation and meaningful participation) and sensitivity to the ambivalences of global governance structures (the problem of tyranny and elitism). Therefore, global democracy should better be taken as a starting point for developing a novel institutional imagination and practices of digital activism (see e-democracy) rather than transferring the traditional concepts of ‘demos’, ‘public’, and ‘parliament’ to supra- and transnational levels.

The second variant of cosmopolitan democracy, while not opposing its geopolitical extension, does not place democracy in the theoretical context of governance but argues instead, following Hannah Arendt's concern for the other and every individual's right to have rights, for a more inclusive democracy and the protection of weak social groups. In a post-Westphalian world, where state sovereignty has become an official hypocrisy, citizens, according to this brand of cosmopolitan theory, are committed to antithetical normative programs—universal human rights and a bounded notion of democracy. The normative conflict, we learn, can be mediated, though, by the concept of agonistic cosmopolitanism that severs the linkage between demos and ethnos and instead integrates universal cosmopolitan norms (respect, dignity, and hospitality) into democratic practice. This variant of cosmopolitanism is both demanding and attractive as it plausibly assumes that (1) migration is a universal human condition that warrants the protection of (undocumented) aliens, migrants, and refugees, (2) emphasizes, in an almost Tocquevillean turn to democracy as a social phenomenon and not only a form of government, that democracy is a scheme of cooperation rather than a community of fate and therefore has to deal with everyday conflict and dissent, and (3) can be connected with the discourse on transnational citizenship. There seems to be no need, though, to argue for a ‘constitutional essentialism’, because a democratic grammar—and practice—of conflict as outlined above will do. Moreover, Europe's importance as a paradigm case for the future of cosmopolitan democracy should not be overstated.

Whereas its inherent experimentalism opens up democracy to changes from within, it has to deal, despite its hegemony, with challenges from without. On the one hand, democratic experimentalism is likely to be propelled by socio-economic and cultural development. Thus, the emergence of mega-cities challenges the concepts, institutions, and practices of local democracy. Local self-rule, always already undermined by tendencies to view localities as means of administrative governance rather than as democratic governments and institutions where actual politics takes place, is now threatened by processes of regional centralization and internationalization through global contestation. Therefore local democracy has to be adapted to the diversity of small towns and global cities, which means, to dramatically different, actually polarized contexts of local participation and decision-making under national and international legal regimes.

A different developmental problem is posed by emerging democracies. As their consolidation is neither safe nor predictably dictated by the logic of evolution or modernization there is always the danger to be reckoned with that they may deviate from the democratic path and be driven to (re-)turn to authoritarian rule. Hence, unstable democracies put to the test the flexibility of democratic ideology and the adaptability of democratic institutions.

On the other hand, democracy has to meet challenges from the outside. Islamic states, though using the firm name of 'democracy' or 'republic', have advanced, during the last decade, a fundamental critique of Western-style, secular democratism and established theocratic governments. While it is true that religion-based authoritarianism will yet have to prove its viability and competitive advantage over the 'second best' form of government, speaking of 'the failure of political Islam' seems to be premature. Islamic 'democratic theocracies', whether mere facades of self-rule or hybrid versions of religious and democratic regimes, confront republican democracies with a problem their protagonists believed had been solved by modernization: modern democracies were and are widely assumed to have settled the precarious relationship between religion and politics by abolishing any transcendent other—God, divine right, holy tradition etc—as a point of reference for the legitimation of political authority and power. It is further widely presumed that democracy succeeded in domesticating the historically divisive force of religions by privatizing religious convictions and practices and separating organized politics (the state) from religious organizations (the churches). There can hardly be any serious doubt that in secularized societies religion has lost most of its power to authorize political decisions. Its primacy in politics and law is history. Constitutions have sealed this development by guaranteeing religious freedom and providing, more or less stringently, for the non-identification of the state with a confession or church. However, a series of conflicts with religious connotations—concerning state-sanctioned school prayers, the headscarf (hijab) of Muslim schoolgirls and teachers, the slaughtering of animals according to Jewish or Muslim rites, anti-evolutionist movements in the United States, the prohibition of minarets in Switzerland, etc.—intermittently disturb the social peace in secular societies and challenge the widespread conviction that religious freedom enjoys unquestionable constitutional protection. These controversies may not be symptoms of a ‘return of religion’ but indicate that the liberal-democratic rhetoric of preferences and interests, choice and voice, and beliefs as private attitudes very inadequately addresses the condition humaine in modern societies and people’s ‘ultimate concerns’. A ‘thin democracy’ might not be able, in times of crisis, both to protect civil societal pursuit of such concerns and to turn into democrats those who believe in a religion associated with heteronymous politics.

Bibliography

Daniele Archibugi and David Held (eds), Cosmopolitan Democracy: An Agenda for a New World Order (1995)

Etienne Balibar, We, the People of Europe? Reflections on Transnational Citizenship (2004)

Benjamin R. Barber, ‘Three Scenarios for the Future of Technology and Democracy’ (1998) 113 Political Science Quarterly 573

Elaine Ciulla Kamarck and Joseph S. Nye (eds), Governance.com: Democracy in the Information Age (2002)

C.B. Macpherson, Democratic Theory: Essays in Retrieval (1973)
Jane J. Mansbridge, Beyond Adversary Democracy (1983)
Joseph Schumpeter, Capitalism, Socialism and Democracy (1942)
Alexis de Tocqueville, Democracy in America ([1835/1840] 1968)
Iris Marion Young, Inclusion and Democracy (2000)

Notes:

(1) David Held, Models of Democracy (3rd edn, 2006).

(4) On equality, see Chapter 47.

(6) On parliamentarism, see further Chapter 30. On sovereignty, see Chapter 17.

(9) Joseph Schumpeter, Capitalism, Socialism and Democracy (1942); Held (n 1), ch 5.

(12) Sartori (n 10), vol I, 28–35.

(14) Homi K. Bhabha, Nation and Narration (1990), 1.

(16) Held (n 1).

(17) Disregarding those not considered to be members.

(18) Sartori (n 10), vol II, 280–7.

(19) Held (n 1), 17.

(26) Catherine MacKinnon, ‘Feminism, Marxism, Method, and the State: Toward a Feminist Jurisprudence’ (1983) 8 Signs 635. See also Chapter 19.

(27) Sartori (n 10), vol II, 383–98.

(35) On rule of law, see Chapter 10.

(36) Ernest Renan, Qu’est-ce qu’une nation? (1882).

(37) In his 'Speech to the Electors of Bristol' (1774) Edmund Burke humbly submitted the classical statement of this ideology: ‘Parliament is not a Congress of Ambassadors from different and hostile interests,...' but a deliberative Assembly of one Nation, with one Interest, that of the whole...’ . Some constitutional documents explicitly provide for a free mandate (German Basic Law, Art 38; Austrian Federal Constitutional Law of 1929, Art 56) or prohibit 'instructions' to deputies (Swiss Constitution of 1999).

(38) Sartori (n 10), vol II.

(43) De Tocqueville (n 40).

(47) Sunstein (n 33), 8.

(50) Risse (n 32); Held (n 1), ch 9.

(54) Offe (n 40), 46.

(58) Held (n 1), ch 3.

(59) For a dualist conception see, however, John Stuart Mill, On Liberty (1859) (advocating protection also against ‘the tyranny of the prevailing opinion and feeling’) and de Tocqueville (n 40), vol I, ch XV.

(60) Madison (n 42), no 10.

(62) Sunstein (n 33).

(63) Pettit (n 22).

(64) James Tully, ‘Placing the Two Treatises’ in Nicholas Philipson and Quentin Skinner (eds), Political Discourse in Early Modern Britain (1993), 261.

(65) The German Basic Law (1949) and the Namibian Constitution (1990) remove the guarantee of human dignity and the fundamental organizational principles (Basic Law, Art 79(3)) respectively the fundamental rights and freedoms (Namibian Constitution, Art 131) from repeal or amendment.

(66) On elections, see Chapter 25.

(67) Five amendments to the US Constitution (Arts XV, XIX, XXIV, and XXVI) mirror the persistent struggles concerning the extension of the franchise and the importance of change (Art XXII).

(68) The Seventeenth Amendment, a series of reapportionment laws and Supreme Court decisions point towards the repeated attempts to correct unfair representation. See Michel L. Balinsky and H. Peyton Young, Fair Representation (1982).

(69) On political parties and the constitution, see Chapter 41.

(73) The Constitution of the Republic of South Africa (1996) provides for the funding of parties ‘to enhance multi-party democracy’ (s 9). In Germany, party funding is regulated by the Law Concerning the Political Parties that has been intermittently challenged on constitutional grounds. Similarly, the Constitution of Iraq (2005) accentuates the strengthening of civil society (Art 45).

(74) The Constitution of the Republic of Italy (1948) divests even qualified majorities of the power to change the republican form of the state by constitutional amendment (Art 139). Art 79(3), the ‘eternity clause’ of the German Basic Law (1949), removes from regular constitutional revision the guarantee of human dignity and the fundamental organizational principles of government (democracy, republic, federalism, welfare state, and rule of law).

(77) Lefort (n 44).

(79) On states of emergency, see further Chapter 21.

(82) ‘Explicit’ usually presupposes that the state of emergency has to be declared and its duration announced, whereas ‘implicit’ refers to the strategy of masking emergency measures as part of the set of regular provisions. For explicitness see Arts 352–60 of the Constitution of India (1949) or the more concise regulation in the Namibian Constitution, Art 26.

(83) Günter Frankenberg, Normalizing the State of Exception—A Critique of Political Technology (2010), ch I.

(84) For a discussion of these questions see the contributions of David Dyzenhaus, Otto Pfersmann, and Gregory Tardi in Sajó (n 80) and Gregory H. Fox and Georg Nolte, ‘Intolerant Democracies’ (1999) 36 Harvard International Law Journal 1.

(85) Frankenberg (n 83), ch IV.

(87) Peter Niesen, ‘Anti-Extremism, Negative Republicanism, Civic Society: Three Paradigms for Banning Political

(88) The German Basic Law, Art 21(2), may be read as a general anti-extremism clause—very much what the Federal Constitutional Court did in its two decisions outlawing the Sozialistische Reichspartei and the German Communist Party in the 1950s, 2 BVerfGE 1 (1952) and 5 BVerfGE 85 (1956). A narrower interpretation along the line of ‘negative republicanism’—preventing the revival of Nazi ideology and the return of Nazis to power under whatever guise—played a crucial role, if ultimately to no avail, in the recent attempt to outlaw the neo-Nazi NPD and was also suggested in a recent decision of the Federal Constitutional Court (124 BVerfGE 300 [2009]).

(89) The Transitional Provisions to the Italian Constitution (1948) forbid ‘to reorganize, under any form whatsoever, the dissolved Fascist party’, restrict, if only for five years, ‘the right to vote and eligibility of the leaders responsible for the Fascist Regime’ (Art XII). Article XII keeps the members of the House of Savoy away from the ballot box and public offices and forbids the ‘ex-kings, their consorts, and male descendants’ access to the national territory.

(90) Constitution of Iraq, Art 7. Rather than directly addressing apartheid, like the Constitution of Namibia (Art 23), the South African Constitution (1996) pursues the path of an indirect negative republicanism by invoking in its preamble ‘unity in our diversity’, emphasizing ‘non-racialism’ as one of the founding provisions, and repeatedly stressing equality and non-discrimination on the ground of race.

(91) Concerning the practices, rationales, and dangers of security agencies see the impressive treatise by Laurence Lustgarten and Ian Leigh, In From the Cold: National Security and Parliamentary Democracy (1994).

(92) One of the most influential analyses of security, intelligence, and public interest has been provided by David Williams, Not in the Public Interest (1965).

(93) The Constitution of the ‘Honorable Government Junta’ of Chile (1980) granted the Dictator-President Pinochet extensive emergency powers (Arts 24, 39–41) but did not mention the intelligence services.

(94) For a typification of intelligence services see Peter Gill, Policing Politics: Security Intelligence and the Liberal Democratic State (1994) who distinguishes domestic intelligence, political police, and an independent security state.

(95) A minimalist constitutional regime of the security services is illustrated by the US Constitution (1787).

(96) The legal mandate of the security establishment in Great Britain and other Westminster democracies is critically evaluated by Lustgarten and Leigh (n 91), 374–492.

(98) For a fairly elaborate constitutional treatment of the security services see the dispersed relevant provisions of the German Basic Law (1949). Concerning democratic control of the military and security establishments in transitional democracies see Cawthra and Luckham (n 56).

(99) As regards the control of intelligence services see Hans Born and Ian Leigh, Making Intelligence Accountable: Legal Standards and Best Practice for Oversight of Intelligence Agencies (2005).

(100) Regarding the legal and constitutional regimes of controlling the security establishment: Lustgarten and Leigh (n 91), 412–91. See also the detailed provisions of the South African Constitution (1996), ss 198–210.

(103) See only Antonio Vercher, Terrorism in Europe: An International Comparative Analysis (1992); Stephan Trüby et al (eds), 5 Codes: Architecture, Paranoia, and Risk in Times of Terror (2006); Richard Jackson, Writing the War on Terrorism: Language, Politics, and Counter-terrorism (2005); Frankenberg (n 83), chs VI and VII.

(104) Held (n 1), 253.

(111) Definitely more democratic than the interstate consultative mechanisms established by the Congress of Vienna or the model of NATO that some authors take as a starting point. See Archibugi and Held (n 110), 12.

(115) A related, albeit different project, is pursued by Fred R. Dallmeyr, Achieving Our World: Toward a Global and Plural Democracy (2001) also emphasizing the reinvigoration of democracy through the achievement of all or many countries based on viable cross-cultural self-other relations (transversality).

(117) Benhabib (n 114).

(120) As is amply demonstrated by the project ‘Transitions from Authoritarian Rule: Prospects for Democracy in Latin America and Southern Europe’, established in early 1977, see O’Donnell, Schmitter, and Whitehead (n 78), with further references.

(121) On Islam and the constitutional order, see Chapter 62.

(125) Modeled after the ‘free exercise clause’ and the ‘establishment clause’ of the First Amendment to the US Constitution.

Günter Frankenberg

Günter Frankenberg is Professor of Public Law, Philosophy of Law and Comparative Law, Goethe-Universität Frankfurt
Conceptions of the State

Olive Beaud

The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Constitutional Law
Edited by Michel Rosenfeld and András Sajó

Print Publication Date: May 2012
Online Publication Date: Nov 2012

Abstract and Keywords

This article challenges the idea that the concept of the state is a central feature of constitutional law everywhere. Sociologists have stolen a march on jurists by questioning whether the state is a universal phenomenon. The argument here is that only continental European scholarship has come up with what can be judged a complete theory of the state. By comparison, Anglo-American constitutional law scholarship has a somewhat incomplete conception of the state. To demonstrate this, the analysis relies on the usual threesome invoked for defining the state (a government, a territory, a people), which presupposes a somewhat fictitious similarity among all states, but on an examination of the relations of the state, first, with the concept of constitution, then with the concept of sovereignty, and finally with the concept of institution.

Keywords: theory of the state, constitutional law, European scholarship, constitution, sovereignty, institution

I. Introduction 269

II. Two Distinct Ways of Viewing the Relationship between Constitution and State 271
   1. The State as a Presupposition of the Constitution 271

III. State, Sovereignty, and Federalism: Can the State be Thought of as Anything Other than the Unitary State? 274
   1. Sovereignty as a Criterion of the State and the Tropism of the Unitary State 274
   2. Federalism is Perceived Differently in the Two Constitutional Traditions 276

IV. The State as an Institution: Asymmetric Treatment 278
   1. Objectivization of Power by the State Conceived of as an Institutionalized Power (or Juristic Person) 278
   2. Institutionalization or Perpetuation of Power 278
   3. The Impersonalization of Power: Rulers Represent the State 279
   4. The Anglo-American Conception or the Non-Institutionalized State 280

V. Conclusion 282

I. Introduction

The very title of this chapter, inviting us to address ‘conceptions of the state’ in comparative constitutional law, indicates the angle of approach: the aim is to examine the question of the state in the plural. And in assuming there to be more than one conception of the state, the editors clearly give us to understand that distinct constitutional traditions or cultures think of the state in different ways. Accordingly, the comparative outlook immediately introduces some form of ‘relativization’ or differentiation, inviting law scholars to desist for a moment from thinking that their own legal systems and states are universal phenomena.

(p. 270) Yet it is striking that classical textbooks on comparative constitutional law are seemingly unaware of this feature of the comparative outlook.1 For example, Giuseppe de Vergotti’s classic—a Standardwerk—has a chapter on the concept of state as if it were a natural category of comparative constitutional law notwithstanding the observation that the state is not recognized in the United Kingdom.2 Some recent studies, however, do break with this assumption that there is just one single conception. Elisabeth Zoller argues that public law, and so the state, too, is thought of differently in France and in the United Kingdom and the United States.3 Similarly, in her recent textbook, Marie-Claire Ponthoreau writes that ‘The legal concept behind the word “state” does not have the same consistency from one legal order to another’.4 But ultimately, can we not be a little more radical in the treatment of our subject matter and consider that in constitutional law there are jurisprudential traditions in which the concept of state is not a central feature. Might we not venture even that in some countries there simply is no conception of the state?

Just think of England, which is so important for the understanding of modern constitutional law and of the satellite community of common law countries. Whereas the term État became established in seventeenth-century France, ‘state’ failed to find a foothold in England and has not done so since.5 It will be objected that it is not because there is no word for something that there is no concept of. Yet it is precisely that there is a concept labelled ‘state’ which causes the problem when examining the English case. There is no idea of the state in England, remarks the writer of an important book on the subject.6 This is what strikes foreign observers looking to give an account of English law. As Denis Baranger remarks, ‘any talk of the state in Britain seems … to raise certain problems’.7 Likewise, those English jurists who have rubbed with continental and Roman legal science are alert to the strangeness of their own ‘stateless’ system.8 One need only open Albert Dicey’s textbook on British constitutional law9 to see that it has no specific developments on the state.10 And neither in theory nor in practice is the state at the heart of British publicists’ thinking.11 This observation is even more valid with respect to US legal literature. Whether one opens the most important textbooks of constitutional law (eg Lawrence Tribe, American Constitutional Law) or casebooks, the state plays a very limited (p. 271) part. Times have changed since a scholar such as Westel Willoughby sought to convert US jurists to the science of the state.

This lack of interest for the question of the state contrasts starkly with the theoretical over-investment to which the same concept has been subject in certain European countries and especially in Germany and France, but in others, too (Italy, Spain). Embarrassingly, in Germany it was even envisioned that a new discipline might be created by the name of Allgemeine Staatslehre (general theory of the state). This hesitancy in choosing between constitutional law and general theory of the state12 for dealing with the state, is a field of study in itself.13 It is worth recalling here as evidence that the question of the state is a central one for European constitutionalists.

As readers will have grasped, one of the aims of this chapter is to challenge the idea that the concept of the state is a central feature of constitutional law everywhere. Sociologists have stolen a march on jurists by questioning whether the state is a universal phenomenon. The argument here is that only continental European scholarship has come up with what can be judged a complete theory of the state. By comparison, Anglo-American constitutional law scholarship has a somewhat incomplete conception of the state. To demonstrate this, I shall rely not on the usual threesome invoked for defining the state (a government, a territory, a people), which presupposes a somewhat fictitious similarity among all states,14 but on an examination of the relations of the state, first, with the concept of constitution, then with the concept of sovereignty, and finally with the concept of institution.15 It is worth making one final point: this chapter lays no claim to being exhaustive; it is built on hunches and on some sparse evidence.

II. Two Distinct Ways of Viewing the Relationship between Constitution and State

For reasons to do with the subject matter of our inquiry and with space constraints, I shall not engage in any discussion of constitutional theory as to whether or not ‘constitution’ should be taken in the material or the formal
Conceptions of the State

The purpose of my line of inquiry is more limited and is confined to underscoring the existence of two separate traditions: the continental, Roman, ‘European’ tradition that almost systematically associates the idea of constitution with that of state; and the common law tradition that tends to think of the one separately from the other.

1. The State as a Presupposition of the Constitution

The continental European tradition is distinctive in that it considers the concept of state itself as being presupposed by the concept of constitution. More often than not, the constitution is (p. 272) defined by the (written) legal instrument that organizes and founds the state. From this legal-regulatory conception flow two major consequences for understanding the constitution.

For one thing, it is perceived as being politically neutral. By this it is meant that the constitution is not necessarily devised to be liberal, to impose limits on power; it also purports to organize power. The constitution is the regulation of the state, that is, the legal arrangement by which the uppermost echelon of the state—its rulers—is organized and governed. This does not necessarily imply that power is limited, shared out, and controlled. The constitution can be thought of as ruling an authoritarian state, which is contrary to the most stringent requisites of constitutionalism. This accounts for the two sides of the constitution: it is at once and the same time an instrument that enables and an instrument that disables. Moreover, since the constitution is perceived as the ‘articles of association’ of the state, it is considered as binding on its addressees, the rulers and the ruled alike. It is thought of as a unilateral instrument, along the lines of the law of the state. Thus in several countries the constitution must be promulgated like any statute. In the instrument of promulgation it is stated that it must be performed like a ‘law of the state’. Such an interpretation bars the road to another conception of the constitution that was current in the nineteenth century and that saw it as a sort of political contract, whether a constitutional pact or a federal pact.

According to this tradition, then, the state has in some sense become a sort of second nature of modern constitutional law. It is a kind of unheeded element of this constitutional science that reappears immediately when the association between state and constitution becomes problematic. This is the case today with European construction, which has compelled constitutionalists to think again about the connection between the constitutional instrument and the political entity to which it pertains. If the constitution is the ‘articles of association’ of the state, for there to be such a European constitution there would either have to be a European state or the constitution would have to be dissociated from the state. Both solutions have been contemplated.

Alongside this European tradition, which is state-centred even in respect of the concept of constitution, however, stands the common law tradition that does not at all perceive the constitution as being intrinsically related to the state. Here the constitution is related to the idea of the rule of law, as transpires from reading Albert Dicey. He conceives of the constitution as ‘the security given under the English constitution to the rights of individuals’. The concept of rule of law appears here as the great unwritten constitutional principle of English law. It implies three things: the principle of lawfulness, the equality of all citizens before law, and the judicial protection of rights. Accordingly, constitutional law too is inspired by the maxim (p. 273) that ‘remedies precede rights’ such that there is serious competition between the written constitution and the common law. One might somewhat provocatively claim, following Dicey, that there is no need for any specific constitutional law since the common law provides for everything. For a jurist from the continental European area, the relations between the two concepts (constitution and common law) remain a mystery. Admittedly, one should not be too naive and mistake a part for the whole believing that constitutional law is exhausted with the rule of law. The rule of law does not extend to every domain. There is a whole sphere of ‘governmentality’ in English law that, thanks to what is left of the doctrine of prerogative or of Crown theory, escapes the control of the courts and even any political control. US law too has a sphere of power that is not controlled by the courts and which is even tending to grow dangerously.

There arise a whole series of conceptual consequences from this sort of association made by Anglo-American jurisprudence between the rule of law and the constitution. The constitution is perceived as a set of legal rules by which the rights of individuals are safeguarded. Political power rests upon two pillars: the common law and the power of the courts. Dicey, once again, captured this primacy of the ‘judicial State’ in very clear terms: ‘They [judges] rather than the government represent the august dignity of the State, or, in accordance with English terminology of the Crown'. This is why the idea of judicial review becomes thinkable, including for a statute that supposedly emanates from the people when one is not stopped by the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty. Marbury v Madison (1804), which is invariably cited to illustrate the birth of the control of constitutionality of laws, is a fine example of a common law procedure used to defend an individual right. Such pre-eminence granted to the rights of the individual assumes that it is admitted that the courts are third instances between the state and individuals; they are not fundamentally conceived as state institutions. The other obvious consequence is that the constitution is conceived also, or even primarily, as a charter of freedoms. This is a recent tendency, though. Initially in England, rights were protected by simple laws or by simple charters (such as the celebrated Magna Carta). In the United States, the Philadelphia Constitution admittedly contains a Bill of Rights, but its initial aim was not so much to protect human rights in general as to prevent the Union (the federation) from interfering excessively in the internal affairs of its member states. However, since the Fourteenth Amendment introduced the Equal Protection Clause its massive use by the courts, combined with the equally massive use of the Due Process Clause has brought about a substantial upheaval in US constitutional law, which is mainly perceived as a law of freedoms within which the rights recognized by the Bill of Rights form the chapter headings of textbooks and casebooks. US constitutional jurists interested in institutional law pass for heterodox figures.
Conceptions of the State

(p. 274) III. State, Sovereignty, and Federalism: Can the State be Thought of as Anything Other than the Unitary State?

Although the issue of sovereignty is examined in this volume by Michel Troper, it shall nonetheless be addressed here for a very simple reason: when it is taken in the sense of sovereignty of the state (legal person) and not in the (democratic and organic) sense of sovereignty of the people, it comes in a different way under the ideal-type contrast between the ‘European’ and ‘non-European’ conceptions.

On the one hand, there is a telltale sign in the Anglo-American tradition: in the Oxford Handbook of Law and Politics, the word ‘Sovereignty’ is not to be found in the subject index. Jurists with an interest in sovereignty are exceptions in the jurisprudential landscape. On the other hand, in countries of the Roman law tradition, the term ‘sovereignty’ is invariably found in equivalent dictionaries. In France, it is found in most dictionaries, and at any rate in constitutional dictionaries, as it is in Germany in the Lexikon on core concepts (Koselleck, Brunner, and Conze, Staatslexikon) or in Italy. If the concept of sovereignty is central in the continental European tradition, it is because it is considered that it is and that it remains the criterion of the state. However, this question is quite simply not posed in Anglo-American constitutional scholarship. And so the concept of sovereignty illuminates the clear contrast between European doctrine, which gives precedence to state power that prizes sovereignty, and the Anglo-American doctrine, which is unaware of sovereignty or ignores it.

1. Sovereignty as a Criterion of the State and the Tropism of the Unitary State

In the European tradition, and by virtue of sovereignty, state power is held to be a power of dominance, even an irresistible power, such that the state may be defined as a ‘unit for decision-making and action’. Admittedly, this idea has been contested, but it does still structure the way the state is perceived. Notably, it has a major effect on the way in which forms of state are accounted for. It long implied that just a single form might be described: the unitary state. Federalism came along to spoil this fine harmony and plunge jurists into terrible turmoil. A second form had to be invented, the federal state, which allowed greater autonomy—that could extended to constitutional and legislative autonomy—to ‘infra-state’ authorities referred to as ‘federated entities’.

Undoubtedly, the tropism of sovereignty leads the state to be perceived of principally as a unitary state. The unitary state has been defined as the one which ‘legally appears to be that whose Power lies in its founding, in its structure and in its exercise’. It might be more judicious, though, to define it by the idea of centralization of political power. By such a definition it can be taken that, in a unitary state, authorities other than the state are not entitled to exercise political power; they are administrative bodies. Such political centralization is reflected, legally, by the idea of ‘the unity of law or of statute within the country (unity of legislation)’. In France, which is the land of the unitary state par excellence, political centralization is reflected in the terms of the Constitution by the principle that the Republic is indivisible. This principle means that ‘a single political power exercises sovereignty over the whole territory of the Republic, albeit that power may attribute certain competencies, including competencies differentiated by location, to other authorities, notably local authorities. This idea may be worded differently: statute law remains a monopoly of the central state. This monopoly is narrowly interpreted. In 1991, the Conseil constitutionnel dismissed the idea that the Corsican Assembly might enjoy a sort of right to intervene in the legislative process even for bills concerning the region and considered that the mere reference in the act of the expression ‘the Corsican people’ was unconstitutional. Political centralization, specific to the unitary state, does not preclude a degree of flexibility in managing administrative issues. It is equally at ease with administrative centralization as with administrative decentralization. France is the prime example of the doubly (politically and administratively) centralized state that has evolved towards a form of decentralized unitary state in the administrative sense of the word.
Conceptions of the State

Some countries of Europe, notably Italy and Spain, are evolving from ‘unitary’ states into ‘regional’ states. A form of political regionalism is thus developing that resembles federalism without being federalism. Let us take the case of Spain, whose 1978 Constitution recognizes the existence of a plurinational reality. It guarantees the ‘right to self-government of the nationalities and regions’ (Art 2). Two types of autonomous status are provided for by the Constitution that may be characterized as ordinary and special status. The Constitution also provides that historical nationalities (Catalonia, Euskadi, Galicia) may immediately accede to self-government by different channels. While the state retains all the attributes of sovereignty (foreign policy, defence, currency, Crown property, justice, criminal and commercial legislation), the regions have exclusive competence for town and country planning, tourism, health, agriculture, and so on. They have a wide autonomy, including legislative autonomy. But such entities cannot be considered sovereign and remain subject to the control of the law of the Spanish state. The institutional status of the self-governing communities remains largely ring-fenced by the state constitution. It is therefore not at all surprising, in terms of positive constitutional law, that the Spanish Constitutional Court should have annulled in 2010 a large part of the organic law of 19 July 2006 reforming the Statute of Autonomy of Catalonia. Yes, the state statute passed by the Cortes had been approved by its Catalan people further to a referendum, pursuant to the procedure in force, but that democratic approval was insufficient since, in the case in point, certain provisions of the Catalan statute purported to give the Autonomous Community the right to administer justice independently and autonomously, which was an encroachment on the competence of the Spanish state. Unsurprisingly the Constitutional Court also annulled other provisions for extending competencies, notably fiscal powers.

It is not wrong, therefore, to claim that the principle of sovereignty continues, despite all the tinkering with it, to govern most unitary states. Generally, the federal state appears to jurists steeped in a unitary state culture to be an abnormal state compared with the normal, unitary state.

2. Federalism is Perceived Differently in the Two Constitutional Traditions

If the state is thought of as being necessarily sovereign, it is not readily compatible with the federal structure. This contradiction is especially marked when dealing with the federal state, the description of which raises a serious problem for continental European jurists. State sovereignty is mainly manifested in the existence of an indivisible bundle of powers and competencies exercised by a single entity termed the state. But federalism radically challenges this form of state sovereignty by dividing what is indivisible between two tiers of government, the federation and its member states. There arises from this a natural infirmity of the federal government that is dominated by the ‘principle of incompleteness’: ‘a federal government is in essence incomplete’. European scholarship has come up with several more or less radical solutions to overcome the antinomy between federalism and sovereignty. One is to abandon the criterion of sovereignty and consider that the federal state is a state that is itself made up of states, which is to accept that there are such things as non-sovereign states: federated states. Another solution contemplated is to consider that the federal state is merely a highly decentralized state, but this solution presents the drawback of denying that there is anything particular about federalism. In short, European thinking has enormous difficulty with the federal arrangement because European thinking is state-centred.

In contradistinction, thinkers with a common law constitutional culture have studied federalism rather pragmatically. They have treated it as a fact that thrusts itself upon them and have not wondered whether it had to be reconciled with state sovereignty, a category that is not central to their world of thought. A commentator such as Dicey has a whole chapter on the question of federalism without making an issue of the contradiction with sovereignty. He studies parliamentary sovereignty, the cardinal principle of his country’s law, at length, but ignores it when he studies US or Swiss federalism. Or again, Kenneth Wheare, the most influential writer on federalism, deals with the issue without ever broaching the potential conflict with sovereignty. US jurists reason differently because the basis of their thinking is not state sovereignty but the federal structure. From their standpoint, it is sovereignty that appears to be a legal absurdity. Or when they study true federations, they evoke the existence of a ‘double sovereignty’ or a ‘divided sovereignty’. This was the thesis of ‘dual federalism’ the Supreme Court was to invent after Justice Marshall to try to find a compromise between the supporters of the Union and the supporters of the member states. One of the most famous expressions of this doctrine is found in the Supreme Court ruling:
Conceptions of the State

Our dual form of government has it perplexities, state and nation having different spheres of jurisdiction ... but it must be kept in mind that we are one people, and the powers reserved to the states and those conferred on the nation are adapted to be exercised, whether independently or concurrently, to promote the general welfare material and moral.

Such an argument is still taken up today, whether by the Supreme Court or by the scholarly literature. For their part, the proponents of ‘national federalism’ have resorted to the theory of the sovereignty of the people, which has proved the most economical way to overcome this obstacle. This theory effectively construes federalism as a simple form of separation of powers. Accordingly the idea of federation, that is, of the Union, that lies at the heart of the Articles of the Confederation and of the 1787 Constitution, is relegated to the subordinate rank of ‘auxiliary precaution’. We have there, then, a dominant interpretation of federalism that considers it not as a political form, a form of state, but simply as a ‘vertical’ separation of powers.

In a nutshell, whereas continental European doctrine endeavours to think of federalism in its various guises through the form of the state, the federal state, common law jurists never refer to the federation as a ‘state’. This is very striking for the United States where the term ‘the Union’ substitutes for an abstract concept and saves answering the question of principle (federalism versus statism). For me, it has to be concluded from this that a state-centred analysis is unsuitable for describing the specificities of federal government. Federal government ‘seen from the inside ... has nothing to do with a “state”’ with the result that it can be taken, not unparadoxically, that ‘American federalism’ allows us ‘to think of federalism outside of the theory of the federal state’. So Anglo-American legal scholars think of federalism without the theory of the federal state whereas continental European legal scholarship adapts (betrays?) its theory of state to make it compatible with federalism as a fact and to avoid the tropism of the unitary state.

(p. 278) IV. The State as an Institution: Asymmetric Treatment

For a European constitutional law scholar, it goes without saying that the state is a personalized entity, separate from those who govern. This obvious point is reflected by the idea that the state is an artificial person. Thus the state is at one and the same time a political body and a juristic person. What is obvious here in Europe ceases to be so across the Channel or across the Atlantic. The absence of institutionalization of political power by Anglo-American scholarship confirms the argument proposed here that the concept of state is incomplete in the cultural area of what is called the common law.

1. Objectivization of Power by the State Conceived of as an Institutionalized Power (or Juristic Person)

In the European tradition, jurisprudence has inferred from this and other related facts that the state is to be distinguished from the sovereign, the ‘rulers’ and from the government. The state, writes Georges Burdeau, is ‘an institutionalized power’. And so it is from the vantage point of the institution that we shall examine the state now considered as a juristic person, an abstract entity that is an artificial person. Here the job is to think about the mediation between the sovereign (sovereignty) and the state, that is, to think about the objectivization of power.

It should next be emphasized that before being the subject of one or rather several legal theories, the state was first a practical challenge. Jurists had to invent a legal category, that of ‘person’ or ‘body’, to meet the circumstances of the time. The precursors of international law had to legally systematize interstate relations and overcome the diversity of forms of government of the different European states (absolute monarchy, constitutional monarchy). It took two centuries, from Grotius to Vattel, for this construction of the legal personality of the state to be constructed in international law doctrine. Constitutional law supplements international law by finding the way to think of making power perpetual and impersonal thanks to the concept of institution applied to the state.

2. Institutionalization or Perpetuation of Power

Historically, it was the practical challenge posed by the death of the sovereign that led jurists to invent solutions for institutionalizing power. French and English jurists turned to various legal fictions as a basis on which to perpetuate royal power. Thus the monarchical state brought about the first modern form of such institutionalization, as attested by Bossuet's celebrated apostrophe: 'You die, O Princes, but your state must be immortal'. Accordingly, this neutralization of political power was to be able to serve the monarchical and democratic causes alike, the nation substituting for the king as a timeless category. But this institutionalization of power did not concern just the succession of rulers, sovereigns; it also affected the passing on of public offices and of public property. A judge authorized by the sovereign continues to hold office notwithstanding the death of the sovereign who personally invested him. The continuity of office (of public functions) is to be thought through; the continuity of property too. Property acquired or ceded by the state must remain so. Thus jurists were to invent distinctions between the state as owner and the rulers, between the republic as owner and the sovereign as administrator, and between office holder and office, inspired by the civil law distinction between the ownership of property and the enjoyment or use of it. The theory of the inalienability of public property is the fortunate corollary of the institutionalization of state power.

In declaring the state immortal, it is merely a matter of thinking of it as independent of its rulers’ existence. From this standpoint, the theory of state is heir to Roman-canon law, for solutions already hit upon by canon lawyers for thinking of the Church as an institution have been simply transposed and adapted.

3. The Impersonalization of Power: Rulers Represent the State

The institution-person does not have as its sole function to perpetuate power; it forms a decisive divide between the public person and the private person. This can be understood from the fundamental issue of the ascribing of deeds done by people, rulers, to a legal entity, a juristic person, the state.

Here we shall start out from a far-sighted observation by Alf Ross:

> certain acts that are in reality performed by definite individuals—and who else could perform an act—are spoken of as being performed not by the physical person in question, but by a subject called ‘the State’. The act, one can also say, is attributed to ‘the State’.

It is striking to observe that even the most nominalist of jurists have been compelled to admit that, behind the deed done by an individual, the law has been bound to imagine a ‘subject that one imagines as it were standing behind him’. Whether they realize it or not they fall in with Thomas Hobbes, who plainly separates the republic (the state, the commonwealth) from the sovereign who is its representative, and to whom Hobbes ascribes a dual capacity: a ‘political capacity’ when he acts on behalf of the state and a ‘natural capacity’ when he acts for his own account, as a private individual. There results a split between the state and its rulers, and a duality of rulers who have a dual public (representative of the state) and private side (as a natural person). Thus through the institutionalization of power the great question of representation is played out. The state acts through its representatives. Before having a democratic meaning, whereby the rulers represent the rule by virtue of a trust (Locke), representation has an eminently state or institutional meaning: rulers (like civil servants) represent the institution, the state. It is this objective dimension that Martin Loughlin describes when he says that sovereignty is ‘authoritative’.

Thus, as it is conceived in Europe, the theory of the state as an institution allows us to handle the continuity of power and the attribution of acts to a juristic person. It is the essential complement to the subjective theory of sovereignty. Even so, one must be aware of the political danger of this doctrine when it is instrumentalized by the power in place. It can lead rulers to shelter behind the person of the state to escape their own responsibility for any negligence or wrongdoing on their part. The concept of the juristic person may thus be the screen behind which rulers hide and so endorse a denial of responsibility although responsibility is one of the fundamental concepts of modern constitutionalism.
To conclude on this point, it is important to grasp the scope of this phenomenon of the impersonalization of power in the construction of the modern state: it exceeds the single field of constitutional law. It prohibits the ‘assetization’ of the state. Rulers are not the owners of their power; what is public is clearly separate from what is private. They hold competencies, legally, that they do not own.76

4. The Anglo-American Conception or the Non-Institutionalized State

It would be an exaggeration to claim that Anglo-American jurists are unfamiliar with the concept of the institutionalization of power. There are obviously fragments of it. English jurists too resorted to various legal fictions on which to found royal power, as is readily apparent from the Tudor metaphor of The King’s Two Bodies,77 so masterfully reconstructed by Ernst Kantorowicz. But here too jurists do not have the possibility of turning to the concept of state in cases where European jurists are able to do so. To prove this hypothesis, we shall settle for a single piece of evidence, which is resort to the concept of the Crown in English law.78 One might also refer, in a broader domain than constitutional law, to the comparison Maitland makes between the English concept of ‘trust’ and Gierke’s famous theory of the German corporation.

As might be expected, the legal concept of the Crown is not unequivocal and English jurists are still divided over its exact meaning.79 The term may designate the holder of various prerogatives the characteristics of which are that they are not fully subject to the rule of law. The Crown has also gradually become the symbol of government. More materially, one might say that the word ‘Crown’ simply meant formerly the king (Anson) or nowadays the queen (Wade). The throng of uses of the Crown in public law has been commented on.80 But the main point about this concept is that it apprehends the polity as a corporation, the English particularity of which is supposedly that it is here a ‘corporation sole’ and not a ‘corporation aggregate’. What the non-English jurist needs to know of the Crown is that it allows ‘a natural person [the king] to be depersonalized’ or that it has made it possible to raise the royal person ‘to a new rank: that of an institution of government’.81 In many respects the concept of the Crown reminds the European jurist of the concept of the state in the sense of institutionalized power and yet it is not the equivalent of the state.

The dividing line with the European tradition lies in the fact that English law does not view the Crown as a juristic person capable of incorporating the polity.82 As Kantorowicz writes, the ‘concept of Crown’ was not the artificial person, but ‘a personification in its own right, which was not only above its members, but also divorced from them.’83 The essential thing is, however, in the role of institutionalization played by the concept of the Crown in creating an indissociable whole with the monarch.84 There is much common ground between the formation of legal personality in the history of European law and that of the Crown in the history of English law, but these similarities do not preclude us from remarking upon one major difference: unlike the legal person or institution, the concept of the Crown has never been used to characterize the state as a polity endowed with a legal nature. In other words, the complete incorporation of the polity has not been made possible by the doctrine of the Crown. There has been ‘bodyfication’ but not ‘personification’. The upshot is that it can be said in the United Kingdom that ‘the state is not personalized’.85 A formula that one might equally well turn around by saying that, with respect to the European model of the complete state, the absence of personalization of power means there can be no talk of state in the United Kingdom.

The difficulty with this principle was raised by Maitland who observed that ‘English lawyers ... liked their persons to be real’.86 The usually concrete view of the Crown, thought of as the monarch, or nowadays as the symbol of executive authority, thus proceeds from the ‘traditional antipathy of English common lawyers towards abstract thinking’.87 This turn of mind probably explains why English law has not adopted identical solutions to European public law with respect to the institutionalization of power: the attribution of a patrimony to the state, a clear dissociation between public management and private management, the gradual attribution of state responsibility for acts that are part of public administration etc.88 We shall not dally here over the visible political consequences of this doctrine of the Crown, which are both contrary to the theory of the rule of law (with respect to immunity) and to republicanism. It is not this residue of monarchism that is worth attending to but the fact that such a doctrine attests to the difficulty, already pointed out, for English law to escape from the domination of the common law and a private law style of thinking.89 Now, there is no possibility of constructing a theory of the state if one remains caught up in schemes that are the legacy of private law.
V. Conclusion

It would not be impossible to contemplate other examples to prove the difference in outlook between the state-centred doctrine of jurists from the Roman law family and the state-de-centred doctrine of jurists from the common law family. The place of the courts might be indicative of another major difference: the courts are related to the state in the European tradition but, rather, to civil society in the common law tradition. One might also point out the differences in the way in which various cultural and national entities are thought of in the various cultural spaces. But the purpose of this chapter has been to show that political power is not perceived in the same way by constitutional law scholars. In other words, the question of whether to ascribe a central position to the concept of ‘state’ is indeed a question that divides the world of constitutional law.

Bibliography

For a very good bibliography, related to public law and state, see Martin Loughlin, Foundations of Public Law (2010), 468–510

Olivier Beaud, La puissance de l’Etat (1994)

Olivier Beaud, Théorie de la Fédération (2nd edn, 2009)

Ernst-Wolfgang Böckenförde, Staat, Verfassung, Demokratie (1991)

Erst Kantorowicz, The King’s Two Bodies: A Study in Mediaeval Political Theology (1957)

Martin Loughlin, ‘In Defence of Staatslehre’ (2009) 48 (1) Der Staat 1

Frederick Maitland, Collected Papers, vol III (1911)

Alexandre Passerin d’Entrèves, The Notion of State: An Introduction to Political Theory (1967)

Helmut Quaritsch, Staat und Souveränität (1970)

Maurice Sunkin and Sebastian Payne (eds), The Nature of the Crown: A Legal and Political Analysis (1999)

Michel Troper, Pour une théorie juridique de l’État (1994)

Notes:

(*) Translated by Christopher Sutcliffe.
In one dated but still valuable treatise, the state is presupposed in constitutional law with no possible variation in the meaning of the term being even contemplated: Manuel García Pelayo, Tratado de derecho constitucional comparado ([1951] 7th edn, 1984), 101.

(10) Which does not preclude Dicey from thinking of constitutional law as a branch of public law understood as the law of the state. This is paradoxical, notes Baranger (n 7), 255. Similarly in Ivor Jennings, The Law and the Constitution (1959) the most prominent twentieth-century British constitutionalist does not even include ‘state’ in the subject index let alone have a chapter on it.

(11) It suffices here to cite a contemporary British jurist Patrick Birkinshaw, Grievances, Remedies and the State (2nd edn, 1994), 9, cited by Baranger (n 7), 245.

(13) See for the Franco-German dialogue Christoph Schönberger, ‘Der “Staat” der Allgemeinen Staatslehre: Anmerkungen zu einer eigenwilligen deutschen Disziplin im Vergleich mit Frankreich’ in Olivier Beaud and Erk Volkmar Heyen (eds), Une science juridique franco-allemande? (1999), 111ff.

(14) This analytic definition is used above all in public international law and far less in constitutional law.

(16) Adhémar Esmein, the founder of constitutional law as a discipline in France, wrote tersely: ‘the constitution determines the form of the state and the form of the republic’. Raymond Carré de Malberg defined the constitution, further to German scholarship, as the ‘articles of association of the state’.

(17) On the constitution as a pact, see the two major commentators Maurice Hauriou, Précis de droit constitutionnel (1923, 1929) and Carl Schmitt, Verfassungslehre (1928), ch 6.

(18) Based on the arguments in Dieter Grimm, Braucht Europa eine Verfassung? (1995), setting out the ‘statist’ terms of the debate.

(19) On the rule of law, also see Chapter 10.

(20) Cited by Ponthoreau (n 4), 322.
(21) Dicey (n 9) (10th edn, 1895), 148.

(22) As is astutely noted by Zoller (n 3), 105.

(23) See the keen comments by Baranger (n 7), 255.

(24) Bruce Ackerman, Decline and Fall of the American Republic (2010).

(25) Dicey (n 9), 259–60. Cited by Baranger (n 7), 256.

(26) The state described here is a ‘judicial State’ (Etat de justice). Space is too short here to describe the convergence between the two traditions. In Europe, too, Rechtsstaat becomes Justizstaat.

(28) One thinks here obviously of the work of Bruce Ackerman, whose historical and ‘political science’ orientation makes him a peculiar figure in the United States. Cass Sunstein and Mark Tushnet are other non-mainstream figures.

(29) See Chapter 17.

(30) See Chapter 17 by Michel Troper on the various meanings of sovereignty.

(33) Dictionnaire de culture juridique (2004).

(36) The great Herman Heller might be cited here.

(37) Either by categorically denying the very idea of sovereignty, which was perceived of as metaphysical (Duguit, Kelsen) or by replacing it with the idea of public or state power (Staatsgewalt) (Jellinek).

(38) On federalism, see further Chapter 27.

(40) See on this Maurice Hauriou, Précis de droit administratif (1911), 116.

(41) Ibid (11th edn, 1927), 44.

(43) Article 34 of the French Constitution of the Fifth Republic states tersely: ‘Parliament shall pass statutes’ (La loi est votée par le Parlement).

(44) Conseil constitutionnel, no 91-290 DC, 9 May 1991 (Corsica).

(45) For a sound outline in French see Philippe Lauvaux, Les grandes démocraties contemporaines (3rd edn, 2004), 790ff, esp nn 271ff (Italy) and nn 297ff (Spain).

(46) See esp ibid, 994–5 n 298.

(50) ‘By the federal principle, I mean the method of dividing powers so that the general and regional governments are each, within a sphere, coordinate and independent’: Kenneth Wheare, Federal Government (4th edn, 1947), 10.

(51) ‘Soeverignty, in the classic sense, has no meaning: divided as power is, the element of absoluteness which is essential to the concept of sovereignty is not present’: Richard Leach, American Federalism (1970), 1.

(52) For a very good recent description of such federalism see Robert Schütze, From Dual Federalism to Cooperative Federalism (2010).

(55) Federalism as an American constitutional principle may be defined as the existence of two tiers of sovereignty in which each person is a citizen of the nation in respect of the powers and obligations of that government, but also a citizen of the state where he lives.

(57) Ibid ch 9.

(58) Here again Kenneth Wheare is quite representative of the mainstream as pointed out by Murray Forsyth, Union of States (1981), 2.

(59) This ideal-type describes European (German, Swiss), North American (United States, Canada), Central and South American (Mexico, Brazil) and even Australian federalism.

(60) Zoller (n 49) 61 n 21.

(61) Ibid 73 n 37.

(62) It is to escape this dead-end that I proposed thinking about the federation without resort to the theory of the state. See Olivier Beaud, Théorie de la Fédération (2nd edn, 2009). See also Christoph Schönberger, Unionsbürger (2005).

(63) Loughlin, Foundations (n 8), 183ff.

(64) Georges Burdeau, Traité de science politique, vol II (1980).

(65) The theory of juridical personality of the state has occupied many jurists. It suffers from the absolutist image bequeathed by German scholarship that made the state an artificial person with subjective rights of domination over individuals. For a description of this Gerber–Laband doctrine see Olivier Jouanjan, Une histoire de la pensée juridique allemande (2004).

(67) See on this the highly instructive argument by Emmanuelle Jouannet, Emer de Vattel et l’émergence

(70) The remarkable work by Ernst Kantorowicz, The King’s Two Bodies (1957) is invariably cited, but this idea is commonplace in the history of law.

(73) Loughlin (n 32).

(74) In a way, I am trying to tip into the theory of the institution what other commentators (here Loughlin and Baranger) pigeon-hole under sovereignty. But what matters in the end is that both theories relate to one theory, that of the state.

(75) On constitutionalism, see further Chapter 8.

(76) Here one cannot overemphasize the importance of the section Jellinek devotes to this issue as ‘Die Rechstellung der Staatsorgane’ in Allgemeine Staatslehre (1911), 560ff.

(77) See on this Kantorowicz (n 70), the reading of which is greatly facilitated by the erudite warnings in Giesey (n 69), 9ff.

(78) There are probably others.

(79) See Maurice Sunkin and Sebastian Payne, The Nature of the Crown: A Legal and Political Analysis (1999). My thanks to Denis Baranger for drawing my attention to this work which is central to the subject.

(80) Baranger (n 7), 204–14.

(81) These two formulas are borrowings from ch 4, ‘Ce qu’il est advenu de la Couronne’ in Baranger (n 7), 197 and 200.

(82) Martin Loughlin, ‘The State, the Crown and the Law’ in Sunkin and Payne (n 79), 55–6 (interpreting the history of English law and Kantorowicz, The King’s Two Bodies).

(83) Kantorowicz (n 70), 382.

(84) Loughlin (n 82), 33.

(85) Baranger (n 7), 264.

(87) Loughlin (n 82), 59.

(88) See the developments by Martin Loughlin who shows the harmful consequences of over-use of the concept of the Crown.

(89) Loughlin (n 82), 76.

Olivier Beaud
Olivier Beaud is Professor of Public Law, University Panthéon-Assas (Paris II) and Director, Institut Michel Villey
The debate over rights and liberties — not unlike the debate over justice — is a never-ending discussion, reflecting normative, analytical, and institutional considerations. Questions respecting the rights and liberties that an individual can lay claim to are fundamental normative questions in every society. They represent major themes not only in the law, especially constitutional law, but also in practical philosophy, and they count as central points of political dispute. This article is organized as follows. Section I presents a brief analysis of the general structure of rights and liberties. The themes of Section II are the concepts of human and constitutional rights. Finally, Section III discusses the construction of constitutional rights, especially the connection between constitutional rights and proportionality.

Keywords: rights, liberties, human rights, constitutional rights, proportionality

I. Rights and Liberties in General 284
   1. Will and Interest Theory 284
   2. A Three-Stage Model of Rights 284
   3. A System of Basic Legal Positions and Relations 285
      (a) Rights to Something 285
      (b) Liberties 287
      (c) Powers 288

II. Constitutional and Human Rights 288
   1. Constitutional Rights 288
      (a) Formal Concept 289
      (b) Procedural Concept 289
      (c) Substantial Concept 289
   2. Human Rights 290
      (a) The Concept of Human Rights 290
      (b) The Justification of Human Rights 290

III. The Construction of Constitutional Rights 291
   1. Rules and Principles 291
   2. Proportionality 291
   3. The Rule Construction 292
   4. The Principles Construction 294

THE debate over rights and liberties—not unlike the debate over justice—is a never-ending discussion, reflecting normative, analytical, and institutional considerations. Questions respecting the rights and liberties that an individual can lay claim to are fundamental normative questions in every society. They represent major themes not only in the law, especially constitutional law, but also in practical philosophy, and they count as central points of political dispute, too. This fundamental normative character is connected with a high degree of complexity. With respect to liberties, Isaiah Berlin has spoken of ‘more than two hundred senses of this protean word recorded by historians of ideas’. Rights are no less complicated. To these analytical problems, one has to add, finally, the institutional dimension. As soon as rights and liberties are recorded in a constitution as constitutional rights and liberties that bind the legislature and are subject to constitutional review, questions respecting the democratic legitimation of constitutional adjudication arise.

Not losing track in this tangle of problems requires conceptual clarity. In the first section, I will present a brief analysis of the general structure of rights and liberties. The themes of Section II are the concepts of human and constitutional rights. Finally, Section III concerns the construction of constitutional rights, especially the connection between constitutional rights and proportionality.

1. Rights and Liberties in General

1. Will and Interest Theory

Ever since the nineteenth century, various versions of the will and interest theories have competed on the question of the most adequate explanation of the concept and nature of rights or, more precisely, of subjective rights. Adherents of the will theory claim that an individual’s having a right means that his will or his choice, his freedom, is recognized. With this, rights are closely connected with liberties. Proponents of the interest theory, by contrast, argue that it is essential for rights that they protect or promote the interests or the benefit, the well-being, of the holder of the right. This applies, for example, to social rights.

2. A Three-Stage Model of Rights

The division of the theories of rights into will theories and interest theories is, if they are interpreted as strict alternatives, unfortunate. Some norms conferring rights may aim at the recognition of freedom of the will, others may have the purpose of protecting and advancing interests, and still others may do both. The puzzles stemming from this, puzzles that have occupied so very many legal theorists for such a long time, can easily be avoided if one grounds the analysis of rights on the distinction among (1) reasons for rights, (2) rights as legal positions and relations, and (3) the enforceability of rights. This distinction leads to a three-stage model of rights.

The first stage comprises reasons for rights. Each and every argument that can be put forward for establishing rights of whatsoever kind has its place at this first stage. This includes not only the recognition of freedom of the will and the protection and promotion of the interests of the holder of the right, that is, to say, individual goods, but also collective goods. It is possible, for instance, to attempt to justify private property through the general economic effectiveness of an economy based on private ownership, that is, by reference to a collective good. To be sure, an exclusively collective justification of individual or subjective rights gives these rights a much weaker standing than a justification based exclusively or supplementarily on individual goods. But this does not suffice to exclude collective goods from the first stage of the three-stage model, for this model is no more than an analytical tool and has, as such, a formal character. It comprises all conceivable reasons for subjective rights. Whether they are good or bad reasons remains a matter of substantive normative argument.

At the second stage rights as legal positions and relations are to be found. An example is the right of a as against b that b should not obstruct a in φ-ing, for instance the right a citizen has against the state, namely, that the state should not obstruct this citizen’s freedom of speech.

Finally, the third stage comprises those legal positions that are related to the enforcement of legal rights, especially by bringing an action. This stage connects powers concerning enforcement with the positions and relations of the second stage.

All three stages are important for a theory of constitutional rights. The central elements, however, are the positions and relations at the second stage. They are what the reasons for rights located at the first stage intend to justify.
and they, again, are reasons for the enforceability to be found at the third stage. Their nature and their different kinds can be expounded by means of a system of basic legal positions and relations.

3. A System of Basic Legal Positions and Relations

The basis of the system of basic legal positions and relations is a threefold division into (1) rights to something, (2) liberties, and (3) powers. This division is linked both to Bentham's distinction between ‘rights to services’, ‘liberties’, and ‘powers’ and to Bierling's distinction between 'legal claim' (Rechtsanspruch), ‘simple legal permission’ (einfache[s] rechtliche[s] Dürfen), and ‘legal ability’ (rechtliche[s] Können).

(a) Rights to Something

Rights to something or claim rights are three-place relations of which the first element is the beneficiary or holder of a right (a), the second is the addressee of the right (b), and the third is the subject matter or object of the right (S). This three-place relation can be expressed by ‘R’. The most general form of a statement of a right to something can thus be expressed by (p. 286)

\[(1) \text{ RabS} \]

This scheme can give rise to a great variety of rights, depending on what a, b, and S stand for. When a refers to a natural person and b to the state and S to an omission, a classical liberal defensive right is expressed. If S represents a positive act of the state, a right to positive state action is at hand, for example a protective right or a social right. Many other problems of the theory of constitutional rights can be constructed as questions of what can be substituted for each of the three variables. If, for instance, one puts the question of whether natural persons can be substituted not only for a, the holder, but also for b, the addressee, the problem of the horizontal effect of constitutional rights is drawn up, and if, to give a further example, the question is raised of whether not only individuals but also groups, for instance minorities of whatever kind, can be substituted for a, the problem of collective constitutional rights is at stake.

It is of great importance for the theory of rights that

\[(1) \text{ RabS} \]

is logically equivalent to

\[(2) \text{ ObaS} \]

‘O’ in this formula is a three-place or relational form of the elementary deontic operator ‘O’ which can be read as ‘It is obligatory that …’.\(^8\)

When (1) expresses

\[(3) \text{ a has a right against b that b grant a asylum,} \]
\[(4) \text{ b is vis-à-vis a obligated to grant a asylum.} \]

(1) and (2) are what Wesley Newcomb Hohfeld terms ‘right’ and ‘duty’ qua ‘jural correlatives’.\(^9\) Jural correlatives are converse relations. For this reason, the sentence

\[(5) \text{ RabS} \equiv \text{ ObaS} \] represents an analytical truth. This does not mean that every obligation or duty implies a right. The non-relational duty

\[(6) \text{ ObS} \]

does not imply

\[(1) \text{ RabS} \].
(p. 287) But it does mean that rights imply duties. There cannot exist a right without a correlative duty. This is of considerable systematic importance, for it connects the concept of a right with the concept of the ‘ought’. Sentences that contain an ‘ought’ express—individual or general—norms. This leads to the further corollary that there cannot exist rights without norms.

(b) Liberties

One has to distinguish the general concept of liberty and the concept of legal liberty as a special case of general liberty. Liberties, in general, are three-place relations between a liberty-holder, a liberty-obstacle, and a liberty-object. The paradigmatic cases of liberty-holders are natural persons. But it is also possible to talk about the liberties of associations. With respect to the liberty-object the most fundamental distinction is the difference between a choice of action and a single act. An example of a choice of action is the option of professing a certain religion or not. In this case one can speak of a negative liberty. An example of a single act as the object of liberty is the profession of a certain religion. In this case one can speak of a positive liberty. Positive liberty stands at the centre of Kant’s moral philosophy: ‘The positive concept of freedom is that of the ability of pure reason to be of itself practical. But this is not possible except by the subjection of the maxim of every action to the condition of its qualifying as universal law.’ Herewith, positive liberty is defined as the liberty to do what is right or correct, and as not the liberty to do whatever one wishes to do. In the moral life of a person positive liberty can be of great importance. Making positive liberty the basis of the political system, however, has despotic consequences. For this reason, constitutional rights are essentially guarantees of negative liberties. Therefore, only negative liberties shall be considered here.

The liberty-obstacles, too, can be of very different kinds. Economic want and social pressure are examples. In these cases one can speak of economic and social ‘unfreedom’. With a view to constitutional rights, legal liberty-obstacles are of special importance. Legal liberty-obstacles consist, first and foremost, of legal prohibitions and legal commands. If a is both free from legal prohibitions to express his opinion and free from legal commands to do so, no legal liberty-obstacles exist, and a is free to express his opinion. This implies an intrinsic relation between legal liberty and permission. If the expression of a’s opinion is neither prohibited nor required, a is both permitted to express his opinion and permitted not to do so. For this reason, legal liberty can be defined as the conjunction of the permission to perform an act and the permission to omit it.

(p. 288) All constitutional rights that refer to actions of their holders, for instance exercise of religion, expression of opinion, and choice of profession, are liberties in the sense just defined. But if they were only such liberties, they would be poor liberties. A liberty as such does not imply a right to be unhindered in the realization of this freedom. Such a right is a right to something and is fundamentally different from a combination of permissions. In order to obtain a fully-fledged constitutional right the unprotected liberty must be protected by a substantively equivalent right against the state that the state should not prevent the liberty-holder from doing what he is constitutionally free to do. This right against the state—which, again, has to be combined with a power to challenge infringements before the courts—is the core of constitutional rights. For this reason, rights to negative or positive actions on the part of the state, that is, rights to something, are the centre of the theory of constitutional rights. One might call this the ‘centre thesis’.

(c) Powers

The centre thesis is true also with respect to powers. Legal powers or competences consist of the normative possibility to change the legal situation by means of a declaration that expresses the (actual or imputed) intention to bring about this change. An example is the power to acquire and to dispose of property. This power is an essential element of the constitutional guarantee of property.

Legal competences are closely related to liberties. They ‘add something to the freedom of action of the individual, that he does not have by nature’. Any removal, limitation, or obstruction of powers or competences of an individual is an infringement of the individual’s respective constitutional right. The central character of the right to something results from the fact that the decisive question in such cases is whether the right of the individual against the state to omit such infringements is violated. In what follows, therefore, the right to something as a right to either negative or positive action will be in the foreground of the discussion.
II. Constitutional and Human Rights

1. Constitutional Rights

All constitutional rights are rights, but not all rights are constitutional rights. This leads to the question of the specific character, the differentia specifica, of constitutional rights. This question concerns the concept and the nature of constitutional rights. Three concepts have to be distinguished: a formal, a procedural, and a substantial concept.

(a) Formal Concept

A formal concept of constitutional rights is employed if fundamental rights are defined as rights contained in a constitution, or in a certain part of it, for instance in a catalogue of constitutional rights, or as rights endowed by the constitution with special protection, for example a constitutional complaint brought before a constitutional court. Concepts of this kind are useful in many cases. They do not suffice, however, where the question arises of whether a right recorded in a constitution is really a constitutional right and not, for instance, a competence of an instrument of state, or when the problem is posed of whether a right established outside a catalogue of constitutional rights is a constitutional right or not, or when a dispute comes up of whether a right not explicitly endowed with special protection requires such protection. Questions like these cannot be excluded from the beginning, and they cannot be answered on the basis of an exclusively formal concept.

(b) Procedural Concept

The procedural concept of constitutional rights focuses on the institutional problems connected with constitutional rights. Recording constitutional rights in a constitution and granting a court the power of judicial review with respect to all state authority is to limit the power of parliament. In this respect, constitutional rights are an expression of distrust in the democratic process. They are, at the same time, both the basis and the boundary of democracy. Corresponding to this, the procedural concept of constitutional rights holds that constitutional rights are rights which are so important that the decision to protect them cannot be left to simple parliamentary majorities.

The procedural concept, indeed, points out an important feature of constitutional rights, but this concept, too, is not able to grasp the nature of constitutional rights. The reason for this is that the procedural concept, as such, is unable to provide for an answer to the question of which rights are so important that the decision about their protection cannot be left to simple parliamentary majorities. This can be elaborated only within the framework of a substantial concept of constitutional rights.

(c) Substantial Concept

Human rights are at the core of the substantial concept of constitutional rights. Constitutional rights are, as the formal and the procedural concept illustrate, positive, institutionalized rights, that is to say, positive law at the level of the constitution. But this does not suffice to explain their nature. Positivity is but one side of constitutional rights, namely, their real or factual side. Over and above this they also possess an ideal dimension. This might be termed the ‘dual nature thesis’. The ideal dimension stems from their connection with human rights qua moral rights. Constitutional rights are rights that have been recorded in a constitution with the intention of transforming human rights into positive law—the intention, in other words, of positivizing human rights.

This intention is often an intention actually or subjectively held by the constitutional framers. And, over and above this, it is a claim necessarily raised by those who set down a catalogue of constitutional rights. This claim is a special case of the claim to correctness necessarily connected with law in general. A catalogue of constitutional rights is correct if and only if it matches the requirements of human rights. All catalogues of constitutional rights, therefore, can be conceived as attempts to transform human rights into positive law. As with attempts generally, attempts to transform human rights into positive law can be successful to a greater or lesser extent. To this extent, the ideal dimension plays a critical role even after the transformation into positive law. This is of pivotal importance for the interpretation and application of constitutional rights. Their wording and the concrete original intent of the framers of the constitution by no means lose their importance. But wording and concrete original intent are relativized by the ideal intent directed to the realization of human rights. For this reason, the dual nature of constitutional rights necessarily requires a certain degree of judicial activism.
2. Human Rights

The dual nature thesis presupposes the existence of human rights. It might be objected that human rights qua moral rights do not exist. A reply to this objection requires an answer to two questions. The first concerns the problem of what it means to say that a human right qua moral rights exists, whereas the second concerns the problem of whether the conditions for the existence of moral rights can be fulfilled.

(a) The Concept of Human Rights

Human rights are, first, moral, second, universal, third, fundamental, and, fourth, abstract rights that, fifth, take priority over all other norms.22 With respect to the problem of existence only the first of these five defining properties of human rights need be considered: their moral character. Rights, in general, exist if they are valid. The validity of human rights qua moral rights depends on their justifiability and on that alone. Human rights exist if and only if they are justifiable.

(b) The Justification of Human Rights

Theories about the justification of human rights can be classified in many ways. The most fundamental division is that into theories which generally deny the possibility of any justification of human rights and theories which claim that some kind of justification is possible. An example of the sceptic view is Alasdair MacIntyre's thesis that 'there are no such rights, and belief in them is one with belief in witches and in unicorns'.23 The less or non-sceptic approaches can be divided in eight groups: first, religious, second, intuitionistic, third, consensual, fourth, socio-biological, fifth, utility maximizing or instrumentalistic, sixth, cultural, seventh, explicative, and, eighth, existential approaches. The first six approaches are confronted with serious difficulties.24 The seventh, the explicative approach, however, is of special interest. This approach attempts to provide a foundation for human rights by making explicit what is necessarily implicit in human practice. Its starting point is the practice of asserting, asking, and arguing, that is to say, the practice of discourse. This practice presupposes rules of discourse that express the ideas of freedom and equality. Freedom and equality, in turn, are central elements of human rights.

This argument as such, however, does not suffice to justify human rights. Why should we take our discursive capabilities seriously? The answer can be given only within the framework of the eighth approach, the existential approach. We must take our discursive capabilities seriously if we want to take ourselves seriously as, to use an expression of Robert Brandom's, 'discursive creatures',25 or, in classical terms, as reasonable beings. This is a decision about our identity. The explicative argument can be conceived as objective, the existential argument as subjective. The combination of both is the explicative-existential argument. The explicative-existential argument is objective as well as subjective. As an objective-subjective justification it offers, on the one hand, much less than pure objectivity, but it establishes, on the other, much more than pure subjectivity. Perhaps one can say that it provides enough objectivity to be qualified as a justification. If this is true, human rights exist.

III. The Construction of Constitutional Rights

The concept of constitutional rights depends not only on their general structure as rights and on their relationship to human rights but also on their construction. There are two fundamentally different constructions of constitutional rights: the rule construction and the principles construction.

1. Rules and Principles

The basis of both the rule and the principles construction is the norm-theoretic distinction between rules and principles.26 Rules are norms that require something definitively. They are definitive commands. Their form of application is subsumption. If a rule is valid and applicable, it is definitively required that exactly what it demands be done. If this is done, the rule is complied with; if this is not done, the rule is not complied with. By contrast, principles are norms requiring that something be realized to the greatest extent possible, given the factual and legal possibilities at hand. Thus, principles are optimization requirements. As such, they are characterized by the fact that they can be satisfied to varying degrees, and that the appropriate degree of satisfaction depends not only on what is factually possible but also on what is legally possible. Rules aside, the legal possibilities are determined essentially by opposing principles. For this reason, principles, each taken alone, always comprise a merely prima facie requirement. The determination of the appropriate degree of satisfaction of one principle relative to the requirements of another principle is balancing. Thus, balancing is the specific form of the application of principles.

2. Proportionality

The struggle between the rule construction and the principles construction is far more than a discussion of a norm-theoretic problem. It is a debate about the nature of constitutional rights, which has far-reaching consequences for nearly all questions of the doctrine of constitutional rights. For this reason, it is a basic question of constitutionalism.

(p. 292) If the principles construction should prove to be correct, that is to say, if constitutional rights are to be conceived as optimization requirements, constitutional rights are necessarily connected with proportionality analysis. The principle of proportionality, which in the last decades has received ever greater international recognition in the theory and practice of constitutional review, consists of three sub-principles: the principles of suitability, of necessity, and of proportionality in the narrower sense. All three sub-principles—and this is the gist of the matter—express the idea of optimization. Principles qua optimization requirements require optimization relative both to what is factually possible and to what is legally possible.

The principles of suitability and necessity refer to optimization relative to the factual possibilities. The principle of suitability precludes the adoption of means that obstruct the realization of at least one principle without promoting any principle or goal for which it has been adopted. If a means $M$, adopted in order to promote the principle $P_1$, is not suitable for this purpose, but obstructs the realization of $P_2$, then there are no costs either to $P_1$ or $P_2$ if $M$ is omitted, but there are costs to $P_2$ if $M$ is adopted. Thus, $P_1$ and $P_2$, taken together, may be realized to a higher degree relative to what is factually possible, if $M$ is abandoned. $P_1$ and $P_2$, when taken together, $P_1$, that is, as elements of a single system, prescribe the use of $M$. This shows that the principle of suitability is nothing other than an expression of the idea of Pareto-optimality. One position can be improved without detriment to the other.

The second sub-principle of the principle of proportionality, the principle of necessity, requires that of two means promoting $P_1$ that are, broadly speaking, equally suitable, the one that interferes less intensively with $P_2$ has to be chosen. If there exists a less intensively interfering and equally suitable means, one position can be improved at no cost to the other. Under this condition, $P_1$ and $P_2$, taken together, require that the less intensively interfering means be applied. This is, again, a case of Pareto-optimality.

In the debate about proportionality analysis the first two sub-principles, that is, optimization relative to the factual possibilities, is scarcely contested. This shows that even opponents of balancing do not completely dismiss the idea of optimization. The real difference begins where costs are unavoidable. Costs are unavoidable when principles collide. Then, according to the principles construction, balancing becomes necessary. Balancing is the subject of the third sub-principle of the principle of proportionality, the principle of proportionality in the narrower sense. This third sub-principle, that is, balancing, is the central issue of the proportionality debate.

3. The Rule Construction

The rule construction claims that balancing can be avoided in the application of constitutional rights without loss of rationality. This claim would be justified if the rule construction could propose an alternative to balancing that provides for a higher degree of rationality than balancing—or, at least, as high a degree.

One alternative suggests itself: interpretation. In Germany, Ernst Forsthoff insisted that the problems of the application of constitutional rights should be resolved by means of the traditional canons of interpretation. These canons of interpretation comprise, above all, the word (p. 293) ing of the constitutional rights provisions, the intentions of those who framed the constitution, and the systematic context of the provision being interpreted. There are, indeed, numerous cases that can be resolved without any problem simply by appeal to wording, intent, or systematic context, that is to say, by subsumption or classification connected with interpretation, just as anywhere else in the law. Hearing the Rolling Stones in a library, for instance, is not an exercise of religious freedom even if someone believes that this kind of music is the highest source of inspiration. But as soon as the case becomes more complicated, the rule construction causes problems. Several constitutions guarantee freedom of religion without any limiting clause. If one takes the wording seriously and if a particular religious faith requires for religious reasons that apostates be killed, then this killing must be classified as a practice within one’s religion.
Naturally, adherents of the rule construction will not arrive at the result that killing required by a religious faith is allowed. But they have difficulties justifying this result. Not classifying the killing as a religious act would contradict the wording of the constitutional rights provision. For this reason, the rule construction has to explain why the religious act is a forbidden religious act. The intent of the framers of the constitution may be offered as a reason. What else, however, other than the protection of life and the religious freedom of the apostates should this argument refer to? If the argument refers to these rights, the protection of life and the religious freedom of the apostates, then the argument boils down to something ultimately based on balancing. The right to live together with the religious freedom of the apostates is given precedence over the religious freedom of those who want to kill the apostates for religious reasons. If the result of balancing were in all cases as clear as it is here, an elaborated theory of balancing might, indeed, be of some theoretical interest, but it would not have very much practical importance. But there are many cases in which the solution of collisions between constitutional rights as well as collisions between constitutional rights and collective goods are far more difficult. Here, the principles construction has the advantage of directly addressing the issue.

No less serious are the problems of the rule construction in cases in which constitutional rights are connected with a limiting clause. In Germany, a limiting clause, namely, that, ‘These rights may only be interfered with on a statutory basis’,30 is attached to the right to life and to bodily integrity. If one follows the rule construction and takes these provisions literally, the limiting clause makes possible any interference with life and bodily integrity as long as the interference is based on a statute. One may attempt to avoid this by adding more rules, for instance, by applying a rule that forbids infringing on the core content of a constitutional right. Even here, however, the legislature remains completely free at every point beneath the threshold of the core content. Moreover, it is highly unlikely that the core content can be determined at all without resorting to balancing.31

A rule construction orientated towards wording, intent, and systematic context can be assigned to positivism. The rule construction, however, need not be positivistic. A non-positivistic alternative to balancing is proposed by Ronald Dworkin. According to Dworkin, striking a balance is a matter of ‘asking whether the benefits of our policy outweigh its costs to us’.32 This is a kind of economic calculation.33 The application of the constitutional right is said to concern ‘the very different question of what morality requires, even at the expense of our own (p. 294) interests’.34 With this argument, Dworkin presupposes that there exists an intrinsic relation between balancing and interests, a relation that amounts to the thesis that each and every instance of balancing is a balancing of interests. This, however, must be contested. It is, indeed, possible to strike a balance in a conflict of interests. But this does not imply that balancing is possible only between interests and not between rights. The principles construction tries to show that balancing rights is possible. Still another point in Dworkin’s argument has to be rejected. Dworkin conceives balancing and moral arguments as opposites. The reply to this is that balancing rights is a form of moral argument.

4. The Principles Construction

The principles construction attempts to resolve the problems of the rule construction by establishing a necessary connection between constitutional rights and balancing. Many authors have raised objections to this approach. The most serious objection is the irrationality objection. It has been prominently articulated by Jürgen Habermas and Bernhard Schlink. Habermas’s central point is that there exist ‘no rational standards’ for balancing: ‘Because there are no rational standards for this, weighing takes place either arbitrarily or unreflectively, according to customary standards and hierarchies.’35 Where Habermas speaks about arbitrariness and unreflected customs, Schlink employs the concepts of subjectivity and decision: balancing is, ‘in the final analysis, subjective and decisionistic’.36

The irrationality objection can be rejected if balancing can be established as a rational form of legal and moral argument. This is, indeed, the case. The basis of balancing is a rule that can be called the ‘Law of Balancing’. This rule states:

The greater the degree of non-satisfaction of, or detriment to, one principle, the greater must be the importance of satisfying the other.37

The Law of Balancing excludes, inter alia, an intensive interference with principle $P_1$ that is justified only by a low importance assigned to the satisfaction of the colliding principle $P_2$. Such a solution would not be an optimization of...
Rights and Liberties as Concepts

$P_1$ together with $P_2$.

The Law of Balancing is to be found, in different formulations, nearly everywhere in constitutional adjudication. It expresses a central feature of balancing and is of great practical importance. If one wishes to achieve a precise and complete analysis of the structure of balancing, the Law of Balancing has, however, to be elaborated further. The result of such a further elaboration is the Weight Formula.\(^{38}\)

The Weight Formula defines the weight of a principle $P_i$ in a concrete case, that is, the concrete weight of $P_i$ relative to a colliding principle $P_j (W_{i,j})$, as the quotient of, first, the product of the intensity of the interference with $P_i (I_i)$ and the abstract weight of $P_i (W_i)$ and the degree of reliability of the empirical assumptions concerning what the measure in question means for (p. 293) the non-realization of $P_i (R_i)$, and, second, the product of the corresponding values with respect to $P_j$, now related to the realization of $P_j$. It runs as follows:

$$W_{i,j} = \frac{I_i \cdot W_i \cdot R_i}{I_j \cdot W_j \cdot R_j}$$

Now to talk about quotients and products is sensible only in the presence of numbers. This is the problem of graduation. The question of graduation is a central problem of the theory of balancing, for balancing presupposes scales.\(^{39}\) At exactly this point the distinction between continuous and discrete scales is of pivotal importance. Continuous scales run over an infinite number of points between, for instance, 0 and 1. The crude nature of law excludes their application. Discrete scales are defined by the fact that between their points no further points exist. Balancing can begin as soon as one has a scale with two values, say, light and serious. In constitutional law a triadic scale is often used, which works with the values light ($l$), moderate ($m$), and serious ($s$). There are various possibilities in representing these values by numbers.\(^{40}\) If one chooses a geometric sequence like $2^0, 2^1, \text{and } 2^2$, it becomes possible to represent the fact that the power of principles increases overproportionally with increasing intensity of interference. This is the basis of an answer to the reproach that principles theory leads to an unacceptable weakening of constitutional rights. If the concrete weight ($W_{i,j}$) of $P_i$ is greater than 1, $P_i$ precedes $P_j$, if it is smaller than 1, $P_j$ precedes $P_i$. If, however, the concrete weight ($W_{i,j}$) is 1, a stalemate exists. In this case, it is both permitted to perform the measure in question and to omit it. This means that the state, especially the legislator, has discretion.\(^{41}\) This is of utmost importance for a reply to the reproach that principles theory leads to an overconstitutionalization.\(^{42}\)

The objection has been raised to the Weight Formula that it ‘expresses the ideal of a precise, one might say mathematically precise, science’,\(^{43}\) and that this is ‘a methodological chimera’.\(^{44}\) This objection rests on a misconception of the role of the Weight Formula. Its purpose is not to reduce legal reasoning to calculation, but to grasp those elements that play a role in balancing and to see how these elements are connected. The numbers that have to be substituted for the variables represent propositions, for instance the proposition ‘The interference with the freedom of expression is serious’. This proposition has to be justified in order to establish its claim to correctness and this can only be done by argument. In this way, the Weight Formula is intrinsically connected with legal discourse. It does not claim to substitute calculation for discourse, but attempts to lend to discourse a rational structure.

The abstract explanation of the principle of proportionality in the narrower sense shall be illustrated by means of a case. The case in question is a decision of the German Federal Constitutional Court that concerns the classic conflict between freedom of expression and (p. 296) personality right.\(^{45}\) A widely published satirical magazine, Titanic, described a paraplegic reserve officer who had successfully carried out his responsibilities, having been called to active duty, first as ‘born Murderer’ and in a later edition as a ‘cripple’. The Düsseldorf Higher Regional Court of Appeal ruled against Titanic in an action brought by the officer and ordered the magazine to pay damages in the amount of DM 12,000. Titanic brought a constitutional complaint. The Federal Constitutional Court undertook ‘case-specific balancing’\(^ {46}\) between freedom of expression of those associated with the magazine ($P_1$) and the officer’s general personality right ($P_2$). To this end the intensity of interference with these rights was determined, and they were placed in relationship to each other. The judgment in damages was treated a ‘lasting’\(^{47}\) or serious (s) interference ($I_1$) with freedom of expression. If the Court had confined itself simply to qualifying the interference as serious, rational argument would be missing. This seems to be the picture of balancing that stands behind the irrationality objection. But the Court gives reasons for its assessment of the interference as serious. Its main argument is that awarding damages could affect the future willingness of those producing the magazine to carry... out their work in the way they have done previously. To this it adds that if exaggerations and alienations were not allowed as stylistic devices, satirical magazines would have to give up their characteristic features.\textsuperscript{48} This can be conceived as rational argumentation. In a next step the description ‘born Murderer’ was placed in the context of the satire published by \textit{Titanic}. Here several persons had been described as having a surname at birth in a ‘recognizably humorous’ way, from ‘puns to silliness’.\textsuperscript{49} This excludes an ‘isolated assessment’ of the description ‘born Murderer’ by taking it ‘literally’.\textsuperscript{50} The interference with the personality right was thus treated as having a moderate \textit{(m)}, perhaps even a light or minor intensity \textit{(l)}. Even those who do not agree with this result must concede that this rating of the intensity of interference with \textit{P}\textsubscript{2} is backed by reasonable arguments. More cannot be required in law. The two assessments of intensity completed the first part of the decision. In order to justify an award of damages, which is a serious \textit{(s)} interference with the constitutional right to freedom of expression (\textit{P}\textsubscript{1}), the interference with the right to personality (\textit{P}\textsubscript{2}), which was supposed to be compensated for by damages, would have had to have been at least also serious \textit{(s)}. But according to the assessment of the Court, it was not. It was at best moderate \textit{(m)}, perhaps even merely light \textit{(l)}. This meant that the interference with the freedom of expression was, according to the Law of Balancing and, with it, the Weight Formula,\textsuperscript{51} disproportional and, therefore, unconstitutional.

Matters, however, were different in that part of the case where the officer had been called a ‘cripple’. According to the Court, this counted as ‘serious harm to his personality right’.\textsuperscript{52} (\textsuperscript{p. 297}) This assessment was justified by the fact that describing a severely disabled person in public as a ‘cripple’ is generally taken, these days, to be ‘humiliating’ and to express a ‘lack of respect’.\textsuperscript{53} Such public humiliation and lack of respect reaches and undermines the very dignity of the victim. The graduation of the intensity of interference is, in this way, again backed by reasons. And—this is a reply to Dworkin’s separation of balancing and morality—these reasons are moral reasons. The result is stalemate. The serious \textit{(s)} interference \textit{(l\textsubscript{1})} with the freedom of expression \textit{(P}\textsubscript{1}) was countered by the great \textit{(s)} importance \textit{(l\textsubscript{2})} accorded to the protection of personality. Consequently, the Court came to the conclusion that it could see ‘no flaw in the balancing to detriment of freedom of expression’\textsuperscript{54} in the decision of the Düsseldorf Higher Regional Court of Appeal. \textit{Titanic}’s constitutional complaint was thus only justified to the extent that it related to damages for the description ‘born Murderer’. As far as the description ‘cripple’ was concerned, it was unjustified.

The \textit{Titanic} decision shows that balancing is a test of whether an interference with a right is justified. This can be generalized. All constitutional rights are rights against unjustified infringements.\textsuperscript{55} The most rational way of distinguishing justified and unjustified infringements is proportionality analysis. This leads to a necessary connection between constitutional rights and proportionality. The claim to correctness, necessarily connected with constitutional rights as with law in general, requires that the application of constitutional rights be as rational as possible. The highest possible degree of rationality can be achieved only by proportionality analysis. In this way, the claim to correctness establishes a necessary connection between constitutional rights and proportionality. This implies that proportionality is included in the very concept of constitutional rights.

\section*{Bibliography}

\begin{itemize}
  \item John Austin, \textit{Lectures on Jurisprudence or the Philosophy of Positive Law}, vol 1 (5th edn, 1911)
  \item Aharon Barak, \textit{The Judge in a Democracy} (2006)
  \item David M. Beatty, \textit{The Ultimate Rule of Law} (2004)
  \item Isaiah Berlin, \textit{Four Essays on Liberty} (1969)
\end{itemize}
Rights and Liberties as Concepts

Wesley Newcomb Hohfeld, Fundamental Legal Conceptions as Applied in Judicial Reasoning (1919)

Notes:

(*) I should like to thank Stanley L. Paulson for suggestions and advice on matters of English style.

(4) See on this Robert Alexy, ‘Individual Rights and Collective Goods’ in Carlos Nino (ed), Rights (1992), 170, 175–6, where the thesis is presented that a legal system that comprises no subjective rights established by individual reasons cannot be justified.

(5) Bentham (n 2), 57–8, 83–92, 119.

(7) In A Theory of Constitutional Rights (n 3), 120, the subject matter or object is represented by ‘G’. This is due to the fact that a subject matter or an object in German is ‘Gegenstand’.

(8) On more details see Alexy (n 3), 131–8.

(10) Against the triadic construction of rights it might be objected that rights without addressees are possible. An example would be a right to medical aid in cases of serious sickness. This right could acquire the following structure: RaS. RaS represents what traditionally is designated as ‘ius in rem’, in contrast with a ‘ius in personam’. It is, indeed, for reasons of simplicity often sufficient to speak of rights in the sense of relations between a legal subject and an object. If, however, there exists no duty of any addressee at all, in our case, for instance, no duty at all for those who are able to help, then talk about the existence of a right would make no sense. See on this Alexy (n 3), 121.

(11) Ibid 140.
Rights and Liberties as Concepts

(12) Ibid 140–2.

(14) If ‘P’ is used to express a permission, ‘S’ to express the subject matter or object of the permission, and ‘L’ to express liberty as a normative modality, legal liberty can be defined as follows:

\[ LS = PS & P \neg S. \]

It is, of course, possible to transform this scheme into a scheme that expresses a legal relation:

\[ LabS = PabS & Pab \neg S \]

(see on this Alexy (n 3), 145). ‘LabS’ is not the same as Hohfeld’s ‘privilege’. According to Hohfeld a privilege ‘is the mere negation of a duty’ (Hohfeld (n 9), 39). This means that Hohfeld’s privilege is nothing else than Pab\(\neg S\), for Pab\(\neg S\) is equivalent to \(\neg OabS\); that is to say, the negation of the (relative) duty of doing S (Alexy (n 3), 134–6). For this reason, legal liberty necessarily comprises two privileges, one with a negated subject matter (\(\neg S\)), and one with a non-negated subject matter (S).

(15) Alexy (n 3), 149.

(19) Alexy (n 3), 297.

(20) Alexy (n 18), 16–17.

(22) Alexy (n 18), 18.

(24) Alexy (n 18), 19–21.

(26) See Alexy (n 3), 47–9.

(27) On proportionality, see further Chapters 33 and 34.

(30) See Grundgesetz für die Bundesrepublik Deutschland (German Basic Law), Art 2(2)(3).

(31) Alexy (n 3), 192–6.

(34) Dworkin (n 32), 27.

(37) Alexy (n 3), 102.

(40) On this issue see Alexy, ‘The Weight Formula’ (n 38), 20–3.

(41) Alexy (n 3), 408, 410–14.

(42) The discretion in case of stalemate can be termed ‘structural discretion’. A second kind of discretion is epistemic discretion. Epistemic discretion is incorporated in the Weight Formula by means of $R_i$ and $R_j$, the variables referring to the degree of reliability of the empirical assumptions on the basis of which judgments about the intensity of interferences rest. See on this ibid 414–25.

(44) Ibid 165.

(45) Decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court, BVerfGE 86, 1. On freedom of expression more generally, see Chapter 42.

(46) BVerfGE 86, 1 (11).

(47) Ibid 1 (10).

(48) Ibid.

(49) Ibid 1 (11).

(50) Ibid 1 (12).

(51) It is of interest that the Court refers only to the intensity of interference on both sides ($I_i, I_j$). This makes sense of the assumption that the Court attributes the same abstract weight ($W_i, W_j$) to the freedom of expression ($P_i$) and the right to personality ($P_j$). Such silent graduations are to be observed in many cases. For the Weight Formula this means that $W_i$ and $W_j$ can be reduced. The same seems to apply to the degree of reliability of the empirical assumptions ($R_i, R_j$). This shows that the Weight Formula is an instrument that provides not only a description of what a court has explicitly presented but also a reconstruction of what it has implicitly assumed. In this respect, the Weight Formula can play not only a reconstructive but also a critical role.

(52) BVerfGE 86, 1 (13).

(53) Ibid.

(54) Ibid.

Robert Alexy is Professor of Public Law and Legal Philosophy, Christian Albrechts University, Kiel
Abstract and Keywords

This article begins with a broad-brush survey of the doctrinal play of public/private in constitutional law. It then turns to the question of a public/private ‘ghost’ presiding from behind the scenes over all the public/private coding we meet on stage—shaping it, guiding it, imbuing it with point and purpose: some master spirit, then, whose sundry outcroppings in institutional design and doctrinal construction could be expected both to vary and to converge in interestingly describable and classifiable ways across instances of the legal forms and practices labelled as ‘constitutional’.

Keywords: constitutional law, public, private, ghost conjecture

I. Public/Private (and Allied) Classifications in Constitutional-Legal Doctrine: A Brief Survey 299
   1. Types of Laws 299
   2. Object Fields: Powers of Decision 300
   3. Object Fields: Matters to be Decided 302
   4. The Question of the ‘Reality’ of Public/Private 304

II. The ‘Ghost’ Conjecture 304
   1. ‘Dualist’ Constitutionalism 304
   2. Inspirations and Implications of Dualism 305
   3. Test Drive: Dualism Modified? 307
   4. Test Drive: Resilience to Critique? 309
   5. The Case of South Africa 311

III. Comparison Functional and Taxonomic 312
   1. Left-Right Scalar Cross-Country Comparison and the ‘Relative Autonomy of Law’ 312
   2. From ‘Functional’ to ‘Taxonomic’ Comparison: British Constitutionalism 314

LIKE an ostinato motif, the theme of public/private plays and replays in the constitutional law of many countries. Or does it? No doubt, as we shall see, the figuration recurs in countless doctrinal classifications in constitutional law. But is it truly all the same idea, each repetition the sign of one and the same fixture in constitutional-legal thought and discourse?

This chapter begins with a broad-brush survey of the doctrinal play of public/private in constitutional law. It then turns to the question of a public/private ‘ghost’ presiding from behind the scenes over all the public/private coding we meet on stage—shaping it, guiding it, imbuing it with point and purpose: some master spirit, then, whose sundry outcroppings in institutional design and doctrinal construction could be expected both to vary and to converge in interestingly describable and classifiable ways across instances of the legal forms and practices we label as
I. Public/Private (and Allied) Classifications in Constitutional-Legal Doctrine: A Brief Survey

1. Types of Laws

We start with two crosscutting divisions-in-kind among laws or bodies of law.

In Table 14.1, the two columns divide laws according to whether they are specially directed to the acts and relations of the state or government or rather are directed widely to acts and relations of persons and groups in society at large. The two rows divide laws according to whether they are or are not meant to control all other lawmaking, as fixed and enduring commitments of the regnant constitutional order. Note that our terminology is stipulative and may not exactly match variant local usages. Depending on the place and context, professional usage may sometimes class major regulatory legislation for the social sphere as ‘public’ law. Laws may be classed as ‘constitutional’ when they fall into any of cells I, II, or III. Cell IV includes what is often called the ‘general’ or ‘background’ or ‘common’ law (in civilian systems, it would be mainly the law of the Civil Code). The term ‘ordinary law’ will typically refer to laws in cell III as well those in cell IV.

As the table shows, there is no necessitating logic of correlation across our two axes of differentiation of laws. Among a given system's laws undoubtedly directed to a governmental (‘public’) sphere of application, certainly some but likely not all will be classed as basic (‘constitutional’) in depth and force. Conversely, among a system's laws undoubtedly received as basic in depth and force, some will very likely reach beyond the governmental to the social

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Table 14.1 Two Categorizations of Laws</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>by sphere of application</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>by normative depth and force</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>‘public law’ specifically directed to state and government</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>basic law fixed and controlling</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ordinary law variable and controlled</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Logical independence does not, however, equate to an absence of tendencies-in-practice toward correlation across our table's intersecting axes of division. To the contrary, cell II in our table—the space of so-called ‘horizontal’ application of basic-law guarantees—is seemingly everywhere felt to be an exceptionally contested and problematic space. Some greater or lesser pull towards evacuation of that space, leaving application of the basic laws more or less restricted to the state sector, is a commonplace expectation of constitutional lawyers around the globe. The cause, however, plainly is not conceptual; it must rather be political: the greater or lesser prevalence in a society's decisive quarters of some combination of (1) a special commitment to freedom of choice of aims and activities by persons and groups in society, (2) a correlative reluctance to extend throughout society the same set of restraints we devise for the state viewed as the monopolist of lawful force, the sole power from the reach of whose command there is virtually no exit; and perhaps, along with those, (3) a belief in the superior ability of on-the-spot parliaments—as compared with rarely assembled constitutional framers—to work out contextually responsive, aptly fair, and freedom-optimizing solutions to societal conflicts, at least as long as the parliament acts under the effective control of good basic laws (a bill of rights). It seems it must always be some combination of such beliefs that will argue, more or less persuasively depending on the time and place, toward confinement of the application of basic laws to the state sector, leaving non-state operations to be controlled by the more concretized processes of occasional, ordinary lawmaker.

2. Object Fields: Powers of Decision

We come, then, to public/private division not of laws but of object-fields. An object-field is a class of items (it might be actions, actors, powers, functions, purposes, concerns, ‘spheres’) on whose characterization as X or not-X depends the legal system's choice of which of two or more arguably applicable rules or doctrines to apply to a case. In any system that differentiates bodies of public and private law in the manner of Table 14.1's two columns, we must expect also to encounter public/private characterization in at least one object-field, simply because the system requires some way of delimiting the respective scopes of application of the two types of laws.

Table 14.2 Public/Private Classifications of Powers of Decision [‘→’ = tends towards, argues for, in constitutional-legal doctrine.]

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>decision power classed as</th>
<th>of the state</th>
<th>not of the state</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>‘verticality’</td>
<td>→ certainly controlled by both governmental ('public') and basic ('constitutional') law and</td>
<td>→ possibly shielded from basic law and</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>official immunity vs. rule of law</td>
<td>possibly shielded from civil ('private') law</td>
<td>‘state action’ doctrines</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>certainly controlled by civil('private') law</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Table 14.2 depicts a doctrinal practice of public/private characterization on a field called ‘powers of decision’, but terms such as ‘actor’ and ‘action’ might have served as well.

Table 14.2 shows two possible lines of doctrinal consequence from characterization of a power as belonging or not to the state. First, state powers will almost certainly be subjected to control by whatever laws in a system are deemed basic, whereas non-state powers may be shielded from such control. Secondly, doctrines of state or official immunity may shield state powers from some parts of the general civil (‘private’) law—say, of delict. Both kinds of shielding doctrines may be contentious. Below, we will notice how such contention may solidify into wholesale resistance to the very idea of a differentiation, in constitutional-legal discourse, between ‘state’ and ‘non-state’ powers. But of course contention in relation to the shielding doctrines may also work at retail, focusing on where and how to draw the lines dividing one or another field between public and private. Thus, we run into controversies over whether an act of one or another parastatal or ‘hybrid’ organization is to be classed as ‘of the state’ for purposes of subjecting that act to the full, formal control of a constitutional bill of rights, and whether conduct by a private sector organization of an assertedly ‘inherently public’ social operation should call into play basic-law principles whose application is nominally restricted to state deciders.

3. Object Fields: Matters to be Decided

In Table 14.2, above, public/private coding occurs on the field of decision-powers. In Table 14.3, by contrast, coding occurs on the field of matters at issue or at stake in a legal dispute. Table 14.2 looks at choices between public-constitutional and private-ordinary law as decisive for a given case, showing how characterization of a power as state or non-state may bear on such choices. Table 14.3, by contrast, looks at choices within the body of public constitutional law, showing how characterization of a dispute’s bone of contention as predominantly public (social) or private (personal) can affect constitutional-legal conclusions regarding the state's regulatory competence and obligation.
Table 14.3 employs the term ‘matters to be decided’ quite sweepingly. The ‘matter’ might be a line of conduct or activity (say, a person's conduct of her intimate relationships), or it might be control over a space or locale (eg a person's home), or over an item of belonging (eg of personal memorabilia), or information (eg a medical record).

Much familiar constitutional law imposes limits on the permissible objectives of state coercion. Those limits often include a requirement that the state’s objectives meet some threshold test of joint or collective concern to the public at large (thus, a ‘public’ purpose or use), so that an objective’s failure to meet the test precludes its pursuit by coercive state powers of taxation, regulation, or expropriation. As shown in column B of Table 14.3, such a negative ‘ultra vires’ conclusion can find doctrinal expression in terms of failure to meet a test of ‘rational basis’, ‘legality’, or ‘principles of fundamental justice’.

Column C represents a set of doctrines providing a special shield—typically expressed as a demand for an exceptionally urgent justification—against state control of individual and group pursuits classed as ‘core’ components of personal liberty (autonomy, privacy, dignity).

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>matter to be decided classed as</th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>A intensely public (social) concern</td>
<td>B threshold general public concern</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>→ mandatory retention or assumption of control by state authorities</td>
<td>→ permissible exercise of (proportionate) state coercion</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>anti-delegation doctrines</td>
<td>doctrines of ultra vires ('legality'), 'rational basis', 'fundamental justice'</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>‘proportionate’</td>
<td>justification’</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

(p. 303) These doctrines aim not at preventing the state from stepping into matters devoid of public import—that being the business of the column B ultra vires doctrines—but rather at blocking state intrusions into matters deemed intensely personal despite the assumed probity of the state's reasons for intruding. In some systems, doctrinal material gives expression to this difference in motivations by prescribing a categorically stiffer test of justification for laws found to intrude into the core liberties of column C than for those questioned on only the ultra vires grounds of column B. In others systems, the difference may be blurred by a blanket resort to a test of proportional justification for all coercive state measures.

At the opposite end of the spectrum from column C lies column A. Where column C represents a strong constraint against state control, designation of a matter as intensely public or social, hence falling into column A (eg the conduct of public elections, primary and secondary education, street policing), may bring into play a directly contrary constraint on the state's relinquishment of control over that matter to non-state authorities.

Of course, both of these policy-limiting doctrines, like the power-ownership doctrines of Table 14.2, are often politically contentious. Within countries, we can observe shifts over time of controversial matters from one space to another in apparent harness with changing political tides; for example, in the United States, a shift of the matter of domestic violence from presumptively off-limits to government (space C in Table 14.3) to presumptively a mandatory topic of regulation (space A). Across countries, we observe synchronous disagreements over placement—for example, of the matter of early-stage abortion choice: today in Germany, that matter lies in space A, while in Canada it lies at a juncture of spaces B and C.

4. The Question of the 'Reality' of Public/Private
Constitutions and the Public/Private Divide

Our survey confirms what logic suggests: a legal system cannot institute a differentiation between ‘public’ and ‘private’ laws without also supplying some doctrine or doctrines of field-division by which the respective scopes of application of the two types can be ascertained. But must it, then, be one doctrine or may it be several, unified by nothing beyond mere verbiage? Is public/private, after all, a real distinction?

In US constitutional law, we find ‘public/private’ used to classify actors, functions, purposes, concerns, information, uses, spaces and belongings, activities and relationships, ‘forums’, ‘figures’, and more. But since each occurrence, each usage, is specific to some discrete context of dispute, a question remains about a convergence of all of them on a unified, common core of meaning or reference. They might, after all, just be labels of convenience opportunistically plastered on sundry judgments made for sundry reasons on sundry topics. (Suppose we had one law for things ‘high’ and another for things ‘low’, and so we found the judges dividing the fields according to ordinary speech: high price (expensive), high temperature (warm), high voice (treble), high volume (loud), high dudgeon (angry), high purpose (noble), high-minded (pure).)

Our question here is not so much whether there is any common semantic essence that ties together all these usages of public/private, as whether we have any reason for presuming that there is or supposing that there might be. All we have in hand so far is a set of observations suggesting that the legal practice of one or another country can more or less manage with public/private verbiage to delimit, in sundry topical contexts, the fields and modes of application of constitutional law. We do not yet have a reason to suppose any deep, semantic unification of these sundry sorting practices across contexts or across countries.

What type of consideration could supply such a reason? How about detection of a common germ of public/private, ensconced from the start in the very thought of a legal constitution or constitutional law?

II. The ‘Ghost’ Conjecture

1. ‘Dualist’ Constitutionalism

Lying just outside or at the limit of any possible practice of positive legal ordering—so we are advised by highly influential, jurisprudential teachings—there must always be found a society’s convergence on an implicit, unwritten rule for the formation of laws to control the further production of laws. If so, then every possible practice of positive legal ordering may be said to have, in that sense, its constitution. Of course, not every such practice purports to sort its total corpus of express ‘positive’ laws between the two layers of basic and subordinate, ‘constitutional’ and ‘ordinary’. But still many do, no doubt including most of those of chief interest to users of this volume. Let us use the term ‘dualist’ to designates the ones that do.

By our definition, a system will be classed as dualist as long as it sustains any distinct component of relatively fixed, positive ‘higher’ law whose demands other law is required to heed, even if that component is quite narrowly drawn. Imagine, then, that the substantive content of a country’s positive higher law consists of the single mandate that state functionaries shall not engage in intentional acts of race-based discrimination. If that requirement is held controlling on ordinary law and those engaged in making it, the system is dualist. Of course, the system also is dualist if the higher law prohibition on race-based discrimination is written in terms that control private-on-private as well as state-on-private discrimination.

2. Inspirations and Implications of Dualism

Our conjecture posits the fixture in, specifically, dualist constitutional thought of an abstract and formal idea—‘ghost’—of a public/private divide on the field of legal operations. According to a standard view, here very loosely recounted, the dualist differentiation of constitutional from ordinary law takes shape historically in response to political demands for the simultaneous achievement of four effects. These demands compose a conjectural set of ‘proto-liberal’ inspirations (as we may call them) for the rise of dualist constitutionalism when and where it did arise, in Europe in the eighteenth century (although, of course, the proto-liberal antecedents go further back than that). They are: first, a demand for effective imposition, on powers that form and roam in society, of peace- and order-keeping by means of the issuance of positive laws backed by sufficient force (a legally ordered society); which implies, second, for each self-standing territory or population, the concentration in a single institutional
Constitutions and the Public/Private Divide

nexus (the (p. 306) state) of these positive-legislating, order-keeping powers and functions; and so implies also, third, a vesting in that same institutional nexus of the sole, final disposition over deployments of coercive powers (state monopoly of lawful force); and then, finally and recursively, fourth, a demand for subjection of these state-concentrated powers—which themselves now appear as an imposing instance of powers forming and roaming—to positive legal controls: in other words, constitutional government, government under law.

It seems that always and already contained in such a play of political thought is the idea of a body of laws expressly designed for control of the state's exercise of its unique power to make and enforce further laws for the control of society. It seems, moreover, that these ‘constitutional’ laws for the lawmaking state to be under must necessarily be conceived as distinct from those other ‘ordinary’ laws of which the state itself is the uniquely commissioned maker. Already at that point—so runs the developing conjecture—some abstract and formal idea of a categorial divide on the field of legal operations is in play, instinct in the very concept, the very notion, of (dualist) constitutional law. The doctrinal play of public/private is thus conceptually instigated from the start by the most primitive modern (proto-liberal) inspirations of dualist constitutionalism.

No doubt an impulse of contemporary political preference must feed and bolster any such remote conceptual instigation. Who, today, would wish for (let alone easily conceive of) a complete merger of the laws controlling state governors with the laws the governors make? Only those, it seems, who feel totally certain that legal controls on society ought, as a matter of the highest policy, to match exactly, in every substantive respect, the controls imposed on rulership (so that, for example, parents handing out discipline to their children would be directly controlled by standards of procedural justice identical to those imposed on governments regulating society).29 To any who retain the slightest doubt in that regard, a concentration of rulership powers in the state implies that there must be a space of activity left over which is not the exercise of rulership. There must be left over the space of the addressees of these powers—the space of ‘society’, populated by the ruled or the governed.

Thus:

A system where the state enjoys the freedom of private persons would have as little a constitution as a system in which private persons may exercise public power [i.e., the power of rule]. If private persons gain a share in public power, the constitution can no longer fulfill its claim to regulate the establishment and exercise of public power comprehensively unless the private actors submit themselves to constitutional rules whereby they would lose their status as free members of society [i.e., as addressees of the state's exercise of its powers of rule].30

In sum, ‘the concentration of all public power in the hands of the state’ carries as its corollary ‘the privatisation of society’.31

Ruling implies ruled. Government implies society. Concentration of powers of rule in a state nexus specialized to that work means that the addressees of rulership—society—compose a sphere of activity distinct and apart from that of the rulers or government, appropriately subject to a correspondingly different body of normative controls. The ‘ghost’—the ineluctable primitive, maximally abstract notion of a public/private divide in the law—thus (p. 307) appears to be a direct reflex of the division between governing and governed already contained in the very idea of dualist constitutionalism or of its supposed proto-liberal political inspirations.

Can we hazard some prediction about how this ghost might be expected to manifest its presence in the doctrinal part of a dualist-constitutional legal practice? So far, all we have is the idea of a binary coding of laws as meant-for-the-state and meant-for-society. But if we add the anticipation of a doctrinal process of making ascertainable the proper scopes of application of the two types of laws, assuring and delimiting a scope for each of them, then something more must follow. We must expect the emergence of a parallel practice of coding, as actually or properly ‘of the state’ or ‘of society’, of items in at least one, and very possibly more than one, of such object-fields as acts, actors, powers, affairs, functions, and concerns—quite consistently, it seems, with what our survey in Section I discloses.

3. Test Drive: Dualism Modified?

No doubt any constitutional-dualist legal system requires ‘some way’ to delimit the respective fields of application of constitutional and ordinary law.32 But must that way necessarily be the way of public/private?
Consider a modified version of Table 14.1:

A system described in the terms of Table 14.1A would apparently extend the overriding mandates of the basic law to all matters coded ‘religious’, however public or private their venues might be. In precincts of society no less than in precincts of the state—in homes, families, markets, workplaces, clubs, and sanctuaries—any and all affairs deemed ‘religious’ would fall under regulation by applicable basic-law directives. Very possibly—although not necessarily; it would depend on what matters were found to be ‘religious’ in import, which in turn would partly depend on the substantive content and coverage of the basic-law texts in question—those overriding mandates could reach to matters of dress, diet, child-rearing, sex, artistic expression, trade, and so on without limit.

Just as a master partition of all laws between ‘public’ (for-the-state) and ‘private’ (for-society) instigates the rise of doctrine for the division of some object-field or fields between ‘of the state’ and ‘of society’ (Section I.2 above), so will a master partition of all laws between

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Table 14.1A Two Categorizations of Laws</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>by sphere of application</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>by normative depth and force</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>basic law fixed and controlling</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>I. basic law for the religion sphere</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ordinary law variable and controlled</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

(p. 308) ‘religious’ (for-the-religion sphere) and ‘secular’ (for-the-secular sphere) be attended by its own, parallel doctrines of field-division. In a cultural setting where liberal political sensibilities retain some purchase, the results could possibly, in some degree, track those we would expect to find at work in the ‘public/private’ systems depicted by Table 14.1. (So, for example, the question of one's choice of a domestic partner might be coded ‘secular’—and thus placed beyond the reach of basic-religious law—just because that question feels so intensely ‘private’.) But it seems that any such congruence with liberal outcomes would be purely accidental, a contingency of local political preference. ‘Public/private’ coding is not expressly (as it were) built into Table 14.1A as it is into Table 14.1. Where Table 14.1 calls expressly for doctrinal codings of matters as ‘state-or-not’, Table 14.1A calls for codings of matters as ‘religious-or-not’; and it seems the results could cut wildly across any plausible, liberalistic map of public/private divides. A real-world Table 14.1A system could thus be decidedly anti-liberal in character.

Yet such a system would also, apparently, be ‘dualist’ in structure. With its two rows dividing ‘ordinary’ from ‘basic’ law, Table 14.1A appears to posit both a workaday institutionalized process of (‘ordinary’) legislation and the subjection of that process to legal control by a relatively fixed and enduring body of ‘basic’ law. The two rows thus mark Table 14.1A as ‘dualist’ on its face. And yet the sort of system depicted by the table stands apparently far distant from any proto-liberal inspiration. If we may speak in the language of rough-hewn ideal-types, Table 14.1A models a ‘constitutional theocracy’, in contrast with the liberal ‘constitutional democracy’ represented by Table 14.1.

The difference is marked by the labels on the respective tables’ two columns. As we have already noticed, Table 14.1A’s ‘religious/secular’ partition seems essentially non-correlated with Table 14.1’s ‘state/society’ partition. And yet the two tables’ rows are identically labeled. In what would seem to be the key respect of sustaining a differentiation of ‘basic’ from ‘ordinary’ law, Table 14.1A, like Table 14.1, is dualist on its face. The apparent easy imaginability of real-world practices corresponding to Table 14.1A would thus seem to pose a strong challenge to our conjecture of a tight, generative bond between ‘dualist’ constitutionalism and public/private line-drawing in constitutional law.
That impression may fade, however, under closer inspection. The question is whether we will see, already implicit in Table 14.1A’s differentiation of constitutional (‘basic’) from ‘ordinary’ law, a differentiation of ‘law-for-the-state’ from ‘law-for-society’. But that is precisely what we will see, if we follow the conjectural account (Section II.2 above) of the genesis of dualist constitutionalism in a historically emergent, complex political demand for ‘government under law’—the demand for a ‘state’ to legislate for an otherwise intolerably unruly ‘society’ (ordinary law), but to do so under the control of a law (basic) of which the state cannot, then, itself be the maker.

A reading of Table 14.1A through the lens of the ‘ghost’ conjecture thus discloses in the table a third, suppressed axis of differentiation, hiding (as it were) behind the overt differentiation of ‘basic’ from ‘ordinary’ law. The fully unfolded table then will be sixfold, not fourfold, constructed in a three-dimensional space on three orthogonally intersecting axes of differentiation: status of laws (basic/ordinary); topics of laws (religious/secular); and powers targeted by laws (of-the-state/of-society). Public/private doctrinal coding of powers can then be expected to ensue.

It is only (to repeat) through the lens of the conjecture that the third (state/society) dimension turns up in Table 14.1A. But why, it may be asked, must we read through that lens? Are we (p. 309) not free to read the table quite differently, to represent a scheme in which the notion of the ‘religious’ is so expansive, and the basic law’s textual prescriptions are so substantively sweeping, that every possible social and personal question or issue is fully decidable by application of the basic law’s religious directives, and no space is left for ‘private’ ordering?

The answer must be that we are not free to read the table in that way. In such a religiously totalizing scheme, the ‘basic’ law would be, in effect, the only law. But such a system—leaving no space for ‘ordinary’ lawmaking or for a ‘state’ to serve as the maker (thus collapsing the two rows of Tables 14.1 and 14.1A)—would not qualify as ‘dualist’ in the sense intended by the conjecture. The conjecture—of the ‘fixture [of public/private] in [specifically] dualist constitutional thought’ (Section II.2 above)—is meant only for constructions that leave over some space where laws originating from a legally constituted ‘state’ (and not directly and conclusively from the very laws that constitute the state) can take hold and make a difference for ‘society’.

As a matter of historical contingency, it might happen that exactly such a specification would cover most or all of the political formations observable on Earth at a given time. If such were found to be case today, then—according to the conjecture—that observation would go far to explain the seeming ubiquity of doctrinal public/private line-drawing in constitutional law the world over. Not only, then, would we have redeemed the ‘ghost’ conjecture from the challenge posed by the apparent easy imaginability of purely theocratic governance. We would have bolstered and enriched the conjecture, to the point of having it affirmatively suggest that the proto-liberal promptings to dualist constitutionalism might, in some epoch (say, ours), become so very widespread across the globe as to be more or less inescapable. The conjecture would then give us reason to peer hard at any constitutional regimes that might claim or appear to be purely theocratic in character, with the expectation of finding public/private divides cropping up in their constitutional-legal operations.

4. Test Drive: Resilience to Critique?

The conjecture works only as an abstraction. It tells us nothing about which object-fields (actors, function, concerns) will be targeted for line-drawing or about where or how the lines will be drawn. It is strong in confidence but thin in substance. However contentious, uncertain, or confusing the play of public/private may be or become in any country’s politics and laws, that play will carry on—so runs the conjecture—until, if ever, we arrive at the moment of the erasure from that country’s prevailing political sensibility of the proto-liberal impulse for state-centered ordering.

As suggestive evidence, one might cite the history of a long-standing left-theoretical onslaught, and a more recent feminist-theoretical onslaught, against public/private divides in the law of the United States.

(p. 310) The idea of the private has been a bone of left-versus-right contention over generations extending back (at least) to Karl Marx. Still very much alive today is a set of legal-theoretic challenges launched nearly a century ago by writers of the school of American Legal Realism, more recently revived and extended by critical legal and feminist-legal scholarship.

Four moments may be said to mark the Legal Realist-CLS assault on public/private in the law. At a moment of setup
Constitutions and the Public/Private Divide

(as we may call it), writers easily demolish overdrawn portrayals, from the right, of ‘the private’ as a zone of personal self-sufficiency and autonomous self-direction, to be contrasted with the ‘public’ (ie the state) portrayed as a zone of dependency, subjection to external controls, and oppression-in-the-offing. At a moment of relativization, writers suggest an approximate functional equivalence between powers enjoyed by civil society players under private law supporting exclusive property rights and so-called ‘sovereign’ powers supposedly granted solely to the state, and so also to an approximate equivalence between the threats to freedom respectively posed by those private-law-sanctioned powers and by the state’s own direct actions; all of this leading to pointed questions about why constitutional-legal restraints against oppression should not extend fully to acts of corporations and other players in the so-called ‘private’ sector. On top of which come demonstrations—call this the moment of the deduction of the ubiquity of the state—of the state’s plain responsibility for the permissions and empowersments, no less than for the prohibitions and immunities, that its own lawmaking weaves into the overall fabric of the private law, from which an inference is drawn that every case at law falls within the purview of a constitutional bill of rights no matter how strictly ‘vertically’ directed.

These contentions have long been in wide circulation. Not only are they formidable, they enjoy today the assent of many, maybe most defenders of doctrinal public/private divides. An alleged result of their acceptance—and here is the fourth moment of the left/feminist (p. 311) assault on public/private doctrine—is the stereotypification (or call it the hyper-formalization) of public/private. On all sides, confidence is lost in the both the rational determinacy and the material persuasive power of ever more routinized arguments pro and con the classification of this or that actor, power, function, concern, or whatever as public or as private, and so the whole business of classifying comes increasingly to be seen as mere cover for conclusions that can only have been reached on political or ideological grounds.

In the wake of such objections, constitutional-legal doctrines of public/private appear to many to lie more or less in shambles. Yet not only do spirited defenses of these doctrines continue to appear, the doctrines show no sign of receding from their salient position in constitutional law—good news, one might say, for the ghost.

5. The Case of South Africa

The point holds not only for such entrenched market-liberal societies as the United States may be taken to represent, but also for constitutional orders distinctly identifiable as social-democratic or ‘post-liberal’. A telling instance occurs in South Africa, where post-transition constitutional discourse and doctrine convey what is perhaps the dualist constitutional world’s strongest stance of resistance to public/private divides in the law. Regarding South Africa’s dualism there can be no question: the Constitution is declared ‘the supreme law of the Republic’ with which all (other) law must be ‘consistent’ in order to be ‘valid’. No less apparently pronounced, though, is the system’s all-out push—no doubt as influenced in part by the Realist–CLS–feminist critiques of public/private—towards constitutionalization of the entire legal order. The Bill of Rights ‘applies to all law’; the rights the Bill entrenches ‘bind’ non-state actors; and the Bill directs South African courts at all times to construe statutes and develop private law doctrines in harmony with its ‘spirit, purport, and objects’. To top off all the rest, the South African Constitutional Court (SACC) has declared most emphatically that there are not two systems of law, each … operating in its own field with its own highest court. … There is only one system of law. It is shaped by the Constitution which is the supreme law, and all law … is subject to constitutional control.

(p. 312) How, then, do we make sense of these simultaneous declarations of the Constitution’s supreme-law status and of the unity of South African law? Over what law, then, is the Constitution’s law supreme? Plainly, it is supreme over bodies of state-made ordinary law that cannot, then, themselves be constitutional law, and the system is in that sense ‘dual’ in structure. But the system also is detectably dualist in our further sense (Section II.2 above) of the persistence within it of a proto-liberal impulse to resist—to resist as a matter of value and of policy—a full merger in substance of the laws controlling governors with the laws controlling society.

No doubt, current South African jurisprudence is marked by its unrelenting demand for harmonization of the country’s ordinary, private law with constitutional value-orderings. No doubt that demand covers, along with ordinary statute law, South Africa’s extensive and frequently decisive body of common law. And yet—so says the SACC—common law development is to be guided by the common law’s ‘own paradigm’. How so? Because often, when the pre-constitutional common law's treatment of a problem is found to stand in need of some adaptation to the Constitution's value-orderings, a trained common lawyer will be able to perceive the possibility of several different doctrinal entry points for making the needed adjustment, any one of which might satisfy the Constitution and so preserve the unity (in that sense) of the entire law of South Africa. In such cases, the Constitution's law—as some might say—runs out before all the available, ordinary legal-doctrinal options are resolved. And the choice, then, among constitutionally satisfactory ordinary-legal resolutions, can still be shaped by considerations having to do with which choice would be most ‘beneficial for the common law’ when regarded as an identifiable, bounded component of South African law, organized internally by its own logic or ‘paradigm’. The SACC visibly and pointedly implements this view through discretionary exercise of its powers of docket control—typically, by refusing leave for direct access, or for direct appeal from trial-level decisions, before litigants have exhausted their ordinary-legal claims and contentions before the ordinary appellate judiciary.

Thus does the ‘ghost’—the proto-liberal impulse toward a division of public from private law—continue to haunt South Africa's decidedly post-liberal mind.

Views and practices in Germany, South Africa's predecessor and rival as a world leader towards horizontalism, appear to be quite similar.

III. Comparison Functional and Taxonomic

1. Left–Right Scalar Cross-Country Comparison and the ‘Relative Autonomy of Law’

The ‘ghost’ conjecture predicts an appearance of some sort of doctrinal public/private divide in every dualist constitutional legal practice. The prediction, however, is highly abstract and approximate. To say that at least one of the object-fields (from among actors, functions, and so on) must undergo ‘state’/‘society’ sorting is to leave open everything else about where or how the lines will be drawn. This open-endedness in the conjecture suggests a possible mode of comparative study of the play of public/private in constitutional law.

We might make it a scalar study. Rather than a collection of dichotomous categorial partitions of various object-fields, we could take public/private to signify an ideological continuum along which various countries’ summative locations can be plotted. For example, taking our cue from Section II.3 above, we could set up a scale running from a total privatization to a total ‘public-ization’ of religion. Section II.4 suggests a different possibility. Our scale could run from ‘left’ to ‘right’, from red to blue, from relatively collectivist-leaning to relatively individualist-leaning. Each country could be assigned a summative score or location along such a substantive-ideological, red-to-blue axis, but with the score compiled strictly and only from observations of about where and how that country's legal doctrines do and do not draw public/private lines across various object-fields.

Comparisons of this kind appear to be workable. If, for example, we look at the relevant deployments of public/private on the doctrinal levels of current South African and US constitutional-legal practice, we will find South Africa lying consistently to the red (‘post-liberal’) side of the United States. In South Africa but decidedly not in the United States:

- the Constitution obligates the state to protect persons against private violence;
- group-vilifying private speech is a virtually mandatory public concern, for which state regulatory controls are not only permitted but invited;
- the Constitution requires a continuing audit of the entire corpus of private law—extending, for example, to such matters as fair dealing and ‘conscionability’ in private-market contracting—for compatibility with the ‘spirit, purport, and objects’ of the guarantees in the bill of rights;
- the Constitution expressly permits compulsory taking of land by the state for the sole purpose of equitably redistributing this resource;
- the Constitution expressly provides protection for labor-union activity in private markets;
- the Constitution obligates the state to exert maximum feasible effort toward fulfillment of everyone's basic material needs, by off-market means insofar as necessary.
and so on, nor do there appear to be any counter instances. South Africa plainly lies more toward the red pole of the spectrum, the United States more toward the blue. We thus see how comparative arrays of cross-country (or cross-temporal) variations in legal doctrine might figure in larger historical, political, and cultural studies.

But then how would these qualify as studies in law, as distinct from studies in society (history, politics, culture) that merely happen to use legal-doctrinal data-points as social indicators? Of what interest might such studies be to specifically legal-theoretic knowledge? In what way do we think a national society’s specifically legal thought and discourse—as distinct from the rest of its political-cultural milieu—might affect its location on a political-cultural scale running from red to blue? To put the question in another form: How, if at all, might our plottings of these locations tie into the thesis of law’s ‘relative autonomy’ vis-à-vis society—the thesis (put very crudely) of an alternating exchange of cause and effect between a distinguishably legal domain of thought and practice and other social domains such as politics and culture. And what is there, then (if anything), within specifically legal thought and discourse, that could affect a country’s summative location on a political-cultural scale running from red to blue?

To questions of that sort, our ‘ghost’ conjecture stands poised, in a way, with a response. It says that the red-to-blue location of a country’s constitutional-legal practice is not necessarily or solely a matter of being at one point or another along the scale; it is, at least as interestingly, a matter of being on (and not off) the scale. In the view of the conjecture, the point to see is that both US and South African constitutionalism are very evidently on the scale, market-liberal though the one society's self-understanding may be and post-liberal the other's. The universality (such as it may be) of public/private lies not in any putative sameness of each country's relatively left or relatively right position on the scale, but rather in the fact that a very great many countries do, in fact and not accidentally, share the two characteristics that they sustain constitutional-dualist legal structures and they occupy a location somewhere along the scale of legal-doctrinal deployments of public/private—which is to say, their deployments of public/private are not nil.

Is the lesson, then, that not only must a body of constitutional law be found in every law-governed society (Section II.1 above), but that every body of constitutional law must occupy a location along a left-right scale of public/private line-drawing on various object fields? No law without a state, no state without constitutional law, no constitutional law without a location along the scale?

Our conjecture does not go so far. It says nothing against the possibility of a constitutional construction devoid of a lawmaking state, or against the idea that practices of law can still take shape within such radically anti-statist constructions. The conjecture rather would point out that such a state-denying construction could not ever be ‘dualist’, in the stipulated sense of sustaining a distinct body of law specially aimed at a state making laws for society. Allowing for the possibilities of anti-statist constitutional constructions, and of law-without-a-state, thus leaves untouched the conjecture of strong attractive forces binding dualist constitutionalism at one end to proto-liberal political impulses and, at the other end, to bodies of legal doctrine marked by public/private divides. We have not yet run into or thought of a case in which one of those three moments—proto-liberalism, dualist constitutionalism, public/private coding on some legal-doctrinal object-field—is plainly parted from the other two.

2. From ‘Functional’ to ‘Taxonomic’ Comparison: British Constitutionalism

Our putative left-right scalar comparison is of a type known to the trade as ‘functional’ or ‘functionalist’. From a functional-comparative angle, we look for a conjectural common aim (p. 315) or compulsion to which the constitutional-legal practices of variously circumstanced countries might all be responding by their differing combinations of institutional and doctrinal devices. The ‘ghost’ conjecture takes up a certain subset of device-variations, composed of doctrinal public/private and kindred divides as variously drawn in various systems in various ways on various object-fields. These may all, says the conjecture, be understood as outcomes of pressures to accommodate a persistent set of proto-liberal impulses, inscribed in legal-systemic dualist practice, to otherwise widely variant historical, material, cultural, and other societal circumstances.

Functional comparison of the doctrinal play of public/private thus would operate within the set of identifiably dualist legal systems. ‘Taxonomic’ comparison, by contrast, would operate across the boundary separating such systems from whatever other type or types we care to posit. Given a conjecture that the pull toward public/private coding is an accompaniment, specifically, of dualist constitutional thought and practice, we can look to see whether ostensibly non-dualist systems are, as we might predict, comparatively free of public/private fixations. If, perchance, we find to the contrary, we can ask whether that ostensibly non-dualist system might perhaps turn out, on a closer look, to be dualist (as it were) malgré elle.
Constitutions and the Public/Private Divide

In that spirit, having taken our glance at the impulse of South African constitutionalism to be simultaneously legal-dualist and legal-unitarian (Section II.5 above), we now take up the case of the United Kingdom with its proud tradition of legal dualism and common law constitutionalism, marked by historic resistance to continentalist differentiations of ‘public’ from ‘private’ law.65 (We mean, of course, vintage Britain, Britain prior to the adoption, under pressure of treaty obligation, of a separated, basic-law layer in the form of the Human Rights Act 1998.66) The British case poses an important test for us, because Britain’s modern history of political ideas has proto-liberal roots as sure and deep as any country’s, and ‘public/private’ talk is—as we confirm just below—easily detectible in the doctrinal discourse of British common law constitutional practice. Where does Britain fit, taxonomically, in the view of the conjecture? Dualist or not?

On the vintage account, Britain is constitutional-unitarian, not dualist. On the one hand, all persons equally are bound by the common law. On the other hand, state officials are simply persons who happen, for a time, to be ‘employed in the service of the state’. And so, correspondingly, ‘the general principles of the constitution’ are nothing but ‘the result of ... decisions determining the [common law] rights of private persons in particular cases brought before the courts.’67 The results can be quite jarring to liberal-constitutional sensibilities—as when, for example, the common law libertarian principle that all conduct not prohibited by a person by law is permitted to him (in the absence of any applicable Act of Parliament) to defeat any possibility of a claim against the legal permissibility of telephone tapping by, or by the order of, the Home Secretary.68

(p. 316) Regarding such judgments, Professor Allison remarks that ‘without a clear conception of the state administration, [jurists have] had no clear reason to distinguish the legal consequences of administrative disputes from those of private disputes.’69 But the picture is not and cannot be so simple. It turns out that those ‘rights of private persons’ can be—and on the view of our conjecture they predictably will be—flexed this way or that depending on whether, indeed, the relevant persons are private; or, in other words, on whether one or another party to the case should happen (or not) to be acting as a part of the state service. Thus, we see cases such as Air Canada v Secretary of State for Trade,70 where the judges construe a common law ‘public interest/administration of justice’ rule for document discovery by litigants to allow special consideration to a Secretary of State’s plea for confidentiality of ministerial deliberations; or such as Attorney-General v Jonathan Cape Ltd,71 where the judges develop common law protections against ‘breach of confidence’ in a special way for application to disclosures of Cabinet proceedings in the memoirs of a former minister. Evidently, Britain has not been immune to the dualist pull to produce a body of law that is specialized to the control of state-concentrated, ultimate powers of rule—which is where, after all, on the view of the conjecture, constitutional-legal dualism begins. And then the advent of the Human Rights Act, we might say, moves the story along the conjectural track.

Bibliography

Bibliography

Morris R. Cohen, ‘Property and Sovereignty’ (1927) 13 Cornell Law Quarterly 8

Albert Venn Dicey, Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution (10th edn, 1959)

Constitutions and the Public/Private Divide

Robert L. Hale, ‘Coercion and Distribution in a Supposedly Non-Coercive State’ (1923) 38 Political Science Quarterly 470

Rand Hirschl, Constitutional Theocracy (2011)

Karl Marx, ‘On the Jewish Question’ in David McLellan (ed), Karl Marx: Selected Writings (1977), 39ff

‘Symposium on the State Action Doctrine’ (1993) 10 Constitutional Commentary 309–442

Notes:

(2) I note here, and reserve for brief discussion later, the possibility that prevailing ideas in some countries would reject the Table 14.1 schema more or less in its entirety. See Section III.2 below.

(3) In the United States, eg, extension of the Constitution’s prohibition of slavery (US Constitution, Amendment 13) to legally optional private sector relationships registers as an exception from a general rule that only ‘state’ actors and actions are subject to control by constitutional requirements and prohibitions. See eg Jones v Alfred H Mayer Co 392 US 409, 438–9 (1968); Civil Rights Cases 109 US 3, 20–1 (1883).

(4) See eg South African Constitution, s 8(2) (providing for the binding effect of bill-of-rights guarantees on ‘natural persons’ to the extent appropriate in view of ‘the nature of the right and ... any duty imposed by the right’).

Constitutions and the Public/Private Divide

(6) See generally the papers collected in András Sajó and Renata Uitz (eds), The Constitution in Private Relations (2005).

(10) See Section II.4 below.

(11) For engagement in such controversies, including exemplary case decisions, see eg Daphne Barak-Erez, ‘Civil Rights in the Privatized State: A Comparative View’ (1999) 28 Anglo-American Law Review 503, 506–7 (approving preservation of public/private in constitutional law while calling for a ‘functional’ not ‘formal’ approach to drawing the lines); David A. Strauss, ‘State Action After the Civil Rights Era’ (1993) 10 Constitutional Commentary 409ff (proposing a relaxed application of constitutional guarantees to subdivisional state institutions, such as universities and municipalities, that operate in fields open to competition).

(12) See Chapter 46.

(13) See Chapter 46.

(14) See Chapters 33 and 34, and Chapter 44.

(15) See eg R v Malmo-Levine; R v Caine [2003] 3 SCR 571 (Canada) paras 90, 96–9, 131, 135 (construing the phrase ‘principles of fundamental justice’ as used in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s 7).

(17) See Chapters 33 and 34, and Chapter 44.

(18) See eg Beit Sourik Village Council v Government of Israel, HCJ 2056/04, paras 57–62 (Israel, 2004) (finding lack of proportionate justification for location of one stretch of Israel’s ‘separation fence’ in the occupied territories, in view of grave disruptive effects on the lives and livelihoods of inhabitants, but without doubting either the probity of the state’s objectives or the substantial serviceability to those objectives of the state’s chosen path for the fence).

We should note a further ramification of the impulse to shield core personal freedoms from collective control. Regard for private freedom of choice appears to be a chief ground of reluctance to extend bill-of-rights controls ‘horizontally’ to cover acts and relations of ordinary citizens. To that concern, a standard rejoinder is an assurance that doctrines allowing for justification for prima facie bill-of-rights infringements (as by proportionality review) will dependably save most private actions from ultimate constitutional-legal liability. See eg Paul A. Brest, ‘State Action and Liberal Theory: A Casenote on Flagg Brothers v Brooks’ (1982) 130 University of Pennsylvania Law Review 1296, 1323–34.

Constitutional law provides a congeries of public/private-coded doctrines in response to the same basic impulse.
These include the ‘essential state function’ branch of ‘state action’ doctrine, doctrines of direct and indirect horizontal application of bill-of-rights guarantees, doctrines imposing a ‘protective function’ on the state, and, arguably, the inclusion in constitutional law of positive socio-economic guarantees. For consideration of the distinctions and connections among these doctrinal types, see Freeman, above; Gardbaum (n 8); Dieter Grimm, ‘The Protective Function of the State’ in Georg Nolte (ed), European and US Constitutionalism (2005), 137ff; Mark Tushnet, ‘State Action, Social Welfare Rights, and the Judicial Role: Some Comparative Observations’ (2002) 3 Chicago Journal of International Law 435ff; Richard S. Kay, ‘The State Action Doctrine, The Public–Private Distinction, and the Independence of Constitutional Law’ (1993) 10 Constitutional Commentary 329, 330–2. For the purposes of this chapter, it suffices to note the functional overlaps among these doctrinal strategies for ensuring the effectuation of constitutional or ‘public’ values in the law.

Constitutional controls on outsourcing may also draw on separation-of-powers ideas concerning reservation of powers designated ‘legislative’ or ‘executive’ to appropriate branches of government. See eg Catherine M. Donnelly, Delegation of Governmental Power to Private Parties: A Comparative Perspective (2007), 117–63 (examining such doctrines in the United States, the European Union. and the United Kingdom).

(22) Thus, classification of ‘forums’ and ‘figures’ as public or private occurs in US doctrine on constitutional protection of freedom of expression. See eg Laurence H. Tribe, American Constitutional Law (2nd edn, 1988), 873–86 (figures), 986–1009 (forums).

(23) See Section II.2 below.

(26) For a classic expression of an opposite ‘one law’ conception, see Albert Venn Dicey, Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution (10th edn, 1959); Section III.2 below.

(27) What I am calling ‘dualist’ has been called ‘almost definitional’ for constitutional-legal regimes, see Kay (n 19), 338. See, however, for other significations of ‘constitutional’ as applied to law and legal systems, Chapters 8 and 9. My use here of the term ‘dualist’ chimes with Bruce Ackerman's use of ‘dualist democracy’ to mark out systems that provide for two distinct ‘tracks’ of lawmaking: a ‘higher track’ for constitutive lawmaking by the people and another, ‘lower track’ for subordinate lawmaking by the people's constituted government. See Bruce Ackerman, ‘Constitutional Law, Constitutional Politics’ (1989) 99 Yale Law Journal 453, 461–2.

(28) I have drawn this account, and the resultant conjecture, from writings of Dieter Grimm, but my crude renditions must not be blamed on him. See Dieter Grimm, ‘The Constitution in the Process of Denationalization’ (2005) 12 Constellations 447ff; Dieter Grimm, ‘The Achievement of Constitutionalism and its Prospects in a Changed World’ in Petra Dobner and Martin Laughlin (eds), The Twilight of Constitutionalism? (2010), 3ff. Kay (n 19) develops in a similar way the inescapability of a public/private divide in dualist constitutional law. Kay does not trace this inescapability to the conjectural proto-liberal inspirations for dualist constitutionalism as I do here, following Grimm; he places more weight on a felt need to limit the reach of constitutional law in order to avoid a total juridification of politics. See ibid 324, 339–41.

Constitutions and the Public/Private Divide

(‘In Hell, there will be nothing but law, and due process will be meticulously observed’).

(30) Grimm, ‘Achievement of Constitutionalism’ (n 28), 12.

(31) Ibid.

(32) Kay (n 19), 342.

(34) See ibid 26–40 for real-world illustration of a range of approximations.

(35) It would be, in Hirschl’s terms, a ‘pure’ and not a ‘constitutional’ theocracy. See ibid 7.

(36) The conjecture thus evades a possible objection that there is and can be no de-politicized space because there is no space from which relations and depredations of power are absent, and this truth holds regardless of the monistic or dualist structure of a legal system. See Catherine A. Mackinnon, Toward a Feminist Theory of the State (1989), 160–2. The proposition under examination here is not that of a morally sustainable divide between the ‘political’ and the (non-political) ‘personal’. It is that of a divide between that which is ‘state’ (public) and that which is ‘society’ (private) with respect to certain issues of choice of law in a dualistically structured legal system. Repudiation of the political/personal divide says a lot about how and how not (morally) to draw the state/society line. It does not rebut the necessity of somehow drawing the lines, wherever legal-systemic dualism prevails.

(37) See Karl Marx, ‘On the Jewish Question’ in David McLellan (ed), Karl Marx: Selected Writings (1977), 39ff.

(38) For leading examples of the Critical Legal Studies (CLS) contribution, along with rebuttals, see the essays collected in ‘Symposium: The Public-Private Distinction’ (1982) 130 University of Pennsylvania Law Review 1289ff.

Important feminist-theoretic writing distinguishes the public/private divide with which this chapter is centrally concerned—ie, the grand divide between the spaces of the state and of society and the laws respectively applicable to them—and another construction, mainly internal to ‘private’ law, by which a relatively ‘public’ space of the market is divided from a relatively ‘private’ space of the family. See Olsen (n 29), 1501–2 and passim (also showing complex and powerful interactions between the two ‘dichotomies’). Accordingly, we find within feminist-theoretic writing both a strain addressed to the family/market divide (decrying, eg, its relation to ideas of woman’s separate sphere, see eg Olsen (n 16), 322–3), and a strain addressed to the state/society divide, largely coincident with the ‘left’ critique of the private summarized here.

(40) See eg Robert L. Hale, ‘Coercion and Distribution in a Supposedly Non-Coercive State’ (1923) 38 Political Science Quarterly 470ff.

(42) See Johan van der Walt, ‘Progressive Indirect Horizontal Application of the Bill of Rights: Towards a Cooperative Relation between Common-law and Constitutional Jurisprudence’ (2001) 17 South African Journal of Human Rights 341ff (‘the most consistent position to take would be that one can never take the ... involvement of the state out of ... private legal relations, be these relations founded on statutory private law or common-law private law?’).

Such claims are subjected to strong and sometimes quite subtle contestation. See eg Frank I. Goodman, ‘Professor Brest on State Action and Liberal Theory, and a Postscript to Professor Stone’ (1982) 130 University of Pennsylvania Law Review 1331ff.

(43) See eg Alexander (n 7), 361–8; Kay (n 19), 334–7.

(44) Duncan Kennedy, ‘The Stages of the Decline of the Public/Private Distinction’ (1982) 130 University of Constitutions and the Public/Private Divide

Pennsylvania Law Review 1349ff; see Olsen (n 16), 324–5; Olsen (n 29), 1508–13.

(46) See eg the German Basic Law, Art 28(1) (‘The constitutional order in the Länder must conform to the principles of a republican, democratic and social state governed by the rule of law, within the meaning of this Basic Law’).

(48) South African Constitution, s 2.

(50) South African Constitution, ss 8(1), 8(2), 39(2); see Carmichele v Minister of Public Safety [2001] ZACC 22; 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), paras 33–9.

(51) Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of South Africa: In re Ex Parte President of the Republic [2000] ZACC 1; 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), para 44. The SACC was responding, in part, to a jurisdictional turf-battle with South Africa’s ordinary judiciary, but its declaration was plainly meant to convey a deeper message about the unity of South African law under the Constitution. See Frank I. Michelman, ‘The Rule of Law, Legality, and the Supremacy of the Constitution’ in Stuart Woolman, Theunis Roux and Michael Bishop (eds), Constitutional Law of South Africa (2008), vol i, ch 11 at 16–23, 36–8 (chapters separately paginated).

(52) Carmichele (n 48), paras 55–6.

(53) See Michelman (n 51), 6 n 2.

(54) See Michelman (n 1).

(56) As an example of such a study (only making the continuum a loop instead of a bipolar axis, in order to show how extremes of both privatization and publicization (or ‘state-ification’) of religion can impair religious freedom) see W. Cole Durham, ‘Perspectives on Religious Liberty’ in Johan D. van der Vyver and John Witte, Jr (eds), Religious Human Rights in Global Perspective (1996).

(57) Compare the South African Constitution, ss 7(2), 12(1)(c) and Carmichele (n 50) with DeShaney v Winnebago County 489 US 189 (1989).

(58) Compare the South African Constitution, s 16(2)(c) with RAV v St Paul 505 US 377 (1992).

(61) See ibid s 23.

(62) Compare ibid ss 25(5), 26, 27, 28 with DeShaney (n 57).

Constitutions and the Public/Private Divide

1225ff.

(67) Dicey (n 26), 193, 195.

(68) See Malone v Metropolitan Police Commissioner [1979] Ch 344. This case example and two more to follow are taken from Allison (n 65), 79–80.

(69) Allison (n 65), 80.

(70) [1983] 2 AC 394.

(71) [1976] QB 752.

Frank I. Michelman
Frank I. Michelman is Robert Walmsley University Professor, Harvard University that law that excludes openly gay people from military service is objectionably non-neutral. Suppose now that, as a response to the demand of neutrality towards the sexual orientation of servicemen, the ban is repealed. Very likely, the proportion between straight and gay servicemen will

Abstract and Keywords
This article attempts to spell out the main tenets of the principle of state neutrality and to explain how they hang together. It examines the central objections, and explores revisions that may enhance the theory's defensibility. Specifically, it discusses neutrality as non-discrimination, neutrality as shared reasons, objections to liberal neutrality, and religious neutrality.

Keywords: theory of neutrality, state neutrality, non-discrimination, liberal neutrality, religious neutrality

I. Preliminaries
State neutrality is a distinctly political principle. Personal morality does not require its subjects (human individuals) to be neutral in the way political morality requires its subject to do (the state acting through public officials). It does not prohibit, for instance, our assisting others in carrying out their projects which we deem admirable while, at the same time, denying assistance to projects we do not value.

Neutrality is a relational attribute. Acts cannot be neutral simpliciter. When an act is neutral, it is neutral between different things, say, between X and Y. X and Y cannot stand for just anything. A principle requiring state acts to be neutral towards everything would be self-defeating. First, it would itself be a member of the class of things with regard to which states are required to be neutral. In order to satisfy PSN, a state would have to remain neutral between the claim that it is required to satisfy PSN and the opposite claim that it is not so required. That is incoherent.

Furthermore, neutrality is not the only principle that states must satisfy. Satisfying PSN must be consistent with satisfying the other principles. Therefore, PSN cannot apply to the latter. It cannot hold, for instance, that states ought to be neutral between the requirement of treating citizens as equals and the denial of this requirement.

Does PSN apply to everything else? That would not affect its consistency. But it would make it overbread. PSN should be understood as a principle identifying specific types of non-neutrality as objectionable. The question is, then, under what conditions is non-neutrality morally objectionable.

A further question is related to the aspects of the relevant public acts on which PSN focuses. It may focus on the outcomes of state action or on its underlying reasons. An act is outcome-neutral between X and Y if it leaves the relative positions of X and Y unaffected. An act is reason-neutral between X and Y if the reasons for taking it rely on no evaluative ranking of X and Y. Outcome-neutrality is an implausible requirement. Many believe that a law that excludes openly gay people from military service is objectionally non-neutral. Suppose now that, as a response to the demand of neutrality towards the sexual orientation of servicemen, the ban is repealed. Very likely, the proportion between straight and gay servicemen will change as a consequence, so the legislative change would violate outcome-neutrality. This would count, however, in favor of the amendment, rather than against it.

An act can be required to be reason-neutral in two interesting ways: the requirement may apply to the reason actually proposed by the agent or to the best reason that could be provided for it under certain idealized conditions. We can speak, in the first case, about neutrality of intent, while in the second, about justificatory neutrality. Neutrality of intent means that a policy benefiting A more than B is not in fact justified by a judgment of comparative value about the basic beliefs or lifestyles of A and B. Justificatory neutrality means that a policy distributing advantages between A and B unequally could be provided with a plausible (p. 320) justification that does not rely on a judgment of comparative value about the basic beliefs or lifestyles of A and B.

The actual aim of particular legislators is often difficult to reconstruct, and there may be no unique way to combine the individual aims into a collective aim of the legislature. More importantly, the intent's failure to satisfy PSN need not compromise a law which lends itself to a plausible neutral justification. So the advocates of PSN tend to settle on justificatory neutrality. 4

Sometimes, however, the actual intent matters on its own account. It matters, for example, when it is made explicit by the wording of the preamble to a law. In such cases, the intent may compromise the law even if its regulatory content could be given a non-objectication justifications. One way of dealing with such cases is for a court empowered to subject it to constitutional review not to strike down the law but to instruct the lower courts to disregard its preamble.

Finally, we should say something about the theoretical status of PSN. Some authors take PSN to be a foundational principle. According to Bruce Ackerman, for instance, the principles of justice result from conversations among citizens. 5 For the process of conversation to yield determinate and morally acceptable outcomes it must be constrained in a certain way: the permissible arguments must satisfy the condition of neutrality. 6 It is, thus, a fundamental commitment to neutrality that binds legitimate states to adopt a particular conception of equality, toleration, and individual rights. Ronald Dworkin, on the other hand, insists that neutrality properly understood is a derivative principle; it relies on the deeper principle that states should treat their citizens as equals. 7

The foundationalist view is unappealing: it raises the suspicion that neutrality is based on ethical skepticism, that it is a principle for people with no convictions. And it deprives PSN of the conceptual tools for distinguishing between values towards which a state is permitted or even required to be non-neutral and those with which it is required to deal in a neutral manner.

This chapter will take it for granted that PSN is a derivative principle. It will assume that the main principle underlying PSN is the one according to which states should express equal concern and respect for each citizen both in the way they treat them and in the way they speak to them and about them. It will accept, furthermore, as a main factual assumption, that citizens of modern democracies are divided by deep, pervasive, and protracted disagreements. The disagreements are deep in the sense that they involve around basic—religious, metaphysical, epistemological, ethical—beliefs and around general ideas on how to live well. Liberal neutrality as developed in the 1970s and 1980s argues from these main premises for a two-pronged PSN. First, state acts that discriminate between citizens on the ground of (controversial) value judgments regarding their ‘conceptions of the good’ are objectionably non-neutral. Second, a state act is objectionably non-neutral if its actual or possible justification appeals to reasons that some citizens cannot be expected to share.

(p. 321) Sections II and III discuss these two requirements. Section IV present the main objections leveled at liberal neutrality. Sections V and VI offers a revision of PSN in light of those objections. Section VII addresses the specific issue of religious neutrality.

II. Neutrality as Non-Discrimination

Advocates of liberal neutrality often identify the paradigm of objectionably non-neutral state action with the coercive imposition of valuable ways of life or coercive prevention of the pursuit of lifestyles that are worthless. But when they explain why trying to make people’s lives better by coercive means is morally impermissible, they often appeal to a principle other than neutrality. Coercion is not a proper way to improve peoples’ lives, Ronald Dworkin argues, because ‘someone’s life cannot be improved against his steady conviction that it has not been.’ 8 What this argument objects to is forcing people to lead their lives in ways they do not endorse, and this is precisely what we understand by paternalism. At least on one occasion, though, Dworkin proposes a different account of PSN:

People have the right not to suffer disadvantage in the distribution of social goods and opportunities, including disadvantage in the liberties permitted to them by the criminal law, just on the ground that their officials or fellow-citizens think that their opinions about the right way for them to lead their lives are ignoble or wrong. 9

What makes a state act objectionably non-neutral, on this account, is that it disadvantages people only on the ground of a judgment about their ways of life. The disadvantage may, but need not, be inflicted by way of coercively restricting the options open to those people. So understood, the neutrality principle requires states not to favor or disfavor anyone on the ground of an official judgment about their conception of the good life.

This is a principle of non-discrimination, a principle outlawing discriminations of a special kind. In contrast, consider racial discrimination. Race is not a proper object of evaluative assessment. So when people are advantaged or disadvantaged by virtue of belonging to a social group constructed on the basis of real or alleged racial characteristics, the discrimination is either arbitrary, having no reason at all, or it is prejudice-based, having for its reason false value attributions. Advantaging or disadvantaging someone on the basis of her religious outlook, for instance, is different. A person’s religious outlook submits to value judgments. Of course, those judgments may be prejudiced. But they need not be. PSN does not presuppose that the official judgment is prejudiced or that it is mistaken in some innocent way. Even if the disadvantaged person’s conception of the good life is in fact worthless, disadvantaging him on the basis of a controversial official judgment is morally objectionable. What is wrong with it?

Let us see first what is wrong with paternalist state action. Paternalism is wrong because and when it usurps an individual’s responsibility and right to be the one who decides what to make of her life. The wrong of non-neutral state action, as defined in the previous paragraph, is also related in some way to denying this right and responsibility, although in a more complicated manner. When everyone is allowed to lead their lives in their own light, the cost, for each individual, of reaching his aims is fixed as a function of the choices of others. My supreme goal may be that of erecting a huge temple in honor of my god. The more people are dedicated to the same goal, the less costly it will be for me to achieve it, and vice versa. If my religious (p. 322) community shrinks below a critical level, the costs become prohibitive. In general: as long as people are free to choose their lifestyles, plans, and projects, the costs of an individual’s preferred pursuits vary with the choices of others. Suppose that the distribution of resources against which I and the other members of my society form our preferences is deeply unjust. Or suppose the formation of preferences is subject to coercion or manipulation.
Then morality disapproves of the structure of preferences in my society and the resulting structure of the costs, for different individuals, of reaching their personal aims. Other things being equal, state intervention aiming to rectify the distribution of resources or to eliminate manipulation and coercion is, therefore, morally permissible. But state intervention aiming to encourage the pursuit of valuable projects or to discourage the pursuit of projects of low or negative value is morally tainted. It makes the structure of the costs of personal pursuits depart from what it would be if it were determined by autonomous choices adopted under the circumstances of justice. Suppose the government decides to co-fund the temple-building project on the ground that honoring that god is of utmost importance. In so doing, it lowers the cost of building the temple for those committed to this aim by making it no longer a deterrent to those who are not so motivated to contribute as taxpayers. It either violates the requirement of treating individuals with appropriate respect for their right and responsibility to lead their lives in light of their own best judgment or it violates the requirement of treating individuals with equal concern for their flourishing, or both.

The scope of PSN is both wider and narrower than that of the anti-paternalist principle (APP). It is wider, since it applies to state acts that disadvantage certain individuals without coercively restricting their options. It is narrower since it is restricted to political communities as they act through their state, while the APP is a principle of both personal and political morality. As Dworkin puts it, ‘no one can improve another’s life by forcing him to behave differently, against his will and his conviction.’ But we can improve, as private individuals, the lives of others by contributing to their projects, without being embarrassed by the possibility that assisting projects we deem admirable while not assisting projects in which we take no interest may affect, at least to some small degree, the relative costs of different pursuits.

III. Neutrality as Shared Reasons

The debate on liberal neutrality has been framed by John Rawls’ seminal works, A Theory of Justice (TJ) and Political Liberalism (PL), even though the term itself does not appear at all in TJ, and crops up only occasionally in PL. TJ argues for neutrality as non-discrimination. ‘[T]he principles of justice cover all persons with rational plans of life, whatever their content’, it insists.11 They regulate the distribution of the all-purpose ‘social primary goods’, leaving it to the individuals to form, revise, and pursue their particular life-plans, within the limits of their just share in those goods. ‘Systems of ends are not ranked in value’ by the principles of justice,12 nor do these principles reflect any bias in favor of particular plans of life or conceptions of the good.13 Hence PSN, as discussed in Section II, should not disadvantage anyone merely on the ground of a (controversial) value judgment about their conception of the good life. So understood, PSN requires states to be neutral among (controversial) conceptions of the good.

(p. 323) PL adds two important considerations to this. First, it distinguishes controversies dividing reasonable persons—persons seeking fair terms for their cooperation, conscious of their own fallibility, and taking seriously the arguments of the other side—from controversies where at least one of the parties is not reasonable in this sense, and it restricts the scope of neutrality as non-discrimination to conceptions of the good subject to reasonable disagreement. It also provides an open-ended list of the sources of ‘reasonable disagreement’ (it calls these the burdens of judgment): the evidence bearing on controversial cases is hard to evaluate; even if one agrees on the relevant considerations, one tends to disagree about their weight; our concepts in general and especially our moral concepts are vague and they are subject to hard cases, and so on.14 Secondly, PL insists that justifying a state act by an appeal to reasons that are controversial among reasonable people is morally objectionable whether or not the act in question results in an unequal distribution of advantages. This is so because such justifications violate what we could call the liberal legitimacy principle (LJP). LJP holds that no one may be subjected to a political organization’s coercive power without providing him with a justification that that organization has a right to monopolize such power. For a state to have legitimate monopoly of coercive power, it is not sufficient that it in fact has the right to monopolize coercive power. In other words, it is not sufficient that its claim to have such a right is true. It is also necessary that its claim can be justified to all its subjects, severally. The assumption of a pervasive fact of ‘reasonable disagreement’ poses a difficulty for LJP. Justifying the claim of legitimate monopoly of power to someone presupposes that the justification is provided in terms of reasons that they can be expected to share.15 But if the reasons figuring in the justification are subject to intractable disagreement among reasonable persons, then they cannot be expected to be shared by everyone.

In order to resolve this difficulty, PL proposes to distinguish ‘political conceptions’ from ‘comprehensive doctrines’. A doctrine is more or less comprehensive if it entails normative and factual assumptions regarding non-political matters: assumptions belonging to the domain of metaphysics, epistemology, personal morality, ethics, and so on. A conception is narrowly political if it has for its subject the basic structure of society —roughly speaking, its coercive institutions.16 Comprehensive doctrines tend to be subject to reasonable disagreement. The narrowly political reasons can be expected, however, to be beyond reasonable controversy. Therefore, justifications of state acts satisfy LJP if they are neutral towards the controversial conceptions of the good. It must be given in narrowly political terms.

But if liberalism requires the state to be neutral in this way, how can the justification of this requirement succeed? Arguably, it must itself meet the standard which it sets for other justifications: it must be based on reasons all reasonable citizens can share. But, traditionally, liberalism is understood as a comprehensive doctrine, its political tenets relying on a particular conception of personal autonomy and of human flourishing. ‘Comprehensive liberalism’ is a controversial view, so it cannot provide the required justification. In order to avoid being ‘just another sectarian doctrine’, Rawls concludes, liberalism must apply PSN to itself. It must set aside the metaphysical, epistemological, ethical etc. foundations of its own political principles and simply appeal to what is implicit in the public political culture of a democratic society.17 Restated as a narrowly political theory, liberalism will occupy a higher ground relative to the conflicting ‘comprehensive doctrines’, or so Rawls hopes. It does not compete with them. It rather enables a democratic citizenry to remain divided by controversial basic beliefs and ways of life, and yet to coexist in mutual respect.

(p. 324) Earlier I said that the truth of a conception that justifies the claim of monopoly of coercive power is not sufficient for that claim to command legitimacy. Rawls wants to say more. According to him, truth is not even necessary for legitimacy. Citizens may be skeptical about truth altogether and still agree ‘political liberalism’ as a set of principles which individuals seeking fair terms of cooperation can each accept. Thus, ‘The political conception does without the concept of truth’.18 To take stock: treating citizens as equals involves, according to PL, a two-pronged PSN. The first prong outlaws discrimination based on judgments regarding the comparative worth of basic beliefs and ways of life on which reasonable citizens disagree. The second rules out justifications of claims of legitimate coercive power that rely on ‘comprehensive views’, failing to provide reasons that all citizens can be expected to share. The domains of the two prongs are disjoint. Neutrality as non-discrimination applies to the way the state treats its citizens. Neutrality as shared reasons applies to the way the state speaks to them and about them.

IV. Objections to Liberal Neutrality

Liberal neutrality provoked huge debates, the main criticisms coming from two corners: communitarian19 and perfectionist.20 For our present aims, it is not necessary to enter into the history of the controversy. It will suffice to reconstruct the main arguments that seem to call for a serious revision of PSN.

Consider first the core objection to neutrality as non-discrimination. To recall: the non-discrimination prong of PSN entails that political communities, acting through their states must not interfere with social interaction on the basis of controversial judgments regarding the comparative value of different preferences. The argument underlying this conception tacitly assumes that the preferences themselves are fixed prior to social interaction: it is only the costs of their satisfaction that vary with changes in the patterns of the latter. But individuals do not form their conceptions of the good out of nothing: they draw on the cultural forms and practices available in their social environment. Changes in the patterns of interaction change the environment; changes in the environment do not involve changes in the costs of personal pursuits only: they give occasion to changes in the preferences themselves. And so it simply does not make sense to claim that an individual is disadvantaged by the state's action because, prior to it, he held preferences that the institutional agents judged not worthy of support. To be sure, if the change in preferences is induced coercively or by means of manipulation, the state's action can be correctly criticized on that account. But that criticism is not neutrality-based. If, on the other hand, the adjustment of preferences is left to the individuals' autonomous agency, it does not seem morally objectionable, for a democratically authorized government to divert collective resources for promoting valuable pursuits. To conclude, states are morally permitted to engage in action characterized and rejected by Rawls as perfectionist, that is, action aiming to promote 'human excellence in the various forms of culture'.

Let us turn now to neutrality as shared reasons. Rawls' proposal of a 'free-standing' political theory relies on the tacit assumption that reasonable persons whom the 'burdens of judgment' prevent from reaching agreement on matters of a comprehensive nature are nevertheless capable of reaching agreement on the political principles of justice. But the 'burdens of judgment' (insufficient evidence, conceptual vagueness etc) are not specifically related to comprehensive doctrines. If they give rise to passionate disagreements over non-political ideals, then they are likely to give rise to passionate disagreements over political principles, too.

At first blush, it seems as if PL had an answer to this objection: the reasonable comprehensive doctrines allowed to flourish by the liberties characteristic of constitutional democracies, diverging as they should be as to their non-political content, converge on the same political principles, PL maintains. This is what Rawls famously calls the 'overlapping consensus'. If the claim of overlapping consensus holds, then the 'burdens of judgment' are safe for 'political liberalism'. The pervasive fact of 'reasonable disagreement' leaves the domain of the political unaffected.

But the belief that the content of the political principles—as an object of general agreement—can be neatly separated from 'comprehensive' views—as objects of disagreement—seems to ignore the fact that the relevant political principles command something like a consensus only as long as they are formulated at a very high level of abstraction. It is not a mere historical accident that the basic principles of the great constitutions are drafted in abstract language. This is what allows citizens of the same as well as of successive generations to live under a shared constitution that each can regard as their own, notwithstanding their deep disagreements. But the consensus secured by abstract wording comes at a price. Abstract principles do not, in themselves, provide determinate answers to the question whether they are satisfied by specific institutional rules and procedures or in particular contexts. They need to be interpreted in light of that question, and the interpretation cannot proceed without involving further premises, not entailed by the abstract principles. It must show that the controversial reading is consistent with other normative commitments and factual beliefs one wants to uphold, commitments and beliefs that have their natural home in 'comprehensive doctrines'.

As a consequence, the strategy to seek a higher ground for 'political liberalism', to raise it above the plurality of 'comprehensive conceptions', is doomed to fail. Liberals must not defend their theory as an impartial arbiter in the conflicts of the many 'sectarian doctrines' but rather as a controversial view. As the core objection to neutrality as non-discrimination is consistent with the controversial interpretation of the principles of justice.

If so, then LLP and, together with it, neutrality as shared reasons must either be abandoned or revised.

V. Neutrality as Non-Discrimination Revisited

To reiterate, the objection to neutrality as non-discrimination holds that states can engage in creating valuable opportunities without discriminating between persons on the basis of a judgment concerning the relative value of their conceptions of the good life. This is because (p. 326) the conceptions of the good life themselves are responsive to changes in the social and cultural environment.

The non-discrimination prong of PSN as it was reconstructed in Section II entails that perfectionist state action is always morally impermissible. The objection implies that it is never permissible—no matter how much one might object to this on abstract grounds—for a state to promote a particular way of life, or project, or goal, if this state's action is not justified by a more abstract aim. Rather than aspiring to promote this or that particular way of life, or project, or goal, it may aspire to improve people's sense of the significance of the choices they face, and to facilitate more reflective choices (eg by making programs of ethics part of public education). Or it may aim at protecting and increasing the richness and complexity of the general cultural environment against the background of which the personal choices are made (eg by supporting the arts). If so, then even if it aims to forward 'human excellence in the various forms of culture', perfectionist state action is not objectionably non-neutral among particular conceptions of the good.

As restated in this form, the argument does not imply that perfectionist state action is always permissible. It upholds neutrality as non-discrimination, and condemns perfectionist state action whenever it is justified by the aim of promoting particular conceptions of the good. But it does imply that perfectionist state action is not always impermissible: it is consistent with neutrality as non-discrimination when a state's action justifies the aim focuses on promoting deep and reflective choices taken against the background of a rich and complex cultural environment.

However, even in this form, the argument raises hard questions. Consider the funding of the arts. Artistic genres and forms as such are not biased for or against particular conceptions of the good life: rather, they enrich the language and the models in terms of which people can form and reflect upon their own conceptions. True, only a minority of citizens—and mostly those with a better education and higher income—go to opera, visit exhibitions, or read novels. But they are not the only beneficiaries of the flourishing of artistic practices. 'High culture' is not separated by a Chinese wall from 'mass culture': it provides 'mass culture' with reference, style, tropes, and much else. So it indirectly benefits almost everyone.
State Neutrality

But the funding does not go to the arts in general. It is always extended to particular artistic ventures and given the limited amount of resources a community can divert to the arts, it necessarily involves choices. The argument discussed above suggests that the choice is not objectionably non-neutral if it is based on a judgment on the likelihood of competing artistic ventures to increase the richness and complexity of the general cultural environment. It is not (p. 328) clear, however, how this judgment would be separated from judgments on the content of the particular competing ventures. For instance, were we not to think that a new production of Hamlet is going to provide an original interpretation of the tragedy, one that links Shakespeare's text to the present in an innovative way, we would not believe that it has the potential to enrich the general cultural environment.

The interdependence between the judgment on the impact of a particular artistic venture on the general cultural environment and the judgment on its intrinsic value makes the distinction between perfectionist-state action consistent with neutrality as non-discrimination and one incompatible with it open to reasonable disagreement. A funding decision that, for its advocates, is neutral towards the ranking of different artistic currents and traditions may raise the suspicion of objectionable non-neutrality in the eyes of its opponents. This means, however, that neutrality as non-discrimination lacks criteria for deciding issues to which it purports to apply. It must be amended.

I suggest that we look at the concept of 'reasonable disagreement' with a fresh eye. Rawls identifies 'reasonable disagreement' with intractable disagreement among reasonable people. This characterization allows for two readings. It can be understood as applying only to controversies between persons who in fact treat their disputes in a reasonable manner. Or it can be understood as also covering controversies the parties to which may not actually be reasonable but would not be able to settle their disagreement even if they were. There is an important parallel between the two readings, and there are significant differences as well. They are similar in assuming that the parties lack the epistemic resources necessary for achieving reasoned consensus. But they make different assumptions regarding the way the parties respond to the insufficiency of epistemic resources.

The first reading takes the parties to be trying to make as good a case for their position as they can, other things being equal. The second allows for the possibility that some of the parties (or all of them) are reluctant to do so. Such reluctance is particularly onerous on the part of those who have the power to enforce a state act against the judgment and will of its opponents: It casts doubt on whether making and enforcing that act treats everyone with equal concern and respect.

Suppose advocates and opponents of a state act disagree on whether it satisfies PSN. Suppose their disagreement rests on a deeper disagreement on what neutrality, correctly interpreted, requires. Suppose, finally, that the two sides lack the epistemic resources necessary for resolving their disagreement, and consider a case where responsibility for defending the act make a good-faith attempt to track the correct interpretation and tailor the act to that interpretation. By hypothesis, they have no proof for their position, such that the opponents of the act, if reasonable, could not but accept it. But they give evidence that they take seriously the moral taint the act would incur if it violated PSN. This is the best they can do, under the circumstances, in order to make sure that the act satisfies the principle of equal concern and respect (to the extent that this depends on whether the act is neutral in the relevant sense). The act's opponents may think in good faith that it reflects a defective interpretation of what PSN requires. This is not a sufficient ground, though, for them to claim that the act expresses contempt for their (or for anyone else's) status and interests.

Consider, now, a case when those with a responsibility to defend the act disregard their duty to support it by a plausible enough conception of state neutrality. That is evidence that they do (p. 328) not take seriously the consequences of violating PSN. Thus, even if the opponents of the act cannot prove beyond controversy that it violates PSN correctly interpreted, the disregard for the duty to support the act by a plausible enough conception of state neutrality counts, decisively under the circumstances, against the act.

To sum up: a state act with an impact of redistributing advantages among people who pursue different conceptions of the good is permitted by PSN if the underlying value judgment refers to how the redistribution affects the overall cultural environment rather than particular cultural forms and practices belonging to it. On the other hand, whether the real basis of the act is such a holistic judgment or a judgment regarding particular cultural forms and practices may be a controversial matter, the parties to the disagreement lack the epistemic tools to resolve it. In such cases—in cases of reasonable disagreement—the belief that the act is objectionably non-neutral is not a sufficient ground for treating it as illegitimate. To suggest that the advocates of the act make a good-faith attempt to justify their contrary belief, while the same judgment is a sufficient ground for treating it as illegitimate if those responsible for defending the act refuse to take their judiciary duty seriously.

One might object: the question whether a state act reflects a serious attempt to satisfy the neutrality requirement is as open to 'reasonable disagreement' as the question whether it in fact achieves that aim; the only difference consisting in that the latter question divides defenders and critics of the act while the former emerge between different critics.

What a reasonable critic may see as an act issued from a good-faith—even if failed—attempt to satisfy the correct interpretation of PSN, other, no less reasonable critics may see to be an outright rejection of the very requirement of neutrality. We need more refined tests capable of dealing with this further disagreement.

Here are two examples of such tests. The first asks whether a particular state act charged with violating neutrality as non-discrimination receives a justification that faces up to the moral gravity of the criticism. This test—call it the adequacy test—rests on the idea that citizens have a right of equal respect publicly to object to their state's acts and to receive an answer that takes their objections seriously. The adequacy test does not fail a state act for lacking knock-down proof of its neutrality; by hypothesis, no such proof is available. But it fails the act if those having the power to make and enforce it simply ignore their duty to meet objections of non-neutrality adequately, and not to dismiss them without due consideration. It also fails the act which, while being claimed in principle to satisfy neutrality as non-discrimination, appeals to specific judgments on the comparative value of competing pursuits (as when a government, while declaring its intention to support the arts with the neutral aim of maintaining a rich and complex cultural environment, takes at the same time the blameworthy character of certain artistic works as a reason to deny eligibility for support to those works).

A second test that I would call the outcome test asks whether a putatively neutral act is characterized by strong outcome bias. Its question does not rest on mistakenly taking outcome neutrality for a plausible neutrality principle. It rather rests on the assumption that strong outcome bias is a reason for suspecting that the allegedly neutral justification of the controversial act is not forward in good faith. The outcome test fails an act that, while claiming (p. 328) neutrality towards competing views on how to live well, rigs the distribution of burdens and benefits against a particular view.

VI. Neutrality as Shared Reasons Revisited

To recap, the pervasive fact of 'reasonable disagreement' raises a difficulty for LLP. The question is, how can a justification that is controversial among reasonable citizens appeal to each of them. Rawls proposes 'political liberalism' as a solution to this difficulty. This solution is not workable, however: the 'burdens of judgment' underlying the facts of 'reasonable disagreement' are not specific to 'comprehensive doctrines'. Members of modern, democratic societies tend to disagree on just about everything, including the political principles of justice, freedom, equality, and tolerance. Thus, the shared reasons for PSN must either be abandoned or revised.

I suggest that we follow the strategy of revision explored in the previous section. Suppose the shared reasons available to citizens of a democratic republic are insufficient for allowing those with a responsibility to defend a state act to provide a compelling argument in terms of reasons their opponents can be expected to share. And suppose that these people take seriously their obligation to try to provide an argument in terms of such reasons. Then, the critics must understand the controversial act as resulting from a good faith—even if unsuccessful—attempt to work from a conception of legitimacy that rests on reasons each citizen can be expected to share. In this case, given the fact of ‘reasonable disagreement’, they are not justified to see the act as denying equal respect to those who disagree with it. Suppose now that those with a responsibility to defend the act disregard their duty to provide reasons with reasons they can be expected to share. Then, again given the fact of reasonable disagreement, the critics are justified in suspecting that the act fails to treat with equal respect those who disagree with it.

Like amended requires political communities seriously to try to provide each citizen with reasons they can be expected to share; its verdict does not hinge on the success of the attempt. Non-neutrality in the shared reasons sense violates LLP, and is therefore morally objectionable, if and only if it reflects a failure to make the requisite effort to justify the controversial act in terms of reasons each citizen can be expected to share.12

However, the question whether a state act reflects a serious attempt to provide a justification each citizen can be expected to share is as open to ‘reasonable disagreement’ as the very content of the justification. So the distinction, as the previous section suggested in the context of a similar problem, needs more elaborate tests. Here are, again, two examples of such tests.

The first test was widely discussed in the debates about liberal neutrality: It is of an epistemic character. Call it the accessibility test. The accessibility test draws a line that separates those reasons that may be reasons to share a reason because it is inconsistent with her other views. She examines the proposed reason against the backdrop of the views she already holds, and ends up rejecting it as unsuitable for being integrated into the web of those views. When, on the other hand, a reason is inaccessible to her, such an examination cannot even begin. How, then, to make sense of this claim?

In a paper from the late 1980s, Thomas Nagel suggests that for a reason to be publicly accessible, ‘it must be possible to present [it] to others … , so that once you have done so, they have what you have’. 23 In reply, Joseph Raz argues that the proposed criterion is too demanding: It rules out reliance even on everyday observations of fact. Suppose I am the only eyewitness to an accident, and I report to you what I have seen. Under certain conditions, you would take my report as the basis of your judgment on what happened. But you would not have what I have. My sensory perceptions and memories would not become yours.

Is it possible to resolve this difficulty by relaxing Nagel’s criterion? Raz’s answer is: no. Suppose you know that the accident could not have happened the way I described it, or you have doubts about the reliability of the visual perception and memory of eyewitnesses in general. Then, you have reasons for not trusting my report. And yet you would agree that if my story were not grossly implausible, and if my memory were not distorted by hearsay and newspaper reports etc., then my report would be acceptable as evidence of what had happened. If you do not trust my report, you and I do not have shared beliefs concerning the accident. But my report is accessible to you since it would make perfect sense for you to rely on it if the requisite conditions obtained, and you and I agree on what those conditions are.

Unfortunately, relaxed in this way, the criterion becomes too weak. Raz goes on to argue. Certain types of reasons that Nagel would want to rule out as lacking public accessibility would pass it: ‘Others may doubt whether the Centurion saw Jesus rise from his grave. But they agree that if he did, it is evidence … of the Resurrection’.11 On the relaxed test, there seems to be no difference between the epistemic status of the Centurion’s account of what he saw as an eyewitness to the miracle of Resurrection and my account of what I saw as an eyewitness to an accident.

The conclusion does not seem to follow, though. For a religious audience, the report on what the Centurion saw has a deeper meaning than that of reason for an empirical fact. It involves them in the mystery of the existence of the supernatural. For people with a secular outlook, mystery is but an unresolved intellectual problem calling for further inquiry or explanation. For a religious person, the fact that mystery defies rational explanation is not a defect to be superseded but rather a gift of grace that allows one to be initiated into the presence of the divine in the world. The sense of awe accompanying the belief in religious facts such as the resurrection of Jesus is not a further belief people with a secular outlook do not hold true being able to agree, at the same time, that if it were true it would be evidence for the fact of resurrection or for other religious claims such as the one holding that Jesus was the son of God. Rather, it is a personal experience of encountering something greater than man, greater even (p. 331) than humanity. And yet, it secures an exalted status to the underlying beliefs that radically distinguish them from ordinary secular beliefs and is experienced as a warranty to their truth. Beliefs of such exalted status are inaccessible to non-believers. If someone with a secular outlook found the eyewitness report of the Resurrection to be reliable, then he would take it as evidence not for an exalted fact but rather for an ordinary fact that calls for an explanation in terms of his ordinary beliefs. Justifying a legitimacy claim by reasons that are inaccessible to some people in this way amounts to denying equal respect to this people, and so its failed by the accessibility test.

Does this mean that all religious reasons are inaccessible to non-believers? I will argue in Section VII that it does not: actually, religious reasons are likely to pass the accessibility test significantly more often than to be failed by it. But this does not mean that the accessibility test cannot be given consistent interpretation or that it is empty for some other reason. It means only that it is a test with relatively limited power.

The early advocates of liberal neutrality paid much less attention to the second test I want to consider now. This is regrettable since, as I will attempt to show in the next section, this test—like it the recognition test—is much more powerful than the accessibility test.

Here is how it goes: reasons for adopting and enforcing a state act sometimes make explicit or implicit reference to the social identity of the community in whose name the act is made and applied. When they do, and when the group identified in this way is less inclusive than the citizenry as a whole, then some citizens cannot but see themselves as being denied recognition as full members of the citizenry. The recognition test fails such reasons because people whose status is degraded in this way cannot accept the reasons in question without resigning their sense of full citizenship. Thus, the recognition test is indeed a test of neutrality as shared reasons. It is similar to the accessibility test in that it is a consequence of the requirement of equal respect. But it is dissimilar to that test in that it is linked to equal respect. The accessibility test is linked to equal respect indirectly, through an assessment of the epistemic status of the controversial reasons. The recognition test is linked to it directly, through the examination of the scope of the group identified with ‘we the people’.

It is not only reasons in the strict sense of the word that are proper objects of the recognition test. States may adopt group-specific symbols which are not provided as reasons for adopting and enforcing an official act but which submit themselves to the question whether their adoption is consistent with attributing full status to each and every citizen. Think of hanging the crucifix in classrooms of public schools or in courts of justice. There are good grounds to presume that the display of the crucifix conveys the message that the state belongs to the community of Christian believers and that, as a consequence, non-Christians and non-believers are at best marginal citizens. That presumption is open to rebuttal, but it marks the default option, and given the threat to the status as citizens for some, really strong reasons are needed for the rebuttal to succeed.

I conclude this section by a remark on the relationship between neutrality as non-discrimination and neutrality as shared reasons. I said, towards the end of Section III, that the two prongs of PSN have separate domains: the first applies to the way the state treats its subjects while the second applies to the way it speaks to them and about them. The discussion of the recognition test reveals, however, that although separate, the two prongs are closely related. Once we see that mere symbolic expressions fail within the scope of the recognition test, it is a small step to discover that discriminating between citizens on account of a judgment (p. 332) about their basic beliefs or lifestyles may carry a symbolic message, one that is condemned by the recognition test. Acts that violate neutrality as non-discrimination may, by the same token, also violate neutrality as shared reasons by conveying the judgment that ‘we’—the people in whose name the act is carried out—are not like this. Judgments that fail the recognition test may, in their turn, serve as a basis for distributing advantages and disadvantages in a way condemned by neutrality as non-discrimination.

VII. Religious Neutrality

The problem of the place of religion in a liberal state is at the heart of the conception of state neutrality.26 PSN originally emerged as a response to this problem, in order to be gradually generalized throughout the history of constitutional debates and struggles in modern democracies. Even as it grew more and more general in scope, the way it handles religion remains a major test for its accuracy.

PSN would prove grossly inadequate if it rested on a bias for or against religion. Does this mean that it must treat all conflicts based on disagreements between people of religious versus secular beliefs in the same way as it treats conflicts based on disagreement between secular-minded people or on disagreement between religious people? It does not since the tests of neutrality may not be equally satisfied by reasons of religious and secular character.

Consider neutrality as shared reasons first, beginning with the accessibility test. This seems to be no secular counterpart to miracles and revelations. The special attitude towards mystical experience described in the previous section seems to be constitutive of the religious outlook and largely alien from the secular one. Thus, secular reasons are unlikely to be failed by the accessibility test, while it is not difficult to see how a religious reason may be failed by it.

This claim must be treated with caution. Religious reasons are not reducible to reports of mystical experience. Their body entails a large set of claims—ethical, moral, prudential, metaphysical, and empirical—that non-religious individuals are fully capable of assessing against their own background beliefs. Theologians often rely on nothing but ‘natural’ reasons, that is, reasons available to the ordinary human mind, unaided by divine revelation.15

Here is an example: ‘Human persons are equal since God has created all of us to His own image.’ Such propositions are not rendered inaccessible to non-believers in virtue of their religious connotation. Actually, much of the modern, secular moral theory emerged from translations of Judeo-Christian moral theology and from a critical engagement with it. So if it is the inaccessibility test that fails religious claims, then PSN does not disqualify religion-based reasons as such. Rather, it cuts across the domain of religious reasons, ruling out a relatively small part of them.

The recognition test seems to have more far-reaching implications. Religions are not exhausted by sets of beliefs. They typically constitute a community, setting apart insiders from outsiders. Religion tends to define social identity in a way secular belief systems do not. This difference has momentous consequences.34

To recall, the state speaks in the name of ‘we the people’. Explicitly or implicitly, its pronouncements say something about who ‘we the people’ are. Respect for the equal status of citizens requires the state not to attribute to ‘we the people’ a social identity that is less inclusive (p. 333) than the citizenry as a whole. Imagine a law starting with this preamble: ‘Whereas God has given the earth to humankind for common use’. The text of the preamble echoes a thesis of Christian theology. Combined with the implicit claim of speaking in the name of the people, it implies that ‘we the people’ are a community of Christian believers. It signals to non-Christians and non-believers that they are not full members.

There are, thus, serious grounds for assuming that neutrality as shared reasons fails religious reasons significantly more often than it fails secular reasons. It always judges as inappropriate a state action to appeal to religious reasons, but it does not necessarily judge official appeals to controversial secular reasons as inappropriate. It mandates the avoidance of religious language not because religious claims are false or otherwise problematic; it does so because of the social identity-related implications of its use by official state acts. According to Charles Taylor, to have a legislative clause: ‘Whereas Kant said that the only thing good without limits is a good will’, or ‘Whereas Marx said that religion is the opium of the people’, would be as improper as having a legislative clause appealing to some religious tenet.35 But the appeal to the Kantian dictum would have no consequences for the social identity of ‘we the people’. The Marxist clause would, since it identifies the community in which the name of the law speaks as opposed to religion. Anti-religious language is ruled out by neutrality as shared reasons on the same ground as is religious language, while secular language as such is not.

Those insisting that PSN is biased against religion because its shared reasons prong disqualifies them more often than it disqualifies secular reasons should consider how the non-discrimination prong deals with the difference between religious and secular reasons. If the shared reason prong expresses an anti-religious bias, then the non-discrimination prong is loaded by a reverse—anti-secularist—bias.

To explain: there are special cases when neutrality as non-discrimination allows privileged treatment to be given to people committed to basic beliefs or pursuing ways of life of a particular kind. The property of the beliefs or lifestyles that justifies privileged treatment in such cases is that they involve special obligations that may conflict with the obligation to obey the law. Consider a conscript committed to a religious creed that prohibits taking up arms. Neutrality permits granting an exemption to such a person, since the exception clause need not rely on a comparative judgment about his views on how one should live and the views held by others. It rather rests on the judgment that enforcing the law against a person’s sincerely held ethical convictions is an affront to moral integrity—whether or not those convictions are correct.

To be sure, for the exemption to fit neutrality as non-discrimination, the class of the beneficiaries of the exception clause must coincide with the class of those whom the requirement to obey the law would implicate in a serious conflict of conscience. All sorts of radical pacifists, religious or not, face the same conflict when called up to serve in the army. Thus, narrowing the justification of the exception clause to holders of a religious system of belief would unjustly discriminate against pacifists with a secular outlook.40

No such discrimination is involved, however, by exemptions that honor the ritual code of certain religions. As an example, think of the permission given to Sikh men riding a motorcycle to wear their turban rather than a safety helmet. Such exemptions are individual to particular (p. 334) religions; they have no application to people committed to some secular system of belief. This is because religions, unlike secular creeds, constitute normative communities: they set conventional norms of conduct with which the faithful are expected to comply. Normative communities regulate activities which may also be subject to legal regulation. Coincidences of the two codes—the religious and the political—tend to give rise to conflict of conscience similar to the one inflicted upon radical pacifists by military conscription. No such conflicts are likely to emerge for people with a secular outlook.

Thus, the exception is properly restricted to people belonging to certain religious groups: neutrality as non-discrimination endorses this rather than condemning it.41

In sum, if PSN deals with religion in a special manner, the special restrictions and exemptions are not due to bias but rather to the special characteristics of religion as a belief system and as a social institution.

Philosophers and legal scholars with a religious background insist that, on the contrary, PSN does not give appropriate consideration to the special character of religion. The requirement to bracket out religious reasons silences citizens whose views on matters of policy are motivated by faith and, by assuming that their concerns can be exhaustively rendered in secular terms, trivializes their deepest convictions.42

Is this complaint against liberal neutrality well founded? It may ring, perhaps, persuasively when it is raised in France but not in the United States where, to put it bluntly, it is the kiss of death for a politician openly to confess to a lack of religious faith. But the question is not whether it is a fact about politics in contemporary liberal states that religious believers find themselves marginalized by it, but whether it is true about the principle of state neutrality that, properly understood, it implies such a marginalization. Clearly, PSN requires the law to use secular language. But, for the complaint to hold, it must be the case that PSN requires the public discourse about the law to use secular language, too. Does it entail such a requirement? Not necessarily, since not all participants of public deliberation speak in the name of ‘we the people’, and when they do not, their language does not determine the political status of those disagreeing with them nor is it subject to the requirement of state neutrality on some other ground.

When citizens participate in the informal processes of public deliberation, they speak in their own name, and so PSN does not bear on their discourse. Judges speaking in the court are at the opposite extreme, since they give authoritative interpretations of the law. Legislators are somewhere in between: while not speaking in their own name, rarely do they speak, as individual members of the legislature, in the name of the legislative body—and, therefore, the citizenry—as a whole. Their pronouncements contribute to public deliberation in a pluralistic society including many particular perspectives. Typically, they speak from one of the many perspectives of which the religious perspectives represent one legitimate family. So PSN leaves some latitude for legislators to give voice to religious reasons.43 How wide is that latitude?

In PL, Rawls argues that the duty of civility binds citizens to explain their position to others in terms of public reason.44 If that is true about ordinary citizens, it is doubly true about their representatives, especially when they speak in the legislature, as participants in the process of legislation. But Rawls also mentions two considerations that may override the presumption. In both cases, religious reasons are additive to the reasons presented in secular language. They may be added, according to Rawls, either as evidence of the sincerity of a religious legislator’s commitment to a particular political position, or with the aim of giving strength to the political conception.45

One could cite further considerations. When the political argument seems to run out, religious ideas may be introduced into the debate in the hope of providing the non-religious party with fruitful metaphors that may help to unblock the controversy. Ironically, the non-religious side may also find an interest in making the religious background of the opponent’s position explicit. They may want to show that that position is not implied by the underlying religious views: one can adopt a different political position without being compelled to give up those views.

To conclude, PSN—INCLUDING neutrality as shared reasons—requires strict exclusion of religion from the language of the state’s acts and their official justification; its requirements become less stringent when the speaker does not speak in the name of the state and, through it, the citizenry. Liberal neutrality, properly understood, has no impact on silencing people with deeply held religious beliefs.

To be sure, religious language is not part of the shared language of a pluralistic community, and it is inappropriate to presume that representatives—unlike ordinary citizens—ought to stick to the shared language. Rawls invokes, in PL, the ideal of civility in support of such a presumption.

Bibliography

Bibliography

Bruce Ackerman, Social Justice in a Liberal State (1980)
Robert Audi, Religious Commitment and Secular Reason (2000)
Richard Bellamy and Martin Hollis (eds), Pluralism and Liberal Neutrality (1999)
Ronald Dworkin, A Matter of Principle (1985), chs 8, 9, 11, 17
Ronald Dworkin, Sovereign Virtue (2000), chs 3, 6
Robert Goodin and Andrew Reeve (eds), Liberal Neutrality (1989)
Jürgen Habermas, Zwischen Naturalismus und Religion (2005)
Vinit Haksar, Equality, Liberty and Perfectionism (1979)
Charles Larmore, Patterns of Moral Complexity (1987)
Alasdair MacIntyre, After Virtue. A Study in Moral Theory (1985)
State Neutrality

John Rawls, Political Liberalism (1993)
Michael Sandel, Liberalism and the Limits of Justice (1982)
George Sher, Beyond Neutrality. Perfectionism and Politics (1997)

Notes:
(5) On the constitution and justice, see Chapter 16.
(6) Ackerman (n 1), 11. Charles Larmore, too, advocates making neutrality ‘the primary ideal of liberalism’ (Larmore (n 1), 46). But, not fully consistent with this proposal, he also suggests that, rather than taking their commitment to neutrality to be foundational, liberals should make sense of it in terms of a more basic principle of equal respect (ibid 59ff).
(7) Dworkin (n 1), 205.
(9) Dworkin (n 1), 353.
(11) Rawls, A Theory of Justice (n 1), 223.
(12) Ibid 17.
(13) Ibid 222.
(14) Rawls, Political Liberalism (n 1), 56-7.
(15) Ibid 243.
(16) Ibid 10–11.
(17) Ibid 8, 13ff.
(18) Ibid 94.
(19) Sandel (n 2); MacIntyre (n 2).
(21) Rawls, A Theory of Justice (n 1), 22.
(22) For a similar argument see Simon Casey, ‘Liberal Neutrality, Reasonable Disagreement, and Justice’ in Richard Bellamy and Martin Hollis (eds), Pluralism and Liberal Neutrality (1999), 22ff.
(23) Rawls, Political Liberalism (n 1), 39ff.
(24) eg the question whether a woman's right to control her own body entails a right to early abortion cannot be answered without taking sides on the moral status of the fetus. See Chapter 51.
(26) For a similar claim, see Steven Wall, ‘Neutralism for Perfectionists: The Case of Restricted State Neutrality’ (2010) 120 Ethics 232. Wall, however, proposes a case for a limited neutrality principle that actually defends the APP rather than PSN. He says that coercing people to adopt a particular lifestyle undermines their sense of equal worth, and so even perfectionists must reject it. That is true, but it is not an argument in favor of a separate neutrality principle.
(27) Dworkin (n 1), 229.
(29) This is a further reason why, as I mentioned in Section I, the early advocates of liberal neutrality were mistaken to think that the neutrality requirement applies only to the reasons that can possibly be marshaled in favor of it (‘justificatory neutrality’), and never to the reasons actually appealed to (‘neutrality of intent’).

(30) For the implausibility of interpreting neutrality as neutrality of outcomes, see Section I.

(31) Consider an individual in the grip of a terminal illness. Suppose she thinks that a life in debilitating pain and dependence undermines her dignity, and asks for medical assistance to discontinue it. And suppose the law makes voluntary euthanasia a punishable crime. The legislator says, however: euthanasia is an insult to God and to the order of nature, but this judgment does not figure among the reasons for its prohibition. We prohibit it because we have to take the interests of other terminally ill patients into consideration, too: those who think that by successfully resisting the temptation to precipitate death they will achieve their life’s greatest victory or want to live on for some other reason. Permitting euthanasia would deliver them to the arbitrary will of their relatives, tired of assisting them or desirous to inherit their property. Such a reasoning is not entirely groundless. There is no legal regulation of end-of-life decisions that would maximally fit the interests of both types of terminally ill people. Any regulation must be suboptimal at least from the point of view of one of the two groups. But placing the whole burden of regulation on one of the groups—especially if its interests do not carry the sympathy of the legislator—raises the suspicion that the actual motivation for the act is not neutral between the conflicting decisions.

(36) On religion more generally, see Chapter 43.

(37) See Raz (n 34), 40.

(38) There are exceptions. Marxism in the early periods of its history was one.

(40) On when legal exemptions are and are not objectionably non-neutral, see Kwame Anthony Appiah, The Ethics of Identity (2003), 88–9.

(43) Habermas insists that, nevertheless, religious discourse must be kept out even from legislative debates: the Speaker of the Parliament must have the power, he says, to delete from the protocols religious statements and justifications. It is unclear why this should be the case. See Jürgen Habermas, ‘Religion in der Öffentlichkeit’ in Jürgen Habermas, Zwischen Naturalismus und Religion (2005), 137.

(44) Rawls, Political Liberalism (n 1), 217 ff.

(45) Ibid 247, 251.

János Kis
János Kis is Professor of Political Science and Philosophy at Central European University, Budapest.
Abstract and Keywords

This article is organized as follows. Section I examines a procedural approach to the constitution. According to the procedural reading, a just constitution has to be neutral among different views and establish a fair procedure through which rival parties seek approval from the people. In order to study the procedural approach, it seeks support in John Rawls's Theory of Justice, where the constitution is examined as an exemplar of imperfect procedural justice. Section II distinguishes between two different interpretations of the procedural constitution, one related to libertarianism and the other to egalitarianism. These interpretations allow us to reflect on the neutral character of the procedural constitution. Section III contrasts the procedural approach with an alternative, republican understanding of the constitution. In order to illustrate the differences between these theories, the article examines their conflicting views on whether or not a just constitution should incorporate a list of social rights in its Bill of Rights.

Keywords: theory of justice, John Rawls, procedural constitution, libertarianism, egalitarianism, social rights, bill of rights

I. Procedural Justice 336
   1. Rawls, the Constitution, and (Imperfect) Procedural Justice 336
   2. Justice and the Constitution: The Liberal View 339
      (a) Bill of Rights 339
      (b) Checks and Balances 341

II. Libertarianism and Egalitarianism on Substantive Justice 342

III. The Republican Alternative 344

This chapter consists of three sections. In Section I, I examine a procedural approach to the constitution. According to the procedural reading, a just constitution has to be neutral among different views and establish a fair procedure through which rival parties seek approval from the people. In order to study the procedural approach, I shall seek support in John Rawls's Theory of Justice, where the constitution is examined as an exemplar of imperfect procedural justice. In Section II, I distinguish between two different interpretations of the procedural constitution, one related to libertarianism and the other to egalitarianism. These interpretations allow us to reflect on the neutral character of the procedural constitution. In Section III, I contrast the procedural approach with an alternative, republican understanding of the constitution. In order to illustrate the differences between these theories, I examine their conflicting views regarding whether a just constitution should incorporate, or not, a list of social rights in its Bill of Rights.
I. Procedural Justice

1. Rawls, the Constitution, and (Imperfect) Procedural Justice

In his well-known book, A Theory of Justice, John Rawls presents the constitution as one of the main examples of what he calls imperfect procedural justice. So understood, the constitution comes to set up ‘a form of fair rivalry for political office and authority’. In order to understand (p. 337) what Rawls means by the idea of imperfect procedural justice, it is necessary to examine the three general ideas of procedural justice that are studied in A Theory of Justice.

The first idea refers to perfect procedural justice. Here, there is an independent criterion for deciding what is a fair outcome (‘a criterion defined separately from and prior to the procedure which is to be followed’), and a procedure that guarantees that we get that outcome. An example of this case would be a procedure for dividing a cake where the one who slices the case picks last. In this case we have an independent criterion of justice (equal slices for all), and a procedure that is appropriate for reaching that outcome.

The second idea is the one of imperfect procedural justice. Here we also have, as in the first case, an independent criterion that allows us to define what is a fair outcome; but we do not have, as in the previous case, a procedure that ensures the desired outcome. An example that could illustrate this case is that of a criminal trial. In effect, here we know that we want to condemn only the guilty, but the procedure that we have created for dealing with these situations cannot guarantee us the desired outcome. In fact, as Rawls says, it seems impossible to design the legal rules so that they always lead to the correct result.

Finally, we have the case of pure procedural justice. In this situation, and contrary to what happened in the previous two, we do not have an independent criterion for the right result. What we do have is a fair procedure such that the outcome is likewise correct, provided that the procedure was properly followed. The example would be that of gambling, where we do have a procedure, but not a pre-defined fair outcome.

The constitution is, according to Rawls, an exemplary case of imperfect procedural justice. This is so because there is no feasible political procedure which guarantees that the enacted legislation is just even though we have (let us suppose) a standard for just legislation. … The constitutional process, like a criminal trial (cannot guarantee) that only just and effective legislation is enacted.

To favor the enactment of just legislation, the procedural constitution needs to be framed so that ‘it is more likely than any other (arrangement) to result in a just and effective system of legislation’. For such a purpose, it is crucial that the constitution guarantees equal participation. In his words, ‘all citizens are to have an equal right to take part in, and to determine the outcome of, the constitutional process that establishes the laws with which they are to comply.’ The point is extremely important: if the state wants to exercise its coercive authority in a legitimate way, then the constitutional process has to preserve this equal representation to the degree that is feasible.

Other crucial characteristics of the procedural constitution would be the following. First, and in order to satisfy the principle of equal participation, it is necessary but not sufficient that the charter guarantees periodic, free, and fair elections. In a proper constitutional regime, Rawls maintains, we should also find ‘firm constitutional protections for certain liberties, particularly freedom of speech and assembly, and liberty to form political associations.’

In addition, Rawls believes that the usual devices of constitutionalism (such as checks and balances, separation of powers, etc.) can be consistent with the principle of equal liberty (although they certainly limit it), provided that ‘the constraints introduced are likely over time to fall evenly upon all sectors of society’. In every case, the idea is to ensure that ‘those similarly (p. 338) endowed and motivated … have roughly the same chance of attaining positions of political authority irrespective of their economic and social class.’ Rawls is well aware that the liberties in question lose much of their value whenever the rich (or, in general, the most advantaged) are allowed to use their privileges to bias the public debate in their own favor. Such an unfair situation may always occur, although it is more typical—according to Rawls—in societies that allow ‘private ownership if the means of production, property and wealth’ to be ‘concentrated in a few hands, rather than widely distributed’.

Finally, Rawls establishes a strong connection between the political conception of justice and political liberalism. Liberalism helps us to understand what the constitutional essentials or essential features of the constitution must be. In Rawls’s words, the essential features would be the following:

the powers of the legislative, executive, and the judiciary, the limits and scope of majority rule, as well as the basic political and civil rights and liberties legislative majorities must respect, such as the right to vote and to participate in politics, freedom of thought and liberty of conscience, and also the protections of the rule of law.\textsuperscript{10}

So organized, the political process becomes ‘a just procedure for choosing between governments and for enacting just legislation’,\textsuperscript{11} or, in other words, a procedure through which ‘rival parties seek the citizen’s approval ... against a background of freedom of thought and assembly in which the fair value of political liberty is assured.’\textsuperscript{12}

Rawls’s insistence on the procedural character of the constitution is intimately related to his rejection of an opposite alternative, namely that of having a constitution that expresses and enforces a comprehensive view of justice. For him, if we want to have a ‘workable political conception of justice’, the conception of justice embodied by the constitution must be able to ‘gain the support of a diversity of comprehensive doctrines’. Political liberalism is not ‘a view of the whole of life: it is not a (fully or partially) comprehensive doctrine’.\textsuperscript{13}

\textsuperscript{(p. 339)} 2. Justice and the Constitution: The Liberal View

In the present context of societies characterized by ‘the fact of pluralism’, liberals reject the use of the state’s coercive powers in the name of any particular view. As the moral philosopher Michael Sandel has put it, liberals assume that ‘[since] people disagree about the best way to live, government should not affirm in law any particular vision of the good life. Instead, it should provide a framework of rights that respects individuals as free and independent beings, capable of choosing their own values and ends.’ Liberals assert ‘the priority of fair procedures over particular ends,’ and this is why he refers to this view as ‘the procedural republic’.\textsuperscript{14}

In this procedural republic, the constitution is seen as fundamentally \textit{neutral} in its content, which means that it is not committed to any particular comprehensive doctrine. This is to say, for liberals, the main mission of the constitution is to set a framework that is compatible with substantively different approaches.

Now, to state this does not mean to deny that the procedural view is premised on the defense of one particular value, namely individual autonomy. In any case, one needs to consider that the value of individual autonomy has the particular characteristic of being able to accommodate, in principle, all other different values and conceptions of the good. A constitution that consecrates the value of personal autonomy is, then, a constitution that is equally open to radically different projects, both at the personal and political level.

A central element of the struggle led by liberalism in defense of personal autonomy was its proclaimed distrust of the power of the state. The state came to represent the source of evil, the risk of oppression, the permanent threat that could violate the most sacred individual liberties. That which, over the course of long years, liberals had learned was the foremost threat to everyone’s liberty originated there: in concentrated power, the state that controlled both budget and arms. This omnipotent state was the same one that had persecuted religious dissidents, the one that had expropriated, the one that had threatened property, freedoms of expression, and association. Hence, for many, the solution, when faced with such a risk, turned out to be the severe restriction of the state’s powers; if a powerful state meant the risk of oppression, an absent state or one with its hands tied held the promise of liberty.\textsuperscript{15}

The whole procedural constitutional can be read as an attempt to protect individual autonomy and limit the influence of the state. If we pay attention to the two main parts of the liberal constitution, we can see that it consists of a bill of rights, which is basically aimed at the protection of individuals’ rights against perfectionist impulses; and a structure of ‘checks and balances’, which purports to establish strict controls over the different branches of power, against possible, foreseeable excesses. Let us explore the specific content of each of these sections in more detail.

\textbf{(a) Bill of Rights}

As the philosopher Jürgen Habermas has stated, in the liberal approach the status of citizens is defined primarily by negative rights against the state and other citizens. As bearers of these rights, citizens enjoy government protection as long as they pursue their private interests within the boundaries set by legal status, and this includes protections against government interventions that exceed statutory limits. Political rights have not only the same structure but also the same meaning as private rights that provide space within which legal subjects are free from external compulsion.16

A good example of this view of rights as barriers against the state can be found in the very origins of constitutionalism in the United States. At the time, important efforts were directed primarily at impeding the imposition of a particular religion by the central state over a socially and culturally heterogeneous population. Within this framework, the principal protagonists of North American life tended to coincide in defense of practicing tolerance toward religious diversity. While some, like the famous Roger Williams, defended the separation of Church and state as a form of protecting different faiths from the state's nefarious influence, others supported the freedom of religion clause because of their fear that the public power would impose, in the different states that made up the Union, a religion other than the one that predominated in each one of them. Finally, other politicians, like James Madison, encouraged the strict separation of Church and state, bearing in mind the mutual convenience of both authorities, and others still, like Jefferson, defined this separation as a means of protecting the state from persistent interference by the Church—only thereby, thought Jefferson, could the citizens be guaranteed a free choice between distinct political options.17

Organized in such a way, the section of rights, in the liberal constitution, comes to ‘shield’ individuals’ lives from external, undue influences. The idea was—as Jefferson graphically stated—to build a ‘wall of separation’ that separated individuals from the state.18 Granted, the image of a ‘wall of separation’ was primarily used to refer to the need for preventing the use of state coercion in religious matters. However, that image helps us to see the liberals’ general approach to the issue of the coercive powers of the state. In the end, they wanted to build a ‘wall of separation’ that protected each person from the arbitrary imposition of any conception of the good.19

(p. 341) Individual rights function, therefore, like ‘trump cards’ by which to defy and defeat all collective claims.20 Through the defense of individual rights, liberals asserted their basic assumption that each person was worthy of respect independently of the fact that the majority or dominant group rejected or disliked his or her own personal project. Each person had to count as an end in him or herself.

(b) Checks and Balances
The liberal system of checks and balances is mainly directed at preventing the abuses coming from an arbitrary executive authority. At the same time, this system of multiple controls reduces the threats posed by a too powerful Congress, such as the oppression of minority groups, or extreme state interventionism.

Madison explained and justified the creation of a system of checks and balances in Federalist Papers no 51, where he stated:

the members of each department should be as little dependent as possible on those of the others, for the emoluments annexed to their offices. Were the executive magistrate, or the judges, not independent of the legislature in this particular, their independence in every other would be merely nominal. But the great security against a gradual concentration of the several powers in the same department, consists in giving to those who administer each department the necessary constitutional means and personal motives to resist encroachments of the others.

The system of checks and balances was thus based on the same goals and assumptions that supported the adoption of the Bill of Rights, namely individualism, self-interest, and the protection of personal choices. The logic that regulated the system was also the same that was present in the former case, this is to say, an invisible hand mechanism, which favored that selfish motives became transformed into actions that promoted the interests of society as a whole.21

Together with these initiatives, liberals tended to resist institutional arrangements that permitted or promoted the establishment of close bonds between representatives and their constituencies, based on the idea that these arrangements would render impartial decision-making impossible. This, they argued, was the case not only because of the difficulty presented to adequate reflection by the large numbers in the group, under such conditions, but also, mainly, because when subject to the demands of their electorates, representatives would put aside all concern for the general interest in order to focus on the demands of those who pressured them the most. The constant pressures of the electorate would come to directly impede the delegate’s ability to change his opinion through conversation with the other delegates; in this way, representatives would turn into the ‘mouthpieces’ of their electorates. Hence, the preference for representative systems that rested fundamentally on the independent and isolated decisions of representatives. With this type of system—added Madison—‘it may well happen (p. 342) that the public voice, pronounced by the representatives of the people, will be more consonant to the public good than if pronounced by the people themselves, convened for the purpose’ (emphasis added).

Without a well-functioning representational system and without an appropriate system of checks and balances—liberals assumed—decisions became less than rational, or, as was often sustained in that period, less guided by reason than by passion. Moved by passion and other reprehensible impulses, minority or majority groups tended to become factions, that is to say (in accordance with the famous definition given by Madison in the Federalist no 10) groups that acted against the interests of the nation and the rights of individuals. The liberal constitution, in sum, appeared as a way to reintroduce rationality into politics, and to prevent politics being dominated by powerful groups as well.

II. Libertarianism and Egalitarianism on Substantive Justice

So far we have seen that one of the main virtues claimed by the procedural constitution resides on its neutral character. The fact is, however, that in spite of this claim, supposedly neutral procedures are frequently interpreted as being only or mainly compatible with very specific distributive outcomes. Neutral procedures appear, then, to be thick enough to contain particular distributive mandates.

Let us take, for instance, the case of the US Constitution, which is frequently read as a relevant example of what a procedural, neutral document is or should look like. According to many authors, that Constitution is not a mere catalog of basic, empty rules. Rather, the Constitution is seen as containing particular directives about substantive justice, which would prevent certain distributive outcomes, while promoting certain others.

Many libertarians, for example, consider that the US Constitution is a good example of a well-designed constitution, which is defined as one that organizes the political order so as to ‘channel the self-serving behavior of participants towards the common good in manner that comes as close as possible to that described for us by Adam Smith with respect to the economic order.’ For this view, the US constitutional system would be a successful attempt to use people’s rational egoism for the sake of the individual rights and the nation’s interests (which seemed to be under the threat of factions). Accordingly, most of the Founding Fathers, and James Madison in particular, appear, in this approach, as lucid precursors of the so-called public choice analysis. In Buchanan’s words,

> When persons are modeled as self-interested in politics ... the constitutional challenge becomes one of constructing and deigning framework institutions or rules that will, to the (p. 343) maximum extent possible, limit the exercise of such interest in exploitative ways and direct such interest to furtherance of the general interest. It is not surprising therefore, to discover the roots of a public choice perspective...in the writings of the American Founders, and most notably in James Madison's contribution to The Federalist Papers.

More significantly, libertarians consider that those origins reveal that the US Constitution embodies a very specific view of justice. As James Dorn has claimed, for Madison, ‘justice meant the protection of property, broadly conceived, and it was the primary function of a just government to afford such protection’. The main goal of the Constitution would have then been ‘to protect persons and property and provide a structure of government that limited the potential for injustice, that is, for the taking of property without the consent of the rightful owner(s)’. The idea was to ‘limit government and provide the maximum scope for individual freedom under the higher law of the Constitution’. In sum, and according to this view, the US Constitution would include a particular view of (distributive) justice that would prevent the undue taking of property.

Of course, this is a debatable reading of the procedural constitution, in general, and a disputable reading of the US Constitution, in particular. In fact, one could reasonably challenge the libertarian presentation in its descriptive aspects, and claim that the libertarian view does not offer a plausible reconstruction of US constitutional history. More significantly, one could also challenge the normative view that libertarians derive from this particular constitutional text and its history.

A good illustration of the latter can be found in the work of the legal scholar Ronald Dworkin. Dworkin interprets the US Constitution as embodying two fundamental values, namely those of freedom and equality. For him, the only plausible interpretation of the text is an egalitarian, moral reading, which demands that every person be treated with equal consideration and respect. This interpretation would be derived from the American constitutional text and practice, and would suggest specific responses for all significant hard cases. In Dworkin’s words,

The moral reading proposes that we all—judges, lawyers, citizens—interpret and apply these abstract clauses on the understanding that they invoke moral principles about political decency and justice. ... So when some novel or controversial constitutional issue arises—about whether, for instance, the First Amendment permits laws against pornography—people who form an opinion must decide how an abstract moral principle is best understood. ... The moral reading therefore brings political morality into the heart of constitutional law.28

For Dworkin, an appropriate interpretation of the main principles incorporated into the constitution forces on us relevant conclusions regarding many of the main debates of our public life, including issues about human rights, the role of religion in politics, questions about social justice, the distribution of economic wealth, and the character of the dominant decision-making process. Not surprisingly, Dworkin considers that the specific responses that (p. 344) derive from the abstract principles of the constitution are liberal-egalitarian in their nature and content. These principles allow him to challenge conservative approaches in matters of religion; resist contemporary criticisms on American tax and social policy; and also defy the politics of the so-called war on terror.29

At this point, it is not necessary that we solve the dispute between the libertarian and egalitarian readings of the constitution. This is an interpretative disagreement, which is the object of an ongoing and unfinished debate (John Ely, for example, challenges both readings from a more strictly procedural approach to the US Constitution).30 It is sufficient to say, by now, that both approaches link the US, procedural Constitution, with a specific view of substantive justice, and that both are reasonable interpretations of the history, values, and practices that surround the Constitution. In other words, both positions come to challenge the idea that the procedural constitution is agnostic in terms of distributive justice. In the end, what this dispute does is to question the idea that the procedural constitution is compatible with the enforcement of almost any position in terms of justice.

III. The Republican Alternative

1. Against the Procedural Approach

Probably, one of the main reasons that makes it difficult for the procedural view of the constitution to stand as an undisputable neutral conception is the fact that, from the very beginning, it incorporates controversial assumptions regarding the individuals’ moral character and moral dispositions, their main motivations, and their capacities for acting together. In effect, as we already know, the procedural view tends to take the fact that individuals are rational agents as given. It also assumes that individuals are mainly motivated by self-interest; that they are not particularly interested in participating in politics; or that they have difficulties with behaving rationally, when acting together in large assemblies.31

Not surprisingly, then, those who do not share such controversial assumptions tend to have a different approach to the constitution, and think about questions of institutional design in different terms: different subjects with different motivations require, in the end, a different constitutional machinery. One of the most interesting examples, in this respect, is the one represented by the republican alternative.

The republican alternative offers a different reading about the relationship between the constitution and justice. In this reading, the constitution does not appear as a procedural mechanism, open to all different conceptions of the good and ideas of distributive justice, but rather as an expression of a social compact that aims to work for the common good. More in particular, the republican constitution comes to promote, first, certain qualities of character and moral dispositions—a model of a virtuous citizen—and then, also, a certain specific view of social justice—an egalitarian order, capable of fostering a better communal life. Here, positive (p. 345) liberty or, in other contemporary views, liberty as non-domination, occupies the place that negative liberty occupies in the liberal model.\textsuperscript{32}

The starting point of republican constitutional theory is a different conception of the person, which allows its proponents to object to the liberal picture of self-interested individuals, both from a descriptive and normative point of view. They reject the idea that self-interest constitutes the individuals’ main motivation, and they also defy the proposal that says that the institutional system has to take self-interest as a given fact—as the combustible that fuels the institutional system, and the main motivation that the institutional system promotes.

As a consequence of all these differences, republicans tend to challenge the procedural approach to the constitution, and also the idea of having a constitution that works as an open document, compatible with all possible character traits, conceptions of the good, or ideas of social justice. In contrast with such a view, most republicans maintain that the institutional system has to be organized for the common good. More specifically, they consider that the preservation of a self-governing republic requires the presence of active and committed citizens, who are identified with their fellow citizens and committed to their community.

The republican Constitution of Pennsylvania, 1776, which was written by the British radical Thomas Paine, provides us with an interesting example of how republicans could conceive of the constitution. Among other things, the Constitution asserted that all power ‘derived from the people’; that all officers of government were ‘their trustees and servants, and at all time accountable to them’ (Art 4); and that the people had the right to ‘assemble together, and to apply to the legislature for redress of grievances, by address, petition, or remonstrance’ (Art 16). Profoundly republican, it declared ‘a firm adherence to justice, moderation, temperance, industry, and frugality’, virtues that, assumedly, were necessary to ‘preserve the blessings of liberty, and keep a government free’ (Art 14).

This different, republican understanding of the people’s moral character and motivations went hand in hand with a different approach to a majoritarian democracy. In contrast with the profound distrust to mass meetings and collective bodies shown by liberals, most republicans saw massive assemblies as a source of wisdom. They claimed: ‘the most respectable assemblies we have any knowledge of and the wisest, have been those, each of which consisted of several hundred members.’ Some of them seemed to subscribe a general principle about the virtues of large collective bodies, to which the ‘more numerous state assemblies and conventions have universally discovered more wisdom, and as much order, as the less numerous ones’.\textsuperscript{33} Others defended the creation of large assemblies for instrumental reasons: ‘the variety prevents combination, and the number excludes corruption’, they argued.\textsuperscript{34}

(p. 346) Given their defense of majoritarianism and, thus, of the supreme authority of Congress, republicans tended to reject institutional arrangements that allowed other branches of power to interfere with the decisions of the legislature. More specifically, they challenged all those proposals that allowed the executive or the judiciary to obstruct the decisions of the majority. Instead of a system of checks and balances, republicans favored a system of strict separation of powers where no power had the right to interfere with the actions of the others. As Maurice Vile explained in his study on the first constitutional discussions in the United States: ‘they [the radicals] all adhered to the doctrine of the separation of powers, and they all rejected, to a greater or a lesser degree, the concept of checks and balances.’\textsuperscript{35}

In coherence with those principles, republicans advocated the expansion of certain specific rights, namely, those that appeared as a precondition to the government of the majorities. Remarkably, as an expression of their defense of self-governing communities, republicans were frequently behind the demands for more political rights. The fight for expanding the list of ‘citizens’, in fact, defined political radicalism since its origins.

In addition, republicans were also concerned with ensuring the people’s subsistence and independence, which were seen as crucial preconditions for having a self-governing community. Some radicals argued against large-scale manufacturing and wage labor, assuming that it would foster the dependency of workers. They believed that ‘the dependency of workers under industrial capitalism’ would ‘deprive[] workers of the independence of mind and judgement necessary to meaningful participation in self-government.’\textsuperscript{36} Similarly, many of them defended a substantive revision of the status quo, proposing, for example, a far-reaching redistribution of land. Initiatives of the kind may be found, for example, in Thomas Paine or Thomas Jefferson’s defense of ‘agrarian republicanism’, but also in those of many early constitutional thinkers, also linked to republicanism, all around Latin America.\textsuperscript{37} This is why republicanism can be considered the main theoretical antecedent behind the present growth of (what we call) social rights.

In the next and final section of this chapter, I shall examine how libertarians and liberals have dealt with social rights. In particular, I shall explore what their ideas about the incorporation of social rights into the constitution were. This examination will allow us to have a better picture of the differences that exist among all these theories, regarding what a just constitution should look like.

(p. 347) 2. Social Rights

There is a sharp contrast between the level of disagreements that we find in theoretical discussions about social rights, and the present, daily life of social rights.

In actual practice, social rights have already been included in a majority of constitutions, and at the same time there has been an enormous growth and development of judicial activism in the area.\(^38\)

As we know, social rights were first incorporated into a constitution in Weimar, 1919, but even earlier in Mexico, 1917.\(^39\) The tendency towards the adoption of social rights was strongly reinvigorated after the Great Depression and the Second World War, which both strengthened the demand for a more active state. In the United States, Franklin Roosevelt promoted the adoption of a ‘Second Bill of Rights’ as a means to ensure ‘the realization of freedom from want’—which, in Roosevelt’s view, meant ‘economic understanding which will secure to every nation everywhere a healthy peacetime life for its inhabitants’.\(^40\) Meanwhile, in Europe, and soon after the war, Germany and Italy decided to include social clauses in their constitutions. During the 1970s, and in a second wave of democratization, Greece, Portugal, and Spain also incorporated social guarantees in their constitutions.

European constitutions have opted for these rights in different ways. The Portuguese Constitution, for example, is one of the most detailed, distinguishing between different categories of people in need, including the young, the elderly, the disabled, workers, and the unemployed. The constitutions of France, Italy, the Netherlands, Malta, or Spain are very expansive on the rights they secure, and the levels at which they should be granted. Meanwhile, the Constitution of Cyprus simply stipulates that individuals have a right to ‘decent existence and social security’, without going into further detail.\(^41\)

In spite of all these practical developments, different theories of justice continue to present substantial disagreements regarding what the status of social rights should be; how these rights compare with first-generation rights (such as freedom of expression or the right of due process); whether they should be incorporated or not into constitutions; and whether and how these rights should be enforced.

In the previous section, for example, we examined the republican alternative approach, and recognized it as an important antecedent in the development of constitutional social rights—republicans, we said, were always supportive of the writing of more ‘social’ constitutions. However, other theories of justice tend to assume strongly different views on the topic. Libertarians, for instance, adopt a very critical view regarding social rights. For the philosopher Robert Nozick, the problem with social rights is that they ‘treat objects as if they appeared from nowhere, out of nothing’, ignoring thus the existence of property rights.\(^42\) Many legal scholars related to libertarian theory do not see reasons to commit a constitution to those kinds of provisions. For instance, in the United States, Judge Richard Posner has claimed that ‘the Constitution is a charter of negative liberties: it tells the state to let people alone; it does not require the federal government or the state to provide services, even so elementary a service as maintaining law and order.’\(^43\) Similarly, Judge Scalia has said that ‘it is impossible to say that our constitution traditions mandate the legal imposition of even so basic a precept of distributive justice as providing food to the destitute’;\(^44\) and Judge Bork strongly rejected the possibility of ‘finding’ welfare rights in the (US) Constitution.\(^45\)

For the liberal-procedural (and even for the liberal egalitarian) tradition, the issue of social rights seems more difficult to tackle. Rawls’s approach to the topic—particularly as it was developed in his book Political Liberalism—may be illustrative of the difficulties found by liberalism in this respect. In A Theory of Justice, the question about social rights and the constitution was still not fully developed, although some of his views on this issue had already generated some controversy. Thus, for example, the legal philosopher Jeremy Waldron criticized the ‘original position’ that was presented and defended in the book, for not being able to accommodate a ‘social minimum’. For Waldron, it was clear that ‘an economic system without a social minimum is not a system that could possibly be agreed on in an original position: the strains of commitment rule it out as a possible subject for agreement.’

In Political Liberalism—Rawls's second important book—the question of social rights was examined in more detail. In this book, Rawls concedes that a social minimum should be constitutionalized. However, and perhaps surprisingly, he also states that the constitution should deal differently with issues related to basic freedoms, and those related to social and economic questions. Rawls explicitly claims that the constitution has to provide constitutional protection to the basic freedoms, while denying it to the principles that govern social and economic inequalities, that is to say, to the difference principle and the principle of fair equality of opportunity. Rawls lists four reasons for justifying such a different treatment. The reasons are (1) that ‘the two kinds of principles specify different roles for the basic structure’; (2) that it is ‘more urgent to settle the essentials dealing with the basic freedoms’; (3) that it is ‘far easier to tell whether those essentials are realized’; and (4v) that it is ‘much easier to gain agreement about what the basic rights and liberties should be’.

None of these reasons seems, in principle, particularly attractive. In fact, all his claims may be true (it may actually be ‘more urgent to settle the essentials dealing with the basic freedoms’; it may also be easier to ‘tell whether those essentials are realized’ or ‘gain agreement about what the basic rights and liberties should be’), but even in that case it would not be clear why those facts would support denying constitutional protection to the principles related to social and economic inequalities altogether. As Jeremy Waldron has put it, ‘Rawls's theory is certainly not hostile to the idea of welfare provision’, but principles requiring the constitutionalization of social rights ‘do not feature among Rawls's … principles of justice as fairness—the principles that constitute his conception of justice.’

In sum, an analysis of how different theories of justice deal with the issue of social rights can be particularly helpful for recognizing their different understanding about what it means to have a just constitution.

Bibliography

James Buchanan, The Economics of Politics (1978)

Ronald Dworkin, Is Democracy Possible Here? (2008)

Cécile Fabre, Social Rights Under the Constitution (2000)

Varun Gauri and Daniel M. Brinks (eds), Courting Social Justice (2008)

Jürgen Habermas, Between Facts and Norms: Contributions to a Discourse Theory on Law and Democracy (1996)

John Rawls, A Theory of Justice (1971)

John Rawls, Political Liberalism (1993)

Maurice Vile, Constitutionalism and the Separation of Powers (1967)
Notes:

(2) Ibid 221.

(4) Rawls (n 1), 221.

(5) Ibid.

(6) Ibid 222.

(7) Ibid 222–3.

(8) Ibid 224.

(9) Ibid 225. In effect, the principle of equal liberty, which implies the notion ‘one elector one vote’, requires that ‘each vote has approximately the same weight in determining the outcome of elections’ (ibid 223). See further Chapter 6 on constitutionalism and impoverishment and Chapter 50 on economic rights.

(10) John Rawls, ‘The Domain of the Political and Overlapping Consensus’ in Rawls, Collected Papers (n 3), 481. In this way, the political conception of justice comes to provide a ‘reasonable framework of principles and value for resolving questions’ concerning the constitutional essentials. For that reason, diverse and opposite comprehensive doctrines are able to endorse the political conception, even though ‘it may have little specific to say about innumerable economic and social uses that legislative bodies must regularly consider’ (ibid).

(13) John Rawls, ‘The Idea of Public Reason Revisited’ in Rawls, Collected Papers (n 3), 480. Rawls’s rejection of the picture of a society dominated and organized by a comprehensive view was always present in the background of his reasoning and writings, but became almost an obsession in his later work, and particularly so since his Political Liberalism (1993). He himself clarified this point in one of the few interviews he conceded in those years. In his words:

I’m concerned about the survival, historically, of constitutional democracy. I live in a country where 95 or 90 percent of the people profess to be religious, and maybe they are religious, though my experience of religion suggests that very few people are actually religious in more than a conventional sense. Still, religious faith is an important aspect of American culture and a fact of American political life. So the question is: in a constitutional democracy, how can religious and secular doctrines of all kinds get on together and cooperate in running a reasonably just and effective government? What assumptions would you have to make about religious and secular doctrines, and the political sphere, for these to work together?

(15) Because of this, many liberals began to defend the idea that the public life of the community should be the simple and spontaneous result of what was agreed upon by its members by means of formal or informal contracts that they would celebrate amongst themselves.

(17) The neutrality imposed on the state was entrenched in the US Constitution’s First Amendment. It establishes that the Congress cannot dictate any law instituting a particular religion or prohibiting the free exercise of any particular religion. Although many liberals had initially resisted the incorporation of these types of amendments because they thought the state should not assume powers not directly delegated to it, the consecration of this guarantee began to symbolize the liberal commitment to the ideal of neutrality. On state neutrality more generally, see Chapter 15. On freedom of religion, see Chapter 43.

(18) In his words:

Believing with you that religion is a matter which lies solely between man and his God, that he owes account to none other for his faith or his worship, that the legislative powers of government reach actions only, and not opinions, I contemplate with sovereign reverence that act of the whole American people which declared that their legislature should ‘make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof’, therefore building a wall of separation between church and State. Adhering to its expression of the supreme will of the nation in behalf of the rights of conscience, I shall see with sincere satisfaction the progress of those sentiments which tend to restore to man all his natural rights, convinced he has no natural right in opposition to his social duties.

(19) In effect, the liberals’ defense of religious neutrality implied a broader claim, one against any kind of state interventions against individuals’ personal convictions. Individuals, they maintained, had to enjoy their ‘privacy’, a ‘space’ free from public interference. The ‘private’ sphere appeared, therefore, as a sacred and intangible area where each individual was the absolute sovereign. The idea was, then, to ensure the distinction and separation between this ‘private’ sphere, and the ‘public’ one: Charles E. Larmore, Patterns of Moral Complexity (1987), 198; Michael Walzer, ‘Liberalism and the Art of Separation’ (1984) 12 Political Theory 315. See further Chapter 14 on the public/private divide and Chapter 46 on privacy.

(21) In the same text, The Federalist Papers, no 51, Madison described the motivational basis of the whole system, which is also telling with regard to the liberal view. He wrote:

Ambition must be made to counteract ambition. The interest of the man must be connected with the constitutional rights of the place. It may be a reflection on human nature, that such devices should be necessary to control the abuses of government. But what is government itself, but the greatest of all reflections on human nature? If men were angels, no government would be necessary. If angels were to govern men, neither external nor internal controls on government would be necessary. In framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: you must first enable the government to control the governed; and in the next place oblige it to control itself.

(22) John Ely, Democracy and Distrust (1980). In effect, at the level of constitutional law, many have identified the US Constitution with such a procedural position. This was, eg, how the legal scholar John Ely approached the US Constitution. For Ely, there are no substantive values to be ‘discovered within the four corners of the document’. Rather, it is the task of each generation to fill that space with new contents (ibid). The idea is then not to focus on whether this or that substantive value is unusually important or fundamental, but rather on whether the opportunity to participate either in the political process by which values are appropriately identified and accommodated, or in the accommodation those processes have reached, has been unduly constricted (ibid 77).

Wagner (eds), Public Choice and Constitutional Economics (1988), 75.

(30) Ely (n 22), ch 3; Habermas (n 16), 261–86.

(31) As James Madison put it, in The Federalist Papers, no 55, ‘all very numerous assemblies, of whatever character composed, passion never fails to wrest the sceptre from reason. Had every Athenian citizen been a Socrates, every Athenian assembly would still have been a mob.’ These assumptions, eg, moved the Founding Fathers of the US Constitution to regard representative democracy not as a ‘necessary evil’ but rather as a first, desirable option. They also explain why they assumed that ‘the public voice, pronounced by the representatives of the people, will be more consonant to the public good than if pronounced by the people themselves, convened for the purpose’ (The Federalist Papers, no 10).

(34) Thomas Paine, Pennsylvania Packet, December 5, 1778. In Latin America, the radical liberal Ponciano Arriaga argued that ‘legislation becomes wiser when the legislative assembly is more numerous’. ‘It is not true’, he asserted, contradicting the judgments of his opponents, that when we have more deputies we find less conscience and less patriotism among the elected. These difficulties we will have even if we restrict the numbers. However, experience teaches that the more dispersed and fragmented is the authority, the more public spirit and respect for the democratic institutions we find. ... What happens is that many are still horrified with the people. ... If we increase the number [of deputies] Congress will be filled by new and humbler men, who won’t believe they are wise. Perhaps, then, everything will be better, because we will find more faith and stronger commitments [among the representatives].

Following the same line of thought, Ignacio Ramírez criticized the creation of small legislative bodies, arguing that they would be more easily corrupted: Francisco Zarco, Historia del Congreso Constitucional de 1857 (1957). The Ecuadorian Juan Montalvo also believed that ‘great social ideas’ required ‘the approval of a numerous and august body’: Arturo Andrés Raigo, El pensamiento social de Montalvo (1984), 231–2.

(35) Maurice Vile, Constitutionalism and the Separation of Powers (1967), 133. The system of ‘strict’ separation seemed to have many virtues when compared to other alternatives. First, it was based on a mechanism that was clear, simple, and easy to understand. Through its implementation, everyone would know what branch of power was doing what. There would be no confusions. Secondly, the system of ‘strict’ separation helped to prevent an undesirable scenario: through its functioning, none of the different branches of power would feel the temptation to subtly begin to replace the others. In other words, when the institutional system allowed one of the branches to interfere with the actions of the others, then, it suddenly ‘opened the door’ to unacceptable encroachments. Each power would use each possible situation for taking the place of the others. Clearly, for people who assumed, as did republicans, that most public officers tended to behave selfishly, this possibility was obviously threatening. Thirdly, the system made clear that, in order to check the government, what was necessary was to ensure ‘exogenous’ or ‘popular’ controls. Finally, and most importantly, the system of ‘strict’ separation fenced the Congress against the intrusive actions of counter-majoritarian institutions: Alexander Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch (1962). Particularly, it helped to strengthen the powers of the congress vis-à-vis a tradition of strong executives, namely, of strong royal governors. In the end, the republicans’ defense of the system of ‘strict’ separation was, above all, a way of preserving the radical character of the republican government. See also Chapter 40.
(36) Sandel, Democracy's Discontent (n 14), 326.

(39) In Latin America, most constitutions followed the early Mexican example, and promptly began to grant long list of social rights in their constitutions. This is what happened in Brazil, with the 1937 Constitution; in Bolivia, 1938; Cuba, 1940; Ecuador, 1945; Argentina, 1949; and Costa Rica, also in 1949. This strong wave of social constitutionalism was continued and deepened at the end of the century, with a new series of constitutional reforms (ie in Bolivia and Ecuador, 2001), which strengthened these constitutions’ commitment to social, economic, and cultural rights.

(40) Cass Sunstein, The Second Bill of Rights (2004), 2. However, the US Constitution has finally not incorporated social rights into its text.

(41) Gráinne de Búrca and Bruno de Witte, Social Rights in Europe (2005).

(44) Ibid 24.

(46) Jeremy Waldron, ‘John Rawls and the Social Minimum’ in Jeremy Waldron (ed), Liberal Rights (1993), 267. Soon after the apparition of A Theory of Justice, Norman Daniels published an important critique of Rawls’s book, based on the types of inequalities that were there justified. For Daniels, this particular outcome was inconsistent with the very principles that were maintained in the book. More recently, Gerald Cohen has also presented a powerful criticism of the book, with a similar structure. For Cohen, A Theory of Justice tolerated inequalities that it was not supposed to tolerate, given the very principles that were defended in the book. See Norman Daniels, ‘Equal Liberty and Unequal Worth of Liberty’ in Norman Daniels (ed), Reading Rawls: Critical Studies on Rawls’ A Theory of Justice (1975); Gerald Cohen, Rescuing Justice and Equality (2008).

(47) Rawls, Political Liberalism (n 13), 230.

Roberto Gargarella
Roberto Gargarella is Professor of Constitutional Theory, CONICET/CMI, Argentina
The idea that the state possesses and exercises a supreme and absolute power is central to constitutional law. It is almost impossible for anyone writing in the field to avoid discussing it, even if in some cases the discussion leads to denying that it is a meaningful concept. This article discusses the external and internal sovereignty of the state and sovereignty in the state. It argues that the question whether the theory of sovereignty is valid must be answered in the affirmative for two different reasons, both connected to fundamental conceptions of constitutional theory. First, we can see the task of constitutional theory as a general description of positive constitutional law. Constitutional theory also describes the law through an analysis of legal discourse and it is an empirical fact that actors use the language of sovereignty.

Keywords: state sovereignty, constitutional law, constitutional theory, supreme power, absolute power

I. Sovereignty of the State 354
   1. Internal Sovereignty of the State 354
   2. External Sovereignty 359
      (a) External Sovereignty in Classical International Law 359
      (b) External Sovereignty in Contemporary International Law 361

II. Sovereignty in the State 362
   1. The Existence of a Sovereign 362
   2. The Holder of Sovereignty in the State 365

III. Conclusion 368

The idea that the state possesses and exercises a supreme and absolute power is central to constitutional law. It is almost impossible for anyone writing in the field to avoid discussing it, even if in some cases the discussion leads to denying that it is a meaningful concept. This is because theories of sovereignty have been a central part of constitutional discourse at least since Bodin defined it as 'the absolute and perpetual power of a commonwealth ... that is the highest power of command'. Several constitutions expressly refer to theories of sovereignty, proclaiming for instance that the Republic of X is a sovereign state, or that sovereignty belongs to the people, or that the state will accept limitations of its sovereignty in order to protect peace. Even when the word is not to be found in the constitutional document, the concept is nevertheless used or some of the ideas it conveys are used by courts or scholars to justify legal rules and legal decisions. On the other hand, constitutional law itself has sometimes been defined as the set of rules organizing the state and regulating the powers of its organs. Obviously, this calls for a definition of the state and one of the key elements of such a definition has been for centuries precisely that the state is sovereign. Sovereignty has traditionally (p. 351) been considered an essential and distinctive characteristic of the state. Max Weber's famous definition of the state as 'an entity which claims a monopoly on the legitimate use of violence’ has been shown to be based ultimately on the concept of sovereignty\(^5\) and on the fact that an entity deprived of sovereignty could not qualify as a state.\(^6\)
Sovereignty

The concept has also played a central role for general jurisprudence, for instance in the following sentences: ‘by some definitions, legal positivism is the view that legal rules are rules willed by a sovereign’; ‘international law is the law produced by agreements between sovereigns and whose main addressees are sovereign states’; ‘because public law is a system of rules regulating the relations between the State and its citizens it is defined a sphere of heteronomy, since these rules can be forced unilaterally by the sovereign State on citizens, in contrast with private law, which is viewed as a sphere of autonomy left by the sovereign to agreements between private subjects’.

However, none of these propositions has been universally accepted. Scholars disagree about every aspect of the theories of sovereignty: whether they were first devised with the creation of the modern state after the end of the Middle Ages or have medieval origins; whether every state is sovereign or one can conceive of a non sovereign state; whether sovereignty is indivisible; whether there is a sovereign in every state; whether in the contemporary world sovereignty is compatible with the fact that states are subject to international law, with the idea of the Rechtsstaat, the rule of law, or with fundamental rights. At least some of these disagreements reflect different ideological preferences. Others result from conceptual confusion and can be clarified. But first, two remarks are in order.

In the first place, many of the writings on sovereignty are ideologically laden in very diverse ways. They do not focus on the question of whether states are actually sovereign and what it means or whether there is a sovereign in every state and who that sovereign is in a particular state, but rather whether it is a good or a bad thing that states are or were sovereign at some period in history. Hobbes has argued that a sovereign authority is a necessary guarantor of peace and security within a society, but liberals have claimed that on the contrary an unchecked power is dangerous and asked ‘whether we should not strive towards institutional control of the rulers by balancing their powers against other powers’.\(^7\) The Westphalian system of international relations has been praised for bringing peace through equilibrium between sovereign states, while critics argue that peace can only result from the primacy of international law, which is incompatible with the sovereignty of national states.\(^8\) In Europe, scholars and politicians are deeply divided on the merits of more integration and the theory of sovereignty plays an important part in the discussion: naturally, those who are in favor of strong nation-states claim that the states should retain their sovereignty; but this leaves several roads open to the partisans of European integration. They can argue either that the European Union leaves the nation state’s sovereignty intact or conversely that the states should abandon their sovereignty (or that they have already lost it) in favor of the European Union, which would then become a super-state. They can also maintain that we can imagine a world without sovereignty altogether because, as Neil MacCormick famously wrote, sovereignty is not like \(p. 352\) property ‘which can be given up only when another person gains it’, but ‘more like virginity, something that can be lost by one without another’s gaining it’,\(^9\) and whose loss ‘in apt circumstances can even be a matter for celebration’.\(^10\) Liberals fear that theories of sovereignty can be used to justify authoritarianism\(^11\) but democrats, even if they are committed to liberty, define democracy as the sovereignty of the people.\(^12\)

Secondly, the word ‘sovereign’ is often used to denote the character of a state that is politically or economically truly independent as in the sentence ‘few states in the world are large enough to be really sovereign’. In this sense, sovereignty is an empirical character and, provided we agree on the size of the territory or the army or the GNP that are required to be called sovereign, we can easily find which states are really sovereign. But in constitutional law we are dealing not with facts but with legal concepts. We may eventually be able to draw a legal classification of states, such that some states will not be qualified as sovereign, for example member states in a federal system, but this qualification will never depend on factual elements such as size or military might. Indeed, in the traditional conception of the state, be that of constitutional law or international law, Monaco is as much a sovereign state as France or the United States and the Charter of the United Nations speaks of the ‘sovereign equality of all its members’.\(^13\)

The question thus is only whether it is a valid concept, that is, whether it may help us to perform a meaningful analysis of constitutional law. But we can ask that question in two different ways, because ‘sovereignty’ can be used at two different levels. On the one hand, lawmakers or courts use it in the language of positive law and scholars in the language of legal theory when they talk about the state or about constitutional law. In the latter case it is a metaconcept: These two concepts are mutually independent. For instance, some scholars may argue that the state is not really sovereign or that one should get rid of the concept of sovereignty, because the state is subject to international law or because they find it to be incompatible with the rule of law. But these same scholars do not deny that constitutional documents, lawmakers, or courts use not only the word ‘sovereignty’, but also arguments drawn from the theory of sovereignty. This does not falsify their own theories. The two concepts belong not only to different levels but also to different kinds of discourse. The language of positive law is prescriptive not only in the sense that it is made of commands to perform certain actions, but also that it mandates certain modes of justification, which will be considered valid independently of their truth value. For instance, it may be that an argument drawn from a religious or a moral doctrine or from the theory that a collective will exists is a valid argument for some legal systems. Thus, the same scholar could assert that states are not really sovereign because they are subject to international law or that none of the political branches of government possess an absolute and unlimited power and at the same time describe the positive law of the country and write, without contradicting herself, that the constitutional rules or the doctrine of the courts are based on the principle of national sovereignty. Alternatively, we could find that, in some legal systems, no mention is ever made of sovereignty, but that the state can nevertheless be usefully described as sovereign.

Ideally, we should conduct two separate inquiries. However, the task is complicated by the fact that at both levels, scholars as well as legal actors use the word ‘sovereignty’ with different meanings, so that it refers to multiple concepts.

We should therefore distinguish between these concepts, starting from an analysis by the most important French constitutional scholar of the past century, Raymond Carré de Malberg, who identified in the French language three meanings of the word sovereignty and therefore three concepts of sovereignty:

In the original sense, the word ‘sovereignty’ refers to the supreme character of the State's power. In a second sense, it refers to the whole range of the powers included in the State's authority and it is therefore synonymous with that authority. Thirdly, it is used to characterize the position occupied within the State by the highest organ of the State's authority and in that sense, sovereignty is the same thing as the power of that organ.14

Carré de Malberg stresses that the French language is poor in that it contains only one word for the three concepts of sovereignty. The same could be said of English. However, the German language has three words, one for each of these senses. Souveranität corresponds to sovereignty in the first sense, that is, the supreme character of the state on the international as well as on the domestic level. Staatsgewalt is the power of the state in the second sense. Herrschaft is the power of domination by an organ. Carré de Malberg believed that these distinctions could help us to discover the ‘true nature’ of sovereignty.15 Such a belief may be naive, but the distinction is nevertheless useful to clarify a few traditional puzzling questions.

One of these is whether it is possible to divide sovereignty. On the basis of Carré de Malberg's distinction, it is easy to see that sovereignty in the third sense, the quality of the highest organ of the state, is indeed indivisible, because, as soon as one divides it between several organs, none is the highest.16 On the other hand, if sovereignty in the second sense is the range of powers that can be exercised by the state, it is perfectly divisible. It is even possible to divide them by their subject matter (the power to wage war, to control a currency, to render justice etc) as Pufendorf did with the partes potentialia,17 or by the type of legal acts that are necessary to exercise them (like legislation, execution, and adjudication). Separation of powers is precisely a division of sovereignty in this sense.

In the same way, these distinctions help us to understand why some sentences that use the concept of sovereignty may seem to be incompatible or contradictory but are simultaneously true. Thus, at the time of Carré de Malberg, during the French Third Republic, it was possible to answer the question ‘who is the sovereign’, by any one of three sentences: ‘the French state is the sovereign’, ‘the French Parliament is the sovereign’, and ‘legislation is a sovereign power’. In the first sentence, sovereignty refers to the supreme character of the state's power, which enables it to act on the international level and interfere with other sovereigns, or to dominate the Church or any other institution. In the second sentence, sovereignty is a quality of an organ of the state, and in the third sentence it is one of the powers that the state may exercise.

Carré de Malberg's distinction also helps to clarify an ongoing debate about the origin of the modern concept of sovereignty. Scholars who follow a long tradition attribute the theory of sovereignty to Jean Bodin and... consider that sovereign of the state dates from the end of the religious wars and the birth of the absolute monarchy. But others argue that the concept of sovereignty is more ancient and can be traced to the Middle Ages. However, while it is true that the idea of a supreme power existed and even that some authors found in the people the ultimate justification for the existence of such a supreme power, it is only in the seventeenth century that sovereignty was thought to include an unlimited range of powers and the capacity to legislate on every possible aspect of human life. Following Carré de Malberg's method, we can examine at this point whether the three concepts are still necessary, at the two levels that we have distinguished, that is, both for scholars and for legal actors.

But before turning to this task, another remark seems to be in order. Carré de Malberg's distinction does not give sufficient account of some sentences that we find in constitutional documents as well as in the discourse of state authorities. Take for example, ‘the sovereign is the people’ or ‘sovereignty belongs to the people’. Such a sentence obviously does not mean that the French people is the state and effectively acts on an international level, or that it exercises a power of domination and certainly not that the people is a range of powers. In reality, they are used to justify other sentences: for example, in French legal discourse, ‘sovereignty belongs to the people’ was used during the Third Republic to justify ‘Parliament is sovereign’ or ‘the law is sovereign’. It meant that Parliament exercised a sovereignty that was not its own, but that belonged to the people and was exercised in the name of the people, or that the law expressed the will of the sovereign people. In this context, when imputed to the people; the word ‘sovereignty’ is thus used in a fourth sense: it refers to the quality of a being in whose name sovereignty in the first three senses is exercised. The doctrine of sovereignty in this fourth sense is a principle of imputation. Depending on the type of justification that is necessary in a given system, the entity that is being called the sovereign in this fourth sense can be the people, the king, the nation, or even the state itself, as in the German legal doctrine of the nineteenth century. We can see that while sovereignty in the first and second sense are characters of the state, in the third and the fourth sense it is a character of some entity within the state.

I. Sovereignty of the State

When we say that the state is sovereign, we mean two things. First, that the state has the absolute power to make decisions on every aspect of human life, and, secondly, that it is independent of every other external power.

1. Internal Sovereignty of the State

From the beginning, the claim that the state is sovereign had two aspects: first that the state possesses and exercises a power that is its own, that it has not been empowered to exercise; secondly, that this power is unlimited. We should distinguish between these two aspects, because it is conceivable that some superior authority creates another and entrusts it with unlimited power, just as it is conceivable that some authority has not been created by another but is nevertheless limited by law. For instance, we know of constitutions which give parliaments unlimited and unchecked power, because under these constitutions there is no judicial review of legislation and we know of constitutionally created courts that put limits to the constituent power, although the constituent power has been created by another power, still superior.

However, these two aspects are closely linked within the framework of the theory that law is a product of the will. This theory does not necessarily deny the existence of natural law, but stresses that only positive law is legally binding. This fundamental idea has two consequences. The first is the idea of the hierarchy of norms, and the second is the absence of any substantial limits to the power of the state.

Regarding the hierarchy of norms, obviously every sentence that looks like a command is not law. Only those that have been issued by some authority empowered to produce commands are law. But this empowering authority similarly has to be empowered by a still higher authority, and so on until we reach the ultimate level above which we cannot find a higher human authority. This highest authority has not been empowered by any legal rule, unlike all other authorities. Its powers are suo jure. They derive from its own nature.

On the other hand, since that authority is the ultimate lawmaker, it is necessarily unbound, legibus solutus. However, being unbound can have two different meanings. First, it can mean that the state is also unlimited in the functions that it can exercise and the fields that it can regulate. In the terms of German scholars, the state has a Kompetenz-Kompetenz, the competency to determine its own competency. But, secondly, being unbound can also mean having the power to decide with complete discretion, but within a limited field and on a limited number of matters. The word ‘sovereign’ is used to convey both meanings. In the second sense, when one speaks for example in French of a ‘sovereign court’ or one says that a professor is sovereign when she grades her students, what that means is that the court’s or the professor’s decisions cannot be appealed. It is also in that sense that in a federal system member states are said to be sovereign or in the United States that Native American tribes are sovereign.23

This double meaning helps to explain the long debate in federal systems on the doctrine of dual sovereignty. If sovereignty means the unlimited capacity to determine one’s own competency and to exercise an unlimited power in every possible field, then dual sovereignty is logically and practically impossible, since the federal state could take away the powers of the member states and the member states could take away the powers of the federal state. But if it means simply that each entity exercises discretionary power within its own jurisdiction, or that the Staatsgewalt is divided between the federal state and the member states, then it is both possible and actual.

Thus, if we take the words ‘internal sovereignty’ in the strict sense, obviously only the state as a whole, and in a federal system only the federal state, has the Kompetenz-Kompetenz and can be said to be sovereign.

(p. 356) The theory of sovereignty was precisely devised after the religious wars in order to justify the claim that the state could decide on every subject matter, especially religious matters. This may be the reason why in the seventeenth century jurists chose a particular way of listing the state’s powers. These powers or functions of the state, also called ‘attributes of sovereignty’, ‘marks of sovereignty’, or ‘partes potentiales’ did not correspond to the modern functions or powers of government, legislation, execution, and adjudication. Nor were they a list of possible subject matter on which the state could act. Rather, they were a bizarre combination of the two typologies, the former formal, and the latter substantial. The list starts with the power of making laws. The first attribute of the sovereign prince therefore is the power to make law binding on all his subjects in general and on each in particular. But, to avoid any ambiguity, one must add that he does so without the consent of any superior, equal, or inferior being necessary. The other attributes include the powers to make war, to hear appeals from all courts, and to tax subjects, among others. Similarly, Pufendorf later distinguishes between the legislative power, the vindicative power, the judiciary power, the power of war and peace, the right of appointing magistrates, the right of levying taxes, and the right of examining doctrines.24

Jean-Jacques Rousseau would later criticize the theory of the attributes of sovereignty, but Bodin himself had already noted the strangeness of the list: all the other attributes and rights of sovereignty are included in this power of making and unmaking law, so that strictly speaking this is the unique attribute of sovereign power. It includes all other rights of sovereignty.25 This is because all these other functions are being exercised either in the form of law or in a mode authorized by law. In any case, it is perfectly clear that there are no substantial limits to what the sovereign can do. For instance, his powers included religious matters. It was held in France that the Pope could not legislate for the French Church except with the consent and confirmation of the king, and that the king could exercise surveillance over religious orders and intervene in doctrinal matters.26

This is the reason why the typology of the state’s functions was radically changed in the eighteenth century, with the new doctrine of the separation of powers. Instead of putting formal and substantial functions in a single list, the Enlightenment distinguished two or three main functions, legislative, executive, and judiciary, defined only formally in their relation to the law. Since there is general acceptance of the idea that there are no limits to what the state can do, there is no need for a list of the substantial functions of the state. Moreover, it was difficult to reconcile this list with the idea that sovereignty is indivisible.27

(p. 357) The doctrine of the separation of powers, on the contrary, is perfectly compatible with it, because the three powers are not part of sovereignty. Only the legislative power is sovereign, as Kant, following Rousseau makes perfectly clear:

Every State contains three authorities within it, that is, the general united will consists of three persons (trias politica): the sovereign authority (sovereignty) in the person of the legislator; the executive authority in the person of the ruler (in conformity to law) and the judicial authority (to award to each what is his in accordance with the law in the person of the judge.28

Sovereignty in this sense obviously also includes the power to regulate private law. In pre-revolutionary France, private law was regulated by custom, but jurists stressed that custom only has binding force ‘by the sufferance and during the good pleasure of the sovereign prince, and so far as he is willing to authorize it’. Thus, according to this doctrine of sovereignty, the power of the state is in effect without substantial limits. In the words of the German jurist Georg Meyer: ‘a State must be in a condition to make whatsoever it chooses an object of its activity’.

At this point, one could argue that this is only a self-description of the system, and that, in spite of what some lawyers say, the state is not really sovereign in these senses or that it may have been sovereign in the past but that it now subject to substantive limitations, either because some of its traditional functions have been deregulated and left to private corporations or because it has become a Rechtsstaat and is subject to the constitution and an obligation to respect fundamental rights, and in the European Union because states have transferred a great number of important powers to European authorities.

The first idea can be rapidly dismissed: if the state has left some of its functions to private enterprise, it is not in order to comply with a legal obligation (at least not an obligation under domestic law) but as a matter of policy, a policy that can always be reversed. We have thus no limitation.

As to a limitation by the constitution and fundamental rights, the argument misses the fact that the constitution is not above the state but is a law made by the state itself. While it is true that the constitution creates and imposes limitations, these limitations only bind state authorities and the branches of government, but it does not bind the state as a whole, because it can always change its constitution. Amending the constitution or changing it altogether may be difficult or unpractical, depending on the required procedure, but it is not forbidden.

The strongest argument of those who claim that internal sovereignty has been lost by the state focuses on European integration. The states, so the argument goes, have transferred many of their traditional sovereign powers to the European Union in many very important fields and are now incapable of exercising them. The argument has two branches: on the one hand, that the state has lost the Staatsgewalt, because it has lost the power to make rules in every possible field; and on the other hand, that the hierarchy of norms has been modified as Acts of Parliament are no more supreme and even those powers that states may still exercise are now submitted to EU law.

As impressive as it may seem, the argument should nevertheless be examined at the two levels of legal language, that of positive law and that of legal scholarship. On the level of legal language, that of the constitutional texts and of the jurisprudence of the courts, we find that although, as we have seen, some constitutions mention that they accept ‘limitations of sovereignty’ several among them still proclaim the principle of ‘national sovereignty’. Because of these provisions, in several cases the treaties that organized the transference of powers to the European Union were referred before ratification to constitutional courts, in order to check whether the transference was compatible with the constitution, especially with the principle of national sovereignty. The case of the French Constitutional Council is particularly interesting. The Council used an ancient and important distinction in French public law between the essence and the exercise of sovereignty. It decided that a provision of a treaty would only be unconstitutional when it would bring about a transfer of the essence of sovereignty. For the Council, this can happen when some extremely important powers are transferred to a European authority, for example control of the currency, and when that authority is empowered to decide by a majority vote or by some procedure that could result in France being in a minority and constrained against its will. But even if the treaty is to be found incompatible with the constitution on this account, the constitution can still be amended in order to authorize the process of ratification. This has happened a few times, for example for the Maastricht Treaty or for the failed Constitutional Treaty of 2005. In that case, the principle of national sovereignty remained the same, because the text of Article 3 of the Constitution (‘National sovereignty shall vest in the people, who shall exercise it through their representatives and by means of referendum’) was not reformulated. This shows that in the language of the French Constitution and of the Council, the transfer of competences is not incompatible with the principle of national sovereignty but only with the ‘essential conditions of the exercise of national sovereignty’. The essence of sovereignty has never been lost, because the powers themselves have not been transferred and can always be recovered by renegotiation, by denunciation of the treaties, or a new constitutional amendment. It may be that the latter solution would be a violation of EU law, but that would not make it invalid from the point of view of French law. Similarly, the German Federal Constitutional Court has decided that the European Union was not a federal state (Bundesstaat), but only a union of states (Staatenbund), so that while states may exercise jointly some powers they still retain their sovereignty.
According to the second branch of the argument, some competences are exercised jointly by the states and the European Union. In those fields, in case of a conflict of norms, EU law prevails over domestic law. The prevalence of European Union law has been mandated both by the national constitutions and by EU law, that is, by the jurisprudence of the European Court of Justice and lately by the Lisbon Treaty. Constitutional courts have used comparable strategies to avoid abandoning national sovereignty. For example, the French courts had initially resisted the European Court of Justice by deciding that EU law may prevail over statutes but not over norms of a constitutional level. Later, after the Lisbon Treaty made EU law prevail over national law including the constitution, the Constitutional Council developed an argumentation in two stages.

First, the source of the obligation to apply EU law is to be found not in the treaties, but in the Constitution. Therefore, EU law prevails over the constitution to the extent that the constitution prescribes that EU law prevails over itself. It follows that the constitution could not, without contradiction, decide to submit to a European rule that would go against its own express provisions or the principles that shape the constitutional identity of France. Therefore, it has implicitly protected such provisions or principles and EU law cannot have primacy over them. Only the French constituent power could derogate those principles.

Thus, the state is still the master of its own competencies. It may decide not to exercise or to delegate the exercise of some of them, but ultimately the rules by which they are exercised remain under its control. Nevertheless, this point is hotly debated and some scholars who deny that the state is sovereign stress that it is bound by international law.

2. External Sovereignty

(a) External Sovereignty in Classical International Law

For the classical doctrine of sovereignty, international sovereignty was just another aspect of internal sovereignty. A state was sovereign if it was not subject to any other power, whether internal or external. Even before the national kings constituted themselves as sovereigns with absolute power over their subjects, they had claimed to be independent from the Pope and the Emperor. Being sovereign never meant to be unbound by treaties. On the contrary, being bound by treaties to which he had consented meant that the sovereign was only bound by his own will. The capacity to make treaties and be bound by them was thus viewed not as a limitation but as an expression of sovereignty—Bodin places it among the attributes of sovereignty, as part of the power of making war and peace.

This is the reason why the system of international relations that was established after the Peace of Westphalia in 1648 was an order between sovereign states. Several consequences follow: first, that only sovereign states have the power to enter into international relations and that entities that do not have that power, such as member states in a federal system, are not sovereign states; today, some international organizations can make treaties but on the basis of the treaty that created them. Secondly, that because they are all sovereign, all states are legally equal; equality of the states is still the dominant principle of contemporary international law as it has been proclaimed by the Charter of the United Nations. Thirdly, that states keep their internal sovereignty to the effect that they are free from an intervention by another state in their affairs and that their subjects are not the direct subjects of international law, but only of domestic law.

The question whether states keep their sovereignty although they are subject to international law is dependent on the position one takes on the issue of the relation between the domestic and the international legal systems. According to the dualist theory, the two systems are distinct and separate, so that the validity of the norms belonging to one system is not based on a norm belonging to the other and one norm or one action could be valid under one system and invalid under the other. According to the monist theory, domestic law and international law are not two distinct legal systems but form a unity. Most prominent among the authors who favor the monist theory is Hans Kelsen, who has argued that within this unity there are two sets of rules, the international legal order and the national legal order, which in his view is just another name for the state. In their mutual relation, international law prevails because ‘by coming into legal existence, the State is subjected to preexisting international law’. It is international law that determines and delimits not only the so-called ‘elements of the state’, its territorial, personal, and substantial spheres of validity in relation to other states, but also ‘the reason of validity of the national legal orders’, because ‘international law empowers the “fathers of the constitution” function as the first legislators of a State’. International law does not usually place substantial limits on the constituent power, but this is not at all impossible and there have been cases where treaties have mandated constitutional amendments.

Kelsen's monist theory of the relation between domestic and international law is open to a number of objections. Most of his arguments are based on a specific conception of validity that allows him to beg the question, for instance the idea that international law determines the sphere of validity of the state. We can imagine an Act of the British Parliament mandating driving on the left in France. Is this Act valid? If valid means 'in accordance with a higher rule', then, obviously, the Act is not valid according to international law, but it is definitely valid according to domestic law, because there is a constitutional rule that empowers the British Parliament to produce general rules without any substantial limit to that power. Thus, Kelsen's thesis holds only if we agree with him that one action cannot be simultaneously valid and not valid, but this is a premise that he fails to prove. On the contrary, is quite possible that an action is valid under the rules of one system and invalid under the rules of another. This is precisely what happens, not only between law and morality, but also between two national legal systems. Kelsen's only counter-argument is that international law and national law form not two, but just one system, which is precisely what he needs to demonstrate and is not justified in using as a starting point.

The monist theory falls under another objection, one derived from a different theory of validity, one that Kelsen has himself used in other parts of his work, and which is equated with formal validity: a valid norm is one that has been produced by a competent authority according to the prescribed procedure and has not been nullified. Whenever there is no way to nullify a norm because there is no judicial review, then the norm produced by a competent authority is valid. An Act of the British Parliament that cannot be nullified by a British court on the ground that it is contrary to a constitutional rule or an international rule is valid and remains valid, even if there were an international court that could nullify it on the ground that it contradicts an international rule.

Thus, external sovereignty is not affected by international law and the state is only bound by its own will. However, the relation between international law and domestic law in the contemporary world seems slightly different. Important changes have taken place both at the level of general international law and of regional, especially European, law.

(b) External Sovereignty in Contemporary International Law

First, scholars of international law have stressed that, after the horrors of the Second World War, states have agreed to relinquish part of their sovereignties as a means to protect peace. The most notable example of such renouncement is the UN Charter, which prohibits the use of force, once one of the main attributes of sovereignty and a monopoly of the state, except in a case of self-defense or for 'the common interest', that is, in accordance with the purpose of the organization. Moreover, the Security Council itself has received the right to use force against states.

Another important case is that of international criminal courts, such as the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia or the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, both created by the Security Council of the United Nations and the International Criminal Court in the Treaty of Rome in 1998. These courts have the power to try citizens against the will of their own states.

But the most significant development has taken place in Europe with the European Union and the European Convention on Human Rights. In both cases, states may be bound by decisions to which they have not consented. What makes the change particularly striking is that EU law or the European Convention can be applied not only against the will of the state, but by the state's own courts.

All these developments are obviously of the greatest political significance. We can doubt, however, if they are as meaningful from the legal point of view and whether they constitute a real challenge for the theory of the international sovereignty of the state. First, these arguments are formulated at a metalinguistic level. The language of the treaties themselves and that of the courts are very different. Several of the treaties invoke the principle of sovereignty. Besides, Article 1(2) of the UN Charter, the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties explicitly mentions the principles 'of sovereign equality and independence of all States, of non-interference in the domestic affairs of States.' We have seen how constitutional courts tend to safeguard the principle of national sovereignty by basing the supremacy of the law produced by international organizations not on the treaties but on the national constitutions and how they let the constituent power have the final word.
Sovereignty

On the other hand, it must be noted that, even if treaties have limited the exercise of their powers by the states, this is only because the states themselves have signed and ratified them, on the basis of their sovereignty. The existence of these limits does not prove a loss, but rather a manifestation of sovereignty. Moreover, the limits last only as long as the states consent and (p. 362) they can always denounce the treaties. True, denunciation is prohibited by the Vienna Convention, but the Vienna Convention only binds the states that have ratified it and one could easily argue that since the Convention could not possibly refer to itself but only to other treaties, a state could denounce the Vienna Convention. And, even if denunciation were considered a violation of international law, the act of denunciation could still be valid under domestic law.

II. Sovereignty in the State

1. The Existence of a Sovereign

This was Carré de Malberg’s third concept of sovereignty, the quality of the highest organ in the state. Early positivists needed this concept for their definition of law: a legal rule was defined as a ‘command laid down by a sovereign’ and judge-made law or custom were law in that they were tacit commands of the sovereign. The sovereign himself was defined as one whom the majority of society habitually obeys and who renders habitual obedience to no one. Moreover, they claimed that one such sovereign was to be found in every state.

H.L.A. Hart has famously criticized this definition of the sovereign on these two elements of the definition. About the habit of obedience, Hart stresses that from ‘the people habitually frequent the tavern on Saturday nights’, we cannot infer that they ought to do so. Why then, if they habitually obey one man, should we say that they are under an obligation to obey him and that this man has the ‘right’ to lay down rules? It is not even true that there is always such a habit: if the sovereign dies, obviously no one is in the habit of obeying his successor. In fact, says Hart—and Kelsen too—we need such concepts as obligation or empowerment in order to distinguish the power of the sovereign from raw power.

The definition of the sovereign by the habit of obedience is undoubtedly extremely weak and Hart and Kelsen are certainly right when they point out that without such concepts we cannot tell why the sovereign’s commands are valid rules. But they both seem to miss the crucial benefit of the theory of sovereignty. It is not a legal theory devised to answer the question of legitimacy of the supreme authority of the land, but it serves on the contrary to avoid that question altogether. While giving legitimacy to every authority in the state, it provides for the basis of validity of commands issued by subordinate officers. These officers cannot draw their power from their biological nature or their social prestige, but only from the fact that they have been empowered by the sovereign. It is this empowerment that justifies them to require obedience from the subjects. But what is the basis for the obligation to obey the sovereign? The answer is precisely this: because he is the sovereign. If one asks a further question, ‘Why is he the sovereign?’, the only possible answer is to refer to some political theory, the divine right of kings or the democratic theory. But these political theories are not necessary for the legal system or for the functioning of the state and the same sovereign could be equally justified by several competing theories. The legal questioning stops here.

In this respect, the function of the theory of sovereignty resembles closely the theory of the Grundnorm. It is not a starting but a final point to a series of questions about the validity of norms. If we understand that the theory performs such a function, the question we need to (p. 363) ask is not what makes the rules laid down by the sovereign valid, but simply whether it is true that in every state there is a sovereign organ, one who is not only habitually obeyed but who does not obey anyone or rather who is not subject to any legal limits.

This second element of Austin’s definition also comes under Hart’s critique. Since Austin had in mind the British Parliament, Hart points out that there are many societies where the supreme legislative power is limited by a constitution. He concedes that in some cases the legislature operating a special procedure may be able to remove those limitations and therefore ‘it is arguable that it may be identified with the sovereign incapable of legal limitations, which the theory requires’. But, he also stresses that there are other cases where the constitution can only be amended by a special body or where the restrictions are altogether outside the scope of any amending power and Hart sees this as a difficulty for the theory.
However, this critique is strange. If a special authority can freely amend the constitution, that authority is able not only to remove limitations on the legislature, but also to impose fresh ones or, as Kelsen clearly saw, to adopt rules that are formally constitutional and that may have any substantial content. That authority is not limited by any substantial rules and should be identified with the sovereign, just as in the case described by Hart of a legislature able to change the constitution.

It is true that it must follow some procedural rules, but these procedural rules are only constitutive rules. They do not limit the power of the amending body, but define that body as the constituent power and the rules they enact as constitutional amendments. If a group of men vote and adopt an amendment to the constitutional document, this group is not an amending authority unless its members have been appointed in a certain way, and the rule they enact is not a constitutional amendment unless discussed in a certain way and adopted with the required majority. That group having thus complete discretion as to the substance of the amendment can be defined as the sovereign.

One must keep in mind that the sovereign, whether a legislator or a constituent power, need not be composed of one single authority. The author of a decision in the legal sense is the authority, whether composed of an individual, a group, or several groups, to whom the decision is jointly imputed and this is the case when the decision cannot be adopted without the consent of any single component, which nevertheless could not have decided alone. Thus, the British Parliament, although composed of the King, Commons, and Lords, is the sole author of statutes. The same is true for the constituent power: it is rarely composed of a single authority. For example, the procedure requires several steps: first, the legislature must vote for a bill, then another assembly will vote and adopt the bill with a super-majority. In that case, the constituent power is the complex authority composed of the legislature and the special assembly.

The fact that certain provisions of the constitution may not be amended does not really change the picture. Article 89 of the French Constitution of 1958 prohibits changing ‘the republican form of government’.\(^{47}\) Similarly, Article 69(3) of the German Basic Law prohibits affecting the most fundamental principles.\(^ {48}\) However, it has been suggested that these (p. 364) prohibitions could be easily lifted in two steps.\(^ {49}\) First, one could amend Article 89 of the French Constitution. Such an amendment would not in itself be a change in the republican form of government. It might reveal an intention to change it, but the possibility would still be there that no change finally occurs. Thus, the amendment would not fall clearly under the prohibition. Then, once the provision had been removed, a second amendment would change the republican form of government.

On the other hand, such prohibitions have no consequences unless another body has the power to decide that the amendment is unconstitutional and void. When there is no constitutional court, constitutional amendments cannot be reviewed. When there is a constitutional court, it is not clear that they have the power to review amendments. But in case they do claim to exercise it, as in India,\(^{50}\) then we ought to examine whether these courts are an element of the constituent power. The answer depends on the theory of adjudication that is being used. If we think that adjudication is a mere application of a previous rule which the judge must discover but does not have the power to change, then the court cannot be considered to exercise discretion and consent to the amendment. But if we agree that the court cannot review amendments without interpreting and even creating the fundamental principles which the amending power must respect; that this process involves a very large margin of appreciation; and that the choices the court makes depend on the political, moral, or religious preferences of the judges, then we must analyze its role as one of consenting to constitutional amendments. The court then becomes a part of the constituent power, exactly as the House of Lords in the British Parliament of the eighteenth century. Sovereignty is not shared between the elements of the constituent power, but exercised jointly. That this is a joint exercise is more visible when the court strikes down a constitutional amendment. But it is no less real when it upholds it, exactly as the President of the United States as an element of the legislative power, both when he vetoes a law and when he consents to it.

The idea that sovereignty lies in the constituent power has repeatedly been used in Europe as an argument to justify judicial review of legislation against the theory that it is undemocratic. Some scholars have claimed that the constituent power, which, as a supreme authority, is the true representative of the sovereign people, can always overrule a decision of the court striking down a statute. When it does, it is an exercise of sovereignty. The same can be said when the constituent power does not amend the constitution in reaction to a decision by the court, because by this abstention it expresses tacit consent.\(^ {51}\)
Sovereignty

Even more strikingly, some courts have used the theory that the constituent power is sovereign as an argument to justify a refusal to review constitutional amendments. For example, the French Constitutional Council decided in 1992 that ‘the constituent power is sovereign; it has discretion to abrogate, modify or supplement any rule of constitutional rank in the form that it considers most appropriate.’ In Vedel’s words, ‘the constituent power being the supreme power in the State cannot be bound, even by itself’.

Thus, courts do acknowledge the existence of a body that exercises an absolute power in the sense not only that it is unlimited and that its rules are binding on everyone, but also that every rule and every legal decision is binding only because they have been derived from these rules or because their creation has been authorized by that body.

In some states, the power that is exercised by that supreme authority is its own. That was the case with the English Parliament or with the king in pre-revolutionary France. However, in the modern state, the sovereign authority, the organ of the state that renders habitual obedience to no one, exercises a power, legislative or constituent, which it does not claim to be its own but that of the ‘real sovereign’ whom it represents. This is the fourth function of the theories of sovereignty: justifying the actual exercise of power by the legislative or the constituent authorities by imputing their decisions to another being.

2. The Holder of Sovereignty in the State

One of the virtues of the hierarchy of norms is that it allows every norm-maker to contend that he is applying the will of another. That other is not necessarily a physical human being or a group of human beings. The French parliaments which resisted the king’s laws in the eighteenth century asserted that they were applying his real will, of which he was not aware, or that they represented the immortal body of the king whose will they expressed against the will that had only been expressed by mistake by the mortal king. Later the ‘Parlements’ pretended to represent the nation.

This episode shows the nature of the theory of representation that was used at the time, later confirmed by the French Revolution and still at work in contemporary constitutional law. Carré de Malberg has made clear that representation, according to this theory, is not a contract between two persons, one appointing the other as its representative and giving her a mandate to accomplish some action, then exercising some sort of control. This is due to the fact that the represented has no existence preceding that of the representative. It only exists because it is represented and it is represented only because the constitution-makers contend that they act in its name. Many modern constitutions designate an entity as the holder of a sovereignty that the government merely exercises. Thus, by pretending to have received a delegation of power, it is the representative that creates the represented.

We see here another use of the distinction between the essence and the exercise of sovereignty, solemnly proclaimed in the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen of 1789 in its Article 3, ‘the principle of all sovereignty resides essentially in the nation’. The theory has a double function, a negative function (the lawmaker is not the sovereign, but a mere representative) and a positive function (the rules he makes are binding because they express the will of the real sovereign). Article 6 of the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen asserts that ‘Law is the expression of the general will’. This sentence does not mean that in a society well ordained law should coincide with the general will, but that the justification of the law is that it is presumed to possess the inherent quality of expressing the general will. Thus, once the competent authority has made the law, no one may question it, but every citizen ought to obey it because he will then only obey the general will. In addition, when the law serves as a basis of every norm in the system, they all appear to be ultimately derived from the will of the sovereign. For instance, court decisions in Italy are rendered ‘in the name of the Italian people’.

But whose will is the general will? Who is the real sovereign, the holder of the essence of sovereignty? In the German Empire, the state itself was the sovereign, in whose name the various organs acted. Modern constitutions name either the people or the nation. How does one chose between them?

According to a common presentation, members of constitutional conventions derive the provisions they favor from their political ideologies. The actual provisions of the constitution therefore reflect the relative strength of political groups and express the beliefs of the majority. The most progressive democrats would favor sovereignty of the people, the more conservative sovereignty of the nation. This is because the people is viewed as a reality, a group of citizens living in a country, whereas the nation is an abstract entity made up not only of citizens but also of the long-term general interests that may transcend the interests of citizens. Scholars who accept these views assume that several practical consequences follow from each of the two doctrines.

Three consequences are supposed to follow from the principle that the people are sovereign. Since it exists in the real world, citizens will only delegate those powers that, for practical reasons, they could not exercise by themselves. They will also exercise by themselves those powers that they do not delegate. Thus, there will be some form of direct democracy, with a popular referendum. On the other hand, all members of the people have a right to participate in the exercise of sovereignty that is a right to vote, either in a referendum or to elect their representatives. Votes will be by universal suffrage. Thirdly, the representatives will carry an imperative mandate; voters will give them instructions and will have a right to recall them if the representatives have not acted according to those instructions.

The doctrine of national sovereignty is supposed to carry opposite consequences. The nation, being an abstract entity, cannot exercise sovereignty and must delegate it to representatives. The system will not be a democracy, but a representative government. Therefore, citizens have no personal right to vote. Participation in an election is a function that is entrusted to citizens by the nation, that is, by its representatives. That function need not be entrusted to all citizens, but only to those who are qualified or have an interest to exercise it well, either because they have received an education, or because they are wealthy, or because they are not dependent on other men. Finally, since voters are not the sovereign, representatives are not their delegates and they cannot be bound by an imperative mandate. The will expressed by the representatives cannot be compared to that of the sovereign, since the sovereign, being an abstraction, is incapable of having a will. The will expressed by the representatives is presumed to be the expression of the general will and this is an absolute presumption, which can never be rebutted.

This idea that provisions of a constitution are deduced more geometrico from a set of general principles is naive and flawed. It is easy to see from a few examples that national and popular sovereignty are not as strongly different as is usually assumed and that the choice between recognizing the nation or the people is not the consequence of ideological preferences but that they are ex post justifications for the distribution of powers.

We can see that some constitutions, for example the French Constitutions of 1793 and 1795, explicitly proclaim the principle of popular sovereignty, but nevertheless are very reluctant to introduce direct democracy and explicitly prohibit the imperative mandate. Individual members of the legislature are not representatives of the voters in their constituency, but the legislature as a whole represents the people and there is no possible recall.

(p. 367) On the other hand, all members of the people, unlike the nation, are not an abstract entity but a real being is also profoundly naive. In order for a group of men to be called ‘a people’, we need a rule to decide which individuals count as members of that people. Then, since all its members cannot possibly vote, there must be another rule to decide on the conditions (age, gender, mental capacity, residence ...) that have to be met by citizens in order to vote. The people and the citizens are no more real than the nation. They are a legal category produced by the constitution.

The reason why the sovereign was called ‘nation’ in some constitutions and ‘people’ in others lies in the structure of the legislative power. Thus, in the first French Constitution, in 1789–91, the legislative power was attributed jointly to an elected legislature and to the king, who could veto the bills adopted by the legislature. Since the power they exercised was not their own, the writers of the Constitution had no choice but to consider that they expressed the general will and were both representatives of the sovereign. The structure of the legislative power was that of a mixed government, where sovereignty is exercised jointly by the king and the people. With such a structure it was logically impossible to consider that the king is a representative of the people and exercises sovereignty with the people or that the people exercises his sovereignty, jointly with the king, yet is represented by him. The only solution was to declare that the sovereign is the nation, which is represented by the two elements of the legislative power. This solution ceased to be logically necessary when the republic was established and the executive had no veto power. Later constitutions could then declare either that sovereignty belongs to the people or use the words ‘nation’ and ‘people’ as synonyms.

By proclaiming that the people are the sovereign, constitutions assert their democratic legitimacy. A great number of constitutional documents include such proclamations. They do not serve a purely rhetorical purpose. Courts make abundant use of such provisions as important arguments. Thus, the French Constitution proclaims that ‘National sovereignty shall vest in the people, who shall exercise it through their representatives and by means of referendum’. This formulation relates to the distinction between the essence and the exercise of sovereignty. For the Council, the system is democratic because the people is not merely the holder of the essence of sovereignty, but also exercises it by itself. There are two ways for the people to exercise their sovereignty: through representatives and by referendum. Democracy is thus alternately indirect or direct. And the Constitutional Council justifies its refusal to review laws adopted by referendum by stating they are the ‘direct expression of national sovereignty’.

The need to refer to the people as a holder of sovereignty explains some of the difficulties in the relations between the European Union and the national legal systems. Neither the treaties nor the European Court mention a European people. Apart from the fact that it is hard to conceive of a democracy without a demos, the absence of a European people makes it impossible to present decisions made by the European organs as the expression of a general will. The only possible justification is that they express the general will of the national people. (p. 368) Maintaining that these decisions, even when they prevail over domestic law, including the constitution, prevail in virtue of the national constitution can do this.

III. Conclusion

The question whether the theory of sovereignty is valid must be answered in the affirmative for two different reasons, both connected to fundamental conceptions of constitutional theory.

First, we can see the task of constitutional theory as a general description of positive constitutional law. In that case, we find that an adequate description can be made, even in the contemporary world, using the various concepts of sovereignty: states do exist and they must still be defined with the help of these concepts; they are not legally bound by any external or internal rule, they have unlimited power to decide on the range of powers they intend to exercise; in every state, we find a supreme authority or group of authorities capable of producing the highest rules in the system, without being themselves subject to any rule and finally they produce these rules in the name of an entity supposed to be supreme and whose supremacy cannot be questioned.

But, these propositions can only be proved to be true by describing the actual behavior of some actors, especially national courts, and by checking whether they find that states are bound against their own will or that there is no supreme entity in whose name every power in the state is being exercised and how they justify their decisions. Constitutional theory then describes the law through an analysis of legal discourse and it is an empirical fact that actors use the language of sovereignty. We could even go as far as saying that, since in a system characterized by the hierarchy of norms, theories of sovereignty are, if not the only possible legal justifications for a number of decisions, certainly the most practical, then this type of discourse is the product of the system itself. And if sovereignty is a constitutive character of the state, then, it is not the law that is produced by the state, but the state that is produced by the law.

Bibliography

Guillaume Bacot, Carré de Malberg et l’origine de la distinction entre souveraineté du peuple et souveraineté nationale (1985)

Olivier Beaud, La puissance de l’Etat (1994)

Olivier Beaud, Théorie de la Fédération (2007)

Agostino Carrino (ed), Kelsen e il problema della sovranità (1990)

Hans Kelsen, Das Problem der Souveränität und die Theorie des Völkerrechts ([1920] 2nd edn 1928)

Paul Laband, Le droit public de l’Empire allemand (1900)

Helmut Quaritsch, ‘Souveränität: Entstehung und Entwicklung des Begriffs’ in Frankreich und Deutschland von 13 Jh bis 1806 (1986)

Sovereignty

Notes:

(2) eg Constitution of Romania, Art 1: ‘La Roumanie est un État national, souverain et indépendant, unitaire et indivisible’.

(3) eg French Constitution of 1958, ‘Art 3: National sovereignty shall vest in the people, who shall exercise it through their representatives and by means of referendum’.

(4) eg Italian Constitution, ‘Art 11: ‘L’Italia ... consente, in condizioni di parità con gli altri stati, alle limitazioni di sovranità necessarie ad un ordinamento che assicuri la pace e la giustizia fra le nazioni ... ’.

(6) In Olivier Beaud’s words ‘whoever thinks of the state is constrained to think of sovereignty and vice versa’: Etat et souveraineté. Eléments pour une contribution à une théorie de l’Etat (1989), 4.

(10) MacCormick (n 8).

(12) In the French Constitution of 1958, Art 1 states that France is a democratic republic, Art 2 reproduces Lincoln’s definition of democracy as ‘government of the people, by the people and for the people’ and Art 3 proclaims that ‘national sovereignty shall vest in the people’.

(13) Art 2(1).

(15) Ibid 86.

(16) However, several organs could exercise sovereignty jointly, see below.

(19) Some authors who accept talk of a medieval sovereignty, still maintain that modern sovereignty is specific (Olivier Beaud, La puissance de l’Etat (1994), 33.

(21) Beaud (n 19), 56 ff.
(22) ‘Sovereignty, then, is not limited either in power, or in function, or in length of time’: Bodin (n 1), bk I, ch 8.

(23) US v Lara 541 US 193 (2004); similarly, the European Court of Justice has claimed that ‘European institutions have been endowed with sovereign rights, the exercise of which affects member states and also their citizen.’ Judgment of the Court of 5 February 1963, NV Algemene Transport- en Expeditie Onderneming van Gend & Loos v Netherlands Inland Revenue Administration.

(24) Pufendorf (n 17), bk VII, ch IV. We find similar lists in many different works throughout the seventeenth century, eg Loyseau:

 faire loys, créer officiers, arbitrer la paix et la guerre, avoir le dernier ressort de la justice et forger monnoye. Lesquels sont du tout inséparables de la personne du souverain et tellement attachés à la souveraineté que quiconque en entreprend aucun, entreprend quant et quant la souveraineté est coupable de lèse majesté ...

(25) Bodin (n 1).

(27) Jean-Jacques Rousseau, The Social Contract and Discourses by Jean-Jacques Rousseau (G.D.H. Cole trans, 1923), ch II (‘that sovereignty is indivisible’). Rousseau's main argument is that if the attributes of sovereignty were divided and distributed between several authorities, sovereignty would be destroyed, as none of them would be sovereign. See Robert Derathé, Jean-Jacques Rousseau et la science politique de son temps (1974).

 Legislature as was before observed, is the greatest act of superiority that can be exercised by one being over another. Wherefore it is requisite to the very essence of Law, that it be made by the supreme power. Sovereignty and legislature are indeed convertible terms; one cannot subsist without the other.

(29) Bodin (n 1).

(32) The Italian Constitution or the Preamble to the French Constitution of 1946.

(33) Judgment of 30 June 2009.

(34) Case 06/64 Costa/ENEL.

(35) Declaration No 17 attached to the Treaty.

(36) Decision no 2004–496 DC, 10 June 2004, Loi pour la confiance dans l’économie numérique: Art 88(1) of the Constitution provides:

 The Republic shall participate in the European Communities and in the European Union constituted by States which have freely chosen, by virtue of the treaties that established them, to exercise some of their powers in common.

Thus, the transposition of a community directive into domestic law is a constitutional obligation.
(37) Decision no 2006–540 DC, 27 July 2006, Copyright and related rights in the Information Society: ‘the transposition of a Directive cannot run counter to an rule or principle inherent to the constitutional identity of France, except when the constituting power consents thereto.’ See also Chapter 35 on constitutional identity.

(38) Art 1(2).

(40) The Preamble to the Charter of the United Nations proclaims ‘that armed force shall not be used, save in the common interest’, and Art 2(4) that

All Members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations.

(41) Ibid Art 42:

Should the Security Council consider that measures provided for in Article 41 would be inadequate or have proved to be inadequate, it may take such action by air, sea, or land forces as may be necessary to maintain or restore international peace and security. Such action may include demonstrations, blockade, and other operations by air, sea, or land forces of Members of the United Nations.

(42) Ibid Preamble.

(45) Ibid 65: ‘the importance of the theory ... lies in the claim that in every society where there is law there is a sovereign’.

(46) Ibid 72.

(47) Art 89: ‘The republican form of government shall not be the object of any amendment’.

(48) Art 79(3): ‘Amendments to this Basic Law affecting the division of the Federation into Länder, their participation on principle in the legislative process, or the principles laid down in Articles 1 and 20 shall be inadmissible.’

(49) Georges Vedel, Manuel élémentaire de droit constitutionnel ([1949] 2002), 117.

(53) Vedel (n 49), 117.

(55) Malberg (n 14), vol II, 199 ff.

(57) On referendum, see Chapter 24.

(59) French Constitution of 1791, Title III, Art 2: ‘The nation wherefrom all powers proceed can only exercise them by delegation. The French constitution is representative: the representatives are the legislature and the king.’

(61) eg Constitution of Portugal, Art 3; Russia, Art 3; Brazil, Art 1; Thailand (1997), Art 3, et al.

(64) Decision no 2006-540 DC (n 37).

Michel Troper
Michel Troper is Professor Emeritus, University of Paris Ouest-Nanterre
Abstract and Keywords

The controversy around human dignity as a foundational concept for the law in general and constitutionalism in particular is no superficial affair. To find a way out of this maze, this article first discusses the problems of the method and theory of comparative legal perspectives and the core issue to which they lead: the antinomy of practical universalism and theoretical relativism of human rights. It then sketches some relevant aspects of the history of the idea of human dignity. The discussion then turns to the content of human dignity and its doctrinal unfolding as a legal concept. Finally, some tentative remarks are made on the deeper cultural and political issues at stake.

Keywords: human dignity, constitutionalism, comparative law, practical universalism, relativism, human rights
The concept of human dignity is as difficult and loaded with substantial problems as it is central for the contemporary architecture of human rights. The latter role is evident: human dignity forms a foundational concept for the international legal order of human rights. Many national legal orders incorporate it explicitly, in the post-war era often following the example set by the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Supranational international organizations like the European Union have recently done the same as have regional systems for the protection of human rights, though sometimes in quite questionable terms.

A further category of norms and instruments relevant for the legal positivation of human dignity are those whose scope is coextensive with central parts of what human dignity is about. Various international instruments, including the international humanitarian and the prospering international criminal law, are aiming at protecting human dignity, mostly explicitly so through action against genocide, crimes against humanity, torture, war crimes, or patterns of discrimination. On the level of constitutional norms and constitutional instruments, prohibitions on inhuman and degrading treatment, torture, or slavery are evident examples, as are prohibitions of discrimination on the grounds of ascribed race, ethnic origin, sex, religion and belief, disability, and—increasingly so—other characteristics such as sexual orientation.

In legal orders—national or international—without explicit foundation in the positive law, dignity nevertheless plays a sometimes even pivotal role: here it is included in the law through interpretation of other norms, more or less closely related to dignity, by case law.

The central role of human dignity in the global culture of law is by no means self-evident. Human dignity as an ethical and political idea has very powerful history. As a legal concept, it had a rather slow career. It appeared late on the scene of modern constitutional law before its inclusion in the UN Charter and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights sparked off further development.

And there is another point why the central role of human dignity may seem less evident than it sometimes appears: human dignity is not at all a fully trusted lodestar of the international human rights culture and its hard legal normative core in the multi-layered, manifold intertwined, differentiated, and heterogeneous systems of human rights protections through constitutions, sub- and quasi-constitutional human rights bills, supra- and international instruments. For some, the light it sheds is not the light of judicial insight and normative progress, but the dubious, phosphorescent, seductive glow of a legal will-o’-the-wisp that leads one astray in the dangerous swamp of hidden ideologies, false essentialism, masked power, and self-righteous cultural and religious parochialism treacherously adorned in the splendid robe of universalism.

And there are reasons for this perspective: the reference to human dignity in legal instruments or court decisions is sometimes not at all in accordance with fundamental values like liberty, equality, and true concern for the worth of individual personality. In any event, it is heterogeneous and full of discord: in important legal matters, the law and courts may refer to human dignity but draw radically different conclusions of what that means for the issue at stake.

Human autonomy is habitually ranked as a central, perhaps even necessary, content of human dignity. This conceptual affiliation, however, nourishes doubts as well as seems to presuppose the idea of a reasonable, self-determining human subject that is for many since its inception profoundly and disdainfully biased by particularistic perspectives such as gender, ethnic background, cultural origin, or social status and rightly deconstructed in contemporary discourse.
On the other hand, is it really imaginable to do away with human dignity in modern law? After all, the quest for grasping the core of human dignity has accompanied human reflection since its beginnings, not necessarily as a term, but as the idea that human beings are invested with a particular worth commanding care and respect, for others and for their own proper selves. And its particular role in the international rights debates is not just a kittenish twist in a contingently unfolding normative narrative of the last century. To the contrary, its rise had to do with epochal shifts—the final dawn of the European empires, decolonization in political, ideological, and theoretical terms, the fall of patriarchies, the critique of dehumanizing ideologies such as racism, democratization, and the economic emancipation of wider parts of societies because powerful social movements claimed their due. And, not to be forgotten, its cruel and unwilling midwife at birth was nothing but the illumination of what its negation practically means provided by the crude light of the gas chambers and other atrocious offspring of a dire epoch.

The controversy around human dignity as a foundational concept for the law in general and constitutionalism in particular is thus no superficial affair. To find a way out of this maze, the (p. 373) following steps will be taken: First, problems of the method and theory of comparative legal perspectives will be discussed and the core issue to which they lead: the antinomy of practical universalism and theoretical relativism of human rights (Section II). Secondly, a few remarks will sketch some relevant aspects of the history of the idea of human dignity (Section III). Thirdly, the discussion will turn to the content of human dignity and its doctrinal unfolding as a legal concept (Sections IV and V). Finally, some tentative remarks will comment on the deeper cultural and political issues at stake (Section VI).

II. Dignity and the Antinomy of Human Rights

It is an interesting property of contemporary court practice of constitutional and particularly human rights adjudication to incorporate comparative perspectives: a new hermeneutical cross-border curiosity is the jurisprudential mark of the day. The methodological justification of this development is, however, far from clear. One common ground for scholarly work is the interest in understanding the many paths of the law in different legal systems. However, the concrete impact of such studies is problematic for judicial decision-making. For some, a functional approach seems appropriate that tries to describe and evaluate the answers of different legal systems to the common problems each legal system faces. Others may aim to distil from the heterogeneous legal worlds the normative best, not least by studying unconvincing attempts, perhaps pursuing a universalist stance, in general or limited to human rights with their apparent (though contested) universalist potential. Other alternatives encompass a constructive dialogue of different legal systems or pluralistic perspectives: from the latter point of view, legal concepts are irredeemably embedded in cultural and political contexts and expressions of the particular being or decisions of the community that creates the law. The universalist credentials of a term such as ‘dignity’ may even be a functionally useful shell to give—contrary to appearance—cultural pluralism its due: the universalist appearance permits particularistic conceptions to unfold, unrealized, perhaps, by actors like courts. From this perspective, comparative analysis serves to make this transparent and to criticize, deconstruct, and prevent naive uses of a legal concept such as dignity by legal actors.

The central question behind these debates is the possibility of normative universalism, a position very much under strain in the contemporary debates. The main problems in this respect are not the variety of interpretations of shared legal concepts or the importance of context for the understanding of legal precepts. There are many different conceptions and understandings of fundamental legal concepts not only between but within various legal systems and cultures, as any dissenting court opinion illustrates. Human dignity is of course no exception in this respect. The interesting question is, however, whether all these conceptions are of equal normative plausibility—a question that the observable variety poses, not answers.

In addition, contexts certainly matter for what a legal concept in a particular legal system really means. On the other hand, one should avoid the mystification of contexts: there is much to be said about the different contexts, say, of administering the death penalty in the United States or in South Africa. At the core, however, everywhere a hard normative question is at stake: Can the taking of life for penological purposes be justified? Stressing contexts should not be used to cloud the core of these questions and their often painful normative and political implications.

The real question is thus whether any justification of certain understandings of normative concepts can be
For human rights, this question can be reformulated more precisely as the question of the possibility of a culturally non-relative justification of a theory of fundamental rights. Human rights and connected norms, like clauses of limitations are regularly specifically underdetermined by the positive law. Their text is opaque, open-textured, and abstract. A theory of fundamental rights fills the hermeneutical space opened by the abstract structure of human rights norms by providing those normative principles that guide their interpretation: it is an encompassing account of the structure and normative point of an order of fundamental rights and the particular normative positions it creates. Such a theory of fundamental rights must be based on the positive law it serves to interpret. A fascist theory of fundamental rights is irreconcilable with the European Convention on Human Rights. Beyond such extreme cases, a theory of fundamental rights can, however, (and with hermeneutical necessity) not be determined in the last instance by positive human rights norms as the opaqueness and openness for different interpretations of these norms formed the reasons to have recourse to theoretical reflection in the first place. The content of a theory of fundamental rights cannot itself be determined by the normative material the content of which it serves to define.

There are now several reasons why it may seem doubtful that a non-relativist theory of fundamental rights is possible. Most importantly, perhaps, a universalist approach faces many challenges of normative epistemology. The critique of metaphysics through analytical non-cognitivism, the element of avowal and decision in value statements in Max Weber's analysis, the social and cultural genealogies of Critical Theory, structuralism, and post-modernity have rendered it profoundly doubtful that any universalist claim could be epistemologically justified. After all, which foundational argument does not become entangled in the maze of dogmatism, infinite justificatory regress, tautologies, or recourse to contingent traditions? For many, the only intellectually respectable position is therefore one or another form of relativism founding normative arguments in the last instance on cultural traditions, social semantics, discourse formations, operations of social systems, shifting narratives, or exchangeable final languages.

There is a political point against universalism, too. Universalism smacks of paternalism, even cultural imperialism that raises serious problems not least in the context of multi-layered systems of human rights, because the universalist stance of one court, say an international court like the European Court of Human Rights, may unduly curtail the self-determination of a political community.

There is, however, a fundamental catch: the very architecture of international human rights law seems to imply the possibility of universalism. This is not just a functional universalism through factual interdependence in multilayered systems of human rights protection. It is an axiological universalism: the various national, supranational, and international human rights codes presuppose through their interconnection that not only irreconcilable norms collide, but that something common is secured and new common ground is gained in the process of adjudication. This was, after all, the core aspiration of the post-Second World War normative recalibration though the political practice of powers continued to remain remote from it. This assumption is the lifeblood as well of fundamental new beginnings of communities that want to re-join the better normative heritage of humanity after years of suppression and injustice—from post-war Germany to South Africa's post-apartheid constitutional resurrection.

The antimony of international human rights law is thus formulated: there is a practical universalism implied in the very architecture of modern human rights law; this universalism seems, however, theoretically indefensible and politically doubtful. This fundamental problem of all human rights is of particular importance for the idea of human dignity which since its inception has been at the heart of the whole human rights project.

A plausible approach to the solution of this problem cannot be outlined by abstract argument alone but presupposes a reconstruction of the content, the various conceptualizations of the concept human dignity, and some thoughts about their respective legitimacy. Methods and their substantial theoretical underpinnings are sometimes most clearly stated (and to a certain degree legitimized) by the practice of their application. This is what we turn to now, first in a historical perspective.

III. The Quest for Dignity
1. The Point and Perils of Historical Reflection

The reflection about the value status of human beings occupies a central place in the history of normative ideas. This complex and sometimes contradictory history is the background and base for the concrete incorporation of dignity in legal systems. It is therefore rightly not amiss in any serious treatment of the matter. Crucially important for gaining a somewhat fuller picture of the content of this history is to look not only at the development of ideas but also at the real history of social practice and struggles. This holds for the contemporary world, too. The most impressive manifestations of human dignity are certainly not found in books (great though some of them are) but in human lives—to be clear, not only or even predominantly so in the lives of the real or imagined heroes and heroines of politics, science, and art, but in the ordinary lives led around the corner that are unnoticed by history books and still embody what this term is about.

Equally significant is to search for manifestations not only where the term dignity and its many synonyms and circumscriptions are used but in other than linguistic forms of human expression as well. There is certainly much to be learned about human dignity from Sophocles’ tragedies, Michelangelo’s sculptures, or Goya’s etchings. Some accounts of the historical development of the concept of human dignity overlook this and conflate recorded theoretical thought with the whole history of this complex normative idea. One detrimental consequence of this stance is that those predominantly non-European, non-Western cultures where such records do not exist (because they were not produced or because they were destroyed by conquerors, empire-building imperialists, and the like) do not even appear on the screen of historical recollections.

A second important point concerns the fallacy of concluding from the absence of a term like ‘dignity’ in a particular language the absence of the normative substrate in the minds of the people using that language. That this is in fact a fallacy seems to be a rather clear lesson of the contemporary theory of the relation of language and mind. Mental representations of any sort (concepts etc.) can be realized in a variety of ways without the need for a proper term for what is meant: a native English speaker may lack the word Gemütlichkeit without being devoid of the feeling that this term designates and the ability to express this subjective emotional state linguistically. This has some significance for a central issue at stake: one finds, not rarely, the opinion voiced that culture X lacks the idea of human rights in general or of human dignity in particular because language Y used in X lacks a special term for human rights or dignity. This in itself is often not true but even if it were so, it is—given what has been said before about the relation of language and mind—of no interesting consequence for the substantive question at stake.

A third point concerns the distinction between what people think and express about the norms that are applicable to them and the norms that are in fact applicable to them. The fact that a person or a group of persons was or is of the opinion that human dignity is (or is not) a normative status its members enjoy, does not entail that they do (or do not) enjoy it. Thus a culture of fervent dignity-deniers may still possess what they deny.

Finally, it is worth noting that genealogy and justification are distinct things in normative argumentation. A consequence of this distinction is that even if a certain culture has a certain normative tradition, this does not mean that this tradition is justified only for this culture or even justified at all. It may be a good, a bad—or the usual case—a mixed tradition, including better and worse ideas. Historical genealogy of a normative concept thus does not avail one of the tasks for providing a justification for its understanding.

2. Dignity in History: Some Tentative Observations

Looking at the history, paying due attention to these methodological parameters, one could make the following observations about the historical trajectory of the idea of dignity:

The idea of what is today called human dignity concerns the intrinsic value status of human beings as human beings irrespective of other properties. As words in general, human dignity and its synonyms can be used to designate other designata, for example a relative position within a given, contingent social hierarchy.

This idea is not bound to any particular culture or religion. One finds it in classical antique thought, for example in Greece or China, in the framework of polytheistic, pantheistic, different monotheistic and secular, agnostic, or atheistic worldviews. Undoubtedly, violations of human dignity were often defended within these frameworks. The point here is only that the basis for unfolding a concept of dignity is equally present in many cultural and religious contexts, long as the way may be.
The ascription of dignity demands respect and recognition as a creature with particular worth equally shared by every human being. A more precise statement with more clear-cut normative consequences of what this worth means is to regard human beings as last-order purposes of human intentions and actions. Human beings are regarded as Selbstzwänge, as ends-in-themselves, a term that can be derived from Kant's version of this thought—a version, not the origin, given other traditions, something to be underlined because the idea is sometimes attributed to Kant alone. The normative consequence of this status is the protection of the subject status of human beings, the ability to become authors of their lives and thus of their autonomy. The negative counterpart of this is the prohibition of instrumentalization and objectification. This denies the status of a subject to human beings by making them the instruments for the realization of ends beyond themselves.

If human dignity is ascribed, its source can be transcendent or immanent. The dignity of religious ethics and some particular ontologies are examples of the former. The latter can lead to derivative accounts of human dignity which make the dignity of human beings dependent on some other immanent source, for example Hegel's conditioning human dignity on partaking in the Sittlichkeit of the state. The immanent account for dignity can take a further step and base the ascription of dignity on nothing but the humaneness of humans: this is the path of modern humanism in its various Enlightenment or Post-Enlightenment forms.

It is noteworthy that a strong current of dignity scepticism has accompanied these thoughts. The most radical critique is that there is no shared supreme worth of all human beings, either because all or a portion of humanity is sufficiently wretched and wicked or because worth is not connected to humanity as such but is relative to the performance of certain tasks in society. Others argue that dignity as a normative concept suffers from severe weaknesses. Schopenhauer's catchphrase of dignity as the 'Shibboleth of all clue- and thoughtless moralists' has therefore gained considerable popularity.

Given this scepticism, the problem of justification of the predication of dignity to humans gains some importance. The fundamentally different theories outlined about the sources of dignity—transcendent, immanent, derivative, original—entail different theories of justification of dignity. A transcendental conception bases the justification of the ascription to a transcendental legitimacy-conferring cause, prominently an act of grace by a divine force. The immanent derivative theories depend on the justification of the dignity-conferring entity central to such a theory—for example Hegel's theory of the state. The immanent original theories are most commonly based on particular properties of humans that legitimize the predication of dignity to human beings. These properties can be relevant for a transcendental theory as well, for example as the gifts of god. Interestingly, across cultures and times a limited set of properties has been used to legitimize the ascription of dignity. Prominent among them rank the capability to reason and think, moral orientation, self-determination, freedom of will and action and, in consequence, the ability for self-creation through culture.

(p. 379) IV. The Content of Human Dignity as a Legal Concept

Human dignity as a legal concept fulfills various functions in constitutions, constitutional instruments, and international law: It serves as a normative protection of individuals. It constitutes objective law and an important part of the general principles of the law, not least as a guideline for the interpretation of other fundamental rights. It formulates principles for the structure of the state and other political, legally institutionalized, transnational orders. As with any other norms investigated from a comparative perspective, legal guarantees of human dignity differ considerably from each other both on the level of positive texts and judicial interpretation. These differences will first be surveyed in relation to some important systematic points (Section IV), then the normative merits of these different solutions will be considered (Section V).

1. The Scope of Dignity

(a) Elements of Concretization

Central elements of concretizations of human dignity prominent in the history of ideas across cultural, religious, and philosophical frontiers can be found in international jurisprudence as well. The preservation of certain minimum standards of treatment of persons, the protection of the subject status of human individuals implying the guarantee of their autonomy, and a prohibition of their instrumentalization and objectification rank.
prominently in various jurisdictions, as explicit arguments or implicit principles. These contents are spelled out in different forms. The two most important strategies, sometimes combined, are, as for other human rights, first abstract and more or less precise intentional delineations of the content of human dignity; secondly, the often only implicit unfolding of the content through case law on violations of dignity.

A rather straightforward abstract definition stems from the German Federal Constitutional Court. This definition is a standard reference point in comparative analysis of dignity jurisprudence, not least because of the prominent role of human dignity in the German Basic Law due to its historical background. The position of the individual human being as the highest-order purpose of the law is the explicit central element of this jurisprudence, although only after years of jurisprudence on the matter. The negative flipside is the prohibition on making a person the object and thus the means of state action, the so-called ‘Objektformel’ (object-formula) of the court. In addition, the duty to protect human beings against violations of the respect they are entitled to beyond cases of instrumentalization has also been underlined. This formula has been applied—sometimes more, sometimes less convincingly—over the decades in many contexts, on procedural rights, privacy, limits of state surveillance, criminal sanctions, abortion, or killing of third parties to protect the lives of others.

Other concretizations, although adopting a similar path, stress the open-textured content of human dignity as the expression of an ungraspable essence of human beings, on the basis of respect for the uniqueness and individuality of the person and protection against objectification or degradation or focus more abstractly on the particular equal worth entitling human beings to respect and equal consideration underling as well the importance of autonomy and self-determination.

The second judicial strategy to get to grips with the content of human dignity is to give the content of dignity contours via cases where a violation of dignity is assumed without an abstract definition of what it is about. This approach is of particular importance for the delineation of the scope of the right even if the first approach is adopted because it helps to concretize this abstract content. Important areas where dignity plays a role revolve, first, around autonomous self-determination, secondly, the preservation of personal (bodily and psychic) integrity, thirdly, the violation and preservation of the equality of status rights, fourthly, the provision of material preconditions of human life, fifthly, the social expression of human worth, and sixthly, foundational principles of the structure of the state and of democracy. Prominent examples of the first group are issues of privacy and abortion; for the second, prohibitions of torture and degrading, cruel, unusual, and inhuman treatment and punishment; for the third, cases of discrimination; for the fourth, dignity-based social rights; for the fifth, matters of individual reputation or collective issues such as pornography, prostitution, or hate speech; and for the sixth, decisions on rights-based constraints on the structures of states and democracy.

An interesting example in this context is the role of dignity in US constitutional law. It has been observed that dignity played an ambivalent role in US constitutional law: ‘In one sense, the entire edifice of U.S. constitutional law is built on a vision of human dignity, as reflected in popular sovereignty, representative government and entrenched individual rights.’ On the other hand, violations of human dignity were legally buttressed or implicitly accepted, including accommodation of unequal voting rights, of slavery and segregation on the base of attributed race, the constitutional framing of US colonialism, or of eugenics.

As far as the jurisprudence of the US Supreme Court is concerned, from the 1940s onwards, references to human dignity have played a significant, if not doctrinally, systematically clarified role. The concept has been important for matters such as cruel and unusual punishment, the constitutionality of the death penalty, prisoners’ rights and conditions of confinement, searches, taking of bodily fluid and other intrusions on bodily integrity, and procedural rights such as the privilege against self-incrimination or personal reputation. It is noteworthy that constitutional arguments about such high-profile topics as the death penalty, abortion, or sexual self-determination were prominently and contentiously in part based on human dignity.

Constitutional jurisprudence on these matters oscillates between more or less wide and precise determinations of which treatment is irreconcilable with human worth. Human dignity can coalesce with general personality rights or can be more narrowly circumscribed to particularly qualified acts. A central common function is to draw a baseline for what is impermissible treatment of individuals under any circumstances. A classical testing case, whether human beings are regarded as a worth at all, is the death penalty. Consequently, human dignity plays a prominent role in determining its permissibility in four main aspects: as to the implicit denial of any human worth of the accused by execution, the modes of execution, including the death row phenomenon, the violation of the continuing subject status of the convict, and the implicit objectification and instrumentalization of the accused for penological purposes. The death penalty has ceased to be a central political concern in many countries, given the momentum of the international abolitionist movement. Its great human drama serves, however, as a looking-glass to make more visible the critical role dignity can serve in human rights adjudication. It is interesting to observe that with the idea of intrinsic worth, protected status as a subject and purpose of action and the prohibition of instrumentalization and objectification arguments again play a decisive role that belongs to the core tenets associated with human dignity in historical and systematic perspectives. These elements are significant for other cases, too, for example life imprisonment, legal protection of pre-natal life, prostitution, or child pornography. Another testing case that has more recently gained prominence and raises similar concerns is torture, especially for the purpose of protection of third parties.

The protection of human dignity encompasses not only respect of persons by public authorities and others but is also regarded as aiming to protect the sense of self-worth of an individual—another element already present in the history of ideas.

An interesting aspect concerns the relation of individual and community. It has been underlined that respect for the dignity of a person does not imply disregard for importance of membership of a community.

One means employed by courts to avoid an inflation of dignitarian claims is to demand a sufficiently qualified impact on the individual: An act has to touch upon central concerns of human existence to fall within the scope of protection of a right to dignity.

Dignity is often regarded as unalienable. In legal terms, this can mean different things: that the content of the protection is not modified according to the actions of the bearer, that human beings are not only the necessary bearer of this right, but that this status is unforfeitable or that there are specific limits to any system of limitations. What is meant is hardly spelled out in jurisprudence and doctrine.

(b) The Cosmopolitan Framework

Human dignity has appealed to many worldviews. Consequently, courts tend to be reluctant to embark on any in-depth justification of their interpretation of human dignity wedding this concept to judicial authority to any specific approach. A recurrent element, however, is the attempt to embed a concrete interpretation in the international context and its consensual elements and thus to transcend a purely local perspective. It is noteworthy that the ideas of dignity are vindicated by other than the so-called Western cultures—with self-confidence and sometimes in politically central moments, as the example of South Africa shows, where dignity was claimed for the post-apartheid normative re-orientation as an intrinsic part of the African normative tradition and the value of ubuntu.

(c) Dignity as a Subjective Right

An important question is whether human dignity is taken as a subjective right as in certain systems. As to other conceptions, various alternatives have been formulated, including objective law or principles of interpretation. The matter is of practical significance because it may be decisive for the legal standing of individuals. If human dignity is not a subjective right, its invocation may be impossible or conditioned on its relevance for the interpretation of other rights.

(d) Personal Scope: The Bearer of the Right

If human dignity is regarded as a subjective right, humans are necessarily the bearers of this right. Constitutional dignity guarantees are commonly conceived as universal rights and not just as the rights of the citizens of the respective state. The same holds for supra- and international instruments. It is not, however, extended to legal persons like corporations as is done for other fundamental rights through transferral norms or interpretation. Another question of ongoing discussions concerns the question whether dignity is to be extended to animals or even nature in general. Some constitutional law and cases exist in this respect.

(e) Objective Element of the Law

Dignity can in addition to (or alternative to) its position as a subjective right be part of objective law. Public authorities are in consequence bound by it, though individuals may not have the possibility to base complaints solely on this ground. This is not necessarily completely clarified by doctrine. An interesting example in this respect is the argument that the death penalty violates not only the subjective rights of the convict, but violates the dignity of those that administer and institutionalize it.

In this objective respect, human dignity is sometimes interpreted not only as a protected legal interest of individuals but as a norm guaranteeing the integrity of the human species as such. It becomes the legal embodiment of a species ethics. This has gained some practical significance in the framework of biotechnologies that may not violate the rights of any existing human individual but may endanger the given character of the human species.

(f) Horizontal Effect
As for any human right, the question arises for human dignity as well, whether at all and if so how it unfolds normative effects not only between the individual and the state but between private parties as well. Some constitutions and legal instruments contain explicit horizontal regulations for the respective fundamental rights catalogue, although it is not always clear whether these general regulations also apply to human dignity. A system—if it allows any horizontal effect—may restrict this to an indirect horizontal effect through the interpretation of other norms in light of fundamental rights. Human dignity, however, is one of the fundamental rights where a direct horizontal effect is more often assumed than in the case of other human rights. It is, for example, a widespread assumption that slavery is prohibited by human dignity without need for further positive law which implies such a direct horizontal effect.

(g) Positive Duties and Rights; Procedural Elements
Fundamental rights are today often taken as the origin of positive duties. This is true for dignity guarantees as well which can be interpreted as the source of duties to protect the dignity of individuals. This raises—apart from the standard questions about positive duties, especially prerogatives of the legislature—an important structural and apparently paradoxical problem: Can human dignity that is so closely associated with autonomy in fact be used to curtail autonomy? Differently put: Can the individual consent to relinquishing the protection of her dignity with legal effects? If this is denied, the conception of dignity at the base of this denial may seem paternalistic. There is some case law on this matter—much discussed are cases such as dwarf throwing, peep shows, or laserdromes. Another more fundamental issue already mentioned is slavery. There is little doubt that dignity implies the prohibition to disclaim the fundamental liberty of a person by handing herself over into slavery. This is an interesting observation as it indicates that the question is not so much whether dignity can be protected at all against the will of the person whose dignity is at stake, but under which qualified circumstances it is justified to do so.

Human dignity gives rise in some legal orders not only to negative rights but to positive rights as well. The most important positive right is the right to the provision of a minimal standard of living.

Guarantees of human dignity have distinct procedural dimensions. The subject status they guarantee is secured through procedural safeguards that give persons the possibility actively and effectively to pursue their rights and interests or make them subjects in their working life.

(p. 386) (h) Beginning, Diachronical Continuity, and End
An important question to determine the beginning and end of human dignity is whether the existence of individual human life is a sufficient condition for the ascription of dignity or whether it is conditioned on qualified—for example self-conscious—forms of human life. These questions are connected with the problem, whether personhood is the reason for dignity and when personhood begins—with conception, nidation, sometimes in the pre-natal maturation process (e.g., sensitivity to pain, viability), at birth, or even later. Another issue concerns diachronically continuous personal identity and its impact for the protection of self-determination, for example as to a person's pre-dementia decisions for post-dementia issues.

Consequently and not surprisingly, given the ethical, political, and religious subtexts of these questions, there is particular variety in jurisprudence and doctrine. Of particular concern is the beginning of human life, either because life and dignity are regarded to be diachronically coextensive or because the existence of human life is at least a precondition for ascribing dignity at all (though it may be not or only ambiguously done in a particular jurisdiction). Courts have regarded conception\(^\text{119}\) or at least nidation\(^\text{120}\) as the beginning of protection of both life and dignity. Others have followed a different course, giving for example special weight to viability for any legally protected status of the pre-natal life\(^\text{121}\) or suspended or deferred the answer as to life and dignity.\(^\text{122}\) There is a further complication from the fact that the beginning of the normative protection through dignity can refer to dignity as a subjective right\(^\text{123}\) or a tenet of objective law.\(^\text{124}\)

A diachronically discontinuous conception of dignity has so far only reached the academic debate. The question when dignity ends, however, has occupied various courts: in some jurisdictions dignity defies death as it is protected post-mortem.\(^\text{125}\)

(p. 387) 2. Interference

The delineation of an interference is of particular relevance for a conception of human dignity that excludes justified limitations as there is no further step of determining a violation of dignity: interfering with dignity means violating it. Consequently, the discussion of interference can be quite loaded with substantive consideration that doctrinally may belong to another sphere. The scope of the right concerned is an obvious candidate in this respect.

3. Limitations and Justification

One of the practically most important questions concerns the limitations of human dignity. Dignity can be protected absolutely, without allowing any such limitations. This approach can extend to the dignity provision as such,\(^\text{126}\) or to particular elements of what is usually taken to be within its scope.\(^\text{127}\) However, legal provisions on human dignity can also foresee or can be interpreted as containing limitations.\(^\text{128}\) Then it has to be determined which weight human dignity has in relation to other rights and protected legal interests. This weight is regarded as quite considerable—only other values of high order can outweigh dignity concerns, not, for example, the expediency of daily politics.

Those systems that acknowledge limits to dignity can limit the limitations through residual guarantees of a core area, for example by protecting the ‘essence’ of the right or equivalent jurisprudence.\(^\text{129}\) In any case, any limitation has to undergo (differently framed and named) tests that set limits to encroachments of the right and that deal at their core with matters of proportionality.

The question of limitations is not the least relevant in such contentious areas as abortion.\(^\text{130}\) Here the particular case of conflicts of the dignity of one person with the dignity of another person may arise: if both the embryo and/or the fetus and the women are the bearers of dignity, and if in the case of abortion dignity concerns are taken to be relevant for both sides, such a conflict ensues. As far as pre-natal life is concerned—if it is regarded as the bearer of a subjective right or as an object of protection through dignity as objective law—a violation of this right is based on the ending of the pre-natal life through abortion.\(^\text{131}\) As far as pregnant women are concerned, the recognition that the dignity of women and not only minor concerns are at stake has been of central legal importance. Crucial for this has been the insight that the fundamental status as subjects of their lives is put into question by certain restrictions on abortion.\(^\text{132}\) The solution of this conflict is not obvious, but tends to be shaped by the kind of time-sensitive model of abortion that has become widely accepted in liberal constitutional states.\(^\text{133}\) This is important to emphasize to prevent the misperception that ascribing dignity to \((p. 388)\) pre-natal life precludes due concern for the fundamental rights of women. It is noteworthy that the legal recourse to their dignity had for women in the framework of abortion a quite substantial emancipatory effect.\(^\text{134}\)

For torture it has been argued but not taken up by the courts that the same constellation of colliding claims arises, especially in the case of torturing a kidnapper to disclose the whereabouts of her victim (or any of the much discussed ticking bomb scenarios).\(^\text{135}\)

In any case, dignity as other human rights not only constitutes individual claims but restricts them as well. If dignity is taken to be absolute, the restriction is defined by any act of interference. Any exercise of any other right cannot go as far as to violate the dignity of another person.\(^\text{136}\) If dignity is not taken to be absolute, weighing and balancing exercises including principles of proportionality (and their doctrinal functional equivalents) determine the respective reach of other rights.

4. Relation to Other Fundamental Rights and the Political Order

The delineation of the scope of different fundamental rights is a general problem that takes, in the case of dignity, a particular twist: as human dignity is often regarded as the foundation of all fundamental rights, one could conclude that it is implicitly at stake for any case. One way to avoid this conclusion is to narrow the scope of the right or demand necessary qualification of an interference. Another solution is subsidiarity—dignity guarantees are only practically considered if no other fundamental right is violated. A special case is the relation of dignity and equality: dignity is often regarded as fundamental for equality—it serves as a yardstick to calibrate constitutional equality guarantees, sometimes without explicit reference to the term.

Dignity is traditionally regarded as a foundation of democracy and a normative yardstick for the structure of the state.

(p. 389) V. Problems and Solutions

The preceding remarks have outlined some aspects of the heterogeneous world of contemporary dignity law. Now the next question arises: What are the merits of the various approaches outlined?

1. The Scope of Dignity

(a) Content and Legitimacy

Human dignity as a legal concept aims to protect the inherent, supreme, and inalienable worth of human beings. As was indicated in the historical observations, there is a striking tendency to connect a central normative concern (called dignity, something else, or being present as an implicit premise of an, on the surface, quite different looking argument) with the idea that human beings are ends-in-themselves, highest-order purposes of human motivation and correspondent action who therefore have the right that their status as an autonomous subject of their live is protected. This leads to a prohibition of instrumentalization, objectification, and reification and general demands for respect. These ideas play a crucial role in legal conceptions of human dignity as well, as courts regularly explicitly or implicitly refer to these principles as foundational principles.

This raises the question of the possible justification of these principles. Despite the shortcomings of some argumentations in the history of ideas and of contemporary debates, including Kant's, such a justification does not seem impossible. A starting point is the anthropological fact that for human beings—pathological cases aside—the fulfilment of their individual lives is a natural end in itself. This worth of a human life to its possessor is not limited to a particular class of individuals with an elevated content of life. On the contrary, no human life is worth more for its bearer than any other, an observation paving the way to a critique of all social arrangements that deny this worth, for example on the ground of racism, sexism, contempt for the economically and socially unfortunate, and the like. Applying the basic principle of justice to treat equal things equally, respect for the status of any human life as a purpose of equal worth is a universal right. Every human person is the justified last-order purpose of action, because human beings are, through their factual quest for happiness, a purpose in themselves. Universalization as a command of justice demands the ascription of this purpose-status to all.

As Pufendorf nicely formulated, human beings have a particularly fine sense of self-respect. To protect this human need for respect is certainly justified purely because of a concern for the feelings of human beings. The fact of self-respect does not, however, answer the question, whether this attitude is justified because the self is in fact worthy of respect or whether the self-estimation of human beings is just a (pleasant) subjective illusion. This is an important and difficult question.

Still, if one looks at the existential properties of human life, the Selbstzweckhaftigkeit or being-an-end-in-oneself seems to be based on some good reasons. Human beings construct in one way or another a mental explanatory image of the world and have learned to accept its sometimes challenging results as to the rather precarious position of human life in natural history. They appropriate aesthetically human existence with its many, not always pleasant, sides in art. They unfold the emotionally richly textured self of a transient being faced with its own mortality without guarantee that their pursuits will lead to happiness. They live these lives in the mode of self-reflective consciousness and self-determination under moral principles that motivate them sometimes to regard the well-being of others to be of greater importance than their own—an ability to benevolent self-transcendence that is the daily bread of care and affection. All this confers dignity to human life—at least from the (only available) human point of view.

Given these reasons for predicking dignity to human beings, dignity is not only legitimately ascribed to human beings, but rightly taken as unalienable: Because one cannot lose the existential human properties that play a decisive role for its foundation, one cannot lose the dignity that is their consequence.

(b) Dignity and Autonomy

Autonomy is a contested subject in the international discourse about dignity: autonomy is challenged as an antiquated idea because of the modern consciousness of the many influences on human self-determination, for example the subconscious sources of motives, wishes, and desires and their powerful sway over human choice and action or the social and cultural structures that limit the possibilities of action and colour profoundly what is aimed at in the first place. All of this is real enough but no reason to debunk the normative idea of autonomy. It is a misunderstanding of this concept to think it is irreconcilable with these perspectives. The reason is straightforward: it is a concept that does not presuppose that none of these influences exist, but merely that they are not all that counts, that there is an element of residual human self-determination the protection of which is consequently of crucial importance.

(c) Dignity: Widely or Narrowly Defined?

Jurisprudential experience seems to teach that there are good reasons to differentiate a protection of human dignity as such from other personality rights, the enjoyment of particular liberties and equality, and thus to circumscribe its scope narrowly. This is best done by limiting the scope of the right to matters that pertain to the subject status of the individual as such and core matters of her worth: to force a women seriously to compromise her health for giving birth puts the subject status in question, to force someone to drive a victim of an accident to a hospital does not, though both are cases of instrumentalization. To imprison someone in an ugly cell is not a violation of dignity by a display of lack of respect for the aesthetic dimension of her life; to do so in cell regularly flooded by faeces, however, is. This aids avoiding an inflationary use of dignity deprived of any concrete contours and meaning.

(d) Subjective Right, Objective Law, Personal Scope

As human dignity is about the worth of individuals and their autonomy there are not reasons discernible not to understand it as a judicially enforceable subjective right. The limitation of dignity to natural human persons also appears to be quite plausible. Legal persons are not ends-in-themselves but creations for well-defined purposes. That dignity guarantees are of universal scope is well warranted—to limit the protection of this right, for example to the citizens of particular states, fails to grasp the core of its meaning.

Given its origin and mode of legitimation, dignity as a proper legal concept is best reserved for human beings. As practice shows, the expansion of dignitarian concerns leads to fussy legal concepts and carries with it the danger of weakening the protection of humans. As to (p. 391) animals and nature in general, this by no means indicates a lack of concern as there are other ways effectively to protect non-human organisms or the environment.

Human dignity is in a certain respect the expression of the normative self-confidence of every individual. Human dignity implies in addition the perception that humanity understood as the decisive set of properties shaped by the process of natural history making humans human is something worth protecting, treasuring, and respecting, too. A way to express this perception is to interpret the objective dimension of dignity guarantees as a legal element of species ethics. A concretization of this dimension worth thinking about may be the following: human dignity protects as objective law the set of properties resulting from natural history constitutive of the character of the human species against modification. Dignity is an individual trump of law, but a legal element of the justified self-preservation of the human species as well.

(e) Horizontal Effect, Positive Duties and Rights, Procedural Elements
The tendency to give dignity guarantees effects between private persons is well warranted. Given the constitutive importance and—in a proper doctrinal construction—the clearly circumscribed scope of a dignity guarantee, there is no reason to deny a direct horizontal effect. The not unusual acceptance of a prohibition of slavery directly on the ground of human dignity is an expression of the plausibility of this construction.

As for other human rights, positive duties, including duties to protect and procedural concretizations are to be taken as elements of the scope of a dignity guarantee. This does not necessarily lead to an unwarranted paternalism. Dignity protects autonomy and any protection of dignity against the will of the concerned person consequently needs very good reasons. The case of slavery, as mentioned above, illustrates that in principle there are such reasons: voluntary slavery is not acceptable under a modern human rights conception. To say that there are such duties does not imply that the reach of this duty should be interpreted excessively. Positive duties stemming from dignity guarantees only lead to what is properly called paternalism if they are interpreted paternalistically—which does and may happen (as a freedom may be interpreted quite illiberally) but not necessarily so.

Human dignity is a decisive argument for social rights: if humans are ends-in-themselves they are to be treated as such as to the available necessary material preconditions of a human life.

The procedural aspects of human dignity have been rightly underlined: one way to protect human dignity is to enable human beings to defend their autonomy themselves, in the courtroom and through social and political structures of more than feigned participation.

(f) Beginning, Diachronical Continuity, and End

There seems no plausible reason to dissociate dignity and human life. If there is human life, it has dignity. As to the beginning of human life, there is a good case for taking conception as the crucial moment as at least one genetically individualized human organism comes into existence. It is crucial to rationalize debates to underline, that, as indicated above, this perception does not predetermine the solution of the problem of abortion. For this, competing rights have to be taken into account, most importantly the dignity of the mother. Therefore, ascribing dignity to pre-natal life does not entail the entry of new dark ages of reproductive instrumentalization of women.

The legal status of pre-natal life is not only of concern for the question of abortion. It can be of importance for the protection of this phase of the existence of a human being against harm, including life and bodily integrity, of increasing concern in the wake of new biotechnological possibilities.

There is no reason for a diachronically discontinuous conception of human dignity and autonomy. The human substrate of the right is the person in its physical and mental entirety, continuously existing in human life and thus the bearer of an uninterrupted personal right. There is equally no reason for post-mortem protection of human dignity as a subjective right. Such a right presupposes the existence of its bearer which ends with death. Legitimate concerns motivating the post mortem protection of dignity can be dealt with by other legal means, for example entitlements of descendants, relatives, partners, and the like and by the objective dimension of human dignity.

2. Interference, Limitations, and Justification

The possible modes of interference in dignity include beyond final, direct, legal, and sanctioned acts by public authorities other forms that violate the scope of the right, even if unintentional, indirect, factual, and devoid of sanctions. The sufficient gravity of the interfering act is best discussed on the level of the scope of the right.

The problem of the beginning of life and dignity has led already to the question of abortion, which is a core issue of the limitations of the right. Abortion can imply a constellation where claims of dignity collide: the right of the unborn human organism to become a full personality and the right of the mother to stay the subject of her life and not to be instrumentalized for giving birth. The abortion regimes, now common in many constitutional states that allow for abortion under certain conditions (as to danger to life and health of the women, because of the cause of pregnancy, eg in the case of rape or as to the life situation of the mother), taking into account temporal factors of maturation, draw the right conclusion from this insight.
There is no other comparable situation and in this sense dignity is absolute. It is perhaps worthwhile to underscore that torture and, more precisely, torture to save the lives of others in particular is not such a situation, despite arguments to the contrary. There are three central reasons for this: in real life (thought not in theoretical ticking bomb scenarios) it is always unclear whether or not the person tortured has the information she is supposed to disclose, and if so, whether she will disclose it and not lie. Secondly, torture is not only dehumanizing the tortured persons, but the torturer as well. Under the rule of law, torture would need a proper legal, institutional, and personal framework. To legally institutionalize barbarous acts is, however, unthinkable under a constitutional rule of law. Thirdly, given the ubiquitous reality of torture only an absolute ban is a suitable means against its practice.

3. Dignity, Other Fundamental Rights, and the Structure of the Body Politic

Dignity is foundational for human rights, but its scope is not coextensive, but in principle more narrowly circumscribed than rights to liberty and equality. One may accept (odd as it may seem) that someone enjoys certain liberties but deny her equal worth. A historical example of this is the liberty of privileged slaves. Not every violation of a liberty is, on the other hand, a violation of human dignity: there are good reasons to think that a prohibition to evaluate the quality of a wine in strong, vulgar terms is a violation of freedom of speech. The permission to critique only without such strong, vulgar terms would, however, not be a violation of human dignity.

The relation of human dignity and equality is no different: the preservation of equality does not suffice to protect human dignity, as the case of a non-arbitrary or unbiased administration of the death penalty illustrates: this punishment, although administered perfectly equal, would still violate the dignity of the convicted. Not every unjustified unequal treatment is, on the other hand, necessarily a violation of human dignity. The preservation of equality is a necessary, not a sufficient, condition of the preservation of dignity, a violation of dignity is a sufficient, not a necessary, condition of a violation of equality. Dignity is, however, for equality guarantees of particular importance: it spells out their substantial concerns. This is a prerequisite of their application as the demand of equality as such does not exclude uniform bad treatment, as the example of the death penalty shows. Only if there is a substantial notion attached to it, equality's point becomes clear. This central notion is the intrinsic worth of human beings.

The idea of human dignity always had a distinct political side. It not only demands and forbids certain actions by the state but is a normative standard for the structure of the political order as such. It demands that human beings are the subjects of political life. The right to structures of participatory democracy with the legal infrastructure that it entails is one of its central consequences. The ethical and political point is clear: if human dignity is to be taken seriously, national and international structures of governance have to give human individuals—as far as possible on this scale and as mediated as it may be unavoidable—some meaningful share in the process of political self-determination.

VI. The Universalist Stance: Yet Another Particularism?

These remarks have tried to reconstruct some elements of human dignity as a legal concept from a comparative perspective, embedding the contemporary debates in the history of this idea—as a part of normative theory and as a part of the struggles of real life. The identified core tenets are by no way new and surprising: they are the core tenets of a liberal, egalitarian, and secular humanism. Their origin in secular reflection is important not because of disregard for the impressive contributions of religious beliefs to a culture of dignity, but because only such a justification fits in a methodologically necessarily secular science and can hope to win support across the borders of cultures and religious traditions.

This humanism takes a universalist stance without epistemological embarrassment, as, contrary to the assumptions of some theories mentioned above, there are quite plausible reasons for such an orientation. As has been indicated in the remarks on the history of ideas, arguments from the (often wrongly reported) lack of explicit cultural traditions, from language or genealogy do not justify in principle relativist conclusions. Furthermore, it appears to be not very plausible that the elements of justification referred to are relative to one culture. The perception that life is an end in itself and something worth enjoying for people in Calcutta as much as in Cape Town or Anchorage appears rather plausible. That any of the particular properties of human beings that are the base of the ascription of dignity are limited to a certain class of people—say whites or men—has fortunately lost some of its century-proofed appeal, as the idea that the worth of a human being can be forfeited, for example by religious heresy. That the principle of equal treatment of equals is valid in London as in Beijing or Riyadh sounds likewise not very outlandish. In addition, there are quite interesting mentalistic approaches reconstructing the basis of human moral judgment, including precepts of justice or non-instrumentalization by means of the modern theory of the human mind that may offer a promising framework for a fallibilistic, non-fundamentalist but universalist moral and legal epistemology. Relativism is certainly not without theoretical alternative. These remarks imply an answer to the problem of the antinomy of human rights: they show that the practical universalism of the modern human rights culture is theoretically actually well justified. Comparative analysis consequently has a normative point: it is an effective antidote against judicial parochialism, stirs judicial imaginativeness, and shields against the danger of overlooking convincing normative ideas that have been formulated elsewhere but to solve a similar problem. It can thus supply arguments for doctrinal developments if the positive laws leave room for it. If the respective positive law excludes certain conceptions that seem reasonable they may still be useful for critical assessments of the given legal framework and, finally, these conceptions may be helpful for the shaping of future developments of the law. Comparative research has thus rightly become a constitutive element convincing legal heuristics. The thus in light of what can be regarded as usual standards of justification of any human rights content, justifiable ascription of dignity has to be fleshed out for concrete cases and new challenges, often with no immediately evident solutions, and no easy matter as for any other fundamental right. The courts around the world have made some progress in this respect, for example as to discrimination, the death penalty, or personal autonomy. Accomplishments such as these may seem insignificant, but are—with an eye to the short history of human rights as legal instruments and the power of the forces pursuing ends other than the realization of the dignity of individuals—in fact quite considerable. Human dignity tells a simple story: there are no human lives of greater or lesser worth, whether one of the many, or one of the few that somehow, legitimately or illegitimately, catch the admiring imagination of those to come. Dignity is the value of humans as humans, in this central respect one is like the others irrespective of personal properties and achievements. This idea is consequently the most profound critique of any bifurcation of humanity in guardians and toilers, masters and servants, deserving and undeserving, touchables and untouchables, gender that rules and gender that serves which has dominated much of human history and has been transfigured by thought, as in the magnificent beauty of Plato's prose or stripped naked to its unappealing core in the doctrines of racists, sexists, and their like. Respect for dignity is not costless: dignity demands human solidarity not only in words but in deeds that understand the price to be paid for the enjoyment of humans' common bequest. There are no grounds for any too magnificent hopes for human civilization, because all rosy fogs of illusion about the human lot have been dispersed by the crisp winds of past horrors and the uneasy hunch that humans will—again and again—have more of this in stock for each other. The taste of dignity is not the mawkish flavour of narcissistic human self-admiration and anthropocentrism, although this appears in the history and present as well, sometimes abundantly. The taste is—in the better and certainly in the great contributions—rather saturated with doubt and the uneasy consciousness of the uncanny depth of what makes up the core of the human self. But it still gives reasons to straighten the neck in an unbent existential pride that is able to look in the eyes of what may come. To make human dignity a cornerstone of the modern architecture of human rights at the core of constitutionalism is therefore a well-advised move. There is no reason to downgrade it doctrinally, to reduce its importance in legal systems that protect it, or prevent its incorporations in those, where it plays no or only a limited role through interpretation, with due respect to the limits of this enterprise, or through further development of legal instruments. The law often served and serves power and the interests of a few. A constitutionalism, national and beyond nations' borders, based on the dignity and autonomy of human beings, is part of a different conception of the law. Below the diaphanous folds of legal argument and thought, there is something to be detected that is not wedded to one religious or theoretical creed, but to a fundamental relation to human life: the conviction that care for humans has a point as the being that is at its centre is worth the effort of thought, hope, courage, and sometimes quite profound despair.

Bibliography

Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica (1933ff)

Cicero, De officiis (2007)

Günter Dürig, Die Menschenauffassung des Grundgesetzes (1952)

Ronald Dworkin, Life’s Dominion (1994)

Jürgen Habermas, ‘Das Konzept der Menschenwürde und die realistische Utopie der Menschenrechte’ (2010) 58 Deutsche Zeitschrift für Philosophie 343

Jürgen Habermas, Die Zukunft der menschlichen Natur (2005)

Immanuel Kant, Grundlegung zur Metaphysik der Sitten, Akademie Ausgabe, Bd IV (1911)

Immanuel Kant, Kritik der praktischen Vernunft, Akademie Ausgabe, Bd V (1913)

Matthias Mahlmann, Elemente einer ethischen Grundrechtstheorie (2008)

Matthias Mahlmann, Rationalismus in der praktischen Theorie (2nd edn, 1999)

Avishai Margalit, The Decent Society (1996)

John Mikhail, Elements of Moral Cognition (2011)

Johannes Morsink, The Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1999)

Human Dignity and Autonomy in Modern Constitutional Orders

Notes:

(1) Cf for some examples: UN Charter, Preamble; Universal Declaration of Human Rights, Preamble and Art 1; International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, Preamble; and International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, Preamble, acknowledge a foundational role of dignity for human rights.

(2) Cf for examples from different continents: Finland: s 1; Germany: Art 1; Japan: Art 24; Portugal: Arts 1, 13, 26, 67, 206; Mexico: Art 3(c); South Africa: Art 10; Spain: Art 10; Switzerland: Art 7.

(7) Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment, 10 December 1984 (dignity in preamble).

(9) The European Convention on Human Rights does not contain a reference to human dignity, although such reference is included in additional protocols, cf Protocol 13 noting that ‘the abolition of the death penalty is essential for the protection of this right and for the full recognition of the inherent dignity of all human beings’. The European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) assigned dignity a pivotal role in the architecture of the Convention: Pretty v United Kingdom, App no 2346/02, para 65. The Court connects human dignity with Art 3 (para 52) and states that human autonomy is protected by Art 8 (para 61).

(10) For early references see Art 151 of the Weimar Constitution of Germany (1919) not establishing a subjective right but a principle of economic organization; see further the Preamble of the Constitution of Ireland of 1937. Christopher McCrudden, ‘Human Dignity and Judicial Interpretation of Human Rights’ (2008) 19 European Journal of International Law 664 lists other examples. Dignity, however, was included in the Constitution of Finland by amendment of 17 July 1995 before the Constitution of 1999 came into force. It was included in the Constitution of Portugal by amendment of 11 June 1951 before the Constitution of 1976 came into force. The Preamble of the Cuban Constitution of 1976 refers to human dignity, but not the Preamble of the Constitution of 1940, Art 20 which includes human dignity in a non-discrimination clause. The Constitution of Mexico of 1917, Art 3, did not contain a reference to dignity, the amendment of Art 3c dates from 1946. § 139 on the prohibition of the death penalty in the Paulskirchenverfassung, 28 March 1849 was based on the opinion of the drafters that the human dignity of criminals has to be respected, cf Jörg-Detlef Kühne, Die Rechtsverfassung der Paulskirche (2nd edn, 1998), 344.

(11) Cf Christopher McCrudden (n 10), 655.
Human Dignity and Autonomy in Modern Constitutional Orders

(12) Cf Vicki C. Jackson in Chapter 2 of this volume.

(14) Zweigert and Kötz (n 13), 15ff.

(18) These are common approaches; cf the taxonomy of Mark Tushnet, Weak Courts, Strong Rights (2009), 5ff, distinguishing functionalism and normative universalism, on the one hand, from contextualism and expressivism, on the other.

(19) This is the central point of McRudden (n 10), 710.

(20) This is correctly highlighted by Tushnet (n 18), 10ff.

(22) For some background see Matthias Mahlmann, ‘Dictatorship of the Obscure? Values and the Secular Adjudication of Fundamental Rights’ in András Sajó and Renata Uitz (eds), Constitutional Topography: Values and Constitutions (2010), 343ff; Matthias Mahlmann, Elemente einer ethischen Grundrechtstheorie (2008).

(28) Cf eg Foucault, Les mots et les choses (n 26); Foucault, L’archéologie du savoir (n 26).

(29) Niklas Luhmann, Die Gesellschaft der Gesellschaft (n 26).

(33) Cf eg former judge of the German Federal Constitutional Court, Paul Kirchhof at the Humboldt-Universität, Berlin in 2009, asserting—in the context of an argument for the Christian origins of human dignity—that the Turkish language is lacking a term for human dignity, cf Der Tagesspiegel, 23 April 2009; Die Welt, 23 April 2009.
(34) Genealogical reconstructions often show exclusionary tendencies. Cf the theses voiced by Ernst von Caemmerer, in Hans-Jürgen Papier and Detlef Merten (eds), Handbuch der Grundrechte, Bd VI/1 (2010), § 136, paras 104–112, that human rights are intrinsically connected to the Christian, and less so the Judean, tradition, but are alien to Islam.

(35) For more detail cf Mahlmann, Elemente (n 22), 97–173.

(36) Classic example for this is Cicero, De inventione rhetorica, II, 166. The distinction helps to evaluate the thesis that dignity is honour universalized by the Nazis, cf James Q. Whitman, ‘Nazi “Honour” and New European “Dignity”’ in Christian Joerges and Navraj S. Ghaleigh (eds), Darker Legacies of Law in Europe (2003), 243ff: the point of human dignity proper is that it is a value status intrinsic to any human being, the very point the ideology of racial honour denies—with lethal consequences for those devoid of this ‘honour’. The idea of the universalization of the highest rank appears in a different context in Jeremy Waldron, ‘Dignity and Rank’ (2007) 48 Archives européennes d’archéologie 201.

(37) Cf Sophocles, Antigone (1997), lines 332ff, where the greatness of human beings is praised.

(39) eg Sophocles (n 37).

(40) An important source for the reflection of the worth of humans is the Stoa. Cf the testimony about earlier Stoic thought in Cicero, De officiis, 1, 105.

(41) Both for Judaism and Christianity the idea of an image of god (imago dei) is of central importance, cf Gen 1, 26; 27. Similar ideas are found in other religious frameworks, cf eg for Islam, The Quran, Sure 2, 30 on human beings as ‘representatives’ or ‘successors’ of God.

(42) One of the central elements of Kant's ethics which is foundational for the modern theory of dignity is its principled secularity, cf Immanuel Kant, Die Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der bloßen Vernunft, Akademie Ausgabe, Bd VI, 3. One of the bedrock assumptions of John Rawls's ethics was that humans share an 'aristocracy of all', cf his reconstruction of this idea in Kant's work, John Rawls, Lectures on the History of Moral Philosophy (2000), 213, 306, developed in his later years within a non-religious framework, cf John Rawls, On my Religion, in John Rawls, A Brief Inquiry into the Meaning of Sin and Faith: With ‘On My Religion’ (2009).

(43) Cf Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologica, II-II, q 64: human beings ‘propter se ipsum existens’; John Locke, ‘The Second Treatise’ in Two Treatises on Government, ch II: ‘Being furnished with like faculties, sharing all in one Community of Nature, there cannot be supposed any such Subordination among us, that may Authorize us to destroy one another, as if we were made for one another's uses’ (emphasis in original).

(44) Cf eg Immanuel Kant, Grundlegung zur Metaphysik der Sitten, Akademie Ausgabe, Bd IV, 434 and passim; Immanuel Kant, Kritik der praktischen Vernunft, Akademie Ausgabe, Bd V, 87, 131ff; Immanuel Kant, Kritik der Urteilskraft, Akademie Ausgabe, Bd V, 435.

(45) Cf n 41.

(46) Cf Martin Heidegger, Über den Humanismus (1999), 32 where the position of a human being is described as a ‘Hirt des Seins’ a ‘shepherd of being’. This particular ‘ontical’ position of humans is regarded to be the source of dignity and human worth.

(48) The paradigmatic theory is Kant (n 44).

(49) For a classic example see Thomas Hobbes, Leviathan, ch 10. For a modern variant (human dignity and other human rights functional fiction of an autopoietic social system for the purpose of self-reproduction) see Niklas Luhmann, Grundrechte als Institution (1965); Luhmann (n 29), 1075ff.

(53) Its first decision on dignity refers to ‘Erniedrigung, Brandmarkung, Ächtung’ (humiliation, stigmatization, ostracism), BVerfGE 1, 97 (104). In the decision on the prohibition of the right extremist party SRP, the Court referred to the intrinsic worth of human beings irreconcilable with a totalitarian state, BVerfGE 2, 1 (12). In the decision on the ban of the communist party KPD, the Court stated that human dignity is the supreme value of the constitution, respecting a human being as a person that is concretely entitled to be a subject of a the political, democratic process, BVerfGE 5, 85 (204ff). The priority of the person over the order of the state is emphasized in BVerfGE 7, 198 (205). BVerfGE 45, 187 (227) formulated then programmatically: human beings are a ‘Zweck an sich selbst’—a purpose in itself.

(54) Fully established by BVerfGE 27, 1 (6) and standing case law, despite some sceptical remarks in BVerfGE 30, 1 (25). The ‘object-formula’ is attributed to Günter Dürig, Die Menschenauffassung des Grundgesetzes (1952), 259, stating that the human being as conceptualized under the Basic Law was not the mere object of state power as under Nazi rule; Günter Dürig, ‘Der Grundrechtssatz von der Menschenwürde’ (1956) 81 Archiv des Öffenlichen Rechts 117, 127.

(55) BVerfG NJW 1993, 3190: flooding of prison cell with faeces is a violation of dignity. Cf in this context Brown v Plata, 563 US _ (2011): ‘A prison that deprives prisoners of basic sustenance, including adequate medical care, is incompatible with the concept of human dignity and has no place in civilized society.’

(56) These were already relevant in early decisions preparing the mature jurisprudence BVerfGE 7, 53; 7, 275; 9, 89; or in criminal law BVerfGE 57, 250.

(57) BVerfGE 27, 1: as an early decision on data protection.

(58) BVerfGE 30, 1: declaring a constitutional amendment as reconcilable with dignity that limited access to secret service data to a parliamentary committee, with a sharp (and convincing) dissent, BVerfGE 30, 1 (39).

(59) BVerfGE 45, 187: life imprisonment only reconcilable with dignity if legally regulated possibility to regain freedom.

(60) BVerfGE 39, 1; 88, 203.

(61) BVerfGE 115, 118 on a law allowing for shooting down airplanes in the hands of terrorists to save others, declaring it unconstitutional.

(62) Swiss Federal Court BGE 127 I 6, 14ff. The prohibition of objectivation is underlined in the context of procedural rights, BGE 124 V 180, 181; BGE 127 I 6, 13ff; Hungarian Constitutional Court, Decision 23/1990. 31 October 1990, 3 (Sólyom concurring): humans not to be ‘changed into tool or object’.

(64) Cf eg Supreme Court of Canada, Law v Canada [1999] 1 SCR 497, para 53.

(65) eg Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v Casey 505 US 833, 846 (1992) and below.
(66) Cf eg Public Committee Against Torture in Israel v The State of Israel, 6 September 1999, paras 23–32: shaking, forced crouching on one's toes, cuffing in contorted positions, covering the head with a sack, long-term exposition to loud music, the (contorted) 'Shabach' position on a chair, deprivation of sleep to break a person without further reasoning what exactly makes the concrete acts violations of dignity. Cf Mordechai Kremnitzer and Re'em Segev, 'The Legality of Interrogational Torture: A Question of Proper Authorization or a substantial Moral Issue?' (2000) 34 Israel Law Review 509.

(68) eg SACC, Government of the Republic of South Africa and Others v Grootboom and Others (CCT 11/00) [2000] ZACC 19; 2001 (1) SA 46; 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (4 October 2000), para 44 and below.

(69) eg BVerfGE 30, 173 (194).

(70) eg SACC, De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecution (CCT 5/03) [2003] ZACC 19; 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC); 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC) (15 October 2003), paras 61ff, para 63 referring to degradation and objectification of children through child pornography.

(71) eg S v Jordan and Others (CCT 31/01) [2002] ZACC 22; 2002 (6) SA 642; 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (9 October 2002) (O'Regan and Sachs), para 74: no infringement in the dignity of prostitutes by criminalizing their activities because the violation of dignity actually lies in the 'commodification' of the human body.

(72) eg Supreme Court of Canada, R v Keegstra [1990] 3 SCR 697.

(73) Cf BVerfGE 2, 1 (SRP); 5, 85 (KPD).

(74) The federal Constitution does not contain a reference to human dignity. On the level of states, the Montana Constitution of 1972, Art II(4) provides that the 'dignity of the human being is inviolable'. In addition, there are a reference to dignity in the Louisiana Constitution, Art I(3) and the Illinois Constitution, Art 1(20). Only the Montana clause, it appears, had any and partly quite interesting legal effects, cf Vicki C. Jackson, 'Constitutional Dialogue and Human Dignity: States and Transnational Constitutional Discourse' (2004) 65 Montana Law Review 15.

(76) Ibid 249, 252ff.

(77) As the first reference in re Yamashita 327 US 1, 29 (Murphy, dissenting):

If we are ever to develop an orderly international community based upon a recognition of human dignity it is of the utmost importance that the necessary punishment of those guilty of atrocities be as free as possible from the ugly stigma of revenge and vindictiveness.

(On the question of punishment for war crimes of a Japanese General.)

(79) See below n 84.

(80) Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v Casey 505 US 833, 846 (1992) and below.

(82) An example of a doctrinal path differentiating dignity from other personality rights is the course taken by the German Federal Constitutional Court which created through jurisdiction a general right to protection of the individual personality by reading Art 2(1) (personal liberty) in conjunction with Art 1 (dignity), allowing—unlike dignity—for limitations by all other rights, cf BVerfGE 54, 148 (153).

(84) Trop v Dulles 356 US 84, 100 (1958) on the ‘dignity of man’ as the underlying concept of the 8th amendment:

Death is truly an awesome punishment. The calculated killing of a human being by the State involves, by its very nature, a denial of the executed person’s humanity. ... In comparison to all other punishments today, then, the deliberate extinguishment of human life by the state is uniquely degrading to human dignity.

(85) Consequently, graphic descriptions of the realities of executions and the death row phenomenon play a significant role in jurisprudential arguments, cf eg Supreme Court of Canada, Kindler v Canada [1991] 2 SCR 779 (Lamer and Cory dissenting); SACC Makwanyane, paras 26ff (Chaskalson); 335 (Regan).

(87) SACC, Makwanyane, para 251 (Madala): no individual beyond reformation.

(88) Cf SACC, Makwanyane, para 144 (Chaskalson); para 166 (Ackerman); paras 313, 316 (Mogkoro); Hungarian Constitutional Court, Decision 23/1990, 31 October 1990, 3. (Sólyom concurring): humans not to be ‘changed into tool or object’. Note that the element of contempt for human worth displayed in the mode of execution does not necessarily imply an instrumentalization—the latter is an additional and separate aspect.

(89) The protection of the subject status was decisive in BVerfGE 45, 187.

(91) eg S v Jordan and Others (n 71) (O’Regan and Sachs) para 74.

(92) SACC, De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecution (n 70), paras 61ff, 63.

(93) ECHR, Gäfgen, App no 22978/05, 1 June 2010 (Grand Chamber), paras 87, 107.

The denial of equal dignity and worth all too quickly and insidiously degenerates into a denial of humanity and leads to inhuman treatment by the rest of society in many other ways. This is deeply demeaning and frequently has the cruel effect of undermining the confidence and the sense of worth of lesbians and gays.

(95) BVerfGE 45, 187 (227).

(96) The German Federal Constitutional Court demands eg that the position of a subject is put into question ‘in principle’, BVerfGE 97, 209 (228). An example is the dismissal of the claim that the wrong spelling of a person’s name may violate human dignity, German Federal Administrative Court BVerwGE 31, 236 (237). Examples like the spelling case are sometimes taken as illustrations of a dangerous expansion of dignity law. This, however, would only be the case if the claims were not only made but were successful due to structural properties of dignity guarantees.

(97) See the argument in death penalty cases, that someone who has committed certain crimes, has forfeited his right to dignity, cf the argument of the South African Attorney General in SACC, Makwanyane, para 136, taken to be fallacious by the court, ibid para 137. The same conclusion was reached by Brennan, in Furman v Georgia 408 US
238, 273 (Brennan J concurring): even the vilest criminal remains a human being.

(98) The drafting history of dignity guarantees is full of pluralistic influences, without clear dominant strands that are sometimes identified from Kant to Jacques Maritain, The Rights of Man and Natural Law (1944). Cf Johannes Morsink, The Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1999), Mary Ann Glendon, A World Made New (2002); Mahlmann, Elemente (n 22), 244ff.

(99) Cf Chaskalson, Langa, Mahomed, and Mogkoro, SACC, Makwanyane, paras 131, 223ff, 263, 300ff, at 313 with an explicit connection of the prohibition of instrumentalization with the discussed indigenous African tradition and ubuntu; paras 358ff, 374ff (Sachs).

(100) BVerfGE 1, 97 (104). BVerfGE 45, 187); SACC, Dawood and Another v Minister of Home Affairs and Others; Shalabi and Another v Minister of Home Affairs and Others; Thomas and Another v Minister of Home Affairs and Others (CCT35/99) [2000] ZACC 8; 2000 (3) SA 936, 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (7 June 2000), para 35.

(101) Cf Dürg, ‘Der Grundrechtssatz von der Menschenwürde’ (n 54) 119.

(102) For the United States, Neuman (n 75) sums up:

There is no constitutional right to human dignity as such, no objective constitutional norm prohibiting all state action inconsistent with human dignity, and no mandate upon the state to ensure the realization of human dignity. Human dignity informs the interpretation of particular constitutional rights, including the general rights to equality and liberty.

See also sceptical remarks about dignity as subjective rights by David Feldman, ‘Human Dignity as a Legal Value-Part I’ (1999) Public Law 682.

(103) eg German Basic Law, Art 19(3).

(104) The Swiss Federal Court has applied the ‘dignity of the creature’ (Swiss Federal Constitution, Art 120(2)) in a leading case on research with primates restricting this research, although not out ruling it in principle. It held that there is a difference between the ‘dignity of the creature’ of Art 120(2) and human dignity of the Swiss Federal Constitution, Art 7, without clearly stating what this difference is, BGE 135 II 384, 403. In Israel, the Supreme Court has referred ambiguously to the dignity or honour (kavod) of animals (concretely alligators in the context of alligator wrestling) in Let the Animals Live v Hamat Gader Recreation Enterprise, LCA 1684/96, cf McCrudden (n 10). The Court did not refer to the Basic Law of Dignity and Freedom, but statutory law on animal protection (thanks to Dr Liat Levanon for clarification on the Hebrew text). In a later case, ‘Noah’—The Israel Federation of Animal Protection Organizations v The Attorney General, HCJ 9232/01, 11 August 2003, the Court did not refer to honour or dignity, but to the suffering of animals.

(105) Cf BVerfGE 39, 1; 88, 203.

(106) SACC, Makwanyane, para 314 (Mokgoro).

(107) The German Federal Constitutional Court has referred to the ‘Würde des Menschen als Gattungswesen’, to ‘the dignity of a human being as a species-being’, BVerfGE 87, 209 (228).

(108) Cf eg Constitution of South Africa, ss 8(2) and 8(3); Swiss Constitution, Art 35(3). On horizontal effect see Chapter 26.

(109) BVerfGE 7, 198.

(110) The Constitution of South Africa, s 9(4), enacts a direct horizontal effect of the prohibition of discrimination, which in turn is governed by human dignity, cf Ackermann (n 31), 538, 550ff. Direct horizontal effect seems to be implied in BVerfGE 24, 119 (144); 115, 118 (153).

(111) Dignity may not be explicitly mentioned, cf Art 4 ECHR, 13th Amendment of the US Constitution.

(112) Cf in the case of abortion BVerfGE 39, 1 (41); 88, 203 with rather wide-ranging conclusions.

(114) German Federal Administrative Court, BVerwGE 64, 274 (278ff).

(115) ECJ, C-36/02 Omega (14 October 2004).

(116) The reference to social rights to human dignity is common, eg Universal Declaration of Human Rights, Art 23(3). For a right to the provision of minimum livelihood cf BVerfGE 45, 187 (228); 82, 60 (85); 125, 175 (222).

(117) Cf Swiss Federal Court BGE 124 V 180, 181; BGE 127 I 6, 13 ff; BVerfGE 7, 275 (279).

(118) BVerfGE 28, 314 (323).

(119) This is the tendency of BVerfGE 88, 203 (251) or of the dissent of Rupp-von Brünneck BVerfGE 39, 1 (80). The ECJ, C-34/10, Brüstle v Greenpeace (18 October 2011) ruled that any ovum after fertilization, any non-fertilized human ovum into which the the cell nucleus from a mature human cell has been transplanted, and any non-fertilized human ovum whose division and further development have been stimulated by parthenogenesis constitute a human embryo. This interpretation is derived from the need to protect human dignity, paras 32–34.

(120) Cf BVerfGE 39, 1(37).

(121) Cf Roe v Wade 410 US 113, 163 (1973); Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v Casey 505 US 833, 846 (1992). The rights of the embryo/fetus are not explicitly constructed as related to dignity by the Court, the reasoning uses, however, central notions of what this term is about, cf eg ‘the profound respect for the life of the unborn’, Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v Casey 505 US 833, 877 (1992). Cf Stenberg v Carhart 530 US 914 (2000); Gonzales v Carhart 550 US 124 (2007), stating that the Act under review ‘expresses respect for the dignity of human life’, without, however clarifying whether this was the constitutional stake for the Court as well.

(122) Cf ECtHR, A, B and C v Ireland, App no 25579, 16 December 2010, paras 233, 237: rights of unborn engaged, states enjoy a margin of appreciation as to the legal definition of the beginning of life. In Vo v France, App no 53924/00, 8 July 2004, para 84, the Court, however, stated:

At best, it may be regarded as common ground between States that the embryo/fetus belongs to the human race. The potentiality of that being and its capacity to become a person—enjoying protection under the civil law, moreover, in many States, such as France, in the context of inheritance and gifts, and also in the United Kingdom ... —require protection in the name of dignity (emphasis added).

(123) This seems to be implied in BVerfGE 88, 203, 210, 283, 306 as in the dissent in BVerfGE 39, 1, 79.

(124) In ECtHR, Vo v France, App no 53924/00, 8 July 2004, para 84, the reference must be to objective law as persons as necessary bearers of subjective rights are assumed not yet to exist. The state’s interest in protecting the life of the fetus referred to by the US Supreme Court (n 121) appears also to refer to objective law, as it is the ‘state’s interest’ that is of concern, not the interest of an individual.

(125) eg Germany, BVerfGE 30, 173, 194; BVerfG NJW 2001, 2957, 2959; Israel, Frederika Shavit v Rishon Lezion Burial Society, CA 6024/97, 6 July 1999, paras 4, 16, 20, 26 confirming earlier judgments, in particular Jerusalem Community Jewish Burial Society v Kestenbaum, CA 294/91. The case concerned the right to inscribe non-Hebrew letters and to use the Gregorian calendar in a Jewish cemetery. On the background see ibid Englard (dissenting), para 18: ‘behind this dispute, forces are warring for the character of Judaism and the state of Israel’. The issue can thus be of more than individual concern.

(127) Cf ECtHR, Gäfgen v Germany, App no 22978/05, 1 June 2010 (Grand Chamber), paras 87, 107.
(128) See eg in Public Committee Against Torture in Israel v The State of Israel, 6 September 1999, para 23.

(129) Cf Swiss Constitution, Art 36(4) , though it remains to be clarified what limitations are possible under Swiss law.

(130) See Chapter 51.

(131) Cf BVerfGE 37, 1, 43; 88, 203, 255.

(133) Cf Federal German Constitutional Court, BVerfGE 39, 1; 88, 203 allowing an abortion for reasons of life and health of the mother, cases such as rape and well-being thus establishing de facto freedom of the ultimate decision of the woman concerned in the first trimester, although with various procedural qualifications, not all convincing.

(134) Cf the summary of the development in Gonzales v Carhart 550 US 124 (2007) Ginsburg (dissenting), 171 n 2; 183ff or in BVerfGE 88, 203, 340, 348 (Mahrenholz and Sommer dissenting).

(135) ECtHR, Gäfgen, App no 22978/05, 1 June 2010 (Grand Chamber), paras 87, 107. The argument could run like this: the state has a duty stemming from dignity to protect the victim of a kidnapper against instrumentalization; the kidnapper is turned into a means for the provision of information through torture.

(136) BVerfG NJW 2001, 2957, 2959.

(137) The problem is illustrated by the following passage (internal quotations omitted) from Frederika Shavit v Rishon Lezion Burial Society, CA 6024/97, 6 July 1999, para 9 (Barak concurring):

From one point of view I assume that the value (or liberty) of freedom of religion is an aspect of human dignity, from the other point of view there is the value (or liberty) of freedom from religion, which is also an aspect of human dignity. ... This is not the first time we have weighed different aspects of the same liberty. ... Thus we also behaved when the right to one's good name (which is part of human dignity) clashed with the right to freedom of expression (which, in my view, is another aspect of human dignity).

(138) Cf Swiss Federal Court BGE 127 I 6, 14.

(139) For an example for the violation of the basic worth of a human being through discrimination Brown v Board of Education 347 US 483, 494 (1954).

(140) James Wilson formulated: ‘Man, fearfully and wonderfully made, is the workmanship of his all perfect Creator: A State; useful and valuable as the contrivance is, is the inferior contrivance of man; and from his native dignity derives all its acquired importance’, Chisholm, Ex’r v Georgia 2 US 419, 2 Dall 419, 455 (1793). Cf Supreme Court of Canada, Kindler v Canada [1991] 2 SCR 779 (Cory); SACC, Makwanyane, para 330 (Regan); BVerfGE 5, 85 (204).

(141) For a detailed review of Kant's theory cf Mahlmann, Elemente (n 22), 152ff.

(142) As Nietzsche thought: see Friedrich Nietzsche, ‘Fünf Vorreden zu fünf ungeschriebenen Büchern’ in Friedrich Nietzsche, Kritische Studienausgabe (1999), Bd I, 776.

(144) On the extensive debates on the matter, not least on the arguments from belonging to the human species, the continuity of human development from conception via birth to adulthood, the potentiality of pre-natal life and the identity of pre-natal life with the post-natal human being, see Mahlmann, Elemente (n 22), 293ff.

(145) An example is ECtHR, Vo v France, App no 53924/00, 8 July 2004.

(146) ECtHR, Uj v Hungary, App no 23954/10, 19 July 2011.

(147) Not to take into account periods of employment completed by an employee before reaching the age of 25 in calculating the notice period for dismissal can be regarded with convincing reasons to form discrimination on the ground of age, but hardly as a violation of human dignity, cf ECJ, C-555/07 Seda Küçükdeveci v Swedex GmbH & Co KG, para 57 (19 January 2010). An interpretation of equality and non-discrimination clauses as in Law v Canada [1999] 1 SCR 497 paras 52ff which constructs the equality guarantee to demand a violation of human dignity is in danger of interpreting the equality guarantee too narrowly or human dignity too broadly. Cf Supreme Court of Canada, R v Kapp, 2008 SCC 41, para 22.

Matthias Mahlmann
Matthias Mahlmann is Professor of Law, Chair of Legal Theory, Legal Sociology and International Public Law, University of Zurich, Faculty of Law
Gender in Constitutions

Abstract and Keywords

This article explores the role of gender in constitutions. The voices and concerns of women have been largely absent from official constituting processes and decisive interpretations until recently. Historically, constitutions have been almost exclusively man-made, and it shows. The central gender question posed by comparative constitutional analysis is the impact of intervention at the constitutional level on gender hierarchy in life and law. The gendered features of constitutional regimes, in their relations to the social and legal contexts they reflect and shape, can be analyzed along four principled dimensions through which sex inequality is institutionalized, and along which it is being contested. The first concerns equality; the second concerns relative freedom; the third involves the structural private dimension; the fourth involves the political dimension in the broadest sense. Often the four dimensions intersect and interact. For example, the family is considered structurally private and can be controlled by moral rules of religious or customary law, shaping realities of gender hierarchy that would trigger equality law (law that itself may either be constructed around difference or in opposition to dominance). These interconnections can make gendered issues doubly or even triply difficult to reach and remedy constitutionally.

Keywords: constitution, gender issues, women, constitutional analysis, sex inequality

I. Analytical Framework

II. Application

1. Difference and Dominance
2. Coercion and Consent
3. Public and Private
4. Morality and Politics

Constitutions found nations, define states, and ground and bind governments. Largely absent from official constituting processes and decisive interpretations until recently—flags of democracy flying notwithstanding—have been the voices and concerns of women, a group that comprises over half of most populations worldwide. Historically, constitutions have been almost exclusively man-made, and it shows.

Women and men are socially organized as such—into sexes—by cultures that attribute that designation and assignment to the biology of their sex. Gender is the social meaning of sex. Socially, the qualities ascribed to biological females are deemed feminine in gender; those thought biologically male are considered masculine in gender—thus ascribed to women and men as such respectively. Most individuals, regardless of biology, present a rich mix of both sets of traits, supporting a showing that the assertedly natural basis of these stereotyped social features is a pervasive ideology. The sexes, paralleled by the genders attributed to each, are, with variation, documented unequal in status and treatment throughout the world and over time, with men assigned a superior social position of power and worth over women—often through the collaboration of official patterns of intervention or deference, affirmation or neglect—masculinity accorded preeminence over femininity and granted a higher rank and value.5

I. Analytical Framework

Gender is institutionalized in constitutions, along with most areas of social life, in ways great and small, textual and structural, blatant and subtle. Gendered language pervades constitutions, including in seemingly habitual use of the masculine generic, such as usage of ‘his’ or ‘he’ in reference to rights-bearers, impliedly equating citizenship with maleness. Some constitutions use gendered terms as the equivalent of every individual, as Armenia, which grants ‘his or her’ rights 51 times.6 The Cambodian Constitution provides a range of specific rights to ‘Khmer citizens of either sex’,7 raising the question of the effect of explicitly calling attention to sex at all. Provisions protecting women and men from enslavement8 pose a similar question, although slavery can take sex-specific forms, as is seemingly recognized in constitutional provisions committed to women’s freedom from prostitution, trafficking, and other forms of sexual exploitation,9 which, in turn, call sex-specific constitutional attention to a radically gender-skewed problem, the victims of which are, however, by no means confined to women.

Tacit gender-based language guarantees to all citizens ‘fundamental freedoms and the Rights of Man’, an Algerian constitutional reference to human rights that is common in the French tradition. It also refers to the national heritage as ‘the common patrimony of all Algerians [masculine] and Algerians [feminine]’.10 On the other end of the spectrum, in provisions with clear differential bite, Tonga’s Constitution enforces primogeniture by distinguishing between male and female children in property succession.11 Only male children (‘son[s]’) are mentioned in the elaborate and labyrinthine constitutional rules for succession to the throne of Brunei.12 Here, not even a daughter of the most prized ‘blood’ is considered over her ever more distant male relatives. And the Constitution of Myanmar, having prohibited sex discrimination in civil service, comes right out and says that ‘nothing in this Section shall prevent appointment of men to the positions that are suitable for men only’.13

Despite gendered language littering the surface of constitutions, with consequences great and small, few indications exist that the substance of gender inherent in the sex-unequal status and life chances of women have been considered in making conventional constitutional decisions, certainly not until the modern period, and not usually even then. Yet evidence and logic indicate that constituting choices, including those that have no gender on their face, can have powerful consequences for women as women, meaning women as a sex in the gendered sense. The observation that women may receive more recognition of rights from distant than near authorities implies that more centralized and internationally receptive systems may advance their rights more decisively than do federated and local systems. Common law systems, which allow direct access to courts by individuals with lawyers and conceive law as open-ended and intrinsically responsive to changing social perceptions and realities as well as to individual circumstances, may be somewhat less elite and exclusionary, hence more amenable to gender equality, than civil law processes that favor legislation. Judicial supremacy allows appeals to principle over power, predominant in many legislatures, from which women have been effectively excluded in the past, although some scholars have argued that legislatures, as deliberative bodies, are more conducive to needed changes for women.14 The division and scope of powers of each branch, including whether and with what reach legislatures are permitted to guarantee equality rights where inequality reigns, doubtless affects social outcomes for women and lower status men. These structural questions, along with whether presidential or parliamentary systems are more receptive to women’s voices and interests, must be regarded as hypothesis-generating at present, calling for further inquiry into their impact on gender-based inequality.16

Each regime’s concept of, and attitude toward, rights as such profoundly shapes the capacity of constitutions to be used to change gender-based inequality in law and society. Rights can be aspirational and open-ended or concrete and limited to specified areas, negative or positive, individual or collective. Sources of law and their ranking can be crucial. International law occupies varied places in national systems ranging from incorporation and deference to rejection in favor of the parochially domestic. The place and content of religion or customary law can be decisive, as family law is often governed by extra- or pre-legal systems, and women’s lives are often confined to and by the family. Criminal law, defining gender crimes and accountability for them through a wide variety of constitutional rubrics, can also be shaped by religious, customary, international, or common law with major impact.
Gender in Constitutions

on women's equality, dignity, and personal security, all dimensions of their gender status. Demonstrably central is the approach adopted by each constitutional court to interpreting and implementing equality obligations.

The larger political context in which a constitution is framed and interpreted powerfully affects its utility for gender justice as well. Democracy may or may not improve women's situation, as illustrated by the collapse of women's electoral representation with the erosion of their social and economic rights across Central and Eastern Europe after the fall of communism, although women's presence in a legislative body that itself has little power cannot be considered effective representation. (As with occupations, perhaps the less power a legislature has, the more women may be found in it.) The role of women's movements, especially whether seen as indigenous or alien, influences constitutional developments as well, as shown by gains in many Latin American settings, including after authoritarianism. Additional variables that appear to contribute to determining whether constitutions move toward gender equality include the quality, depth, and organization of civil society and the norms governing its relation to the state; the effectiveness of addressing racism and social and economic rights; the systematic role of the military; and the conditions and recency of internal or external conflict among men. Media, from the contributions of a free press to the ravages of the pornography industry, powerfully control how and what people can know and think and feel, hence do, on gendered dimensions as well as others. Corruption—self-dealing of the powerful using resources that are unequally distributed (inter alia) on the basis of sex and gender—can undermine any legal guarantee, underlining the importance of knowing whether the rule of law is the rule, corruption the exception, or corruption is the rule. Constitutions are regnant over these factors but also reflect their imprint.

If no scholarship yet considers all these determinants together in a consolidated field theory, considerable work has been done in a number of these discrete areas, some of it comparative, some in considerable depth in a single jurisdiction. The relation of constitutional provisions addressing gender and gendered realities to women's situations on the ground has thus not yet been established in a systematic way, although promising beginning attempts have been made. Comparing measures of sex inequality with relatively explicit constitutional provisions in the gendered domain discloses revealing patterns. Of the two countries with the highest international ranking for equality of the sexes, Norway has no equality provisions in its constitution and Australia has no formal written constitution at all, although both have documents that fill this approximate function. The next two countries with the highest sex equality in international rankings—the United States (although its high rate of sexual assault is not taken into account) and Ireland—have generic equality provisions that do not mention sex or gender textually. In contrast, many nations with the lowest equality rankings in the world have strongly worded provisions guaranteeing equality generally, sex equality specifically, gender equality, and equal rights between women and men concretely and with admirable particularity. Malawi has one of the most detailed constitutional provisions for equality of the sexes in the world, guaranteeing equal protection of the law, women 'the same rights as men in civil law’, invalidating laws that discriminate based on gender, requiring legislation be passed to eliminate discriminatory customs and practices including ‘sexual abuse, harassment and violence’ as well as discrimination at work and in property, guaranteeing full participation in all spheres of society, and requiring implementation of laws to address ‘domestic violence, security of the person, lack of maternity benefits, economic exploitation and rights to property’. Malawi rests at number 153 in sex inequality among the 169 nations ranked. In the Democratic Republic of the Congo—number 168 of 169 in sex inequality measures even without its astronomical incidence of rape in ongoing conflicts not reflected in that measure—the Constitution requires that ‘the public powers see to the elimination of any form of discrimination concerning women’ and ‘take measures to struggle against all forms of violence made against women in public and in private life’.

On this qualitative level at the extremes, the evidence approaches a constitutional paradox: attention to gender in a constitution may as much indicate a problem to be solved as provide a tool for its solution. Often the reasons for the gap between guarantee and reality—surely as extreme for gender as for the relation of constitutional law to any other social regularity—lie elsewhere than in constitutions. Norway has had a Gender Equality Act in force since 1979 that refers directly to its ratification of the international Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) the same year. The Norwegian women's movement has had notably strong working relationships with women in parliament and women's public policy agencies during this period as well, a factor found to powerfully potentiate gender egalitarian policy results. Having expanded its statutory prohibitions on gender discrimination repeatedly, Norway's Human Rights Act 1999 incorporated CEDAW into domestic law, guaranteeing its precedence over other national legislation. Australia too has signed CEDAW, enabling its federal government to enact strong domestic legislation to enforce nondiscrimination against women in the absence of a written constitution.\footnote{Gender, and the inequality based on it, is so pervasive in law and life that positing any link risks overdetermination. Where constitutions are strong on sex equality and gender inequality in life is somewhat attenuated, even if only comparatively speaking, the potential for simultaneity bias is rife: the same forces that determine women's status relative to men in particular cultures and jurisdictions may control whether constitutional guarantees of sex equality are present and how robustly they are interpreted and enforced, clouding inference of constitutional causality. Many apparently causal factors operate with varying force in diverse settings. In some places, the power of a guarantee may derive less from its language than from its judicial interpretation. The strength of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms for women, for example, is due less to its terms, although they have merit, and more to its implementing equality theory, predicated on a substantive approach to sex inequality. Constitutional language can be highly specific and extensive, as in Brazil, but a comparatively weak role for the judiciary can make it less potent. International law can be creatively implemented in constitutions, as in India for instance, providing crucial leverage for advancing women's rights on specific issues and support for local nongovernmental organizations. But corruption of various kinds can intervene to vitiate its effectiveness on the ground. Countries like Israel have a constitutionalistic norm and strong judicial discourse of sex equality with no written constitution. Despite such challenges, comparative constitutional consideration of gender inequality has begun, including unmasking the masculinity that discernibly animates the institutions men design, of which a constitution is an apex legal form in most contemporary national states. But at this stage, comparative analysis of gender in constitutions leans toward a descriptive, qualitative, and contextual understanding that is more art than science.

II. Application

The central gender question posed by comparative constitutional analysis is the impact of intervention at the constitutional level on gender hierarchy in life and law. The gendered features of constitutional regimes, in their relations to the social and legal contexts they reflect and shape, can be analyzed along four principled dimensions through which sex inequality is institutionalized, and along which it is being contested. The first concerns equality. It appears that the more a country addresses the substance of gender hierarchy in its equality jurisprudence, as opposed to taking the traditional sameness-difference approach to sex, the more it will promote gender equality through law. The second concerns relative freedom. For if gender equality is to be real, women's voice and choices need to be real, rather than their consent being presumed under conditions of coercion, which include law and socialization. The third involves the structural private. Arguably, the more issues conventionally regarded as private in the gendered domain are addressed as the public issues of sex discrimination that they are, including through jurisdiction, the more gender inequality will be weakened as a structural factor. The fourth involves the political in the broadest sense. Morality, especially when cultural or religious, can be a guise for power-ordered relationships based on sex and gender, yet is frequently regarded as exempt from gender scrutiny. A gender perspective on constitutions exposes such realms to scrutiny. Often the four dimensions intersect and interact. For example, the family is considered structurally private and can be controlled by moral rules of religious or customary law, shaping realities of gender hierarchy that would trigger equality law (law that itself may either be constructed around difference or in opposition to dominance). These interconnections can make gendered issues doubly or even triply difficult to reach and remedy constitutionally.

1. Difference and Dominance
Gender is an inequality. A telling analytic dimension along which the constitutional treatment of gender can accordingly be traced—one readily susceptible to comparative study—concerns the faces and features of equality as a constitutional guarantee. Not all gender inequality will be found subject to constitutional equality guarantees. Even where such guarantees are not absent, they can be flaccid or deemed inapplicable to gendered areas of life. This principled dimension of analysis thus focuses upon the extent to which constitutional equality standards that do exist confront, deconstruct, and dismantle gender hierarchy or continue to permit, essentialize, and institutionalize it.

Constitutional remediation of the pervasively unequal status and treatment of women based on gender through equality guarantees has been slow, despite their facial promise. Understanding men as men in the legal context has been even slower. Possibly this is because considering women as particular and different and marked as ‘the sex’, men as generic and standard and universally human, unmarked by sex or gender specificity, has elevated men over women on the human scale, even as the consequences for men who fall below masculine gender standards are punishing. One constitutional index to this larger matter are the 12 constitutions that expressly stipulate that the use therein of exclusive sex-based terms, usually the masculine generic, means both sexes. Cyprus, for example, provides that ‘words importing the masculine gender include females’. That said, most constitutions contain equality guarantees that differentially bear upon the gendered domain. Whether equality is formal or substantive, abstract or concrete, general or specific, vertical or also horizontal, an overarching norm or a strictly legal claim, its second-order attributes can decisively define how effective the guarantees prove to be.

Nearly 200 countries (including for this purpose the European Union as an entity and Vatican City) have written constitutions. Of these, 184 guarantee gender equality in one or more of its various forms, although the reality of gender equality exists nowhere. Least common are general constitutional grants of abstract equality only, the text naked of specific grounds or groups, a pattern seen only in Indonesia, Kuwait, Latvia, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Singapore, United Arab Emirates, and the United States. States in the United States are (p. 405) forbidden to ‘deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws’; As a contrasting instance, Uruguay's still comparatively sparse equality commitment is more expansive: ‘All persons are equal before the law, no other distinctions being recognized among them save those of talent and virtue.’ By distinction, 139 countries expressly provide for sex equality or nondiscrimination on the basis of sex, 71 of these recognizing both equality generally and sex equality specifically. The vast majority of constitutions thus textually guarantee equality of the sexes in some facially explicit form, prohibiting discrimination ‘on grounds of’ or ‘on the basis of’ sex, or according rights to all citizens ‘regardless of’ sex. States that guarantee equal rights to women and men by name, registering a more substantive vision of the people who possess the rights, are also substantial in number—114 constitutions from Afghanistan to Zimbabwe reflect this pattern—often with culturally specific variations that were clearly carefully considered. Of these, 20 provide for equality between males and females, or male and female persons, as in Canada’s hard-fought, but so far unused, Section 28. A perhaps surprising 66 expressly provide for gender equality, as in ‘Lao citizens are all equal before the law irrespective of their gender. By some gendered constitutional provisions are female protective in ways that may be intended to equalize against an unequal reality or may have the paternalistic purpose or effect of keeping women in a subordinate role. Examples of the former, as in the Central African Republic, may take special notice of violence against women. Among the latter are incentives for motherhood and prohibitions on women working at night. Ambiguously in this respect, some constitutions prescribe different pension requirements by sex or require sex-segregation of incarcerated women. Spouses, or husbands and wives, are granted equality in the family in numerous constitutions, among them some of the 29 countries in which marriage is confined to a man and a woman by constitutional fiat. Most of these examples are found in Latin American constitutions that also possess equality provisions, the simple sex discrimination inherent in dictating (p. 406) one’s marital partner by sex apparently overlooked. Although they position women and men equally in a social institution on their face (particularly as against plural marriage, for instance), such provisions may, depending upon the circumstances, be considered equality-promoting or inequality-entrenching, even as their gendered nature is unambiguous.

Whatever the textual language, various equality theories are deployed by the judiciary in interpreting and applying gender terms. Demonstrably crucial is whether sex and gender are seen as a matter of sameness and difference, abstract and generic and symmetrical, as in the traditional Aristotelian model of likes alike, unlike these unalike, or whether sex and gender are recognized as presenting a question of social domination and subordination, a substantive and asymmetrical hierarchy, as do some modern constitutional systems, notably Canada and South
The standard Enlightenment question of whether gender should be addressed under general equality principles or through its particularity as to sex both derives from and serves to obscure the question of whether the standard for generic equality is defined in masculine terms—hence whether the content of sex-specific rules compound or counter gender hierarchy. The real issue here is not the constitutional language alone, but whether the equality standards applied to interpret it recognize and oppose substantive hierarchy, an approach that concrete sex-specific language may or may not accomplish or encourage. The related question of whether classifications by sex should be limited or prohibited, or whether the class women should be specifically protected, derives from and stands in for the same question of fundamental posture: Is sex a symmetrical abstraction, as in the traditional sameness/difference model, or is gender inequality seen as an artifact of an historical disadvantage that is asymmetrical and subject to rectification?

The gap between equality guarantees in constitutions and the unequal relative status of the sexes is striking in virtually all settings. A look at the world’s constitutions suggests little if any determinate relationship between a constitution addressing women’s rights and their equality of status relative to men. There is much such language to look at. Austria requires governmental entities ‘subscribe to the de facto equality of men and women’; women in the People’s Republic of China enjoy equal rights with men in all spheres of life; ‘Women and men are equal before the law’ in the Dominican Republic and in many other states. ‘Women and men shall have the same rights and duties in all areas of family, political, economic, social and cultural life’ in Timor Leste. In Iran, ‘All citizens of the country, both men and women, equally enjoy the protection of the law and enjoy all human, political, economic, social and cultural rights, in conformity with Islamic criteria’. In Yemen, ‘Women are the sisters of men. They have rights and duties, which are guaranteed and assigned by the Shari’ah and stipulated (p. 407) by law.’ In their Preamble, the people of Zambia ‘recognize the equal worth of men and women in their rights to participate, and freely determine and build a political, economic and social system of their own free choice.’ More affirmatively still, Syria ‘guarantees women all opportunities enabling them to fully and effectively participate in the political, social, cultural, and economic life. The state removes the restrictions that prevent women’s development and participation in building the socialist Arab society.’ These countries rank up and down the sex inequality scale with little to no discernible relation between equality of the sexes in life and the strength of constitutional language. This does not mean that recognizing women’s rights in constitutions is not symbolically and/or practically important for advancing gender equality in any particular situation or overall. These examples may indicate more about the role and rule of law itself in the jurisdiction than anything else.

Where approaches to equality are most substantive—in that the substance of gender hierarchy is identified and addressed in the text—constitutional provisions may look like Colombia’s Article 13 which, after providing for equality before the law and prohibiting discrimination ‘on the basis of gender’, states:

> The state will promote the conditions necessary in order that equality may be real and effective and will adopt measures in favor of groups which are discriminated against or marginalized. The state will especially protect those individuals who on account of their economic, physical, or mental condition are in obviously vulnerable circumstances and will sanction any abuse or ill-treatment perpetrated against them.

As this language suggests, whether or not affirmatively acting to produce sex equality is distinguishable from prohibition of discrimination is (again) further derivative of whether the model of inequality is one of sameness and difference, in which case the distinction holds, or of hierarchy, specifically domination and subordination, in which case there is no such distinction. Failing to act to end subordination and enforcing subordination both maintain dominance and disadvantage, hence is simply discriminatory.

Paradigmatic on this issue is Article 3(2) of Germany’s Basic Law: ‘The State shall promote the actual implementation of equal rights for women and men and take steps to eliminate disadvantages that now exist.’ As applied, this clause aims at ‘overcom[ing] men’s traditional domination over women’. The jurisprudence under this article understands that ending discrimination against women is not positive discrimination in their favor; it is equality, not discrimination at all. Article 3(3) states, ‘No one may be disadvantaged or favored because of his sex’. Instead of using this provision to make impossible any steps toward real equality, as called for under Article 3(2), in what the Aristotelian approach would call neutrality, women are understood as socially substantially unequal to men, historically and currently, hence the two clauses do not conflict. The Greek Constitution concisely adopts the asymmetrical equality (p. 408) principle: ‘Adoption of positive measures for promoting equality between men and women does not constitute discrimination on grounds of sex. The State shall take measures for the elimination of inequalities actually existing, in particular to the detriment of women.’ As under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, acts that eliminate the disadvantage of a disadvantaged group are treated as acts that are not unequal—not acts that are unequal but permissible, rather simply as steps toward equality.

Where a substantive approach to gender inequality is largely used, as in Canada, South Africa, Germany, and Colombia, substantive issues of gender inequality that are not traditionally addressed by equality law on the ground that the sexes are ‘different’—issues like reproductive rights and sexual assault, as well as issues located in the outpost of the private, such as family (including divorce)—are all strongly affected by gender equality considerations and may be governed by sex equality guarantees. Canada provides the original template, although many areas that are resolved favorably to gender justice under the aegis of its approach may not be decided in equality terms technically. A substantive gender equality approach is at times taken without calling it that. Some issues, like same-sex sexuality, that could be pursued on a gender basis under a substantive sex equality—indeed are suffused with sex and gender in substance—have also not been. Most constitutional courts have recognized sexual orientation as a separate and distinct ground for prohibition of discrimination, Canada again taking the lead. So lesbian women receive same-sex equality rights as members of the gender neutral group ‘homosexual’ or ‘gay’, rather than as women, discriminated against because their gender—sexuality being a dimension of gender—is discriminatorily not seen to fit their sex. In the process of imperfectly implementing a substantive gender equality standard, use of the concept of ‘dignity’ has at times been used as a mediating gap-filler, despite its tendency to be gendered unequal in itself.

International law, which has traditionally taken the mainstream essentialist approach to equality—at times attributing unequal realities produced by gender hierarchy to the inherent nature of women and men, considering them ‘differences’ or not—has become increasingly substantive in the last two decades, recognizing the basis in social hierarchy of the problem of gender inequality, in particular in the European and Latin American regional systems and some UN treaty bodies. This development makes the extent to which international law is (p. 409) embodied in domestic constitutions a significant factor in constitutional adjudications of gendered questions, a feature also illustrated by the relative positioning of CEDAW in cases in which a domestic constitutional provision is challenged. Also as a result, reservations to CEDAW may show more about gender under the law in a given jurisdiction than does examination of constitutional provisions alone.

2. Coercion and Consent

Women have not, in general, written constitutions or decided on constitutional matters. Men in power have written them many long ago and as if women did not exist, as in the United States; some after wars, in the waging and ending of which women actively participated only marginally, if at all, as in Japan; many recently, by foreign experts, as in Central and Eastern Europe after communism, where it has been generally assumed that Western liberal models are an adequate template for rights with gendered dimensions. In recent times, women have had some voice in constitution-making, often after revolutions, but nowhere near half the clout in either constitutional design or constitutive decision-making. Accordingly, a second dimension of gender and its contestation arises with the assumption that women consent to being ruled under constitutions when they were not consulted on their terms.

In democratic systems—most contemporary constitutions are considered democratic instruments—all citizens are deemed to consent to their government, from which it derives its legitimacy. The CEDAW Committee’s observation that ‘[s]ocieties in which women are excluded from public life and decision-making cannot be described as democratic’ applies in spades to their constitutions. The assumption that women agree to governmental structures and processes in the construction of which they did not participate and from which they were afforded no meaningful opportunity to dissent renders this consent illusory. The constitutive nature of constitutions, combined with the fact that women did not actively participate in framing them and in most instances were not permitted to vote to elect representatives under them until very recently, in addition to raising legitimacy problems, suggests that the structures of representation and traditional practices of elections may have built-in gender bias that can persist long after women, as a biological demographic group, are permitted to take part. For example, proportional voting schemes have been shown to elect more women than do single member majority/plurality systems, yet women have virtually never been given the chance to choose between these systems, but rather have inherited whatever system men previously chose. Consent in any sense of affirmative agreement is more attributed than meaningful in such circumstances, reelying more upon acquiescence than choice between open and equally available and consequential alternatives. The efficacy of women's political participation has also been crippled over generations by sex-based poverty and illiteracy, that is, by deprivation of economic and social rights because they are women. Improvements in education and suffrage have begun to address women's representation as a group, but the deeper structural issues of gender inequality, including those built into constitutional frameworks, remain.

(p. 410) As of 2011, 22 countries have attempted to address the problem of women's lack of political representation in government by entrenching sex-based electoral quotas in their constitutions, some, including Argentina and France, through a mix of constitutional and statutory provisions. Electoral quotas demonstrably improve women's representation in numbers in the affected elected branches, promoting bringing their perspectives to all levels of government, including to constitutional questions. Most sex-based electoral quotas in constitutions refer explicitly to women but not to men. Many Latin American countries impose a quota of at least 30 per cent women in the covered positions, with the aim of achieving a critical mass. On the constitutional equality concern, leading researchers Dahlerup and Freidenvall argue, with evidence, that quotas come closer to providing real equality of opportunity for women than equality of result, hence are supported by formal as well as substantive equality models. Most quota schemes do not reserve seats, hence would not be construed as reverse discrimination under the Aristotelian model. The concern that quotas on party lists will divide the national community has also been argued to be misplaced. But as often, particularly with women's issues, numbers do not tell the whole story. Quotas may give women greater political voice, as in India's local panchayats, but can also be used to support the party in power where largely male parliamentarians nominate the women who will fill the women's quota, as in Bangladesh at the national level. Women may not represent women's interests, or always bring women's experiences to the fore in public conversations affecting them as such, and men may do so, although in governments, in which men have overwhelmingly predominated, they largely have not. Women's movement actors have frequently been found to represent women's interests, promoting women's political participation, particularly in policy processes and debates on sexual violence, enhancing policy outcomes across national settings.

In conceptual parallel, a further example on the coercion/consent dimension of gender principle can be found in the laws of sexual assault. Under them, women are conventionally presumed to consent to acts imposed upon them under conditions of sex inequality, a form of coercion that not recognized by laws of sexual assault, which itself is frequently ringed with constitutional support for the rights of criminal defendants. Much as women are deemed to consent to the state in which they live, hence its entire constitutional framework, whether or not such consent was ever given or is meaningful, they are deemed to consent to sexual relations with men, despite undisputed conditions of gender inequality that frequently give them little real choice and can disempower them from effectively declining. The same dominant social and cultural gender norms widely animate the rules, including constitutional ones, that shape legal accountability for gender crimes.

Sex crimes have not historically been understood as gender-based at all, hence are not yet generally seen to raise principled gender questions on the constitutional plane. Developments in international law, particularly the law of war and international humanitarian law, have increasingly grasped sex crimes as gendered, encouraging the complementary implementation of this concept in national constitutional orders. In the absence of this perspective, prohibitions on gender crime, for example sexual assault or domestic battering, are not typically constitutionally entrenched, while strong procedural rights of accused perpetrators of such crimes often are. Rights of accused victimizers that may be backed up by constitutions include due process rights—full answer and defense, right of confrontation, right to fair trial—the presumption of innocence, freedom of expression, and evidentiary concepts of relevance. In an exceptional constitutional balance yet to register on the realities in South Africa, the Constitutional Court has decisively recognized the rights of women to the enforcement of laws against gender-based violence, in one instance allowing a woman to sue the police and prosecutor for failing to comply with a legal duty to prevent a man, previously convicted of rape and on trial for further related offences, from harming her. Elsewhere, the pattern is typically one of constitutional rights that are designed to be used primarily for those in circumstances in which men predominate (although of course the text does not say so) as against an absence of countervailing rights for those who are victimized based on their gender, predominantly women. These procedural rights are not considered gendered, despite operating to the systematic disadvantage of (mainly but not exclusively) women who are victimized by gender crime, seldom providing either procedural or substantive rights needed by the victims of gender crimes. Constitutional law, through its rules and lack of rules, including its tacit one-sided entrenchment of rights for perpetrators but few to none for victims, thus effectively renders coercion consent, participating in widespread impunity for gender crime and contributing to the normalization of violence against women.

3. Public and Private

The distinction between public and private, a third principled dimension of gender under constitutional law, has many layers. For purposes of comparing constitutions on a gendered plane, beyond being a feature of positive law, this distinction has a structural feature. The public has traditionally been gendered masculine, conceived as superior and dominant and external, and thought associated with and appropriate for men. The private is gendered feminine, considered subordinate and inferior and internal compared with the public, and is associated with and considered the sphere for women. But it is in private where men are, by virtue of exemption from public intervention even as the public orders its relations, sovereign. The sphere called private has been extensively found to be a (perhaps the) crucible of gender inequality, notably of the patriarchal family, labor stratification and the feminization of poverty, denial of reproductive control, and male dominant stereotypical sexual practices and rape ringed with rape myths rationalized as love or culture. Institutionally, public/private distinctions have functioned to justify limits on constitutional intervention, itself considered public, into settings imagined as private that are customarily ruled by gender hierarchy: the family, the marketplace, reproduction, and sexual relations. This is not to say that these sites are not constitutionally shaped. Rather, it is gender equality rules, suddenly considered public, that are often held inapt for them, even as the same constitutions may impose gender inequality in the same spheres without objections of intrusiveness.

One form the supposed bipolarity between public and private has taken is the standard distinction between horizontal and vertical rights in constitutions. In many constitutions, rights, including equality rights, are confined to the vertical, meaning they are guaranteed between the individual, regarded as private, and the state, regarded as public. In law, the line is frequently doctrinally guarded under some version of the rubric of ‘state action’, as illustrated by the United States and constitutions so patterned. In such systems, horizontal relations between people and other people—civil society is regarded as the private here—a key site of gender hierarchy, cannot be directly reached by constitutions, as they are, for example, in contemporary South Africa, where ‘no person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including … gender, sex ...’. Restricting assertable rights to a narrow concept of state action can render them especially superficial where gender, an inequality across society as well as between the government and the people, is concerned.

Federalism by design draws public/private jurisdictional lines to shield subnational units from intervention by external central authority. As a consequence, the more federated the system is, the less reach constitutional gender equality guarantees may have. Federalism as a way of keeping women down and out further functions through a failure to see the gender dimensions of, for example, family law, due in substantial part to federal structures that have deemed the family, read private, unsusceptible to constitutional equality standards, read public. This framework remains despite the fact that family law disputes are typically resolved in courts and under laws, neither of which are actually private, often with systematically gender unequal results. Whole separate regimes for family law jurisdictionally permit implementation of legal systems ungoverned by equality rules to the systematic disadvantage of women as a sex.

Although the relation between devolved power and women's status has not been conclusively resolved empirically, locating power in smaller units does not seem to increase women's power in those units. This hypothesis finds support, again, in the United States, where federalism as a constitutional interpretation has waxed and waned over time, recently being deployed at its zenith to invalidate the national anti-sex-discrimination Violence Against Women Act, passed because states’ approaches to the named problem have been so demonstrably ineffectual. A similar effect can be observed in the impact of international law, seen as the more centralized public system, on constitutional systems in national units, read as the smaller private ones. Arguably, the weaker the public-private distinction, through the stronger embodiment of international gender equality norms in a constitutional structure, as in an exemplary manner in Costa Rica, the more favorable constitutional developments will be to addressing gender crime and other violations that are shielded from accountability in what is euphemized as the private.

4. Morality and Politics

A fourth analytic dimension through which the role of gender in constitutional law can be analyzed revolves around a distinction between morality and power. In the sense used here, morality concerns questions of value, judgments of right and wrong, good and evil, while power concerns questions of fact, distributions of status, rank, and social hierarchy that operate as the political domain. Gendered questions posed by culture and religion especially, often affecting issues of family and sexual relations, typically present themselves in constitutional discourse as matters of morality: culturally relative, value-based, open to differing judgments, demanding tolerance. As often with the dimensions discussed, these cultural or religious concepts—for instance, as applied to the law and policy of the family or sexual assault—may frequently serve as guises for gendered power differentials and their exercise, as evidenced by their deeply unequal gendered consequences. Again, the role of international law in the constitutional regime can be decisive in countering this tendency, as international law does not permit custom or religion to override human rights, including gender-based ones.

Customary law is often couched in and defended as enunciating moral or traditional values while at the same time elevating women over men in value or resources, constraining women's life chances in ways that reinforce their relative powerlessness or inferiority on the basis of their sex. Constitutions may openly structure such questions outside their purview, as to some extent in India, where issues of family law are ceded largely (but not exclusively) to religions courts, or in Zimbabwe, where customary law, with unequal proscriptions for women and men in families, sits side by side with equality in the Constitution, no priority constitutionally prescribed for either over the other. A constitutional collision between gender equality norms on the one hand and traditional views of custom in family relations on the other is particularly visible where polygyny is permitted by customary law, ‘creating a situation whereby all bar the husband/father are the losers’. South Africa constitutionally recognizes cultural rights while disallowing them to limit the expression of other rights, seeking harmonization, relying on the resolution of this complex tension case by case.

Frequently, even typically, discussions of constitutional rights that are gender-based in reality present themselves as moral when they are, in fact, political, obscuring the exercise of power behind a discourse of morality. Protectionist paternalist guarantees for certain classes of women in constitutions, including pregnant women or nursing mothers that likely derive from pro-natalist religious culture, could be considered moral laws in this sense, rather than failed equality laws. These provisions often appear in the form of constitutional support for protective labor laws, quite common in Latin America, or as clauses exempting women from compulsory military service or allowing women voluntary military service where it is compulsory for men. Even Germany, ordinarily alert to gender-inegalitarian assumptions, provides in its constitution that while women aged 18–55 may be called upon for service in emergencies, they may ‘under no circumstances ... be required to render service involving the use of arms’. The civilian consequences of training only men in the use of weapons while women are officially disarmed, together with the discrimination against men entailed in requiring that only they risk injury and loss of life in military service, half of whom would not be in this dangerous position were the requirement gender neutral, appears to be unnoticed. Instead, morality is interwoven into the interpretation of constitutional rubrics as if gender equality is not involved, as is the case with substantive due process rubrics in the United States. One result is that issues such as abortion, for example, are customarily discussed and litigated as moral issues rather than as posing the sex inequality considerations that make it a gender question legally and socially.

One consequence of the absence of women's equal participation in framing constitutions and shaping constitutional interpretive traditions is that constitutions can institutionalize, without any need to mention gender, the power of men over women in the form of entrenched rights, appearing only to make gender neutral value choices. Combined with the absence of countervailing sex equality rights, the lack of gendered flags may make law appear free of gender bias—hence legitimate—when it is hardly gender neutral. The law of sexual assault typically illustrates. Interpreting freedom of speech or expression to support the pornography industry as a constitutional right in the face of uncontested evidence of its sex-unequal effects is a further contested example, ruled on for women's equality in Canada, for the pornographers in the United States. The presentation of the issue as one of morality (is pornography good or evil?), then of a conflict of rights (speech or equality?) obscures the division of power between women and men under two layers of constitutional discourse, one that can be stacked against a gender equality resolution. When constitutional rights are extended without considering their substantive effect on gender inequality, and socially embedded throughout society to reinforce male supremacy, constituting groups with power do not need to make gender visible on the face of a constitutional text or decision to establish and maintain hegemony through it.

(p. 416) Recognitions of the need to equalize the sexes on the basis of gender are as pervasive in constitutions as gender inequality is commonplace in social life. The reasons why, and the way forward, may be found transnationally, if anywhere.

Bibliography

Bibliography

Beverley Baines and Ruth Rubio-Marín (eds), The Gender of Constitutional Jurisprudence (2005)

Helen Irving, Gender and the Constitution: Equity and Agency in Comparative Constitutional Design (2008)

Dorothy McBride Stetson and Amy G. Mazur (eds), Comparative State Feminism (1995)

Joyce Outshoorn and Johanna Kantola (eds), Changing State Feminism: Just Debate and Gender Justice in the Public Sphere (2007)

Beth A. Simmons, Mobilizing for Human Rights: International Law in Domestic Politics (2009)
Gender in Constitutions

Denise M. Walsh, Women's Rights in Democratizing States (2011)
Susan H. Williams (ed), Constituting Equality: Gender Equality and Comparative Constitutional Law (2009)

Notes:

(*) The resourceful and intrepid research assistance of Shauna Lani Shamas, Aisha Harris, the ever-amazing University of Michigan Law Library is gratefully acknowledged. Lisa Cardyn provided, in addition, astute conceptual help with the database and perceptive collegial comments, for which I am in her debt. Time to conceive this chapter was supported by the Diane Middlebrook and Carl Djerassi Visiting Professorship at the University of Cambridge Centre for Gender Studies, Lent Term, 2011. © C. MacKinnon, 2012.

(1) Other than as noted, the database created for this chapter is confined to written constitutions included in HeinOnline’s World Constitutions Illustrated database, of which 198 country constitutions were considered, including one for the entity European Union. Of those, four jurisdictions—the Vatican, United Kingdom, Israel, and New Zealand—do not have textual constitutions, leaving 194, including the EU. In the 22 instances in which the most recent English language version of a constitution was unavailable, it was drawn from Albert P. Blaustein and Gisberg H. Flanz (eds), Constitutions of the Countries of the World (1971–2011), 20 vols plus supplements. The translations provided by these two sources were relied upon unless otherwise noted.

(2) Accounts and documentation of women's participation in recent constituting processes can be found in Alexandra Dobrowolsky and Vivien Hart (eds), Women Making Constitutions: New Politics and Comparative Perspectives (2003). For an analysis of women's participation, or attempts to participate, in constitutions historically, see Helen Irving, Gender and the Constitution: Equity and Agency in Comparative Constitutional Design (2008), 4–22.

(3) A definition of gender evoking much of its broad domain is provided by the United Nations Office of the Special Advisor on Gender Issues (OSAGI):

Gender: refers to the social attributes and opportunities associated with being male and female and the relationships between women and men and girls and boys, as well as the relations between women and those between men. These attributes, opportunities and relationships are socially constructed and are learned through socialization processes. They are context/time-specific and changeable. Gender determines what is expected, allowed and valued in a woman or a man in a given context. In most societies there are differences and inequalities between women and men in responsibilities assigned, activities undertaken, access to and control over resources, as well as decision-making opportunities. Gender is part of the broader socio-cultural context. Other important criteria for socio-cultural analysis include class, race, poverty level, ethnic group and age.

UN Women, OSAGI, Concepts and Definitions, available at (http://www.un.org/womenwatch/osagi/conceptsanddefinitions.htm). The latter attributes are normally understood as part of gender analysis through their intersections with it. Except where a distinction between the two is being discussed, the terms ‘sex’ and ‘gender’ will be used relatively interchangeably here, since constitutional law is a social discipline and sex inequality is a social, not biological, fact, much as ‘race’ is a biological construct that is pervasively used to designate an inequality that is social.

(4) See eg Anne Fausto-Sterling, Myths of Gender: Biological Theories about Women and Men (rev edn, 1992); Anne Fausto-Sterling, Sexing the Body: Gender Politics and the Construction of Sexuality (2000).

(6) See eg Constitution of the Republic of Armenia, Art 16, for just one illustration.

(7) Constitution of the Kingdom of Cambodia, Arts 34, 35, 36, 43, 50, 76.

(8) Contrast eg Constitution of the Commonwealth of the Bahamas, Preamble (‘[N]o Man, Woman or Child shall ever be Slave or Bondsman to anyone’), with Constitution of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Art II(3)(c) (according ‘[a]ll persons within the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina … [t]he right not to be held in slavery or servitude’); Constitution of the Republic of Serbia, Art 26(1) (‘No person may be kept in slavery or servitude’); Constitution of the Republic of Seychelles, Art 17(1) (‘Every person has the right not to be held in slavery or bondage’).

(9) See eg Constitution of the Kingdom of Bhutan, Art 17 (‘The State shall endeavour to take appropriate measures to eliminate all forms of discrimination and exploitation against women including trafficking, prostitution, abuse, violence, harassment and intimidation at work in both public and private spheres’); Iraqi Constitution, Art 37(3) (‘Forced labor, slavery, slave trade, trafficking in women or children, and sex trade shall be prohibited’).

(10) Constitution of the People's Democratic Republic of Algeria, Art 32 (emphasis added). However, this could as well be translated, as the Algerian mission to the UN does, to guarantee ‘a common heritage of all Algerians, men and women’.

(17) See generally Denise M. Walsh, Women's Rights in Democratizing States (2011) (comparing Poland, Chile, and South Africa, and arguing that discourse legitimizing gender injustice prevails in most democratizing states).

(18) Although it does not focus upon constitutional law as such, the work of the Research Network on Gender Politics and the State (RNGS) is highly informative, some of it reported in Dorothy McBride Stetson and Amy G. Mazur (eds), Comparative State Feminism (1995), and Joyce Outshoorn and Johanna Kantola (eds), Changing State Feminism: Just Debate and Gender Justice in the Public Sphere (2007), investigating the effects of women's movements on women's state agencies, looking at policymaking processes, debates, and outcomes in 13 post-industrial Western countries over a 30-year period relying on a database comprising ‘a unique source of cross-national, cross-sectoral, and longitudinal information on comparative gender policy issues’. RNGS, available at (http://libarts.wsu.edu/polisci/rngs/index.html). See also UN, Department of Economic and Social Affairs, ‘The Impact of Women's Participation and Leadership on Policy Outcomes: A Focus on Women's Policy Machineries’, UN Doc EGM/EPWD/2005/EP.5 (December 12, 2005) (prepared by Amy Mazur), available at (http://www.un.org/womenwatch/daw/egm/eql-men/docs/EP.5_Mazur.pdf).

(20) A thorough analysis of this factor within the comparative constitutional setting of affirmative action, including a useful comparison of Germany with the United States, can be found in Ann Peters, Women, Quotas, and

(23) This measure of inequality does not include reported or actual incidents of violence against women.

(25) ibid Arts 24(2)(a), 13(a)(iii).

(31) For an illuminating discussion, see Ruth Rubio-Marín and Martha I. Morgan, ‘Constitutional Domestication of International Gender Norms: Categorizations, Illustrations, and Reflections from the Nearside of the Bridge’ in Karen Knop (ed), Gender and Human Rights (2004), 113–52, analyzing the role of international gender norms in domestic constitutions in terms of assimilation, supplementation, and adaptation. For a statistical treatment of the relationship between the adoption of CEDAW and women's rights domestically in the domains of education, employment, and reproductive control, see Beth A. Simmons, Mobilizing for Human Rights: International Law in Domestic Politics (2009), 202–55.

(32) See Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia [1989] 1 SCR 143 (Canada); see also R v Kapp [2008] 2 SCR 483 (Canada).

(33) Various sex-based rights are provided in the Constitution of the Federative Republic of Brazil at Arts 5, 7, 20, 143(21), 183, 189, 201.

Valuable contributions include Baines, Barak-Erez, and Kahana (n 15); Baines and Rubio-Marin (n 19); and Susan H. Williams (ed), Constituting Equality: Gender Equality and Comparative Constitutional Law (2009).

Constitution of the Republic of Cyprus, Art 186 s 1(2). Cyprus finishes the sentence with ‘and words in the singular include the plural and vice-versa’. One wonders if the ‘vice-versa’ also means that words importing the feminine gender include males.

Kathleen M. Sullivan, ‘Constitutionalizing Women’s Equality’ (2002) 90 California Law Review 735, lucidly analyzes some of these factors in terms of what may be better for women, but without real-world data or consideration of their intrinsically gendered character.

The figures included in this paragraph were derived from the sources listed in n 1.

US Constitution, Amendment 14, s 1.

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s 28. For further discussion, see Penney Kome, The Taking of Twenty-Eight: Women Challenge the Constitution (1983). This figure does not include Bolivia, which has such a provision only for foreigners.

See eg Constitution of the Central African Republic, Art 6 (‘The protection of the woman and of the child against violence and insecurity, exploitation and moral, intellectual and physical neglect, is an obligation of the State and the other public collectivities’). Similar provisions also appear outside of the protectionist context. See eg Constitution of the Kingdom of Bhutan, Art 8, para 5 (“A person shall not tolerate or participate in … abuse of women … and shall take necessary steps to prevent such acts”), Art 9, para 17 (“The State shall endeavour to take appropriate measures to eliminate all forms of discrimination and exploitation against women including trafficking, prostitution, abuse, violence, harassment and intimidation at work in both public and private spheres”).

See eg Constitution of Albania, Art 54; Political Constitution of Colombia, Art 53. For further discussion, see dimension four below.

See eg Constitution of the Federative Republic of Brazil, Art 40, s 1(III)(a)(b).

See eg ibid, Art 5, s XLVIII; Political Constitution of the United Mexican States, Art 18; Constitution of the Republic of Nicaragua, Art 39, para 2; Constitution of the Republic of Palau, Art IV, s 7; Constitution of the Republic of Seychelles, Art 18(13).

A lucid discussion of the South African concept of equality can be found in Kate O’Regan and Nick Friedman, ‘Equality’ in Tom Ginsburg and Rosalind Dixon (eds), Comparative Constitutional Law (2011), 473–503.

One commentator on Arab state constitutions finds not so much a gap between guarantee and reality but a ‘gap in the legal system which is further exaggerated by patriarchal practices’: Nawal Ammar, ‘Arab Women in their States’ Constitutions’ (2004) 4 International Journal of Comparative Criminology 196. She calls for a restructuring of constitutional guarantees to support empowerment of Arab women, the problem substantive equality is designed to address.

Constitution of Austria, Art 7(2).

(60) For discussion of interpretations by the Constitutional Court of Colombia as a substantive equality provision, which nonetheless contains some denigrating essentializing elements, see Morgan (n 19), 86–91.

(61) Basic Law for the Federal Republic of Germany, Art 3(2).

(62) Blanca Rodriguez Ruiz and Ute Sacksofsky, ‘Gender in the German Constitution’ in Baines and Rubio-Marin (n 19), 149, 155.

(63) Because European Union law under the directives (specifically Council Directive 76/207/EEC, 1976 OJ L 39/40) has tended to be interpreted in Aristotelian terms, steps some Europeans would take, specifically Germans (Case C-450/93 Kaland v Freie Hansestadt Bremen [1995] ECR 1-3051) or Swedes (Case Abrahamsson and Anderson v Fogelqvist [2000] ECR I-05539) instituting affirmative action to produce equality for women authorized by their domestic equality approach have been invalidated by the European Court of Justice as inequality for men. This is further illustrated in Marschall, where a savings clause allows individual male candidates to be selected (Case C-409/95 Marschall v Land Nordrhein-Westfalen [1997] ECR I-6363).

(64) Constitution of Greece, Art 116(2).

(65) R v Kapp [2008] 2 SCR 483(Canada).

(66) This is especially visible in Colombia. See Political Constitution of Colombia, Art 43 (guaranteeing pregnant women and new mothers ‘the special assistance and protection of the State’); Art 53 (expressing the state’s commitment providing ‘special protection’ for ‘women’ and ‘motherhood’); Art 134 (constitutionalizing women’s right to maternity leave).

(67) Canadian examples include R v Lavallée [1990] 1 SCR 852 (battering), and Moge v Moge [1992] 3 SCR 813 (support after divorce).

(69) M v H [1999] 2 SCR 3 began this; R v Kapp [2008] 2 SCR 483 (Canada) recognized some of its drawbacks.

(70) In Europe, MC v Bulgaria, 15 ECHR 627 (2003) (on rape), and Opuz v Turkey, ECHR App no 33401/02, Judgment (2009) (on battering), are especially significant, with the Convention of Belém do Pará, Inter-American Convention on the Prevention, Punishment and Eradication of Violence against Women (Convention of Belém do Pará), Belém do Pará, June 6, 1994, 33 ILM 1534 (1994), as well as adjudications such as Mejía v Peru, Case 10.970, Inter-Am CtHR, Report No 5/96 (1996), and González et al (‘Cotton Field’) v Mexico, Inter-Am CtHR (Ser C) No 205 (2009).

(71) See eg Botswana v Unity Dow, 103 ILR 128 (Court of Appeals of Botswana, 1992).

(74) Lane Kenworthy and Melissa Malami, ‘Gender Inequality in Political Representation: A Worldwide Comparative

(75) International Institute for Democracy and Electoral Assistance (Stockholm, Sweden), Global Database of Quotas for Women, available at (http://www.quotaproject.org). As of the date of this writing, in a very fluid situation, 104 countries had legal gender quotas of some kind in their electoral systems. Ibid.

(76) See Ley de Cupos (Quota Laws) (Law 24.102). Dispute as to its constitutionality was settled by a larger constitutional reform in 1994, in which it was asserted that ‘real equality of opportunity between men and women regarding access to elective and political party positions will be guaranteed by positive action in regulation of political parties and in the electoral code’: Constitution of the Argentine Nation, Art 27.

(77) See Loi sur la parité (Parity Law) (Constitutional Law No 99-569), Art 3 (stating that ‘statutes shall promote the equal access of women and men to elective offices and positions’), and Art 4 (directing that ‘[p]olitical parties shall contribute to the implementation of the principle [of parity] as provided by statute’, subsequently clarified by Law No 2000-403 of June 6, 2000, Journal Officiel de la République Française (Official Gazette of France), June 7, 2000, at 8560, specifying the conditions under which it applies).

(78) See Drude Dahlerup and Lenita Freidenvall, ‘Gender Quotas in Politics—A Constitutional Challenge’ in Williams (n 36), 29–52.

(79) See eg Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan, Art 84(3); Constitution of the People's Republic of Bangladesh, Art 65(3); Constitution of the Central African Republic, Art 74; Constitution of India, Art 243D(3).

(81) Dahlerup and Freidenvall (n 78), 36. Most require equality on party lists, or in primaries. See ibid 40–4 (comparing quota systems of Argentina, Costa Rica, and France, which are legislated, and Rwanda, exemplifying the alternative of reserved seats for women, elected from among an all-female slate of candidates by an electoral college consisting of local councils and women's organizations). Crucially, the constitutional mandate that women occupy at least 30 percent of posts in decision-making organs did not become a ceiling. More than 30 percent of those elected in 2003 and 2008 were women—the actual figure being 56.3 percent, the highest in the world. Ibid 49. See also Susan H. Williams, ‘Equality, Representation, and Challenge to Hierarchy: Justifying Electoral Quotas for Women’ in Williams (n 36), 53–72.

(83) The 73rd and 74th Constitutional Amendment Acts 1992 in India reserved 33 percent of local election seats for women. Their impact is considered in Niraja Gopal Jayal, 'Gender and Decentralisation', Background paper commissioned by the United Nations Development Programme for Discussion Paper Series 1, Decentralisation in India: Challenges and Opportunities, 2000, 30; Asmita Resource Centre for Women, ‘South India’ in Yasmin Tambiah (ed), Women and Governance in South Asia: Re-Imagining the State (2002), 362.

(84) See Yasmin Tambiah, ‘The Impact of Gender Inequality on Governance’ in Nussbaum et al (n 19), 77.

(86) See eg Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, July 17, 1998, 2187 UNTS 90, Art 7(1)(g)–(h) (enumerating as crimes against humanity, ‘Rape, sexual slavery, enforced prostitution, forced pregnancy, enforced sterilization, or any other form of sexual violence of comparable gravity’ and ‘Persecution’, respectively); Art 8(e)(vi) (establishing as war crimes ‘rape, sexual slavery, enforced prostitution, forced pregnancy, as defined in article 7, paragraph 2(f), enforced sterilization, and any other form of sexual violence also constituting a serious violation of article 3 common to the four Geneva Conventions).

(87) Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security, 2001 (4) SA 038 (CC).

(88) For further discussion that includes a gendered dimension, see Frank Michelman in Chapter 14 of this volume. Professor Michelman’s ‘ghost’ animating the public/private distinction, seen through the analysis of the present chapter, would be gendered male.

(89) A lucid summary of the philosophical foundations of this concept in this context, as it has been criticized from a gendered perspective, can be found in Martha Nussbaum, ‘Gender and Governance: An Introduction’ in Nussbaum et al (n 19), 5–15.

(90) See sources and analysis in MacKinnon (n 49), ch 7, 9.

(92) Some scholars have concluded that the subnational representation of women is not influenced by a state’s degree of federalism. See Richard Vengroff, Zsolt Nyiri, and Melissa Fugiero, ‘Electoral Systems and Gender Representation in Sub-National Legislatures: Is There a National-Sub-National Gender Gap?’ (2003) 56 Political Research Quarterly 171. Discussions of the Australian setting can be found in Irving (n 2), 65–89, and Karpin and O’Connell, ‘Speaking into a Silence’ in Baines and Rubio-Marin (n 19), 22–47.

(94) For illumination, see Hilary Charlesworth and Christine Chinkin, The Boundaries of International Law: A Feminist Analysis (2000). The jurisdictional structure of international law draws its own public–private lines, notably between state sovereignty and transnational guarantees. But international law also cuts across many boundaries between public and private, for instance in the domains of human rights and humanitarian law, supporting social and economic rights, including those affecting gender status, regardless of sphere, and the gender-based rights of victims of intimate violence in recognized conflicts.

(95) The Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Court has interpreted Art 7 of the Constitution as incorporating and granting supra-constitutional status to human rights conventions that Costa Rica has ratified, making them self-executing. A 1993 opinion held that human rights instruments ‘have not only a value similar to the Constitution, but to the extent that they grant greater rights or guarantees to the people, they prevail over the Constitution’. Voto No 5759–93. See Facio, Sandova, and Morgan (n 19), 99.

(96) For discussion, with varying emphases, see eg Irving (n 2), 236–9; Jewel Amoah, ‘Watch GRACE Grow: African Customary Law and Constitutional Law in the Equality Garden’ in Baines, Barak-Erez, and Kahana (n 15); and Chuma Himonga, ‘Constitutional Rights of Women under Customary Law in Southern Africa: Dominant Interventions and “Old Pathways”’ in ibid.

(97) For one analysis and relevant citations, see Catharine A. MacKinnon, ‘Sex Equality Under the Constitution of India: Problems, Prospects, and “Personal Laws”’ in MacKinnon (n 14), 120–38.

(98) See Constitution of Zimbabwe, ss 23(3)(b), 89.

(99) Fareda Banda, ‘Between a Rock and a Hard Place: Courts and Customary Law in Zimbabwe’ in Andrew Bainham (ed), The International Survey of Family Law (2002), 471, 485. In a useful framework, Professor Fareda Banda identifies three constitutional models on the matter of sex equality and customary law: strong cultural relativism, as in Zimbabwe, allowing customary law to exist unfettered by equality provisions; weak cultural relativism, as in Tanzania, which recognizes both without elevating one over the other; and the universalist position, as in South Africa, making both customary law and a right to culture subject to equality standards. See Fareda Banda, Women, Law, and Human Rights: An African Perspective (2005), 34.

(101) These laws are especially prevalent in the constitutions of Latin America. See eg Constitution of the Plurinational State of Bolivia, Art 45(V) (‘Women have the right to safe maternity with an intercultural practice and vision; they shall enjoy the special assistance and protection of the State during pregnancy and birth and in the prenatal and postnatal periods’) even as the criminalization of abortion, which endangers pregnant women, often fatally, remains. Protective laws have even survived communism. See eg Constitution of the Republic of Cuba, Art 44 (guaranteeing ‘to the working woman paid leave for maternity before and after childbirth’); see also Constitution of the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Art 128(10) (guaranteeing leave before and after childbirth without wage loss, rest periods during nursing, and job security to pregnant women).

(102) Brazil, for instance, exempts women from compulsory military service. See Constitution of the Federative Republic of Brazil, Art 143(21). Examples of protective laws for women at work include Political Constitution of the Republic of Costa Rica, Art 71 (‘The laws shall provide special protection to women and minors in their work’); Political Constitution of Colombia, Art 43 (granting special assistance to and protection of women during pregnancy and after delivery, including food subsidies if needed, and especially when head of household); Constitution of the Republic of Moldova, Art 43(2) (extending state protection to ‘working conditions for women and young people’); and Constitution of the Republic of El Salvador, further pairing women with children, Art 38 (‘Unhealthy or dangerous work is prohibited for persons under eighteen years of age and for women’).

(103) Basic Law, Art 12a(4) (Germany). Denmark provides ‘every male person able to bear arms’ shall contribute to that national defense under statutory rules. Constitutional Act of Denmark, s 81.

---

Catharine A. Mackinnon

Catharine A. MacKinnon is Elizabeth A. Long Professor of Law, University of Michigan, James Barr Ames Visiting Professor of Law (long term), Harvard Law School and Special Gender Adviser to the Prosecutor, International Criminal Court (The Hague)
Abstract and Keywords

This article considers the procedural and resulting legitimacy issues of constitution-making and fundamental constitutional amendment. These procedures are partly related to the different historical scenarios and substantive (material) factors that give rise to e-constitutions. It considers only those political and economic factors which contribute to specific constitution-making features. In this regard, revolutions, regime change, and state-building are particularly relevant. In the case of revolutions there is a deliberate departure from, a rupture with, the existing constitution and the processes of legal and therefore legitimate change. This raises a fundamental issue of legitimacy: What gives the right (authority) to enact a new constitution? The article refers to the process that is not based on pre-existing rules of procedure as one of creation and the related constitution-making is called creation ex nihilo. In the case of regime change or reform the procedural modalities of the existing constitution might be observed.

Keywords: constitution making, constitutional amendment, revolutions, regime change, state-building, legitimacy
Lycurgus in the case of Sparta, worthy of hero worship by posterity. Though these ancient constitutions were often subject to fundamental changes, in principle they were supposed to be perpetual, as in the case of Sparta thanks to an oath taken by the people never to break with the system.

(p. 420) The future framers of modern constitutions were confronted with a tradition of immutable, tradition-sanctioned constitutions and, many among them, have gradually accepted the rationalistic approach of enlightenment: constitutions can be designed and perhaps even crafted, more geometrico. Both the American Framers and the French revolutionaries alike, thought that the model constitutions of ancient liberty were based on public participation, the legitimate authority of the people was at work behind the act of creation by wise man. People had to consent at least, if not deliberate. However, even within this understanding a fundamental difficulty continued to haunt the founders:

Is it not a little remarkable that in every case reported by ancient history, in which government has been established with deliberation and consent, the task of framing it has not been committed to an assembly of men, but has been performed by some individual citizen of preeminent wisdom and approved integrity.

Making a constitution is not a matter of pure engineering design. Whatever the dictates of wisdom and prudence would be, the process of making and the resulting constitution are at the mercy of historical contingencies. Constitution-making is ‘a pre-eminently political act’. It is a decision-making process carried out by political actors, responsible for selecting, enforcing, implementing, and evaluating societal choices; and it is shaped by the socio-political order in which it takes place and, in turn, it strongly influences that order. The participants are aware that they are involved in ‘higher law-making’ and this creates special expectations, roles, and rules. Constitution-makers may rise above ordinary attitudes of ‘business as usual’ and are capable of adapting non-parochial, long-term perspectives. The constitutional enthusiasm of the constitutional moment may have such impact, or it may not. The great pages of the history of constitution-making are full of human pettiness and, increasingly, institutional self-interest. Nevertheless, trial and error notwithstanding, through short-sightedness and egotism, certain regularities with normative consequences have emerged that characterize modern constitution-making.

Originally, it was not obvious that constitutions can be made by deliberate human choice and design. The idea of making (new) constitutions has become a fashionable activity only since the eighteenth century, at least in some countries like France, Germany, as well as in a few others. For example, France has known more than ten constitutions in 200 years. (The exact number is unclear since some constitutions are not considered by all historians and experts as valid). While constitutions were designed to withstand time and change, only a few countries, in particular the US, have been able to stay with the same basic constitutitional document for over 200 years. But such perpetuity might be misleading: while constitutions may formally remain the same, it is possible that through amendments the constitution becomes fundamentally different from the one which remains in formal existence, raising the issue of fundamental change of the constitution without making a formally new constitution.

Making constitutions appears as a process that follows certain rules (and) or rites which have been progressively established. How do we make constitutions? Are there neatly distinct models of constitution-making? What are the grounds for choosing one or another model? What makes a constitution-making process legitimate?

The stability of the constitution remains a characteristic aspiration: drafters intend to set values and institutions for generations to come. How to achieve stability (how to protect the constitution including against fundamental changes that go against its essence) and how to grant sufficient flexibility by allowing reasonable accommodation to emerging changes.

This chapter considers the procedural and resulting legitimacy issues of constitution-making and fundamental constitutional amendment. (Fundamental amendments mean an essential change that would, in theory, require higher lawmaking in the sense that not only special procedural requirements are to be met (eg super-majority) but a special commitment; a conscious and specifically legitimized effort that the textual change makes a break with past fundamental values.) These procedures are partly related to the different historical scenarios and substantive (material) factors that give rise to e-constitutions. We will consider only those political and economic factors which contribute to specific constitution-making features. In this regard, revolutions, regime change, and state-building are particularly relevant. In the case of revolutions there is a deliberate departure from, a rupture with, the existing constitution and the processes of legal and therefore legitimate change. This raises a fundamental issue of legitimacy: What gives the right (authority) to enact a new constitution? In this chapter we refer to the process that is not based on pre-existing rules of procedure as one of creation and the related constitution-making is called creation ex nihilo (see Chapter 45). In the case of regime change or reform the procedural modalities of the existing constitution might be observed.

The constitution is made by a pre-constitutional or extra-constitutional entity (power) and constitution-making includes the self-constitution of the power that creates it. In the situation of creating the constitution ex nihilo the constitution emerges from a legal void. Ex nihilo constitution-making can be revolutionary or state-creating (where there is no previous state (p. 422) whose constitution could have been considered and the constituent is pre-constitutional). In the revolutionary version of ex nihilo constitution-making the constitution in force is disregarded, while in the nation-state-building version there is allegedly no previous constitution to be disregarded (although very often the secession (the declaration of independence) is also based on disregard of the applicable constitutional arrangement).

In the transition model, the rules of creation are determined in the very constitution that is to be replaced. Besides those two main models there are special situations where sovereign decisions do not rest fully with the constitution-makers, like in post-war and de-colonization situations where foreign powers or former colonial masters had considerable influence on the process and the content, and in post-conflict situations in which the international community is active.

II. Constituent Power and the Legitimacy of Constitution-Making

In the European (continental) theory the process of constitution-making has traditionally been ascribed to a power defined as ‘constituent power’, mostly known through its French qualification ‘pouvoir constituant’, as opposed to pouvoir constitué (constituted power, for example the existing legislation). In this chapter we will deal only briefly with that important theoretical quasi-philosophical question: What is the constituent power? Is it a legal power?

A legal theory of ‘constituent power’ basically assumes that it is a legal power, which implies that the undoing power has a legal character. Olivier Beaud argues that before starting the (new) constituent process another constitution-making moment must be declared. This approach is also heavily reliant on the Schmittian view, known as ‘decisionist theory’. The pre-constituent decisions include also the de-constituent decision, that is, the decision to abolish the former constitutional order and the decision to create a new one. This ‘de-constituent’ phase of the entire process by which the pre-existing constitutional order is abolished is generally taken with solemnity, since the new regime wants to establish its new legitimacy with its new ideological direction. Beaud distinguishes between the decision of ‘pre-constituent initiative’ and the decision ‘attributing the constituent power’.

In the cases where the decision is a ‘de-constituent’ decision, that is, when the former constitutional order is abolished, the decision itself is a revolutionary one, made by a primary constitution-maker, a gouvernement de fait. The very first establishing or empowering norm that sets into motion the constitutional decoupling is very often a factual one. The style would generally be that of ‘ordinance’ (eg, a decree or even proclamation of the provisional government) for the election of a constituent assembly, which supposes also the answer to the question: Who is entitled to elect and the method of the election (representation) to the Assembly? However, the primary constitution-maker has to take into consideration the existing structures (local or territorial) and constituencies that they trust. Moreover, the constitution-maker has to respect prevailing ideologies about the subject of the constitution and allow for participation of those whose input will make the constitution legitimate, efficient, and accepted. These matters might have decisive effects on the composition of the Assembly and hence on the outcome.

In the case of ex nihilo constitution-making, the first act consists in the (auto) determination of the entity that will constitute the constituents. This must be an act of self-affirmation by definition. This is, quite often, a matter of the decision of a small elite that relies on force and violence. Such self-constitution is revolutionary (and it is very often part of a social revolution). It is an act of denial of the previous regime (the existing constitutional setting); it is denied that the existing structures can determine who can decide who is included in the constituent people. The primary constituting body may itself undertake constitution-writing, as is the case with military juntas that proclaim the constitution (pronunciamiento). More often, the primary constituting body introduces an interim skeleton set of rules of government (including an interim skeleton constitution) and calls at the same time for another body to draft and eventually adopt a constitution. In the making of constitutions that satisfy the criteria of constitutionalism and/or democracy, the preferred (and successful) body is an elected (or at least delegated) constituent body, a constituent assembly.

Historically constituent assemblies were often delegates of existing territorial or other entities (as it was the case in 1789 in France, and in 1830 in Belgium where provincial governments were asked by the interim government to send delegates).

As always, the empirical processes on setting up the constituent body are odd mixtures: in 1789 the representatives were elected according to the (somewhat obscure) rules existing in the monarchy, but they then undertook an act of auto-proclamation to constitute themselves (p. 424) as representatives of the people (though elected by a tiny minority of the people living in France).

Resonating revolutionary democratic ideologies, modern democratic theories relate constituent power to the ultimate source of state power, namely to people. According to Thomas Paine’s well-known dictum: ‘The constitution of a country is not the act of its government, but of the people constituting a government’. But who is the people? Jennings had already stated (in another sense) that ‘people cannot decide until somebody decides who are the people’. It is well known that 95 percent of people living in America were excluded by pre-existing laws from participating in the ratification of the Constitution. The ‘People’, that is the constituency may change as part of the constitution-making, or perhaps it is the change in the composition of the constituency that drives and dictates the constitution-making. Thus, the French ‘people’ of 1945 was quite different from the ‘people’ in 1936 (when the last elections before the Second World War took place): for instance, in 1936 women still did not have the vote in France, whereas ‘someone’ (de Gaulle) decided in 1945 that women would have the vote. The same is true in regard to Germany (in 1918) and Italy (1946) with the extension of voting rights. Where constitution-making power in the substantive sense pertains to the nation it is possible that people who pertain to the nation on ethnic grounds will be selected and granted voting rights. In practical terms, this means that in the actual determination of the constituent assembly, nationality-based inclusion or exclusion by the initial decision-makers will be significant. The composition and even the formal representation of the peoples behind the constituent assembly might be decisive and are not necessarily subject to the original design. The tragedy of the partition of India in 1947 illustrates this dialectic.

It is believed that the more participatory the constitution-making, the higher its legitimacy and acceptance. But popular participation is often absent or formal, and even where participation has created constitutional enthusiasm this may not result in lasting or widespread acceptance of the constitution, especially where high expectations of empowerment do not materialize. On the other hand, even an imposed constitution may gain acceptance and even legitimacy thanks to its conflict-reducing effects, and in particular if it provides a frame that provides affluence. Participation does not equal consent: acquiescence is the condition that most constitutions may aspire to in society. But for a theory of constitutionalism, it is not the democratic nature of the participation through constituent bodies and referenda that matters, but the lack of unilateral imposition. The principle of public participation in the drafting of the US Constitution was ‘that the people should endow the government with a constitution and not vice versa’.

The ‘people’ is not sufficiently structured to develop a constitution. Nor are empirical people very welcome by the actual constitution-making elite. Moreover, empirically, society is often divided about the constitution, many of them resisting it. Quite often those who oppose it are (p. 425) denied participation in the process. The British loyalists were de facto excluded from participation in the ratification of the US Constitution, or earlier in the process of calling for a state constitution. The standard solution to the problem of the participation of the people is one based on representation: a specifically designated body, elected by the majority will exercise the constitution-making power. This was the idea behind the formulation of Article 3 of the French Declaration: ‘The principle of all sovereignty resides essentially in the nation’. People are replaced by the abstraction of the nation to avoid claims of being responsible to a specific electorate’s whims. The nation (or even people) is only a point of location. The original word ‘principe’ refers to source. To be a source of sovereignty is different from being the sovereign.
In accordance with the concept of representation of this specifically elected body, a constituent assembly is deemed to have the authority and legitimacy to carry out the task (though for practical reasons it often works in small committees).

The understanding of constituent power has a fundamental impact on the constitution-making process. Competing concepts have emerged in the last 250 years as to the nature of this constituent power, with implications for the articulation of the will of the power. Certain practices became accepted as having greater or lesser legitimacy but the constitution-making process remains to some extent a matter of power contingency and these contingencies determine which elements of the toolkit of constitution-making apply.

The ambiguity of constitution-making power emerged most spectacularly in the making of the US Constitution. There is an ongoing debate concerning the democratic credentials of the US Constitution. Madison famously argued:

> the principle of representation was neither unknown to the ancients nor wholly overlooked in their political constitutions. The true distinction between these and the American governments, lies in the total exclusion of the people, in their collective capacity, from any share in the latter, and not in the total exclusion of the representatives of the people from the administration of the former. The distinction, however, thus qualified, must be admitted to leave a most advantageous superiority in favor of the United States.26

III. Launching Constitutions

Prima facie, a constitutional process is, in the formal sense, no different from any other norm productive process. Producing a constitution starts with an initial decision (known as the ‘initiative’): Who decides the initiative and what does it mean? In this respect, some models are apparent. The process goes on with a decision on how to position the process vis-à-vis the existing structure (eg to amend the constitution, or to have a new one according to the existing formalities of constitution-making or disregard the existing patterns) followed by the choice (elections) for the deliberating body or the draft constitution-preparing body (the constituent assembly). The process includes also the working technique of that body (how are the articles of the future constitution prepared?). Lastly, the question of the final decision or approval appears: approval by the body itself or by a referendum (most likely nowadays) a veto right, a review right, a promulgation right, etc.

(p. 426) How does it start? Who gives the starting signal leading to a constitutional process, that, to the setting up of a (future) constitution? How is the signal delivered? This is a question of legitimacy: Is it the existing constitution or some other external source to give power and set the force and form of the change? Is the constitution made by a constituent power or by a constituted one?

1. Models of Ex Nihilo Creation

(a) The Revolutionary Version

The great revolutionary constitutions were established in total rupture with the former constitutional regime.27 In most modern cases, if not in all, a process establishing a new constitution, starts from a decision to undo, which, in our view, in turn starts from a decision to do, which, in the previous existing constitutional order. The foundational event of modern constitutionalism, the Philadelphia Convention28 had already raised the intriguing question of the legality of the Convention in light of the Articles of the Confederation of 1777. The very convening of the convention may be considered as a ‘de-constituent’ step, on the verge of a legal revolution.29

In a legal (technical) sense undoing means that the rules of replacing the constitution are disregarded. Such disregard presupposes that the constitution considers itself (or its essence—see below on amendments) immutable or it requires a special process for it that is then disregarded.30

In revolutionary constitution-making, the disregard of the pre-existing constitution-making system means that the body making the new constitution has to constitute itself in this sense. In Locke's natural law right of revolution people retained their right to cancel the implied contract with the king. Following Locke only to some extent the American Declaration of Independence identified sovereignty of the people as the source of the emerging government. The state constitutions which were enacted after 1776 were written texts and were ‘the self-conscious expression of a collective people speaking as the sovereign and giving direction to government ... ’.

The French National Assembly (in 1789), that was convened for a different purpose, proclaimed itself as that constituent assembly. Beaud qualifies that decision as a kind of ‘speech act’. Likewise, the Founding Fathers who had a limited mandate to amend the existing Articles of Confederation took upon themselves at least a drafting power and defined the final consti (p. 427) tuent power in the ratification through the states in popular assemblies. At the convention that was called to create the constitution of the newly independent Belgium in 1830, which was fully aware of the creation rituals that had emerged during the French Revolution, the first sentence uttered was: ‘The National Congress constitutes itself in the name of the Belgian people’ (not ‘nation’!) (‘Le congrès national s’installe au nom du peuple belge’). It is equally telling that ten minutes after the convention was opened the debate concerned the urgency of ratifying the mandates, which was the first act of self-constitution: ‘There must be something in existence before creating the standing order.’

According to the democratic-popular theory of constituent power it is the people (perhaps in the exercise of ultimate popular sovereignty) that constitutes the body that determines the text of the constitution. In some instances additional ratification is required. But ‘democratic choice is commonly supposed to be a form of popular sovereignty over political results. In any complex, polity, however, this supposition is at best metaphorical, as the large post-war literature on democratic theory suggests.

i. The Idea of the Constituent Assembly

While the French revolutionary approach to the idea of the constitution is often characterized as being fascinated with the constitution as if it were a pudding to be made following a recipe, the oath that constituted the constituent assembly from the delegates of the Third Estate by the end of June 1789 was certainly not premeditated. In the Tennis Court Oath they directed themselves to ‘fix [restore] the constitution of the realm, carry out regeneration of the public order and maintain the true principles of monarchy’. It took some time to understand that the traditional structure cannot be restored and regeneration means drafting a new constitution ex nihilo.

The typical expression of self-assertion at (revolutionary, ie, non-legal) constituent assemblies consists of a reference to the source of all power (people, nation, supreme being). In June 1789, the delegates placed themselves in a constitutional vacuum: the constituent power was perceived by Sieyès as a return to the state of nature. The only source and authority to rely upon, in the logic of Sieyès was the nation as the ultimate political entity. Only with the Declaration and the abolition of feudal privileges did the majority of the Assembly accept that they had to create a constitution. But the idea that they had to give legitimacy to themselves emerged from the very beginning when the Third Estate representatives met in Versailles: they reserved to themselves the right to approve the delegates’ mandate.

In the workings of the French Constituent Assembly, trial and error resulted in certain normative expectations about the frames and principles a constituent assembly has to observe. The Constituent Assembly, while acting as an ordinary legislator, at a certain point came to the conclusion that it should cease to operate after the constitution was adopted. Moreover, following Robespierre’s motion members of the assembly became ineligible. The emerging doctrine attributed a unique status of incompatibility to constituent assemblies, granting it a unique mission, including the seldom observed principle that they should not become involved in (p. 428) ordinary legislation.

Ex post facto the involvement of the Assembly in legislation became problematic. The Constituent Assembly has a special popular mandate to make the constitution and other considerations of ordinary politics would undermine this sacred mission. In a way, additional functions result in the confusion of constituent and constituted power.

The original uncertainty in 1789 and the incredible social and political complexity of the Revolution made French constitution-making erratic. The drafting was time and again discontinued in order to solve more pressing political and legislative issues, because of political stalemate or simply because it took time to clarify various new concepts and their implications. In consequence, the drafting lasted more than two years and ended only because the unfortunate escape of the king to Varennes ended in a fiasco and he lost his ability to resist and could not but take the oath on the Constitution on September 14, 1791. The conclusion for the theory of constitution-making was that time limits should be set (limited mandate).
In the 1789–91 period, the powers of the constitution-makers changed continuously with major impacts on the rather irregular procedures. Procedural rules (rules of counting votes, rules on preparing drafts, standing orders) were improvised and even the circle of actors participating in the process changed, including major changes in the role of the king, who lost his veto power regarding the enactment of the constitution.

The use of constituent assemblies as an instrument of ex nihilo creation became a type of norm thanks to the authority of the French Revolution. The authority of the French Revolution and the logic of generating power in a political vacuum made it natural after the 1830 Revolution in Belgium to call a National Congress to enact a constitution for the newly independent state. This has to be understood in the context of the alternative that prevailed in early nineteenth-century constitutional monarchies. These constitutions were ‘granted’ like the granted charters in French constitutional history: this was the case of the two ‘granted’ Charters in 1815 and in 1830 (chartes constitutionnelles ‘octroyées’).

The reliance on the technique of the constituent assembly was more or less self-evident in the Latin American liberation/independence context. The use of formative constitution-making through specific constituent assemblies (with Simon Bolivar participating in several projects) created a kind of model or path dependence for future Latin American constitution-making. (The tradition was particularly respected because, like in France, restrictive constitutions were often and typically promulgated as charters dictated by caudillos. These were simply approved by legislation.)

Beyond theoretical considerations, recourse to the constituent assembly was also dictated by technical constraints: it was nearly impossible in the nineteenth century to rely on plebiscites in large countries. No French constitution was submitted to referendum in 1789–92, in 1793–95, in 1848, or in 1871. This was the basis of the French understanding of ‘convention power’ where there are no limits to the power of the assembly.

ii. Mixed Constitution-Making in Times of Mass Democracy (the Emergence of the Referendum)
A study of twentieth-century constitution-making indicates that the idea of constituent assemblies has been only partly retained. Here we review the making of a few continental constitutions which were theoretically innovative or politically influential.

Weimar. In the aftermath of defeat in the First World War—in the course of the German ‘Revolution’ of 1918—on November 9, 1918 the Republic was proclaimed, simply by a declaration of one of the leaders of the socialist party. This founding ‘de-constituent’ act—by which the old ‘Kaiser’ regime was abolished—had created a constitutional vacuum which necessitated a new constitution which necessitated a new process. A provisional government of Volksbeauftragte (delegates of the people) was established which in turn decided to elect a ‘National Assembly’, in order to adopt a new constitution for Germany. The elections were quickly organized: as early as January 19, 1919, with the first meeting taking place in Weimar on February 6, 1919. The Constitution of the Weimar Republic was adopted on August 11, 1919. The Constitution was adopted without being presented to a popular referendum. Notwithstanding the special electoral process that satisfied in principle the requirement of popular authorization, the Constitution suffered from a deep lack of legitimacy due to the German defeat.

Transition to the Fourth Republic in France. France emerged victorious from the Second World War in 1945, but the old institutions of the Third Republic had disappeared in 1940, at the moment of the collapse of France and the establishment of the Vichy regime. The theoretical problem was that of the status of the pre-existing structures. The official position of de Gaulle, the head of the provisional government of France, was that Vichy was nul et non avenu, that is, had never legally existed. Thus the question was: How would the new institutions be installed or the old institutions reinstated? The democratic answer was clear: the people itself should decide. Thus, on October 21, 1945, the French people were called to the polls and had to cast three different ballots: the first gave the people the right to decide whether they wanted to abolish the Third Republic initiating a new constitution. The answer was yes by a huge majority. The yes to the second ballot determined the process of writing the new constitution: it authorized a Constituent Assembly (with limited powers) to be elected. The final say had been granted again to the people through a referendum (for the results see below).

Italy. A comparable process took place in Italy in 1946, though formally within the frame of the pre-existing constitutional setting of the monarchy. The process, however, was initiated in breach of the existing legal system by a decree of the executive, based on an agreement that was reached during the war (decreto Bonomi). People were called to choose by referendum between republic and monarchy (12.7 million for the republic and 10.7 million for the monarchy). At the same time, they elected a constituent assembly which subsequently adopted the new constitution by the end of 1947 without referendum.

Democratization in Russia and Romania. Regime change including transition to democracy from totalitarianism (as in the case of Russia in 1993) is also centered on the body or authority that decides on the assembly that will have constituent power. In 1993 President Yeltsin, after receiving confirmation by referendum that expressed confidence in the President, handpicked an assembly to draft a new constitution. The Congress of the People's Deputies (the body with constituent powers) and its Supreme Soviet reserved for itself constitution-making powers relying on the provisions of the constitution in force. After a violent dissolution of the Supreme Soviet, Yeltsin submitted 'his' draft to an 'all-national vote' (a process established by presidential decree).

As in Russia in 1993, in Romania in 1989, following a violent transfer of power a self-proclaimed National Salvation Front Council set the rules of transition to a new constitution. It enacted laws for the election of a bicameral parliament which was called to act as a constituent assembly (sitting in joint session). The Constituent Assembly adopted the text of the constitution which was ratified by referendum at the end of 1991, two years after Ceausescu was summarily executed. The parliament continued to operate.

These variations indicate that the revolutionary element in the process is a matter of degree. The mandate of the constituent body may be self-imposed (France, 1789; America, 1787) or subject to popular authorization. Even where the process begins while the previous constitutional regime is in place (France, 1789; Italy, 1946; France, 1958) the popular or self-promotional mandate means that a rupture with the previous regime and a new source of constitution-making power and legitimacy emerges.

To sum up these developments, the problem of legitimacy of the ex nihilo creation—that is, when someone sets into motion an extra-legal process in denial of the existing forms—has attracted increased attention, at least at the beginning of the twentieth century, in order to make the act of creation more credible beyond reference to to the people or the nation. It is for this reason that the very departure from constitution-making rules and from the constitution in force was increasingly subjected to participatory affirmation, or even preliminary popular approval. In Italy, in 1946, the setting up of the constituent assembly was preceded by a referendum on the form of state; in Colombia there were referenda to authorize the President to rely on a constituent assembly.47 In addition, indirect elements of external support may contribute to the legitimation, as was the case with the referendum initiated to prepare for the impeachment of Yeltsin for his constitution-making and other matters. International recognition of an interim government may have similar effects. Finally, with the increased popularity (p. 431) of the referendum, it has now evolved to corroborate popular support for the assembly, and indirectly for the whole process (beginning in France with the case of making the Constitution of the Fourth Republic).48

(b) Nation-State-Building Constitutions

i. State-Building as an Act of National Sovereignty

While the ex nihilo creation model assumes that constitution-making is formally defined by a rejection of a pre-existing process and a denial of the legitimacy of pre-existing institutional actors, the making of nation-state-building constitutions is not defined in terms of the denial of an available procedure and underlying authority. Many aspects of the self-constitution and self-referentialism that is so characteristic of revolutions are present here too. The distinction is sometimes purely academic. While revolutionary in substance, the making of the US Constitution in 1787 is also one of nation/state-building. By creating a more integrated government, 'the true objective of the American Constitution was not to limit power but to create more power, actually to establish and duly constitute an entirely new power center ... whose authority was to be exerted over a large, expanding territory.'49

As with the case of the original American states, newly created states need a constitution for purposes of self-assertion. The state must affirm itself by granting itself a structure of government. This was the task for Israel in 1948 after the Declaration of Independence, though the constitution-making had to remain unfinished. This was the task of the framing of the constitution for Belgium in 1830–31, of the new states created after the First World War (such as Poland in 1921 or Latvia in 192250) or for Croatia in 1990. Newly formed post-colonial states faced the same problem in the late 1950s and early 1960s: they had to create a government structure.
Although the constitution-making process may rely on revolutionary popular acts of creation, substantively these are different from purely revolutionary constitutions. To the extent the state is based on ethnic homogeneity or the affirmation of a special nationality and its identity with the new state, the constitution will reflect nationalistic aspirations and the constituency (the people entitled to representation) might be ethnically limited.

ii. Constitution-Making as an International Effort
Constitution-making in the absence of full national sovereignty represents special features. Though this may seem an aberration in view of popular theories of constitution-making, it is actually a rather common occurrence in the history of constitution-making and has lasting implications on the constitution. The lack of de iure or at least de facto sovereignty has an important impact on this procedure.

For present purposes, it is useful to distinguish two main forms of constitution-making without sovereignty. A country may lose its sovereignty because of a war. The occupation forces may determine the process of the restoration of sovereignty, inter alia, by setting the terms of reference and procedure for the new constitution. In this regard the occupying power may not only be the undoer of the previous constitutional system (the power appointing a new constituent entity) but may also be involved in the actual drafting. This involvement may reach the level of imposition (constitutional octroi). The drafting of the Japanese Constitution under the guidance of General MacArthur borders such octroi. The German Basic Law of 1949 was created on an Allied initiative as part of the restoration of German state sovereignty, with the Allied forces insisting on certain substantive solutions (eg federalism). The particular features of (West) German constitution-making, including disregard of the then prevailing and established constitution-making wisdom related to constituent power and assembly process, are related to these circumstances. The Basic Law was adopted by a ‘parliamentary council’, a body of 65 representatives of the local parliaments (of the Länder) called up by the occupation forces. The three Western Military Governors authorized the Germans to draft their constitution in the ‘Frankfurt Documents’ of July 1, 1948. Hoping for unification with Germans in the Eastern sector, the Germans would have preferred an interim governance document. For this reason, notwithstanding strong American objections, they refused to have a convention and ratification by referendum and submitted to ratification by the local parliaments. It was thus not approved by the people. The absence of a referendum is partly related to the distrust in the institution that originated in Hitler’s successful use of the plebiscite with the same population.

Partly related to decolonization and increasingly due to the participation of the international community in the handling of post-conflict situations, an increasing number of contemporary constitutions are drafted under the aegis (or even authority) of international organizations and, in peace processes, with the participation of foreign mediating powers. This is often carried out with de facto power of persuasion, as in the case of the Dayton Agreements which determined the Constitution of Bosnia-Herzegovina, turning it to some extent into an international institutional regime (with powers granted to international civil servants under the High Representative and a constitutional court composed of foreigners).

In the archetypal situation for such constitution-making, a specific territory, on the verge of independence, is about to adopt a constitution: this constitution being guided and inspired, sometimes imposed, by the international community. One very interesting example had already been furnished in 1947 by Resolution 181(II) of the General Assembly of the United Nations which recommended the establishment of two states in Palestine (one Jewish and one Arab). Article 10 of the resolution described the process leading to the adoption of democratic parliamentary constitutions (excluding thus a presidential regime) in both states and guaranteeing the principles of equality.

Similar steps were taken more recently by the United Nations in the case of states or territories such as Cambodia, East Timor, and even Afghanistan. An interesting constitutional complication is who, and at which stage, can amend or alter such a constitution.

2. Constitution-Making ‘By the Rules’
There are instances where transition to the new constitutional regime is a relatively smooth one, in search of formal continuity, thus avoiding political turmoil and a crisis of legitimacy. Most often this takes the form of fundamental amendments but sometimes a new constitution is preferred for reasons of consistency or ideology. To the extent new constitutions can be created via amendment, this process is not reserved to the constituent power of the people. The Swiss or Venezuelan solution is quite unusual: here, there can be a popular initiative for constitutional change, although subject to (some) control by the existing institutions. A number of constitutions (expressing reservations regarding populism) prohibit popular initiatives intended to amend the constitution, at the price of separating the constitution from the constituent power.

Even where the constitutional change is more ambitious, amounting fundamentally to regime change, we quite often witness a quasi-pathetic attempt to rely, a minima, that is, almost indirectly but nevertheless clearly, on the outgoing order, as if this reliance could add ‘something’ to the legitimacy of the new order. One should not underestimate ‘the magic of constituent power’. A certain quality is attributed to so-called ‘constituent power’ which means that if the magic current passes through the amending power, it suffices to render the entire process legal and legitimate, at least superficially, hence the efforts of numerous revolutionary leaders to show, despite even minimal credibility, that their seizure of power, followed by the establishment of a new constitution, has a basis in the existing constitutional chain. (See the adoption of new constitutions after free elections in the post-communist transition.) Quite often, reliance on the pre-existing amendment procedure is part of the compromise underlying the transfer of power. It was for this reason that in Hungary the negotiated transition from communism was based on the fully amended constitution adopted as an amendment to the 1949 constitution by the still in place communist Parliament. The anti-communist opposition refused to accept a new constitution enacted by a non-democratically elected Parliament. Although after the free elections the fully amended text served the needs of the new democracy well, political mistrust had not permitted the making of a new constitution. However, in other countries going through post-communist transition, (p. 434) freely elected parliaments (not created as constituent assemblies but with constitution-making powers under the old constitutions) enacted new constitutions.

Formal reliance on existing constitution-making or amending procedures is characteristic of what is called ‘fraud to the constitution’ which alleges smooth transition from democracy to an autocratic regime. This was the case, for instance, with the Vichy order established through the law of July 10, 1940. As a matter of fact, this was also the case with the transition from the Weimar Republic to the Nazi regime, starting with the empowering (‘enabling’) law of March 23, 1933. Should we not be consistent and admit that such fraud may work in the other direction (from autocratic to democratic) too? Consider the cases where passage was allowed from an autocratic regime to a new, modern liberal one: as well as the cases of Portugal and Spain (from quasi-fascist regimes to liberal regimes) there are also those of some of the former communist countries (eg, Poland where most of the fundamental changes were introduced into the old constitution after the free elections; which was followed by a delayed enactment of the new constitution by referendum).

IV. The Drafting Process

We now enter the reconstruction phase, or ‘re-constituent’ phase. We have supposed that the former constitutional order has been abolished and that a new one is to be established. The process is similar to any legislative process where we must know who is in charge and how the task will be conducted.

Obviously, in our democratic times, seldom would a new constitution be drafted by a non-elected body. The idea that a constitution should be approved by the people is now undisputed, even in regimes where the people is not really free to choose. The value of affirmation by plebiscite remains dubious. It may be assumed that today a new constitution would not be ratified or approved without the direct involvement of the people. However, given the transformative nature of the process and the political vulnerabilities of the powers who had initial control over the process, contemporary exceptions are rather common, especially in the case of ‘pacted’ transfers of power (Czechoslovakia, 1991; Czech Republic, 1992; Slovakia, 1992; Bulgaria, 1991; Hungary, 2011). Determining the powers of the drafting body is crucial for the process. From the theoretical perspective, a constituent assembly representing the nation or people as the ultimate depository of constituent power should not have its powers restricted, except if one accepts the idea of a binding mandate. This was the original position of the French representatives in 1789 who tried to buy time by requesting authorization from their constituents. However, Siéyes’s radical position that they represent the whole (indivisible) nation put an end to this approach.

Notwithstanding theory to the contrary, the power that put into motion the process often sets substantive and procedural criteria (eg a timeline) to the constitution-making body, for example in the edict that sets up the
The Process of Certification and Ratification of Constitutions

The last step in constitution-making is the certification of the constitution (ratification in US terminology) which in turn will allow its promulgation signaling its validity and its coming into force. What happens to the draft once it has been approved depends on the decision made before the assembly was elected unless the assembly itself decides to amend the rules. Often the constituent body claims to have powers to promulgate, although historically in monarchies at least royal assent was needed (this was a major issue in the making of the 1791 French Constitution, where the position of the king was changed under duress during the process). The prevailing contemporary finalizing act is consent by the people in the form of a referendum (see above).

Another question is that of the ‘material’ limitations imposed in certain cases on the drafters, that is, certain principles they should introduce and respect in the draft: which in turn will raise the question of the body in control of those principles and rules. In some cases the constitution needs certification, namely a declaration according to which the draft proposed is in conformity with the principles set up before the process began. In this regard, see the French constitutional law of July 10, 1940 and that of June 3, 1958: both cases were situations where the legitimacy of the process was doubtful. Technically the inclusion of guiding principles has the following meaning: the authority issuing the norm containing the guiding principles is ‘higher’ than that which will be submitted to those principles.

With the consolidation of the powers of constitutional courts, the formal judicial certification of the constitution before promulgation became a possibility (for additional judicial review of constitutional changes see below). The most famous example is that of the South (p. 437) African Constitution. After the collapse of the apartheid system, a provisional constitution was adopted in 1994. This document prepared for the election of a constituent assembly: it provided for 34 principles to be observed and introduced in the new constitution, under the control of the South African Constitutional Court. In May 1996, the Court rejected the first draft of the constitution—it considered that the principles had not been fully respected. A new draft was prepared and finally ratified by the Court; a process which was qualified as a ‘certifying process’. Other cases are slightly different, for example provisions may require certification by an external body (a high religious order in religious states, approval by a body of ‘sages’, etc (see Iran)). These external bodies are intended to be the guardians of the principles, a task which is elsewhere in the charge of the courts.

VI. Between Amendment and Constitutional Change: Protection of Unamendable Provisions

Official doctrine distinguishes somewhat pedantically between the framing power versus the amending power. In the present framework, we will not enter the convolutions of those discussions. Suffice it to say that the amending process has, by its very nature, certain repercussions on constitution-building. In this section we will discuss instances where amendment functions as fundamental change resulting in a substantively new constitution, thereby raising fundamental issues of legitimacy. Further, we will discuss the substantive limitations to the amending process, including protection of the allegedly immutable provisions of the constitution.

The constitution is an instrument designed to solve the pre-commitment problem. At a down-to-earth political-sociological level it is intended to perpetuate a certain power arrangement (at least excluding certain groups from exercising dominant power: see the anti-aristocracy and anti-royal power provisions in the 1791 French Constitution or the Belgian Constitution of 1831, the anti-clerical provision in the 1917 Mexican Constitution etc., to the extremes of the Soviet constitutions which used to limit power to the Communist Party and in principle to ‘toilers’ only). As a foundational document the founders’ ambition is to perpetuate a vision of social order, or at least its fundamental underlying values concerning government and nation. Jefferson’s opinion that the dead should not govern the living and that every generation has the right to a new constitution based on necessity never carried the day. Nevertheless, early popular revolutionary theory and practice expressly recognized the people’s right ‘to reform, alter, or totally change’.

It is not surprising that constitutions developed procedural and substantive solutions for their protection; currently practically all constitutions have such provisions. Amendment and the making of new constitutions can be cumbersome. In modern constitutions the idea of non-amendable provisions became increasingly popular with the possibility that judicial control is applied to protect the constitution both in terms of procedure (related to judicial review of electoral and referenda results and of legislative procedure) and substance.

1. The Amending Process and its Meaning

From its inception, at the end of the eighteenth century, modern constitutional theory understood that provisions should be made allowing for revision or amendment of the constitution, since no human written norm could be considered as perpetual and since future generations should be able to deliver themselves from the yolk of those previous. In a modern judicial formulation: ‘A static system of laws is the worst tyranny that any Constitution can impose upon a country. An unamendable Constitution means that all reform and progress are at a standstill.’

The amending process may be defined as a key to the constitution: it will allow the opening of the entire constitutional system and eventually its transformation or amendment. Thus the nature of the amending process gives the precise measure of the protection of the constitution and may induce collateral attempts to amend it. It reflects the understanding of popular sovereignty.
A standard approach is to apply the expectations of constitution-making to amendments. In this logic, amendments are to be carried out by specifically elected constituent assemblies, or at least submitted to referenda. Where referendum is the principal form of constitutional lawmaking, amendment is also by referendum, as in Switzerland. The alternative is to grant amendment power to ordinary legislation but add super-majority requirements and special procedures for cooling down periods. Germany is an example of this approach which may offer very limited protection: in Slovakia, 60 percent of parliamentarians in a single chamber may pass constitutional amendments. In the Dutch-Norwegian system, parliament is entitled to make changes but under very strenuous political conditions, which make the populist political abuse of the process politically very costly or at least risky. The basic idea is that after a super-majority has adopted an amendment, the legislation has to be dissolved and the amendment has to be adopted by the newly elected parliament within a short period of time. According to the French Constitution of 1958, the initiative of revision is reserved to the executive and to parliament, while ratification is by referendum if it was initiated by parliament (the two chambers in identical terms). This opening up to popular will had more to do with de Gaulle's mistrust of the Senate, and less to do with respect for popular sovereignty. Revisions initiated by the executive can be ratified by Congress (three-fifths of parliamentarians). The republican form of government cannot be subjected to revision.

The results concerning the stability of the constitution differ even though the concept of a ‘difficult amending system’ is not a scientific concept. The best known example of stability is, of course, that of the US Constitution with an initiative by a bicameral super-majority (or by a convention called by two-thirds of the states) and a ratification by three-quarters of states. In consequence, only 27 amendments have been adopted since 1787 (some of them repealed): compare this with the Federal Republic of Germany with 50 amendments in 60 years (the process being simple and requiring only a majority of two-thirds in both houses). Countries like the United States with a ‘difficult’ system of amendment have in fact developed alternative, non-textual ways of introducing changes in the life of the constitution (in part, of course, through judicial review of legislation).

2. Substantive Limitations to the Amending Process

The basic idea here is that of protection of the constitution against attempts to amend its very essence according to the amending process but leading to another political regime. In 1884 the French Constitution (which was at that time simply a series of constitutional laws) was amended to prohibit any future amendment which would abolish ‘the republican form of the government’. At a period in French history when the restoration of monarchy was still seriously considered, the intention was clear: prohibiting it constitutionally. This was the beginning of a new period in comparative constitutional practice (and theory) which may be called the age of the ‘eternity clauses’. After the Second World War those clauses become more and more frequent: the German Basic Law had also introduced its famous Article 79(3) provision (human dignity, the separation of powers being immutable) as a very clear reaction to and safeguard against fascist or other anti-democratic attempts legally to introduce anti-democratic amendments. The Portuguese democratic constitution of 1975 contains 35 such provisions. Some constitutional courts (Germany, Romania, and Austria) are constitutionally authorized to review amendments. This is particularly relevant for the protection of immutable provisions.

Note also the debates around another form of limitations to the amending power: the so-called implied limitations, that is, those which are not expressed but derive from the very sense of the constitution which should not be abrogated from or amended under a formal process of amendment, in pure formal conformity with the amending process. In turn, this opens the debate on the judicial review of such proceedings. Inconsistency with other provisions might be an additional reason for such review. The protection of the constitution, or at least its core elements (like the republican form of government) poses a fundamental challenge to the idea of constituent power which was found in a sovereign source outside the constitution. After all, one could argue that the power was transferred but it did not extinguish the source of power. Even if one does not accept that the power to give entails the power to repeal (though the express authorization to change the constitution or even replace it corroborates that assumption), the very foundation of making the constitution rests on its extra-legal sources. The constitutionalist doctrine that goes back to Benjamin Constant, indicates that people's sovereign power was never full and did not include the destruction of the very fundamentals of its existence by authorizing despotism. Fundamental human rights cannot be disposed of, even by people.

The Supreme Court of India offers a practical application of this logic. It concluded that irrespective of express provisions of the Constitution of India to the contrary (which denied the power of the Court to review constitutional amendments), certain fundamental elements of the Constitution cannot be amended. The Supreme Court argued that it has an unwritten mandate to protect the basic structure of the Constitution against unconstitutional constitutional amendments. The Indian concept was followed in Pakistan and recently in Bangladesh.\textsuperscript{86}

The Indian Supreme Court argued that:

\begin{quote}
It was the common understanding that fundamental rights would remain in substance as they are and they would, not be amended out of existence. It seems also, to have been a common understanding that the fundamental features of the Constitution, namely, secularism, democracy and the freedom of the individual would always subsist in the welfare state. In view of the above reasons, a necessary implication arises that there are implied limitations on the power of Parliament that the expression ‘amendment of this Constitution’ has consequently a limited meaning in our Constitution and not the meaning suggested by the respondents. ... [T]he appeal by the respondents to democratic principles and the necessity of having absolute amending power to prevent a revolution to buttress their contention is rather fruitless, because if their contention is accepted the very democratic principles, which they appeal to, would disappear and a revolution would also become a possibility.\textsuperscript{87}
\end{quote}

Indeed, revolution remains the ultimate form of constitution-making, pointing towards the non-legal dimension of constitutionalism.

\section*{Bibliography}

\begin{itemize}
\item Olivier Beaud, \textit{La puissance de l'Etat} (1994)
\item Olivier Cayla and Pasquale Pasquino (eds), \textit{Le pouvoir constituant et l'Europe} (2011)
\item Jon Elster, 'Intemporal Choice and Political Thought' in George Loewenstein and Jon Elster (eds), \textit{Choice Over Time} (1992)
\item Jon Elster and Rune Slagstad, \textit{Constitutionalism and Democracy} (1988)
\item Claude Klein, \textit{Théorie et pratique du pouvoir constituant} (1996)
\item Arnaud Le Pillouer, \textit{Les pouvoirs non-constituants des assemblées constituanttes, Essai sur le pouvoir instituant} (2005)
\item Martin Loughlin and Neil Walker (eds), \textit{The Paradox of Constitutionalism: Constituent Power and Constitutional Form} (2007)
\item Michel Rosenfeld, \textit{The Identity of the Constitutional Subject, Selfhood, Citizenship, Culture and Community} (2010)
\item Carl Schmitt, \textit{Theory of the Constitution} (2008)
\item Michel Troper and Dominique Chagnollaud (eds), \textit{Traité international de droit constitutionnel} (2012)
\end{itemize}

\section*{Notes:}

(1) ‘What degree of agency these reputed lawgivers might have in their respective establishments, or how far they might be clothed with the legitimate authority of the people, cannot in every instance be ascertained’: James Madison, ‘The Same Subject Continued, and the Incoherence of the Objections to the New Plan Explosed’ (1788) \textit{The Federalist Papers}, no 38.

(2) Ibid.
Constitution-Making: Process and Substance

(5) Bruce Ackerman, We the People: Foundations (1991), 266–94.

(6) One could argue that constitutional stability is the exception and not the rule, notwithstanding the pre-commitment principle that underlies all constitutions. Eg, Venezuela had 26 constitutions from its original Bolivarian one of 1811 until the current 1999 constitution. See further, Zachary Elkins, Tom Ginsburg, and James Melton, The Endurance of National Constitutions (2009).

(7) The Norwegian Constitution is technically the 1814 Constitution though fundamentally amended over the decades and the Belgian Constitution formally dates from 1831. Austria has technically had the same constitution since 1920, since the first constitution was re-enacted in 1945, though with a great number of amendments: 75 between 1929 and 1999.

(8) See eg Bruce Ackerman's theory of higher order lawmaking. Ibid 266–94.

(9) Jon Elster has listed the following political and economic grounds for making a constitution: social and economic crisis, as in the making of the US Constitution of 1787 or the French Constitution of 1791; revolution, as in the making of the 1830 Charter in France or the French and German 1848 Constitutions; regime collapse, as in the making of the new constitutions in Southern Europe in the mid-1970s and in Eastern Europe in the early 1990s; fear of regime collapse, as in the making of the French Constitution of 1958, which was imposed by de Gaulle under the shadow of a military rebellion; defeat in war, as in Germany after the First and Second World Wars, or in Italy and Japan after the Second World War; reconstruction after war, as in France in 1946; the creation of a new state, as in Poland and Czechoslovakia after the First World War (or the Reconstruction of the South after the American Civil War); liberation from colonial rule, as in the United States after 1776 and in many third world countries after 1945: Jon Elster, ‘Forces and Mechanisms in the Constitution Making Process’ (1995) 45 Duke Law Journal 364.

(10) The actual division is not so clear-cut. Post-colonial constitutions were created under the umbrella of the colonial power, or even by the colonial power. In the latter case in some instances the element of rupture disappears as the creation is carried out under the mandate of the constitution of the colonial power. This was clearly the case with Canada and the Austro-Hungarian monarchy in 1867, and to a much lesser extent with India beginning in 1946.

(11) The two versions are not always clearly distinguishable, while constitutional restoration brings a paradox. Here a self-proclaimed body, after having obtained power through force, declares the return to a previous constitution often submitting the act of return to a referendum. While the idea of restoration as a constitutional concept originates in the rule of Louis XVIII, the monarchy could not return to the pre-revolutionary status quo. There are, however, better contemporary examples of restoration. After free elections in 1990, Latvia’s Parliament (the majority) declared independence and restored the 1922 Constitution. These measures were reaffirmed by a referendum a year later.

(14) The distinction is attributable to Abbé de Sisseyès. The US doctrine would at times use the term ‘framing power’ as opposed to the ‘amending power’ stemming from the constitution. In the British tradition, it is common to use the literal translation ‘constituent’ power. Note that Albert V. Dicey in his Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution (1965) describes quite coherently and accurately the constitutional process in ‘written constitutions’ but never refers to a 'constituent power', preferring to use the distinction between 'flexible' and 'rigid' constitutions. The German tradition, of course, knows the concept very well: it is rendered by the complex wording 'verfassungsgebende Gewalt'. See further, Claude Klein, Théorie et pratique du pouvoir constituant (1996).

(16) Roughly and concisely, 'decisionism' may be defined as an approach putting the decision-making process by a certain authority at the forefront of the legal analysis thus transcending the legalistic approach.

(17) Ibid 265.

(18) Those are governments without legal basis at their inception, but their power being effective over a period of time and a defined territory.

(19) The question of the lawful or legal character of that initiating step is of course well beyond the scope of this chapter on the process of constitution-making. German authors (mainly the famous Georg Jellinek) have used the following illuminating formula: 'Die Lehre von der normativen Kraft des Faktischen' (the theory of normative force of the factual). See Andreas Anter (ed), Die normative Kraft des faktischen: Das Staatsverständniss Georg Jellineks (2004).

(20) Some constitutions originate in interstate treaties. Though even here popular sovereignty might play a primary role in the theory of constituent power, constituent state consent continues to play a role. (See also the need of state ratification in making the US Constitution.) This is certainly an issue in the case of making a European Constitution.

(21) Thomas Paine, Rights of Man (1791), 53.

(23) While the Muslim League under Jinnah asked for two constitution-making bodies, the British colonial authorities opted for one where were members were indirectly elected by the members of the Provisional Legislative Assemblies (a minority of them fully controlled by Muslims). Muslims were in the minority at the Constituent Assembly. Partition was the ‘preferred’ constitutional arrangement.

(24) Quoted in Hannah Arendt, On Revolution (1963), 144.

(26) James Madison, ‘The Senate (Continued)’ (1788) The Federalist Papers, no 63. Akhil Reed Amar, America’s Constitution (2005), 14, argues that this position is not anti-democratic but ‘a republican proceduralist pondering how best to structure lawmaking institutions’.

(27) Examples include the United States (both in 1776 and mainly in 1787), France in 1789 and during the entire revolutionary episode as well as the Soviet Russia vis-à-vis the czarist regime.

(29) We may define a revolution in the legal sense as an amendment to the constitution, disregarding the rules of amendment. This was the case of the Articles of the Confederation.

(30) Such express provision is contained eg in Section 30 of the Constitution of the Argentine Nation:

The Constitution may be totally or partially amended. The necessity of reform must be declared by Congress with the vote of at least two-thirds of the members; but it shall not be carried out except by an Assembly summoned to that effect.

Article 146 of the German Basic Law allows its demise under non-specific conditions:
This Basic Law, which since the achievement of the unity and freedom of Germany applies to the entire German people, shall cease to apply on the day on which a constitution freely adopted by the German people takes effect.

(33) Ibid 102. ‘M. le baron de Stassart observe qu’il faut être quelque chose avant de faire le règlement’.

(34) Russell Hardin, Liberalism, Constitutionalism, and Democracy (2003), 152.

(35) Massachusetts in 1780 had already vindicated and practiced the right to have its own convention acting independently of government (including the elected legislature) to draft a constitution. (See Arendt (n 24), 301.) This model was known in Paris but not followed: the Assembly was a quasi-legislative body called up by the king.

(36) For a contemporary application of the non-eligibility rule see the case of the Constituent Assembly of Colombia in 1991.

(37) Some of these assemblies were called congresses. For an overview see Darrel R. Reid and Patrick Fafard, Constituent Assemblies: A Comparative Survey (1991).

(38) Characteristic of the sentiments prevailing when a nation-state creates a revolutionary assembly, the Belgian constituents—with personal memories and affiliations with the French Revolution—considered their assembly an original one, being created by the Belgian nation in a time of trouble without any preliminary rules to rely on: Philippe Raxhon, ‘Mémoire de la Révolution française de 1789 et Congrès national belge (1830–31)’ (1996) 26 Revue belge d’histoire contemporaine 33, 51.

(39) Technically, the Belgian Constitution of 1831 originated in the rejection of a Dutch Constitution that was unilaterally imposed.

(40) Following the liberation wars led by Simon Bolívar, the Congress of Cúcuta was called up with specifically elected representatives. This convention promulgated the Constitution of Cúcuta (unifying various territories of the former Spanish Viceroyalty into the short-lived federation of Gran Colombia on August 30, 1821). The addition of the referendum to the constituent assembly process became increasingly attractive in Latin America too, at least from the 1990s (see, eg, Venezuela, with a strong emphasis on direct popular legitimation).

(41) See, however, the plebiscite of 1851 to grant constitution-making powers to Louis Napoléon Bonaparte. See also the 1802 plebiscite making Napoléon into a consul for life, and the 1804 plebiscite on the French Empire.

(44) A position that was hardly tenable: the ‘Ordonnance portant rétablissement de la légalité républicaine’ (August 9, 1944) declared that the Republic never ceased to exist and that all laws and regulations of the regime are void, but that voidness must be declared expressis verbis! In fact, a very small number of such laws with ideological content were formally declared void.

(45) If the people were to answer ‘no’ to the first question, the elected assembly would have become the legislative assembly in the constitutional framework of the (maintained) Third Republic.

(46) In the case of creating the Fifth Republic in France the process of undoing the regime in force for the sake of a new constitution was ‘legalized’ in the sense that as a first step the then ruling elite accepted the constitutional law of June 3, 1958 which provided for an amendment of the 1946 Constitution according to a new procedure, disregarding the original procedure.

(47) The 1991 constitutional changes in Colombia were adopted by a constituent assembly. This procedure was not foreseen in the Constitution of Colombia, but was called upon and legitimated in two prior referenda.

(48) Of course, such complicated and staggered processes are not only the result of a need for legitimation; they also reflect political compromises and uncertainties where some of the groups agreeing to the process hope to increase power through the process by mobilization.

(49) Arendt (n 24), 152.

(50) After a war of independence a constituent assembly was called to enact a constitution for the country that had already received international (diplomatic and treaty) recognition of its sovereignty.

(51) Imposed constitutions have a long history, related to various forms of colonialism. The Constitution of 1908, imposed on Bosnia-Herzegovina within the frame of the Austro-Hungarian Empire was one of the most elaborate and progressive constitutional documents of its days.

(54) Related to internationalization (integrated participation in international organizations), international organizations may play a participatory and certifying role in constitution-making which has implications for the formal structure of constitution-drafting. The Venice Commission of the Council of Europe was deeply involved in making the Romanian Constitution and the same Commission monitored the constitution-making in Hungary in 2011.

(55) For a case of extremely strong international impact see East Timor under a UN administration. See Rosenfeld (n 12), 206–7.

(56) See Sejdic and Finci v Bosnia and Herzegovina, ECtHR App nos 27996/06 and 34836/06, Judgment of 22 December 2009 (government claiming that it cannot change the internationally mandated constitution in order to grant passive voting rights to members of non-national ethnic groups. Only Bosnians, Serbs, and Croats were eligible but not the Roma and Jews).

(57) The initiative can come from 15 percent of the citizens registered in the Civil and Electoral Register; or by 30 percent of the members of the National Assembly or (from) the President of the Republic in the Council of Ministers: Venezuela Constitution, 1999, Art 341(1).

(58) To be published (2012) under the title ‘La théorie du pouvoir constituant’ in Michel Troper and Dominique Chagnollaud (eds), Traité international de droit constitutionnel, vol 3 (forthcoming 2012).

(59) South Africa may also be attached to the transitional model. Like the former communist countries, agreements were progressively reached in order to allow smooth transition, without any revolutionary rupture.

(60) Only after 2010 when a new super-majority emerged with a reference to the revolution in the ballot box did it venture into successful constitution-making.

(61) See Georges Liet-Veaux's doctorate, Essai d'une théorie juridique des révolutions (1943) and his series of articles under the title ‘“La Fraude à la Constitution”’: Essai d’une analyse juridique des révolutions communautaires récentes Italie, Allemagne, France’ (1943) Revue du droit public 116–51.

(62) A similar technique was used in making the French Constitution in 1958 though the doctrinal distance between the 1946 order and the 1958 order is much less important than between the Third Republic and the Vichy order.

(63) But this was the case for the Fifth French Republic, through the constitutional law of June 3, 1958. It was also, in part, the case of the German Basic Law, in 1949 (see below).

(64) This is the case, for instance, of the German Weimar Constitution in 1919, which was not submitted to a referendum. The same applies to the Austrian Constitution in 1920.
See further Jon Elster, ‘Constitution Making in Eastern Europe: Rebuilding the Boat in the Open Sea’ (1993) 71 Public Administration 169–217. Of course, lack of referendum may originate from other circumstances as was the case with the Constitution of Croatia in 1990 which emerged in a unilateral secession.

The experience of 1958 is rather peculiar in that respect: the draft was prepared by a non-elected body, defined as ‘consultative’ which had to prepare a draft around defined lines, but the referendum was mandatory. The French Constitutional Act of July 10, 1940 empowered ‘the government under the authority and the signature of Maréchal Pétain’ to promulgate a new constitution of France which should guarantee the ‘Rights of Work, the Family and the Fatherland’, adding that the Constitution would be ratified by the nation and applied by the created assemblies. On the validity issue see Klein (n 14), 72.

The experience of 1958 is rather peculiar in that respect: the draft was prepared by a non-elected body, defined as ‘consultative’ which had to prepare a draft around defined lines, but the referendum was mandatory. The French Constitutional Act of July 10, 1940 empowered ‘the government under the authority and the signature of Maréchal Pétain’ to promulgate a new constitution of France which should guarantee the ‘Rights of Work, the Family and the Fatherland’, adding that the Constitution would be ratified by the nation and applied by the created assemblies. On the validity issue see Klein (n 14), 72.

The preparation of the Weimar Constitution was also greatly influenced by a technical inspirer: it was Hugo Preuss (1860–1925), himself inspired by Max Weber and Robert Redslob.

Tocqueville, as a member of the 1848 constituent assembly, wrote in his Souvenirs how the Assembly was haunted by the shadow of the great Constituent of 1789 and of the second Assembly, the Convention (1792–95). An attempt was even made to dress similar to Robespierre! Alexis de Tocqueville, ‘Souvenirs’ in Oeuvres, vol III (2004), 811.

The Court held on December 4, 1996 that most of the grounds for non-certification of the earlier constitutional text had clearly been eliminated in the amended constitutional text. Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (CCT37/96) [1996] ZACC 24; 1997 (1) BCLR 1; 1997 (2) SA 97 (December 4, 1996). In 2011, the Hungarian Constitutional Court was confronted with the issue of the constitutionality of the new constitution in the absence of a certification power. The Court ruled that it had no authority to rule on the matter but most judges wrote concurring opinions expressing their criticism with regard to the process: Decision 61/2011 (VII.13) of the Constitutional Court of the Republic of Hungary.

Certain constitution like the Russian one expressly differentiate between core provisions which are difficult to amend and others which are considered more technical and in need of constant revision and therefore subject to easy amendment.

Massachusetts Constitutions of 1780, Declaration of Rights, Art VII. ‘Alter and abolish’ clauses became gradually accepted in the post-revolutionary period and ‘recurrence’ was quite common. ‘Bypassing procedures were founded on the people’s sovereignty’. Constitutional conventions were even called in disregard of existing rules and such practice was legitimate and ‘circumvention’ was quite common at the state level. Fritz (n 31), 82ff. See also Art 28 of the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen (1793): a people has always the right to review, to reform, and to alter its constitution. One generation cannot subject to its law the future generations.

Compare with the data of the Constitutional Design Group, which puts this figure at 94 percent. See Jefferson even considered that ‘the earth belongs to the living’ and thus rejected, in principle, the very idea of entrenchment clauses, i.e., the idea of making it hard for future generations to amend the constitution. Condorcet had imagined a system in which each generation would ratify the constitution.

Notwithstanding the fact that the mandatory referendum relies on the double majority system in a national popular referendum (majority of the people and majority of the cantons) the Swiss Constitution (federal like that of the United States) has very often been amended. Referenda seem not to provide much protection for the constitution.

Cf Otto Pfersmann, ‘De l’impossibilité du changement de sens de la constitution’ in L’esprit des institutions, l’équilibre des pouvoirs, Mélanges en l’honneur de Pierre Pactet (2003), 353. See further Chapter 17 on sovereignty.

The Constitution of Afghanistan 2004, Art 149 provides:

1. The provisions of adherence to the fundamentals of the sacred religion of Islam and the regime of the Islamic Republic cannot be amended.
2. The amendment of the fundamental rights of the people are permitted only in order to make them more effective.
3. Considering new experiences and requirements of the time, other contents of this Constitution can be amended by the proposal of the President or by the majority of the National Assembly in accordance with the provisions of Art. 67 and 146 of this constitution.

Secularism seems to be an immutable principle in the Turkish Constitution.

As the provision only refers to other very broad articles, its meaning is not obvious. In Klass the German Federal Constitutional Court had to review an amendment to the inviolability of telecommunications provision of the Basic Law, enabling restrictions ordered by administrative bodies, instead of judicial authorization. The Court found (5:3) that this is not a breach of Art 79. The Turkish Constitutional Court took the opposite approach, ruling that rule of law is part of the republican form of state. The republican form of state cannot be amended, and that applies to its characteristics listed in the Constitution: Kemal Gözler, Judicial Review of Constitutional Amendments: A Comparative Study (2008), 46.

The Romanian Constitutional Court regularly exercises a priori review of amendment initiatives. See further ibid 5–7.

Fazlul Quder Chowdhury v Abdul Hague [1963] PLD (SC) 486; Anwar Hussain v Bangladesh (the 8th Amendment case). The French Constitutional Council, the Supreme Court of Ireland, and earlier the Hungarian Constitutional Court rejected the legitimacy of such review.

His Holiness Kesavananda Bharati Sripadaglavaru v State of Kerala, Supreme Court (India) (1973) Supp SCR.

Claude Klein

Claude Klein is Professor Emeritus of Law, Hebrew University

András Sajó

András Sajó is Judge, European Court of Human Rights, Strasbourg and University Professor (on leave), Central European University, Budapest
States of Emergency

David Dyzenhaus
The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Constitutional Law
Edited by Michel Rosenfeld and András Sajó

Print Publication Date: May 2012
Online Publication Date: Nov 2012

Abstract and Keywords

States of emergency may play a unique role in constitutional practice and theory. A comparison of constitutional orders reveals that they have to choose between seeking to entrench in a written constitution, if they have one, rules about how the state may respond to an emergency, and leaving such responses to be decided as and when an emergency occurs. This article sets out some examples of constitutional design and looks at some examples of constitutional practice show the basis for the Schmittian view of states of emergency and their implications for constitutionalism. The ramifications of this issue go far beyond states of emergency, a phenomenon of which lawyers and political scientists in the United States are well aware as they seek to deal with the way in which the office of the president and the executive in general seem increasingly free of constitutional and legal constraints. But the examples hardly tell unambiguously in favour of Schmitt. Indeed, they might serve to show that the constitutional choice is not between various institutions — the executive, the legislature and the judiciary — but between a vacuous or merely procedural account of legality and one that links procedure to substance. Moreover, the latter requires that all three powers work together in ensuring that responses to emergencies accord with constitutional principles.

Keywords: constitutional practice, constitutional theory, constitutional design, Schmitt, constitutionalism

I. Introduction 442
II. Constitutional Design/Constitutional Practice 446
III. The Derogation Model 451
IV. Conclusion 460

I. Introduction

States of emergency may play a unique role in constitutional practice and theory. As we will see, a comparison of constitutional orders reveals that they have to choose between seeking to entrench in a written constitution, if they have one, rules about how the state may respond to an emergency and leaving such responses to be decided as and when an emergency occurs. Consider, for example, that the US Constitution contains only one clear constitutional prescription for emergencies: Article 1.9, ‘The privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it.’ In contrast, as we will see below, the German Constitution contains a detailed set of prescriptions for the federal authority’s response to an emergency.

If the first choice is made, there has to be another choice between two models of emergency power: the ‘executive model’, which delegates to the executive the authority to decide on whether there is an emergency and how best to respond to the emergency; and the ‘legislative model’, which requires the legislature to design a legal regime that deals with both of these issues. Whichever is chosen, there has to be yet another choice about the extent to which judicial supervision is part of the emergency regime. Indeed, if judicial supervision is given a very large role, one might see emerging a third basic constitutional model for emergencies—the ‘judicial model’. We will also see that the latter two choices have to be made even when a legal order does not have a constitutionally entrenched emergency regime, whether because there (p. 443) is a minimal or no attempt within the written constitution to regulate emergencies or because the legal order has opted not to have a written constitution.
States of Emergency

Of course, it does not follow from the fact that a legal order has no written constitution that it is not a constitutional order. Within the common law tradition arguments are made that the unwritten constitution is a source of principles for regulating emergencies. These principles are given expression by judges in the course of deciding particular cases, so that their main manifestation is in judicial decisions. Similar arguments can be made that the principles of a written constitution, often again as interpreted by judges, govern emergencies even if the constitution does not explicitly say this. It is even arguable that the very commitment to constitutionalism shapes the choice of model, so that the constitutional regulation of emergencies will take that shape whatever an actual written constitution says.

The premise of this argument is that all legal orders have one constitutional feature in common, no matter how much they differ in other respects. They are committed to a principle of legality, which in written constitutions will be given different kinds of concrete expression. But the content of that principle is not exhausted by such concrete expression since the principle has to be presupposed in order for these orders to be such—to be legal orders. It is this last argument that gets us close to the point of seeing why states of emergency may play a unique role in constitutional practice and theory.

However, a full appreciation of this possible role for states of emergency to illuminate constitutionalism requires one more step. We need to take into account the counter-argument that actual emergency practice in any constitutional order will reveal the limits of constitutionalism, even and more dramatically that such practice shows the emptiness of the liberal constitutional project, by which I mean the constitutional commitment to put in place the rule of law rather than the arbitrary rule of men. In short, states of emergency might be thought to show the impossibility of constitutionalism. And thus an inquiry into what states of emergency reveal about constitutionalism cannot remain at the level of comparative design and practice; it has to engage with profound questions of legal and political theory.

Here the classic text remains John Locke’s Second Treatise of Government. Locke extolled the virtues of the rule of law—of the advantages to liberty of life under ‘settled, standing’ legislated rules common to all in contrast to ‘the inconstant, uncertain, unknown, arbitrary will of another man’. But he also insisted that in emergencies the government had to have a prerogative or legally unconstrained power to ‘act according to discretion, for the publick good, without the prescription of the Law, and sometimes even against it’.

Locke is thus responsible within the liberal tradition for the view that an emergency is ungovernable by the legal regime in place for regulating normal life since an effective response to an emergency may require that some state institutions respond quickly and effectively to threats either without legal authority or even against the law. Lockeans regard it as clear that neither the legislature nor the judiciary is capable of the swift, energetic action required to deal with an emergency, which leaves the executive by default as the authoritative body. However, they also suppose that that such a response can be on liberal terms since the executive should be guided by the supreme law of nature—the safety of the people.

(p. 444) In the twentieth century, Locke’s idea was radicalized by Carl Schmitt, in the opening line of Political Theology: ‘Sovereign is he who decides on the state of exception’. Schmitt also supposes that in abnormal times the sovereign is legally uncontrolled. But Schmitt’s thought goes further. Not only is the sovereign legally uncontrolled in the state of emergency, he who is the sovereign is revealed in the answer to the question of who gets to decide that there is an emergency such that a declaration of a state of emergency is appropriate.

Schmitt’s position presupposes that sovereignty is a pre-legal idea; the sovereign’s authority is not ultimately constituted by law. It resides in a political, not a legal constitution. Closely bound up with Schmitt’s claim about states of emergency is another claim about ‘the political’. According to Schmitt, the political is prior to law and its central distinction is between friend and enemy, so that the primary task of the sovereign is to make that distinction. It is in the moment of the emergency that the existential nature of the political is revealed. Since to make that distinction is to make a kind of existential decision, he who makes it has to be capable of acting in a decisive... way, which for Schmitt, as for Locke, ruled out both the judiciary and parliament, leaving the executive as the only serious candidate. But it follows for Schmitt that even when liberals recognize the problem that a state of emergency is a state of exception to regular norms and principles, they do not have the theoretical or practical resources to cope with that problem. The state of emergency is ‘something incommensurable to John Locke’s doctrine of the constitutional state’.11

Because of this incommensurability, Schmitt thought that liberal theorists and liberal states will and should reject the idea that a legally uncontrolled executive has authority not only to respond to an emergency, but also to decide that there is an emergency. Such a refusal, in his view, characterized the neo-Kantian legal theory elaborated by Hans Kelsen in the twentieth century. But the consequence of that refusal is that protections for individual liberty associated with the Rechtsstaat and the rule of law become ever more attenuated until the point where the rule of law is said to exist as long as the executive can claim that it has a valid or purely formal authorization for its actions.

Put differently, the liberal dream of the constitutional state in which public coercive judgments are made by a centralized legislature and put into laws of general application deteriorates inevitably into the nightmare of the administrative state, in which such judgments are made by the decision of particular officials at the point of application of the laws. But what is applied is neither the law nor something authentically public. Rather, we get an exercise of arbitrary power by a particular official legitimized by a legal theory evacuated of all liberal substance and thus reduced to an empty proceduralism: the rule of law is reduced to a regime of delegations of authority in which the constraints are purely formal.

It does not then matter much, even at all, to Schmitt whether liberals adopt the Kantian, principled stance that the rule of law can and should control politics even in times of great political stress or the more pragmatic, Lockean liberal stance that the liberal state has to respond in such times outside of the law. For the Kantians content themselves with law’s form, permitting liberalism’s enemies to capture politics from within, whereas the Lockans give to liberalism’s enemies the license to capture politics by using extra-legal methods.12

(p. 445) Schmitt is and has to be taken seriously because the claim that the executive is the real agent in responding to emergencies seems to have considerable support in legal and political experience. Usually, this claim is put on a practical basis—only the executive branch has the information and the capacity to act quickly and decisively in response to an emergency. But that practical basis is always combined by implication if not explicitly with a normative one. Here ‘ought’ seems to follow from ‘is’. Since only the executive is capable of the kind of decision required to respond effectively to an emergency, the constitutional authority that inheres in every legal order to declare and react to the state of emergency belongs to the executive. At most, the legal order can inscribe in its constitution its recognition that the executive has the constitutional authority to decide both when there is an emergency and how to respond to it.

Consider, for example, Article 16 of the 1958 French Constitution, which has been described as one of the ‘broadest grants of emergency powers to the executive in a modern constitution’.13 Article 16 gives the President unilateral authority to declare an emergency when the institutions of the Republic, the independence of the Nation, the integrity of its territory or the fulfillment of its international commitments are under serious and immediate threat, and when the proper functioning of the constitutional public powers is interrupted.

The President decides both that there is an emergency and how to respond to it.

Article 16 does set out some conditions. It stipulates that the measures ‘must stem from the desire to provide the constitutional public authorities, in the shortest possible time, with the means to carry out their duties’ and it requires both that ‘Parliament shall convene as of right’ and that the National Assembly shall not be dissolved during the exercise of the emergency powers. In addition, the President has to consult the Constitutional Council with regard to the measures. Finally, a 2008 amendment requires the Constitutional Council to give its opinion after 60 days as to whether the emergency conditions persist. The President is not, however, bound to adopt the opinion of any other institution, though Article 68 permits Parliament to impeach the President for a ‘breach of his duties patently incompatible with his continuing in office’. Thus the possibility exists of a formal legal sanction, likely triggered by the fact that other public institutions continue their operation and are given the opportunity to express... public disagreement with the President. But there are no internal, enforceable checks on the President's authority.\(^{14}\)

Consider also that Bruce Ackerman, a leading US constitutional theorist, argued in the wake of 9/11 that legal controls are impractical in a time of emergency, in part because judges always defer to the executive during such a time. As a result, he sketched an elaborate scheme of political safeguards to control the executive rather than legal ones. Yet Ackerman too succumbed to the pull of the rule of law by making it an essential component of his model for dealing with emergencies that these safeguards be either put into a written constitution or a statute, so that their observance would be reviewable by judges.\(^{15}\)

\(^{(p. 446)}\) In the next section, I will set out some further examples of constitutional design and also look at some examples of constitutional practice that will show the basis for the Schmittean view of states of emergency and their implications for constitutionalism. Indeed, it is important to note that the ramifications of this issue go far beyond states of emergency, a phenomenon of which lawyers and political scientists in the United States are well aware as they seek to deal with the way in which the office of the president and the executive in general seem increasingly free of constitutional and legal constraints.\(^{16}\)

But, as we will see in Section III, the examples hardly tell unambiguously in favor of Schmitt. Indeed, they might serve to show that the constitutional choice is not between various institutions—the executive, the legislature and the judiciary—but between a vacuous or merely procedural account of legality and one that links procedure to substance. Moreover, the latter requires that all three powers work together in ensuring that responses to emergencies accord with constitutional principles.

II. Constitutional Design/Constitutional Practice

The constitutional design of models of emergency power is haunted by two historical experiences—in countries with written constitutions that of Article 48 of the Weimar Constitution and in common law countries that of martial law.

The doctrine of martial law proposes that the executive has an inherent constitutional authority to proclaim martial law when it deems there to be a public emergency, a proclamation that entitles the executive to act as it sees fit to respond to the emergency. The executive may, for example, deploy the military to deal with civil unrest and may authorize the military to try civilians in accordance with whatever procedures and penalties seem appropriate. In the nineteenth century, the threat of the imposition of martial law was an essential resource for the officials who maintained the British Empire, as they sought to defend imperial interests in the midst of an often very hostile local population. In invoking the threat, and on occasion martial law itself, the officials drew on examples from England's own earlier history when martial law facilitated the executive's suppression of internal challenge, and on very recent examples from Ireland, which though not technically a colony was treated in many ways as such.

\(^{(p. 447)}\) However, the claim that the executive has this power is puzzling since it suggests that there can be a valid use of law by the executive to do away with law's control over the executive.\(^{17}\) Of course, those who regard martial law or something like it as inevitable in times of severe political stress want to justify it as only a temporary killing off of law—a suspension. They also say that the acts done under martial law are both lawful and in the long-term interests of legal order. On their view, martial law is not a complete absence of law, nor is it a special kind of law—a scheme of legal regulation. Rather, it is an absence of law prescribed by law under the concept of necessity: a legal black hole, but one created, perhaps even in some sense bounded by, law.

This puzzle is anathema to constitutionalism, which is why in the most famous work on the English constitution, A.V. Dicey claimed that common law constitutionalism does not know martial law, by which he meant an executive prerogative to act as it sees fit in times of emergency. ‘Martial law’, he said, ‘in the proper sense of that term, in which it means the suspension of ordinary law and the temporary government of a country or parts of it by military tribunals, is unknown to the law of England.’\(^{18}\) ‘This’, for Dicey, was ‘unmistakable proof of the permanent supremacy of the law under our constitution’.\(^{19}\)

However, in his magisterial work Human Rights and the End of Empire: Britain and the Genesis of the European Convention, A.W.B. Simpson says of Dicey's claim about martial law that it is ‘grossly and perversely misleading’ since under martial law ‘precisely what happens is the suspension of ordinary law, followed by the government of the relevant area by the military’. Moreover, Simpson argues that the fact that martial law is no longer invoked has to be understood not as a victory for the rule of law and for constitutionalism. For, the reason that it is no longer invoked is that in the twentieth century the parliaments of common law jurisdictions have simply provided the military and the security services with advance statutory authority to do whatever they would have claimed it necessary to do in the past under the cover of martial law.

Simpson’s claim is grist to Schmitt’s mill. The puzzle that martial law presents is one only from the perspective of those like Dicey who think that there can be a meaningful legal regulation of emergencies, one in accordance with constitutional principles, whereas from Schmitt’s perspective there is no puzzle, only an illustration of the fact that emergency measures are not amenable to such regulation.

(p. 448) Of course, it might seem that Schmitt’s perspective has rather too easy a time in a constitutional context in which there is a supreme legislature, which has the authority to delegate vast powers to the executive. But one has to recall that his theory of emergency powers was developed in the context of the Weimar Constitution, a written constitution that was drafted in a time of civil unrest and that explicitly sought to define the authority of the executive.

The two crucial paragraphs of Article 48, the emergency powers provision, read as follows:

1. If a state [Land] does not fulfil the duties imposed on it by the Constitution of the Reich or by a law of the Reich, the President can ensure that these duties are performed with the help of armed force.

2. If the public safety and order of the German Reich is seriously disturbed or endangered, the President may take the measures necessary for the restoration of public safety and order, and may intervene if necessary with the help of armed force. To this end he may temporarily revoke in whole or in part the fundamental rights contained in Articles 114 [inviolability of personal liberty], 115 [inviolability of the home], 117 [privacy of mail, telegraph, and telephone], 118 [freedom of opinion and press], 123 [freedom of assembly], 124 [freedom of association], and 153 [inviolability of private property].

The exercise of these powers required the countersignature of the Cabinet; and the Cabinet, while appointed by the President, had to enjoy the confidence of the Parliament. But the President also had the power to dissolve the Parliament, a power limited only by the vague requirement that he could do this ‘only once on the same ground’.

The President’s power to dissolve the Parliament combined with his power to appoint the Cabinet meant that he could ensure a Cabinet which would give him the requisite countersignature and which did not have the confidence of the Parliament simply because there was for the time being no Parliament in existence.

On July 20, 1932, Field Marshall von Hindenburg, the President, issued a decree ‘concerning the restoration of public safety and order in the area of the Land [state] of Prussia’. This decree is a crucial moment in the breakdown of Germany’s first experiment with democracy.

The decree was issued under the authority granted the President by Article 48. It declared the Chancellor of the Reich, Franz von Papen, to be the Commissioner for Prussia—the largest and most powerful of the German states—and gave him authority to take over its political machinery. It was issued at the behest of Papen’s Cabinet and it formed an integral part of the strategy of the then Minister of Defence, General von Schleicher. The decree responded to the alleged inability and unwillingness of Prussia’s government—a coalition in which the main socialist party, the Social Democratic Party, dominated—to deal with the state of political unrest and violence within Prussia. This coalition was the most important base of institutional resistance to the Nazi march to power and it was removed at the stroke of a pen.

The Prussian government considered armed resistance. But both because it seemed that such action would end in defeat and because, as social democrats, they were committed to legality, they chose to challenge the constitutional validity of the decree before the Staatsgerichtshof—the court set up by the Weimar Constitution to resolve constitutional disputes between the Federal Government and the states.

The legal and political importance of this case was clear to Germans. Some of the most important public law theorists of the day, including Schmitt who with four other lawyers represented the federal government, argued before the court, turning the forensic debate into a battle of constitutional theories. In his argument, Schmitt did not contest the claim put by Prussia’s lawyers that the court was the guardian of the Constitution. But he said that this guardianship role of the court was confined by its character as a court of law and thus it was guardian only in so far as the issue was one appropriate for a legal and judicial body. Since the issues were deeply political, and the President was the guardian of the Constitution in matters political, the question of constitutionality was for him to decide. That he had this role was for Schmitt made clear by the powers the President had in terms of Article 48 to decide the crucial questions of politics. The court effectively upheld the decree in late October, by which time the Social Democratic Party was no longer an effective force. And so it might seem that, at least in the context of Weimar, Schmitt’s general argument about emergency powers was vindicated.
States of Emergency

The reaction to this experience in Germany after the war was a conscious attempt to refute, as it were, Schmitt by creating within the framework of Germany’s Basic Law a ‘constitution within a constitution’—a ‘precise and comprehensive regulatory framework for emergency measures’ that reflects, in Rainer Grote’s words, ‘a firm commitment to the preservation of the twin principles of democratic legitimacy and rule of law even in times of fundamental crisis.’ It thus constitutes ‘an emphatic rejection of the model followed by the (in)famous Article 48(2) of the Constitution of Weimar, with its emphasis on broad emergency powers for the executive, including the power to suspend most political rights of citizens.’

Since the German states retain police powers, the Basic Law distinguishes between internal and external emergencies, and thus leaves it up to the individual states to decide how to respond to internal emergencies. However, in the case of an internal emergency the federal authority may intervene when an emergency affects the territory of more than one state or when a state government either will not or cannot respond to the internal emergency. While the decision that there is an emergency rests with the government of either the affected state or the federal government, the Federal Parliament retains its powers, including the power to order an end to government action; the government is not authorized to derogate from any of the fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution (including the right to strike); and judicial review is preserved of the measures taken for responding to the emergency.

In regard to external emergencies, the Basic Law distinguishes between the state of tension, the clear danger of an armed attack, and the state of defense, a directly imminent or actual attack. It is up to the Federal Parliament, with the consent of the Federal Council (the legislative body that represent the states at the federal level) to decide when a state of tension exists and it seems clear that it also will decide on the termination of the state. Moreover, the state of tension does not permit derogation from fundamental rights.

The Federal Parliament will ordinarily decide by two-thirds majority whether a state of defense exists. But if immediate action is required and the parliament either cannot convene in time or constitute a quorum, then a Joint Committee, composed of both the parliament and the Federal Council, decides again by two-thirds majority vote. In either case, the decision is subject to review by the Federal Constitutional Court, whose powers remain unrestricted. Finally, if an armed attack is in progress, and neither of the first two modes of declaring a state of defense is possible, the Federal President may make the declaration.

During a state of defense, the government has no special powers other than those delegated by the Federal Parliament. In this regard the Federal Parliament can decide to centralize powers radically in the hands of the federal government. But the most egregious interference with fundamental rights permitted is that the period of deprivation of liberty without judicial decision may be extended from one day to four days. Moreover, the right of access to the courts remains unaffected as does the right to a fair trial, all government action and parliamentary measures remain vulnerable to judicial review, and the jurisdiction of the Federal Constitutional Court remains unaffected. The Federal Parliament acting with consent of the Federal Council terminates the state of defense by simple majority.

However Grote also points to the possibility of what he terms ‘supra-constitutional emergency law’, based on the federal and state reaction to the Red Army activity of the 1970s. He draws attention to the executive ban on detainees’ contacts with the outside world including their lawyers, which was justified by supporters of the ban on the basis of the principle of necessity in the German Penal Code. The invocation of the principle of necessity in the context of public law leads, he says, to supra-constitutional emergency law, thus rendering the constitutional control meaningless because at its core is ‘virtually unlimited flexibility and adaptability to changing circumstances’. And in a paper about Germany’s legal response after 9/11, Oliver Lepsius has expressed
States of Emergency

cconcern that the federal counter-terrorism law that came into effect on January 1, 2002 has important consequences for the protection of freedom, since it does encroach upon basic rights, and in general is evidence of a trend to make security a prior value to liberty, instead of the approach he deems proper of understanding security as part of a scheme of constitutionally protected liberties.32

While one should not exaggerate the extent to which Germany has moved towards a legal regime that subverts the official constitutional regime,33 it is still significant that, as Grote points out, the regime does not seem to have excluded the possibility of such a move. Thus, there is a basis for the cynical or perhaps realist observation that Germany has not to this point been properly tested and that the experience of history shows that when the test comes, necessity will be invoked and the constitutional regime will be bypassed, perhaps as Lepsius might be taken to suggest, by enacting legislation that begins to put in place the executive model and that operates, as it were, under the constitutional radar of the entrenched bill of rights. And, as indicated, the same observation may seem to have an even stronger basis in the transition in common law jurisdictions from a martial law to a legislative model for dealing with emergencies.

(p. 451) However, a closer inspection of the experience of the United Kingdom might show that constitutional principles can have more of a grip on the control of states of emergency than is often thought to be the case, a grip that is exercised through the different institutions or powers cooperating within the structure of what can think of as a ‘derogation model’ for dealing with emergencies. Moreover, since this experience takes place in the absence of any written constitution, let alone an entrenched bill of rights, it has a particular salience in the debate about the viability of different constitutional models for the following reason. As we have seen, the transition from proclamations of martial law to legislative regulation of emergencies has been said to make little or no difference, since in a system of parliamentary supremacy, parliament can give and has given the executive all the powers it would have previously claimed under the title of martial law. If in that situation, constitutional principles of legality still operate, there are clear implications for systems like the French one in which the constitution seems to recognize something close to a Schmittean sovereign,34 or the German one, where an elaborate system of explicit and entrenched controls seems vulnerable to being undermined by executive action or legislation or some combination, or the constitutional order of the United States, which has, as we have seen, only one provision that speaks directly to states of emergency. In particular, we will see that thrown into question is one of the most significant bits of evidence for the Schmittean view, namely, that judges tend to defer to the executive during the first stages of emergency rule and become willing to step in to impose the rule of law only during a second phase—a time when there is general agreement that the emergency is over.35

III. The Derogation Model

As I have indicated, the claim associated with the executive model that the executive is entitled to rely on extra-legal measures in a time of emergency has significant scholarly support, but will not generally be articulated by governments. Rather, the executive will nearly always say either that its authority to act as it sees fit is an inherent constitutional one or that the legislature has delegated such an authority to it. Consider that in the United States the post 9/11 Congressional Resolution—'The Authorization for Use of Military Force'36—empowering the President to 'use all necessary and appropriate force against those ... he determines planned, authorized, committed, or aided the terrorist attacks ... on September 11, 2001'37 was argued by the Bush administration's lawyers to give the President legislative authority to act as he saw fit in the war on terror.

In claiming the mantle of legality, the executive answers to what I have called in other work the ‘compulsion of legality’—the perceived necessity to have a legal authorization for state action because legally unauthorized action is widely considered illegitimate.38 Put differently, (p. 452) compliance with legality is seen as a necessary if not sufficient condition for legitimate state action. But, as I have also recognized in that work, the compulsion of legality can set in motion two very different cycles of legality. In one virtuous cycle, the institutions of legal order cooperate in devising controls on public actors that ensure that their decisions comply with the principle of legality, understood as a substantive conception of the rule of law. In the other cycle, the content of legality is understood in an ever more formal or vacuous manner, resulting in the mere appearance or even the pretence of legality. Here, the compulsion of legality results in the subversion of constitutionalism.

However, as we will now see, as long as judges adopt the right interpretive approach and as long as the legal order undertakes appropriate experiments in institutional design, the virtuous cycle is enabled. And, while this claim might seem to be shakily dependent on two contingencies, it is important to recall that the Schmittian challenge to constitutionalism, one which has more than a toehold in both liberal theory and the practice of liberal democratic states, asserts the inevitability of the vacuous cycle, whatever the efforts of the judiciary and of other institutions. The story starts in what may seem like unpromising terrain—two dissenting judgments in the House of Lords during the world wars.

In the United Kingdom during the First and Second World Wars, the indefinite detention of individuals who were perceived to be risks to national security had to follow a procedure set out in regulations. Each decision was in principle subject to an appeal to an executive committee, whose chairman had to inform detainees of the grounds of their detentions, so that they could make a case to the committee for their release. The Home Secretary could decline to follow the advice of the committee, but had to report monthly to Parliament about the orders he had made and about whether he had declined to follow advice. The committee, however, lacked rule-of-law teeth. Not only did it fail to require the real reasons for detentions from the intelligence branch, but in any case if it thought that someone had been wrongly detained, it could only advise the Home Secretary of its view.

When judges are required to pronounce on the legality of such a regime, they have three options. First, they can try to give the regime rule-of-law teeth. Secondly, they can say that the regime is legal without making the attempt, in which case they give the regime the imprimatur of the rule of law by equating that rule with rule by law. Finally, they might find that the regime is illegal because it is incompatible with constitutional principles of legality. The majority of the House of Lords in the First World War decision Halliday and in the Second World War decision Liversidge undertook a constructive repeal of habeas corpus, a repeal by the executive which is then ratified by judges. He would, he said, have come to his conclusion even thought the language of the statute ‘had been much more plain and definite than it is’. Since the Defence of the Realm Consolidation Act 1914 did not explicitly authorize a detention regulation, the regulation that brought the detention regime into play was invalid.

In contrast, Lord Shaw in his dissent in Halliday chose the option of invalidation. He started with the assumption that Parliament must be taken to intend that its delegates act in accordance with the rule of law, which meant that it had explicitly to authorize any departures from the rule of law. As Lord Shaw put it, the judicial stance should be that ‘if Parliament had intended to make this colossal delegation of power it would have done so plainly and courageously and not under cover of words about regulations for safety and defence.’ For judges to allow the right to be abridged is to revolutionize the constitution, perhaps, more accurately to (p. 453) undertake a counter-revolution. It amounts to what he called a ‘constructive repeal of habeas corpus’, a repeal by the executive which is then ratified by judges. He would, he said, have come to his conclusion even thought the language of the statute ‘had been much more plain and definite than it is’. Since the Defence of the Realm Consolidation Act 1914 did not explicitly authorize a detention regulation, the regulation that brought the detention regime into play was invalid.

When civil servants put together the detention regime for the Second World War, they took note of Shaw's dissent and so ensured that the authorizing statute explicitly permitted the establishment of a detention regime by regulation. The government also responded to concerns raised in Parliament about the wording of the initial version of the detention regulation. It substituted ‘reasonable cause to believe’ when it came to the grounds for detention for the original proposal of ‘if satisfied that’. It was on the basis of that substitution that Lord Atkin held in his famous dissent in Liversidge that a court was entitled to more than the government's say-so that an individual is a security risk, thus seeking, in line with the third option, to make the scheme into something better. The majority disagreed on the basis that it was inappropriate in wartime for judges to go beyond the mechanism explicitly put in place, the toothless review committee. Lord Atkin thus accused his fellow judges of being more executive-minded than the executive and of acceding to arguments that had not been put to a court since the days of the Star Chamber.

Despite the fact that Lords Shaw and Atkin were in dissent, Halliday and Liversidge are plausibly understood as episodes in the virtuous cycle of legality. First, Lord Shaw's insistence in Halliday on what we would call today a 'clear statement rule’, the rule that the legislature must expressly delegate authority to infringe fundamental rights, did have the result that the authorization to detain was put into the Defence of the Realm Act in the Second World War and was thus subject to parliamentary debate. That subjection meant that the question of the content of the regulation as well as the question whether there should be such a regulation came up for debate in Parliament, instead of being regarded as matters of executive discretion, given the delegation of vast powers to the executive to act as it sees fit in the stature. And, as we have seen, debate on the former question led to the substitution in wording.

Secondly, while Lord Atkin put rather too much emphasis on the substitution, he was entitled to infer from it and indeed from the very existence of the toothless executive committee that the legislature and the executive did think that some review of detention decisions was not only possible but also desirable. Indeed, it is worth noting that in the leading speech for the majority in Liversidge, Viscount Maugham said that if an appeal against the Home Secretary's decision ‘had been thought proper, it would have been to a special tribunal with power to inquire privately into all the reasons for the Secretary's action, but without any obligation to communicate them to the person detained.’ He too therefore thought that review is possible, though not in the absence of institutional innovation.

And, to cut a long story short, precisely such an innovation was attempted when the UK Parliament responded to the adverse decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Chahal by creating in the late 1990s the Special Immigration Appeals Commission (SIAC). Because the tribunal is staffed by people who have a combination of experience in security matters and adjudication, it has the expertise and the authority to review executive decisions made on national security grounds. It has access to all the information on which the executive bases its claims and may hold closed hearings when confidential information is in issue, in which it has the services of a special advocate to test the executive's case, although the special advocate is severely hampered by the fact that he or she may not communicate with the person subject to the decision on the basis of material presented in the closed hearings. Finally, it may issue its decisions in two parts—one closed and one public.

The first decision of the House of Lords after 9/11 did not, however, bode well for any effective judicial review of government emergency action. In Secretary of State for the Home Department v Rehman, SIAC had rejected the government's argument that the question of what could constitute a threat to national security was a matter for the exclusive decision of the Secretary of State. But the House of Lords held, on separation of powers grounds, that it was for the executive to decide what is in the interests of national security and on the issue of the particular allegations against an individual that these must stand unless they can be shown to be absurd.

However, things changed when the House of Lords pronounced on the Anti-terrorism, Crime and Security Act of 2001, the United Kingdom's reaction to 9/11. That statute put in place a system of indefinite detention for aliens who were suspected of being security risks but who could not, also the result of Chahal, be deported because of the risk of torture. It was accompanied by a derogation notice under Article 15 of the European Convention on Human Rights:

1. In time of war or other public emergency threatening the life of the nation any High Contracting Party may take measures derogating from its obligations under this Convention to the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation, provided that such measures are not inconsistent with its other obligations under international law.

2. No derogation from Article 2, except in respect of deaths resulting from lawful acts of war, or from Articles 3 and 7 shall be made under this provision.

3. Any High Contracting Party availing itself of this right of derogation shall keep the Secretary-General of the Council of Europe fully informed of the measures which it has taken and the reasons therefor. It shall also inform the Secretary-General of the Council of Europe when such measures have ceased to operate and the provisions of the Convention are again being fully executed.

The government had notified its intention to derogate from the Article 5 protection of liberty and section 30 of the Act gave SIAC exclusive jurisdiction in derogation matters. In Belmarsh, the majority of the House of Lords found the derogation invalid and the system incompatible with the Human Rights Act (1998) both because the system was disproportion (p. 455) ate since less intrusive measures had been devised for dealing with citizens who were deemed security risks and because in singling out aliens for detention it violated a right to equality—Article 14—which had not been derogated from. According to Lord Bingham's summary of the Attorney General's argument, the government submitted that as it was for Parliament and the executive to assess the threat facing the nation, so it was for those bodies and not the courts to judge the response necessary to protect the security of the public. These were matters of a political character calling for an exercise of political and not judicial judgment.

In other words, the government adopted the typical stance of governments that claim emergency powers by presenting an argument with two limbs. First, it asserted that the question whether there is an emergency is so quintessentially a matter for political judgment that courts must submit to the government's and Parliament's assessment without any scrutiny of the basis of that assessment. Secondly, it claimed that since the question of the most appropriate response to the emergency is no less quintessentially a matter for political judgment, courts must also submit to the government and Parliament on that question, again without conducting any scrutiny of the justifications relied on. In effect, the government was arguing that these are non-justiciable questions: questions not appropriate for or capable of judicial resolution.

Lord Bingham's response to the Attorney General was that while Parliament, the executive, and the judges have 'different functions', 'the function of independent judges charged to interpret and apply the law is universally recognised as a cardinal feature of the modern democratic state, a cornerstone of the rule of law itself.' It was thus wrong to 'stigmatisé judicial decision-making as in some way undemocratic'.

It is significant that Lord Bingham did not find his ultimate ground in the Human Rights Act, but in the constitutional nature of the democratic state with its inherent commitment to the rule of law. Put differently, his understanding of the judicial role does not look to any particular statute, not even the Human Rights Act itself, as the basis for the judicial authority to review legislation and executive decisions for their compliance with human rights and the rule of law, since the legal order is assumed to be a constitutional one, and thus premised on judges having such authority.

Lord Rodger elaborated this point:

If the provisions of section 30 of the 2001 Act are to have any real meaning, deference to the views of the Government and Parliament on the derogation cannot be taken too far. Due deference does not mean abasement before those views, even in matters relating to national security. ... Moreover, by enacting section 30, Parliament, including the democratically elected House of Commons, gave SIAC and the appellate courts a specific mandate to perform that function—a function which the executive and the legislature cannot perform for themselves—in relation to the derogation. The legitimacy of the courts' scrutiny role cannot be in doubt.

However, it is not that easy to claim this decision as a victory for the constitutional project and the virtuous cycle of legality for two reasons. First, the majority of the House of Lords were reluctant to scrutinise the government's claim that there was a public emergency of the sort described in Article 15 despite the fact that they admitted that there was reason to doubt the cogency of that claim. However, they found shelter behind the fact that SIAC in coming to the decision that it should defer to the government's claim that there was an emergency had seen confidential material from the government in closed session. The Attorney General, however, had declined to ask the House of Lords to read the same material. Still the majority seemed to think that because SIAC had seen confidential material in closed session and come to a conclusion on its basis that the claim that there was an emergency must have been strengthened by that material. And they thought this despite the fact that SIAC had expressly not relied on the confidential material in coming to its conclusion.

However, as we have seen Lord Rodger put it, 'Due deference does not mean abasement'. Even if a less strict standard of scrutiny is required for the question whether there is an emergency than for the question about how best to respond to it, the scrutiny has to be of the reasons if the reasons are to be given the stamp of approval of adequacy. To give, as one judge put it, the government the 'benefit of the doubt' at the same time as he expresses 'very grave doubt' about the government's case seems peculiar, especially when the government chose not to allow the court to see evidence that might remove some of that doubt.

My point here is not that the majority in Belmarsh were wrong to defer, but that they failed to require that a proper case for deference be made. And in failing so to require, they in effect conceded to Schmitt the first limb of his claim about states of emergency—that it is for the executive to decide when there is a state of emergency. Moreover, they concede that limb in a way that makes things worse from the perspective of the rule of law. They still, contra Schmitt, adopt the regulative assumption that all exercises of public power are legally constrained. But their understanding of constraint is so thin that it becomes merely formal, with the result that they claim that the declaration of the state of emergency has met the test of legality, even as they empty the test of serious content, which introduces a severe tension into their reasoning.
For even though Article 15 isolates the question of the existence of a public emergency from the question of the proportionality of the means to combat it, determination of the latter question necessarily involves consideration of the former. It is the fact of the emergency that justifies the derogating measures, and assessing their proportionality in meeting the emergency must necessarily involve consideration of the nature and level of the threat.

This of course does not answer the question of how judges are to go about this exercise. But, as I have argued elsewhere, it is well within the bounds of the legal imagination to design a system of parliamentary committees that could in closed session hear the executive's case for the existence of a public emergency that could then be made available to judges on review, in the same way as the material in the closed sessions before SIAC can be made available to judges.63

(p. 457) The second reason why it is not that easy to claim the Belmarsh decision as a victory In addition for constitutionalism is that the government's response was the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2005, which introduced a system of control orders that applies to both citizens and aliens. There are derogating control orders, which impose obligations incompatible with the controlee's right to liberty under Article 5 of the European Convention, and which are made by a court. And there are non-derogating control orders, considered not to limit Convention-protected rights, made by the Secretary of State and subject to judicial review.

There are grounds for supposing that this response to Belmarsh made things worse rather than better. For even the less severe, non-derogating control orders were experienced by those subject to them as just as or more debilitating than detention in Belmarsh prison, and because of the limit on communication between the special advocates and those subject to the control orders, it seemed that the services of the former in contesting the orders was close to useless, imposing what an English judge referred to as a 'thin veneer of legality’ over substantive arbitrariness.64

However, as Adam Tomkins, a leading public lawyer, has argued, the record on control orders has not proved to be altogether dismal.65 A series of judgments by national courts and the European Court of Human Rights on the implications of the protection in Article 6 of the right to a ‘fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal’ has ‘sharpened the courts’ teeth in making aspects of judicial procedure in national security cases more robust’.66 In addition, the same author argues that this augmentation of procedural protections is accompanied by a greater readiness on the part of reviewing bodies to entertain substantive challenges to security measures.67

One can, in my view, take the following lesson from this story. The insistence on a clear statement rule in Halliday makes sense only if it is followed by meaningful review of the executive decisions once properly authorized. Moreover, such insistence also makes possible such review, because it forces the executive to bring its activity within the scope of a deliberately and democratically designed statutory regime, one which has at least the potential of providing rule-of-law teeth. At least one can take that lesson, if the insistence does not inevitably result in a mere thin veneer of procedural legality, to which judges give their blessing.

This point can be reinforced by a quick analysis of Hamdi v Rumsfeld,68 the first major post 9/11 decision of the US Supreme Court. A plurality of the Supreme Court (Justice O’Connor, joined by the Chief Justice, Justice Kennedy, and Justice Breyer), held that the Congressional resolution in reaction to 9/11 mentioned above—the Authorization for Use of Military Force—authorized the detention of enemy combatants, since detention of individuals for the duration of the conflict was ‘so fundamental’ and accepted an incident to war as to be an exercise of the ‘necessary and appropriate force’ Congress has authorized the President to use. The plurality also held that the detainees were entitled to contest their detention orders before an independent tribunal.69 Finally, the plurality indicated that a military tribunal would be an appropriate forum for the contest to take place with its procedures determined in accordance with a cost—benefit calculation, that is, one which weighs security and rights considerations together; and that it would be appropriate for the detainee to have to rebut a presumption—established through the process of the initial military decision to detain—that he is an enemy combatant (the category developed by the Bush administration in order to wage its war on terror).70

In his dissent in that case, Justice Scalia, joined by Justice Stevens, held that Hamdi, a US citizen held on US soil, was entitled to a writ of habeas corpus because the Congressional resolution did not explicitly suspend the writ as required by Article 1.9—the Suspension Clause of the Constitution. He supported this holding by a lengthy discussion of the common and constitutional law history of the writ.71 In contrast, Justice Thomas in his dissent staked out a quasi-Schmittean position that the executive was justified in acting as it did as a matter of inherent authority and both constitutional and congressional authorization.\textsuperscript{72} Justice Souter in a minority opinion, joined by Justice Ginsburg, concurred in the judgment of the plurality in order to give it practical effect, but did not agree that the Congressional resolution authorized detention and also expressed doubts about the kind of truncated due process that the plurality seemed to endorse.\textsuperscript{73}

Lord Shaw's critique of the majority in Halliday applies, in my view, with equal force to the reasoning of the plurality in Hamdi, since the plurality also ratified a constructive repeal of habeas corpus. Moreover, the plurality can be said to have made things even worse by signaling to the executive and to Congress that, when it came the checking the legality of the detention of enemy combatants, the Court would be satisfied in the future with a rather minimal form of executive-devised due process, presided over by an executive-created, military tribunal.\textsuperscript{74}

And as Justice Scalia's dissent and the minority's opinion illustrate, there were alternative paths open to the Court. It could, with Justice Scalia, have required of Congress that it suspend habeas corpus, or, with the minority, that Congress put in place a legislative scheme for detention of enemy combatants that prescribed procedures and substantive criteria in a way that reflected Congress's understanding of its obligation of fidelity to the Constitution. The second option would reflect Congress's understanding of a set of procedures and criteria that provided an adequate regime of legality, one to which the Court should, if the scheme were challenged, defer. Congress would have been required to devise a comprehensive regime for arrest and detention and probably, given the inevitability of some criminal trials, for prosecution as well.

The second option seems preferable because it approximates more what I referred to earlier as the derogation model. Consider, for example, Trevor Morrison's argument that when Congress suspends the writ of habeas corpus unlawful detentions are not converted into lawful ones.\textsuperscript{75} His argument is specifically aimed at Justice Scalia's dissent, a model Morrison calls 'suspension-as-legalization'. On this model, suspension provides not only an 'affirmative grant of authority to detain, but also displaces any constitutional or other legal objection ... that (p. 459) might be raised against the detention.'\textsuperscript{76} Suspension thus creates a 'lawless void, a legal black hole, in which the state acts unconstrained by law.'\textsuperscript{77} This model, as Morrison has pointed out, has attracted the support of prominent academics, including David Shapiro, who argues that the 'practical reality' of emergencies requires that the executive be freed 'from the legal restraints on detention that would otherwise apply'.\textsuperscript{78} For Shapiro, suspension amounts to legalization because otherwise executive actors might be 'deterred from engaging in the very activity needed, and contemplated, to deal with the crisis by an ... understandable reluctance to violate their oaths to support the Constitution.'\textsuperscript{79} Morrison, in contrast, argues that executive actors must always seek to uphold the Constitution.

Morrison's claim raises the question of how to understand the fact that legality is still preserved in some meaningful way, despite the suspension, and he seeks to answer the question through investigating reforms internal to the executive. This is a valuable line of inquiry, but one should, I think, be careful to avoid giving the basis for an inference that judicial review cannot or should not play a role. Here I take my cue from the English Habeas Corpus Suspension Acts—the historical backdrop against which Article 1.9 was drafted.\textsuperscript{80}

Those Acts were what we can think of as primitive derogations from the constitutional morality of the legal order. They were derogations because they did not purport to change the constitutional order but only to provide a temporary immunity from its normal operation. (Indeed, as Dicey pointed out, all they sought to achieve was a temporary immunity from habeas corpus for people detained on a charge or on suspicion of high treason.)\textsuperscript{81} They were derogations from constitutional morality, not constitutional rules, because, following Ronald Dworkin's distinction between principles and rules, the choice of derogation is evidence of the fact that the legal norm derogated from is recognized as a fundamental principle that cannot be overridden except at the cost of constitutional revolution. And they were primitive in three overlapping respects—formally, institutionally, and doctrinally, as I will now explain.

First, derogation differs from suspension formally in the following respects. It entrenches both a monitoring mechanism that goes beyond the legislature to international bodies\textsuperscript{82} and rights from which there can be no derogation; it puts in place the test of strict necessity of the doctrine of proportionality that presupposes that the derogation itself as well as the derogating measures are subject to judicial review; rights must be explicitly derogated from, which means that all rights not explicitly derogated from are in force, as well as all non-derogable rights together with the government's other international obligations; finally, the principle of legality is left intact. As Tom Hickman has put it, the ‘derogation model creates a space between fundamental rights and the rule of law. Whilst governments are permitted to step (p. 460) outside the human rights regime their action remains within the law and subject to judicial supervision."

Secondly, the institutional imagination of the time of the Habeas Corpus Acts did not include the sophisticated apparatus of the administrative state of the late twentieth century that makes possible hybrid bodies such as SIAC that combine executive and adjudicative expertise. Thirdly, the sophisticated version of the doctrine of proportionality in constitutional law and human rights law (both international and domestic) had not yet been developed, a doctrine that has the potential to promote a highly nuanced, transparent and context-sensitive evolution of ways to cater to both security and human rights concerns.

It could thus be said that at least in the first and third respects the United States remains to some extent stuck in a time when an all-or-nothing approach to constitutional and human rights bolsters the sense among lawyers and other scholars that emergencies are not susceptible to constitutional control. On the argument of this section, it could also be said that the adoption of the derogation model in the United States would render Article 1.9 redundant.

IV. Conclusion

As we have seen, constitutions deal with the topic of emergency powers in a wide variety of ways, ranging from silence to detailed attempts to establish the grip of constitutional principles on their exercise. But whatever mode they adopt, the questions raised by the topic go to the fundamentals of constitutionalism, namely, whether it is even possible to establish a meaningful constitutional control.

However, I have suggested that comparative experience issues in two conclusions. The first is firmly established and it is that a constitutional order and the governments that act within them must make the attempt to establish such control. They will respond to the compulsion of legality. The second conclusion is that it is possible for a virtuous rather than a vacuous cycle of legality to unfold as long as one sees that the challenge is not to decide on which institution or power should be the primary actor, but that the legislature, the executive and the judiciary have to participate together in a common constitutional project. In other words, we do not have to choose between a legislative, an executive, or a judicial model for dealing with emergencies. Rather, what we need is a normative framework for understanding how, in the light of experience, the grip of constitutional principles can be maintained. Here I suggested that the derogation model is fruitful.

The second conclusion is more tentative than the first, since this model is still being tested. But it has already shown sufficient resilience and capacity for innovative development to (p. 461) undermine the pessimism associated with the Schmittean claim that all attempts at meaningful constitutional control of emergencies are doomed to failure.

Bibliography

Bruce Ackerman, Before the Next Attack: Preserving Civil Liberties in an Age of Terrorism (2006)

Bruce Ackerman, The Decline and Fall of the American Republic (2010)

Evan J. Criddle and Evan Fox-Decent, ‘Human Rights, Emergencies, and the Rule of Law’ under submission at the European Journal of International Law

David Dyzenhaus, ‘L'état d'exception’ in Michel Troper (ed), Traité International de Droit Constitutionnel (forthcoming)

Paul D. Halliday, Habeas Corpus from England to Empire (2010)

Carl Schmitt, The Concept of the Political (1976)

Carl Schmitt, Der Hüter der Verfassung (1985)

Carl Schmitt, Die Diktatur: Von den Anfängen des modernen Souveränitätsgedankens bis zum proletarischen Klassenkampf (5th edn, 1989)

Carl Schmitt, Political Theology: Four Chapters on the Concept of Sovereignty (2005)
Notes:

(2) On constitutionalism more generally, see Chapter 8.

(3) See Chapter 10 on rule of law.

(5) Ibid paras 22 and 137.

(6) Ibid para 160.

(7) Ibid chs XIII and XIV.

(11) Schmitt (n 8), 13.

(13) Jenny S. Martinez, ‘Inherent Executive Power: A Comparative Perspective’ (2005–06) 115 Yale Law Journal 2480, 2496. However, it has been invoked only once, by Charles de Gaulle, in 1961 during the Algeria crisis.

(14) Article 36 of the French Constitution sets out another model for dealing with emergencies, the ‘state of siege’. The Council of Ministers, led by the President, has the authority to declare a state of siege for up to 12 days; any further extension has to be approved by the Parliament. The state of siege basically involves the transfer of powers ordinarily exercised by civilian authorities to the military but it is also regulated by legislation, which diminishes the extent of executive authority under it. See William Feldman, ‘Theories of Emergency Powers: A Comparative Analysis of American Martial Law and the French State of Siege’ (2005) 38 Cornell International Law Journal 1021, 1028–9.

(16) For a recent treatment, a companion essay to the book cited in the last note, see Bruce Ackerman, The Decline and Fall of the American Republic (2010). A full appreciation of this point can be found in recent work by Adrian Vermeule, who follows Schmitt in arguing that the executive is as a matter of fact uncontrollable by legal norms both when it comes to emergency decisions and the ordinary day-to-day decisions taken by the officials who staff the administrative state: Adrian Vermeule, ‘Our Schmittian Administrative Law’ (2008–09) 122 Harvard Law Review 1095. As he sees it, on Schmitt’s view, liberals should not fear that the lack of legal constraint in emergency times will spill over into ordinary times; rather, there is a ‘type of reverse spillover, from ordinary to extraordinary times’ in any complex administrative state; ibid 1135. Moreover, taking his cue from Schmitt, Vermeule thinks it is normatively desirable that the US president be legally unconstrained when it comes to emergency decisions. See Eric A. Posner and Adrian Vermeule, Terror in the Balance: Security, Liberty, and the Courts (2007). But his reasons for thinking so is not that such lack of constraint enables the distinction between friend and enemy to be made in a way that will establish the substantive homogeneity of the people. Rather, he supposes that the kind of cost–benefit analysis associated with a laissez-faire picture of society argues for the efficiency of leaving such decisions to the President. And, it seems, the question of the extent to which the officials of the administrative state should have their legally uncontrolled powers is also to be settled on efficiency grounds. The difference between him and Schmitt is that Vermeule is confident that a highly individualistic society can sustain itself even in the face of existential threats, given that the kind of legally uncontrolled decision that has to be made to deal with such threats is a fact of life in ordinary times.

(19) Ibid.

(21) Simpson, ibid 75–90, who chooses 1936 because of the comprehensive nature of the Palestine Martial Law (Defence) Order in Council of 26 September 1936, the making of which was authorized by the Defence of the Realm Acts, introduced during the First World War. Simpson remarks (86) that ‘[w]ith such a code in force who need martial law?’ But his rhetorical question requires him to accept the correctness of the majority of the House of Lords’ decision in R v Halliday, ex p Zadig [1917] AC 260, discussed below. Others would date the statutory introduction of martial law to the Defence of the Realm Acts, beginning in 1914. See Charles Townshend, Making the Peace: Public Order and Public Security in Modern Britain (1993).

(22) For Schmitt’s view of martial law in this regard, see Carl Schmitt, Die Diktatur: Von den Anfängen des modernen Souveränitätsgedankens bis zum proletarischen Klassenkampf (5th edn, 1989), 174–6. Note that Schmitt had not at the time of publishing the first edition of this book (1922) given up entirely on the idea that there could be some legal regulation of an emergency. He still preserved in it a distinction between limited commissarial and unlimited sovereign dictatorship. But the logic of his own argument does not permit this distinction and he gave it up in late Weimar.

(24) Article 25 of the Weimar Constitution.

(25) For the full text, see the collection that contains the transcript of the case: Preussen contra Reich vor dem Staatsgerichtshof: Stenogrammbericht der Verhandlungen vor dem Staatsgerichtshof in Leipzig vom 10. bis. 14 und vom 17. Oktober 1932 (1976), 481.

(26) Ibid 466–9.

(28) Ibid 177.

(29) There are three types of internal emergency: those caused by a natural disaster or a serious accident; by a threat to public safety or order; or by the imminent danger to the existence or the free democratic order of the federation or a state.

(31) Ibid 176.

(34) Consider that when de Gaulle introduced Art 16 in 1961, France had not yet ratified the European Convention on Human Rights and constitutional review was more limited. Thus the invocation of Art 16 of the Constitution for the introduction of a measure such as an indefinite detention regulation would be subject to Art 15 of the European Convention on Human Rights. For reasons to do with the Constitutional Council's stance that international treaties are not automatically part of constitutional law, one could not seek review of the measure on the basis of the Convention. But if the Council were to accept jurisdiction, one could seek review on the basis of a constitutional doctrine such as proportionality. (I am grateful to Michel Troper for his answer to my question on this topic, of which the above is my summary.)

(35) Posner and Vermeule (n 16), 120–3.

(37) Ibid §2(a).

(40) Halliday (n 21).

(42) Halliday (n 21), 292–3.

(43) Ibid 294.

(44) Ibid 293.

(45) Liversidge (n 41), 244.

(47) Chahal v United Kingdom (1996) 23 EHRR 413.

(48) [2002] 1 All ER 123.

(49) See especially Lord Hoffmann's ‘Postscript’, 142.

(50) Right to life.

(51) Prohibition on torture.

(52) Prohibition on slavery/servitude.

(53) Convictions of only those criminal offences in existence at time of act.

(54) A v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2005] AC 68, commonly known as Belmarsh, as it concerned the challenge by men held in indefinite detention in Belmarsh prison to the statutory provision which authorized their detention.

(55) The Human Rights Act (1998) does not give judges the authority to invalidate a statute. All they may do is make a declaration of incompatibility.

(56) Belmarsh (n 54), 110.

(58) Ibid 158.

(60) Ibid 104–5.

(61) Ibid Lord Scott, 51.

(62) The majority also relied on decisions of the European Court of Human Rights that held that the Court should generally defer to a national government's determination that there is such an emergency; ibid 105. But such reliance fails to give proper effect to the gap some of the judges acknowledged between the situation in which the European Court defers to a decision by a government that has withheld challenges before that government's national courts and the situation in which the highest national court has to evaluate the government's challenge; ibid Lord Bingham, 112–13 and Lord Hope, 139. That is, a stricter standard is arguably appropriate in the latter situation and the application of such a standard would make more sense of the application of the more relaxed standard in the first situation. See Tom R. Hickman, ‘Between Human Rights and the Rule of Law: Indefinite Detention and the Derogation Model of Constitutionalism’ (2005) 68 Modern Law Review 655.

(64) MB v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2006] EWHC 1000 (Admin), [103].

(65) Adam Tomkins, ‘National Security and the Role of the Court: A Changed Landscape?’ (2010) 126 Law Quarterly Review 543. Note that these control orders are reviewed in the first instance not by SIAC but by an Administrative Court, which like SIAC, is entitled to see all the confidential material and has available to it a special advocate.

(66) Ibid 552.

(67) Ibid 552ff.

(69) Ibid 533.

(70) Ibid 538.

(72) Ibid 579.

(73) Ibid 539–40.

(74) I trace the problematic way in which the Supreme Court's jurisprudence unfolded in Dyzenhaus (n 38). For an excellent analysis of the same process, see Jenny S. Martinez, ‘Process and Substance in the “War on Terror”’ (2008) 108 Columbia Law Review 1013.

(76) Ibid 1539.

(77) Ibid quoting from David Dyzenhaus, ‘Schmitt v Dicey: Are States of Emergency Inside or Outside the Legal

(78) David L. Shapiro, ‘Habeas Corpus, Suspension, and Detention: Another View’ (2006) 82 Notre Dame Law Review 59, 86 and 89. As Morrison points out, Shapiro does not contemplate a total black hole, as at 90–5, he confines his argument to the issue of detention thus removing from its scope issues like treatment during detention; Morrison (n 75), 540. On my argument, Shapiro’s qualification merely evidences the grip of the compulsion of legality.

(79) Shapiro (n 78), 89.

(80) See eg Paul D. Halliday, Habeas Corpus from England to Empire (2010), 253.

(81) Dicey (n 18), 224–6.

(82) For the ambiguous role of such bodies in monitoring emergencies, see Gross and Ní Aoláin (n 12), 304–25.

(83) Hickman (n 62), 659. Tomkin’s essay (n 65) may even provide support for the claim that the preservation of legality provides resources for judges to help to develop regimes more friendly to human rights. One also has to take into account the potential of international courts, a notable example being the judgment of the European Court of Justice (Grand Chamber) of 3 September 2008, Joined Cases C-402/05 P and C-415/05 P Yassin Abdullah Kadi, Al Barakaat International Foundation v Council of the European Union, Commission of the European Communities, United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland (2008), available at (http://curia.europa.eu/jurisp/cgi-bin/form.pl?lang=EN&Submit=rechercher&numaff=C-402/05). For discussion, see Kim Lane Scheppele, ‘Global Security Law and the Challenge to Constitutionalism after 9/11’ (2011) Public Law 353. See further Evan J. Criddle and Evan Fox-Decent, ‘Human Rights, Emergencies, and the Rule of Law’ under submission at the European Journal of International Law.

(84) See further Chapters 33 and 34 on proportionality.

(85) Naturally, that sense would then feed a claim that emergencies perhaps illustrate a more general phenomenon—the trend noted towards an accretion of constitutionally uncontrolled power to the executive even in normal times.

David Dyzenhaus

David Dyzenhaus is Professor of Law and Philosophy, University of Toronto
This article offers a comparative survey of war-power arrangements in the United Kingdom, the United States, France, Germany, and Japan. The United Kingdom, United States, and France — long-standing liberal democracies and permanent members of the UN Security Council — have been quite active in deploying military forces abroad. In contrast, Germany, and Japan are latecomers both as liberal democracies and as participants in international military operations. The article focuses mainly on powers of initiating armed conflicts, including that of deploying armed forces into actual or potential conflicts, but deals neither with conducting war nor ending it, nor with related treaty-making power.

Keywords: war-power arrangements, United Kingdom, United States, France, Germany, Japan, international military operations, liberal democracy, armed conflicts, deployment

I. Introduction 463
II. United Kingdom 466
   1. The Crown as the Sole Decision-Maker 466
   2. Prospects of Modernization 467
III. The United States 468
    1. Ambiguous Allocation of War Powers 468
    2. War Powers Resolution 471
IV. France 472
    1. The President, the Commander-in-Chief 472
    2. Authorization by Parliament 473
    3. Prohibition of Aggressive Wars 475
V. Germany 475
    1. The Military under the Basic Law 475
    2. The Military Deployment Case 476
    3. The Parliamentary Participation Act 477
VI. Japan 477
    1. Article 9 and the Self-Defence Forces 477
    2. UN Peacekeeping Operations Act 478
VII. Conclusion 479
I. Introduction

An essential function of every state is to protect the lives and property of its citizens, but it is not a sole purpose for states to wage wars. When states go to war, their aim is often rather to protect their own constitutions or to change the form of government of their enemies. In Jean-Jacques Rousseau's understanding, 'The principle of life of the body politic and, so to speak, the heart of the state, is the social pact which, as soon as it is injured, causes the state instantly to die.' States exist to protect their citizens, but to sustain their constitutions, they must have the power to coerce their citizens to sacrifice their lives. As Rousseau observes, 'Man becomes a soldier only after having been a citizen'.

In its war against the Allied Powers from 1941 to 1945, Japan fought to preserve its imperial, militaristic form of government. However, when continuing the war threatened its society with total devastation, Japan surrendered, accepting the necessity of transforming itself into a liberal democracy. As Rousseau argues, the ultimate object of armed attack is the enemy state's social pact; for 'that is all the essence of the state consists in. If the social pact could be severed with a single strike, straightway there would be no more war; and with that single strike the state would be killed, without a single man dying.' To preserve the lives and property of the citizens, Rousseau suggests, the better course is sometimes to remove the social pact and kill the state. Some scholars argue that this is the course the East European countries took in discarding their communist forms of government to end the Cold War.

Liberal democratic states wage war to maintain their basic form of government against attack, whether from states with different constitutional principles or terrorist organizations intent on destroying their integrity. Notwithstanding the demand of the UN Charter that all member states refrain from the threat or use of force against other states in their international relations (Art 2(4)), such threats and uses of military forces occur frequently. The question of how liberal democracies can restrain and control the use of force democratically is therefore an acute one in this non-ideal world. If a state undermines its form of government during a war by, say, irreversibly damaging its democratic political process, or by committing gross violations of human rights in the course of the war, it deforms its constitution and in effect loses the war. Notably, these eventualities do not present the same constitutional threat to non-liberal, non-democratic states in waging war; they have other principles to which they must adhere.

As a means of securing democratic control of the military, a number of liberal democratic states have come to require the authorization of their national parliaments in decisions to deploy military forces. Katja Ziegler observes that parliamentary consent for military deployments not amounting to a formalized state of war is required in Austria, the Czech Republic, Denmark, Germany, Hungary, Italy, the Netherlands, Norway, Spain, Sweden, and Turkey. To this list we may with confidence add Japan, Korea, and France; the situations in the United Kingdom and United States are less clear.

In support of the necessity of parliamentary consent, Immanuel Kant argues that citizens must always be regarded as co-legislating members of states (not merely as means, but also as ends in themselves), and therefore give their free assent, through their representatives, not (p. 465) only to waging war in general but also to each particular declaration of war. Only under this limiting condition can a state direct them to serve in a way full of danger to them.

The requirement of parliamentary consent for waging of war might furthermore be expected to have several beneficial effects. It should make decisions to go to war more difficult to take and, as a result, more prudent; as John Hart Ely recommends, 'it should take quite a number of keys to start a war'. At the same time, parliamentary consent, once given, should accord more legitimacy to, and to consolidate popular support for, military operations, thereby increasing their effectiveness. Yet it is hard to say whether the requirement of parliamentary consent actually yields such benefits, if only because parliaments tend to be reluctant to take responsibility on such serious issues.

An institution that states have employed to ensure the effectiveness of the parliamentary consent requirement in restraining the armed forces is military conscription. Conscription provides the public with a strong incentive to avoid unnecessary wars, an attitude members of parliament might be expected to reflect. Conscription furthermore keeps military forces anchored in a given society, in contrast to standing armies, which tend to embrace interests different from those of citizens. However, conscription can have such beneficial effects only where democratic political processes function well. Moreover, in this age of highly technological warfare, the concept of conscription itself has come to seem obsolete.

Beyond relying on parliamentary consent and conscription systems, states have tended, since the Second World War, to constrain the use of military force by delegating judgments about its legitimacy and legality to international institutions such as the United Nations.^{14} Military deployments have been conducted under the auspices of international institutions to resolve not only inter-state but also intra-state conflicts, with missions including peacekeeping, preventing genocide, and restoring democratic government. Member states of the European Union have increasingly coordinated their overseas humanitarian and peacekeeping operations. In addition, both German case law and Japanese parliamentary statutes explicitly refer to decisions of international institutions as part of the legal basis of foreign deployment.^{15}

The tendency of states to defer to international organizations does not inherently increase democratic accountability. International society is a society of states, and its traditional mode of decision-making is not majority rule but consensus. Moreover, a significant number of its constituent members are not liberal democracies, and in any case, most international institutions are not democratically accountable to the citizens of their member countries.

Robert Dahl points out that from a democratic perspective, the challenge posed by internationalisation is to make sure that the costs to democracy are fully taken into account when decisions are shifted to international levels, and to strengthen the means for holding political and bureaucratic elites accountable for their decisions.

(p. 466) Dahl continues, ‘Whether and how these [aims] may be accomplished is, alas, far from clear’.^{16} Dahl's conclusion is especially applicable to the use of armed force.^{17}

This chapter offers a comparative survey of war-power arrangements in the United Kingdom, the United States, France, Germany, and Japan. The United Kingdom, the United States, and France, long-standing liberal democracies and permanent members of the UN Security Council, have been quite active in deploying military forces abroad. In contrast, Germany, and Japan are latecomers both as liberal democracies and as participants in international military operations. It should be noted that this chapter focuses mainly on powers of initiating armed conflicts, including that of deploying armed forces into actual or potential conflicts, but deals neither with conducting war nor ending it, nor with related treaty-making power.

II. United Kingdom

1. The Crown as the Sole Decision-Maker

The United Kingdom exemplifies the state in which war powers are vested solely in the executive. That the British Parliament has no formal role in the deployment of the armed forces makes the United Kingdom exceptional among contemporary democracies. However, there is latitude for doubting whether the United Kingdom and the United States differ in practice in this regard.^{18}

In the case of the United Kingdom, one must distinguish carefully between matters of law and of convention. As a matter of law, the prerogative power to declare war or engage the armed forces in conflict rests solely with the government; the government can lawfully exercise ‘without the authority of the Act of Parliament’ any act ‘done in virtue of [the] prerogative’.^{19} Though prerogative powers are not immune from judicial review, the courts have not been prepared to review the decisions of the government on deployment of the armed forces.^{20}

However, according to the Bill of Rights of 1689, ‘the raising or keeping of a standing army within the Kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with consent of Parliament, is against law.’ Thus, while the Royal Navy may be maintained without authorization by virtue of the prerogative, the authority of Parliament is required for the maintenance of the British Army, the Royal Air Force, and other land-based forces. In addition, as in other countries, Parliament holds power over the supplying of forces.^{21} Consequently, the government cannot deploy the armed forces in large-scale operations for extended periods without the support of Parliament.
As a matter of convention, it has not been the practice of British governments to ask for parliamentary permission to deploy the armed forces. In 1982, the government sought no explicit authorization for the military engagement in the Falklands. The government furthermore did not seek parliamentary authorization for the engagement of the armed forces either in the conflict in Yugoslavia in 1999 or in Afghanistan in 2001.

However, before embarking on military intervention in Iraq in 2003, the government asked the House of Commons to approve the use of all necessary means, including military force, ‘to ensure the disarmament of Iraq’s weapons of mass destruction’. While opinions differ on whether this precedent established a constitutional convention that parliamentary approval must be obtained before the use of military force, it has been astutely observed that ‘there are unlikely to be any circumstances in which a government could go to war without the [at least implicit] support of Parliament’.24

2. Prospects of Modernization

Against this background, the House of Lords Select Committee on the Constitution recommended in 2006 that ‘there should be a parliamentary convention determining the role Parliament should play in making decisions to deploy force or forces outside the United Kingdom to war, intervention in an existing conflict or to environments where there is a risk that the forces will be engaged in conflict’. The Committee maintained that the convention should pursue the following measures:

(1) The government should seek parliamentary approval (for example, in the House of Commons, by laying of a resolution) if it is proposing the deployment of British forces outside the United Kingdom into actual or potential conflict.

(2) In seeking approval, the government should indicate the deployment’s objectives, its legal basis, likely duration and, in general terms, an estimate of its size.

(3) If, for reasons of emergency and security, such prior application is impossible, the government should provide retrospective information within 7 days of its commencement or as soon as it is feasible, at which point the process in (1) should be followed.

(4) The government, as a matter of course, should keep Parliament informed of the progress of such deployments and, if their nature or objectives alter significantly, should seek a renewal of the approval.

The government’s initial reaction to the report was less than enthusiastic. Its response concluded, the Government is not presently persuaded of the case for ... establishing a new convention determining the role of Parliament in the deployment of the armed forces. The existing legal and constitutional convention is that it must be the Government which takes the decision in accordance with its own assessment of the position.

However, in a Green Paper on constitutional reform published in July 2007, the government under the premiership of Gordon Brown admitted that the current state of affairs was ‘outdated’ in a modern democracy, and proposed that ‘the House of Commons develop a parliamentary convention that could be formalised by a resolution’, which requires an approval of the House of Commons for the government to deploy the armed forces into armed conflict.

III. The United States

1. Ambiguous Allocation of War Powers

In the United States, the Constitution vests in Congress the power ‘To declare War, grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal, and make Rules concerning Captures on Land and Water’ (Art 1, s 8(11)). It also makes the President the ‘Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States’ (Art 2, s 2(1)). While the Constitution clearly divides the power to wage war between Congress and the President, where exactly the division falls is ambiguous. The courts, reluctant to become entangled in the political questions surrounding military deployments, have not established reliable precedents.
In this context, some pro-Congress scholars have argued that the power of Congress to declare war means that every deployment of the armed forces requires the prior authorization of Congress. According to this argument, the Founders clearly intended to divorce the power to initiate war from the power to prosecute it, and hence, endorsed a limited commander-in-chief power. According to Alexander Hamilton,

> The President will have only occasional command of such part of the militia of the nation as by legislative provision may be called into the actual service of the Union. ... [The President's commander-in-chief power] would amount to nothing more than the command and direction of the military and naval forces, as first general and admiral of the confederacy; while that of the British extends to the declaring of war and to the raising and regulating of fleets and armies; all which by the Constitution under consideration would appertain to the Legislature.\(^{32}\)

\(^{(p.\ 469)}\) James Madison explained that ‘the executive is the branch of power most interested in war, and most prone to it. [The constitution] has accordingly with studied care, vested the question of war in the Legislature.’\(^{33}\)

While it would be unrealistic to exclude the President from decisions on going to war, it makes sense, according to this line of reasoning, to “clog” the road to combat by requiring the concurrence of a number of various points of view; that is to say, ‘[i]t should take quite a number [of keys] to start a war.’\(^{34}\) Including the House of Representatives in the decision process, in particular, invites a ‘sober second thought’, and given that the burdens of war fall disproportionately on ordinary people, the ‘People’s House’ should have a say in any case in decisions to go to war.\(^{35}\)

Yet there are weaknesses in this argument. First, it is unclear whether ‘to declare war’ should be equated with ‘to commence war’; American history since the Founding is replete with cases in which the President sent armed forces abroad without the prior authorization of Congress. Congress has declared war only five times in all of American history.\(^{37}\)

Moreover, the debates of the Constitutional Convention indicate that the Founders considered the executive to have ‘the power to repel sudden attacks’.\(^{38}\) To respond to an imminent threat or actual sudden attack is beyond the ability of a deliberative body composed of numerous members. In the Prize Cases,\(^{39}\) the Court upheld President Lincoln’s blockade of southern ports after the secession of the southern states. Justice Grier argues, in his opinion,

> If a war be made by invasion of a foreign nation, the President is not only authorised but bound to resist force by force. He does not initiate the war, but is bound to accept the challenge without waiting for any special legislative authority. And whether the hostile party be a foreign invader, or States organised in rebellion, it is none the less a war, although the declaration of it be ‘unilateral’.

Furthermore, the Office of Legal Counsel (OLC) in the Department of Justice has consistently argued that while Congress has the power to ‘declare war’, the President has the power to initiate armed conflicts which, because of their anticipated ‘nature, scope and duration’, do not amount to ‘war’ in the constitutional sense without the authorization of Congress.\(^{40}\) Even when the President seeks the authorization of Congress, according to OLC, the authorization need not be explicit or addressed to a specific conflict. Hence, OLC justified the planned invasion of Haiti (p.\ 470) not only on the basis that the deployment would not be a ‘war’, but also that implied authorization could be found in an appropriation bill. OLC also offered implicit authorization as a justification for the US intervention in Kosovo.\(^{41}\) To require explicit prior authorization for each particular conflict is particularly unworkable in the world after 9/11, in which ‘the cost of inaction can be extremely high’.\(^{42}\) In authorizing the use of military force against Iraq in 2002, notably, Congress did not indicate when or for how long the President was authorized to use force.\(^{43}\)

Even the arguments of some leading scholars in the pro-Congress camp suggest that, although Congressional authorization is necessary, it need not be explicit. Laurence Tribe argues, for example, that > it seems apparent that Congress is given the power to declare war, for deciding whether the country should indeed go to war—and, by negative implication, that the President does not have the power affirmatively to make war (as opposed to defending the nation from a military assault) without consulting with and gaining the genuine approval of Congress.\(^{44}\)

However, he supports this claim not on the basis of Congress’s power to ‘declare war’, but rather on that of its power over the public purse. In this argument, the Constitution does not presuppose the existence of armed forces in the first place. Rather, it assigns the decision to create them to Congress, vesting Congress with the power to ‘raise and support Armies’ and to ‘provide and maintain a Navy’ (Art 1, s 8 (12)(13)). The executive cannot make war if Congress does not supply armed forces. Thus, the power to make war ‘resembles the power to incorporate a national bank; that is, it amounts to an implied means that must serve the powers that are enumerated and must be accomplished through the ordinary statutory processes that are specified by the text.’

Tribe’s argument explains how appropriation statutes may work as authorizations of deployments of the armed forces by the executive. If this explanation is correct, then there is no great difference, finally, between the war powers of Congress and those of the British Parliament, notwithstanding Hamilton's assertion.

If Congressional authorization may be implicit and not prior but subsequent to deployment of the armed forces, Congress faces a serious dilemma: it must choose between supporting military actions it is inclined to oppose, or to decline to fund them, cutting supplies and thereby endangering troops already in the field.

2. War Powers Resolution

To resolve this dilemma, Congress passed the War Powers Resolution (50 USC §§1541–1548) in 1973, in the waning days of the Vietnam War, over President Nixon's veto. However, this effort by Congress to strengthen its hand in decisions to use military force is widely regarded as having failed. Despite the Resolution, Congress remains powerless to prevent the President from deploying the military in the first place, and remains reluctant to use its full power once troops are in the field.

The War Powers Resolution requires the President 'in every possible instance' to consult with Congress before introducing US troops into hostilities, and after the deployment of forces, to consult regularly with Congress until the troops have been withdrawn. If there has been no declaration of war by Congress, the President is required to submit a report to Congress within 48 hours whenever troops are introduced into hostilities (§1543(a)).

Within 60 days of submitting this report, the President must terminate the use of armed forces, unless Congress (1) has declared war or enacted a specific authorization for the use of force, (2) has extended the 60-day period, or (3) is physically unable to comply as a result of an armed attack upon the United States. The 60-day period may be extended for not more than an additional 30 days if the President determines and certifies to Congress in writing that unavoidable military necessity respecting the safety of US armed forces requires the continued use of armed forces in the course of bringing about a prompt removal of the forces (§1544(b)).

Moreover, at any time that the armed forces are engaged in hostilities outside the territory of the United States without a declaration of a war or specific statutory authorization, the President is obligated to remove the forces if so directed by a concurrent resolution (§1544(c)).

Provision §1544(c) is regarded by many scholars as unconstitutional in light of INS v Chada, which requires that actions by Congress having ‘the purpose and effect of altering the legal rights, duties and relations of persons, including ... Executive Branch officials’ must be subjected to the possibility of presidential veto. Adoption of a concurrent resolution under §1544(c) would have the purpose and effect of altering the rights and duties of the President, but would not be subject to presidential veto.

Successive American Presidents have taken the position that the War Powers Resolution is an unconstitutional intrusion on the executive's war powers. While they have asked for congressional authorization of large-scale military actions such as the Gulf Wars, they have couched such requests in language of being 'consistent with' the War Powers Resolution rather than in compliance with it. Thus, despite this effort of Congress to increase its role in America's use of military force, we may conclude that progress in the United States towards greater democratic accountability for military deployments is difficult to discern.

IV. France

1. The President, the Commander-in-Chief

While France's current Constitution of 1958 contains several articles on military affairs, these articles are formulated rather vaguely, and are apparently self-contradictory in some regards. The Constitution specifies that the President of the Republic is ‘the commander-in-chief of the armed forces (le chef des armées)’, and that he shall ‘preside over the higher national defence councils and committees’ (Art 15). On the other hand, Article 21 stipulates that the prime minister ‘shall be responsible for national defence’.

The Constitution of 1958 seems to provide a relatively strong role for the President in the national defence in comparison to preceding republican constitutions. The Constitutional Act of 25 February 1875 of the Third Republic stipulates that ‘the President of the Republic shall dispose the military forces’ (Art 3), but that ‘each act of the President shall be counter-signed by a minister’ (Art 3). The Constitution of 27 October 1946, of the Fourth Republic, stipulates that the President shall preside over the higher national defence council and committee and hold the ‘title of the commander-in-chief of the military forces’ (Art 33), but that ‘the prime minister [le président du Conseil] secures the direction of the military forces and co-ordinates the implementation of national defence’ (Art 47(3)). In these regimes, either the prime minister or the Cabinet was viewed as being in charge of the national defence, and the role of the President was viewed as, to borrow the expression of Paul Bastid, no more than a ‘symbolic vestige’.54 Georges Vedel, furthermore, characterizes the presidential title of ‘commander-in-chief’ as ‘purely honorific’, maintaining that ‘the real direction of national defence, in the time of peace as well as war, belongs to the prime minister, the ministers in charge of military departments, and the Cabinet’.55 In the wake of the Vichy regime, no doubt, the power of the President, who was not directly responsible to the populace,56 was an object of suspicion for the French political classes;57 the President was supposed to have neither his own political or defence programme, nor the personal authority to direct the military forces.58

In the Fifth Republic, the situation changed dramatically. In response to the urgent circumstances of domestic political instability and decolonization wars abroad, the regime equipped the President with ‘proper powers’ (pouvoirs propres), including the power to nominate the prime minister (Art 8(1)), dissolve the National Assembly (Art 12), propose national referendums (Art 11), and take the measures required to respond to national emergencies (Art 16), as well as the authority to exercise these powers without the counter-signature of ministers. At least since the amendment of the Constitution in 1962, which introduced direct popular presidential elections, the President has been construed to have his own political programme, to direct the Cabinet when the presidential majority coincides with the parliamentary majority, and to use his constitutional powers to influence Cabinet policy when the two majorities do not coincide (cohabitation). This construal applies to the conduct of government in general, (p. 473) and encompasses the President’s ‘shared powers’ (pouvoirs partagés), the execution of which require the counter-signature of the prime minister (and in some cases, other concerned ministers) (Art 19).

The ‘shared powers’ of the President include his powers as commander-in-chief of the armed forces. The President chairs the Council of Defence, which takes the most important decisions concerning national defence; the Council is composed of the prime minister, the ministers of defence and foreign affairs, other concerned ministers, the secretary-general of defence, the chiefs of the general staff, and the general director for armaments (délégué général pour l’armement).

However, with regard to decisions concerning the nuclear forces, the decree of 12 June 1996 stipulates that the chief of the general staff ‘shall execute the order of engagement of nuclear forces, given by the President of the Republic, the commander-in-chief’. Thus, the decision to use nuclear force belongs exclusively to the President.

In other areas of national defence as well, even in the period of cohabitation, the prime minister, though supposedly ‘responsible for national defence’ (Art 21), generally refrains from any abridgment of the power of the presidency, which he may hope some day to enjoy himself. Thus, the President remains the principal decision-maker.59

2. Authorization by Parliament

In its original form, Article 35 of the current Constitution consisted of just one sentence (the current section 1), which stipulates that declarations of war must be authorized by Parliament. The principle that only Parliament may declare war has its origins in the revolutionary period;50 the Constitution of 3 September 1791 specifies that the king is the ‘commander-in-chief’ (Art 1, Ch IV), but that ‘war shall be decided only by a decree of the Legislative Corp’ (Art 2(1), Ch III).
Subsequent constitutions, however, assign Parliament a lesser role. The Constitution of the Third Republic (the Constitutional Act of 17 July 1875) stipulates that ‘The President of the Republic may not declare war without the prior assent of the two Houses of Parliament’ (Art 9). The Constitution of 27 October 1946 prescribes that ‘War may not be declared without a vote of the National Assembly and the prior assent of the Council of the Republic’ (Art 7). These clauses specify only that declarations of war be authorized by Parliament; the power to declare war itself belonged to the executive. This remains the case in Article 35 of the current Constitution, which furthermore includes no requirement that parliamentary authorization be prior to the declaration of war.

Broadly interpreted, the principle of requiring parliamentary authorization of war might be understood to apply to every engagement in which military forces are committed. In practice, however, ‘war’ has been construed strictly to refer to ‘war proper’, excluding military actions against non-states or resulting from UN Security Council resolutions. Numerous deployments in sub-Saharan states to quell coups d’etat have not been considered ‘wars’, because the French interventions were at the invitation of local governments. The French military action in the Gulf War was not regarded as a war between France and Iraq, but rather as a ‘collective (p. 474) security’ operation authorized by a UN Security Council resolution; the President did convene Parliament to debate this engagement, but for the purpose of approving the government policy in accordance with the procedure stipulated in Article 49, rather than for the purpose of authorizing a declaration of war. In the case of the Kosovo conflict in 1999, the government neither informed Parliament of the French engagement nor solicited a vote of confidence in support of its policy.

Hence, we may conclude that the difference between France and the United Kingdom, in regard to democratic accountability for military deployments, is not very great. Article 35 of the Constitution of 1958 does not in practice function to give Parliament control over the government’s use of military force.

In 1993 the Vedel Committee, commissioned to advise President Mitterrand on possible improvements to the Constitution, proposed that the following paragraph be added to Article 35:

The Government shall notify Parliament of its every decision to have the armed forces intervene abroad, at latest eight days after the beginning of the said intervention. This notice shall be followed by a debate. If Parliament is out of session, Parliament shall reunite for this purpose.

The President apparently found this proposal too constraining; the draft of the amendment proposed by then Prime Minister Bérégovoy read as follows:

The government shall inform the competent committees of Parliament of its every decision to have the armed forces intervene abroad, at latest forty eight hours after the beginning of the said intervention. The government shall notify Parliament of the intervention, where the nature of the intervention justifies it. This notice shall be followed by a debate. If Parliament is out of session, Parliament shall reunite for this purpose.

According to this proposal, parliamentary debate of military deployments abroad would not be organized automatically, but at the discretion of the government. Yet even this moderate change to the Constitution did not materialize at the time.

However, an amendment initiated by President Nicolas Sarkozy that is similar to that originally proposed by the Vedel Committee was adopted in 2008. The amendment adds three new sections to Article 35 that read,

The government shall notify Parliament of its decision to have the armed forces intervene abroad, at the latest three days after the beginning of the said intervention. It shall detail the objectives of the said intervention. This notice may give rise to a debate, which shall not be followed by a vote.

Where the said intervention shall exceed four months, the government shall submit the extension to Parliament for authorisation. It may ask the National Assembly to make the final decision.

(p. 475) If Parliament is out of session at the end of the four-month period, it shall express its decision at the beginning of the following session.

These provisions seem to establish less parliamentary constraint on executive control of the military than the US
War Powers Resolution. While the amended Article 35 equips Parliament with new powers to constrain the government's deployment of military forces, however, the actual text of the amendment is weaker than that of the proposal of the Balladur Committee on which it was based, which reads, ‘The government shall notify Parliament of its every decision to have the armed forces intervene abroad. Where the said intervention exceeds three months, the extension shall be authorised by an Act of Parliament.’

3. Prohibition of Aggressive Wars

The Constitution of 3 September 1791 declared, in the spirit of the Revolution, ‘The French nation renounces to undertake war for the purpose of making conquest, and shall never use force against free people’ (Title VI). The same principle, expressed in the same formulation, was incorporated into the fourteenth paragraph of the preamble to the Constitution of 27 October 1946. This principle is therefore a component of the ‘constitutional bloc’ (bloc de constitutionnalité) under the Constitution of the Fifth Republic, though there has not yet been any decision by the Constitutional Council on this matter.

V. Germany

1. The Military under the Basic Law

As originally promulgated, the German Basic Law of 1949 does not mention the existence of armed forces. While Article 26 declares that any acts ‘tending to and undertaken with intent to disturb the peaceful relations between nations are unconstitutional’, and ‘shall be made a criminal offence’, the Basic Law (in contrast to the post-war Constitution of Japan of 1946) does not contain an explicit prohibition against the establishment of armed forces.

In pursuit of membership for West Germany in the failed European Defence Community (EDC), the Adenauer government argued inter alia, first, that the federal authority over ‘foreign affairs’ conferred by Article 73(1) implies the power to legislate on ‘military affairs’; secondly, that the provision of Article 4(3) on conscientious objection to military services presupposes the existence of armed forces; and thirdly, that Article 24 allows the federal government to become a party to a ‘system of collective security’.

After the 1953 election gave the Adenauer government enough seats to amend the Basic Law, four constitutional amendments were adopted in 1954. The amendments added the power of ‘defence’ to the powers of the federation (Art 73(1)), empowered the Bundestag to declare ‘a state of defence’ (Verteidigungsfall) (Art 59a), and provided for the establishment of ‘armed forces for defence purposes’ (Art 87a). These amendments paved the way for West Germany to become a member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). In 1968, (p. 476) Article 87a of the Basic Law was amended to include a new paragraph, which affirmed that apart from defence, ‘the armed forces may be employed only to the extent expressly permitted by this Basic Law’.

2. The Military Deployment Case

Relative to other democratic countries, the Federal Constitutional Court plays a significant role in decisions regarding the deployment of armed forces abroad as the Military Deployment case of 1994 illustrates.

As a consequence of its historical experience in the first half of the twentieth century, Germany is a latecomer to international military deployments. Although successive federal governments through the late 1980s maintained that the Basic Law prohibited any use of the armed forces except for purposes of self-defence and within the area of the alliances covered by NATO and the WEU (Western European Union), Helmut Kohl’s CDU-FDP government decided in the early 1990s to deploy military forces outside the NATO countries. In the Military Deployment case of 1994, the question in dispute was that of the constitutionality of the deployment of German military units in NATO’s monitoring of compliance with the UN embargo against Serbia, in enforcing the UN resolution establishing a ‘no-fly-zone’ over Bosnia and Herzegovina, and in the UN humanitarian mission in Somalia.

The Federal Constitutional Court ruled that both the UN and NATO treaties constitute systems of ‘collective security’ in the meaning of Article 24(2), and that the Bundestag’s approval of these treaties under Article 59(2) embraces the implied authority to implement the terms of these agreements, including the deployment of German military forces. At the same time, the Court also held that under the Basic Law, the government was required in principle to seek the Bundestag's explicit approval prior to any deployment of the armed forces abroad, because under the Basic Law, the armed forces are conceived to be a ‘parliamentary army’ (Parlamentsheer). Since the Basic Law does not require such approval explicitly, some commentators have suggested that the Court ‘ventured into the field of judicial lawmaking’. Nonetheless, the decision successfully ‘transformed the debate on the use of German forces abroad from one centred on the question of “whether” into the question of “how” … and from a debate between elite and popular sentiment into a debate on democratic accountability’. In compliance with the Court’s ruling in this case, the SDP-Green Party government under Gerhard Schröder asked the parliament to authorize the deployment of the armed forces to intervene in the Kosovo crisis in 1998.

3. The Parliamentary Participation Act

Parliament codified the requirements of the ruling by the Court that emerged from the 1994 case in the Parliamentary Participation Act of 18 March 2005. The Act stipulates the following:

- First, in principle, any ‘deployment of armed forces abroad’ requires the consent of the Bundestag (s 1(2)), irrespective of the type of deployment and whether or not it is within a multilateral or collective security action. However, no consent is required for preparatory measures, planning, and humanitarian services and assistance of the army where weapons are carried solely for self-defence and the soldiers are not expected to become involved in armed action (s 2(2)).

- Secondly, under the standard procedure, the government submits an application with detailed information about the intended deployment (s 3(1)(2)). While the Bundestag may approve or reject the government's request, amendments to the request shall not be permissible (s 3(3)). Under the simplified procedure for minor involvements, consents are deemed to have been granted unless the Bundestag becomes active within seven days after being informed (s 4).

- Thirdly, in emergency situations and for the rescue of nationals abroad, consent may be given ex post (s 5).

As the Act comes into force, the Federal Constitutional Court should be freed of the burden of resolving the highly political questions of military deployments abroad, which often arouse significant controversy among the German populace.

VI. Japan

1. Article 9 and the Self-Defence Forces

Informed by a modern history not dissimilar to that of Germany, Article 9 of the Constitution of Japan promulgated in 1946 states the following:

(1) Aspiring sincerely to an international peace based on justice and order, the Japanese people forever renounce war as a sovereign right of the nation and the threat or use of force as means of settling international disputes.

(2) In order to accomplish the aim of the preceding paragraph, land, sea, and air forces, as well as other war potential, will never be maintained. The right of belligerency of the state will not be recognised.

Despite the apparent purity of the pacifist tone of these clauses, the government of Japan has consistently maintained that they prohibit neither the use of military force for the purpose of self-defence, nor its maintenance of the armed forces necessary to achieve that purpose. The armed forces of Japan are accordingly called the Self-Defence Forces (SDF). In the authoritative opinions of the Cabinet Legislation Bureau (Naikaku Hōsei Kyoku), Article 9 restricts the SDF to the use of force only for the purpose of self-defence, and the meaning of ‘self-defence’ is limited strictly to individual, rather than collective, self-defence. Hence, the SDF may not be used for the defence of a foreign country, even if the security of that country is intimately related to that of Japan.

The Supreme Court of Japan has not yet touched on the constitutionality of the SDF, though it has ruled that the Japan–US Mutual Security Treaty is not unconstitutional, since Article 9 concerns only the kind of forces the War Powers

Japanese government may maintain, whereas US forces stationed in Japan are under the command of the US government. These prudent positions of the government and the court are broadly supported by the public, which still harbours strong pacifist sentiments as well as fears of foreign attack.

The Constitution includes no language concerning war powers. The Self-Defence-Forces Act, however, stipulates that the prime minister is the commander-in-chief of the SDF (s 7), and that the prime minister may order the engagement of the SDF when an armed attack is clearly imminent and the necessity of the engagement is recognized (s 76(1)). However, the use of force must be authorized in advance by the Diet, except in cases in which there is no time to acquire it. Given the pacifist sentiments of the general public, it is unlikely that the government or prime minister would be accorded a free hand in commanding the SDF, even in the event of armed attack from abroad.

2. UN Peacekeeping Operations Act

Since the end of the Cold War, the government has cautiously begun to send the SDF abroad for purposes beyond the national self-defence. In 1992, the Diet enacted the UN Peacekeeping Operations Act, which authorized the SDF to participate in peacekeeping operations sanctioned by either the UN General Assembly or the UN Security Council. In principle, the prime minister must secure the Diet's approval for each deployment in advance when the operation potentially involves the use of force, as in operations to monitor ceasefires or to disarm conflicting parties (s 6(7)). The Act also permits the SDF to participate in humanitarian relief operations at the request of specific listed international organs, including the UN High Commissioner for Refugees, UNICEF, or the World Food Programme. However, the Act stipulates that the SDF may not use force on these missions beyond the use of small firearms for the self-defence of soldiers or persons under their guard (s 24), since the Constitution allows the use of force by military units of the SDF acting as such only for the purpose of Japan's national self-defence.

Because of this restriction, the deployment of the SDF to conflicts abroad is allowed only when ceasefire agreements have been reached between the conflicting parties, and the parties and other countries involved agree to the participation of the SDF. If such agreement is revoked, the government must withdraw the SDF (s 6(13)).

In addition to the UN Peacekeeping Operations Act, the Diet has enacted several pieces of legislation approving deployment of the SDF abroad on an ad hoc basis. This legislation enabled the SDF to participate in reconstruction operations in Iraq after the Gulf War, and to supply fuel to warships and other vessels engaged in anti-terrorist operations in the Indian Ocean after the 9/11 attacks. In these missions, too, the SDF was restrained from using force, in compliance with the government's official policy. The reticence of the government to engage the SDF in overseas operations, and the close parliamentary oversight of such operations, is likely to continue for the foreseeable future, barring amendment of the Constitution.

VII. Conclusion

We may conclude that until the first few years of the twenty-first century, parliamentary control of war powers in the United Kingdom, the United States, and France did not work very effectively. These long-standing liberal democracies and permanent members of the UN Security Council have been quite active in deploying military forces abroad. Both the British and French Parliaments have played no effective role in the deployment of the armed forces. The US Congress has been powerless to prevent the President from deploying the military in the first place, and remains reluctant to use its full power once troops are in the field, despite the existence of the War Powers Resolution. While there are some moves towards the strengthening of parliamentary control in the United Kingdom and France, these efforts may encounter difficulties similar to those under the US War Powers Resolution.

On the other hand, in Germany, the Federal Constitutional Court has played a significant role to place the deployment of armed forces under the control of the Bundestag. And the Japanese government has maintained that the SDF may not be used for the defence of a foreign country. Dispatches of the SDF for purposes beyond the national self-defence are permitted only when the Diet approves them for the limited purposes designated by statute, and their use of force is restrained by the government's official interpretation of the Constitution.

Both German case law and Japanese statutes explicitly refer to decisions of international institutions as part of the legal basis for deployment abroad, for missions including peacekeeping, preventing genocide, and restoring democratic government. However, the efficient solution of regional conflicts often demands timely military actions by ad hoc coalitions of willing and capable states that usually include the old liberal democracies, such as the United States, the United Kingdom, and France. As, for example, the cases of the Kosovo conflict and the Iraq War show, these states reveal, if not their scepticism, at least highly selective attitudes regarding the desirability of using force under the authority of international organizations. It remains to be seen if the lack of effective parliamentary control in these countries might bring about more insecurity rather than security in the world.

Bibliography

Katja Ziegler, ‘Executive Powers in Foreign Policy: The Decision to Dispatch the Military’ in Katja Ziegler, Denis Baranger and Anthony Bradley (eds), Constitutionalism and the Role of Parliaments (2007)

Notes:

(2) Ibid 166.

(3) Ibid 176. In other words, dissolving a regime can resolve even a ‘supreme emergency’ that the regime confronts. For more on supreme emergencies, see Michael Walzer, Just and Unjust Wars (4th edn, 2006), 251–68. On states of emergency, see Chapter 21.

(4) Philip Bobbitt, The Shield of Achilles: War, Peace, and the Course of History (2002), ch 4. This does not mean that the aim of ‘regime change’ in other states can be a moral or legal justification for waging war.

(5) Katja Ziegler, ‘Executive Powers in Foreign Policy: The Decision to Dispatch the Military’ in Katja Ziegler, Denis Baranger, and Anthony Bradley (eds), Constitutionalism and the Role of Parliaments (2007), 143. It makes little sense to require parliamentary consent only for formal declarations of war, since such declarations are quite rare. With regard to this point, see nn 37 and 62 below.

(6) See Section VI below.

(8) See Section IV.2 below.

(9) See Sections II.2 and III below.

(12) Ely's observation may shed light on the attitude of the US Congress. Ibid ch 3. See also the text accompanying nn 48 and 49 below.

(14) As the case of the Iraq War in 2003 shows, the United States is a salient exception on this point.

(15) See Sections V.2 and VI.2 below respectively.

(18) See the text accompanying nn 46 and 47 below.

(20) Council of Civil Service Unions v Minister of State for Civil Service [1985] AC 374 (which held that the courts can review the manner of exercise of discretionary powers conferred by the prerogative). Cf China Navigation Co Ltd v Attorney General [1932] 2 KB 197; Chandler v Director of Public Prosecutions [1964] AC 763 (which held that the courts cannot question whether the Crown has wisely exercised its discretionary power regarding the disposition of the armed forces); Crown Proceedings Act 1947, s 11.

(22) HC Deb vol 401, col 760, 18 March 2003.

(26) Ibid para 110.

(27) Government Response to the House of Lords Constitution Committee’s Report, November 2006, Cm 6923.

(28) The Governance of Britain, July 2007, Cm 7170.

(30) The Supreme Court explicitly rejects the claim that the President's military power as ‘Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces’ includes the power to take possession of private property in order to keep labour disputes from stopping production. See Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co v Sawyer (‘Steel Seizure Case’) 343 US 579 (1952). On the other hand, the Court seems to suggest that the non-delegation doctrine is especially weak with regard to the President's regulation of the sale of arms and munitions to foreign countries. See eg United States v Curtiss-Wright Export Corp 299 US 304 (1936).

(31) Ely (n 11), 67. Ely advocates reviving the non-delegation doctrine, which generally requires that ‘important policy choices are to be made by Congress’ (ibid 24). Compare n 70 below with regard to the German Federal Constitutional Court's implicit invocation of the ‘essential matters’ doctrine, which is a German version of the non-delegation doctrine.
Hamilton (n 19), 336–7 (no 69).

‘Letter from James Madison to Thomas Jefferson, 2 April 1798, quoted in Ely (n 11), 4.

Ely (n 11), 4.

Ibid.

Michael Ramsey, in his ‘Textualism and War Power’ (2002) 69 University of Chicago Law Review 1543, concludes that in the eighteen century, the phrase ‘declare war’ was understood to include an armed attack without a formal proclamation. War might be ‘declared’ either by word or action (ibid 1609–13). Hence, Congress’s power to ‘declare war’ broadly encompasses the power to initiate war. However, even in this reading, uses of military force short of wars—the acts of a sovereign resolving its disputes by force—need not be authorized by Congress (ibid 1631–5).

The five declared wars are the War of 1812, the Mexican–American War of 1846–48, the Spanish–American War of 1898, the First World War, and the Second World War. In all of these conflicts, war was declared after hostilities were underway. See Philip Bobbitt, ‘War Powers: An Essay on John Hart Ely’s War and Responsibility: Constitutional Lessons of Vietnam and Its Aftermath’ (1994) 92 Michigan Law Review 1364, 1397.

The Debates in the Federal Convention of 1787 Which Framed the Constitution of the United States of America, reported by James Madison (eds Gaillard Hunt and James Brownscott, 1920), 418. Thus, when President Jefferson sent the US Navy to Tripoli to defend US ships from Mediterranean pirates, Hamilton criticized the cautious attitude reflected in his annual message to Congress. According to Hamilton, ‘when a foreign nation declares, or openly and avowedly makes war upon the United States … any declaration on the part of Congress is nugatory: it is at least unnecessary.’ See 25 The Papers of Alexander Hamilton (Harold Syrett et al ed, 1977), 444, 455–7.

67 US (2 Black) 635 (1863).

John Yoo, The Powers of War and Peace (2005), x.

Ibid 664. Here Tribe draws on Philip Bobbitt’s argument. See Bobbitt (n 37), 1388–92.

Ibid 1365–6.

See the citation accompanying n 32 above.

In the Kosovo conflict, the House of Representative failed to pass a resolution authorizing air attack, but passed a bill funding the war just a week later. See Dorf (n 13), 172. As early as in 1829, William Rawle pointed out that as to a war [in which] the US might be involved by the conduct of the executive, without the participation of the legislature … no other restraint appears to exist, than that of withholding the supplies to carry it on.

Rawle observed that in England, the king is, in this respect, equally dependent on the parliament, and its history shows that this dependence is not always adequate to prevent unpopular wars.

War Powers

(49) Ely (n 11), 48–54; Bobbitt (n 37), 1397; Tribe (n 44), 667–9; Dorf (n 13), 172. According to Ely, ‘Ulysses tied ... to tie himself to the mast in 1973, but the knots were loose, and he was soon back to his old ways of avoiding responsibility’ ((n 11), 53).

(51) 462 US at 952.

(53) Michael Glennon, ‘The United States: Democracy, Hegemony, and Accountability’ in Ku and Jacobson (n 17), 344.

(55) Georges Vedel, Droit constitutionnel (1949), 516.

(56) In the Third and Fourth Republics, the President was elected by Parliament, united as a Congress. The direct election of the head of state in the Second Republic had left bad memories for the constitution-makers of later regimes.

(57) Frison-Roche (n 54), 509.

(58) Field-Marshal Mac-Mahon was an exception in this regard. The Second President of the Third Republic personally intervened in national politics with his official powers. Mac-Mahon was forced to resign in 1877 after a failed attempt to bring down the political opposition by dissolving the House of Deputies.

(62) Alexander Hamilton observed that even at the time of the founding of the US Constitution, formal declarations of war were increasingly rare (Hamilton (n 19), 117 (no 25)). They remain so, notwithstanding the Hague Convention III of 18 October 1907, which required that hostilities ‘must not commence without previous and explicit warning, in the form either of a reasoned declaration of war or of an ultimatum with conditional declaration of war’ (Art 1). As Michael Dorf points out, ‘Modern military conflicts are too fluid, and arise too suddenly, for a declaration of war to serve any practical purpose’ (Dorf (n 13), 172).

(64) Frison-Roche (n 60), 937.

(67) There is no political question doctrine in Germany.

(68) 90 BVerfGE 286.

(69) Kommers (n 66), 162–4. The Court has referred to the German constitutional tradition at least since the Weimar Constitution of 1919, which required that war and peace should be declared by parliamentary statute (Art 45(2)).

(70) Nolte (n 66), 237. Some commentators argue that the Court might implicitly rely on the ‘essential matters’ doctrine (Wesentlichkeitstheorie), which requires parliamentary decisions when essential matters are affected (Nolte (n 66), 243–4; Memorandum by Katja Ziegler, ‘The Model of a Parliamentary Army Under the German Constitution’ in House of Lords Select Committee on the Constitution, 15th Report, War Making Powers, vol II: Evidence (HL Paper 236-II, 2006), 39–40; Ziegler (n 5), 158–60). Ziegler observes that

The impact on the soldiers whose right to life and physical integrity may be interfered with by sending them into a war zone should be a sufficient reason alone to consider a decision about military deployment as crossing the threshold of an essential question (ibid 159).

(71) Nolte (n 66), 237.

(72) Nolte observes that the long, earnest, and searching’ debate preceding the parliamentary decision on this occasion worked as ‘a catalyst for public opinion which, until then, had not envisaged German troops acting without UN Security Council authorisation (ibid 247).

(73) Cf Memorandum by Ziegler (n 70), 31–46. Ziegler’s memorandum includes an English translation of the Parliamentary Participation Act (ibid 44–6), on which the following description draws.

(74) See generally, Akiho Shibata, ‘Japan: Moderate Commitment within Legal Strictures’ in Ku and Jacobson (n 17).

(75) Many constitutional scholars argue that the maintenance of the SDF is inconsistent with Art 9. This academic view runs counter to the essence of constitutionalism, which entails supporting the fair social cooperation of people embracing mutually inconsistent, even incommensurable worldviews. On this point, see my ‘Constitutional Borrowing and Political Theory’ (2003) 1 International Journal of Constitutional Law 242–3.

(76) Sakata v Japan, 13 Keishû 3225 (Sup Ct GB, 16 December 1959), Sunakawa case.

(77) Article 66(2) of the Constitution states, ‘The prime minister and other cabinet members must be civilian’. This clause was inserted, during the deliberation of the draft constitution at the National Diet, at the request of the Far East Commission, which oversaw the governance of the US occupying forces in Japan. The Commission foresaw the possibility of Japan’s rearmament, even under Art 9.

Yasuo Hasebe

Yasuo Hasebe is Professor of Constitutional Law, University of Tokyo, School of Law
I. Introduction: A Comprehensive Theory of Secession 481
II. Justifying Secession: Theoretical Views 483
III. Secession and Self-Determination in International Law and in the International Practice 487
IV. Secession and the Constitution 493

I. Introduction: A Comprehensive Theory of Secession

Secession is at once the most revolutionary and the most institutionally conservative of political constructs. Its revolutionary character lies in its ultimate challenge to state sovereignty; its conservative side, in the reinforcement of the virtues of the latter. This inherent duality is reflected in the legal regulation surrounding secession. With very limited exceptions, secession is prohibited both by international law as well as, albeit often implicitly, by the overwhelming majority of state constitutions. Nevertheless, a state born out of a successful secessionist project, is likely to be recognized both by international organizations and by the community of states. Often though, in that connection the term ‘secession’ is substituted by ‘dissolution’ (Yugoslavia) or ‘voluntary disassociation’ (Bangladesh, Eritrea, Czechoslovakia, the Soviet Union). Thus, it becomes apparent that legal regulation of secession tends to run counter and to dissimulate its revolutionary character, while legitimizing its conservative dimension, through state building in the context of a new sovereign entity.

State-building is also the primary focus of traditional definitions of secession by international law scholars, in terms of the creation of a new state upon territory previously forming (p. 482) part of an existing one. Some scholars tailor this definition so narrowly as to only comprise the actual event of secession, while others, more broadly, view secession also as the process conducive to the creation of a new state. Irrespective of how broad the definition, however, according to these outcome-based approaches, secession does not challenge the very notions of statehood, citizenship, and sovereignty, but, quite to the contrary, it emphasizes their Westphalian conceptualization: the absolute monopoly of power residing in states, and the congruency of territory, state, people, and nation.
Secession and Self-Determination

In this chapter, I adopt a comprehensive approach to secession, one that encompasses both its revolutionary and its institutionally conservative dimension. Secession can be viewed as one among other means of political separation within a multinational state, a ‘possibility’ inscribed within a state's political and constitutional discourse, without necessarily connoting the establishment of a new state. In this light, the analysis of secession logically fits within the broader discussion relating to minority rights and citizenship in multinational societies. This approach has two major advantages. In the first place, it confers a higher degree of coherence to the overall discussion concerning secession. Under prevailing circumstances, secessionist movements operate in the context of multinational states inhabited by autochthonous, territorially concentrated minorities which share a national or quasi-national identity. Thus, secession is not an isolated phenomenon, but rather part of a broader dynamic between a state and its subnational communities. In this light, traditional territorially-based minority rights and the right to secession fall within the same overall category, as they raise analogous moral, political, and legal questions focused on the difficulties in reconciling political theories on citizenship and nationalism, self-determination and sovereignty. Analogously, in international law, the problems that arise in relation to minority protection have always been strictly intertwined with those regarding the right to statehood.

The second advantage of the comprehensive approach is that it construes secession as a flexible, multi-functional device, that can serve different purposes, depending on the context within which it operates. A paramount consideration in any secession-related discussion is that, irrespective of the nature of secessionists claims, secessions are not prima facie desirable, because they jeopardize world stability. However, demonizing secession, turning it into a constitutional taboo, often adds fuel to secessionist claims. On the other hand, if secession is constructed as one among the many rights and options offered to a state's subnational groups, chances are that it will lose much of its appeal. Secessionist claims are often loaded with emotions and passions, but, if secession is ‘normalized’, and subject to legal rules, if it is rationalized, it is likely to lose its evocative power, and thus to prompt secessionist movements to redirect their agenda towards less disruptive objectives. The other side of the coin is that the presence of a legal right to secession in a multinational state, by challenging the absoluteness of the principles of perpetuity and of territorial integrity, is likely to prompt the government to take nationalist claims, and minority rights, seriously. Ironically, thus, secession might constitute an important step in the pursuit of satisfactory forms of accommodation within, and not beyond, multinational states. But one should caution against uncritically assuming that secession is always a source of instability as that would be misleading. There are doubtless cases in which existing state borders are the actual source of instability. If this is the case, to integrate secession within a state’s constitutional and political discourse, might prove critical in ensuring a peaceful secessionist process, and the building of a new state on democratic premises, all to the advantage of international, as well as domestic, stability.

A comprehensive theory of secession, unlike traditional, outcome-based approaches, requires a re-conceptualization of traditional concepts of statehood, sovereignty, and citizenship. By recognizing secession as one among various minority rights one squarely challenges the monopoly of state power, and the supremacy of state law, by assuming that sub-state entities posses a form of quiescent sovereignty, that might be activated under certain conditions. This stands against the traditional notion of perpetuity as a structural element of state constitutions and against sovereignty as strictly indivisible. In this respect, a comprehensive theory of secession, by calling for a voluntaristic (or con-federal) dimension in a state constitution, tends to blur the line between the realm of constitutional law and that of international law.

This chapter proceeds in three steps. I first briefly outline the principal theories that justify secession. Next, I analyze the evolution of secession in international law and in international practice, as a corollary of the right of all peoples to self-determination. Finally, in the last section, I turn to the relationship between secession and constitutionalism and ask whether the constitutionalization of the right to secede can, in particular context, be regarded as a constructive response to secessionist challenges and what its implications are for constitutional law.
II. Justifying Secession: Theoretical Views

There are two principal types of theories of the right to secede: Primary Right Theories and Remedial Right Theories. The latter construct the right to secession as a remedy for injustices, that is, as derivative upon the violation of other rights. The former theories, to the contrary, posit that a right unilaterally to secede exists per se, independently from the violation of other rights.

Primary Rights Theories are of two types: nationalist and democratic. Nationalistic theories of secession are built on the premise that there is a moral value in the nation, that is, in the fact of belonging to a, broadly speaking, ‘culturally homogeneous’ community. This basic assumption can, of course, be defended on different theoretical and ideological grounds. While nineteenth-century nationalists constructed nations as exclusionary organic communities, contemporary liberal nationalists, such as Margalit and Raz, uphold versions of nationalism that include components of universalism and inclusivity. In this light, national groups are valuable because the self-worth and self-respect of individuals depends to a large extent upon their group membership. Hence, while liberal nationalism theories justify secessionist claims on the basis of the value that they attach to the collective autonomy of groups, they do not antagonize the liberal individualist approach: national groups are valued primarily because they powerfully contribute to the interests of individuals.

Nationalist theories of secession assume that the state is the optimal political form to preserve a national culture, and, by the same token, that states with strong national identities are more likely better to realize social justice within their borders. This is coherent with John Stuart Mill’s assumption that the commonalities among citizens are a fundamental condition for viable states, and that without a homogeneous polity, government would be coercive. Accordingly, for contemporary liberal nationalists, such as Michael Walzer, Michael Lund, and David Miller, nationalism does not constitute a threat to democracy, but is instead a condition for it, because it ensures the solidarity, trust, and shared sentiments and values among citizens that democracy requires.

In light of nationalist theories, the legitimacy of secession depends on two conditions: the preexistence of a ‘nation’, and the existence of a relationship between the latter and a given territory. This poses a first problem, in that various different groups might have equally legitimate claims on the same territory. Moreover, even if in principle all nations should be granted the right to their own state, in practice, to satisfy the aspirations of given nationalities through secession, necessarily implies the frustration of other nationalities. If there are trapped minorities within the separatist subunit, granting secession to the latter on the basis of national self-determination provokes a clash between competing collective rights (that of the seceding group versus that of the trapped minorities) as well as between the collective and individual rights of, respectively, the seceding group and those individuals within it who are opposed to secession. Justifying the legitimacy of secession on nationalist theories could also encourage nation-building programs, with the aim of dismantling existing groups and/or preventing the formation of new ones.

Finally, if, as posited by Miller, secession is legitimate when the borders of a state and those of a nation do not overlap, not only the break-up of multinational states would in principle be acceptable, but secession would be legitimate only if aimed at the formation of homogeneous states, but not of multinational ones. This ignores the natural fluidity of identities and the effects of globalization, in terms of infusing diversity into political communities, and sets the premises for an exclusionary model of citizenship.

The second type of Primary Right Secession Theories can be defined as ‘democratic’ or ‘choice’ theories. Choice theorists, including Robert McGee, Christopher Wellman, Daniel Philpott, and Harry Beran, posit that freedom of association and democracy should, at least in principle, apply when drawing state borders and that the right to secession is derived from the individual right to voluntarily choose associations. Their emphasis is not on the collective autonomy of nations, but rather on the individual autonomy of groups’ members. Individual autonomy is the fundamental value which ultimately justifies secessionist claims, because it constitutes the ground in which is rooted the right to associate politically, that is the basis of any legitimate government. Consensus is a prerequisite for the legitimacy of political authority, as democracy is based on popular consent and voluntary membership. Democratic governments make decisions binding on all citizens, irrespective of whether they approve or disapprove of them. Hence, for a state to be legitimate, citizens should at a minimum agree to be included and observe a core of common rules. If the individuals who form part of a group within a state no longer consent to the state’s authority, they must be granted the right to secede. Autonomy and freedom of association confer, in fact, to all individuals the right to associate, but also that to withdraw from an association, including the political association _par excellence_, the state. It follows that, for choice theorists, the right to secede should be granted irrespective of a group's cultural or ethnic homogeneity, and even in the absence of a strong territorial claim by the separatist group. What really matters are a group's political abilities and its desire of its own state, that is, a group's will to associate in a political and independent unity.\textsuperscript{12} Thus, there is a ‘political- (p. 485) territorial’ rather than a ‘national’ right to secession\textsuperscript{13} that is legitimated by aggregated individual choices. To grant the right to secede only to nations, that is, to large culturally distinct groups, would not only collide with the principle of democracy, but also produce uncertainty, because cultural distinctness is often a matter of degree, making it difficult to draw clear-cut lines, and decide, for example, whether a group constitutes one or more nations.\textsuperscript{14}

Choice theorists construct secession as a primary right. This does not mean, however, that it is an unqualified right. According to Harry Beran ‘liberal political philosophy requires that secession be permitted if it is effectively desired by a territorially concentrated group within a state and is morally and practically possible.’\textsuperscript{15} Hence, the right to secede should not be granted to groups that are not in the position of giving birth to viable states and that do not satisfy certain conditions.\textsuperscript{16} For Christopher Wellman, to base the right to secede on an unqualified freedom of association is a ‘recipe for anarchy’. States, in fact, must be territorially contiguous in order to perform their functions, and contiguity would not be possible if states could coerce only those who consent. In Wellman's view, thus, secession should be allowed only if it does not interfere with the production of essential political functions and does not jeopardize the remaining state from doing so. In other words, the territorial boundaries of existing states can be reconfigured according to the preferences of inhabitants only as long as this does not interrupt the benefits of political stability.\textsuperscript{17}

Thus, choice theories are based in principle on universal values and universal rights, but, in practice, only apply to individuals and groups that are in a favorable situation. Political stability, territorial contiguity, and the overall practicability of secession prevent many (most?) groups from enjoying the democratic right to secession. Moreover, choice theorists posit that a political community is legitimate only if membership of is based a voluntary act of adhesion. It is very unlikely, however, that within a territorially clustered group all individuals would actually agree to secede. This means that a plebiscite in favor of secession would either force the non-secessionist individuals to leave their territory, or it would set the ground for an illegitimate political association, due to lack of consensus.\textsuperscript{18} Thus, if consensus stands as the ultimate criterion of legitimacy for democracy, then the new (post-secession) frontiers may end up being just as undemocratic as the old ones were.

Another problem with choice theories is that they assume that populations are basically fixed entities, not subject to change,\textsuperscript{19} which is not the case in today's globalized world. According to choice theories, a group of migrants could settle in a given territory and legitimately claim the right to secede and to establish its own state. This potential threat would likely prompt states characterized by large immigration flows to impede the formation of homogeneous territorially-concentrated groups,\textsuperscript{20} and/or to prevent new minorities from becoming politically organized and economically autonomous.\textsuperscript{21}

\textit{(p. 486)} In the end, choice theories reproduce, at least in part, the flaws of national self-determination theories. In order to secede democratically, a group must express its will in a referendum or plebiscite.\textsuperscript{22} Accordingly, in order to democratically address a secessionist dispute, the first step would consist in determining in which portion of the territory the referendum should be held and who would be accorded the right to vote.\textsuperscript{23} With very limited exceptions, there is a complete overlap between the territorial unit and the historical tradition that links a given group to the territory. These two dimensions—tradition and territory—preexist consensus, as the territory can only be defined as the area that has been traditionally occupied by a group of people, which has the right to continue occupying it and, as a consequence, to express its will in the referendum regarding secession. If tradition preexists consensus, secession cannot be justified entirely on the basis of democracy, but must be bolstered by other, pre-democratic elements, such as the historical link between a group and the territory it inhabits. Groups that traditionally inhabit a clustered territory and that express a will to secede are, in the overwhelming majority of cases, ethnic or cultural minorities. Hence, in practice, in the overwhelming majority of cases, the right to secede ends up by being granted mainly on the basis of nationality.

Remedial Right Theories of Secession, unlike national self-determination and choice-theories, are built on the premise that secession is not a primary right of all peoples, but rather a remedial right that applies in a restricted number of cases, where certain conditions are met. Just cause theorists, such as Allen Buchanan\textsuperscript{24} and Wayne
Secession and Self-Determination

Norman, assume that a well-functioning, liberal democracy will provide for fair procedures for reaching collective decisions about government policy, and give every individual and every group the right of voice hence obviating any need for a primary right to secede. According to this view, secession should speak to the wrongs suffered by a group thus being justified only if some kind of injustice is present. Injustice can result from a past annexation to which the group has never consented (such as annexation of the Baltic states by the USSR), or from an unfair treatment by the government of the inhabitants of one of the polity's subunits: a lack of protection of their basic rights and security, a failure to safeguard the legitimate political and economic interests of their region, or a persistent discriminatory redistribution. Rainer Bauböck adds to the list of injustices that can justify secession violations of federal agreements and of distinctive collective rights.

Remedial Right Theories also raise a number of problematic questions. The first is the difficulty in defining injustice. It might be hard, for example, to identify the boundary between ‘economic exploitation’ and a redistribution that penalizes certain subunits in acceptable fashion, because, even if the relevant state subunit is charged with bigger economic contributions than others, the ultimate advantages and drawbacks of unity seem more likely to reach a point of balance. Furthermore, one must take into account the advantages, not immediately quantifiable in money terms, that the state's component units enjoy by virtue of belonging to it: cultural life, international image and weight, broader labor market etc. The second, deeper question with remedial right theories, on the other hand, concerns their assumption that the (p. 487) status quo is, in principle, fair. Existing borders, however, are not pre-given; they result from historical processes that can hardly be assumed as being necessarily just.

A variant of the Remedial Right Theory is the ‘territorial interpretation’ of secession offered by Lea Brilmayer. Brilmayer argues that the legitimacy of secession does not depend on certain characteristics that distinguish a given group from a state's majority. Secessionists must demonstrate that justice requires they be granted a right to a given territory:

What matters is not that it is ‘a people’ who are seeking to be free. What matters is that this group—whether a homogeneous ‘people’ or not—has a right to a particular parcel of land, a right that was wrongfully taken from them by a powerful neighbor.

This is, however, a very problematic argument. From a moral standpoint, one does not see how a historically-based claim should be superior to one based on nationality. It is true that there is nothing ‘natural’ and inherently just in today's state borders, but the same is true about past borders. How far can history go in providing a just cause for secession? Moreover, a territorial claim might be ‘just’ for the majority of the members of a given group, but unjust for minorities. In fact, the correspondence between ‘the people at the time of the loss of independence’ and ‘the people now’ may be attenuated by time. Many states unjustly deprived of sovereignty have been the victims of central government policies aimed at weakening their ethnic identity by transplanting ‘colonizers’ of different stock or from the dominant nation (as in the case of ethnic Russians in the Baltic states), who, in turn, became so rooted in the new territory as to become ‘citizens’ with full rights. Citizens of this type are problematic, however, as they are likely to remain sufficiently tied to their (formerly annexing) state of origin to militate against full independence of their new state of citizenship. In view of this, basing the legitimacy of secession on the existence of a ‘just’ territorial claim, is often likely to advantage ethnic majorities within sub-state units, and, thus, to lead to the same shortcomings present in both national self-determination and in choice theories of secession.

III. Secession and Self-Determination in International Law and in the International Practice

In international law, self-determination is ‘the freedom for all peoples to decide their political, economic and social regime’. Hence, it is both a collective right of peoples autonomously to decide the course of their national life and to equally divide power, and a right of all individuals freely and fully to participate to the political process. Moreover, self-determination combines elements of nationalism and of democracy: peoples may invoke the right to self-determination either in order to secede from a state and give birth to a new one; or, in order to achieve other aims, such as to make internal coercion cease, to overturn the state government, or to establish autonomous regimes within the sub-state units. International law, (p. 488) and the practice of the international community, have never provided coherent guidance to respond to the tensions between these different dimensions (collective/individual and democratic/nationalistic) of self-determination. In particular, neither international law nor international practice have ever produced an agreed-upon definition of the characteristics a ‘people’ should have to warrant the right to the ‘external’ or nationalistic dimension of self-determination, or, in other words, the right to secede.

‘Self-determination’ entered the international scene in the early twentieth century, with the advent of the First World War and the Bolshevik Revolution.\(^{31}\) According to Lenin, self-determination was a general criterion for the liberation of oppressed peoples, which, in turn, should contribute to the success of the socialist revolution. In Lenin’s view, however, the socialist cause always took priority over the principle of self-determination, which Lenin championed only strategically, insofar as it furthered class struggle.\(^{32}\) US President Woodrow Wilson, on the other hand, viewed self-determination primarily as a corollary to popular sovereignty, and thus as the right of peoples freely to choose their government. Domestically, this translated into ‘self-government’; externally, Wilson understood self-determination as the criterion best suited to govern territorial changes, and, in particular, the division of the Ottoman and Austro-Hungarian Empires. Wilson also advocated the use of self-determination as a guiding principle in settling colonial disputes, but thought that self-determination had to be reconciled with the interests of the colonial powers.\(^{33}\)

The Wilsonian ideals prevailed in the post-First World War settlement, when the ‘peoples’ entitled to statehood were identified, at least in principle, in all national or ethnic communities. Wilson recognized the right of national/ethnic groups to form states on the territories they inhabited, without relying on existing borders, and explicitly rejected subordination of such groups’ interests to territorial concerns.\(^{34}\) In practice, however, the impossibility to found nation-states for all nationalities and to found ethnically homogeneous nation-states in the territories of former multiethnic empires, obliged the Allies to address the nationality problem also in terms of minority rights. This was done in drawing up the Covenant of the League of Nations and the treaties on minorities. The League system did not, however, provide a minimum standard of protection for all European minorities, since obligations were imposed only on the newly-independent states, and not on Allied and associated states and not even on Germany. In practice only the new states were obliged to limit their newly awarded sovereignty by accepting minority clauses imposed by the Great Powers, as a condition for recognition of their new boundaries. Minority protection represented therefore a limitation of self-determination for the new states and was connected to the rise of expansionist and irredentist nationalism.

The League of Nations was confronted directly with the issue of secession in the Åland Islands case. The Council of the League adopted the view that self-determination was not a positive rule under international law, and, that, in particular, ‘national groups’ did not have a right to unilateral secession.\(^{35}\) The League did not, however, completely rule out the possibility (p. 489) of secession. The dispute, in fact, was settled by obliging Finland to increase the guarantees granted to the Islands. In the event that Finland refused to grant the Åland population such guarantees, the League would have supported the separation of the Islands from Finland.\(^{36}\) Thus, the League, constructed self-determination as strictly intertwined with territorial autonomy and minority rights, and conceptualized secession as a de facto remedial right.

After the Second World War, a new universal and individualistic conception of human rights prevailed. In comparison with the post-First World War period, the minority problem was significantly less dramatic, thanks to the various transfers of populations that had occurred, and to the changing of international boundaries. Moreover, the atmosphere in Europe had changed. The fight for independence carried out by various national minorities had been a prominent factor in the First World War, which from its start, involved the rights of small nationalities, such as Serbia and Belgium. Thus, collective minority rights fell into disfavor, as they were seen as a threat to peace. Neither the UN Charter nor the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948, explicitly protects the rights of minorities. The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) of 1966 contains in Article 27 a clause on minority protection that is very limited in scope and structured in strictly individual terms. The ICCPR, however, also contains Article 1, according to which, ‘All peoples have the right of self-determination’, by virtue of which they ‘freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development’. The ICCPR does not contain a definition of these two categories. However, in the discussion which took place within the Commission for Human Rights, the majority of state delegates agreed that minority rights should not be interpreted as authorizing any group which inhabits a portion of a state territory to constitute communities capable of jeopardizing national unity or security.\(^{37}\) Thus, minorities, regardless of their defining characteristics, lack a right to self-determination. However, the very fact that the states felt the need specifically to address this issue reveals that they were keenly aware of the tenuous basis for the different treatment of the two above-mentioned categories.
Secession and Self-Determination

The Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe of 1975 contains a similar dichotomy. On the one hand, it affirms the right of all peoples to self-determination in particularly wide terms, that encompass all of its dimensions, including the external and nationalistic ones. The Act does not define who the ‘peoples’ are, but since the state parties are exclusively European, the term cannot be taken to refer to ‘colonial peoples’. Moreover, according to the Act, ‘The participating States will respect the equal rights of peoples and their right to self-determination’, which suggests that the ‘peoples’ may not necessary coincide with each state’s constitutionally determined people. Given all this, the only possible category of European people to whom self-determination might apply are subnational ones, that is, national minorities. The Act, however, seems to exclude minorities from the right to self-determination, as it refers to the rights of peoples belonging to national minorities, in terms that are very close to those of Article 7 of the ICCPR. The Helsinki Act does not make any definitional attempt to clarify what features make minorities different from peoples and exclude them from the right to self-determination.

Thus, in the post-Second World War international law system, self-determination was constructed as a right of all peoples, which had not been the case in the League of Nations era. However, the ambiguity regarding its beneficiaries and the strong disfavor regarding secession (p. 490) that emerged in international practice, neutralized the potential of self-determination, turning it in little more than a chimera. The right to external self-determination was granted solely to ‘peoples’ under colonial rule who could not be defined in ethnic or national terms, but, rather in political and territorial ones, as the political majorities formed by the multiethnic peoples under colonial rule. The latter were considered as a unity together with the territories which the colonial powers had delimited. This clashed with the individual dimension of self-determination, according to which each individual may decide to which polity s/he wants to belong to, as well as with the nationalistic dimension of self-determination, as the de-colonization process did not take into account the desires of ethnic or national groups. Many boundaries were changed under the aegis of the UN, without consulting the (individual and collective) peoples directly affected by such changes. Think, among many other cases, of Rwanda, Burundi, British Cameroun, the federation of Ethiopia and Eritrea, and Palestine.

For non-colonial ‘peoples’, the right of ‘all peoples’ to self-determination was conceived in ‘domestic’ terms, emphasizing its ‘democratic’ rather than its ‘nationalistic’ dimension. Conservative international principles prevailed over the right to secede: the ones barring intervention in the internal affairs of states, with its obvious corollary, the inviolability of frontiers; and the threat or use of force against their territorial integrity and political independence. States, thus, are supposed to meet the obligations associated with the right to self-determination of all peoples, of whatever size or nature, by safeguarding their linguistic, ethnic, and cultural heritage and guaranteeing both their enjoyment of fundamental rights and the possibility of access to government on an equal footing with the rest of the population. Such access to government is not shaped as a group right to political participation. The right to self-determination, rather, protects the individuals that compose the minority groups, which should not be excluded from political participation, for example by being denied the right to vote. Only where such guarantees are absent or gravely limited can the right to self-determination become specified as the right to secede: that is, where a people is subjugated in violation of international law, it must be able to regain freedom by constituting itself as an independent and sovereign state.

Between 1947 and 1991, secession occurred only in the case of Bangladesh, as international law viewed state boundaries as permanent features of the international state system and the practice of states and the United Nations prevented the ‘external’ or nationalistic dimension of the right to self-determination from going outside the boundaries of the colonial world. Moreover, even in the colonial context, territorial changes were contingent on assessments of appropriateness and acceptability by the ‘great powers’. For example, the attempted secession of Katanga from the Congo was initially considered of merely internal relevance and hence coming under the principle of non-intervention on the postulate that the United Nations had the object of maintaining the territorial integrity and political independence of the Congo. With the danger of secession over, the Secretary-General declared that the UN ‘has never accepted, does not accept, and ... will never accept a principle of secession from a Member State’. Similarly, the uprising of the Ibo minority in Biafra, coupled with an accusation of genocide by the Nigerian government before the United Nations led to no international intervention, on the postulate—a cavil—that since no party had invoked the Security Council, such intervention would not be possible, as well as on the principle of the inviolability of the sovereign independence of member states. The United Nations did not even oppose the unilateral abolition by Ethiopia of the status of federated region awarded to Eritrea in 1952 based on a recommendation by the General Assembly or the military support that Addis Ababa was receiving from... the USSR and Cuba.

A dramatic change occurred with the end of the Cold War, the break-up of the socialist federations, and the ‘ethnic revival’ that rapidly spread around the world. The emergence of democracy as a legal obligation of states now permits the international community to concern itself with both the procedure and substance of ‘democratic’ decisions concerning ethno-cultural groups. As a consequence, minority rights, self-determination, and secession have regained a central position in the international arena.

Post-1989 democratization has often exacerbated ethnic conflicts. If democracy is not understood simply as majority rule, cultural conflicts in democratic states must be resolved in a way that is either acceptable, or defensible in relation, to all citizens and groups. However, in many formerly authoritarian societies, democracy has been structured as ‘majoritarianism with elections’, which turns into disadvantage for the losers. In the long run, constitutionalism-related principles and institutions, including the protection of fundamental rights, will possibly ameliorate the risks inherent in rapid democratization. These, however, are processes that require time, whereas the adoption of the ‘majoritarianism with election’ model has quickly spread in many multiethnic societies, where democracy without liberalism has often turned borders into a ‘trap for the losers’.

After a long period during which the borders of European states had remained strictly stable, the collapse of Yugoslavia and the USSR posed the problem of recognition of new states in dramatic terms. The European Union developed its ‘Guidelines on the Recognition of New States in Eastern Europe and in the Soviet Union’, which stipulated that, inter alia, democracy, the rule of law, human rights, the rights of minorities, and a commitment to respect the inviolability of frontiers and to peaceful settlement of disputes were all necessary criteria for state recognition. The United States produces analogous policy documents. These guidelines never developed into binding international provisions. In particular, it should be noticed that the European system does not provide for universal standards of minority protection. West European states are free to protect or not to protect minorities, as long as they comply with the principle of non-discrimination. In France, for example, the Constitutional Council declared the European Charter of Regional Languages not consistent with the French Constitution because it confers ‘specific rights to those speaking regional or minority languages within the territories in which such languages are spoken’. Thus, one can say that the post-Cold War situation shows certain analogies with the post-First World War settlement, with the Great Powers imposing minority protection on newborn states in order to contain their expansionist and irredentist nationalism. Once again, minority protection has come to represent a limitation of self-determination for the new states and has become connected with the preservation of regional stability.

On the other hand, the development of these additional and unorthodox criteria for state recognition, enriched and expanded the significance of self-determination and secession. During the whole of the nineteenth century and the first part of the twentieth, the ‘great nations’ were seen as the engines of historical development, while smaller, less-developed nations could progress only by abandoning their national character and permitting their assimilation into one of the great nations. In the post-Cold War period, however, new states have been required, as a condition of recognition, to acknowledge and protect ethnic and national pluralism. This testifies to a more elastic conception of the rights of minority groups, because it postulates a close connection between freedom and equality, and without denying the primarily individual dimension of human rights, it recognizes the role that groups play in the formation and recognition of individual identity. This conception is reflected in the opinions rendered by the Arbitration Commission of the Conference on Yugoslavia (‘Badinter Commission’). According to the Commission, by virtue of self-determination, ‘each human entity might indicate his or her belonging to the community ... of his or her choice’. This means that each individual can call upon the right to self-determination to choose the group to which she decides to belong. In the specific context of former Yugoslavia, this translated in the duty of the states concerned to accord to Serbs in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia, if they so desired, the nationality of their choice (most likely, Serbian nationality). This seems to suggest that the Commission recognized the existence of a distinction between ‘nationality’ and ‘citizenship’ similar to that provided in the Treaty on European Union signed in Maastricht. Moreover, the Badinter Commission placed much emphasis on the democracy of the process leading to independence, requiring that referenda be held as a condition for recognition.

The tendency to legitimize secession under certain procedural and substantive conditions has been confirmed in the more recent cases of Montenegro and Kosovo. In 2003, the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia converted into the State Union of Serbia and Montenegro. Despite its formal domestic nature, the conversion was strongly promoted... by the EU. The Constitutional Charter was adopted following the procedure prescribed by the 1992 Constitution, without any formal break of constitutional continuity. Article 60 of the new Constitution contained a secession clause which provided that upon the expiry of a three-year period, a member state has the right to initiate the withdrawing procedure. Such a decision had to be made after a referendum had been held. The referendum was dependent on an Act on Referendum that had to be passed by a member state. Hence the member state controlled the organization of the referendum, but under the condition that recognized democratic standards were taken into account. In other words, it was agreed that one member state could unilaterally withdraw from the Union, following strict procedural rules. The European Union legitimized the new Constitution of 2003, and, later, the secessionist process of 2006. Under rules proposed by the European Union and approved by Montenegro's Parliament, a 55 percent majority was needed to mandate secession, in order to guarantee the participation of all groups, and particularly of the Serbian minority (30 percent of the population). Montenegro did not experience any difficulty in obtaining international recognition.

(p. 493) Kosovo unilaterally declared its independence from the Republic of Serbia on February 17, 2008. For almost a decade, Kosovo had been administered by a UN provisional authority, the United Nations Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK). Prior to 2008, the Kosovar representatives together with the Serbian leadership and UN and EU representatives, had tried to negotiated the future of Kosovo on several occasions, without ever reaching consensus. The 2008 declaration of independence affirms that it ‘fully accepts’ the UN Secretary-General special envoy's Kosovo Status Settlement. These include respect for the principle of democracy, the rule of law, and fundamental rights of individuals and minorities. The Kosovar representatives, thus, alongside their Montenegrin counterparts, seemed to be aware that respect for democracy and minority protection can ensure a smoother secessionist process, and, thus, implicitly, to acknowledge the legitimacy of the involvement of the international community in the elaboration of the constitutional framework of the newborn state. The Kosovar unilateral declaration of independence was judged not in violation of international law by the International Court of Justice, which implicitly suggests the legitimacy of a democratic and ‘gradual’ secessionist process, heavily involving regional and/or international authorities.

While some scholars fear that tolerating such a process will turn UN-led administrations into ‘nothing but a road towards secession’, others justify the secession of Kosovo as a case of ‘earner sovereignty’. Under the ‘earner sovereignty’ approach, a breakaway entity does not merit recognition as a new state immediately after its separation or quest to separate from its mother state. Instead, such an entity needs to earn its sovereignty, demonstrating that it is capable of functioning as an independent state, and that it would be a reliable sovereign partner for the international community of states.

In any case, undeniably, the post-Cold War attitude towards secession suggests that international law and the practice of the international community is gradually moving towards the legitimation of the ‘secessionist option’, albeit only if it is compatible with democracy, and with a pluralistic understanding of citizenship, and if it is gives enough guarantees that it will not undermine geopolitical equilibria.

IV. Secession and the Constitution

‘Secession’ derives from the Latin verb secedere, which refers to the action of separating or moving away from something. In ancient Roman times, the word did not have a territorial connotation: individuals and groups could secedere from their community for a variety of reasons, including political ones, as in the secession of the Plebeians who went to the Sacred Mountain in 494 BC.

(p. 494) The conceptualization of secession as a specific kind of political action was developed in Johannes Althusius’ Politica (1643). For Althusius, political order was rooted in social bonds and duties. Sovereignty resulted from the symbiotic relation among independent social orders, which delegate authority to a higher social unity. Althusius’ construction was an embryonic modern federative polity, based on consent. Consent was not conceived by Althusius as requiring unanimity. Moreover, whereas social contract theorists, such as Hobbes, posit that once the sovereignty of individual wills is transferred to the sovereign office it cannot be recalled, in Althusius’ Politica each social unit remains free legally to secede from the higher social unit to which it has delegated authority.

It was only in connection with the American Civil War that secession acquired a clear territorial dimension and the modern discourse on secession was launched. This new discourse called into question the relationship between federal power and states’ rights, the nature of the federal constitution, and the very notion of sovereignty. It resulted in a political demonization of secession, and in its being construed as incompatible with constitutionalism.

The heritage of the American Civil War has deeply influenced the subsequent discussion surrounding secession. Liberal federations have been reluctant to enshrine a secession clause in the Constitution, for a variety of reasons. One of these is the potential strategic use that can be made of it, either by the state or by its subunits. In periods of nation-building, the central government might use the secession clause as a blandishment to entice its subunits and/or other independents states that it aims as annexing. The secession clause may be a crucial tool in this process, because existing subunits and new states rely on it and accept the limitation of their sovereignty, given the assurance that they will be able to regain it. In other words, the central government uses the secession clause as an enticement to subunits or other independent states to accept annexation. The latter, as long as they can count on a future option to withdraw, are more amenable to transferring powers to the central government or to joining a federation. Once the central power has achieved its objectives and consolidated its power, however, the secession clause typically either disappears or becomes a dead letter. The 1931 Constitution of the Chinese Soviet Republic (a date when the Communist Party did not control the whole national territory) recognized ‘the right of the national minorities to self-determination … going as far as the formation of an independent State for each of them’, specifying that minorities ‘may join the Union of Chinese Soviets or secede from it and form a sovereign State’. After the Communists consolidated their control over the mainland and subjugated neighboring territories such as Tibet, the secession clause found in their constitution disappeared. Consistent with that, Article 4 of the 1975 Constitution stated that ‘The Chinese People's Republic is a unitary multinational State. The areas having regional autonomy are inalienable parts of the Republic.’ The charter of the Soviet Union had similarly constitutionalized the right of secession. Recognition of this right, in Lenin’s opinion, in no way led to the ‘formation of small States, but to the enlargement of the bigger ones—a phenomenon more advantageous for the masses and for the development of the economy.’ The Constitution of Burma of 1974 also contained a secession clause, but no one had any illusions concerning it ever being put into actual use. Analogously, the guarantee of the right of secession in the Ethiopian Constitution of 1994 seems largely motivated by the desire to strengthen cohesion by dissuading the component subunits of the state from following the example of Eritrea.

The federation’s subunits may also take advantage of the right to secede in order to seek gains having little to do with secession. For example, in the United States in the 1860s, in order to strengthen the constitutional position of the South, many statesmen advocated the extreme position of temporary separation from the North … A.H. Handy, [Secession] Commissioner from Mississippi, in urging the Governor of Maryland to take steps towards separation, defended his position on these grounds: ‘Secession is not intended to break up the present government, but to perpetuate it … we go out for the purpose of getting further guarantees and security for our rights … our plan is for the Southern States to withdraw from the Union for the present, to allow amendments to the Constitution to be made, guaranteeing our just rights.

The democracy and transparency of decision-making processes may be undermined when the right of secession is exploited by the most populous or richest subunits, taking advantage of their greater bargaining power to put forward non-negotiable demands in search of immediate gains instead of compromise solutions, to the detriment of the national interest. In such cases cooperation between the state’s various component parts is replaced by forms of autonomous development, reducing the level of interdependence among the subunits.

Arguing against the constitutionalization of the right to secede on the basis of its potential strategic uses raises an important objection. The absence of a secession clause does not necessary prevent stronger subunits from achieving an excessively strong bargaining position, through the strategic use of the secessionist threat, simply because everyone is aware that secession can (and in most cases actually does) occur regardless of its legal legitimacy. Moreover, the legal impossibility to secede is more likely to turn the relationship between separatist subunits and the central government into a tug of war and encourage the use of violence. On the other hand, a clause which subjects secession to strict procedural conditions is likely to encourage subunits to cooperate and to compromise. Hence, secession need not play into the hands of richer or stronger subunits. To the contrary, as Daniel Weinstock puts it, a constitutional secession clause forces secessionists to make ‘a cold and lucid cost/benefit analysis’ of withdrawing versus remaining in the existing federation, that is, to consider seriously the legal obstacles that they must overcome before they can successfully secede.\textsuperscript{60}

A more convincing objection to the constitutionalization of secession is that the latter might not provide a stable solution to ethnic conflict while actually worsening the situation of sub-minorities.\textsuperscript{61} Most secessionist attempts are motivated by the will of subnational groups to form their own state. Subnational units, however, are almost never completely ethnically homogeneous: in Kosovo, for example, there are Serbian enclaves, in Quebec there are Anglophones and aboriginal minorities etc. In the event of a secession, trapped minorities are excluded from the body that confers legitimacy on the new state, and thus risk becoming ‘second-class’ citizens. For example, the Preamble to the Croatian Constitution of 1990 states that: \textsuperscript{(p. 496)}

\begin{quote}
Proceeding from … the inalienable, indivisible, nontransferable and inexpendable right of the Croatian nation to self-determination and state sovereignty, the Republic of Croatia is … established as the national state of the Croatian people and a state of members of other nations and minorities who are its citizens.
\end{quote}

In other words, Croatia is the state of a collective subject (the Croatian people) entitled to statehood, and of some individuals that do not belong to it.

One should caution, however, against uncritically assuming that secession is always harmful to trapped minorities, or, at least, that it is more harmful than intra-state autonomy. Secession empowers minorities to achieve the ultimate, but certainly not the only, means of political separation. Other modalities of political separation implemented to protect and promote subnational groups’ rights might have similar, or worse, consequences on trapped minorities than does secession. Strong, territorially concentrated subnationalities are often granted a high degree of cultural and political autonomy, which confines the role of states to the setting of basic principles and excludes their interference in decision-making processes that are critical in the development of the national life of the minority. Quebec and Flanders are examples of highly homogeneous self-governing territorial subunits, where the strict application of linguistic territoriality, while undoubtedly effective in protecting the regional majority, results in systematic interference with the cultural and linguistic rights of the individuals and groups that do not belong to the dominant ethnos. In such cases, minority protection has been conceived in ‘ethnocentric’ rather than ‘multicultural’ terms, because it has encouraged minorities to separately develop their national lives and to overemphasize their diversity as against the rest of the state’s population. In deeply divided federations, such as Belgium and Canada, but also in regional contexts (eg Catalonia and South Tyrol), the state subunits ironically end up reproducing in a reduced scale a French-style state exhibiting rigorous neutrality regarding group based differences. Trapped minorities such as Francophones in Flanders, end up being stuck in strictly monolingual subunits within their multinational states. It is true that at the federal level all languages and groups enjoy an equal status; at the local level, however, minorities are not only not protected, but not even legally defined as such. In other words, state protection does not apply to trapped minorities because the very ‘multinational formula’ rejects the notion of minority and promotes federal equality among all national groups. International protection does not apply to trapped minorities either, because, as the Human Rights Committee admitted in a case concerning the status of Anglophones in Quebec, ‘the minorities referred to in article 27 [of the ICCPR] are minorities within … a State, and not minorities within any province’\textsuperscript{62} In the event of secession, however, trapped minorities within a sub-state unit will be elevated to the status of national minorities within a sovereign state. This could give them more visibility, and set the premises for a wider recognition of their rights. This is particularly true in the European context, where, as pointed out in Section II, the recognition of emerging states has been conditioned upon, inter alia, the guarantee that minorities will be effectively protected in the newborn state. Moreover, ‘balkanization’ must be considered jointly with the European integration process: integrating into a super-constitutional entity with democratic features might counterbalance the birth of mono-national states as a consequence of secessions.

The most challenging objection to the constitutionalization of the right to secede, is that secession is incompatible with the very nature of the constitution, because it suggests that the \textsuperscript{(p. 497)} sub-state units posses a form of ‘quiescent’ sovereignty, which runs counter the understanding of sovereignty as the monopoly of the state. A secession clause contributes to the perception that a constitution, in the language of secessionist South Carolina Senator John C. Calhoun, is a ‘compact between’ states rather than ‘a Constitution over them’.\textsuperscript{63} The idea that the constitution could be viewed as a compact was brought to bear in the United States in the 1860s by Lewis M. Stone, precisely in ‘the hope of developing stronger constitutional arguments for secession’.\textsuperscript{64} Stone, who represented Pickens County to the state convention that Alabama convened in 1861 to discuss secession, started from the fundamental premise of state sovereignty and derived two concepts of the nature of the union depending upon the character of the Constitution: the international-law concept and the business partnership concept. Under the first, the Constitution became a treaty, under the second, a compact; and in either case the right of secession was equally legitimate.65

The US Supreme Court rejected both doctrines in Texas v White, in 1869, insisting that the Constitution was ordained “to form a more perfect Union. It is difficult to convey the idea of indissoluble unity more clearly than by these words. What can be indissoluble if a perpetual Union, made more perfect, is not?”66 Thus, a state could not claim a right to withdraw from the Union:

The act which consummated her admission into the Union was something more than a compact; it was the incorporation of a new member into the political body. And it was final. ... There was no place for reconsideration or revocation, except through revolution or through consent of the States.

Over a century later, in 1998, the Canadian Supreme Court adopted a radically different approach in the advisory opinion it rendered concerning certain questions relating to the unilateral secession of Quebec from Canada.67 ‘The Constitution—according to the Canadian Supreme Court—is not a straitjacket’. Hence, ‘the continued existence and operation of the Canadian constitutional order could not be indifferent to a clear expression of a clear majority of Quebeckers that they no longer wish to remain in Canada.’68 The Canadian Court did not legitimize an unconditional unilateral right to secede. It did however affirm the legitimacy of a negotiated secession. According to the Court, a referendum unambiguously demonstrating the desire of a clear majority of Quebeckers to secede from Canada, would give rise to a reciprocal obligations of all parties of the Confederation to negotiate secession. Such negotiations should be conducted on the basis of the principles which constitute the core of the Canadian constitution: democracy, the rule of law, federalism, and respect for (trapped) minorities. Accordingly, considerable weight should be given to any expression by a clear majority of Quebeckers of a common desire to secede, but any ensuing requisite negotiations with a view to secession would depend on reconciliation of the rights and obligations of various principal affected parties: the federal government, Quebec, Canada's remaining provinces, and minority groups that would be significantly impacted by secession.

(p. 498) Between 1869, when the US Supreme Court ruled out categorically the very possibility of secession, and 1998, when the Canadian Court legitimized a democratic secession process, the conceptualization of federalism and the actual implementation of federal models had changed dramatically. In an inversion of the historical tendency that saw federalism emerge from a process of unification, today the formula of political decentralization is mostly used to divide, that is, to contain centrifugal tendencies, by providing subnational groups a high degree of autonomy.69 In sum, most federal constitutions today are not ordained to form ‘a more perfect Union’, but, rather, to loosen the ties to a union that has become unbearable to many. Thus, the idea that constitutions do not necessarily look to ‘indestructible unions’70 and that they may contain international (or confederal) elements seems to re-emerge in contemporary constitutionalism. In fact, comparative analysis shows that there is an increasing number of ‘borderline constitutions’ that combine federal and confederal features. The most striking case is the Belgian Constitution,71 which does not even contain a supremacy clause for federal sources of law. At the end of a long federalizing process, we find—lying at the core of the Belgian state and serving as the basis of its functioning at all levels—its two largest linguistic communities. The federal government must always decide by consensus. In the federal parliament, the agreement between the two linguistic groups is always necessary, as each may block the legislative procedure in all ‘sensitive’ matters and veto constitutional reforms. At all levels and for all purposes, the federal system is based on a necessary consensus between Flemish and francophone Belgians. The structural risks of this system are legislative paralysis and political deadlock: after the general elections of December 2010, Belgium was not able to form a government for over 400 days, beating all world records. There are other instances of constitutions that contain ‘special regimes’ that come close to enshrining sovereign rights for certain minorities, including the ‘override clause’ in Canada72 and the right of ‘interposition’ granted to the Finnish Åland archipelago.73 These kinds of arrangements may be considered as a ‘middle ground’ between independence and integration and a way by which minorities may exercise their right to self-determination.74 Sub-state entities, moreover, play an increasing role in regional organizations such as the EU and the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe.

(p. 499) In contemporary constitutional systems, there is not necessarily a strict dichotomy between constitutional and confederal elements. Hence, constitutions survive with internal contradictions or, put differently, with elements that originate in the logic of both constitutional and international law. This may produce a certain degree of fluidity, which can actually be a precondition for the system's working, especially in deeply divided societies. After all, the EU's experience shows how problematic it is to draw a clear line between an international treaty and a federal constitution. Analogously, domestic constitutions may ‘import’ confederal (international) elements that prove critical for their functioning. A secession clause may be one such element.

The Canadian Court upheld the right to secede combining elements of both national self-determination as well as of choice theories of secession, and adding a further element to the construction. The existence of a national community, that traditionally inhabits a clustered territory, and the rules of democracy (expressed in a referendum), in fact, are not sufficient alone to legitimize the right to secede, because secession must be negotiated according to substantive values. On the other hand, the Court clearly rejected remedial right theories of secession, as Quebec cannot claim to have been subject to past or present injustice.

The Court pointed to another important issue: the difference between the international right to self-determination and the constitutional right to secession. The Court correctly affirmed that the right to external self-determination was manifestly inapplicable to Quebec. Secession, however, according to the Court, cannot only be governed by the international right to self-determination, which does not apply in non-colonial and democratic contexts. This does not exclude the role of the international community in secessionist processes. However, the international community, in order to decide the legitimacy of a given secession, must refer to domestic law. In the case of Canada, the legitimacy of secession springs from the negotiated character of secession, as well as from respect for substantive constitutional values. Hence, while it is true that secession is conceivable, even if it were conducted outside the constitutional framework, a breach of the latter would entail ‘serious legal repercussions’, both at the domestic political level, as well as at the international level. On the other hand, the community of nations would be more likely to recognize a sovereign Quebec born of negotiations conducted in conformity with constitutional principles and values, also in the light of the emphasis placed on analogous principles and values by the most recent criteria developed in Europe on the recognition of new states.

Finally, the Canadian Court's decision successfully strikes a balance between the political and legal dimensions of secession. The Court describes secession as ‘a legal act as much as a political one’, limiting its role to the ‘identification of the relevant aspects of the Constitution’, while subjecting the ‘political aspects of constitutional negotiations’ ‘only to political evaluations’. However, the non-justiciability of the political aspects of secession ‘would not deprive the surrounding constitutional framework of its binding status’. In other words, constitutional law has an important role to play in secessionist disputes: without intruding in the political process, it can set the rules to channel an inevitably conflict-provoking process, often loaded with emotion and irrationality, to rules of democratic logic.

Bibliography

Allen Buchanan, Secession: The Legitimacy of Political Divorce From Fort Sumter to Lithuania and Quebec (1991)
Lee C. Buchheit, Secession-The Legitimacy of Self-Determination (1978)
Antonio Cassese, Self-Determination of Peoples: A Legal Reappraisal (1999)
Don H. Doyle (ed), Secession as an International Phenomenon: From America’s Civil War to Contemporary Separatist Movements (2011)
Seccion and Self-Determination

Margaret Moore (ed), National Self-determination and Secession (1998)

Wayne Norman, ‘The Ethics of Secession as the Regulation of Secessionist Politics’ in Margaret Moore (ed), National Self-determination and Secession (1998)

Notes:

(*) Parts of Section III and Section IV of this chapter draw on my article ‘Rethinking the Boundaries of Democratic Secession: Liberalism, Nationalism and the Right of Minorities to Self-Determination’ (2008) 6 International Journal of Constitutional Law 553.

(1) On sovereignty, see Chapter 17.

(3) On citizenship, see Chapter 48.

(8) On democracy, see further Chapter 11.

(10) Miller (n 6), 112.
Secession and Self-Determination

(15) Ibid 23.

(16) These include: being large enough to assume the responsibility of statehood, being able to guarantee the rights of trapped minorities, inhabiting a territory that will not form an enclave within the existing state, that is not culturally, economically, or military essential to the existing state, and that does not have a disproportionately high share of the economic resources of the existing state: Beran (n 14).

(17) Wellman (n 12), 34ff.

(20) Margaret Moore, The Ethics of Nationalism (2001), 172.

(21) Buchanan (n 18), 52.

(22) On referendum generally, see Chapter 24.

(23) Margiotta (n 11), 232.

(31) Prior to that, the principle of self-determination had already emerged in the American Declaration of Independence of 1776 and in the French Revolution of 1789, as a key component of the principle according to which the government should be responsible to the people. See Antonio Cassese, Self-Determination of Peoples: A Legal Reappraisal (1999), 5ff.

(32) Ibid 18.

(33) Ibid 19.

Report of the International Committee of Jurists entrusted by the Council of the League of Nations with the task of giving an advisory opinion upon the legal aspects of the Aaland Islands question, League of Nations, Official Journal Special Supplement No 3, October 1920, 5.

16 UN ECOSOC, Supp 8, p 7, para 54, UN Doc E/2447, 1953. On socio-economic and economic rights, see Chapters 49 and 50.

Waters (n 4).

Ibid.

To be found in (1992) 31 ILM 1486–7.

The Arbitration Commission of the Conference on Yugoslavia (‘Badinter Commission’) was set up by the EEC Council of Ministers on August 27, 1991 to provide the Conference on Yugoslavia with legal advice. The Commission has handed down 15 opinions on ‘major legal questions’ which have arisen from the split of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. The text of the first ten opinions of the Commission was published in the European Journal of International Law. Opinions 1 to 3 are reproduced in (1992) 3 European Journal of International Law 182ff; Opinions 4 to 10 are reproduced in (1993) 4 European Journal of International Law 74ff.

Accordance with international law of the unilateral declaration of independence in respect of Kosovo (Request for Advisory Opinion), Advisory Opinion (‘Kosovo Opinion’).

A similar pattern was followed in the case of East Timor. In 1999, the East Timorese people voted in a UN-organized referendum to separate from Indonesia. Indonesia protested the referendum results and backed violent militias to attack and intimidate the East Timorese population. The UN Security Council, in Resolution 1264, established a peacekeeping force, the International Force for East Timor, to safeguard East Timor. East Timor was then administered by the United Nations, with substantial support from other countries, until it became a sovereign state on May 20, 2002.

International Court of Justice, CR 2009/24, 60 (Zimmermann).

Secession and Self-Determination of International Law and Policy 355.

(55) Margiotta (n 11), 57.

(56) The 1983 Constitution of the Federation of St Kitts and Nevis, contains a provision on the ‘Secession of Nevis’ at Art 115, according to which ‘If, by virtue of a law enacted by the Nevis Island Legislature under section 113(1), the island of Nevis ceases to be federated with the island of Saint Christopher, the provisions of schedule 3 shall forthwith have effect.’

(58) Vladimir. I. Lenin, Prosvestcenie, n 4, 5, 6, April-June 1914, quoted by Buchheit (n 57), 122.

(64) Carpenter (n 59), 207.

(65) Ibid.

(66) Texas v White 74 US 700, 726 (1869).

(68) Ibid 151.

(69) On federalism, see Chapter 27.

(70) Texas v White (n 66).

(72) Article 33 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms enables provincial and federal legislatures to override by ordinary majority the rights contained in the Charter for a renewable period of five years. Formally, this clause is applicable to all provinces. However, ‘a constitutional convention seems to have arisen ... that the override provision should not be used at all’ either by the federal Parliament or by any of the provinces, with the exception of Quebec. The legislature of Quebec, two months after the enactment of the Charter, in response to adoption of the latter without its consent, passed Bill 62, which basically immunized it as far as possible against the constitutionalized Charter. This bill repealed and re-enacted all of the province’s pre-Charter legislation with the addition of an override clause to each (the ‘omnibus’ feature) automatically added such a standard override clause into all new legislation, and ‘gave the override clause a retroactive effect’. The Supreme Court later invalidated the retroactive effect but upheld the preemptive use of the override ‘by interpreting Section 33 as containing only minimal formal requirement ... and therefore as providing only very limited scope for judicial review of exercise under it’: Stephen Gardbaum, ‘The New Commonwealth Model of Constitutionalism’ (2001) 49 American Journal of Comparative Law 707.

(73) State acts that relate to the principles governing real or business property in Åland and international treaties pertaining to matters within the competence of Åland shall not enter into force in the islands without the consent of the local assembly. Act on the Autonomy of Åland, §§28, 59 (1991/1144).

(76) Reference re Secession of Quebec, paras 135, 138. The Constitutional Court of Russia reached analogous conclusions in its Decision No 671 of 13 March 1992 concerning the independence of the Republic of Tatarstan.

(77) Ibid paras 102, 103.

(78) Ibid para 143.

(79) Ibid para 83.

(80) Ibid para 100.

(81) Ibid para 102.

Susanna Mancini

Susanna Mancini is Professor of Law, Law School, University of Bologna and Adjunct Professor of Law, SAIS Johns Hopkins University BC
Abstract and Keywords

The referendum is a classical issue in constitutional law and political science, but its importance in liberal democracies has increased a lot in the recent period. Both its provisions and regulations in constitutions or other legislative texts, and its effective practice, at the national, but most of all subnational level (e.g., state or region), have greatly increased, albeit substantial country differences persist. Before considering these developments of the provisions and the practice of referendums, this article first reviews what most prominent constitutionalists and democratic theorists have said about the referendum. It then considers the question of judicial control, which, following the general trend, has dramatically gained relevance in the specific case of referendums in the past two or three decades.

Keywords: constitutional law, referendums, liberal democracy, judicial control

I. Theory of Referendums

1. The Constitutional Debate S02
2. Referendum and Democracy S05

II. Provisions for Referendums S08

1. Typologies S08
3. Country Variations: Types of Referendums S10

III. Practice S12

1. History S12
2. Practice S13

IV. Judicial Review S14

1. The Juridicization of the Referendum S14
2. Types of Judicial Review S22
3. Country Profiles S23

V. Concluding Remarks S27

The referendum is a device of direct democracy by which the people are asked to vote directly on an issue or policy. It differs from an election, which is a vote to elect persons who will make decisions on behalf of the people, or a recall, by which citizens are given the opportunity to remove from office an elected representative. Although this distinction between issue voting and person voting is apparently clear, it may be questioned, such as when the referendum is, formally or de facto, a vote of confidence or about the accession or permanence in power of a person. This is often the case in authoritarian regimes, but it also happens in democratic contexts (e.g., the use of referendums by de Gaulle in France). Such referendums are often qualified as ‘plebiscites’, although the word, which goes back to ancient Rome, literally means: ‘a law enacted by the common people’ (plebis scitum). Because the plebiscite is commonly regarded as highly manipulative, the term has a negative connotation. The term ‘plebiscite’ is sometimes extended to all government-initiated referendums, especially if ad hoc, insofar as they would automatically trigger a vote of confidence. But the word has also traditionally been used in a more neutral way, to refer to popular votes on sovereignty issues (e.g., the so-called plebiscites (p. 507) proposed by the League of Nations after the First World War to settle boundary disputes). The word ‘referendum’ appeared much later, possibly in sixteenth-century Switzerland, to denote the procedure by which delegates to cantonal assemblies submitted certain issues to their constituents for ratification (ad referendum). Here, I use the word in a general sense, which includes all types of popular votes bearing formally on an issue. I prefer the plural ‘referendums’ (as a Latin gerund ‘referendum’ has no plural), although the form ‘referenda’ is equally accepted by most dictionaries.

The referendum is a classical issue in constitutional law and political science, but its importance in liberal democracies has increased a lot in the recent period. Both its provisions and regulations in constitutions or other legislative texts, and its effective practice, at the national, but most of all subnational level (e.g., state or region), have greatly increased, albeit substantial country differences persist. Before considering these developments of the provisions and the practice of referendums, we will review in the first section what most prominent constitutionalists and democratic theorists have said about the referendum. We will then turn in the final section to the question of judicial control, which, following the general trend, has dramatically gained relevance in the specific case of referendums in the past two or three decades.

I. Theory of Referendums

Most theoretical accounts on referendums belong either to the constitutional debate or to democratic theory. What distinguishes the two debates in a rather precise way is the set of questions raised: while the classical, constitutional, debate questions the issue of the compatibility of the referendum with representative democracy and the extent and modalities of its use, the democratic debate rather focuses on the democratic quality of the referendum and whether its extension could help to improve the quality of contemporary democracies. We will analyse these two debates in succession.

1. The Constitutional Debate

The origins of the constitutional debate on the referendum are often indicated in the two contrasting theories of Rousseau and Montesquieu. While the former regarded popular legislation (or at least legislation ratified by the people) as the only valid form of legislation, the latter clearly stated that the people was competent only to choose its legislators, not to legislate. The actual debate, however, came later as a debate among advocates of representative democracy (the overwhelming majority of political thinkers) discussing whether the referendum could or could not constitute a supplement (not an alternative) to representation. Arguments on both sides mixed theoretical and practical considerations. According to the authors of the Federalist, who neither introduced provisions for referendums in the US Constitution nor submitted it for approval to the popular people, popular legislation would lead to incompetent decisions and endanger individual liberties through tyranny of the majority. ‘Pure’ representation was not seen as contradicting popular sovereignty since the people could choose its rulers and hold them accountable through re-election. On the opposite side, the Anti-Federalists believed that the principle of popular sovereignty required that the people should as far as possible govern itself and that no check should be placed on popular majorities. A few years later, the French political (p. 503) thinker and delegate of the États-Grands-Savants, articulated a theory of representative government rooted in the concept of national sovereignty, which was more efficient than popular sovereignty in excluding the people—regarded as fully incompetent—from legislation, and inspired generations of French constitutionalists hostile to the referendum. Nonetheless, the principle of the constitutional referendum came about during the revolution, with the solemn declaration of the Convention that ‘il ne peut y avoir de constitution que celle approuvée par le peuple’. The question of the referendum really emerged however one century or more later in the context of strong criticisms against representative government. In the United States, provisions for direct legislation were introduced in many states (especially in the West) under the influence of the Populists, who denounced the corruption of representatives, considered as a prey to the influence of special interests and party machines. In Europe, the debate started in England at the end of the nineteenth century with Dizès’s claim that parliamentary absolutism and the dictatorship of parties were inconsistent with the ‘elective self-governing’ people of the English democratic tradition. The referendum was adopted in the German constitution of 1849, while at that time the French Third Republic. However, the French Third Republic.

To a large extent this classical debate became obsolete after the Second World War, as the legitimacy of the referendum became undisputed, regardless of the fact that the record of its practice in the inter-war period had scored far below the positive expectations of its proponents. The theoretical arguments against the referendum had proved very weak indeed, since the election of representatives, through which the people can de facto influence legislation, is an inherent part of the theory of representative government (be it founded on popular or national sovereignty). On the other side, the practical arguments against the referendum could no longer justify its total exclusion in the context of ‘victorious’ democracy. The contemporary debate was brought among those advocating a very moderate, exceptional, use of the referendum, and those in favour of a more routinized practice. The more recent view, which has been far more common, is well illustrated by Friedrich, who wrote in the 1930 edition of Constitutionalism: The Referendum: Which is the True Way of Representing the People’s Will. He recommended (vainly) popular initiatives to counterweight the ‘absolute parliamentarism’ of the French Third Republic. His defence of the referendum was also inspired by the spreading of direct democracy in post-war European constitutions, about (p. 504), which Minkin-Guetzévitch, in the most article, reported quite critically. The discussion of the Russian constitutionalist focused in particular on a new variety of referendums and popular initiatives aimed at solving conflicts between the executive and the legislative, which could lead to the dissolution of parliament or the revocation of the head of the state. Minkin-Guetzévitch regarded this as contradictory with the trend toward a ‘nationalization’ of parliamentarism, by means of a strengthening of executives, which he worried as the great novelty of these constitutions.

To this extent this classical debate became obsolete after the Second World War, as the legitimacy of the referendum became undisputed, regardless of the fact that the record of its practice in the inter-war period had scored far below the positive expectations of its proponents. The theoretical arguments against the referendum had proved very weak indeed, since the election of representatives, through which the people can de facto influence legislation, is an inherent part of the theory of representative government (be it founded on popular or national sovereignty). On the other side, the practical arguments against the referendum could no longer justify its total exclusion in the context of ‘victorious’ democracy. The contemporary debate was brought among those advocating a very moderate, exceptional, use of the referendum, and those in favour of a more routinized practice. The more recent view, which has been far more common, is well illustrated by Friedrich, who wrote in the 1930 edition of Constitutionalism: The Referendum: Which is the True Way of Representing the People’s Will. He recommended (vainly) popular initiatives to counterweight the ‘absolute parliamentarism’ of the French Third Republic. His defence of the referendum was also inspired by the spreading of direct democracy in post-war European constitutions, about (p. 504), which Minkin-Guetzévitch, in the most article, reported quite critically. The discussion of the Russian constitutionalist focused in particular on a new variety of referendums and popular initiatives aimed at solving conflicts between the executive and the legislative, which could lead to the dissolution of parliament or the revocation of the head of the state. Minkin-Guetzévitch regarded this as contradictory with the trend toward a ‘nationalization’ of parliamentarism, by means of a strengthening of executives, which he worried as the great novelty of these constitutions.

2. Referendum and Democracy

While the constitutional debate is mainly about the possibility to combine direct and representative democracy, democratic theorists rather discuss the referendum as a possible way to improve the quality of democracies, which entails first of all the question of whether it is, or can be, a truly democratic device. From the beginning of the referendum practice, this has been a problematic issue and critics have often pretended that it was a form of government less democratic than representative democracy. Elected officials would be better at producing policies that accurately reflect the will of the majority, because they can aggregate preferences, whereas the referendum, as a device of semi-direct democracy, does not allow the collective elaboration of policies by the people (unlike citizens’ assemblies). Because of this, legislation approved by referendum, unless it comes from parliament, would almost inevitably reflect minority views (those of its opponents). From a different point of view, it is also argued that referendums do not reflect the will of the majority on the question asked because of abstention, which is higher than at elections, and dramatically increases when their use becomes frequent; because voters often answer a different question, as typically occurs when they express a vote of confidence in the incumbents (the so-called ‘plebiscitarian deviation’); or because they just follow party lines, or are easily manipulated by minorities with more intense views and organizational or financial superiority. Conversely, a classical argument is that the referendum would lead to majority tyranny against minorities, because ‘it knows nothing about compromise’, as it gives only a choice between ‘yes’ and ‘no’. Those who believe so generally also doubt that referendums can generate more legitimate decisions and solve conflicts.

Rather, they would enhance divisions. This problem, mentioned above in the specific case of constitutional referendums, has recently received new attention by proponents of deliberative democracy, who recommend supplementing referendums with popular deliberative forums that would take place before the actual wording of the question or proposed legislation is formalized. A different approach regards the capacity of the referendum to produce publics for the people, that is, in the interest of the people. Together with majority tyranny, the most common criticism addressed to direct democracy, dating back to ancient authors, is indeed that ordinary people lack expertise to legislate. This was also a classical argument against elections, it should be noted, but referendums would be worse as the competence required to choose legislators would be inferior to that required for deciding policies directly. Another shortcoming of referendums would be their structural bias against change, people being naturally conservative or tending to be so when they do not have firm preferences—which is often the case at referendums since most issues are complex.

These questions about the democratic quality of the referendum are of course central to the argument contrary to its development in democracies. Further, opponents to referendums emphasize their negative political consequences. Referendums would weaken representative government by undermining the role and responsibility of political parties and elected representatives, and, when used too frequently, generate voter fatigue and low electoral participation. Moreover, it is argued, popular initiatives would overload the political system by continually introducing new demands. Supporters of referendums, on the contrary, believe that representative democracy does not provide for accurate reflection of popular will and regard referendums as superior in this respect. They also insist on the positive political implications of referendums, such as the maximization of citizens (by enhancing both participation and education), or the capacity of popular initiatives to be an alternative channel for raising issues and, as the example of Switzerland shows, for encouraging representative to be more responsive and accommodative in the preparation of legislation (which would also result in creating a stronger attachment of the people to their political system). At the beginning of the twentieth century, Bryce, in his analysis of modern democracies, gives a rather complete account of all these arguments. In the same year, the Italian law philosopher Frensi writes that direct democracy institutions, according to the Swiss or American model, are the only way to circumvent elite domination as brought to the fore by Mises and Pareto. After the Second World War, ‘participators’ like Pateman, Megill, or more recently Barber, will logically stand on the side of the referendums although regarding it as a poor substitute for ‘pure’ direct democracy (assembly democracy), which alone allows the collective elaboration and representation of compromise and enlightened decisions. On the opposite front, ‘elitists’, or ‘representationalists’, following Schumpeter and (p. 507) Sartori, believe that the essence of democracy lies in the right to elect representatives, not to influence policies, for which citizens are both unwilling (time constraint) and incompetent. This point has been strongly reasserted by Sartori in the context of the ‘crisis of knowledge’ which he sees as typical of complex societies despite the rise of educational levels. In this author’s view, democracies suffer a ‘participatorist drift’ which needs to be inverted. A somewhat more moderate stance, but still not very favourable to the referendums, is expressed by authors advocating a ‘horizontal’ diffusion of representative democracy to new political (eg, subnational) or non-political (eg, economic, social, private) spheres, rather than a ‘vertical’ in-depth move toward more direct democracy. For the time being, the prevailing orientation among democratic theorists is not very referendum-oriented since ‘democrats’ have also to a large extent abandoned it. Theories of democratic innovation, which have burgeoned in the last ten decades as a response to party disruption and rising expectations of post-modern citizens, prefer to supplement representative institutions with new arrangements or participatory mechanisms ensuring deliberation, rather than with direct-popular majoritarian decision-making. Similarly, proposals for a greater involvement of interests (eg, so-called ‘excluded’ or ‘mute’ interests) or the democratization of supranational bodies and the establishment of a transnational democracy, hardly mention the referendum. The position in favour of an increase of direct democracy is thus wholly marginal. Its main contemporary supporter is Budge, who advocates a move of liberal democracies towards direct democracy, intended as ‘a regime in which the adult citizens as a whole debate and vote on the most important political decisions, and where their vote determines the action to be taken’.

(p. 508) II. Provisions for Referendums

1. Typologies

Democratic theorists, as was just seen, argue for or against the referendum by referring to their alleged democratic quality or political effects. But this has been until now to a large extent an endless and inconclusive debate since we know very little about the actual implications of referendums. This smallature arises from the lack of empirical studies, but, above all, to the extreme variety of forms it can take, which stands as a barrier against any generalization and formulation of an encompassing theory. Among the numerous modalities of the referendum that can be found in constitutional texts or practices, the initiative is considered to be the most important. Most typologies of referendums are indeed based on this criterion and distinguish between ‘mandatory’ (also termed ‘compulsory’ or ‘obligatory’) referendums, on one side, and ‘optional’ (or ‘facultative’) referendums, on the other side, with a distinction within the latter category between referendums initiated by institutional actors such as the executive, the legislative branch, or a parliamentary minority, and popular initiatives. Many authors use the word ‘referendum’ for mandatory referendums and optional referendums initiated from within institutions, while votes demanded by popular minorities are referred to as ‘initiatives’. Others refer to the formal object, using ‘referendum’ for votes on existing legislation, either current (‘amendatory’ or ‘revisatory’ referendum) or past (‘historical’ or ‘retrospective’ referendums). ‘Initiative’ for votes which are ‘proposative’, that is, dealing with proposals for future legislation (specifically or generally worded) or questions of principle. The category of legislative act it deals with (eg, ordinary legislation, constitutional reform, international treaty), the subject (eg, institutional, international, territorial, moral, economic; …), the legal consequences of the vote (ie, compulsory—also termed advisory—or binding), are other frequent variables included in the typologies, creating numerous designations for the referendum. In our sense, a good typology should focus on three basic variables, which measure the extent to which legislative power is shared with the people and/or the opposition. The first variable is the initiative, which applies only to optional referendums. But the fundamental divide is not as much between institutional and non-institutional initiative as between government and non-government initiative. Government-initiated referendums are decided either by the executive alone (prime minister or head of state), by the legislative alone, or, more frequently, by a common decision of the executive and the legislative. The common feature of these referendums is not to allow the people or the opposition to seize the legislative power. Non-government-initiated referendums are in the hands either of the opposition (parliamentary minority or, eg, a minority of regions in Italy or cantons in Switzerland), or of a popular minority. Mandatory referendums give maximum legislative power to the people (the popular vote being guaranteed, not depending on popular demand for it), but might nonetheless be classified behind propositional popular initiatives in this respect, since they can deal only with legislation originated in the institutions (generally pending legislation just approved by parliament). This introduces the second crucial variable, that is, the author of the legislation (in other words, the initiator of the legislation), which refers to the capacity of the initiator of the referendum to put a proposal of his own to the vote (thus again a variable which regards only optional referendums). This is a better criterion than the above-mentioned formal object of the referendum, since the referendum may be permitted on a law proposal, but not one formulated by its initiator, or a proposal requiring the previous assent of another actor (as in the case of the president-initiated referendum on constitutional revision in France, which can deal only with bills approved in first reading by parliament). Or the referendum may be restricted to pending legislation but nonetheless be in substance propositional, as when the parliament can submit to the people a law that it has just approved (a quite frequent case). The third variable regards the scope of the referendum. Here a first distinction must be between referendums on constitutional revisions, which deal essentially (although not exclusively) with institutional issues, and referendums on ordinary legislation. Within the latter category, one should then differentiate according to the subject: institutional, international (alliances, treaties ...), territorial (secession, decolonization ...), or other (see economic, social, moral, environmental ...), and take into account eventual restrictions within each field (such as when the referendum can only deal with a few predetermined institutional issues).30

As of 2008, only 20 per cent of the 193 countries deemed independent by Freedom House had no provision at all for referendums at the national or subnational level.31 These were mostly in Asia (eg, China and India), the Middle East, and Central America. As may be expected, ‘free’ countries (by Freedom House ranking) have more often provisions for referendums (only 13 per cent have no provisions of any kind at any level) than ‘partly free’ or ‘not free’ countries (24 per cent have no provisions for any kind of referendums). This is mostly due to provisions for subnational referendums, which are much more prevalent in free countries (35 per cent) than in the other countries (26 per cent).

Provisions for referendums have tended to increase in the past few decades, either in free or not-free countries. In the latter, this is partly due to new democracies, whose constitutions have often made more space for the referendum than those of old democracies. Thus, for example, in Eastern and Central Europe, post-communist countries have introduced substantial provisions for referendums and popular initiatives at all territorial levels as part of democratization processes.32 In Western Europe, the increase has more to do with provisions for subnational referendums (often including popular initiatives), although some countries like France or Luxembourg have recently enlarged their constitutional provisions for nationwide referendums. It should be added that there has been a dramatic expansion in the past decades of the legislation regulating referendums, which has contributed to their stronger institutionalization (see previous section). At this time there is no comprehensive theory regarding the factors responsible for the introduction and the extent of referendum provisions in democracies. According to Uleri, the fact that a few countries have extensive provisions and the great majority only restricted opportunities has to do with the existence or not of organized parties prior to full democratization, since parties have historically been the main opponents to direct democracy.33 In the first case, the main, long-term parties have blocked demands for introducing the referendum (which arose precisely to counter their omnipotence); while in the second case, like Switzerland, referendum provisions, typically including the mandatory constitutional referendum and popular initiative, have made their way as a sort of logical next step after franchise.34 This an interesting model, which also works quite well for the recent period, since the growing interest for referendums in mature democracies has been concomitant with party crisis.35 However, there are important exceptions to this model, like France or Italy. In France, the Third Republic remained until the end hostile to any form of referendum, in a context of universal male suffrage and still very weak parties. This shows that not only are parties hostile to the referendum but the representative elite in general. What makes the difference ultimately if we compare France and England on one side, Switzerland and the US states on the other side, was the existence in these two latter countries of a rooted tradition of direct democracy (in the US, it is able to compete with personalism with representative government. In Italy, the abortive referendum was introduced in the 1946 constitution as the initiative of the strong Christian-Democrat party, which conceived it as a potential minority weapon in the event of an electoral victory of the communists. There are thus special conditions, in this case the presence of a strong anti-system party, in which governing parties might become favourable to substantial exceptions to representative democracy. On the other side, why they may accept limited exceptions (typically the introduction of the constitutional referendum) has had historically more to do with ideological considerations relating to the contractualist liberal myth and its results in popular sovereignty, than with strategies of self-preservation.36

3. Country Variations: Types of Referendums

From a worldwide perspective, the IDEA dataset shows that at the national level, ‘mandatory referendums’ and ‘optional referendums’ (the latter category including citizens’ initiatives on existing or pending legislation in IDEA classifications) are much more prevalent (54 per cent and 60 per cent of all countries, respectively) than citizens’ initiatives for future legislation (33 per cent and 16 per cent). Twenty per cent of all countries have a popular initiative of one type or another, but only 15 per cent of not free or partially free countries (23 per cent of free countries). It is remarkable, however, that a device to challenge political authorities such as the popular initiative can be found in the constitutions of countries like the Russian Federation, the Asian republics of the former USSR, Togo, or Uganda—although it is never used. Table 24.1 (see next section) goes into deeper detail regarding a group of mature democracies (mostly Western democracies), by focusing on the three basic variables brought to the fore in Section 1.1. It clearly shows country variations in the extent to which the people can participate in a direct way in the legislation. As for 2011, four countries (the Netherlands, Norway, the United Kingdom, and the United States) have no provisions at all for referendums, while six countries have only (Canada, Finland, Greece) or almost exclusively (France,37 Iceland, Portugal) government-initiated referendums. Another group of six countries has mandatory referendums, which is essentially dealt with in other issues, but none of the varieties of non-government-initiated referendums (Australia, Iceland, Ireland, Israel, Japan, Portugal). Then comes a group of four countries with non-government-initiated referendums but no mandatory referendums: Luxembourg and Sweden, where a parliamentary minority can trigger a referendum on a constitutional revision, and Italy and New Zealand, which are different case since popular referendums are entitled to call a referendum on almost every issue. Finally, five countries have both mandatory and non-government-initiated referendums: Austria and Spain, where these referendums are limited to constitutional revisions; Denmark, where a parliamentary minority may call a referendum on pending legislation; and Malta and Switzerland, where popular initiatives can deal with ordinary legislation.

These country variations in the provisions for direct legislation should not however be considered as a measure of the ‘total’ influence of the people on legislation, which depends on the whole range of opportunities for direct or indirect participation. First of all, provisions for subnational referendums should be taken into account, especially since both these provisions and the competences of subnational governments have increased in the last decade.38 Direct participation in legislation is also fostered by mechanisms like the citizen’s agenda initiative,39 which has been introduced in many democracies and, recently, at the level of the European Union; or, more classically, by provisions for early elections, which give the people the opportunity to pronounce on a conflicting issue, and sometimes are part of the referendum process (eg in Denmark in the case of constitutional
A first glance to referendum practice must regard the history of the device. It is generally associated with three countries. On one side are Switzerland and the United States and, on the other, France. As mentioned above, in the first two, the practice of referendum has its roots in a tradition of direct democracy by popular assemblies at the local level (the American town meetings and the Swiss cantonal Landsgemeinde), dating back to the Middle Ages in the case of Switzerland. In the United States, the referendum experience was initiated with the submission of state constitutions to the people (the first case was the rejection of the Constitution of Massachusetts by the people in 1788) and the introduction in many states of the obligatory referendum on constitutional amendments proposed by the legislature. But it was never extended beyond the state level, even in the federal constitution or in practice. In Switzerland, the first major development of the referendum occurred at the cantonal level, under the impulse of the democratic Liberals in the 1830s, although early forms of referendums were found before this period (as mentioned above). At the time, it appeared as an accessory of the direct democracy assemblies, which had become impractical. In addition, the examples of the United States and France were very influential in promoting the constitutional referendum (the first nationwide referendum had actually been held in Switzerland in 1822 to approve the Napoléonic constitution). During these years, all cantonal constitutions, with the exception of Fribourg, were approved through referendums, and provisions for popular initiatives, on constitutional or legislative matters, were introduced in many of them. The 1848 federal constitution was also submitted to the people in a majority of cantons, and included the obligatory referendum for amendments to the constitution as well as the constitutional referendum for total revision of the constitution. In both countries, a decisive extension of the referendum was achieved under the influence of political reform movements in the second half of the nineteenth century: the Democratic Movement in Switzerland (1860s) and the Progressive Movement in the United States (1890–1920). As a result of these movements, provisions for popular initiatives were enhanced in the Swiss federal constitution (1874: the initiative on laws within 90 days of their publication; 1891: the constitutional initiative for partial revisions) and introduced in many US states, especially in the west (more than 80 per cent of the 24 states that have today the popular initiative adopted it during the Progressive era). In the two countries, these movements drew support from popular dissatisfaction with representative democracy, with politicians being accused of corruption and of fostering the interests of only the richest sections of the population. France has a different story as it had no tradition of direct democracy. Nevertheless, its referendum experience started much as it did in the United States, with referendums on the revolutionary constitutions of 1791 and 1793, as well as on the 1802 constitution. However, the 1793 constitution greatly advanced democratic principles by introducing universal male suffrage and a popular initiative on laws within 40 days of their adoption. This constitution was actually a great source of inspiration for Switzerland. Ultimately, however, it was never applied, and the only form of referendum that found its way into France was the constitutional referendum. Overall, France would soon take a different road with the plebiscitary use of the referendum by Napoleon I and Napoleon II, to some extent perpetuated by the presidential use of the referendum under the Fifth Republic.

A preliminary observation should be made: the popular referendum is very much limited in its ability to make a large contribution to the political debate.

As a result of the development of countries that had a tradition of the referendum, the practice of referendums is now common in many countries. The number of countries using referendums as a regular means of political decision-making has significantly increased over the past decades.

The number of countries using referendums as a regular means of political decision-making has significantly increased over the past decades. In many countries, referendums have become an important tool for political decision-making, particularly in democratic countries. The practice of referendums has become more widespread in recent decades, with the increase in the number of referendums held in countries that have adopted referendums as a regular means of political decision-making.

The increase in the number of referendums held in countries that have adopted referendums as a regular means of political decision-making has been driven by several factors, including the growth of popular participation in political decision-making and the increasing use of referendums to address important political issues. The practice of referendums has also been influenced by the rise of the internet and social media, which have provided new opportunities for citizens to engage in the political process and to influence political decisions. In addition, the practice of referendums has been influenced by the growth of political parties that promote the use of referendums as a means of political decision-making.

In conclusion, the practice of referendums has become more widespread in recent decades, with the increase in the number of referendums held in countries that have adopted referendums as a regular means of political decision-making. This increase has been driven by several factors, including the growth of popular participation in political decision-making and the increasing use of referendums to address important political issues. The practice of referendums has also been influenced by the rise of the internet and social media, which have provided new opportunities for citizens to engage in the political process and to influence political decisions. In addition, the practice of referendums has been influenced by the growth of political parties that promote the use of referendums as a means of political decision-making. lost some ground. In Western Europe, much of the increase has had to do with the submission to the people of the different steps of European integration or of new, cross-cutting issues such as civil, nuclear, or so-called moral questions, like divorce or abortion. Clearly enough, from a world perspective, the increase in referendum use in the 1970s and 1990s also reflects the rise in the number of independent countries and the use of the referendum during the process of nation-building in these countries, as well as the spread of democratic regimes around the world.

IV. Judicial Review

1. The Juridicization of the Referendum

The referendum has not escaped the general trend of juridicization. As for the countries mentioned in Table 24.1, this is to some extent expressed in the number of ad hoc referendums, which is stable over the two periods considered (respectively 14 for each), although the number of referendums has increased (see Table 24.1).\(^2\) It should be noted that the share of these referendums remains very modest (although almost half of the countries with a referendum experience since 1940 have had some), and that only a small minority of them has been decided by ad hoc governmental decrees (4 out of 28), in the particular context of transitions to democracy (eg the referendums on monarchy versus republic in Italy and Greece). All other ad hoc referendums were decided by specific laws regularly adopted by parliaments (eg the British and Hanoverian referendums on EC membership). The juridicization of the referendum is clearly correlated with two other processes. First, the amount of legislation regulating referendums in order to ensure fair practice has substantially increased. It has become clear, indeed, that referendums, just as elections, can vary from being highly democratic to the exact opposite depending on the conditions surrounding their practice. Thus, implementing referendum legislation has flourished everywhere, and filled a void in some countries which had previously experienced referendums in the absence of such legislation (eg the United Kingdom, Canada, France ...). In particular, regulations concerning campaigning, funding, and the vote have been introduced. Such regulations have tried to catch the specific nature of referendums compared to elections. For example, in many countries, funds or time on public television channels are shared between the ‘yes’ and the ‘no’ camps rather than between single (p. 515).

\[^2\] Table 24.1 Provisions for (2011) and practice of (1940–2011) nationwide referendums in 25 consolidated democracies\(^1\)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>1. INITIATOR OF REFERENDUM</th>
<th>2. AUTHOR OF PROPOSAL</th>
<th>3. SCOPE</th>
<th>4. PRACTICE</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Is referendum optional or mandatory?</td>
<td>Can initiator be author?</td>
<td>Which issues can be put to referendum?</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Who can initiate optional referendum?</td>
<td>optional</td>
<td>mandatory</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>gov initiated</td>
<td>non-gov initiated</td>
<td>constit</td>
<td>non-constitutional</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>leg</td>
<td>(leg)</td>
<td>(pop)</td>
<td>prop</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Australia</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1.</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2.</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Austria</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1.</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2(^a)</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3(^b)</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Belgium</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Canada(^4)</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1.</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

\(^1\) Table 24.1 Provisions for (2011) and practice of (1940–2011) nationwide referendums in 25 consolidated democracies\(^1\)

\(^2\) Table 24.1 Provisions for (2011) and practice of (1940–2011) nationwide referendums in 25 consolidated democracies\(^1\)
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Country</th>
<th>1</th>
<th>2</th>
<th>3</th>
<th>4</th>
<th>Tot.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Denmark</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>4 4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1.</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>1 1 2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2.</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>3 2 5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3.</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>1 1</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Finland</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>1 1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1.</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>1 1</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2.</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>4 4 8</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3.</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>1 1</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4.</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5.1g 3e</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>1 1</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4.</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5.2c 3e</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>2 2</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>6.</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5.2d 3e</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>2 2</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>7.</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5.2e 3f</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>2 2</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>8.</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>5.2f 3g</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>2011</td>
<td>2011</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>9.</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ireland</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>1940 1970</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1.</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>1 1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2.</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>3 29 32</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Israel18</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1.</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Italy11</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>X</td>
<td>2 2</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Country</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>-----------</td>
<td>---</td>
<td>---</td>
<td>---</td>
<td>---</td>
<td>---</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Japan</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Luxemburg</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Malta</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>N-Zealand</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Norway</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Portugal</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Spain</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
The referendum was initiated by a parliamentary minority while in 2006 it was a combined minority initiative of parliament, regions and citizens (both referendums ranged in column 1d).

Knesset. The referendum is mandatory only in case the law deciding the restitution of a territory has been approved by a less than two-third majority.

Concerning these referendums, the first three questions refer to the ‘actual’ initiator, to whether the referendum was propositional or not, and to the issue on which it has dealt (the distinction between ‘most’ and ‘few’ issues making no sense here, referendums have been systematically mentioned in the column ‘few’). Referendums held under authoritarian regimes are not reported (eg the Spanish or Greek referendums under the dictatorships).

Provisions generally refer to the category of legislative act (especially constitutional or ordinary legislation) and/or the subject. We report both in this table. Most constitutional issues are institutional, although mere are exceptions, like in Switzerland, where the constitution includes a great variety of norms which belong in other countries to ordinary legislation. Referendums on European integration have been sometimes held under provisions for referendums on constitutional revisions (Austria and Ireland). In a particular field, provisions generally concern most issues or most issues of primary importance (typically, ‘total revisions’ of the constitution, or, in the field of ordinary legislation, ‘questions of national importance’). In the case of nonconstitutional issues and ‘other ordinary legislation’, they are however sometimes restricted to a few issues (eg electoral age in Denmark, regionalization in Portugal, or the status of the Church in Ireland).

Institutional issues not included in the constitution Israel, New Zealand and the United Kingdom have no proper constitutional text. In this case the category of non-constitutional issues includes all institutional issues.

Partial revision of the constitution.

Total revision of the constitution.

Canada has no provision for nationwide referendums in its constitution. However it has a referendum law, adopted after the 1992 referendum, with the view that there should be a set of procedures in place in advance of a future referendum.

This referendum on delegation of powers to international authorities is mandatory only in case the text has been approved by a majority inferior to five-sixth in parliament.

France: 3 and 4 refer to the referendum on constitutional revision. The referendum is mandatory only when the revision has been initiated by parliament; it is optional (decided by the President of the Republic) when the revision has been initiated by the President of the Republic on proposal of the Prime Minister). Type 5 was introduced in 2005, for future treaties of accession of countries to the EC. However, since 2008, the parliament may decide by a majority of three-fifth to approve the treaty without a referendum. France has also introduced in 2008 a new initiative for the referendum on non-constitutional matters (Types 1 and 2), by a combined parliamentary/popular/presidential decision. But it won’t be in force before the approval of an implementing legislation.

1. This table is the product of my own elaboration. It shows constitutional or legal (specific referendum laws) provisions (columns 1 to 3) as well as the effective practice (column 4). Six countries (names in italic) have no provisions of any kind for nationwide referendums. Four of them have had referendums; however, all decided by ad hoc referendum laws. Other countries with provisions for referendums have had referendums not falling into any of these provisions (reported on the last lines), which have been held either under previous constitutional or legislative provisions, or through ad hoc laws or government decrees. Ad hoc referendums are reported in italics. Concerning these referendums, the first three questions refer to the ‘actual’ initiator, to whether the referendum was propositional or not, and to the issue on which it has dealt (the distinction between ‘most’ and ‘few’ issues making no sense here, referendums have been systematically mentioned in the column ‘few’). Referendums held under authoritarian regimes are not reported (eg the Spanish or Greek referendums under the dictatorships).

Provisions generally refer to the category of legislative act (especially constitutional or ordinary legislation) and/or the subject. We report both in this table. Most constitutional issues are institutional, although mere are exceptions, like in Switzerland, where the constitution includes a great variety of norms which belong in other countries to ordinary legislation. Referendums on European integration have been sometimes held under provisions for referendums on constitutional revisions (Austria and Ireland). In a particular field, provisions generally concern most issues or most issues of primary importance (typically, ‘total revisions’ of the constitution, or, in the field of ordinary legislation, ‘questions of national importance’). In the case of non-constitutional issues and ‘other ordinary legislation’, they are however sometimes restricted to a few issues (eg electoral age in Denmark, regionalization in Portugal, or the status of the Church in Ireland).

Institutional issues not included in the constitution Israel, New Zealand and the United Kingdom have no proper constitutional text. In this case the category of non-constitutional issues includes all institutional issues.

Partial revision of the constitution.

Total revision of the constitution.

Canada has no provision for nationwide referendums in its constitution. However it has a referendum law, adopted after the 1992 referendum, with the view that there should be a set of procedures in place in advance of a future referendum.

This referendum on delegation of powers to international authorities is mandatory only in case the text has been approved by a majority inferior to five-sixth in parliament.

France: 3 and 4 refer to the referendum on constitutional revision. The referendum is mandatory only when the revision has been initiated by parliament; it is optional (decided by the President of the Republic) when the revision has been initiated by the President of the Republic on proposal of the Prime Minister). Type 5 was introduced in 2005, for future treaties of accession of countries to the EC. However, since 2008, the parliament may decide by a majority of three-fifth to approve the treaty without a referendum. France has also introduced in 2008 a new initiative for the referendum on non-constitutional matters (Types 1 and 2), by a combined parliamentary/popular/presidential decision. But it won’t be in force before the approval of an implementing legislation.

1. This table is the product of my own elaboration. It shows constitutional or legal (specific referendum laws) provisions (columns 1 to 3) as well as the effective practice (column 4). Six countries (names in italic) have no provisions of any kind for nationwide referendums. Four of them have had referendums; however, all decided by ad hoc referendum laws. Other countries with provisions for referendums have had referendums not falling into any of these provisions (reported on the last lines), which have been held either under previous constitutional or legislative provisions, or through ad hoc laws or government decrees. Ad hoc referendums are reported in italics. Concerning these referendums, the first three questions refer to the ‘actual’ initiator, to whether the referendum was propositional or not, and to the issue on which it has dealt (the distinction between ‘most’ and ‘few’ issues making no sense here, referendums have been systematically mentioned in the column ‘few’). Referendums held under authoritarian regimes are not reported (eg the Spanish or Greek referendums under the dictatorships).

Provisions generally refer to the category of legislative act (especially constitutional or ordinary legislation) and/or the subject. We report both in this table. Most constitutional issues are institutional, although mere are exceptions, like in Switzerland, where the constitution includes a great variety of norms which belong in other countries to ordinary legislation. Referendums on European integration have been sometimes held under provisions for referendums on constitutional revisions (Austria and Ireland). In a particular field, provisions generally concern most issues or most issues of primary importance (typically, ‘total revisions’ of the constitution, or, in the field of ordinary legislation, ‘questions of national importance’). In the case of non-constitutional issues and ‘other ordinary legislation’, they are however sometimes restricted to a few issues (eg electoral age in Denmark, regionalization in Portugal, or the status of the Church in Ireland).

Institutional issues not included in the constitution Israel, New Zealand and the United Kingdom have no proper constitutional text. In this case the category of non-constitutional issues includes all institutional issues.

Partial revision of the constitution.

Total revision of the constitution.

Canada has no provision for nationwide referendums in its constitution. However it has a referendum law, adopted after the 1992 referendum, with the view that there should be a set of procedures in place in advance of a future referendum.

This referendum on delegation of powers to international authorities is mandatory only in case the text has been approved by a majority inferior to five-sixth in parliament.

France: 3 and 4 refer to the referendum on constitutional revision. The referendum is mandatory only when the revision has been initiated by parliament; it is optional (decided by the President of the Republic) when the revision has been initiated by the President of the Republic on proposal of the Prime Minister). Type 5 was introduced in 2005, for future treaties of accession of countries to the EC. However, since 2008, the parliament may decide by a majority of three-fifth to approve the treaty without a referendum. France has also introduced in 2008 a new initiative for the referendum on non-constitutional matters (Types 1 and 2), by a combined parliamentary/popular/presidential decision. But it won’t be in force before the approval of an implementing legislation.

9. Mandatory referendum for any modification of the status of the Church.

10. Israel has introduced provisions for a referendum on the restitution of an annexed territory in 2000 but only in 2010 has the law of implementation for this referendum been approved by the Knesset. The referendum is mandatory only in case the law deciding the restitution of a territory has been approved by a less than two-third majority.

11. 1, 2, and 4 refer to referendums on constitutional amendments, which can be initiated however only if the amendment has been adopted by Parliament with a majority inferior to two-third. In 2001 the referendum was initiated by a parliamentary minority while in 2006 it was a combined minority initiative of parliament, regions and citizens (both referendums ranged in column 1d).
(12) Only in 2010, the Japanese Diet has approved the implementing law enabling the holding of the constitutional referendum provided for in the Constitution since 1947.

(13) Article 51 of the constitution (types 1, 2, 3) is extremely vague about the conditions of application of this referendum and still waiting a specific law defining such conditions. The prevailing interpretation up to now has been that the referendum is government initiated and can deal only with non-constitutional matters. Types 4 and 5 refer to a provision for a constitutional referendum introduced in 2003 (revision of article 114 of the Constitution). A revision of the Constitution which would introduce a popular legislative initiative is currently under discussion.

(14) Only referendum mentioned in the constitution. The two other forms are only dealt with in a special ‘Referenda Act’.

(15) There are no provisions for nationwide referendums in the constitution of Netherlands. A ‘Temporary Law on Referendums’ introducing some forms of referendums has been introduced in 2002 but suspended in 2005. The 2005 referendum on the Treaty for a European Constitution was held on the basis of a different, ad hoc, law.

(16) Like in Austria, the referendum is mandatory for the total revision (type 3) and initiated by a parliamentary minority for any partial revision adopted by parliament.

(17) Counterproject to a popular initiative.
Concerning the vote, special conditions like qualified majorities or quorums of approval or participation have sometimes been introduced, as a way of protecting minorities against immoderate popular decisions. Rules pertaining to the issue, such as the unity of form, of content, or the unicity of the question asked, aimed at ensuring the best expression of popular will, or substantive limits like the respect of entrenched fundamental rights or higher rank legislation, are also widespread; or rules concerning the legal effects of referendums (eg consultative versus legally binding), their implementation (when they consist in a question of principle or a generally worded proposal), or the revision of popular decisions (parallelism of procedures versus right of parliament to reverse a decision taken by the people). Although the amount of these regulations has increased, academic works or think tank reports on referendum monitoring suggest that a lot may still have to be done to ensure referendum best practices. Moreover, it should be noted that substantial country differences persist: while some countries are rather under-regulated, the details of the referendum practice being almost completely left to the parliament (eg Finland, Luxembourg), other countries have extensive regulations (eg Italy, Switzerland). Another important difference concerns the extent to which these rules can be and are actually subject to judicial review, which is the second way by which the juridicization of referendums has increased in recent decades (reflecting the general increase of judicial review).

---

Table 24.2 Practice of nationwide referendums in 25 consolidated democracies by decade (1940–2011)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Australia</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>11</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>27</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Austria</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Belgium</td>
<td>1</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Canada</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Denmark</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>17</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Finland</td>
<td></td>
<td>1</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>France</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>14</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Germany</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Greece</td>
<td></td>
<td>1</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Iceland</td>
<td>2</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>2</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ireland</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>4</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>32</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Israel</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Italy</td>
<td>1</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>3</td>
<td>12</td>
<td>32</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Japan</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Luxembourg</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Malta</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>2</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Netherlands</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>New Zealand</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>2</td>
<td>6</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>8</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>31</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Norway</td>
<td></td>
<td>1</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Portugal</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>2</td>
<td>1</td>
<td></td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Spain</td>
<td>2</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sweden</td>
<td>2</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>1</td>
<td>5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>UK</td>
<td></td>
<td>1</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>USA</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>0</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Total</td>
<td>19</td>
<td>10</td>
<td>21</td>
<td>32</td>
<td>29</td>
<td>63</td>
<td>51</td>
<td>225</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Switzerland</td>
<td>17</td>
<td>45</td>
<td>26</td>
<td>32</td>
<td>29</td>
<td>63</td>
<td>88</td>
<td>113</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

(1) Referendums held under authoritarian regimes are not reported (eg the Spanish or Greek referendums under the dictatures). (p. 522)
2. Types of Judicial Review

What can be the object of judicial review, to whom must the request be addressed, by whom and when: all these questions have answers which vary greatly according to country.45 Regarding the object, judicial review traditionally applies to the process (respect of rules pertaining to the initiation of the referendum, the campaign, the vote...) and, less frequently, to the issue, from a both formal and material point of view. The formal validity of the issue is generally appreciated with regard to the clarity and the unicity of the question or subject (eg the US states, Switzerland, or Italy), which increasingly appears as a minimal requirement of referendum.46 The material validity of the issue is first of all a matter of whether it actually belongs to the field open to the referendum. But it can also regard the conformity of the referendum proposal to the status quo, in some determined areas, or, more commonly, to higher ranking legislation (Constitution, bill of rights...). This depends on whether the referendum is legislative or constitutional, but also on the ranking of referendum/legislation in the hierarchy of norms. Authorities exercising judicial review are sometimes political bodies, like the Federal Assembly in Switzerland, but more often, in this case, there might be an ad hoc advisory court which checks the regularity of the process, and a judicial court—generally the constitutional court in countries which have one—in charge of reviewing the issue (eg Italy). The control might be automatic or compulsory (eg in France since 2008), or depend on seizure by some authorized actor. Thus, a crucial criteria to assess the extent of judicial review is who may lodge an appeal. There is a much variation in this respect: while in some countries any elector may initiate a recourse (eg Greece, Ireland, Italy, Switzerland), or any person directly concerned (the Netherlands), in other countries this capacity is restricted to political parties (eg Spain) or certain authorities, for example the President of the Republic or the Presidents of the Chambers (France until 1974). Finally, another important modality is the moment (before or after the vote). While a priori control seems logical, and is actually the rule for checking the formal regularity of referendums (eg the US states, with the exception of California, or Italy), things are not so clear regarding the material control of the issue (especially its conformity to higher ranking legislation), which is sometimes perceived as conflicting too much with popular sovereignty if a posteriori. This was indeed the reason why the French Constitutional Council declared itself incompetent when asked, after the referendum of November 1962 introducing the direct election of the President of the Republic, to decide about the admissibility of this referendum held under Article 11 of the Constitution (which in the event was only a question of knowing whether it was possible to revise the Constitution through this article). Yet, it appears that most countries that provide for a constitutional review of the issue have placed it a posteriori, actually after the promulgation of the referendum law: for example the United States and Switzerland (both at the sub-state level), which are actually the only two countries which really practice it, or Italy, Ireland, and Portugal (the two latter having also a priori control).47

3. Country Profiles

To a large extent, the importance of judicial review of referendums in a specific country reflects the general situation of judicial review in that country. Thus, countries with no or little judicial review, like Switzerland, Denmark, Ireland, New Zealand (or even Great Britain, Sweden, Finland, Greece, or Luxembourg, as much less frequent users of the referendum), have no judicial control, or only formal judicial control, that is, a control which is limited to checking the regularity of the process or the form of the issue.48 Since 1999, however, it should be noted that Switzerland has introduced a material limitation to the popular constitutional initiative: according to Article 139(2) of the new Federal Constitution, a popular initiative may be declared invalid by the Federal Assembly (a priori control) if it “fails to comply with the requirements of consistency of form, and of subject matter”, but also if it infringes mandatory provisions of international laws.49 This might be seen as a new protection for minorities, since it could appear that popular initiatives must not violate texts like the European Convention on Human Rights or the United Nations Pacte II. However, the decision to reject an initiative, it should be recorded, is in the hands of a political assembly, and not susceptible to litigation in the courts. Moreover, the limitation to “mandatory” provisions drastically reduces the possibility of rejecting an initiative, as illustrated by the ‘anti-minaret’ initiative, which was declared admissible by the Federal Assembly in 2008 since the international human rights violated by this proposal (eg the freedom of religion according to Article 9 of the ECHR) were not part of the jus cogens, as defined by the 1969 Vienna Convention, that is, core human rights to which any state owes strict obedience.50 Similarly, another initiative potentially dangerous for minority rights (mandatory life incarceration for certain prisoners) had been declared admissible by the Federal Assembly in 2001 since it did not violate jus cogens (all the formal requirements being otherwise fulfilled). Actually, these two initiatives have been successively approved by the Swiss people, without any possibility of challenging them legally a posteriori. The only case of a rejection of a popular initiative by the Federal Assembly referring to the violation of jus cogens was in 1995 (the so-called ‘anti-asylum initiative’), before the introduction of the new provision in the Constitution, which was to a large extent an adaptation of the right to this precedent.51

The Federal Assembly regards this initiative as contradicting the non-refoulement principle and thus the vote did not take place. Although the possibility of material control of a popular initiative remains thus very limited in Switzerland, it should be noted however that the Swiss Parliament is allowed to discuss popular initiatives before the actual vote takes place, and may formulate a counter-proposition (which it did not in the anti-minaret and incarcration cases) or simply a recommendation on how voters should decide on the issue (which it did extensively, against the proposal, in these two cases).

Conversely, countries with a stronger tradition of judicial control, like the United States, Australia, Italy, or Spain, or countries with a recent increase in judicial review, like France, have extensive possibilities for judicial review, including material control of issue.52 As for the US states, material a posteriori control of the issue may regard the conformity of referendum legislation to state constitutions (statutory referendum laws), or to the federal constitution (constitutional revisions raising a federal constitutional issue).53 US states are particularly active in this regard: in the five strongest initiative states (California, Oregon, Washington, Colorado, Arizona), 49.5 per cent of all voter-approved initiatives were challenged with a success rate (invalidation) of 45 per cent (corresponding to 22.25 per cent of all voter-approved initiatives) since the beginning of the 1970s.54 The same-sex marriage case in California is a recent and still ongoing very illustrative example of the dialectic interplay between the people and the courts that can take place. In this particular case, the state courts first defeated the popular statutory legislation banning homosexual marriages, which was then reformulated as an initiative constitutional amendment (ICA) and voted again by the people, before being rejected a second time by the US Supreme Court. On the whole, it seems however that judicial55 review operates as a strong constraint on direct democracy only in states where the ICA does not exist, or when the issue put on the ICA raises a federal constitutional matter. In these two cases, the last word is with the courts. Otherwise, it is with the people. Accordingly, in these states a hybrid constitutional system of “popular constitutionalism”, involving the people and the courts, and marinating the legislature.56 Reforms aimed at moderating the power of both the people and the courts should thus be introduced. However, the system altogether works rather well; with the judicial system providing an efficient check to abuses of popular majorities on minority or individual rights. Thus Miller writes: “a fair reading of the record suggests that direct democracy’s most consequential impact on rights has been to limit the expansion of rights in a number of areas, including affirmative action, bilingual education, marriage, and certain areas of criminal law”. But, he adds, “on balance, where direct democracy has threatened rights, the judicial power has effectively countered this threat”.57

Italy is another case of a strong activism of judicial review regarding both formal and material aspects of the abrogative minority referendum (Art 75 of the Italian Constitution). While the Ufficio centrale per ii referendum, which emanates from the higher administrative court, focuses on procedural verifications, the Constitutional Court decides on the admissibility of the issue, with a clear tendency to increase over the years the restrictions on the use of the abrogative referendum (facilitated by the imprecation of Article 75 and its implementing legislation). Thus no less than 48 demands for abrogative referendums have been rejected by the Constitutional Court between 1971 and 2012, against a total of 68 abrogative referendums declared admissible and effectively held.64 Formal motivations for rejecting referendums have been of two kinds, both relying on criteria established by the Court in its successive rulings. A first motivation has been the exclusion of constitutional laws from law, which can be the object of the abrogative referendum, asserted in the no 16 1978 ruling, which rejected the referendum on the Concordat. The second, very frequent motivation, has been the insufficient clarity or homogeneity of the question. The technical complexity of the abrogative referendum, which may ask for the cancellation of only small parts, or even commas, of a law, surely responds to the difficulty of promoters in fulfilling this requirement. Yet, there is no doubt that the Italian Court has progressively increased its demands on the matter, as in its 1987 ruling, when it justified the rejection of the referendum to abrogate some parts of the hunting legislation on the ground that it was impossible to understand the ‘intrinsic aim of the abrogative act’, or in its 1997 and 2000 rulings, when it mentioned the criteria of the ‘capacity of the demand to reach its objective’ and the ‘reasonableness of the law’. This jurisprudence is regularly criticized for being arbitrary or politicized, or anti-referendum oriented, but it remains true that the Italian Court is also trying to guarantee the fair expression of popular will in the context of a very complex type of referendum. Material motivations for rejecting referendums have referred first to the subject limitations in Article 75 (eg the exclusion of tax laws or budget Acts). Again, this has been interpreted in a more and more restrictive way (see 1995 and 1997 rulings). They have also referred to the legislative consequences of the abrogation, considered from multiple perspectives: thus, for example, the referendum on the Senate electoral law was rejected in 1991 because the abrogation would have had a legislative effect, that is, the referendum would have been de facto propositional; conversely, the Court rejected in 1995 and again in 1997 the referendums to eliminate the share of seats elected by proportional representation in the two Chambers on the ground that they would have created a legislative vacuum; it also regularly rejected referendums proposing to repeal standards the loss of which would result in rendering ineffective some parts of the Constitution, operating in that way a sort of control of constitutionality ex ante, which has sometimes been regarded as a way to protect individual rights (as in the case of the cancellation by the Court of the two referendums on work at home and patronage and social care in 2000, or on the law on assisted reproduction in 2008). It remains, however, that in theory a constitutional review a posteriori of a law abrogated by referendum is also possible, as recognized by the Court itself in its 1981 ruling, although it seems that it has until now preferred to exercise as far as possible such control a priori rather than to expose itself to the criticism of overturning the popular will.65

Finally, France is an interesting example of a country which was first characterized by low judicial review of referendums, but has moved recently towards much more demanding standards through the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court and the constitutional reform of 2008. The rarity of referendums, however, makes it difficult to assess the exact scope of these changes. Until the 2000 referendum on the constitutional revision reducing the presidential mandate from seven to five years, the French Constitutional Council only accepted conducting control a posteriori of the voting process. Thus, in 1982, it refused to rule on the constitutionality of the law approved by the referendum held under Article 11 of the Constitution (see above), arguing that its role according to the Constitution was to control the parliament, not popular decisions, which are the ‘direct expression of national sovereignty’.66 On the other hand, the Council of State also interpreted its role in a very restrictive way which included only control of the decree organizing the campaign. As a result, the only case that could have led to material control of the issue under Article 11 was the referendum on a treaty, which, according to Article 11, must not be contrary to the Constitution to take on this article (this was not necessary in the case of the Maastricht Treaty and the Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe since the parliament had conducted the constitutional revisions made necessary by these treaties in the months before the referendum). However, it must be recognized that after Pompidou, the French presidents of the republic, who are the initiators of the referendum under Article 11, clearly took a position against the Gaullist use of this article to revise the constitution, which corresponded to a sort of self-control of constitutionality in the absence of control by the Court. Things changed substantially in 2000 with the jurisprudence Hauchemaille, by which the Constitutional Court acknowledged its competence to exercise a prior control over some preparatory acts to the referendum such as the presidential decree of convocation, which seemed to include the possibility of material control of the issue.67 The latter, however, was clearly introduced by the 2008 constitutional reform, according to which the law proposals mentioned in Article 11 must obligatorily be subject to constitutional review before their submission to the referendum (Art 61 of the Constitution). Thus, after having been criticized for giving full powers to the president of the Republic in calling a referendum, France is now a quite unique case of a country with constitutional review of the referendum which is not only a priori, but also mandatory.68

V. Concluding Remarks

The progressive development of law is characterized by the fact that the same problems raised in the late eighteenth century as philosophical and ideological problems, appear nowadays as technical issues only. (Thus) in the twentieth century, the referendum follows the fate of the other institutions of constitutional law and moves from the doctrinal phase to the positive phase, with the result that the referendum is not anymore a theoretical issue. In front of the free peoples less not an abstract problem, but a practical problem is the referendum a rational process, is freedom better or less ensured through it? Therefore we can and we must, in the twentieth century, consider the problem only as a pure technical issue.69

These comments by Mkhine-Guätzovitch written in 1931 have not lost their timeliness. Rather, they are probably more relevant today than they were on the eve of the fall of European democracies, which demonstrated that the people were not ready, either for direct or for representative democracy. Thus today, in the context of mature democracies, has the referendum become a ‘purely technical issue’. This does not mean, however, that the classical drawbacks of the referendum, such as the role that popular decisions are incompetent, dangerous for liberties, or do not correctly reflect popular will, have disappeared. But, as Mkhine-Guätzovitch meant, these are now problems which can to a large extent be solved by technical adaptations of the device. In other words, the technic might today be enough to ensure the desired ends: democracy and liberty. This is of course where the law can be useful, and already is, as evidenced by the ongoing process of juridification. Direct democracy, just as representative democracy, is happier with the help of constitutionalism.

Bibliography

Andreas Auer and Michael Bützer (eds), Direct Democracy: the Eastern and Central European Experiences (2001)

Andreas Auer and Jean-François Plaus (eds), Le référendum européen: actes du colloque international de Strasbourg, 21-22 février 1997 (1997)

David Butler and Austin Ranney (eds), Referendums around the World. The Growing Use of Direct Democracy (1994)
Raymond Carré de Malberg, ‘Considérations théoriques sur la question de la combinaison du référendum avec le parlementarisme’ (1931) 2 Annuaire de l’Institut international de droit public 272
(p. 528) Simone Chambers, ‘Constitutional Referendums and Democratic Deliberation’ in Matthew Mendelssohn and Andrew Parlin (eds), Citizens, Elites and Deliberation in Referendums Campaigns (2001)

A.V. Dicey, ‘Ought the Referendum to be Introduced into England?’ (1880) 57 Contemporary Review 15
A.V. Dicey, ‘The Referendum and Its Critics’ (1910) 212 Quarterly Review 538

Kenneth P. Miller, Direct Democracy and the Courts (2009)

Boris Mirkine-Guetzevitch, ‘Le référendum et le parlementarisme dans les nouvelles constitutions européennes’ in Annuaire de l’Institut International de Droit Public (1931), vol II

Notes:
(1) On elections, see Chapter 25.
(2) On sovereignty more generally, see Chapter 17.
(3) A.V. Dicey, A Leap in the Dark (2nd edn, 1911), 19.
(4) See also A.V. Dicey, ‘Ought the Referendum to be Introduced into England?’ (1880) 57 Contemporary Review 15 or A.V. Dicey, ‘The Referendum and Its Critics’ (1910) 212 Quarterly Review 538. In Dicey’s view, the referendum was to replace the old check of the House of Lords (which he regarded as having lost legitimacy).
(5) Carl Schmitt, The Crisis of Parliamentary Democracy ([1926] 1985); Hans Kelsen, Vom Wesen und Wert der Demokratie (2nd edn, 1929), in particular chs II and IV. I mention here the original German text as ch IV on the reform of parliamentarism was not translated in the (very recent) English translation (to be found in Arthur J. Jacobson and Bernhard Schlink (eds), Weimar. A Jurisdiction of Crisis (2000)).
(6) Adhemar Esmein, Éléments de droit constitutionnel français et comparé (1906). In this book, Esmein was particularly worried about what he regarded as a general trend towards popular sovereignty in the institutions and practice of democracies.
(7) Raymond Carré de Malberg, La loi, expression de la volonté générale (1931).
(9) Boris Mirkine-Guetzevitch, ‘Le référendum et le parlementarisme dans les nouvelles constitutions européennes’ in Annuaire de l’Institut International de Droit Public (1931), vol II. The author had, however, expressed a rather different position one year earlier, in Les Constitutions de ’Europe nouvelle (1930), where he wrote that ‘the referendum is the logical conclusion of the process of rationalization of parliamentarism’ (ibid 28).
(10) For a balanced account of world practice of referendums until the end of the 1940s, see Carl-J. Friedrich, Constitutional Government and Democracy ([1937] 1990), ch XXV. ‘Direct Popular Action’.
(11) Ibid 571.
(12) Following Karl Loewenstein, Political Power and the Government Process (1957), the constitutional doctrine normally distinguishes between three types of constitutional referendums: on the approval of the constitution, on its revision, and on sovereignty issues (like the foundation of a new state or the transfer of powers from the state to sub-state units or a supranational order).
Discriminant in practice (on this see eg legal rules (2004). The Council of Europe, available at the Venice Commission) of the so-called 'Veince Commission' of 2005 by the European Commission for Democracy through Law (the so-called 'Venice Commission').

The regime being renamed by Budge 'party direct democracy'.

Inclusive democracy, this model increasingly relies on the constitutionalization of rights rather than on democratization.

'Passenger direct democracy'.

An excellent list and analysis of the numerous modalities of the referendum can be found in the online report 'Referendums in Europe—An Analysis of the Legal Rules in European States', issued in 2005 by the European Commission for Democracy through Law (the so-called 'Venice Commission') of the Council of Europe, available at [http://www.idea.int]. See also, by the same Commission, the replies by country to the questionnaires on these legal rules (2004).

Statistics in this paragraph are drawn from IDEA (Institute for Democracy and Electoral Assistance: [http://www.idea.int]), which is the most extensive database on referendum practice and regulations. Provisions for referendums are normally included in the Constitution but sometimes only appear in specific referendum Acts.

See Andreas Auer and Michael Bätz (eds), Direct Democracy: the Eastern and Central European Experiences (2001).

On political parties and the constitution, see further Chapter 41.

(36) In Italy, the vote in 1970 of implementing legislation allowing the practice of the abrogative referendum was again promoted by the Christian-Democrats, this time on purely tactical and short-term grounds. The referendum was supposed to be a recourse against the law introducing divorce, which the Catholics were unable to defeat in parliament. On this see Laurence Moré, ‘Referendums, Direct Democracy and Party Government in Liberal Democracies’ (1998) 6(2) European Review 203; for a deeper analysis of the motivations behind the use of referendums by governments and parties, see also Laurence Moré, ‘The Rise of Politically Obligatory Referendums. The 2005 French Referendum in Comparative Perspective’ (2007) 305 West European Politics 1041.

(37) France introduced in 2008 a referendum by a combined parliamentary/popular/presidential initiative, but it still needs implementing legislation (see Table 2A.1).

(38) The two phenomena being related since traditionally federal or highly decentralized countries tend to have more opportunities for subnational referendums than unitary countries, as the US case exemplarily shows. Germany is another case of a federal country with no provision for nationwide referendums but extensive provisions for referendums in a number of Länder.

(39) Whereby a number of citizens can submit a proposal that must be considered by the legislature but is not necessarily put to a vote of the electorate.

(40) This is a controversial issue, however, since the majoritarian system allows more direct influence on the choice of government.

(41) The data in this paragraph is drawn from IDEA. It is much more difficult to assess the practice of subnational referendums, for which no exhaustive dataset exists.

(42) Note that the second period is also longer.

(43) I mention here only the most common regulations surrounding referendum practice. A more complete overview of these regulations can be found in the above-mentioned Venice Commission reports.

(44) One might refer here to Ranney (n 15), ch 5 (‘Regulating the Referendum’), or to the numerous RI publications (Initiative and Referendum Institute) on the subject (to quote just one: ch 4 by Andreas Gross in Bruno Kaufman and M. Diane Waters (eds), Direct Democracy in Europe. A Comprehensive Reference Guide to the Initiative and Referendum Process in Europe (2004)).

(45) Marthe Fatin-Rouge Stéfanini speaks of a ‘banalisation of judicial review of referendums’ in the conclusion of her seminal comparative study on the subject (le contrôle du référendum par la justice constitutionnelle (2004) (foreword by Louis Favoreux)).

(46) And to types of referendums: referendums on legislation approved by parliament actually need much less control than propositive popular initiatives. Similarly referendums on constitutional revisions are less subject to material judicial review than referendums on ordinary legislation.

(47) Fatin-Rouge Stéfanini (n 45), 167-95.

(48) One could also mention in this list of criteria surrounding judicial review the consultative or binding nature of this review, which is relevant, eg, in France (see ibid 147-53).

(49) Interestingly, in Great Britain there was an appeal to the courts in 2008 to oblige the Brown government to hold its promise to organize a referendum on the EU Constitution. The judicial review was granted but the appeal rejected, the judges declaring that only parliament was entitled to make a legal bid to force the referendum. It would of course have been surprising if the decision not to hold a referendum was in the competence of the judges when the decision to hold one was not (see ibid 136-7 for a discussion of the legal means to force political authorities to organize a referendum).

(50) Another requirement is the possibility of implementing the initiative in practice (see ibid 63). Differently, there is extensive material control at the subnational level: eg, cantonal initiatives are subject to a control of conformity to federal legislation.

(53) For a definition and discussion of the distinction between ‘formal’, or ‘extrinsic’ control, and ‘material’, or ‘intrinsic’ control, see Fatin-Rouge Stéfanini (n 45), 207-12.

(55) Percentages calculated on the basis of the data provided by Kenneth P. Miller, Direct Democracy and the Courts (2009), 106.

(57) Ibid 145. According to Christmann, as for California only, 14 popular initiatives have tried to restrict civil rights between 1990 and 2010 (and 10 in Switzerland during the same period) (Anna Christmann, ‘Voters’ Support for Judicial Review of Anti-Minority Initiatives. Survey Results from California and Switzerland’, Paper prepared for presentation at the PSA and ECPM Conference Sao Paulo, February 2011).

(58) It should be added that many abrogative initiatives have also been rejected by the Ufficio centrale per il referendum, which reviews the demand for referendum in the first place.

(59) On this see Fatin-Rouge Stéfanini (n 45), 125 and 224–30.

(60) A decision which has generated a lot of ambiguity about the status of referendum legislation, which could now appear above the Constitution, while... on the other hand it was admitted that popular laws could be modified by a simple parliamentary law. On this see ibid 95–101.

(61) See ibid 157–66.

(62) It is also generally accepted that referendum legislation could be subject to a control of conformity to international law (e.g. the European Convention on Human Rights), although this would be the competence of ordinary courts.

(63) Mirkine-Guetzevitch (n 9), 294–9 (my translation).
The article discusses the issues surrounding elections that have tended to come before judicial institutions. Over the last generation, we have witnessed ‘the constitutionalization of democratic politics’. Starting with the US Supreme Court’s one-person, one-vote decisions in the 1960s, and accelerating greatly over the last twenty or so years, courts throughout the world have become more and more actively engaged in evaluating the design of democratic institutions and processes. Court decisions now routinely engage certain expressive aspects of democracy and elections, such as who should be understood to have the right to participate, and can also have significant instrumental consequences on the ways in which democracies function, such as when courts determine what kinds of regulations of election financing are constitutionally permissible. In addressing various constitutional challenges to the way legislative rules structure democratic participation and elections, courts struggle to reconcile protection of essential democratic rights; the need to permit popular experimentation with the forms of democracy; the risk of political insiders manipulating the ground rules of democracy for self-interested reasons; and the need to protect democracy against anti-democratic efforts that arise through the political process itself.

Keywords: election, democratic politics, courts, right to participate, democratic rights

I. Introduction 529
II. The Right to Participate 531
   1. Age 531
   2. Mental Capacity 532
   3. Citizenship and Residency 532
   4. Felons and Ex-Felons 534
   5. Voter Identification Laws 535
III. Political Parties 537
IV. Campaign Finance 539
V. Conclusion 543

I. Introduction

Legitimate elections are not sufficient to ensure democracy, but they are its most necessary condition. Regular and genuine elections remain the primary institutional mechanism through which rulers are made accountable to those in whose name they exercise political power. We can envision elections without democracy (indeed, we have plenty of experience of exactly that), but it is difficult to envision modern democracy without meaningful elections.
Yet if elections are central to democratic systems of governance, the precise ways in which elections and representative institutions are structured vary greatly across democratic countries. At a high level of generality, a consensus exists regarding the minimal conditions under which elections must take place to be legitimate, such as a broadly distributed suffrage among citizens, the right to speak freely about political matters, the right to form political associations, including political parties, and the right to run for office. But no broad consensus exists on the relationship between democracy, elections, and the forms that political structures must take for countries to be ‘democratic’. Some democracies use first-past-the-post elections, others use proportional representation; some are parliamentary systems, others presidential; some democracies view separated legislative and executive powers as central, others do not; some democracies have bicameral legislatures, others, unicameral. In addition, different democracies have dramatically different institutions for overseeing the electoral process and disputes concerning elections. Through constitution or statute, some countries expressly create various independent institutions to oversee and preserve the workings of the electoral process. Other countries leave these issues to be addressed by the ordinary institutions of government, whether courts or political institutions. In some countries, election districts are designed by sitting legislators; in other countries, by independent commissions.

Comparative assessment of democracy and elections can thus focus at any of many different levels. It can focus on questions of institutional design; some studies, for example, offer typologies that compare the design of democratic institutions, with an emphasis on questions such as the extent to which different systems permit simple majorities to authorize action or require broad consensus (across groups and interests) to do so. Comparative studies can instead attempt to assess the policy consequences of different ways of organizing elections and institutions. Within political science, for example, a great deal of literature exists trying to assess the comparative performance of presidential versus parliamentary systems, particularly with respect to their stability or risk of lapsing into authoritarian rule. Other social scientists seek to explore how policy outcomes are affected by the particular design of democratic institutions—for example, whether the size of election districts affects the extent of political corruption or policies concerning economic growth. Or comparative analysis can focus on the level of policy, such as by comparing legislatively adopted rules regarding matters such as who is eligible to vote, what preconditions to voting must be met, including voter registration issues, and the like.

This chapter will focus on comparative discussion of the issues surrounding elections that have tended to come before judicial institutions. Over the last generation, we have witnessed what I elsewhere have called ‘the constitutionalization of democratic politics’. Starting with the US Supreme Court's one-person, one-vote decisions in the 1960s, and accelerating greatly over the last 20 or so years, courts throughout the world have become more and more actively engaged in evaluating the design of democratic institutions and processes. Court decisions now routinely engage certain expressive aspects of democracy and elections, such as who should be understood to have the right to participate, and can also have significant instrumental consequences on the ways in which democracies function, such as when courts determine what kinds of regulations of election financing are constitutionally permissible. In addressing various constitutional challenges to the way legislative rules structure democratic participation and elections, courts struggle to reconcile protection of essential democratic rights; the need to permit popular experimentation with the forms of democracy; the risk of political insiders manipulating the ground rules of democracy for self-interested reasons; and the need to protect democracy against anti-democratic efforts that arise through the political process itself.

II. The Right to Participate

Most modern democracies extend the suffrage broadly to all citizens of a certain age. The areas of limitations, and of differences across democracies, tend to center around the issues of age, mental capacity, citizenship, and the status of felons and ex-felons in the democratic process. In addition, democracies typically have voter-identification laws designed to ensure that only eligible voters actually vote; the conditions in these laws vary and have been the subject, in some countries, of court challenges.

1. Age

Age-based voting restrictions reflect the greatest consensus among democratic regimes. While almost every country limits the right to vote to individuals of at least 18 years of age, even this is not universal. Brazil, for example, allows voters as young as 16 to cast a ballot,\(^5\) while many countries in Asia including Japan, Taiwan, Singapore, and South Korea have a higher voting age—20 or 21.\(^6\) The widespread practice of setting the voting age at 18 has itself become a focal point and a basis for coordination between countries. In 2004, for example, the United Kingdom's Electoral Commission considered a proposal to lower its voting age to 16, but decided to revisit the issue in the future; in making its determination, the committee noted that ‘most countries have a minimum voting age of 18 and a pattern of harmonized voting and candidacy ages prevails across Europe and Commonwealth countries.’\(^7\)

In federalist democracies, voting age can vary locally, raising special constitutional issues. In the United States, for example, eligibility to vote is primarily determined at the state level, with the federal government setting minimum protections. When Congress tried in 1970 to lower the voting age in all elections to 18, the Supreme Court held that Congress had the power to set the voting age only for national elections; as a result, the law was held unconstitutional with respect to state and local elections.\(^8\) In response, Congress and the states passed the Twenty-Sixth Amendment to the Constitution, setting the maximum prerequisite age to vote at 18.\(^9\) In Australia, the High Court found that section 41 of the Constitution, which states that ‘No adult person who has or acquires a right to vote at elections for the more numerous House of the Parliament of a State shall, while the right continues, be prevented by any law of the Commonwealth from voting at elections for either House of the Parliament of the Commonwealth’,\(^10\) applied only to Australians over the age of 21, regardless of whether younger Australians were entitled to (p. 532) vote in certain states.\(^11\) As in the United States, Australian law was overhauled soon after this decision and the voting age was lowered to 18 for all Australians.

2. Mental Capacity

All democratic regimes, with the exception of Canada, Sweden, Ireland, Italy, and Austria,\(^12\) restrict voting based on mental capacity. In the United States, voting restrictions based on mental capacity vary greatly from state to state; in some states individuals under court-imposed guardianship must affirmatively prove capacity to vote, while in other states the court must prove incapacity.\(^13\) European countries similarly vary considerably in the way in which they restrict voting rights based on mental capacity. Recently, however, courts have become more involved in order to ensure more individualized determinations. Thus, in 2010 the Constitutional Court of the Czech Republic found that deprivation of voting due to mental incapacity had to be determined on an individualized, case-by-case basis and could not be based on a bright-line rule that applied to all persons judicially adjudicated to be mentally incapacitated; in applying its own rule, the Court found that ‘the approach of the ordinary courts was disproportionate in virtually all cases’.\(^14\) That same year, the European Court of Human Rights, invoking similar reasoning, found that while > it should be for the legislature to decide as to what procedure should be tailored to assessing the fitness to vote of mentally disabled persons, … the treatment as a single class of those with intellectual or mental disabilities is a questionable classification, and the curtailment of their rights must be subject to strict scrutiny.\(^15\)

It is not just courts, however, pushing towards increased franchise for the mentally dis-abled. Recently, 147 countries signed the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities.\(^16\) Article 29 of the Convention states that ‘states should ensure that persons with disabilities can effectively and fully participate in political and public life on an equal basis with others … including the right and opportunity for persons with disabilities to vote and be elected.’\(^17\)

3. Citizenship and Residency

All democracies also limit voting in some way based on citizenship or residence.\(^18\) Restrictions based on citizenship, even in an era in which globalization is undermining traditional conceptions of sovereignty, are justified expressively, as a way of defining membership in the political \((p. 533)\) community, and instrumentally, as a way of ensuring voters have the requisite ‘stake in the electoral process and its outcomes’.\(^19\) Yet this is an area in the midst of considerable flux.

While the vast majority of democratic countries, including the United States, limit voting to citizens, a significant expansion of non-citizen voting at the local level has occurred in recent years. The broadest example stems from the European Union. As a condition of membership in the European Union, each of the 27 member states must allow residents who are citizens of another member state to vote in local elections. In carrying out this directive, the member state must ensure that, ‘The principle of equality and non-discrimination between national and community voters and candidates ... [is] observed’, including mandating voting for registered, non-citizen residents in areas where citizens themselves are compelled to vote.20 In an effort to comply with this rule, countries had to change their local laws and, in some cases, their constitutions. In Germany, the Federal Constitutional Court had previously struck down local laws allowing non-citizen local voting on the grounds that citizenship was required under the German Constitution.21 That position has been overridden now by the requirements of the European Union.
Elections

This distinction between local elections—which are meant to represent local needs—and national elections is a common feature of the relationship between citizenship and voting laws. In Ireland, British citizens are permitted to vote in legislative but not presidential elections.22 Even in the United States, where debates about citizenship and immigration are increasingly fierce, localities are beginning to allow non-citizens to vote. Non-citizen residents may vote in school counsel elections in Chicago23 and in local elections in six Maryland municipalities.24 Allowing non-citizens to vote in local elections is not new in the United States—all but ten states allowed non-citizens to vote for at least some time period before and into the early parts of the twentieth century.25 While the Supreme Court has affirmatively held that limiting the right to vote to citizens is constitutional,26 it has never held the Constitution requires that voting must be restricted to citizens.

In addition to issues of citizenship, federalist systems, such as the United States and the European Union, face related issues concerning how to determine state and local residency for purposes of allocating the right to vote within the federal system. As noted, member states of the European Union may not disenfranchise residents who are citizens of other member (p. 534) states in local elections. According to the 2010 EU Citizenship Report, ‘In 2009, residence-related issues formed the biggest proportion (38%) of all complaints regarding the functioning of the Single Market.’27 In the United States, the Supreme Court has recognized the legitimate concern that states have in preventing fraud through the use of residency requirements. However, the Court struck down a Tennessee law requiring residence within the state for a year before voting, holding that while ‘bona fide’ residency requirements are constitutional, durational requirements are not.28 This concern for residency is not limited to distinctions within federalism regimes, however. About 14 percent of countries require that naturalized citizens reside in the country for a minimum period (ranging from a few months to several years) before voting.29

Finally, countries differ in their treatment of local citizens residing in other countries. US citizens do not lose their right to vote in federal elections due to residency in another country.30 In a study performed by Andre Blais, Louis Massicotte, and Antoine Yoshinaka, researchers found that ‘more established democracies are less inclined to disenfranchise citizens residing abroad’, noting that more than half of the former colonies of the United Kingdom do so, while the United Kingdom itself does not.31

4. Felons and Ex-Felons

Democracies around the world vary considerably in the degree to which convicted citizens maintain the right to vote. All prisoners retain their voting rights in Canada, the Czech Republic, Denmark, France, Germany, Israel, Japan, Kenya, the Netherlands, Norway, Peru, Poland, Romania, South Africa, Sweden, and Zimbabwe.32 Germany33 and South Africa go even further than this by placing a burden on the state to ensure that prisoners are given an opportunity to cast a ballot, rather than placing the burden of voter registration on the prisoner himself.34 On the other end of the spectrum, many East European countries, as well as the United Kingdom and Spain, seek to limit voting to released offenders.35 In some countries such as Belgium, Greece, Italy, and Luxembourg, the court may remove an offender’s right to vote based on the length of a sentence or seriousness of a crime; in these countries, an offender may remain disenfranchised for a period of time after he or she has been released.36 In the United States, where the issue is a matter of state law, practices vary widely across the states; some, such as Maine and Vermont, do not disenfranchise any felons, while other states, such as Kentucky, disenfranchise all convicted felons for life.

In the United States, the Supreme Court has concluded that the text of the Constitution itself permits states to disfranchise felons; this textual provision, in the Court’s view, (p. 535) immunizes felon disfranchisement provisions, as long as they are not racially discriminatory, from the kind of judicial scrutiny the Supreme Court gives to other restrictions on the franchise. Thus, the US Supreme Court does not require felon-disenfranchisement laws in general to meet any kind of standard of proportionality. The Court has held that felon disenfranchisement laws adopted for racially discriminatory reasons are unconstitutional.

Outside the United States, however, many High Courts have struck down felon disenfranchisement laws on the grounds that they are disproportionate to the state's purposes and/or serve no justifiable penal purpose. In 2004, the European Court of Human Rights struck down blanket disenfranchisement in the United Kingdom because the law did not differentiate based on the nature of the offense and Parliament had not considered a more narrow law in an attempt to make the ban proportional, as the European Convention judged proportionality. Similarly, the Supreme Court of South Africa held that the constitutionality of felon disenfranchisement, 'Comes down to whether there is a rational connection between the aim and the restriction' and rejected the argument that the need for the government to appear 'tough on crime' warranted the deprivation of voting rights to prisoners. This focus on proportionality underscores a key difference between countries in which courts aggressively scrutinize felon disenfranchisement laws and countries, such as the United States, which consider such laws to have direct constitutional authorization.

In some countries, such as Israel and Canada, courts have gone beyond focusing on proportionality and rejected disenfranchisement entirely as being fundamentally at odds with a democratic society. In Sauve v Canada, the Court noted, 'Denial of the right to vote on the basis of attributed moral unworthiness is inconsistent with the respect for the dignity of every person that lies at the heart of Canadian democracy.' The Israeli High Court agreed, holding that President Yitzhak Rabin's murderer could not be deprived of the right to vote because 'it is the foundation of the right to vote for the Knesset, from which democracy flows'. Thus, many commentators have concluded that the United States is 'exceptional' in its lack of aggressive judicial scrutiny of felon disenfranchisement laws.

5. Voter Identification Laws

Most countries require that voters present a valid identification document at the polling location. In a study of 63 democratic countries, the vast majority—47 countries—required all voters to present some form of identification before voting, while an additional five countries required that certain voters present valid identification. These requirements, however, vary significantly. In some countries—and in some US states—only government-issued, photo-identification documents are accepted, while in other countries, such as Canada, Ireland, Sweden, and India, a wide variety of documents are accepted.

In the United States and other countries that have not traditionally required voter identification, the proposed enactment of voter identification laws has been criticized as an unnecessary and disproportionate method of counteracting potential fraud. In recent years, there has been increased litigation concerning these laws. All High Courts considering the issue have accepted that some limitations on accessibility to the polls may be necessary to meet legitimate government ends. Whether the court allows the implementation of voter identification laws specifically, depends significantly upon the value that the country places on eliminating fraud from the electoral system, as compared to the value it places on facilitating easy access to the polls.

In the United States, the Supreme Court recently concluded not only that combating voter fraud is a legitimate governmental end, but also that 'public confidence in the integrity of the electoral process has independent significance, because it encourages citizen participation in the democratic process' and that combating the mere appearance of fraud therefore is, standing alone, a legitimate governmental objective. Likewise, the Supreme Court of Canada recently held that, while the right to vote must be given a liberal interpretation, some reasonable limitations are necessary, because 'the electoral rights guarantee meaningful participation, not unlimited participation'.

In general, courts have rejected facial attacks on the constitutionality or legality of voter identification laws. In the United States, the Supreme Court's 2008 decision in Crawford v Marion County Election Board rejected facial challenges to voter identification laws that do not require payment to obtain the identification. The Court noted that there was no evidence regarding just how many people would be affected by these identification requirements or any real evidence that seniors, poorer citizens, or students would have difficulty obtaining the requisite government-issued identification. Likewise, the Canadian Court, faced with a similar voting law, held that ‘Constitutional issues should be determined in the context of a concrete set of facts, not in the abstract or hypothetically.’ 51 Unlike the US Supreme Court, however, the Canadian Court found that evidence of the likely effect of a voter identification law was not ‘hypothetical’ and ‘a possible consequence is that some eligible citizens (though likely few in number, given the extensive measures Elections Canada has taken to facilitate voting) may be unable to cast a vote in future elections.’ 52 Nevertheless, the Canadian Court, like the US Supreme Court, found that the government interest in preventing both actual fraud and the appearance of fraud outweighed these possible effects.
Elections

(p. 537) The possible detrimental effect on voter turnout of certain forms of voter identification laws is particularly apparent in countries with large Muslim populations. In India, where the court weighs the government interest in preventing fraud much more highly than it does the individual right to vote, the Supreme Court rejected the argument that female Muslim voters be given special identification cards rather than show their faces in their pictures, in violation of their religious beliefs. The Court held, ‘if you have such strong religious sentiments, and do not want to be seen by members of public, then do not go to vote. You cannot go with burqa to vote. It will create complications in identification of voters.’ 53 Canada faced a similar problem in 2007, when Elections Canada, an independent, non-partisan agency responsible for running federal elections, allowed women in burqas to refrain from lifting their veils to vote; Parliament responded by introducing a bill to require that every voter’s face be visible when voting. Ultimately, the issue was resolved through a compromise allowing Muslim women to affirm an oath of identity and eligibility. 54

As noted in both the Crawford opinion in the United States and Henry opinion in Canada, it is difficult to determine what detrimental effect on voter turnout in practice, if any, more stringent identification requirements create. A study in Ireland, where the government-initiated new identification requirements in 2003, found that about 3 percent of registered voters did not have any of the required identification documents and that 1 percent of voters who went to a polling station were not permitted to cast a ballot because of missing identification. 55 As more countries and states implement voter identification laws, it is likely that this will remain an area of significant litigation and controversy.

III. Political Parties

Well-functioning political party systems are central to the legitimacy of modern democracies, given the need for intermediary entities that can effectively mobilize and organize citizen participation (as well as organize the processes of governance). 56 While older constitutions did not always reflect appreciation of this reality, modern constitutions do. Thus, before 1950 the right to form political parties tended not to exist in written constitutions; since then, however, 60 percent of the constitutions in effect in 2000 guarantee such a right. 57 Moreover, courts in many countries aggressively protect the perceived constitutional rights of political parties. 58

The German Federal Constitutional Court, for example, has been aggressive in striking down regulations that limit a political party’s access to the ballot. Finding that a 500-signature requirement for new parties interfered with open and fair political competition, the Court invalidated that barrier. 59 Similarly, the Court held unconstitutional, for lack of compelling justification, one state’s requirement that a candidate nominated by local voters’ groups secure a minimum number of signatures to appear on the ballot, while political parties did not face a similar obligation. 60 The Canadian Supreme Court has similarly invoked that country’s constitution to protect the rights of regional or smaller political parties in the context of campaign-finance laws. In the landmark Figeuroa case, 61 the Canadian Supreme Court invalidated election laws that required a political party to nominate candidates in at least 50 election districts in order to be officially registered party, with the various state-provided benefits, including election financing, that accompanied registered-party status. The government defended these provisions as designed to ensure that only parties reflecting large coalitions with broad geographic appeal could seek office. The Court held that these provisions violated the guarantee in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms of each citizen’s right to play a meaningful role in the electoral process.

In many countries with proportional representation systems, minor parties have challenged electoral thresholds as violations of various constitutional provisions reflective of democratic principles, such as the right to vote. These challenges typically have failed, except in unusual contexts. Thus, the German Federal Constitutional Court, informed perhaps by Weimar’s experience with a highly fragmented and paralyzed parliamentary system, has rejected several challenges to that system’s 5 percent threshold; the Court has accepted a strong governmental interest in effective governance institutions. The constitutional courts of the Czech Republic and Romania have similarly upheld challenges to their systems’ 5 percent threshold for representation. But in the exceptional context of the immediate aftermath of German reunification, the German court struck down 5 percent thresholds on the view that this threshold would suppress competition and representation from the former East Germany, given the nascent state of democracy in its initial importation into East Germany.

In addressing the constitutional status and rights of political parties, courts have also had to wrestle with whether post-Second World War notions of ‘militant’ democracy justify states in banning or otherwise restricting parties that are thought to be antagonist to the fundamental principles of democratic regimes. Courts in countries including Germany, Spain, India, Turkey, and Israel, along with the regional European Court of Human Rights, have been forced to confront this question. The types of parties banned or otherwise restricted range from neo-Nazi and Communist parties in Germany, to religiously-based and Kurdish separatist parties in Turkey, and to ethnic parties in many constitutions in Asia, sub-Saharan Africa, post-communist Eastern Europe, and the nascent constitutions of Afghanistan and Iraq.

The form of the restriction on impermissible parties varies. India, for example, does not ban parties, but its electoral code regulates ‘corrupt practices’, which include appeals to vote for or against candidates on the ground of religion, race, caste, community, or language, or the use of, or appeal, to religious symbols. The Indian High Court has permitted state electoral authorities to overturn election results when winning candidates have been found to violate these prohibitions. In Israel, as a result of several back-and-forth exchanges between the Israeli Supreme Court and the parliament, the state denies ‘anti-democratic’ parties the right to seek elective office but does not ban them more broadly.

When tested, these party restrictions have been upheld by many courts to date, even as the courts recognize the tension between these restrictions and the rights of democratic association and participation. The most dramatic of these cases come from Turkey and involve the Refah Partisi (Welfare Party), a mass-based Islamic organization that at one time was the largest political party in the Turkish parliament. Yet the Turkish Constitutional Court found the Welfare Party to be ‘anti-democratic’ and in violation of the Turkish constitutional commitment to a democratic and secular state; the Court therefore ordered the dissolution of the party, the surrender of its assets to the state, the removal of four Refah members from parliament, and the banning of the party’s leaders from elective office for five years. When the Welfare Party turned to the European Court of Human Rights, that Court in turn upheld the Turkish courts on the ground that a State cannot be required to wait, before intervening, until a political party has seized power and begun to take concrete steps to implement a policy incompatible with the standards of the Convention and democracy, even though the danger of that policy for democracy is sufficiently established and imminent.

Thus, constitutional courts in many countries permit restraints on ‘extremist parties’ that would clearly be unconstitutional within the First Amendment tradition of the United States.

Courts in at least some countries have also been aware of the ‘inherent authoritarian’ potential in democratic regimes: the risk that existing office holders will use their power to re-write election laws so as to insulate themselves in power. In response, these courts have struck down such laws as violating various constitutional provisions. In addition, courts are beginning to struggle with the problems posed by one-party democracies, such as South Africa—democracies in which one political party is so dominant as to control electoral outcomes over many elections, even when the elections are fair and legitimate.

IV. Campaign Finance

Legislative and regulatory approaches to campaign financing vary greatly across democracies. Even among common law countries with shared histories, the variations can be extreme; Australia, for example, has a laissez-faire system, with no restraints on the sources or size of campaign contributions or expenditures (other than disclosure requirements), while the United Kingdom imposes strict limitations on election spending, including limiting spending by third parties (actors other than candidates or parties) to a paltry £500. When democracies regulate election financing, they typically do so on the basis of one or more of three rationales: (1) preventing corruption or the appearance of corruption—the risk that legislators will trade political benefits, including votes, for large campaign contributions or expenditures; (2) promoting political equality—the view that citizens should not only have equal voting power, but some kind of equal opportunity to influence the electoral process; and (3) enhancing public confidence in the legitimacy of democracy. When democracies do regulate the election-financing system, different democracies rely on a range of different means of doing so: contribution limits, which cap the amounts that can be given to candidates or parties; spending limits, which limit how much candidates, parties, or third parties can spend; public subsidies, which involve public financing of parties, candidates, or campaigns; free or discounted advertising time, which is usually made available only to parties or candidates; and disclosure requirements, which require public disclosure of the sources of large contributions or expenditures.73
Elections

Just as varied as the policy approaches across democracies to these issues has been the response of courts to these measures. Two bases for challenges typically arise. The most common rests on the claim that these measures violate individual rights to liberty or to free expression (the source of these rights might be constitutional or common law). A secondary basis in some countries is the argument that particular measures have the purpose and effect of manipulating the democratic process, either by favoring particular actors and interests or by seeking to entrench the parties and office holders who currently control the legislative process.

In few areas of comparative constitutional law are the responses of courts more radically at odds with each other. Courts across democratic countries differ not on the application of generally shared legal principles, but on foundational questions in this area, such as what kinds of interests are even legitimate ones for governments to pursue in regulating the financing of elections. Some of these differences appear attributable to differences in the provisions of constitutional texts in different countries, but many of the divergences in judicial treatment appear more to reflect deeper politico-cultural differences about how democracy should best be understood. This section looks briefly at the ways several High Courts have addressed these issues, including the US Supreme Court, the High Court of Australia, the German Federal Constitutional Court, the Supreme Court of Canada, the Supreme Court of Japan, and the European Court of Human Rights.

For all these courts, the determinative factor in whether a regulation is found to be constitutional is the degree to which it relates to a legitimate government aim. Key differences exist, however, in the courts’ conceptions of whether the government’s objectives are deemed to be legitimate. The European Court of Human Rights, for example, has found that the government has a ‘legitimate aim of securing equality between candidates’.74 Likewise, the Supreme Court of Canada has recognized that, ‘Limits on [independent] spending are essential to maintain an equilibrium in financial resources and to guarantee the fairness’ of the electoral process.75

(p. 541) In the United States, in contrast, the Supreme Court has expressly rejected the idea that the government has a legitimate interest in eliminating financial inequalities between political parties or candidates. First articulated in the 1976 landmark case of Buckley v Valeo76 and re-confirmed in the 2010 Citizens United v FEC decision,77 this principle has led the US Supreme Court to ‘reject[] the premise that the Government has an interest “in equalizing the relative ability of individuals and groups to influence the outcome of elections”’.78 Similarly, the High Court of Australia, in the seminal case of Australia Capital Television Pty Co v Commonwealth,79 rejected an Australian law (modeled after one in the United Kingdom) that banned paid broadcast advertising and granted political parties regulated free broadcast advertising; the government had argued that the law would reduce corruption by diminishing the role of large campaign contributions and would promote equality.80 The similarities between the US and Australian courts is particularly striking because, while the text of the Constitution in the former includes a free speech guarantee written in absolutist terms (unlike the more expressly limited free speech provisions in the Canadian Charter), Australia has no explicit protection for freedom of speech in its Constitution. Nevertheless, Australia’s High Court found that the constitutional commitment to representative government implied rights of political communication and that such rights were violated by these bans on paid broadcast political advertisements.

The Supreme Court of Canada and the European Court of Human Rights, however, have been more willing to permit government to pursue political equality and anti-corruption aims even when in tension with freedom of speech concerns. Thus, the Supreme Court of Canada has concluded that ‘the principle of fairness presupposes that certain rights or freedoms can legitimately be restricted in the name of a healthy electoral democracy’.81 Likewise, the European Court of Human Rights finds support for balancing free political speech with the goal of ensuring equality in elections in the text of the Article 10 of the Convention, which recognizes that freedom of speech ‘may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society’ among other legitimate limitations. Therefore, enormous differences across systems exist with regard to foundational questions concerning the relationship of political equality to free speech.

A different concern about campaign-finance laws, addressed in the courts of some countries, is that sitting legislators will use this power to entrench themselves and their allies. Of course, it should be noted that the failure to adopt legislation in this area can also be a means of entrenching the status quo. After all, sitting legislators have been elected, by definition, under the existing legal framework, and changes in the status quo often create uncertainty as to how those changes will play out on the ground; thus, sitting legislators might be assumed presumptively to want to maintain the financing rules under which they were elected. But the temptation to ensure their own re-election prospects or the continuing dominance of their partisan control can also lead to the enactment of new laws designed to favor the legislators’ allies or punish their opponents. Thus far, few courts appear to have confronted this problem directly in the area of election financing. An intriguing 1999 decision from the Constitutional Court for the Republic of Korea, however, shows one judicial approach to this issue.

The Korean government had enacted a statute banning political contributions by labor unions. The government justified the statute as of way of preventing the politicization of unions and of protecting union finances. The Korean court, however, held that this statute violated the Korean Constitution’s guarantees of freedom of expression and association, because the statute singled out labor unions from among all ‘social organizations’ for this unique proscription. The court noted that in the modern era, ‘interest groups and political parties are indispensable elements of democratic decision-making’, and that ‘individuals can realize their political identities through groups that synthesize, prioritize, and reconcile their various interests and desires.’ Though the statute sought to define labor organizations as limited to improvement of working conditions through collective bargaining, the court concluded both that the statute interfered with political freedom, by not permitting unions to contribute to campaigns, and was also discriminatory, because it singled out labor unions for this prohibition; as the court put it,
‘the role of social organizations in the people’s political decision-making is equally applicable to labor unions’. One wonders how much this decision rests on substantive grounds of political freedom rather than on the discriminatory nature of singling out unions for special prohibitions. In the United States, for example, the courts have long accepted even-handed bans on union and corporate general treasury contributions to candidates and campaigns.

Similarly, different cultural understandings of democracy inform interpretations of textually similar free speech guarantees in other arenas involving the campaign process. Article 21 of the Japanese Constitution, for example, guarantees ‘Freedom of assembly and association as well as speech, press and all other forms of expression’; in addition, it provides that ‘no censorship shall be maintained, nor shall the secrecy of any means of communication be violated’. Yet despite these provisions, the Japanese courts regularly uphold relatively severe (by comparison to the United States, at least) legal restrictions on election-related speech activity. In doing so, these courts defer to ‘communal interests’, such as the public welfare, that justify restrictions on individual freedoms for the purpose of what is perceived to be protection of the fairness of the election system as a whole.

In the well-known Taniguchi Canvassing Case, for example, the Japanese Supreme Court upheld the Public Office Election Law’s ban on candidates engaging in door-to-door canvassing for votes. The Court deferred to the legislative conclusion that canvassing could lead to bribery, ‘voting for vested interests’, or disturbing the voters’ peace. The Supreme Court declared that broad restrictions on campaigns are constitutional even when they ban practices that do not ‘substantively violate the spirit of fair elections’. The Election Law also prohibits newspapers and magazines from ‘interfering’ with free elections by providing ‘information and comment’ that ‘might affect a specific candidate’s elections chances’. The Supreme Court unanimously upheld this law against a convicted publisher’s constitutional challenge (though the Court construed the law narrowly and exempted from its scope what the Court called ‘truly fair information and comment’). With respect to modern technologies of communication, Japanese election law flatly bans candidate communications via email, websites, and social media are subject during the campaign period.

V. Conclusion
One of the most striking developments over recent decades is the way courts around the world have moved from enforcing individual rights and principles of equality to policing the structures and processes of democracy itself. In areas ranging from the rights of political participation, the role of political parties, the financing of elections, the resolution of disputed elections, and the design of democratic institutions, courts have increasingly brought constitutional law to bear on the heart of the political process. This constitutionalization of democratic politics has great promise as well as great risk. Democracy is an ongoing process of self-correction and self-determination, as political communities struggle over defining the kinds of political processes that will generate widely accepted, legitimate forms of self-governance; the risk is that by constitutionalizing democratic politics, courts will wrongly freeze in place existing democratic arrangements and frustrate the power of political communities to determine for themselves how best to be perfect the democratic process. The promise is that courts will find ways to counter the inherent pathologies of democratic systems, through which political insiders attempt to entrench themselves more deeply in power, as well as ensuring that democratic systems remain open, inclusive, and competitive.

Bibliography

Keith D. Ewing and Samuel Issacharoff (eds), Party Funding and Campaign Financing in International Perspective (2006)

Notes:

(*) For a great deal of help with research in the production of this chapter, I thank Lynn Eisenberg. I also thank Jeff Oakley for additional research assistance.

(1) Many of the classic works of this sort were written by Arend Lijphart, such as Democracies: Patterns of Majoritarian and Consensus Government in Twenty-One Countries (1984).

(5) Massicotte et al (n 4), 17. Other, less democratic countries that allow 16-year-olds to vote include Cuba and Nicaragua, while Iran allows 15-year-olds to vote. Greg Hurst, ‘Ministers Contemplate Cut in Voting Age to 16’, The...
Elections

(7) Electoral Commission (n 6).

(9) US Constitution, Amendment XXVI.

(10) Australian Constitution, s 41; King v Jones [1972] HCA 44.

(11) King (n 10).

(14) Vyhnánek (n 12), 7.

(16) Although 147 countries signed the Convention, only 99 countries went on to ratify the Convention. See UN ‘Rights and Dignity of Persons with Disabilities’, available at (http://www.un.org/disabilities/).

(17) Vyhnánek (n 12), 6; United Nations (n 16).

(18) See Chapter 48 on citizenship.

(22) Massicotte et al (n 4), 28.

(25) The ten states that have never allowed non-citizen voting are: Alaska, Arizona, California, Hawaii, Iowa, Maine, Mississippi, New Mexico, Utah, and West Virginia. Hayduk (n 23), 19–20 (T 2.1).

(29) Blais et al (n 19), 56.

(31) Massicotte et al (n 4), 32. Canada, a very established democratic country and former colony of the United Kingdom, allows its citizens to vote from abroad for a maximum of five years only.

(35) American Civil Liberties Union (n 32), 6.

(39) Hirst v United Kingdom (No 2), App no 74025/01, Judgment of 6 October 2005, para 79 (‘there is no evidence that Parliament has ever sought to weigh the competing interests or to assess the proportionality of a blanket ban on the right of a convicted prisoner to vote’).

(40) National Institution of Crime Prevention and the Re-Integration of Offenders (NICRO), Erasmus and Schwagerl v Minister of Home Affairs (2004) CCT 03/04 (holding that the legislature cannot deprive convicted prisoners of valuable rights that they retain in order to correct a public misconception as to its true attitude to crime and criminals).

(43) See Alec C. Ewald and Brandan Rottingham (eds), Criminal Disenfranchisement in an International Perspective (2009).

(44) Massicotte et al (n 4), 121.

(46) In the United States, only three states—Florida, Georgia, and Florida—require photographic identification of all voters and will not allow voters without identification to vote after signing an affidavit; 24 states require some form of identification. Schaffer and Wang (n 45), 397. However, 37 states are presently considering implementing or altering voter identification laws. See Nhu-Y Ngo and Keisha Gaskins, Brennan Center for Justice, Voter ID Legislation in the States (2011).

(49) Crawford (n 47).

(50) Ibid.

(51) Henry (n 48).

(52) Ibid.

(55) Schaffer and Wang (n 45), 404–5.

(56) For a further discussion of political parties see Chapter 41.

(59) Ballot Admission Case, 3 BVerfGE 19 (1953).

(60) Stoevesandt Case, 12 BVerfGE 10, 25 (1960).

(64) National Unity Election Case, 82 BVerfGE 322 (1990).

(67) See Basic Law: The Knesset §7A (excluding anti-democratic parties from elections).

(68) See eg Socialist Reich Party Case, 2 BVerfGE 1 (1952).

(69) Turkish Constitutional Court, Decision no 1998/1, January 16, 1998.

(70) Refah Partisi (The Welfare Party) and Others v Turkey, App nos 41340/98, 41342/98, 41343/98, and 41344/98, Judgment of 13 February 2003 (Grand Chamber).

(72) For the leading article on this subject, see Sujit Choudhry, ‘“He Had a Mandate”: The South African Constitutional Court and the African National Congress in Dominant Party Democracy’ (2009) 2 Constitutional Elections

Court Review 1.

(73) For a discussion on the range of regulatory efforts as well as the factors affecting a country's choice of regulations, see Keith D. Ewing and Samuel Issacharoff (eds), Party Funding and Campaign Financing in International Perspective (2006), 6.

(75) Libman v Quebec [1997] 3 SCR 569.

(76) 424 US 1 (1976).

(77) 130 S Ct 876 (2010).

(78) Ibid 904.

(81) Libman (n 75).

(82) Bowman (n 74).

(83) For a fuller survey of these cases, see Richard H. Hasen, ‘Regulation of Campaign Finance’ in Vikram Amar and Mark Tushnet (eds), Global Perspectives on Constitutional Law (2009).

(84) Trade Unions’ Political Contributions Case [1999] 11-2 KCCR 555, 95 Hun-Ma 154. This discussion is based on a quoted summary of the decisions available at (http://english.court.go.kr).

(85) The translations of these provisions is taken from Ronald Krotoszynski, The First Amendment in Cross-Cultural Perspective (2006), 141, which also offers an excellent broader comparative perspective on first amendment issues more generally.

(86) Public Offices Election Law, Law No 100 of 1950. Article 138 states that ‘No one shall conduct a door-to-door canvass with the intention of soliciting a vote for oneself or another person or to prevent the voter from voting for another person.’

(87) Krotoszynski (n 85), 154.

(89) Ibid 150. More recently, a concurring opinion by Justice Ito dismissed the previous reasons for upholding the law against constitutional challenge, finding ‘the public welfare’ insufficient to justify the restrictions on freedom of expression entailed by the canvassing ban. Takatsu v Japan [1981] 35 Keishū 5 at 568 reprinted in Itoh and Beer (n 88), 998. Nonetheless, Justice Ito ultimately would have upheld the ban, too, because of the ‘wide discretion given to the legislature to make ... rules’ governing fair elections. Because, in his view, ‘an election campaign ... is not a context where all sorts of speeches can compete with each other with the minimum necessary restraints’, he concluded the Japanese constitution did not require striking down the canvassing ban.

Richard H. Pildes
Richard H. Pildes is Sudler Family Professor of Constitutional Law, New York University School of Law
Abstract and Keywords

The term ‘horizontal structuring’ refers to the constitutional system for allocating power among government actors at the same geographic level of organization. The concept is referred to in some systems as ‘separation of powers’. Modern democracies do not all employ the same forms of horizontal structuring. For example, while presidential systems typically involve a sharp distinction between executive and legislative power, parliamentary systems do not. Indeed, constitutional systems range in a spectrum from those with strong separation of powers (e.g., the United States) to those with greater fusion of powers (e.g., the United Kingdom), with many falling somewhere in the middle. Some constitutions further subdivide power within a branch of government — for example by creating a bicameral legislature with an upper and lower house, or by creating both a president and a prime minister. This article explores the various forms of horizontal structuring employed in modern constitutional democracies, as well as debates about their relative advantages and disadvantages.

Keywords: separation of powers, constitutional democracies, presidential systems, parliamentary systems, executive power, legislative power

I. Introduction 548
II. History 548
III. Executive and Legislative Power 553

1. Presidential versus Parliamentary Systems: The Basic Distinction 553
   (a) Presidential Systems 553
      i. The United States: The Classic Presidential System 553
      ii. Latin American Countries: Troubled Presidentialism 554
      iii. Presidentialism in Eastern Europe and the Former Soviet Union: Renewed Promise or Renewed Threat? 555
      iv. South Korea 555
   (b) Parliamentary Systems 556
      i. United Kingdom: Westminster Model 556
      ii. Constrained Parliamentarianism: The Examples of Germany and South Africa 556
   (c) Hybrid or Semi-Presidential Systems 557
      i. France 557
      ii. Other Semi-Presidential Systems 558
   (d) Normative Arguments about Parliamentary versus Presidential Systems 558
   (e) Judicial Review of Executive Appointments and Removal 560

2. Beyond the Presidential versus Parliamentary Debate: Other Issues in the Structuring of Executive and Legislative Power 561
   (a) Subdivision of Legislative Power 561
I. Introduction

The term ‘horizontal structuring’ refers to the constitutional system for allocating power among government actors at the same geographic level of organization. The concept is referred to in some systems as ‘separation of powers’.\(^1\) Separation of powers is considered normatively desirable for several reasons, including: the idea that dividing power will inhibit government action and therefore tyranny; the idea that different types of government bodies are more or less competent at certain tasks; and the idea that certain allocations of authority will help ensure democratic legitimacy for government policies. Horizontal structuring should be distinguished from vertical structuring, which involves the division of authority between different organizational levels of government,\(^2\) for example federal and state governments. Horizontal structuring, by contrast, involves the division of power between the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of one level of government.

Modern democracies do not all employ the same forms of horizontal structuring. For example, while presidential systems typically involve a sharp distinction between executive and legislative power, parliamentary systems do not. Indeed, constitutional systems range in a spectrum from those with strong separation of powers (eg the United States) to those with greater fusion of powers (eg the United Kingdom), with many falling somewhere in the middle. Some constitutions further subdivide power within a branch of government—for example by creating a bicameral legislature with an upper and lower house, or by creating both a president and a prime minister. This chapter explores the various forms of horizontal structuring employed in modern constitutional democracies, as well as debates about their relative advantages and disadvantages.

II. History

Western political theory usually traces the idea of constitutional separation of powers to the writings of Montesquieu, although it is also acknowledged that related ideas appear in the earlier writings of others.\(^3\) One of the earliest antecedents to modern notions of separation of (p. 549) powers is the concept of mixed government. The mixed government concept posits combining rule by the one (the monarch), the few (the aristocrats), and the many (the people).\(^4\) Aristotle discussed the possibility of combining monarchy, oligarchy, and democracy, and Polybius and Cicero further popularized the idea of mixed government. These later writers suggested that the Roman Republic constituted a successful form of mixed government through its combination of monarchy (through the consuls), aristocracy (the senate), and the people (assemblies), each of which checked and balanced the other.\(^5\) Theories of mixed government were widely discussed by European political theorists in the seventeenth century.

The constitutional struggles between the king and parliament in England in the seventeenth century gave rise to the related, but distinct, idea of a functional separation of powers, which is the core of the modern doctrine.\(^6\) Functional separation of powers is the idea of dividing different government functions—for example, the function of generating new legal rules through legislation and the function of applying legislation to the facts of particular cases—among different government actors. This line of thinking was reflected in the writings of John Locke, who distinguished between the legislative and executive functions of government. In his 1689 Second Treatise on Government, Locke explained that because human frailty led men to ‘grasp at power’, it was dangerous ‘for the same persons who have the power of making Laws, to have also in their hands the power to execute them.’ Locke argued that ‘the legislative is the supreme power’, and suggested that ‘in all moderated Monarchies and well-framed Governments’ the ‘legislative and executive power are in distinct hands’.

Several statutes passed in the wake of the Glorious Revolution of 1688 reinforced the idea of a distinction between executive and legislative power in England, as well as the notion of judicial independence. The English Bill of Rights Act of 1689 established some of the central principles of Britain’s constitutional monarchy by declaring that ‘the pretended power of suspending the laws or the execution of laws by regal authority without consent of Parliament is illegal’ and that parliamentary consent was required to raise revenue or maintain a standing army. The Act also sought to preserve the independence of Parliament and the courts by providing ‘That election of members of Parliament ought to be free’, and ‘That jurors ought to be duly impannelled and returned, and jurors which pass upon men in trials for high treason ought to be freeholders.’ The Act also strengthened judicial independence by requiring that judges should remain in office during good behavior and could only be removed by Parliament.

(p. 550) It was against this backdrop that Montesquieu wrote his seminal book The Spirit of the Laws, published in 1748. Montesquieu explicated his theory of separation of powers through a discussion of the English system, which he praised for being the one nation in the world ‘that has for the direct end of its constitution political liberty’. Many commentators have criticized Montesquieu for providing an inaccurate description of the English system, which involved a greater degree of fusion of power in practice than he acknowledged. But it is undoubtedly true that the British system and the developments of the Glorious Revolution provided Montesquieu with much of his inspiration.

Montesquieu’s main contribution lay in his extended development of the functional separation of powers, though he also warned in earlier notions of mixed government and checks and balances. Montesquieu described governments as falling into one of several categories: republican (either democratic or aristocratic), monarchical, and despotical. For Montesquieu, the various forms of republican and monarchical government each had their virtues, but despotism—the situation in which ‘a single person directs everything by his own will and caprice’—was undesirable. Despotical governments left their subjects in a state of poverty, insecurity, and fear. Stable republican governments and law-abiding monarchies, on the other hand, yielded conditions of liberty and prosperity. A central problem, however, was that these forms of government were not always stable, and without good management could collapse into despotism. Montesquieu believed that since ‘constant experience shows us that every man invested with power is apt to abuse it ... [it is] necessary from the very nature of things that power should be a check to power.’ Accordingly, he argued that the powers of government should be divided among different persons or bodies, which would act as a check on each other. If powers were concentrated in one person or body, there would be no check on the exercise of power and this results in a swift descent into despotism.

Modern writers typically attribute the tripartite categorization of functional separation of powers into legislative, executive, and judicial power directly to Montesquieu, although the author himself broke things down slightly differently. ‘In every government there are three sorts of power’, he explained, ‘the legislative; the executive in respect to things dependent on the law of nations; and the executive, in regard to matters that depend on the civil law.’ The first, the legislative power, consisted of the power to enact or amend laws. The second, the foreign affairs aspect of the executive power, included the power to make war or peace, send and receive ambassadors, establish public security, and protect against invasion. The third, ‘the executive in regard to matters that depend on the civil law’, consisted of punishing criminals (which he termed simply the ‘executive power of the state’) and resolving disputes that arise between individuals (which he termed ‘the judiciary power’). It is worth noting the blurring of executive and judicial functions in Montesquieu’s third category, particularly with regard to the function of professional judges (as opposed to lay juries, upon whom Montesquieu focused great praise).

(p. 551) Montesquieu believed that ‘When the legislative and executive powers are united in the same person, or in the same body of magistracy, there can be then no liberty’, for in such a system tyrannical laws may be put in place and executed in a tyrannical matter.
As for the judicial power, he advocated that judges in republics must strictly follow ‘the letter of the law’, an idea that proved particularly influential in France.\(^{21}\)

Montesquieu's model acknowledged an inevitable overlap in powers and indeed demanded it in certain ways (as, eg, with the executive's veto power over legislation) as the mechanism by which the powers could check each other's actions. Nevertheless, Montesquieu believed that the core of each function should be retained by its designated branch, a somewhat essentialist idea for which he has been criticized.\(^{22}\)

Even if the actual English system involved a greater fusion of power than Montesquieu might have thought desirable,\(^{23}\) William Blackstone, directly assimilated Montesquieu's ideas into his influential Commentaries on the Law of England. Like Montesquieu, Blackstone tended to mingle the idea of a functional separation of powers with the idea of mixed government and its checks and balances. For instance, Blackstone explained, ‘it is highly necessary for preserving the balance of the constitution, that the executive power should be a branch, though not the whole, of the legislature.’\(^{24}\) Blackstone grounded his observations in the particular English experience of the struggle between king and parliament in the seventeenth century.\(^{25}\)

Montesquieu's ideas were also particularly influential on the architects of the American\(^{26}\) and French Revolutions. The French Declaration of the Rights of Man in 1789, for example, stated that ‘A society where rights are not secured or the separation of powers established has no constitution at all’,\(^{27}\) and the American Continental Congress called him ‘the immortal Montesquieu’.\(^{28}\)

James Madison, writing in Federalist no 51,\(^{29}\) explained that separation of powers was ‘admitted on all hands to be essential to the preservation of liberty’, and was to be achieved by ‘contriving the interior structure of the government as that its several constituent parts may, by their mutual relations, be the means of keeping each other in their proper places.’ Reflecting the views of the time about which branch would be most powerful, Madison wrote in Federalist no 51 that ‘in republican government, the legislative authority necessarily predominates’ and he suggested that ‘the weakness of the executive may require ... that it should be fortified’. Over the centuries, of course, it has become clear that the executive needs little fortification.

(p. 552) It is important to recognize that separation of powers was never conceived as involving a perfect and hermetically sealed division of responsibility. For example, Madison, writing in Federalist no 47, anticipated some overlap in authority, noting that serious concerns arose primarily ‘where the whole power of one department is exercised by the same hands which possess the whole power of another department’.

Madison urged that the appointment and maintenance in office of officials of each branch be kept as separate as possible, but suggested that:

- the great security against a gradual concentration of the several powers in the same department, consists in giving to those who administer each department the necessary constitutional means and personal motives to resist encroachments of the others. ... Ambition must be made to counteract ambition.

Madison's ideas about how to protect against the undue influence of different factions of society through governmental structures are also significant, and represent the evolution of ideas of mixed government into a form suitable for a republican nation.\(^{30}\)

Participants in the French Revolution were also influenced by Montesquieu, but they took quite different lessons from his writings. In France, a main project of the revolution was ‘to protect the executive against judicial interference’, which had been common in the ancien régime in which judges were ‘centers of conservative power’.\(^{31}\) Thus, in revolutionary France, rules were put in place ensuring that judges ‘could not issue regulations, question the legality of administrative rules, orders or other executive action, examine the legality of the conduct of public officials or compel reluctant officials to perform their legal duties.’\(^{32}\) As John Merryman wrote, ‘The most powerful consequence of the French doctrine of separation of powers may have been to demean judges and the judicial function.’\(^{33}\) Following Montesquieu's ideas of the judge as a mechanical applicator of law to facts, there emerged the idea that judges could not ‘make rules applicable to future cases’, nor could they ‘question the validity or alter the meaning of legislation’.\(^{34}\) As a consequence of these restrictions on the judiciary, there eventually emerged a separate system of administrative tribunals formally located within the executive branch, culminating in the Conseil d'État.
Not all constitutional systems, of course, claim to have been influenced by Montesquieu's model. Referring to Canada's mixed constitution, for example, one scholar explained that 'Canadians are not in the habit of looking to Montesquieu for an understanding of the nature of political institutions in their country', and that his work is generally deemed to have been more influential in France and the United States than Britain or former British colonies, which is undoubtedly true. But in recent years, even Britain has moved towards greater separation of powers, for example with the removal of its highest appellate court from the House of Lords into an independent Supreme Court. Moreover, the basic functional categories of executive, legislative, and judicial power remain analytically useful in examining how different constitutions divide government power. Emergent democracies in the past few decades have adopted a wide variety of structures, some of which draw inspiration from the American, French, or British models, and some of which combine them in new ways.

III. Executive and Legislative Power

1. Presidential versus Parliamentary Systems: The Basic Distinction

Observers divide most constitutional systems into presidential (typified by the United States), parliamentary (typified by the United Kingdom), and semi-presidential (typified by France). In a presidential system, the chief executive (the president) is elected separately from the legislature. In a parliamentary system, the chief executive (the prime minister) and sometimes other executive officials (cabinet ministers) are chosen by—and in some systems may be drawn from—the membership of the legislature. In parliamentary systems, the prime minister typically may be removed during office by a no-confidence vote in the legislature, while in a presidential system the president's tenure in office does not depend on legislative support (absent the rare circumstances of impeachment for misconduct). The most obvious consequence of these differences in structure is that in a presidential system, the president is independent of the legislature, and indeed may be from a different political party than the majority of the legislature. In a parliamentary system, on the other hand, whichever party or coalition of parties controls the legislature also controls the executive branch (sometimes called 'the government'). Presidential systems thus exemplify a relatively high degree of separation between executive and legislative power, while parliamentary systems involve a greater fusion of executive and legislative authority. There are also hybrid systems, sometimes called 'semi-presidential' systems, that fall somewhere in between.

The next sections describe some prominent presidential and parliamentary constitutions, and their key attributes on matters such as: the procedures by which the head of government is selected and removed from office; the powers of the chief executive in proposing or vetoing legislation; the structure of the legislature and its areas of authority. This limited survey of systems is intended simply to highlight some of the key differences in how separation of powers is implemented.

(a) Presidential Systems

i. The United States: The Classic Presidential System

The United States has the quintessential presidential system, with the President and the legislature selected independent of one another. Article II of the US Constitution provides that 'the executive power shall be vested in the President of the United States America'. The President is elected following a nationwide vote for that office on a fixed schedule through a mechanism known as the Electoral College. Because most states employ a winner-takes-all approach to allocating their electors' votes, it is possible for a candidate who won a majority or plurality of the nationwide popular vote to nevertheless lose in the Electoral College. This has happened in several elections, including the 2000 presidential election, prompting criticism of the Electoral College as antiquated and undemocratic.

The 'legislative powers' of the federal government are vested in the Congress, which consists of the Senate and the House of Representatives. Each house is given certain special responsibilities. Legislation is enacted by vote of a simple majority of each house followed by presentation to the President. The Congress can override a presidential veto by two-thirds (p. 554) vote of each house. The President may recommend legislation to the Congress, but the Congress is not obliged to act on his recommendations.
Horizontal Structuring

ii. Latin American Countries: Troubled Presidentialism

Presidential systems predominate in Latin America, likely due to the hemispheric influence of the United States.40 Countries in the region with presidential systems include Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Uruguay, and Venezuela. Indeed, only Belize (a former British colony) and some of the Caribbean nations have parliamentary systems.

Until relatively recently, democracy had a troubled history in Latin America, which some scholars have attributed in part to flaws in the presidential model (combined, of course, with other social, political, and economic factors).41 There are a variety of different theories for why this might be so, but a dominant one is the idea that when the president does not enjoy the support of a majority of the legislature (which can happen in presidential but not most parliamentary systems), the resulting paralysis can lead to frustration and eventually to constitutional breakdown. Others have noted that the presidential systems that have survived intact for long periods of time have mainly involved two-party systems, while multi-party presidential democracies have proven more prone to deadlock and breakdown.42

In addition to the basic fact of presidentialism, many scholars have examined the differences between presidential systems in Latin America and the United States in an attempt to discern any formal legal factors (as opposed to social factors) that might help explain why the US presidential system has remained stable and so many in Latin America have not. Scholars have noted that many Latin American constitutions in the mid to late-twentieth century provided for comparatively greater powers in the office of the presidency and reduced authority in the legislature and courts. For example, ‘it was noted that many constitutions permitted the executive branch to introduce bills into congress, and in some countries, only the president could initiate legislation’ on certain subjects. Moreover, ‘In several nations, promulgation of executive-initiated laws was automatic if congress did not reject the measures.’43 Many Latin American presidents had the power of ‘line-item veto’,44 and greater independent authority to appoint federal and state officials. Finally, many Latin American constitutions included emergency provisions that entitled the executive to declare a state of siege or emergency.45

More recently, a greater number of Latin American countries have achieved democratic stability, but have not abandoned the presidential model, casting some doubt on the importance of presidentialism in their previous instability. Of course, only time will tell whether these regimes remain stable in the long run.

(p. 555) iii. Presidentialism in Eastern Europe and the Former Soviet Union: Renewed Promise or Renewed Threat?

Many constitutions adopted in the 1990s in newly independent states of the former Soviet Union follow a presidential model.46 Indeed, according to one study, of the roughly 25 countries formed out of the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, ‘only three—Hungary, the new Czech Republic, and Slovakia—have chosen pure parliamentarianism’.47 While some have used the prevalence of presidentialism in the former Eastern bloc to suggest that presidentialism is alive and well in constitution-making,48 it is worth noting that most of the former Soviet republics that adopted presidential systems—Azerbaijan, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan, for example—rank very low on indices of functioning democracies.49 Many East European countries that adopted parliamentary or semi-presidential regimes—Poland, Bulgaria, Croatia, and Romania, for example—rank comparatively higher in terms of having at least partially functional democracies.50 One study suggested a strong division between Eastern Europe and the former Soviet states, suggesting that parliamentarianism has dominated in Eastern Europe, while presidentialism has dominated in the former Soviet republics.51 Other scholars have argued that more of the former communist constitutions should be classified as ‘semi-presidential’, an argument discussed below in the section on semi-presidentialism.

iv. South Korea

South Korea is today considered a prominent example of a relatively well-functioning presidential system. After decades of authoritarian presidential regimes exercising emergency powers, South Korea successfully transitioned to become a stable democracy in the late 1980s and early 1990s. The current South Korean Constitution retains a presidential system, but this Sixth Republic constitution successfully broke the historic pattern of dictatorship in part because it ‘strengthened the power of the National Assembly and considerably reduced the power of the executive’. 52

Under the current constitution, the South Korean President is directly elected by popular vote and serves a single, five-year term. 53 There is a unicameral legislature called the National Assembly. The President also appoints a Prime Minister with the consent of the National Assembly. The Prime Minister ‘shall assist the President and shall direct the Executive Ministries under order of the President’. 54 Members of the State Council are appointed by the President upon recommendation of the Prime Minister. 55

(p. 556) (b) Parliamentary Systems

i. United Kingdom: Westminster Model

The modern British system, sometimes called the Westminster model, is a parliamentary system with a relatively high degree of fusion of executive and legislative power. Indeed, at one point it was said that ‘The efficient secret of the English Constitution may be described as the close union, the nearly complete fusion, of the executive and legislative powers.’ 56 England has a bicameral legislature, consisting of the House of Commons and the House of Lords. Members of the House of Commons are popularly elected from single-member districts, while the House of Lords consists of life peers (appointed by the monarch on the recommendation of the Prime Minister), bishops, and elected hereditary peers. Although the House of Commons has a greater role in the legislative process, the House of Lords is considered an important check on the government. 57

The political party (or coalition of parties) with a majority in the House of Commons selects a Prime Minister. Voters do not vote directly for the Prime Minister, but instead for their particular member of parliament. The Prime Minister and the Cabinet remain members of the legislature, and play a large role in setting the legislative program. The Prime Minister also exercises control over parliament because of his or her power to dissolve parliament and call for new elections. 58 Because the Prime Minister and legislative majority are drawn from the same party, there is less likelihood of deadlock and a greater chance that legislation will pass. It is worth noting, however, that ‘While there is in practice a fusion of legislative and executive powers, there is in principle a distinction between the two functions’, and the government cannot change statutory law without passing legislation through a parliament. 59 In other words, the Prime Minister cannot change the laws at his or her discretion; the formal legislative process must be observed.

ii. Constrained Parliamentarianism: The Examples of Germany and South Africa

(1) Germany

Many other countries with parliamentary systems differ somewhat from the Westminster model. The German system has been described, in contrast to the Westminster model, as ‘constrained parliamentarianism’. 60 The German Constitution, or Basic Law, formally creates two executive officials, a President and a Federal Chancellor, but the President in practice serves a mostly symbolic, non-partisan role. 61 The Federal Chancellor is appointed and removable by the Bundestag, the lower house of parliament. 62 The ‘constrained’ part of German parliamentarianism comes in part from the limits on the power of the legislature to remove the Chancellor. The Bundestag cannot remove the Chancellor from office without appointing a successor. 63 This was designed to avoid the instability that had characterized German (p. 557) government under the Weimar regime. The legislature also cannot ordinarily be dissolved early, except following the failure of a confidence vote and even then only if a new Chancellor has not been elected. 64

(2) South Africa

South Africa provides a different example of ‘constrained parliamentarianism’. The constitution vests legislative power in a bicameral parliament consisting of a National Assembly and a National Council of Provinces. 65 Cabinet members, deputy ministers, or members of the national assembly may introduce bills, though certain types of financial bills must be introduced by the relevant cabinet minister. 66 Despite being termed a ‘president’, the South African President is actually selected by the parliament rather than by direct election, 67 with the result that the system is best classified as a form of parliamentary system. The President is both head of state and head of government. 68 He or she is selected by the National Assembly from among its members. 69 Unlike some parliamentary systems, however, South Africa constrains the ability of the legislature to remove an executive once in office; the President may be removed only by a two-thirds vote of the National Assembly on grounds of ‘a serious violation of the Constitution or the law’, ‘serious misconduct’, or ‘inability to perform the functions of office’.\textsuperscript{70}

(c) Hybrid or Semi-Presidential Systems

i. France

The French system is a hybrid, with aspects of both presidential and parliamentary models, and is sometimes called a ‘semi-presidential’ system. Under the 1958 Fifth Republic Constitution, the French President is elected by direct universal suffrage.\textsuperscript{71} The President appoints a Prime Minister, who must enjoy the support of a majority of the parliament. Though the President is by far the stronger of the two offices, the President and Prime Minister to some degree share executive power. During periods of ‘cohabitation’, when the parliamentary majority is from a different party than the President, Prime Ministers have enjoyed greater control over domestic policymaking. To a lesser degree, Prime Ministers have also participated in foreign and defense policy.\textsuperscript{72}

The French legislature consists of a bicameral parliament comprised of the National Assembly (elected by direct, universal suffrage), and the Senate (elected through an indirect, electoral college system).\textsuperscript{73} The National Assembly represents the entire citizenry and the Senate represents France’s territorial units. Power is split unequally between the two houses, with the National Assembly exercising much broader powers than the Senate. Most significantly, only the National Assembly may dissolve the government, either through a vote of no confidence or by refusing to endorse the government’s program.\textsuperscript{74} Ordinarily, legislation must pass both \textit{(p. 558)} houses in the same terms to become law. However, when the two houses cannot agree, the government can, with few exceptions, grant the National Assembly final say on the issue.\textsuperscript{75}

ii. Other Semi-Presidential Systems

Some scholars argue that semi-presidentialism, rather than presidentialism or parliamentarianism, is the most popular model in recent constitutions.\textsuperscript{76} Like the French system, these semi-presidential systems combine ‘a popularly elected head of state with a head of government who is responsible to a popularly elected legislature’.\textsuperscript{77} Cindy Skach argues that the constitutions of Belarus, Croatia, Poland, Romania, Russia, and Ukraine are best characterized as semi-presidential. However, the Russian Constitution defines the role of the President in substantially broader terms than other semi-presidential or even presidential systems. As a result, the Russian system is sometimes referred to as ‘superpresidentialism’.\textsuperscript{78} Skach notes that, in most of these systems, ‘the power to preside over cabinet meetings and to direct national policy, is shared between these two executives’, which can be problematic as ‘such power sharing precludes a neat division or clear separation of powers, often leading to constitutional ambiguity’.\textsuperscript{79} This issue is addressed in more detail in the next section.

(d) Normative Arguments about Parliamentary versus Presidential Systems

Parliamentary, presidential, and semi-presidential systems each have advantages and disadvantages. This section surveys the lively normative debate about whether one type of system is preferable to the other.

Beginning in the 1990s, the troubled history of democracy in Latin America led some political scientists, most notably Juan Linz, to suggest that presidential systems may be inherently unstable compared to parliamentary systems.\textsuperscript{80} While it is difficult to untangle causation, these scholars noted that of the 93 countries that became independent between 1945 and 1979, all of those that remained continuously democratic between 1980 and 1989 were parliamentary systems, while none of the non-parliamentary systems remained continuously democratic.\textsuperscript{81} Some of these observers hypothesized that when the president and the legislature in a presidential system are from different political parties or are otherwise unwilling to cooperate, the resulting deadlock can lead to frustration and ultimately collapse of the system as one actor seizes power. Linz thought this was particularly likely in presidential systems due to the combination of a propensity for political stalemate and the already inherent concentration of powers in the executive.\textsuperscript{82}

Of course, a deadlock between the president and legislature does not inevitably lead to collapse of democracy. The president and the legislature may cooperate and compromise; \textit{(p. 559)} perhaps achieving a solution that is better than the one that each might have imposed had they been able to act unilaterally. Bruce Ackerman labeled this the Madisonian hope, based on James Madison’s optimism that the structure of American government would check faction and lead to good policy. Finally, a third possible outcome of deadlock between the president and the legislature is neither good governance nor outright collapse, but ‘endless backbiting, mutual recrimination, and partisan deadlock’.

Ackerman suggested that parliamentary governments will know that the legislation they pass can be undone if they lose the next election. By contrast, in presidential and semi-presidential systems, when the president actually enjoys the support of the legislature—what he described as a system of ‘full authority’—the government has the power to entrench its policies into place for a longer period of time. This, he asserted, is because the government knows that even if it loses the legislature at the next election, it may retain the presidency or other offices. But paradoxically, he argued, politicians in this scenario will focus on policies that have large symbolic impact in order to further their chances in the next election rather than policies that will be truly effective in a middle range of time.

Not everyone agrees that presidential systems are less stable. Political scientists Matthew Shugart and John Carey, for example, found ‘no justification for the claim of Linz and others that presidentialism is inherently more prone to crises that lead to breakdown’, noting numerous breakdowns of parliamentary systems, as well as the fact that in more recent years presidential systems in Latin America and elsewhere have achieved much greater stability. Donald Horowitz ‘pointed out that in postcolonial Africa and Asia, the Westminster model of parliamentarism was the “institutional villain” behind a string of failed democracies, resurgent authoritarianisms, and unstable polities’.

Steven Calabresi in his response to Ackerman contended that most of the countries writing constitutions in the 1980s and 1990s chose presidentialism over parliamentarism. He contended that American-style presidentialism: better embodies democratic principles; promotes stability; provides the executive branch with more democratic legitimacy; allows for more robust judicial review; is more compatible with federalism; and better protects individual liberty.

There seem to be comparatively fewer academic advocates for semi-presidentialism. This structure creates the opportunity for ‘warring executives’, and power-sharing within the executive can make it less clear to the public who is responsible for government policies. Cindy Skach, for example, suggested that ‘even French constitutional scholars’ admit that under their system ‘it’s difficult to know who makes the decisions, and things don’t always work out that well’. Semi-presidential systems are particularly problematic when, in a multi-party system, divided minority governments result, in which neither the party of the president nor of the prime minister enjoys a majority in the legislature. Thus, the success of such regimes depends in part on the party structure of a given country.

There are so many variables in the construction of presidential, parliamentary, and semi-presidential systems that it is hard to say in the abstract that one is always superior. The success of parliamentary systems, for example, may depend in part on the mode of election. Electoral systems that employ varieties of proportional representation that allow many different political parties to gain seats in parliament often result in unstable coalition governments. In countries that use this sort of system, such as Italy, particular cabinets may remain in power for very short periods of time as coalitions form and collapse. Countries like Germany, on the other hand, that employ modified versions of proportional representation and/or set a minimum threshold of support before a minor party can gain seats, tend to produce more stable governments.

In short, given the large number of successful and unsuccessful examples of both types of systems, it seems less than fruitful to claim that either presidentialism or parliamentarism is suitable for all nations. Rather, the success of any given system depends on multiple variables including how the constitution implements the model and the history and social and economic qualities of the particular nation.

Judicial Review of Executive Appointments and Removal

Occasionally, conflict between the executive and the legislature over the appointment and removal from office of executive officials has results in constitutional litigation, though constitutional courts have shown a preference for resolution of such conflicts through the political process. For example, at a time when the President and the majority of the national assembly in South Korea were from different parties, the assembly initially failed to vote on the president’s choice for prime minister, and the president then installed his chosen candidate as acting prime minister. The constitutional court rejected a challenge brought by members of assembly from the majority party.
Horizontal Structuring

with various justices noting that the members of the legislature who had brought the suit could have acted in their legislative capacity to resolve the matter through a legislative vote.\textsuperscript{90} Similarly, the Russian constitutional court noted, in response to a conflict over then-President Boris Yeltsin's choice for Prime Minister, that the constitutional provision requiring dissolution of the legislature and new elections should the legislature reject a president's choice for prime minister three times was a mechanism for overcoming disagreements between the president and legislature through 'free elections', thus promoting the goal of a 'democratic, rule of law state'.\textsuperscript{91}

In some countries, the judiciary may also play a role in resolving disputes involving the attempted impeachment and removal of officials by the legislature. For example, in a case concerning the attempted impeachment of South Korean President Roh Moo-Hyun, the Constitutional Court reinstated the president, finding that his alleged misconduct (e.g., commenting favorably on one party in advance of elections, in violation of a constitutional provision prohibiting the president from engaging in electioneering) did not constitute violations of the fundamental constitutional rules sustaining democracy and therefore were not proper grounds for impeachment.\textsuperscript{92}

In the United States, the President, Vice-President, and 'all civil officers of the United States', may be removed from office 'on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors'.\textsuperscript{93} The House of Representatives has the power of 'impeachment'—that is, of bringing charges against a federal official,\textsuperscript{94} while the Senate is given the power to 'try all impeachments', with a two-thirds vote required for impeachment.\textsuperscript{95}

The Supreme Court has held that the propriety of the Senate's impeachment of a federal judge was a non-justiciable political question; while this case involved a judge rather than an executive branch official, the court's reasoning would seem equally applicable to cases involving legislative impeachment of executive officials.\textsuperscript{96}

2. Beyond the Presidential versus Parliamentary Debate: Other Issues in the Structuring of Executive and Legislative Power

(a) Subdivision of Legislative Power

It is very common for systems to employ a bicameral, or two-house, legislature. The bicameral legislature has its origins in theories of mixed government, and was classically represented in the British Parliament with its House of Lords (representing the aristocracy) and House of Commons (representing the broader populace). Many have argued that the US Senate was originally conceived of as fulfilling a similar role in relation to the House of Representatives, although the absence of a hereditary aristocracy in the United States altered the underlying calculus.

In contemporary constitutions, federalism has replaced class structure as a justification for bicameralism. It is common for countries with a federal system of government involving a vertical separation of powers to reflect this in their bicameral federal legislatures.\textsuperscript{97} Typical in this regard is the German system. The German legislature consists of the Bundestag, which is directly elected, and the Bundesrat, which represents the states (or Länder). While the Bundestag is more prominent, the Bundesrat must be involved when legislation is passed that requires the states to take certain actions or that involves revenue shared between the states and the federal government. In the United States, the Senate contains two members from each state, regardless of population, and is thus considered to in part represent the interests of the states. Other countries with bicameral legislatures in which one house is linked to regional subunits include South Africa (with its National Assembly and National Council of Provinces), Mexico (with its Senate and Chamber of Deputies), and India (with its House of the People and Council of States).

Even in some unitary states, such as France (with its National Assembly and Senate), bicameralism is employed, with the two houses designed to serve as checks on each other. In many systems, the members of the upper house are selected by a different mechanism than members of the lower house. Members of the French Senate, for example, are selected indirectly by regional officials and the members of the National Assembly.

At the same time, a great number of countries employ unicameral legislatures. Unicameral legislatures are considered to be more efficient. Both presidential and parliamentary countries may employ unicameral legislatures. Parliamentary systems with unicameral legislatures may be particularly efficient, but they are criticized by commentators for having insufficient checks and balances.
Horizontal Structuring

(p. 562) (b) Subdivision of Executive Power

There are also a number of debates about the internal structuring of the executive branch, including whether it is desirable to have officials or departments within the executive branch independent of the chief executive—for example an independent attorney general, special independent prosecutors, or independent agencies.

In the United States, the contemporary debate at the federal level has centered around a school of theories concerning the ‘unitary executive’—that is, the idea that the US President ‘must be able to control the execution of all federal laws’ through broad supervisory powers over inferior executive branch officials as well as the discretion to remove those officials from office. As is typical in the United States, part of this debate concerns the original intent of the framers of the Constitution, with some arguing that the idea of the unitary executive is ‘just plain myth’ and ‘a creation of the twentieth century, not the eighteenth’, and others asserting that the founding generation intended a strongly unitary executive. Another dimension of the debate concerns the normative desirability of a strongly unitary executive branch.

These debates were spurred to prominence by a series of cases in the late 1980s in which the US Supreme Court held that statutes providing that certain executive branch officials could only be removed for ‘good cause’ did not violate the constitutional separation of powers. The most notable case involved a statute allowing for the appointment of an ‘independent counsel’ to ‘investigate and, if appropriate, prosecute certain high-ranking Government officials for violations of federal criminal laws’, which the Court upheld in Morrison v Olson. The ‘independent counsel’ was removable ‘only by the personal action of the Attorney General, and only for good cause’. While there was immediate academic controversy about whether the decision was correct, the issue became even more prominent in the late 1990s when independent counsel Kenneth Starr's investigation of President Bill Clinton's involvement in the failed Whitewater Development Corporation expanded into an investigation of Clinton's sexual relationship with White House intern Monica Lewinsky, which in turn led to efforts to impeach the President. This, many believed, fulfilled the fears that an unchecked and unaccountable prosecutor could wreak havoc on the system.

At the same time, below the federal level, many states within the United States in fact insist on the separate election of prosecutors or state attorney generals. For example, as of 2002, 38 out of 50 states provided for separate election of the attorney general.

As noted previously, countries with semi-presidential systems also subdivide executive power, as with the roles of the French President and Prime Minister. Russia, with its President and Chairman of the Government (ie, prime minister), seemingly employs a similar division of executive power. Portugal's 1976 Constitution established a semi-presidential system in the hope that maintaining two centers of executive power (a strong Prime Minister that could counterbalance an equally strong President) would protect against both an excessively strong executive and parliamentary instability. While constitutional revisions in 1982 shifted this original structure more toward pure parliamentaryism, Portugal continues to divide executive power between a popularly elected president and a government dependent on the confidence of the legislature. Still other countries have plural executives that defy easy categorization, such as the Swiss system, which employs a seven-member Federal Council.

(c) Boundaries and Overlap between Legislative and Executive Power

i. Legislation versus Administrative Regulation

Because regulation in the contemporary world is so complex, most legal systems recognize that rules of conduct may be promulgated not only by the legislature through statutes, but also through the executive branch and/or specialized administrative agencies in the form of regulations.

For example, the French Constitution explicitly recognizes that both the legislature and the executive will engage in lawmaking. The Constitution specifies that rules governing certain areas of law must be enacted through the legislature as statutes (lois), including those governing serious crimes, taxation, civil rights and liberties, and nationalization of private companies. In other areas—including protection of the environment, property, contracts, and employment law—the legislature is required to lay down at least the ‘basic principles’. Matters falling outside these areas may be regulated by the government through decrees (règlements). When the legislature enacts lois in areas that fall within the domain of règlements (as determined by the Conseil Constitutionnel), the policies may be amended by règlements after consultation with the Conseil d’État. The government can also receive permission for a limited time to take measures in areas that are ordinarily covered by legislation through ordonnances issued in the Council of Ministers after consultation with the Conseil d’État.

In the United States, the US Supreme Court has held under the ‘non-delegation’ doctrine that the legislature cannot delegate the entire domain of policymaking to an executive branch agency, but must at least set out ‘intelligible principles’ to guide the agency’s discretion. The ‘non-delegation’ doctrine is mostly a theoretical constraint, however, since it has not been applied by the Supreme Court since the 1930s. In contemporary times, if the doctrine remains alive at all, it survives as a canon of statutory interpretation.

Recall that the British system, or Westminster model, involves a relatively high degree of fusion of executive and legislative power. It is therefore not surprising that:

In the United Kingdom and in self-governing Dominions and colonies it has long been the custom for the legislature to invest the executive with power to make regulations ... the legal content of which it would be difficult to distinguish from legislation.

The amount of discretion given to the executive for promulgating regulations can be substantial. The Australian High Court, for instance, recognized that the separation of powers doctrine formed a part of the Australian Constitution and precluded the legislature from conferring legislative power on the executive. Nonetheless, it construed the phrase ‘legislative power’ in such a way that ‘subordinate regulations, however wide the discretion under which they were made, could not be considered as an exercise of legislative power.’ Consequently, the court concluded that ‘a grant of regulatory authority is not a delegation of [Parliament’s] legislative power’—and so there is no separation of powers violation—even when the executive is given the authority ‘to prescribe conduct and regulate rights and duties, however untraummeled the discretion’. As a result, there is almost no limit on the extent to which the Australian Parliament may grant lawmaking authority to the executive.

The German Federal Constitutional Court has noted that, as an aspect of separation of powers, ‘the legislature is obligated ... to make all crucial decisions in fundamental normative areas, especially in those cases where basic rights become subject to governmental regulations.’ Nevertheless, the court has allowed relatively broad delegations of authority to the executive branch in regulatory programs. For example, it rejected a challenge to the Atomic Energy Act, which it found was sufficiently precise to satisfy the legislature's constitutional obligation, concluding that it was ‘within the legislature's discretion to use either undefined legal terms or precise terminology’ and that it was permissible for the legislature to conclude that the executive should have the task of adjusting safety requirements based on current technological developments.

ii. Conflicts between the Executive and the Legislature over Policy Conflicts between the executive and the legislature over policy are often resolved through the political process, but sometimes courts are called up to intervene and resolve the dispute as a matter of constitutional law. In the case of Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co v Sawyer, the US Supreme Court held invalid President Harry Truman's seizure of steel mills as not within his inherent executive authority and contrary to statute. In a famous passage, Justice Jackson, writing in concurrence, explained that presidential actions could be grouped into three categories. In the first, when he acts ‘pursuant to an express or implied authorization of Congress, his authority is at its maximum, for it includes all that he possesses in his own right plus all that Congress can delegate.’ In the second, when the president acts in ‘absence of either a congressional grant or denial of authority’, the president must rely on his own independent powers but there is a ‘zone of twilight in which he and Congress may have concurrent authority’ and the outcome depends on ‘imperatives of events’ rather than ‘abstract theories of law’. Finally, in the third category, when the president ‘takes measure incompatible with the [expressed or implied will of Congress, his power is at its lowest ebb, for he can rely only upon his own constitutional powers minus any constitutional powers of Congress over the matter.’ This framework has proven influential in separation of powers jurisprudence. When the US Supreme Court struck down the military commissions set up to try accused terrorists in Hamdan v Rumsfeld, it was because the Court concluded that the commissions set up by the administration of President George W. Bush fell into this third category and contravened legislation that limited the use of military commissions to situations that were consistent with the laws of war, including the Geneva Conventions.
Courts, in general, seem particularly reluctant to interfere with the internal workings of legislatures. The Israeli Supreme Court, for example, has held that ‘in general, questions of the day-to-day affairs of the legislature are not institutionally justiciable’ that ‘only if it is claimed that the violation of rules regarding internal management harms the parliamentary fabric of life and the foundations of the structure of our constitutional system of government is it appropriate to decide the issue in court.’

iii. Power over Foreign Affairs

Countries vary in their allocation of authority over foreign affairs to the executive and legislature. Montesquieu, the reader will recall, viewed foreign affairs powers as being executive in nature, but most modern systems divide these powers between the branches.

It is quite common for constitutions to require legislative approval of at least some, though often not all, international agreements. The French Constitution, for example, gives the president the power to ‘negotiate and ratify treaties’, but specifies that certain types of treaties ‘may be ratified or approved only by virtue of an Act of Parliament’, including

- Peace treaties, commercial treaties, treaties or agreements relating to international organization, those that commit the finances of the State, those that modify provisions which are matters for statute, those relating to the status of persons, and those that involve the cession, exchange or addition of territory.

Similarly, the German Constitution requires that ‘Treaties that regulate the political relations of the Federation or relate to subjects of federal legislation shall require the consent or participation, in the form of a federal law, of the bodies responsible in such a case for the enactment of federal law.’ South Korea requires legislative votes for treaties pertaining to mutual assistance or mutual security; treaties concerning important international organizations; treaties of friendship, trade and navigation; treaties pertaining to any restriction in sovereignty; peace treaties; treaties which will burden the State or people with an important financial obligation; or treaties related to legislative matters.

In the United States, the President concludes treaties subject to the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate. Although alternative procedures are not mentioned in the Constitution, in practice the United States enters into some international agreements by way of bicameral legislation (so-called congressional-executive agreements, which are common in the area of international trade) and the President also has the power to enter into sole executive agreements.

Many systems also require legislative participation in the decision to engage in war. (See Chapter 22.) In this area formal constitutional requirements are not always adhered to in practice, and executives in many countries are prone to use force without ex ante legislative authorization. The US Constitution famously gives the Congress the power to declare war, but presidents have not always sought congressional authorization in advance for their military actions. This is true in many other countries as well.

In this regard it is not only the prevailing power sharing among the branches that counts but also a country’s troubled history with military dictatorship. For example, the South Korean Constitution requires legislative approval not only for formal declarations of war, but also for any ‘dispatch of armed forces to foreign states, or the stationing of alien forces in the territory of the Republic of Korea.’ Although the President is commander-in-chief, he operates ‘under the conditions as prescribed by the Constitution and Act’, and that ‘The organization and formation of the Armed Forces’ is determined by law.

Many commentators consider some independent executive authority in these areas desirable, for reasons originally expressed by Alexander Hamilton: ‘Decision, activity, secrecy, and dispatch will generally characterise the proceedings of one man in a much more eminent degree than the proceedings of any greater number; and in proportion as the number is increased, these qualities will be diminished.’ Others contend that maintaining legislative control over powers of war and peace is essential to democracy, and have argued for various changes to increase the likelihood of legislative involvement.
iv. Executive versus Legislative Control of Emergency Powers

Times of crisis strain the ordinary separation of powers framework. While there is no widely accepted definition of what constitutes an emergency, Mark Tushnet provides a helpful starting point: An 'emergency' occurs when there is general agreement that a nation or some part of it faces a sudden and unexpected rise in social costs, accompanied by a great deal of uncertainty about the length of time the high level of cost will persist. ... ‘Emergency powers’ describes the expansion of governmental authority generally and the concomitant alteration in the scope of individual liberty, and the transfer of important ‘first instance’ law-making authority from legislatures to executive officials, in emergencies.

The transfer of power to the executive results from the belief that, when a country is faced with an urgent threat, executive officials are ‘better able than legislators to act quickly, in a co-ordinated response, on the basis of adequate information’. But this efficacy comes at a price: the expansion of executive power through the invocation of emergency powers can result in human rights violations or, in the extreme, breed dictatorship. Some support broad, largely unchecked executive authority to assess the threat and adopt appropriate measures to protect national security. Others contend that the need to maintain robust checks and balances on executive power is most important during times of crisis, which ‘provide the best test for our cherished values of liberty and freedom’. Mark Tushnet calls this sort of check on the executive’s exercise of emergency powers ‘political control’, and argues that—when effective—this type of control is preferable to ‘legal control’, which relies on the courts to determine whether a novel government practice violates a fundamental principle of law. In response to Tushnet’s contention, Adam Shinar argues that political controls are wholly ineffective in Israel, where a parliamentary system coupled with proportional representation from a party list ensures that ‘members of parliament have a strong incentive to comply with party policy even if they object to it on a personal level.’ As a result, he contends, government policies and actions in the realm of national security are rarely checked by the Israeli legislature. At the same time, the Israeli Supreme Court has exercised vigorous review of measures including detention of suspected terrorists, interrogation methods, and targeted killings, though its interventions in these areas have drawn criticism as judicial activism.

As this demonstrates, however desirable balancing emergency powers between the legislature and executive might be, formal divisions can readily break down when there is popular support for expansive, executive authority. (For a review of national answers to emergency see Chapter 21.) As in other areas of separation of powers theory, ‘the practical effectiveness of formal divisions of power seems to depend a great deal on political context’, and ‘legislators are often quite willing to cede their powers’. Of course, the courts may also be as a check on emergency powers, as discussed in the next section.

IV. The ‘Least Dangerous Branch’? The Judiciary and Separation of Powers

This section addresses the issue of the relationship between the judicial power and the legislative and executive powers. There is wide agreement that judicial independence is desirable—that is, that judges engaged in the process of adjudication must be independent from direct political and financial influence. Judges should not decide cases based on bribes, threats, or instructions from other government officials. But countries have chosen widely divergent structures to achieve this goal. Numerous questions arise in this context. What role should the legislature and executive play in the appointment and removal of judges? Should some or all judges be formally placed in their own separate branch of government or is it acceptable for some judges to reside formally within the executive branch? Should some or all judges have the power of judicial review—that is, the power to declare legislative or executive enactments invalid on the basis of constitutional or other higher law principles?

1. Judicial Independence and ‘The Judicial Branch’?

While all modern democracies recognize the importance of judicial independence, the segregation of the judiciary into an entirely separate branch of government is not always considered necessary for this. For example, many systems allow for certain types of adjudication to be carried out within the executive branch. In France, administrative tribunals within the executive branch, culminating in the Conseil d’État, review the legality of public actions. The particular idea of separation of powers that was put in place during the French Revolution prohibits ordinary judges from exercising this type of power, and as a consequence these administrative tribunals are not considered courts proper, although they certainly engage in functions that would in most other countries be regarded as adjudication.144

Until recently, the highest appellate court in the United Kingdom was the Law Lords, made up of members of the House of Lords, the upper house of the legislature. In 2009, the appellate function was transferred to a new Supreme Court that is no longer formally a part of the legislature. Even under the previous system, however, the Law Lords functioned as an independent group, and lay peers did not participate in the functioning of the House of Lords as an appellate court. Still, the fact that the Law Lords could participate in legislative debates was considered problematic. The British decision to create a new, separate Supreme Court may be seen as an acknowledgement that the previous system was conceptually troublesome, even if it worked relatively well in practice. In addition, the United Kingdom maintains a significant functional separation of judicial powers at other levels of its court system. Judges ‘may not sit in the House of Commons and they are protected from summary removal under the Act of Settlement [of] 1701.’145

The United States is considered to have a strongly independent federal judiciary. The ‘judicial power’ of the United States is vested ‘in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.’146 The Congress has through legislation established federal trial courts and regional courts of appeal. Federal judges are nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate in a process that is often contentious and politically charged. Once in office, however, they ‘hold their Offices during good Behavior’, and their compensation may not be reduced during their time in office.147 However, federal judges may be removed by impeachment. State judges in many areas of the United States are popularly elected, a practice which some criticize as undermining their independence.

The jurisdiction of the federal courts is constitutionally and statutorily limited to certain types of cases, and there is a long-standing and unresolved debate among legal scholars about whether the Congress can use legislation to strip the federal courts of jurisdiction to hear (p. 569) certain types of cases (e.g., abortion cases).148 A variety of decisions in the United States define the contours of judicial power and independence. In Hayburn’s Case, for example, the members of the US Supreme Court rejected a statutory scheme whereby judicial decisions regarding pension benefits were subject to rejection by the Secretary of War. The Court found this executive control over judicial decisions to be ‘radically inconsistent with the independence of that judicial power which is vested in the courts’.149 Nevertheless, in practice a large amount of adjudication is carried out within executive-branch administrative agencies by judges who do not enjoy the life-tenure protections of Article III. For instance, immigration courts, which fall under a department of the executive branch, received 391,829 cases and issued 232,212 decisions in 2009.150 The Supreme Court has held that this is constitutionally permissible as long as the ‘essential attributes’ of judicial power are retained in Article III courts.151

The South Korean Constitution strongly emphasizes judicial independence. Judges ‘shall rule independently according to their conscience and in conformity with the Constitution’ and laws.152 The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court is appointed by the President with the consent of the National Assembly, while other Supreme Court justices are appointed by the President on the recommendation of the Chief Justice and with the consent of the National Assembly. Lower court judges are appointed by the Chief Justice with the consent of the Conference of Supreme Court justices.153 Justices serve fixed terms, and no judge may be removed except by impeachment or on conviction of a serious crime.154

An area deserving of additional study is the effect of lodging adjudicative bodies within the executive branch of government. A recent study of state-level administrative courts in Mexico found that states were roughly split in whether they placed administrative courts formally within the executive branch or formally within the judicial branch of government. Those administrative courts that were lodged in the judicial branch were found to rule against the government in a larger percentage of cases.155 (See further Chapters 39 and 40.)

2. Judicial Review

The term ‘judicial review’ describes the power of courts to declare legislation or actions of the executive in violation of the constitution. The practice is often considered important to preserving constitutional structure and individual rights, but is also subject to criticism that it is in tension with democratic principles because it allows judges to countermand the will of elected legislators and executive officials.

The practice was established in the United States in the landmark case of Marbury v Madison. Chief Justice Marshall, writing for the Court, explained that ‘The government of the United States has been emphatically termed a government of laws, and not of men’. Marshall explained, ‘it is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is’. A key characteristic of judicial review in the United States is that it is ‘decentralized’, meaning ‘the jurisdiction to engage in constitutional interpretation is not limited to a single court’. Rather, ‘it can be exercised by many courts, state and federal’. Argentina, Australia, Canada, India, and Japan employ similar, decentralized systems of judicial review. South Africa’s constitution, written in the wake of apartheid, significantly increases the power of the judiciary by instantiating a strong principle of judicial review to ensure protection of individual rights. Judicial review extends even further in India, where the Supreme Court ‘may review a constitutional amendment and strike it down if it undermines the basic structure of the Constitution’. This is contrary to judicial review in its more ordinary conception, which presumes a constitutional amendment can override an unpopular court ruling.

Many European countries vest the power to review legislation for constitutionality in specialized bodies. This may be referred to as the ‘centralized’ model of judicial review. (For details, see Chapter 38.)

Not all modern democracies allow judicial review. The United Kingdom continues to operate on the principle of parliamentary supremacy, and its courts lack the power to invalidate legislation on constitutional grounds. Pursuant to the Human Rights Act of 1998, however, British courts now engage in something that looks very much like judicial review when they apply the European Convention on Human Rights. But formally they are only entitled to declare legislation incompatible with the Convention, with the power to change the law still residing in parliament.

In an interesting recent development, the expanding authority of transnational treaties and courts, such as the European Court of Justice, is partially decentralizing the exercise of judicial review in some European countries with centralized systems. The Court's doctrines of 'direct effect' and supremacy of European Union law permit individuals to invoke provisions of international treaties against contrary provisions of national law in ordinary, domestic courts. The willingness of some national courts to refer cases to the European Court of Justice, follow its jurisprudence, and abide by its decisions is leading these domestic courts to assert more judicial review-like functions, sometimes in the face of direct opposition from other branches of national government. A striking example of this occurred in Britain, where 'national courts overturned the sacrosanct doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty and issued an injunction blocking the effect of a British law pending judicial review at the European level.'

In Israel, the role of judicial review is still evolving. Due to political struggles, Israel's first Knesset (parliament) did not enact a constitution, instead 'instructing that the constitution be composed in piecemeal fashion of individual chapters, each constituting basic law.' Originally, Basic Laws were not considered superior to other legislation, and the Israeli Supreme Court 'did not exercise judicial review over primary legislation'. This changed in 1995, when the Supreme Court 'held that the Basic Laws are normatively superior to Knesset legislation' and asserted its authority to strike down legislation that violated rights protected in the Basic Laws. The Court has since taken a very active role in evaluating and invalidating actions of the Knesset as well as the executive, even in cases that involve security measures—an area previously considered beyond the reach of the courts. However, this has generated a significant backlash against the Court. In response to the Court's activism, the legislature and executive are attempting to weaken the Court, particularly its power of judicial review. Moreover, recent public opinion polls evice a substantial decline in public confidence in the Court. Consequently, the future potency of judicial review in Israel remains uncertain.

3. Jurisdiction and Justiciability

Given the overlap and competing ambition of the branches of government, it is of constitutional relevance how the apex courts handle the emerging conflicts in terms of jurisdiction and justiciability, which are only partly carved out by these supreme courts. Because every court in the United States has the power to declare statutes in violation of the Constitution, procedural rules place relatively stringent limits on the types of cases that federal courts can adjudicate. For instance, courts in the United States can only rule on constitutional challenges within the context of concrete cases or controversies. As the Supreme Court explained, the words ‘cases and controversies’ in Article III of the US Constitution ‘define the role assigned to the judiciary in a tripartite allocation of power to assure that the federal courts will not intrude into areas committed to the other branches of government.’ These ‘justiciability’ doctrines are considered an aspect of separation of powers.

On the other hand, countries with specialized constitutional courts are likely to have more lenient gate-keeping procedures. In a decentralized system like the United States, procedural rules are often a means to avoid deciding major constitutional issues. In centralized systems such as those common to Europe, constitutional courts exist ‘for the express purpose of deciding constitutional issues, not evading them’. Consequently, the need to restrict access on procedural grounds is substantially less compelling.

(a) Advisory Opinions

Some constitutional systems allow the judiciary to offer advisory opinions about the constitutionality of measures before they have been enforced, or indeed limit such jurisdiction to abstract questions, as is the case with the French Constitutional Council. In France, historically concerned with ‘judicial excess that could only be controlled by rigorously protecting the executive and legislative powers of government from any form of judicial control’, this type of review may be the only politically palatable form, since post hoc judicial nullification conflicts with the long-standing preference for a restrained judiciary. However, the advisory (p. 572) process is initiated solely by legislators, leading some to criticize the process for being overtly political—forcing courts into the role of policy makers and consequently violating separation of powers. As Alec Stone Sweet argued, abstract review exists only to the extent that politicians seek to alter legislative outcomes, by having their policy choices ratified or the government's and parliamentary majority’s choices watered down or vetoed. If politicians ceased to use referrals as political weapons, abstract review would disappear.

Many countries with specialized constitutional courts similarly favor considering constitutional questions in relatively abstract terms, including Germany, Italy, and Spain.

The US federal courts, by contrast, are not allowed to render advisory opinions but can only decide live disputes involving individual claimants who will be affected by the outcome. The issue first arose in the early days of the country, when then-Secretary of State Thomas Jefferson sent the Supreme Court a list of questions related the meaning of various treaties and laws as they related to American neutrality in the war between England and France. The Supreme Court declined to answer, however, explaining that the three departments of the government ... being in certain respects checks upon each other, and our being judges of a court in the last resort, are considerations which afford strong arguments against the propriety of our extra-judicially deciding the questions alluded to.

Closely related is the doctrine of ‘standing’, which the US Supreme Court has said is ‘built on a single basic idea—the idea of separation of powers’. Standing doctrine requires, among other things, that the plaintiff have suffered or be in immediate danger of an individual injury that is traceable to the defendant's conduct and that will be redressed by the court's decision. The Court held, for example, that a ‘citizen suit’ provision of the Endangered Species Act allowing any person to sue for enforcement of the law was unconstitutional because of separation of powers, finding that citizens’ desire to see endangered animals living in the wild was insufficient to give them standing to sue.

Because the United States is a federal system, not all state level courts follow the same standing doctrine as federal courts. The Hawaiian Supreme Court, for example, decided to depart from the federal doctrine and allow citizens to have standing to enforce state environmental laws. That court explained that its basic approach was ‘that standing requirements should not be barriers to justice’. The court did note that:

[the] judicial power to resolve public disputes in a system of government where there is a separation of powers should be limited to those questions capable of judicial resolution and presented in an adversary context. For ‘prudential rules’ of self-governance ‘found in concern about the proper and properly limited role of courts in a democratic society’ are always of relevant concern.

Even given these constraints, however, the court found it appropriate to allow the various environmental challenges in those cases. Indeed, many state constitutions in the United States have long allowed state courts to render advisory opinions. The Massachusetts state constitution of 1780, for example, stated that ‘Each branch of the legislature, as well as the governor ... shall have authority to require the opinions of the justices of the supreme judicial court, upon important questions of law, and upon solemn occasions.’

Across different constitutional systems, rules of standing vary from extremely restrictive to nearly unconstrained. In India, for example, the rules of standing are exceptionally liberal, to the point that they ‘may be said to have ceased to present any real obstacle to the ... litigant’.

(b) The Political Question Doctrine

One of the most confusing doctrines in US law is the so-called ‘political question doctrine’, which rejects certain issues as beyond the institutional competence or proper authority of courts. The doctrine has its origins in Marbury v Madison, the very case that established judicial review, in which Chief Justice John Marshall explained that ‘Questions, in their nature political, or which are by the constitution and laws, submitted to the executive can never be made in this court.’ Courts in the United States, of course, frequently decide highly politicized questions—such as the constitutional right to abortion, or the outcome of the 2000 presidential election. As the Court has explained, ‘The doctrine of which we treat is one of “political questions”, not one of “political cases”.’ So when does the doctrine apply? In Baker v Carr, the Court provided a not entirely helpful list of circumstances reflecting the separation of powers concerns that underlie the doctrine:

Prominent on the surface of any case held to involve a political question is found a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for resolving it; or the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for nonjudicial discretion; or the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of government; or an unusual need for unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question.

At the opposite end of the spectrum, German law specifically rejects the notion of a political question doctrine as a bar to litigation. In dismissing the suggestion that such a doctrine exists in Germany, Professor Kommers wrote, ‘All questions arising under the Basic Law are amenable to judicial resolution if properly initiated ... includ[ing] the highly politicized field of foreign affairs.’ Nonetheless, the substantial deference the German judiciary affords the government in cases that concern foreign affairs might be said to result in a similar doctrine in practice, if not in theory. As Thomas Franck argued, the doctrine is simply redefined, focusing ‘not [on] whether but how judges decide’. According to this argument, German courts achieve the same result as their US counterparts (generally deferring to the government's discretion in matters concerning foreign affairs and national security), but through different means.

The recent and contentious issue of targeted killings highlights the continued importance of justiciability doctrines. The legality of this technique was challenged in courts in both the United States and Israel. The Israeli Supreme Court, which explicitly rejected the idea that principles of standing or the political nature of the questions presented by a case should deter it from exercising review, heard the case on its merits and decided that the government's ability to engage in targeted killings was constrained by various legal rules. A quite similar case brought in the United States was dismissed on procedural grounds due to the plaintiff's lack of standing and for violating the political question doctrine.

V. Conclusion

One of the complexities of separation of powers jurisprudence is that the abstract distinctions between executive, legislative and judicial powers will very often be blurred in practice. As Richard Bellamy explains:

When judges, for example, adjudicate on which rules do or do not apply in particular cases, they also often end up setting precedents that in effect constituted new rules. Similarly, officials frequently have to create rules in the course of implementing a given law that in turn come to take on a life of their own. Legislators, too, are inevitably concerned with how the laws they frame will be interpreted and applied to specific cases. Thus, each branch of government will find itself engaged in all three activities to one degree or another.\textsuperscript{193}
Horizontal Structuring

As this chapter has shown, modern democracies employ a wide range of strategies to achieve the checks and balances that separation of powers is designed to foster. Measures that some countries deem essential to separation of powers are totally ignored by other countries, which rely on different structures or doctrines to achieve the same basic goals. As in so many areas of comparative constitutional law, there seems to be more than one effective way to do things.

Bibliography

(p. 575) Gerald M. Easter, ‘Preference for Presidentialism: Postcommunist Regime Change in Russia and the NIS’ (1997) 49 World Politics 184

Juan J. Linz and Arturo Valenzuela (eds), The Failure of Presidential Democracy (1994)

Montesquieu, The Spirit of Laws (1750)

Notes:

(2) On which, see Chapter 27 of this volume.

(6) Gordon S. Wood, The Creation of the American Republic 1776–1787 (2nd edn, 1998), 151; M. Elizabeth Magill,

(7) John Locke, Two Treatises of Government (Ian Shapiro ed, 2003), 164.

(8) Ibid 166.

(9) Ibid 171.

(14) See Bellamy (n 4), 261–3.

(15) Montesquieu (n 13), 11.

(16) Ibid 214.

(17) Ibid 215.

(18) Ibid 216.

(19) See Lawrence Claus, ‘Montesquieu’s Mistakes and the True Meaning of Separation’ (2005) 25 Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 419, 423 (describing ‘ongoing ambivalence about whether the professional judges who actually executed the law—applied it to the facts found by juries—were anything other than executive officers’).

(20) Montesquieu (n 13), 216.

(22) Claus (n 19).

(26) See Wood (n 6), 159.

(28) Wood (n 6), 152.

(29) The Federalist Papers are a famous series of essays (numbering 1–85) defending the proposed US Constitution. The complete series is available at http://www.constitution.org/fed/federa00.htm.

(30) Bellamy (n 4), 264–6.

(31) See Merryman (n 21), 111.

(32) Ibid 111.

(33) Ibid 116.
(34) Ibid 111.

(35) Resnick (n 12).

(38) US Constitution, Art I, s 1.

(39) US Constitution, Art II, s 3.

(41) See generally Juan J. Linz and Arturo Valenzuela (eds), The Failure of Presidential Democracy (1994).

(42) Ibid 168.

(43) Mainwaring (n 40).

(44) The ‘line-item veto’, also known as the ‘partial veto’, is the power of an executive to nullify specific provisions of a bill without vetoing the entire legislative act.

(45) Mainwaring (n 40).

(47) Alfred Stepan and Cindy Skach, ‘Presidentialism and Parliamentarianism in Comparative Perspective’ in Linz and Valenzuela (n 41), 119, 120.

(49) See Easter (n 46), 190 (listing regime types); Economist Intelligence Unit, Democracy Index 2010, available at (http://graphics.eiu.com/VPDF/Democracy_Index_2010_web.pdf).

(50) See Economist Intelligence Unit (n 49).

(51) Easter (n 46), 187–9.

(54) Constitution of the Republic of South Korea, Art 86.

(55) Ibid Art 87.

(57) See ‘Role and Work of the House of Lords FAQs’, available at (http://www.parliament.uk/about/faqs/house-of-lords-faqs/role/).

(58) Barendt (n 56), 289.

(59) Ibid 291 (citing Case of Proclamations, 12 Co Rep 74 (1611)).

(63) Ibid Art 67.

(64) German Basic Law, Art 68. Nevertheless a dissolution based on an agreement of all parties was held constitutional by the Federal Constitutional Court.

(66) Ibid s 73.

(67) See ibid s 86.

(68) Ibid s 83.

(69) Ibid s 86.

(70) Ibid s 89.

(74) Ibid Art 50.

(75) Ibid Art 45.

(77) Ibid.

(79) Skach (n 76), 96.

(80) See Juan Linz, ‘The Perils of Presidentialism’ (Winter 1990) 1 Journal of Democracy 51, 52; Linz and Valenzuela (n 41), 4; Ackerman (n 60), 646.

(81) Giovanni Sartori, ‘Neither Presidentialism nor Parliamentarianism’ in Linz and Valenzuela (n 41), 106–7 (cited in Ackerman (n 60), 646).

(82) Linz and Valenzuela (n 41), 69–74.

(83) Ackerman (n 60), 647.

(84) Ibid 650–3.

(85) Easter (n 46), 186.

(86) See Calabresi (n 48), 52–93.

(87) Skach (n 76), 98.
(88) Ibid 105.

(89) Ackerman (n 60), 653–5.

(90) Competence Dispute Between the President of the Republic and Members of the National Assembly, Constitutional Court (Republic of Korea) 29 KCCG 583, 98 HunRa1, 15 July 1998.

(91) Russian Prime Ministerial Appointment Case, Constitutional Court (Russia), Decision 28-P of 11 December 1998.

(92) Impeachment of the President (Roh Moo-Hyun), Constitutional Court (Republic of Korea), Case 16-1KCCR 609 (2004).

(94) Ibid Art I, s 2.

(95) Ibid Art I, s 3.

(97) Ackerman (n 60), 673.

(100) Calabresi and Prakash (n 98), 549.

(103) Ibid 686.

(111) See French Constitution, Art 34.

(112) Ibid Art 37.
(113) Hampton v United States 276 US 394, 401 (1928).

(117) Ibid 39.

(118) Kalkar I Case, Federal Constitutional Court (Germany), 48 BVerfGE 89 (1978).

(121) Public Committee Against Torture, HCJ 769/02, Supreme Court (Israel) (2005) (citing HCJ 9070/00 MK Livnat v The Chairman of the Constitution, Law, and Justice Committee, 55(4) PD 800, 812; HCJ 9056/00 MK Kleiner v The Chairman of the Knesset, 55(4) PD 703, 708).

(122) Public Committee Against Torture, HCJ 769/02, Supreme Court (Israel) (2005) (citing HCJ 652/81 MK Sarid v The Chairman of the Knesset, 36(2) PD 197; HCJ 73/85 ‘Kach’ Knesset Faction v The Chairman of the Knesset, 39(3) PD 141; HCJ 742/84 Kahane v The Chairman of the Knesset, 39(4) PD 85).

(123) French Constitution, Arts 52, 53.

(124) German Basic Law, Art 59.

(125) Constitution of the Republic of South Korea, Art 60.

(127) US Constitution, Art I, s 8.

(128) See Martinez (n 52), 2492–5.

(129) Constitution of the Republic of South Korea, Art 60(2).

(130) Constitution of the Republic of South Korea, Art 74.

(134) Note that some constitutions specifically delineate the criteria that must exist for the government to claim a state of emergency. See eg German Basic Law, Art 115a; Constitution of the Republic of South Korea, Art 76. This can be an important constraint on the exercise of emergency powers, particularly when coupled with an effective mechanism for reviewing the government's claim.

(137) Ibid 276.

(138) Martinez (n 52), 2506–7.

(140) Tushnet (n 135), 277.

(141) Shinar (n 139), 162.

(143) Martinez (n 52), 2510–11.

(144) See Merryman (n 21), 111.

(145) Barendt (n 56), 291.

(146) US Constitution, Art III, s 1.

(147) Ibid Art III, s 1.

(149) Hayburn's Case 2 US 409 (1792).

(151) Commodity Futures Trading Comm’n v Schor 478 US 851 (quoting Crowell 285 US 22, 51 (1932)).

(152) Constitution of the Republic of South Korea, Art 103.

(153) Ibid Art 104.

(154) Ibid Arts 105, 106.

(156) Marbury v Madison 5 US 137 (1803).

(157) Ibid 163.

(158) Ibid 177.

(159) Vicki C. Jackson and Mark Tushnet (eds), Comparative Constitutional Law (2nd edn, 2006), 465.

(165) Shinar (n 139), 147.
(166) Ibid 148.

(167) Ibid 150.

(171) See Merryman (n 21), 117.

(172) Ibid 110.

(174) See Chemerinsky (n 114).

(175) Quoted in Fallon, Jr et al (n 148), 52.

(177) 468 US 737, 758–9.

(178) 504 US 555.

(179) Citizens for Protection of North Kohala Coastline 979 P2d 1120 (Hawaii 1999).

(183) 5 US 137, 163 (1803).

(188) Ibid.

(189) Shinar (n 139), 149 (citing Resler v Minister of Defense, HCJ 910/86, Isr SC 42(2) 441, 462 (1986)).

(190) See The Public Committee against Torture in Israel v The Government of Israel, HCJ 769/02 (2005).

(192) Ibid 121.

(193) Bellamy (n 4), 253, 256.
Jenny S. Martinez
Jenny S. Martinez is Professor of Law and Justin M. Roach, Jr, Faculty Scholar, Stanford Law School
Abstract and Keywords

This article focuses on federalism and attempts to lay the foundation for understanding the constitutional significance of arrangements among multiple levels of authority from private to global governance. The article is organized as follows. Section II critically examines the (relevance of) historical debates about defining federalism. Section III turns to arguments about the origins of federations. Section IV analyzes normative federalism theory and its applicability in legal disputes. Section V discusses the sustainability of federal systems. Section VI considers the consequences of federalism for various policy outputs. Section VII takes federalism beyond its traditional boundaries — first down to regional, local, and private governance, and then up into the global arena. A brief conclusion ends the article.

Keywords: federalism theory, federations, federal systems

I. Introduction 577
II. Federalism—Federation—Confederation 578
   1. Capturing ‘Federalism’ 578
   2. The Territory of ‘Federation’ 580
   3. Beyond ‘Confederation’ 581

III. The Origins of Federal Systems 583
IV. Why Federalism? 585
   1. The Benefits of Local Power 586
      (a) Voice 586
      (b) Community 586
      (c) Expertise 587
      (d) Risk 587
   2. The Benefits of Central Power 588
      (a) Cost Savings 589
      (b) Inter-Jurisdictional Difficulties 589
      (c) Intra-Jurisdictional Difficulties 591
   3. Subsidiarity Redux: Instrumental or Intrinsic? 592

V. Sustaining Federalism 595
   1. Incentive-Compatible Federalism 595
Federalism: Theory, Policy, Law

2. The Role of Political Parties 596

VI. Does Federalism Deliver? 597
1. Policy Stability 597
   (a) Demos-Constraint and the Status Quo 598
   (b) Which Demos? 599
   (c) What Constraint? 600

2. Polity Stability 602
   (a) Fate Follows Formation? 602
   (b) Back to Politics 603

VII. Federalism All the Way? 604
1. Federalism All the Way Down? 604
2. Federalism All the Way Up? 605

VIII. Conclusion 607

(p. 577) I. Introduction

Even France now values local government. Over the past 30 years, top-down appointment of regional prefects and local administrators has given way to regionally elected councils and a revision of Article 1 of the French Constitution, which proclaims today the state's 'organization is decentralized'.¹ The British Parliament, too, has embraced local rule by devolving powers to Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland. And in China, decentralization has reached a point where some scholars speak of 'de facto federalism'.² A systematic study of the distribution of authority in 42 democracies found that over the past 50 years, regional authority grew in 29 countries, remained stable in 11, and declined in only two.³ And various projections over the past half-century place over 50 percent of the world's landmass into federal systems in 1964,⁴ 40 percent of the world population in federal systems in 1987,⁵ and 50 percent (or up to 70 percent if we include China) of the world's population in federal systems by 2009.⁶

Just as subnational authority is on the rise, so, too, global governance is gaining ground. With the creation of the European Union, the birthplace of the nation-state has fostered an historic enterprise of governance beyond the state. The nation-states of Europe have also created the most ambitious and effective international human rights regime to date.⁷ Efforts of transnational governance are taking shape in Africa, the Americas, and Asia.⁸ Three-quarters of all states have joined the World Trade Organization with its compulsory jurisdiction over, and adjudication of, trade disputes.⁹ The United Nations is more active than ever before in peacekeeping missions, resolutions, and direct actions against individuals.¹⁰ And an International Criminal Court has been established to prosecute individuals for crimes against humanity, war crimes, and genocide.

From Belgium to India, traditional forms of federalism are generally understood to be constitutional arrangements. But the extent to which constitutional law serves as the foundation for some of the other arrangements is very much contested. France's devolution is tied to the constitution by only a thin thread, China's is a product of simple legislation formally reversible at will, and whether Britain's will be deemed constitutional only time can tell. On the global level, the very idea of applying constitutional language to governance beyond the state is still hotly debated and conceptually uncertain.¹¹

This chapter focuses on federalism. But it presents the terrain of federalism to lay the foundation for understanding the constitutional significance of arrangements among multiple (p. 578) levels of authority from private to global governance. As we shall see, even traditional federalism covers a broad set of legal arrangements. And the fact that federalism is generally understood to be a constitutional arrangement should not be taken to suggest that the role that constitutional law does or should play in federal systems is uncontested. To the contrary, for some, such as Proudhon, the idea of federalism even contains a hint of anarchy.¹²

The chapter proceeds in six sections. Section II critically examines the (relevance of) historical debates about defining federalism. Section III turns to arguments about the origins of federations. Section IV analyzes normative federalism theory and its applicability in legal disputes. Section V discusses the sustainability of federal systems. Section VI considers the consequences of federalism for various policy outputs. Section VII takes federalism beyond its traditional boundaries—first down to regional, local, and private governance, and then up into the global arena. A brief conclusion ends the chapter.

II. Federalism—Federation—Confederation

Federalism can be a charged and sometimes confusing word. A political rallying cry for decentralization in the United States, the F-word means more Brussels in Europe. Back when James Madison, Alexander Hamilton, and John Jay battled their opponents in pamphlets, both sides of the debate desperately sought the mantle of federalism to help their cause. And among academics, what is and what is not federalism has been embroiled in definitional squabbles that have been, at times, quite caustic\textsuperscript{13} and, more often, of questionable significance.\textsuperscript{14}

1. Capturing ‘Federalism’

Part of the problem is an accident of history. Recall that at the birth of modern federalism in the United States, the Founders described their novel creation as ‘in strictness neither a national nor a federal constitution; but a composition of both’.\textsuperscript{15} As contemporary discussion and usage in the Federalist Papers suggested, the word ‘federal’ at that time signified a distinctly international idea ‘which regards the Union as a confederacy of sovereign states’.\textsuperscript{16} Put another way, ‘federal’ was roughly synonymous with what we would generally call ‘confederal’ today.\textsuperscript{17} The new American Republic was in this sense a hybrid system of governance that combined international with national modes of governance. For example, according to Madison's Federalist 39, the American Republic exemplified the ‘federal’ form in the mode of constitutional ratification (ie, assent via ratification convention in every state that joined the Union) and in the states’ equal representation in the Senate.\textsuperscript{18} But, again according to Madison, the new republic also had ‘national’ features, as for instance, the representation of the people ‘in the same proportion, and on the same principle, as they are in the Legislature of a particular State’.\textsuperscript{19} A similarly ‘national’ feature of the new government was that the central government’s powers operated not merely ‘on the political bodies composing the confederacy, in their political capacities’ but directly on the individual citizen.\textsuperscript{20}

In their campaign documents, the Founders deployed a strategy of imprecision. For instance, in a proper confederation of the type known at the time (or indeed since then), the mode of ratification within each signatory state would ordinarily rest with each signatory state's internal legal requirements. The US Constitution, by contrast, spelled out the mode of its own ratification within each state by demanding popular ratifying conventions that bypassed existing state government institutions. It was, after all, to be a product of 'We, the People' not the 'We, the States'. In this sense, even the purportedly ‘federal’ features of the US Constitution were far less ‘federal’ (ie in modern terms, far less ‘confederal’) than the Framers let on.

The most cunning imprecision of all, however, still influences how we think of the subject today. Call it the Federalists’ strategic synecdoche. By presenting their distinctly hybrid form of governance in ‘The Federalist’ papers, the Founders appropriated for the whole of their new enterprise a term that only described part of the arrangement: ‘federalism’. The ‘national’ bit was subtly dropped. The public relations campaign (and the quest to create the American republic) was a success. And so, today, ‘federal’ and ‘federalism’ are understood primarily in terms of the American hybrid form of governance as opposed to the older idea of federalism as confederation.

But that was not the end of conceptual controversy. In modern times, K.C. Wheare's influential work \textit{Federal Government} promoted an American-centered understanding of the ‘federal principle’ as ‘the method of dividing powers so that the general and regional governments are each, within a sphere, coordinate and independent.’\textsuperscript{21} On Wheare's account, the United States, which exemplified the federal principle, was an ‘association of states’ in which federal and state governments are ‘co-equally supreme within their sphere’.\textsuperscript{22} But for all his focus on the United States, it was questionable whether Wheare understood American federalism properly, especially as it had developed over time. As critics were quick to point out,\textsuperscript{23} Wheare neglected the cooperative elements of US federalism as well as the role of the Supremacy Clause. More important for present purposes, Wheare defined federalism so narrowly that it excluded Argentina, the Weimar Republic (and later the Federal Republic of Germany and many others), in which central and constituent government institutions were more closely intertwined than in Wheare's idealized conception of federalism in the United States.

What followed was a long battle of definition and redefinition—at least within English speaking scholarship—mostly to broaden the scope of ‘federalism’ beyond Wheare's particular (and mostly outdated) understanding of the American model. William Livingston, for example, suggested a sociological approach that focused not on ‘legal and constitutional terminology’ but on the ‘economic, social, political, [and] cultural’ forces necessary to sustain federal government.²⁴ Carl Friedrich, in turn, insisted on a strong conceptual link between federalism and constitutionalism, but viewed both not as fixed legal constructs but as dynamic ‘processes’ by which society continually organizes and reorganizes itself.²⁵ And just as Morton (p. 580) Grodzins famous ‘marble cake’ metaphor debunked the idea that US federalism involved mutually distinct spheres,²⁶ so Daniel Elazar's simple definition of federalism as a combination of ‘self-rule plus shared rule’ expanded the reach of ‘federalism’ and ‘federalism’ well beyond the US model to describe such arrangements as Union, Federation, Confederation, Federacy, Associated Statehood, Condominium, and League.²⁷

The most lasting definitional contribution, however, has come from William Riker. His was grounded in, and accompanied by, an approach to federalism studies that has dominated the political science literature ever since: causal analysis of actors engaged in rational political strategies within defined institutional settings.²⁸ Riker's classic definition held that

A constitution is federal if (1) two levels of government rule the same land and people, (2) each level has at least one area of action in which it is autonomous, and (3) there is some guarantee (even though only a statement in the constitution) of the autonomy of each government in its own sphere.²⁹

Mostly usable to this day,³⁰ Riker's definition should be taken as properly linked to a specific research project. It should not be taken to distract from the fact that in some federal systems, such as Brazil, the European Union, Germany, or India, more than two levels of government have constitutionally based claims to rule that can usefully be analyzed in terms of federalism as well. And it should not deflect attention away from a more modern conception of the distribution of powers (in the United States and around the world), which recognizes that jurisdiction and accompanying policy actions of the various levels are not distinct and autonomous from one another but compete and intermingle with one another.³¹ Finally, Riker's definition should also not distract from the general importance in a federation of each level of government's organizational autonomy as distinct from any substantive jurisdiction over execution, adjudication, or promulgation of law and policy. An alternative definition that embraces all these features might take federalism to mean the coexistence within a compound polity of multiple levels of government each with constitutionally grounded claims to some degree of organizational autonomy and jurisdictional authority.³²

2. The Territory of ‘Federation’

One of the useful analytic insights to emerge from the definitional debates is the central importance to traditional federalism of territorial government, or what Ivo Duchacek long ago termed the ‘territorial dimension of politics’.³³ Some scholars along the way have suggested a more abstract understanding of federalism that would include jurisdictions organized not along geographic but along functional lines. Most prominent in this regard, has been the work (p. 581) of Swiss economists Bruno Frey and Reiner Eichenberger, who advocate a system of functional overlapping competing jurisdictions (FOJCs).³⁴ Such jurisdictions would have governance authority over a single policy issue (such as education or religion) and not be organized along geographical boundaries.³⁵ Analogies between such functionally organized jurisdictions and federalism do indeed exist and can yield useful insights.³⁶ And yet, in common parlance as well as in the scholarly literature, there is still considerable force to Livingston's blunt statement that 'No government has ever been called federal that has been organized on any but the territorial basis.'³⁷

In a less promising move, scholars such as Preston King,³⁸ Ronald Watts,³⁹ and Michael Burgess⁴⁰ have argued for distinguishing between federalism and federation along normative/institutional lines. King, for example, suggested that federalism is best thought of as an ideology, political philosophy, or normative concept as distinguished from the institutional manifestation of federalism in federation.⁴¹ This, he thought, would help to focus debates about the political philosophy that underpins federal arrangements. But it is not clear that anyone was ever seriously confused by the use of ‘federalism’ to signify both normative theory and institutional practice. And so this particular distinction between federalism and federation has never taken root.

Somewhat more promising has been the effort to tease out the idea of a federation as only one particular kind of federal arrangement. Ronald Watts, for example, notes that Within the genus of federal political systems, federations represent a particular species in which neither the federal nor the constituent units of government are constitutionally subordinate to the other, i.e. each has sovereign powers derived from the constitution rather than another level of government, each is empowered to deal directly with its citizens in the exercise of its legislative, executive and taxing powers and each is directly elected by its citizens.\(^{42}\)

Whether using the term ‘federal system’ or ‘federalism’ as the umbrella term, most scholars seem to take the basic point about genus versus species. An accepted distinction, then, exists between federalism as the general phenomenon (be it normative or institutional) and federation as a more specific institutional manifestation. To be sure, as we shall see, scholars still quibble about the precise institutional characteristics of a federation. But ‘federation’ lays the foundation for teasing out one particular institutional manifestation of federalism and distinguishing it from the others.

3. Beyond ‘Confederation’

Among the species of federalism, the distinction between federation and confederation has long generated the most interest. The German-speaking literature on federalism has (p. 582) been especially focused on this distinction, that is, between Staatenbund (confederation) and Bundesstaat (federation), as first Switzerland and then Germany moved from looser alliances to more closely knit forms of federalism. Because the ‘state’ as fundamental unity has loomed so large in the German legal tradition, scholars (especially lawyers) have grappled hard with understanding the very possibility of federalism. Today, we witness a new variant of these debates as scholars, judges, politicians, and citizens argue about whether, for example, the European Union is a federal state, federation, confederation, or sui generis entity.\(^{44}\)

All these definitional arguments, however, say more about the conceptual imagination or intellectual agenda of those arguing for one view over another than they do about the entity being discussed. At times, such inquiries focus on the rather elusive (and frequently unhelpful) idea of ‘sovereignty’, as in asking whether sovereignty ultimately resides at the central level (federation) or component state level (confederation).\(^{45}\) They occasionally worry about whether the system as a whole qualifies as a ‘state’ (either under the definition of international law or on Weber’s definition of the monopoly of the legitimate use of violence) before speaking of federation. Or they may turn to more concrete operational questions, such as (1) whether the central level of government has the authority to expand its powers without the unanimous consent of the component states;\(^{46}\) (2) whether there is a direct electoral link between the citizen and the central level of government;\(^{47}\) and (3) whether the central government can directly impose legal obligations on the individual as defining elements of a federation.\(^{48}\) Reasonable arguments can be made for the significance of many of these operational characteristics in distinguishing between federations and confederations. But the choice of elements selected by the various definitions here, too, will usually depend mostly on the purpose of the academic study or political argument advanced.

When opting for one or more of these characteristics to distinguish federations from other federal arrangements, we are therefore well advised to heed Harold Greaves's early dictum that ‘it is not always possible to draw clear and incontestable distinctions[…] … alliance shades into league, league into confederation, confederation into federal state, federal state into unitary state.’\(^{49}\) The Italian scholar and statesman Pellegrino Rossi made a similar point back in 1833 noting that in moving from federation to confederation he saw no bright lines but only ‘degrees and nuances’.\(^{50}\) Federalism, federation, and confederation may therefore be deployed one way or another as a matter of rhetoric for political gain. But for purposes of theoretical or empirical scholarship, it makes no sense to speak about the accuracy of one definition over another in the absence of a specific research project or theory regarding the causes, effects, or normative implications of the phenomenon being defined.

(p. 583) III. The Origins of Federal Systems

Koen Lenaerts and Alfred Stepan (writing separately in different fields),\(^{51}\) distinguish between two principal ways in which federations come about. In the first, ‘integrative’ (Lenaerts) or ‘coming together’ (Stepan) federalism, independent states form a federation to reap the gains of unity while maintaining the individuality of their component parts. In the second, ‘devolutionary’ (Lenaerts) or ‘holding together’ (Stepan) federalism, a unitary state devolves power to component governments in an effort to appease political demands for decentralization or to pacify separatist movements while maintaining the unity of the overarching state. By introducing this basic distinction, both Stepan and Lenaerts sought to counteract the normalization of the American experience in the study of federations. Stepan, in particular, took aim at Riker's exclusive focus on federalism as the coming together of independent sovereign states. Federations such as India, Spain, and Belgium, did not fit that model and yet they needed a home at the core of what we understand as federalism.

Especially with regard to integrative federations, scholars continue to debate what caused them. Riker boldly posited that such federations are created because politicians desire territorial expansion in the face of an external military threat or opportunity. This ‘primacy of the military motive’ as well as the original hypothesis that such threats or opportunities are always external, has come under severe attack. Scholars soon noted that the threat could come equally from internal, as opposed to external, sources as in the case of Nigeria’s attempt to control ethnic factions within the federation. The origins of the European Union in an attempt of Franco-German reconciliation could be added as an example here as well. Others urged that federation reflects an ideological commitment of elites or the social qualities of its people. Reviewing the literature on the subject in light of the formation of a host of federations, Michael Burgess concludes that the theory about the necessary existence of a military threat is not very informative. ‘Closer historical analysis’ in his view ‘demonstrate[s] that a complex amalgam of socioeconomic, historical and political variables were also present at the creation’; Burgess ultimately pleads for a theory—we might call it an anti-theory—of federal formation: the theory of ‘circumstantial causation’. With regard to the various motives for federation, all of which are easily identifiable, he concludes that ‘it remains very much a matter of conjecture as to how far we can prioritize among them’.

Later studies have tried to hone in more closely on what motivates the choice between federation and its alternatives in the formation of a new political union. Daniel Ziblatt, for instance, calls into question Riker’s hypothesis that a federation derives from a failure of the expanding power to ‘overawe’ its neighbors in the unsuccessful attempt to achieve a greater, unitary state. Ziblatt suggests, instead, that elites with expansive ambitions seize upon the capacity of each of its potential negotiating partners to govern their own internal affairs effectively. He argues for what we can call a supply-side theory of federalism. It holds that the most decisive factor in [the] moment of institutional creation is the preexisting supply of regional political institutions ... with high levels of institutional capacity that can be used both to negotiate the terms of polity formation and to govern after the polity has been formed.

Ziblatt, then, would turn the traditional theory of formation on its head: ‘federalism was not a second-best strategy adopted when necessary. Instead, federalism emerged when possible, while it was unitary structures that were viewed as necessary.’

Chad Rector’s recent study approaches the comparison from the other end. He asks why independent states seeking the benefits of union opt for federation as opposed to some form of looser, international alliance. Rector’s argument is also radical. The principal reason for institutions of federalism, on his account, is not to enhance gains from cooperation but to impose costs for defection. He suggests that states which have less to lose from the potential breakdown of cooperation would prefer an international alliance whereas states with more to lose want federation. Accordingly, the principal purpose of federation is to ‘contrive symmetry’ among the parties where none would otherwise exist. After investing in federation, everyone loses equally if the deal breaks down.

Despite several sophisticated contributions, debate about the origins of federations will clearly continue. No single accepted theory has taken the place of Riker’s rash model. The more general theories tend to be vague or in the nature of anti-theories. The more specific theories need more proof. For example, Ziblatt’s and Rector’s studies provide the most nuanced current analyses of the choice between federation and the alternatives of a unitary state, on the one hand, and an international alliance, on the other. And yet, each suffers from obvious limitations (many of which the authors themselves acknowledge). Ziblatt, for example, creatively draws four comparisons from his two-system study by including a difference analysis among the component states of each (would be) federation. After reaching his conclusions, he adds a quick sketch of a broader comparison throughout Europe. This goes a long way to unsettle previous assumptions. But it will take more detailed work outside his two principal case studies to confirm his specific thesis. Rector’s analysis, while comparing a good deal more systems than Ziblatt’s, often includes judgments of self-restraint through investment that are uncomfortably close to the simple manifestation of dominance. So, for example, he argues that non-vulnerable states must and do invest more heavily in federal institutions as a way to post a credible bond in favor of cooperation with their more vulnerable partners. At the same time, however, such relatively greater investment of strong states in the institutions of federalism—say, Prussia’s preeminence in the German Federation of 1871—may also reflect a hegemonic element within the federation that simply serves to benefit the stronger party.

Perhaps most important, however, we should be careful in this terrain before privileging too much any given moment of ‘creation’ or distinguishing too starkly between ‘coming-together’ (or ‘integrative’) federations and their opposites. Returning to Lenaerts and Stepan, for example, they seem to characterize a federal system based on a chosen moment of creation as falling into one or the other category for all time. But by privileging the moment of foundation to characterize the system as a whole in this way, they suggest that the founding dynamic of politics is the one that will persist and dominate the life of the federation. And yet, a system of governance—especially a long-lived one such as Switzerland, the United States, Germany, Canada, or Venezuela—may undergo successive periods of integration and devolution over time. Indeed, before any given system emerged as a holding-together federation in the first place (as in the case of, say, the modern-day United Kingdom), it most likely had come together at a much earlier point in time to form the unity from which power is now being devolved.

IV. Why Federalism?

The terrain of normative political theory on federalism is well worn. And yet all too often one still finds no more than a disparate collection of individual reasons for or against central or local authority without considering the analytic structure of federalism theory as a whole. This leads to blind spots. Some scholars, for example, thereby fail to appreciate the significant difference between federalism and decentralization or which of several potential values of federalism are at stake in any given decision. As existing federal systems continue to struggle with maintaining a workable division of authority among their various levels of government, and as questions of the constitutional design gain renewed importance around the world, it is therefore useful to bear in mind a general (albeit brief) normative theory of federalism.

US scholars and judges may shy away from using the term, but the key theoretical concept underlying a general theory of federalism is what Europeans call ‘subsidiarity’. To make it palatable to all, we shall simply call it here the ‘federal power principle’. Regardless of name, the basic principle should be familiar to Americans. It animated the Virginia Plan, which James Madison drafted and Governor James Randolph introduced in Philadelphia to serve as the blueprint for the US Constitution. With striking similarity to the later European analogue of subsidiarity, the plan proposed that the central legislature be given the power ‘to legislate in all cases to which the separate States are incompetent, or in which the harmony of the United States may be interrupted by the exercise of individual legislation.’ The Constitutional Convention voted in favor of the provision and used it as the basis for the more specific enumeration of powers found today in Article I, section 8 of the US Constitution. As it turns out, unpacking the Randolph plan, that is, unpacking subsidiarity, gets us all we need (or, more accurately, gives us all we can get) from a general normative theory of federalism.

1. The Benefits of Local Power

Subsidiarity begins with a presumption in favor of a multiplicity of local authorities. Ever since Rousseau argued in favor of small states over large ones, democratic theory and public choice literature have recognized important arguments in support of local over central authority. Some arguments trade principally on size, others emphasize the multiplicity of local power, and yet others build on both. This terrain is for the most part all too well known. But it is nonetheless useful to sketch out briefly before we turn to arguments in favor of a single central authority.

(a) Voice

It is a staple of federalism literature that, all else being equal, local government will better reflect citizen preferences if citizens with different preferences cluster within different jurisdictions. Even if such clustering is slight (or non-existent at first) mobile citizens can move from one jurisdiction to another, thereby sorting themselves into the various jurisdictions that best satisfy their individual preferences. Politicians at local levels will have greater incentives to respond to this diversity than will the politicians in a central government eager to form ‘universalistic coalitions’. And even in the absence of mobility or preference diversity, the smaller the jurisdiction, the greater the weight of an individual citizen’s vote and the greater the individual citizen’s access to, and control of, his or her representative.

(b) Community

Smaller jurisdictions are often said to foster and reflect a greater sense of community among its citizens than do larger jurisdictions. One argument is that smaller jurisdictions increase the quality of democratic interaction and incline individuals more charitably toward their fellow citizens and to public engagement. The anti-federalists generally called this sentiment republican or civic ‘virtue’. Madison took the point and was therefore keen on maintaining states alongside the federal government in the new compound republic. De Tocqueville later would add that when coupled with larger jurisdictions, smaller jurisdictions serve as schools of democracy for citizens and representatives alike. The deeper sense of community in smaller jurisdictions may have benefits for the enforcement and implementation of laws as well, as citizens will more likely follow the rules of a more closely knit community than of one that is large and diffuse.

Scholars have, of course, argued that many constituent states in federal systems are so large today that the argument based on size cannot carry much weight. Constituent units are too large to create the kind of deeply affective community envisioned by the anti-federalists of the eighteenth century. And yet, conclusions about the existence of thicker forms of political participation in smaller jurisdictions as compared to larger ones are remarkably robust even when those smaller jurisdictions contain, say, up to a million citizens. More broadly, regional affinities including language, religion, ethnicity, history, or morality indeed reflect commonalities within a component state that are not shared by the larger citizenship of the federal polity as a whole.

(c) Expertise

Smaller jurisdictions can be more effective because local decision-makers have a better grasp of the relevant local facts than would actors at the central level of governance. This argument about information asymmetries, in particular, applies well beyond democratic settings and even well beyond federalism. In the federalism literature, the classic example is the property tax, where local officials are likely better than national officials at valuation. But the point can be extended to any other matter of local variation presumed to be within the better grasp of local officials. In the European Union, this basic idea is one of the driving forces behind issuing so-called ‘directives’. Even after having decided on a certain policy goal at the central level of governance, a directive (at least in theory) leaves the implementation to local officials who can better tailor the appropriate measures to local conditions.

(d) Risk

A multiplicity of jurisdictions helps to manage risk. This is only an indirect argument in favor of smaller units of government, as its main focus is on the multiplicity of jurisdictions. Spreading governance authority over multiple jurisdictions can increase resistance to bad rule and lower the cost of governance experiments more generally. For example, it should come as no surprise that the first move of fascist government in Germany was the elimination of federalism through ‘Gleichschaltung’ of the Länder. So, too, in Venezuela, federalism has recently come under attack as an obstacle to the move from democracy to a more authoritarian regime. There can be, of course, no paper guarantee for the preservation of federalism (or constitutionalism or the rule of law). But the existence of multiple sites of authority within a system of governance is designed to protect against the ill effects of tyrannical elites seizing power over any one level or unit of government. Similarly, seeing how a politician first does in a component jurisdiction is often a good way of testing for, and assuring citizens (especially in fledgling democracies) of, the trustworthiness of potential leaders of the republic as a whole.

Federalism helps to hedge our bets not only against tyrants, but also against the risk of bad policy. Better that Drachten and Ipswich try out the elimination of all road signs in an effort to increase traffic safety than that we run this experiment Europe-wide. Or that Oregon and the Netherlands experiment with physician-assisted suicide while the rest of us look on. And most important, if we really want experiments to take the federal polity tomorrow where it may not want to go today, we must give local governments the power to choose their own policy goals as well. Thus, local experience with same-sex unions in the United States comes at a time when a majority of Americans is still firmly opposed to the practice and public opinion is slowly changing. Justice Brandeis famously captured this phenomenon in saying that ‘It is one of the happy incidents of the federal system that a single courageous state may, if its citizens choose, serve as a laboratory; and try novel social and economic experiments without risk to the rest of the country.’ A related, but sometimes less well recognized, argument is that by allowing a multiplicity of jurisdictions to try their own policy experiments, federalism can unsettle policies that have become entrenched at the central level of government due to inertia, capture, or corruption. Here, too, the effects of bad (in)decision can be mitigated by unsettling the status quo through local action. Sometimes local experiments with locally contained costs lead the nation by shining example. At other times, local experiments prod the nation into considered action by causing national irritation.

2. The Benefits of Central Power

The literature on the benefits of central power is vast as well. Here, too, modern arguments in public choice literature often echo theorists and statesmen of long ago. In any event, the arguments can be usefully grouped into the following three simple categories.

(a) Cost Savings

The basic point about economies of scale and scope needs little elaboration. Just as it can be cheaper to produce certain goods or services by consolidating production or supply, so, too, it can be cheaper to consolidate certain government activities in a central authority. In the European Union, for example, one argument in support of the creation of a common currency was the cost savings entailed by eliminating currency conversion in cross-border market transactions. Similarly, American businesses operating nationwide often lobby for a single federal regulation that preempts state regulation as a way to save the cost of having to comply with 50 different local rules. Greater policymaking resources at the central level may also mean that difficult policy problems are better solved at the central level of government than by experimentation throughout smaller constituent entities. In law enforcement, too, scholars and officials have advanced scale efficiencies as supporting prerogatives of federal over state powers. Others have argued that delegation of policymaking powers to a central agency saves costly ad hoc negotiations once overall policy goals have been set.

These and similar transactions cost savings point in favor of establishing central power, although not all of them argue for displacing local authority at the same time. In some cases the existence of more cost-effective governance facilities at the center could simply function as resources that component units could tap into at their convenience. Where the center has greater policy-solving or crime-solving capacity, for instance, local governments might avail themselves of the central resource by choice. In other cases, however, such as a common currency, the cost savings derives from the singularity of the central government policy. In these cases, any savings necessarily depend on engagement of the central government and simultaneous disengagement of the component states.

(b) Inter-Jurisdictional Difficulties

The second category reflects problems that arise not due to size but to the multiplicity of local jurisdictions. And they arise not merely due to the increased costs of doing things many different times instead of once but because of difficulties of coordinating multiple jurisdictions. Call this category ‘inter-jurisdictional difficulties’.

The most commonly cited inter-jurisdictional difficulty is an externality, which figures prominently in Wallace Oates’s famous decentralization theorem. Policy effects—whether negative or positive—that radiate beyond any given local jurisdiction can lead to regulatory mismatches for several related reasons. The jurisdiction externalizing effects on others may under-appreciate those effects because it does not feel them; it may value those effects differently even if it were to feel them; or it may be trapped in a multilateral prisoner’s dilemma in which all jurisdictions feel each other’s externalized effects and value them equally but cannot reliably coordinate their regulatory responses. And, indeed, externalities of one sort or another justify a good deal of central government power from certain forms of environmental regulation to central government support for roads or higher education.

But there are other consequences arising from the lack of coordinated policy strategies of multiple jurisdictions as well. Although many might be packed into the model of an externality, some collective action problems are best thought of as creating rather distinct kinds of inter-jurisdictional difficulties.

For example, scholars have long pointed to the twin aspects of Tiebout's famous sorting hypothesis. Think of it as two sides to the coin of mobility: 'voter mobility' and 'object mobility'. On the one side is the mobility of the resident as 'voter' who moves from one jurisdiction to another in search of the proper mix of taxes and services. On the other side is the mobility of the resident as 'object' of regulation, say a manufacturing plant that can flee a costly regulatory regime. As long as the costs and benefits of a particular local regulation roughly fall on the same entity, Tiebout sorting can be a straightforward affair, happily leading to the proverbial race to the top. I move to a certain jurisdiction because of the packages of taxes and benefits I receive much as I buy a widget at a certain store for a price I like.

But as soon as the incidents of regulation fall heavily on one entity, say a manufacturer (and its workers), while the benefits fall on another or on citizens more generally, object mobility limits the exercise of public power. This is why, for example, redistributive policies are difficult to maintain at the level of local government, as the US Supreme Court recognized in upholding federal unemployment laws. Indeed, component jurisdictions within federal systems have often found themselves in competition with one another for movable capital investments, leading to what some have called a race to the bottom. Whether giving up on environmental standards, worker protection, or, ultimately, taxes, subunits within federal systems have frequently sought to outbid one another to attract mobile industry.

The effects of this kind of inter-jurisdictional competition are hotly debated. Some scholars have challenged the race-to-the-bottom hypothesis by arguing that such competition is generally efficient. They claim that this kind of hustling merely reveals each jurisdiction's true preference for trading off tax revenue and other regulatory impositions for the jobs and the economic development the state expects incoming capital investments to provide. Indeed, Barry Weingast maintains that the limitation of public power by virtue of component unit regulation of the economy and the (constitutionally enforced) mobility of the objects of economic regulation are key elements of the 'market-preserving federalism' that has sustained economic growth in the West. And yet, others find it hard to see the value in moving a fixed number of jobs from Seattle to Chicago, as happened in the case of Boeing, in exchange for state and local tax breaks. One component jurisdiction gains at the expense of another, while the federal system as a whole has lost public revenue and compromised its power of regulation.

Whether this is a good or bad outcome mostly depends on one's theory of public choice and whether democratic government is seen as benign or malign. If one has reason to believe that democratic government is merely a self-interested affair by those in power, the analogy between jurisdictional competition and competition among widget manufacturers makes a good deal of sense. In that case, we should applaud the loss of regulatory and taxing power that federalism occasions. If, on the other hand, one has reason to believe that government policies reflect some broader common good, then we might be more worried about certain forms of inter-jurisdictional competition. On the benign view of democracy, allowing the central government (ie, a monopoly jurisdiction or at least one with what economists would call 'market power') to extract supra-competitive 'rents' from industry is not, in principle, objectionable. It all depends on the uses to which the government puts its gains from trade.

Even from a component state's perspective, it can often be vexingly difficult to sort through whether any particular limitation of public power through regulatory competition is ultimately beneficial or harmful. Put another way, it's hard to tell whether the race is to the bottom or the top. As Fritz Scharpf has explained in discussing the European Union, to understand whether a race is benign or malign, we must attend to a host of factors that affect local regulatory capacity as well as those that affect central regulatory capacity. These can range from formal legal authority and institutional voting rules to whether regulatory standards are embedded in goods or services and the extent to which signaling can mobilize market actors who reward quality. Which way a race tends to run can therefore be judged only by looking at the particular dynamics of the sector in question.

Perhaps the only general conclusion we can draw is the following rather obvious principle. Call it the 'federal conservation of powers principle': unless a loss of component state authority is made up for by a gain in authority at the center, federalism institutionalizes a bias in favor of deregulation. And whether that bias is good or bad depends (once again) not on federalism, but on one's theory of democracy, regulation, and the market.
(c) Intra-Jurisdictional Difficulties

The final reason for moving politics from constituent units to the center is a failure of the political process within the component units of governance. Call this an ‘intra-jurisdictional difficulty’. This reason is entirely absent from Wallace Oates's famous theorem on decentralization. Perhaps as a result, it receives less attention in the public choice literature on federalism even though this reason figured prominently in the Framers’ argument.

An intra-jurisdictional difficulty focuses on the political process of a given jurisdiction. But it is not concerned with the failure to consider costs and benefits external to that jurisdiction. Instead, an intra-jurisdictional difficulty is the failure of the political process at the local level to take into account and respond properly to interests that are internal to the local jurisdiction itself. Even when the costs of failure are borne entirely by locally affected parties, shifting politics to the center can help to make politics—in particular, democratic politics—better.

This was Madison's well-known argument in Federalist 10. In small jurisdictions, representatives may win elections by ‘vicious arts’, become ‘unduly attached’ to local interests, and be swayed by a ‘few distinct parties and interests’ forming relatively consistent majorities. All this, Madison argued, leads to the oppression of minorities. His answer was to enlarge the republic: (p. 592)

Extend the sphere, and you take in a greater variety of parties and interests; you make it less probable that a majority of the whole will have a common motive to invade the rights of the other citizens; or if such a common motive exists, it will be more difficult for all who feel it to discover their own strength, and to act in unison with each other.

In addition, ‘where there is consciousness of unjust or dishonorable purposes, communication is always checked by distrust, in proportion to the number whose concurrence is necessary.’ Madison’s idea, then, was safety in numbers. As for central power in a federation, this meant ‘that the same advantage ... in controlling the effects of faction ... enjoyed by a large over a small republic ... is enjoyed by the Union over the States composing it.’

We see responses to such intra-jurisdictional difficulties in a variety of federal settings. Federal systems often protect certain basic rights at the central level of government—especially when fearing an invasion of rights by factions that form local majorities but remain national minorities. A classic response is, for example, the combination of the Bankruptcy Clause and the Contracts Clause in the US Constitution. Taken together, these provisions protected creditors against local levelers while lodging politics over debt relief squarely with the central government. The post-Civil War provisions granting Congress the power to protect civil rights were similarly enacted out of mistrust of state politics—in that case on matters of race. Indeed, state political dysfunction on race continued for so long in the United States that William Riker concluded his comparative study of federalism with the scathing lines: ‘If in the United States one disapproves of racism, one should disapprove of federalism’.

More generally, scholars of democratization have cautioned that decentralized power abets the persistence of subnational authoritarian practices, and complicates efforts to deepen democracy in federations that have made the formal transition to democracy at the federal level. Perhaps the most dramatic provisions intended to protect against this kind of failure of local politics are those guaranteeing the republican or democratic character of constituent state governments. Rarely used in most federations, it can, however, be a powerful weapon of centralization in the hands of some. For example, a transplant of the Guarantee Clause has enabled the federal government of Argentina to take over state government functions repeatedly and for extended periods of time.

3. Subsidiarity Redux: Instrumental or Intrinsic?

Recall the basic federal power principle: the center will assist the constituent units of government (only) in case of need and help to coordinate their activities with the rest of society with a view to the common good. Subsidiarity may be used, as it was in the Randolph plan, to sort out the distribution of powers when founding a federation. But no constituent assembly can specify with precision all the powers of the various levels of government necessary to sustain a functioning compound polity. And unless a polity governs by frequent constitutional revisions or (p. 593) referenda (as, say, in Switzerland), the various actors (including courts) must make due with interpreting existing power provisions to fit the problems of the day. This is where subsidiarity enters the life of the federation as an operative principle of constitutional law.
But subsidiarity is easier said than applied. How do we assess ‘need’ or ‘the common good?’ How do we decide (to use the Randolph formula) when component states are ‘incompetent’ or when the harmony of the union risks being ‘interrupted’? Unpacking the federal power principle into its component claims in favor of local and central authority, as we have just done, provides a much better grasp on the structure of the various arguments hidden in the sleek opening formula. But it does not yet fill these arguments with content. That is because subsidiarity contains a further difficulty.

In addition to the complex empirical judgments involved in some of the arguments in favor of local or central authority, many of these arguments will raise questions of first principle that cannot be resolved absent politics. Take the rather simple sounding idea of externalities. How do we know when they should matter? Every policy affects interests beyond its jurisdictional boundaries even if only because outsiders who know about the policy do not like it. Slavery in the American South had tangible economic effects in the North and elsewhere. It also offended the moral sensibilities of many northern Unionists. Capital punishment in Poland most likely would have a negligible economic impact outside its borders. It is restricted today as a condition of membership in the European Union because it offends stated European values. Gay marriage, physician-assisted suicide, and the use of medical marijuana have all made it onto the national agenda of politics in the United States in large part due to ideological objections voiced outside the jurisdictions in which these policies were instituted. Are such ideological externalities bona fide externalities? The Millean harm principle is of little help here, as it does not come with ready-made content. After all, one jurisdiction’s externality may be another’s autonomy.

What is often overlooked is that this basic question bedevils most arguments in favor of central (or local) authority. Consider the simple case of transactions costs. They are worth reducing only, of course, if we have agreed on the goal we are trying to pursue. Otherwise, high transactions costs may indeed be a welcome safeguard against policies we dislike. Intra-jurisdictional difficulties, too, create harm only to the extent that we view the particular form of intra-jurisdictional politics we are trying to cure as problematic. When African-Americans are excluded from the franchise, the answer is easy. But whether felon disenfranchisement at the component state level compromises the local democratic process already generates little agreement in the United States. Although we may be able to reason our way from universally accepted principles to a few conclusions, we will often need politics to get there. What Robert Dahl observed with regard to the question of how to determine the proper boundaries of a democratic polity applies with equal force here: ‘Democratic ideas ... do not yield a definitive answer. They presuppose that one has been somehow been supplied, by history and politics.’

In trying to apply the federal power principle to concrete cases, it can therefore be useful to distinguish between two kinds of arguments. The first are instrumental arguments, which presuppose agreement on the goal or interest to be achieved. These arguments debate only which level of government will best get us there. The second kind are intrinsic arguments, which debate the very goals and interests. These arguments ask which level of government has the better claim to determine the goals and interests in the first place. This difference between instrumental and intrinsic arguments of federalism can often be confusing. And both kinds of argument can be in play at the same time. And yet, when applying subsidiarity, especially (but not only) in judicial settings, it can be useful to tease out which of these arguments is at stake.

Take, for example, the European Union’s subsidiarity clause, which sets forth an exclusively instrumental version of subsidiarity:

Under the principle of subsidiarity ... the Union shall act only if and in so far as the objectives of the proposed action cannot be sufficiently achieved by the Member States, either at central level or at regional and local level, but can rather, by reason of the scale or effects of the proposed action, be better achieved at Union level.

This provision assumes that the Union has the authority to decide upon the goals of a given action by virtue of an enumerated power spelled out elsewhere in the treaty. Article 5 adds that the Union must now consider whether the member states can achieve this Union-determined goal equally well on their own. For example, in enacting a European-wide deposit guarantee scheme, the Union was to have considered whether exercising its legislative power under then Article 57 of the EC Treaty was necessary to achieve the goal of protecting depositors against loss. The prior question whether the Union should have power to set goals in the area of financial services regulation had already been made by then-Article 57 EC. It may not be very hard in this case to decide that interjurisdictional difficulties would require Union legislation once the decision is taken that a baseline of deposit protection is needed throughout the Union. And so, applying subsidiarity might well be rather easy here.

Consider, by contrast, Canada's Peace Order and Good Government (POGG) Clause, which contains both substantive and instrumental elements of subsidiarity:

It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make Laws for the Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada, in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces.\(^{122}\)

This residual clause in favor of central power is paired with a competing residual clause in favor of exclusive provincial power: ‘In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make Laws in relation to … [g]enerally all Matters of a merely local or private Nature in the Province.’\(^{123}\) In applying these clauses, we must ask not only which level of government can better achieve a set goal. We must also determine which level of government should have the power to set a particular policy goal in the first place.

A jumbled mix of unstated subsidiarity considerations seems to animate a host of judicial decisions interpreting various enumerations of powers. Nowhere has this been more apparent than in the United States. Here, the exceptional difficulty in amending the constitution has created tremendous hydraulic pressure on interpretation. And so, important shifts in interpretation are often accompanied by an implicit return to the federal power principle that animated the distribution of power among the federal government and the states in the first place. Justice Holmes's landmark decision upholding federal power to make a treaty protecting migratory birds, for example, appealed to subsidiarity by pointing out that ‘the States individually are incompetent to act’ and noting that the treaty furthered ‘a national interest of very nearly the first magnitude … [that] can be protected only by national action in concert with that of another power.’\(^{124}\) Justice Cardozo's opinion in Steward Machine Company upheld a national unemployment tax as necessary because states had ‘held back through alarm lest in laying such a toll upon their industries, they would place themselves in a position of economic disadvantage as compared with neighbors or competitors.’\(^{125}\) And Justice Stone noted for the Court in United States v Darby that ‘interstate commerce should not be made the instrument of competition in the distribution of goods produced under substandard labor conditions, which competition is injurious to the commerce and to the state from and to which the commerce flows.’\(^{126}\) More recently, Justice Stevens in Gonzales v Raich upheld federal preemption of California's medical marijuana laws as necessary to regulate (ie, suppress) the nationwide market in the drug.\(^ {127}\) Conversely, the Court struck down several pieces of federal legislation not because of a lack of connection to interstate commerce, but because the kind of connection to interstate commerce present in those cases would have allowed the federal government to regulate family law, education, and violent crime.\(^ {128}\) Many of these subsidiarity questions turn on conceptually simple but empirically complex questions about instrumental rationality. But other subsidiarity decisions turn on substantive claims about national interests and local prerogatives that cannot be solved absent moral argumentation and political contest. Recognizing (and acknowledging) which of these are at stake would allow courts, in particular, to understand better their own powers and limitations in sorting out the various claims.

V. Sustaining Federalism

Scholars have pointed out that the relation between federalism and democratic governance is far more complicated than the happy story of normative theory would suggest. Subsidiarity and high-minded normative theories of federalism are not enough to control the political avarice that can make federalism fail. Courts can help,\(^ {129}\) but they are only a (small) part of the story. A sustainable federation needs a system of institutions that can channel the ambitions of powerful actors to the benefit of the federation and its citizens. The point is as old and as simple as Madison's classic caution in the Federalist Papers that we will not be governed by angels, or even enlightened statesmen. As we might put it here (only somewhat tongue in cheek), politicians are not inherently apt to act with subsidiarity in mind. Madison's conclusion was clear: ‘Ambition must be made to counteract ambition. The interest of the man must be connected with the constitutional rights of the place.’\(^ {130}\)

1. Incentive-Compatible Federalism

In the language of modern political science, federalism must be embedded in an ‘incentive compatible’ system that gives actors concrete political incentives to put their energies to (p. 596) productive uses. To move beyond mere ‘parchment barriers’, federalism—along with any other constitutional arrangement—must channel political ambition to create a ‘self-enforcing’ system.\textsuperscript{131} This involves politicians as well as all other actors within the system. As Rui de Figueiredo and Barry Weingast succinctly put it “The general problem concerns how to structure the political game so that all the players—elected officials, the military, economic actors, and citizens—have incentives to respect the rules.”\textsuperscript{132}

This is no easy task. Jenna Bednar, for example, has demonstrated that any one institutional arrangement for punishing what she terms shirking, encroachment, or burden-shifting in a federation is not enough.\textsuperscript{133} A federation needs structural, popular, political, and judicial safeguards, each providing a different ‘trigger mechanism’ to punish aberrant actors.\textsuperscript{134} Safeguards must cover all the different kinds of transgressions, complement each other in the nature of the punishment they offer, and be a sufficiently redundant check for mistakes.\textsuperscript{135} If we add to Bednar’s theory an understanding that what counts as a transgression is itself the subject of intense debate, the matter becomes even more complicated. Other authors therefore push for a greater reliance on less structured ‘populist safeguards of federalism’.\textsuperscript{136}

2. The Role of Political Parties

The key challenge of designing a federal system seems to require giving political elites incentives to consider the interests of the federation as a whole. In this vein, Riker long ago stressed the significance of the political party system for the creation of vertical links across jurisdictions.\textsuperscript{137} Such links may push uncomfortably toward unification as in the case of US Senators who, at times, controlled the fortunes of local politicians.\textsuperscript{138} And yet, they may also reign in the central government when central government politicians must rely on the support of the local machine for their electoral success, as Larry Kramer has shown.\textsuperscript{139} Jonathan Rodden has similarly pointed out how incentives of local politicians to act in the interests of the national party can be highly beneficial for the stability and efficiency of the union as a whole. Contrasting fiscal responsibility of political subunits in Germany and Australia with the fiscal profligacy on the part of constituent states in Brazil, he writes:

German state officials, like those of Australia are embedded in a highly integrated national party system that shapes their career prospects. Protecting the value of a national party label (p. 597) is generally not a priority for state-level officials in Brazil, providing few electoral incentives to avoid debt and bailout demands.\textsuperscript{140}

Similarly, if local politicians had no realistic aspirations to higher office, the logic of collective action would suggest that few local jurisdictions would run costly policy experiments for the benefit of all.\textsuperscript{141}

For politicians, then, this often means acting against the best interests of their most immediate electorate. As Mikhail Fillipov, Peter Ordeshook, and Olga Shvetsova put it, an important element of creating a self-sustaining federation is to make political elites ‘imperfect agents of those they represent and to motivate citizens to reward such imperfection’.\textsuperscript{142} The most consistent finding in this regard is that an integrated party system must tie politicians not only to their immediate electorate, but to the political system (and hence the electorate) of the system as a whole. Voters, in turn, can similarly be drawn into this incentive structure if parties and party labels are effective at both national and regional levels of governance at once.\textsuperscript{143}

VI. Does Federalism Deliver?

Does all this work? There are, of course, innumerable ways to ask this question. In the following, however, we shall concentrate on only two concrete considerations: policy stability and polity stability.

1. Policy Stability

One of the most persistent critiques in the literature stems from the understanding that federalism in one form or another constrains the central government and, thereby, the central (or, better, the general) body politic.\textsuperscript{144} Given that powers in a federation are, in one way or another, distributed or shared among the central and component governments, the central government in a federation has more limited powers as compared to the government of a unitary state. With the exception of Venezuela,\textsuperscript{145} the central legislature in a federation depends to varying degrees on the concurrence between a lower house and an upper chamber representing geographic units or component governments. This upper chamber, in turn, departs—again to varying degrees—from the principle of equal representation of citizens in favor of the principle of equal representation of territorial units. As a result, politics at the center do not reflect the equality of each individual's voice in the way that democratic theory often seems to demand. Indeed, in some federal systems, such as Brazil and the European Union, even the composition of the lower chamber departs significantly from the strict principle of equality of individuals in favor of boosting the representation of the smaller territorial component units of the federal system. All these institutional features shape the decision-making at the central level of governance on matters ranging from ordinary legislation and the selection (and removal) of presidents, judges, and other officials to amending the constitutional framework itself.

(a) Demos-Constraint and the Status Quo
Alfred Stepan has called these institutional features of federalism ‘demos constraining’. The principal observation regarding this constraint on the general demos has been that, as compared to a unitary state, the institutional structure of federalism creates a systematic policy bias in favor of the status quo. Concerns have focused in particular on the politics of redistribution. Recall that decentralization of redistributive decisions, say the provision of welfare, has the tendency to create a race to the bottom. Because subunits will fear becoming welfare magnets in the competition for mobile capital, each individual unit will have an interest in lowering welfare payments as compared to neighboring jurisdictions. That is why in a federation redistributive measures should be moved to the central level of government. But as it turns out, here, too, redistributive policies face hurdles.

For instance, a broadly representative lower house with the backing of a popularly elected President may vote in favor of easing inequalities in wealth only to be foiled by a less broadly representative upper chamber upon whose consent the legislation also depends. Madison, of course, thought of federalism and bicameralism along with the separation of powers as just such bulwarks against the dangers of populism: ‘a rage for paper money, for an abolition of debts, for an equal division of property, or for any other improper or wicked project, will be less apt to pervade the whole body of the Union, than a particular member of it.’ And, indeed, the phenomenon of federalism and bicameralism stalling redistributive reform has replayed itself the world over. The status quo is maintained not by general preferences but by a ‘structure-induced equilibrium’, to use Kenneth Shepsle’s term.

In the case of Brazil, for example, a small group of Senators representing only 9 percent of the population can block legislation, foiling broadly shared preferences to tackle economic inequality. Comparative studies investigating this phenomenon across democratic systems have found a significant correlation between federalism and greater income inequality.

To the extent we find an institutional bias against change at the center, however, it is not limited to the redistribution of wealth. Multiplying veto points favors the policy status quo across all political domains, including spending. Structure-induced equilibria can limit the redistribution of wealth as well as new forms of central government regulation. Conversely, it can lead to overspending and overregulation by locking in spending and regulatory programs whenever change is subject to the agreement of multiple actors. Especially when change from the status quo depends on the concurrence of the federal government and the states, this can lead to the infamous ‘joint decision trap’.

One question that has largely eluded the federalism literature is the general normative evaluation of this dynamic in cases where it exists. Some amount of policy stability is, of course, necessary for people and economic actors to have projects, plans, and goals. At the same time, too much stability can perpetuate certain forms of domination. And so, as is often the case, much depends on ones normative priors to figure out how much policy stability is just right with regard to any given policy domain. Some scholars applaud federalism as a protective shield against overregulation and too much redistribution. Others worry about a loss of regulatory power and the persistence or exacerbation of inequality of income. As Daniel Treisman puts it, ‘Entrenching the status quo may be desirable or undesirable, depending on what gets entrenched.

But there are far deeper problems with this picture about demos-constraint and the bias in favor of the status quo. First, it is not clear whether an authoritative demos constrained by federalism exists in any meaningful sense. Secondly, not all forms of federalism contain the same degree of bias in favor of the status quo. Indeed, some federal systems help to foster change and may even feature less of a status quo bias than unitary systems.
(b) Which Demos?

The assumption that a particular ‘demos’ is being ‘constrained’ by the federal institutional architecture can be quite misleading. Take redistribution. The suggestion seems to be that the demos would have redistributed wealth in the absence of federalism. The people generally would have voted for redistribution, but the popular will is foiled by an unrepresentative upper chamber. Or so the argument goes. But we should not forget that the raw calculation of majority preferences within a given system does not necessarily indicate that an authoritative democratic will in favor of change is being foiled by a less authoritative democratic will blocking change. That would be giving in to the Schmittian fallacy.\(^{159}\) After all, the political system under investigation may not (and, in an important sense, does not) exist in the absence of federalism and its ‘constraining’ political institutions.

The European Union, for example, might well be added to the roster of federations with an institutional bias against redistribution. And yet it would be odd to posit a pan-European demos that is being constrained in its desire to equalize wealth across Europe. Without the (p. 600) Union, questions of redistribution between Germany and Greece, for example, would be discussed under the rubric of foreign aid. Income inequalities would be maintained all the same but no one would be talking about a stalled demos. In short, we should be careful not to use the idea of a ‘demos’ as a mystical entity that we identify with only one or another of the institutions in a federation or with majority preferences and polls writ large. The positing of an actual ‘demos’ that transcends the institutional architecture of the federation itself may be more imagined than real. In a federal system, the compound polity is all we ever have.

(c) What Constraint?

Federal systems need not increase constraints on policy action.\(^{160}\) To be sure, bicameralism (along with the separation of powers) adds more veto points as compared to a unified parliamentary system. But just as not all unitary systems are created equal, not all institutional elements of federalism add barriers to change. Some may even counteract the status quo.

For example, Jonathan Rodden and Erik Wibbels have suggested that in terms of macroeconomic policy, the constraining effects of decentralization posited by Weingast and others are contingent on a host of features more specific than the brute fact of federalism itself.\(^{161}\) Systems with weak national parties that rely on intergovernmental transfers, for example, tend to allow subunit politicians to compete among one another in ways that ultimately put pressure on the central government to run up the deficit. But where vertical party linkages exist and subunits have the capacity to, and are forced to, rely on their own revenue, subunit politicians seem to resist the temptation to spend beyond their means.

Important differences exist more generally in terms of federal architecture. Distinguish, for example, among three kinds of federal governing mechanisms. Call them ‘joint rule’, ‘multiple rule’, and ‘separate rule’. ‘Joint rule’ is where the central government and the component states must both agree before making a change to the status quo. ‘Multiple rule’ is where both levels of government have the authority and resources to act on their own in the same policy area unless and until a conflict arises between two positively chosen policies. ‘Separate rule’ is the idea that each level separately governs mutually exclusive arenas of action. Multiple and separate rule line up closely with what are often called concurrent and exclusive powers (or competences).\(^{162}\) But the idea of ‘rule’ as used here extends beyond the formal distribution of powers to include principles of preemption as well. A component state may, for example, enjoy concurrent powers with a central government over a given area but see its powers displaced as soon as the central acts. The idea of multiple rule presumes weaker preemption norms, favoring rule by multiple governments until more concrete conflicts develop. Multiple rule is also made stronger where a federation's upper house is independently elected, as in the United States today, as opposed to being composed of recallable emissaries of component state executives, as in Germany or the European Union.\(^{163}\)

(p. 601) In areas of multiple rule, the institutions of federalism may counteract the status quo that results from policy inertia. This has been the central idea behind what is commonly called ‘competitive federalism’.\(^{164}\) When, for example, component states have the authority and capacity to make and implement policies on their own—subject only to central government preemption through positive law—states can prod the center into action. Component state officials (and political parties that form local majorities but national minorities) may adopt and implement policies as a way of competing with central government politicians and governing majorities for voters’ affection. This adds an element of ‘vertical competition’ to governance in federal systems to the ‘horizontal’ competition among the component states.\textsuperscript{165}

Multiple rule federalism can thereby push against the status quo especially where separation of powers and bicameralism have multiplied the number of veto players at the federal level of governance and slowed federal response to change. A slow federal government can now be moved to action by constituent state policies that irritate the federal system by altering the status quo. Even in such matters as foreign affairs, where the number of veto players at the national level is reduced by virtue of executive branch dominance, component states can push for change that would not otherwise occur. Component states can prod the center into action by engaging foreign governments and global corporations to bring pressure to bear on the central government to change, reconsider, or reaffirm through more deliberate action existing policies.\textsuperscript{166}

Under multiple rule federalism, the multiplicity of actors at federal and component state levels does not create additional ‘veto’ points but instead adds more policy drivers. To be sure, at times component units thereby may impose what others will perceive to be negative externalities on other jurisdictions or actors within the system. For example, it is especially important in multiple rule settings to maintain fiscal responsibility for the actions that each level chooses to pursue. If the component level can take on financial obligations in the hopes of a central government bailout, for example, multiple rule can turn into a fiscal disaster.\textsuperscript{167} But where bailout is not an option or component government officials are held partially accountable to the national electorate, multiple rule federalism becomes a viable option.\textsuperscript{168}

Externalities created by multiple rule federalism can often be in the nature of a Socratic gadfly or beneficial irritant. Given sufficient mobilization and legal authority at the center, the center can always react by preempting, adopting, or even tolerating the individual state action. The multiplication of arenas for democratic decision-making and policy activity in such multiple rule federalism thus serves to create ‘political disequilibria’ that unsettle the status quo—especially one based on inaction.\textsuperscript{169} Indeed, we can turn Shepsle’s term on its head to suggest that multiple rule’s political disequilibria are \textit{structural disequilibria} because that the local median voter is unlikely to match up perfectly with the median voter of the system as a whole. To be sure, there are limits to this effect in that component units will still face the familiar fear of leading a charge in favor of redistribution or other costly investments in public goods.\textsuperscript{170} (p. 602) More generally, however, these political disequilibria can yield productive conflicts by forcing constructive engagement among the multiple authorities throughout the system.

\section*{2. Polity Stability}

The greatest promise and challenge of federalism is to sustain the compound polity. This means preventing centripetal forces from collapsing the federal polity into a unitary entity, on the one hand, and centrifugal forces from exploding the polity into its separate parts, on the other. The first of these is the (sometimes bland) worry that federal systems will centralize authority over time. The second is the (often more acute) worry that federalism will exacerbate political cleavages that motivate secession, strife, and civil war. Incentive-compatible federalism seeks, of course, to address both.\textsuperscript{171} Nonetheless, a separate debate has developed with respect to the management of divided societies, to which we shall turn briefly here.

\subsection*{(a) Fate Follows Formation?}

Some scholars seek to derive lessons for the longevity of the Union from the history surrounding its formation. Leslie Goldstein, for instance, has suggested that federations ‘formed in the crucible of revolt against imperial power will be more likely to have state resistance to central power’.\textsuperscript{172} Such unions may be less stable than federations formed under other circumstances, as a comparison between the Dutch, American, Swiss, and European federations would seem to indicate. Friedman similarly suggests that unions ‘precipitated by a war among its member states will be less likely to undergo overt member-state rejection of its authority’.\textsuperscript{173} These explanations seem to draw on the political and cultural dispositions of actors whose self-understanding has been indelibly marked by the history of formation.\textsuperscript{174}

A different kind of argument based on federal formation would be that a stable federation demands the continued presence of the original cause for union. For instance, federations formed to gain economies of scale in matters of military security may become unstable as the outside military threat (or opportunity) evaporates.\textsuperscript{175} Riker, for example, maintained that the ejection of Singapore from the Federation of Malaysia was occasioned by the perception that Indonesia was no longer as threatening as it had once appeared. Although Riker's specific argument regarding Malaysia has been discredited, recent European experience may provide some support for a version of the more general suggestion. As calls for secession in Flanders, Walloon, Scotland, and the Basque region may indicate, separatist movements are likely to draw strength from the fact that the state from which they wish to secede is embedded in a larger union that would, in any event, provide security to everyone involved.
Federalism: Theory, Policy, Law

Arguments based on the continued presence of the causes for federation can seize upon other suggested causes of federation as well. In this vein, scholars have argued that where elite ideological commitment to federalism drove formation of the union, the loss of that commitment will imperil the longevity of the federation over time. One could add to this other, more speculative theories. For example, if Ziblatt is right that the choice between federal and unitary state depends on the supply side of constituent states' governance capacity, then the erosion of that capacity or the increased direct governance capacity of the center (as, say, in the United States) would allow for a renewed push for centralization.

What's good for formation is good for dissolution—or so it seems. These theories look for the causes of endurance in the causes for federation. They posit a rather direct relationship between the purpose of federation and the endurance of a union. First-order reasons for federalism are translated into long-term cultural dispositions of all the actors of the system. Or first-order reasons for federalism drive the formation as well as the endurance of the union as actors continually re-evaluate whether those first-order reasons still apply. Either way, these views see federation as an outcome that actors independently choose based on their bird's eye perspective or historical experience of whether the values of federalism are (still) being served.

(b) Back to Politics

Incentive compatible federalism presumes, by contrast, that politicians are likely to act based on more immediate gain than on whether the values of federalism are ultimately served by their actions. For these theorists, the prescription to prevent secession and strife follows from the prescription for other areas: fuse the interests of individual actors with the interests of the polity as a whole. This means the maintenance of an integrated party system here, as well.

An integrated federal party system, however, does not spell consociationalism. The common argument against federalism is that territorially divided rule exacerbates regional separatism by giving institutional structure and governance capacity to destabilizing regional identities. Scholars such as Lijphart present consociationalism as the cure. Others dismiss consociationalism as an independently workable solution. Pointing to the Netherlands, Israel, and Lebanon, for instance, Daniel Elazar has argued that consociationalism in the absence of territorialization, that is, without some form of federalism, is inherently unstable. Some go one step further and reject the usefulness of consociationalism even as an element of federalism. Based on the experience of Nigeria, Canada, and Malaysia, Donald Horowitz has argued that federalism lowers political stakes by diffusing decisions into multiple arenas, creates coalitions across ethnic divides within constituent states, and socializes citizens and politicians at the local level into conducting productive politics system-wide. An important element in the latter calculus is that subnational federal units remain heterogeneous even if they allow for a particular group to gain a majority in any given component state, and that an ethnic minority not be aggregated in a single state.

An integrated party system may indeed help the federalism side of this debate. Dawn Brancati, for instance, has provided empirical support for the value to stability in divided societies of maintaining parties that operate beyond a single region. As Sujit Choudhry points out, however, there are still many unanswered questions, from whether societies divided by language differ from those divided by religion to whether the management of natural resources located in a given region should occasion special rules.

VII. Federalism All the Way?

How far can the model of federalism take us? The question has implications for liberal theory, public policy, and political practice writ large. Scholars have explored whether federalism can inform dispersing power further down within the constituent state or up into the realm of global governance. Although parts of this terrain are well trodden, it is a vast terrain that is still largely underexplored. Some quick thoughts will have to suffice here.

1. Federalism All the Way Down?

Federalism traditionally has focused on only two levels of government. And yet, some scholars have argued for recognizing the possibility of extending federalism further down into the state. From a normative perspective, this is consistent with a vision of liberal democratic federalism that sees ‘the preservation of diverse, semi-autonomous forums’ as allowing ‘a citizen to become a member of several “issue publics”, each responding to different aspects of a citizens interests or identities and each providing a manageable arena for individual political engagement.’

