There are three aspects to this potential extension of federalism, some obvious and others speculative. First, constitutional protections can be taken down to cities and regions, as they are, for example, in Brazil and India. In light of Tiebout's famous sorting hypothesis, running federalism down to cities is, of course, nothing fancy, but simply following first principles of basic theory. And yet, questions remain, such as whether all but the largest cities can engender sufficient loyalty to create effective political communities or whether they have sufficient capacity for governance to warrant hard constitutional autonomy guarantees. Municipal autonomy may also backfire as it can weaken the component states and enable the center to gain more power than it otherwise could.

Secondly, we might recognize school districts, water districts, and other functionally defined jurisdictions as elements of federalism. Heather Gerken would add such institutions as the jury as a domain for the exercise of circumscribed public power. Here, too, normative federal theory fits these other forms of power dispersion quite naturally. And yet, the political phenomenon of functional federalism differs sufficiently from territorially based federalism to warrant some caution before drawing on more specific lessons gained from territorial federalism. For instance, territorial federalism draws its practical force from conducting a reasonably broad range of politics within any given jurisdiction. Single-issue districts, however, prevent the cross-issue tradeoffs and bargains that are essential to productive politics and peace throughout a (traditionally conceived) federal system.

Thirdly, following federalism all the way down suggests understanding many forms of private governance and perhaps even the autonomy rights of individuals as continuous with federal principles and federal design. As a matter of constitutional practice, protected spheres of private governance may come in disguise. Some free speech doctrines, for example, show evidence of constitutionally protected self-governance rights of social institutions. Political parties may be constitutionally protected, sometimes explicitly so. The family, too, is a constitutionally protected institution of collective self-governance. And even though traditional democratic theory tends to reject placing the individual on a continuum from small to large spheres of governance, it is not entirely implausible to understand individual rights as constitutionally protected spheres of governance as well—especially where an individual makes decisions that affect others.

To be sure, the normative structure of federalism may quickly seem both empty and all-encompassing on this account. But that may not be the result of any mistake in applying federalism theory all the way down. It may, instead, reveal that federalism theory is just as thin and demands just as many off-stage substantive decisions when applied to the traditional realm of territorial federalism. Taking federalism all the way down to private governance, then, is quite possible. Its usefulness as an organizing concept just depends on what we seek to gain.

2. Federalism All the Way Up?

At least since Immanuel Kant's essay ‘On Perpetual Peace’, liberal theory has toyed with the idea of world federation. More recently, an increase in the density and impact of global governance regimes has pushed the more general question to the fore: can federalism play a useful role in how we should understand the relationship between global and domestic levels of governance?

Modern constitutional enthusiasts from Hans Kelsen to David Held have argued for global, hierarchically organized, multilevel rule. These scholars and their fellow global travelers have tapped into certain conceptual and functional continuities between constitutional orders within and beyond the state. One way or another, such cosmopolitan constitutionalists draw on functional and normative theories to suggest that the global level of governance is but another central authority to which the state—even the federal state—is now local.
Then there are the skeptics. In particular, a new group of sovereigntists insists on grounding all claims of legality in the constitutions of independent states. This group of scholars denies any real claim of authority to international law. International law is presented as what emerges when states act based on self-interest. On this view, as Posner and Goldsmith put it, international law is ‘endogenous to state interests’. International law may purport to prescribe particular conduct for a given state. But a state need not and will not follow that prescription unless it matches the state’s independent rational calculus of self-interest. This is not offered as a general theory of law according to which no law has normative pull beyond that which matches self-interest or an independent moral evaluation. Instead, it is offered as a distinction between a state’s domestic legal system, which has normative pull, and the realm of international law, which does not.

A third way to mine the continuities between federalism and global governance is to re-imagine the role of constitutional law both within and beyond the (federal) state. This approach rejects the view that constitutional law is synonymous with a hierarchically ordered legal system. Instead, it recognizes that constitutional law can lead to a multiplicity of claims of authority without a single, final, legal authority, or to what Neil MacCormick first dubbed the idea of ‘constitutional pluralism’.

The pluralist approach opens up new vistas. As various writers forging this tradition have shown, we can learn a good deal about global governance and perhaps even understand domestic constitutionalism better when considering that constitutionalism does not spell universal hierarchy and settlement. To be sure, there are grand discontinuities between federalism and global governance. Even if we agree that some form of international community exists, it stretches the imagination to think of the global community as a compound polity. And yet, for federalism, the idea of pluralism and the unsettled nature of legal authority among different levels of government is a coming home of sorts. After all, the Federalists created a new hybrid that mixed international and domestic forms of governance. And they created a hybrid that sought to complicate the question of final authority beyond what was conceived of as possible at the time.

VIII. Conclusion

‘The twentieth Century’, Proudhon predicted, ‘will open the age of federations, or else humanity will undergo another purgatory of a thousand years.’ How the destruction wrought in the twentieth century compares to purgatory is anyone’s guess, but the age of federations has certainly come. Federalism as a normative ideal has captured the imagination of political theory, and federalism as a concrete institutional arrangement has proven useful and reasonably enduring around the world. So much so that the world seems headed for more federalism and more federation, not less. This chapter has provided a framework for how we should approach this development as a matter of theory, policy, and law.

Having sorted through competing definitions of federalism, and placed the endeavor of conceptual classification of federations and their historical origins into critical perspective, this chapter turned to articulating a succinct general normative theory of federalism. By elaborating on the idea of subsidiarity, termed here the ‘federal power principle’, the chapter teased out the various arguments in favor of local and central rule. Arguing in favor of the local under minimal conditions of diversity, we find familiar claims of greater democratic voice, solidarity, expertise, and risk management. Arguments in favor of central power can be usefully grouped into the three categories of cost savings, inter-jurisdictional difficulties, and intra-jurisdictional difficulties.

The succinct general theory allows us to see that there are two fundamentally distinct aspects of the federal power principle—the first regarding instrumental claims to rule and the second regarding intrinsic claims to rule. This, in turn, allows us better to understand political and judicial practice. It shows, for example, that in some jurisdictions, such as the United States, courts argue over subsidiarity without quite knowing it. And it shows that others—indeed most—fail to distinguish adequately between instrumental and intrinsic arguments. We may indeed need distinct procedures and forms of review to evaluate the various claims depending on which value of federalism we are intending to protect or which kind of claim a given actor intends to advance.

In practice, federalism has always been far more messy and dangerous than normative theory would suggest. At the same time, however, there seem to be basic answers within federalism to the two principal worries: policy stability and polity stability. Regarding the first, we have seen that federalism need not contain a pervasive structural bias in favor of the status quo. In contrast to ‘joint rule’ or ‘separate rule’ federalism, ‘multiple rule’
Federalism: Theory, Policy, Law

Federalism may even lead to structure induced ‘political disequilibria’ that can be useful in unsettling an ill-considered or under-considered status quo. Regarding polity stability, the literature seems to suggest that an integrated party system can help to mitigate the centrifugal forces of accommodation so as to allow federalism to reap the best of both worlds of the proverbial unity and diversity of a federation.

The chapter concludes by suggesting that federalism might well go all the way from private to global governance, depending on the purpose for which we employ the model. Comparative studies of political incentives across a more strictly defined set of ‘federations’ may well yield certain insights that cannot be translated sensibly to a broader context. And yet, many structural principles of federalism seem to apply to a pluralist conception of multilevel governance from the global level all the way down. The anticipated discomfort that such a move may engender would not be new. After all, federalism shattered preconceived notions of hierarchy and settlement from the very start.

Bibliography

Jenna Bednar, The Robust Federation (2009)
Michael Burgess, Comparative Federalism: Theory and Practice (2006)
Daniel Elazar, Exploring Federalism (1987)
Jürgen Habermas, ‘Does the Constitutionalization of International Law Still Have a Chance’ in The Divided West (2006)
Wallace E. Oates, Fiscal Federalism (1972)
Alfred Stepan, Arguing Comparative Politics (2001), 315
Notes:

(*) Thanks to Jenna Bednar, Roderick Hills, Donald Regan, and George Tsebelis for comments and discussions.

(1) For a brief overview of French decentralization, see Martine Lombard and Gilles Dumont, Droit Administratif (6th edn, 2005), 89–91.

(9) For a list of members, see http://www.wto.org/english/thewto_e/whatis_e/tif_e/org6_e.htm.

(18) Madison (n 15), 254–5.

(19) Ibid.

(20) Ibid 255.

(22) Ibid 2.

(27) Elazar (n 5), 12, 33–79.

(28) For various theoretical expositions along these lines, see eg Bednar (n 6); Fritz W. Scharpf, Games Real Actors Play (1997); George Tsebelis, Veto Players: How Political Institutions Work (2002).

(29) Riker (n 4), 11.

(33) Ivo Duchacek, Comparative Federalism: The Territorial Dimension of Politics (1970).

(36) See Section VII below.

(37) Livingston (n 24), 2–3.

(38) Preston T. King, Federalism and Federation (1982).

(41) King (n 38), 20–1.

(42) Watts (n 39), 6–7.

(44) For a discussion of some conceptual difficulties, see eg Schütze (n 31).

(45) See eg Paul Laband, Das Staatsrecht des Deutschen Reiches (1911), 58.

(47) Filippov et al (n 30), 9.

(48) Bednar (n 6), 19.

(49) Harold Richard Goring Greaves, Federal Union in Practice (1940), 10.

(50) See Olivier Beaud, Théorie de la Fédération (2007), 83 n 3.

Lenaerts made nearly a decade earlier in the American Journal of Comparative Law.

(52) Stepan suggested a third category of somewhat lesser significance, that of ‘putting together’ federalism, where federalism is imposed on a group of states by an outside hegemon. The significance of this category in suggesting consequences for politics within the union should not be overlooked, even though it seems to figure in Stepan’s taxonomy as somewhat of an afterthought.

(53) Riker (n 4), 12–13.

(54) Ibid 19.

(55) See eg Davis (n 14), 132 (‘a mere truism’); King (n 38), 34 (‘trivial’); Burgess (n 40), 97 (‘at best exaggerated and at worst erroneous’).

(57) See Michael Burgess, ‘Federalism as Political Ideology’ in Michael Burgess and Alain-G. Gagnon (eds), Comparative Federalism and Federation (1993), 102.

(58) See eg Livingston (n 24), 2; Maiken Umbach, Federalism and Enlightenment in Germany, 1740–1806 (2000).

(59) Burgess (n 40), 101.

(60) Ibid 97.

(61) Ibid 81.

(63) Ibid 144.

(64) Ibid 142.

(66) Eg ibid 15.

(67) Ibid 46.

(69) Although some scholars of federalism will include non-democratic federations within the scope of their study, eg Bednar (n 6), whereas others limit the scope of study to democratic federations, eg Filippov et al (n 30), 9. Elazar has suggested that all (true) federations are democracies. Elazar (n 5), 108–9. And although some insist that there is no necessary connection between federalism and democracy, it seems that most studies gain most of their insights from the study of democratic federations. So, too, here, the theory of federalism will derive largely from a background assumption of democratic federalism despite the fact that some arguments and insights may find application in non-democratic federalism as well.

(71) Max Farrand (ed), The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787 (1911), 20–1. The principle of subsidiarity, as articulated in the Catechism of the Catholic Church, provides:
a community of higher order should not interfere in the internal life of a community of a lower order, depriving the latter of its functions, but rather should support it in case of need and help to co-ordinate its activity with the activities of the rest of society, always with a view to the common good.

Catechism of the Catholic Church, para 1883.

(72) Unless specifically stated otherwise, central and local are used throughout this chapter as generic opposites without referring to any particular level or institution of government.

(73) Of course, all else usually isn’t, but this will be unpacked in Section III.2 below.

(77) Cf eg Michael J. Sandel, Democracy’s Discontent (1996), 347. Most of these arguments, too, can already be found in Rousseau’s Social Contract.

(84) See eg Bednar (n 6), 29.

(91) New Ice Co v Leibman 285 US 262, 311 (Brandeis J dissenting).

(92) See eg Heather Gerken, ‘Dissenting by Deciding’ (2002) 57 Stanford Law Review 1745; Daniel Halberstam, (93) See also Section V.1 below.

(94) This argument is based on the broader Optimal Currency Area theory, attributed to Robert Mundell. See eg Ronald McKinnon, ‘Mundell, the Euro, and Optimum Currency Areas’ in Thomas J. Courchene (ed), Money, Markets, and Mobility (2002).

(100) Tiebout (n 75).

(101) Steward Machine Company v Davis 301 US 548 (1937). Most policies, however, have (re)distributive effects, which makes the category of redistributive policies that should be shifted to the central level of government difficult to assess in the abstract.

(103) See eg John D. Donahue, Disunited States (1997).

(106) Bednar (n 6), 37.

(107) Fritz Scharpf, Governing in Europe: Effective and Democratic? (1999), 84–120.

(109) Ibid 62.

(110) Ibid.

(111) Ibid.

(112) Riker (n 4), 155.

(114) Gibson, ‘Boundary Control’ (n 113), 102.

(120) Treaty on European Union, Art 5.

(122) Constitution Act, 1982, s 91.

(123) Ibid s 92(16).

(125) 301 US at 588.

(126) 312 US 100, 115 (1941).

(129) See generally Halberstam (n 32).

(132) Ibid.

(133) Bednar (n 6), 9.

(134) Ibid.

(135) See eg ibid 215–17.

(137) Riker (n 4), 91–101. On political parties see further Chapter 41.

(141) For an argument that subunit politicians have an insufficient incentive to take on the costs of a risky policy experiment, see Susan Rose-Ackerman, ‘Risk Taking and Re-Election: Does Federalism Promote Innovation?’ (1980) 9 Journal of Legal Studies 593. But see eg Roderick M. Hills, Jr, ‘Federalism and Public Choice’ in Daniel Farber and Anne Joseph O’Connell (eds), Research Handbook on Public Choice and Public Law (2010), 207, 222.

(142) Filippov et al (n 30), 40. See also eg ibid 169–76.

(143) See eg ibid 254.

(145) In 1999, Venezuela adopted a new constitution that abolished the Senate and instituted a unicameral legislature. See Penfold-Becerra (n 87), 217–19.

(148) See Peterson (n 102), 1995.

(149) Madison (n 108), 65.

(152) Stepan (n 147), 339. See also ibid 351.

(154) See generally Tsebelis (n 28).

(156) See Madison (n 108); Weingast (n 105).

(157) Scharpf (n 107); Stepan (n 147).

(159) Recall that Carl Schmitt complained about Weimar parliamentarism as a constraint on the German demos, which he took to exist apart from the institutions of democratic governance. See eg Carl Schmitt, Verfassungslehre (1928), 235; Carl Schmitt, Die Geistesgeschichtliche Lage des Heutigen Parlamentarismus (5th edn, 1979).

(160) See eg Treisman (n 158), 206.

(162) Although there is considerable overlap between the labels introduced in the text and the more traditional ‘competitive’, ‘cooperative’, and ‘dual’ federalism, the more traditional labels are often used without analytic precision. For example, it is often unclear whether ‘cooperative’ federalism (or the frequently invoked ‘shared’ rule) involves ‘joint’ or ‘multiple’ rule as used here. Also, the traditional labels characterize the general effect or character of federalism as opposed to the specific underlying governance mechanism, which is important for our present discussion.

(163) See generally Halberstam (n 119), 213.

(166) See eg Halberstam (n 92).

(167) See eg Rodden (n 140).

(168) Ibid 270–5.

(169) Halberstam (n 86), 824.

(170) See Peterson (n 102); Shapiro (n 150), 109–10.

(171) See Section IV above.

(173) Ibid.

(174) A similar culturally based suggestion is that unions ‘where obedience to the rule of law is more routinized in general will experience less resistance by member state officials to the rule of federation-level authorities.’ Ibid.

(175) See Jonathan Lemco, Political Stability in Federal Governments (1991), 144.

(176) Riker (n 13), 30–1.

(177) See Burgess (n 40), 93.

(179) This is not Ziblatt's idea. It is a variant of an argument made by Justice Stevens in dissent in Printz v United States 521 US 898, 959 (Stevens J dissenting).

(180) Consociationalism brings together rival subgroups by including them in governing coalitions, granting the various groups mutual vetoes, ensuring proportional representation in elections, cabinets, civil service positions, and granting self-governance authority to segmented groups over such matters as education and culture. See Arend Lijphart, 'Consociation and Federation' (1979) 12 Canadian Journal of Political Science 499, 500.

(183) Elazar (n 5), 23–4.

(185) Ibid 214–27. See also Treisman (n 158), 240–2.

(186) Henry Hale confirms the importance of dispersing a dominant ethnic group as a way of taming secessionist tendencies. See Henry Hale, ‘Divided We Stand: Institutional Sources of Ethnofederal State Survival and Collapse’ (2004) 56 World Politics 165. Even where the polity is not in immediate threat of breaking up, much is to be gained from drawing competitive election districts in the context of racially or ethnically polarized voting, see Ellen D. Katz, ‘Reviving the Right to Vote’ (2007) 68 Ohio State Law Journal 1163.

(189) Halberstam (n 86), 823–4 (internal footnotes omitted).

(190) See Brazil Constitution, Arts 18 and 30.

(191) See India Constitution, Art 243B.

(194) See Halberstam (n 86), 824.

(196) Many, of course, will not take federalism this far down See eg Gerken (n 195); Richard Schragger, ‘Federalism All The Way Down’, September 23, 2009, at (http://www.constitution2020.org/node/87).

(200) See eg Dahl (n 118), 205.

(201) Immanuel Kant, ‘Perpetual Peace: A Philosophical Sketch’ in Hans S. Reiss (ed), Kant: Political Writings (2nd edn, 1991), 93.

(207) See eg Daniel Halberstam, ‘Local, Global, and Plural Constitutionalism’ in de Búrca and Weiler (n 11); Mattias Kumm, ‘Democratic Constitutionalism Encounters International Law: Terms of Engagement’ in Sujit Choudhry (ed),...

Daniel Halberstam
Daniel Halberstam is Eric Stein Collegiate Professor of Law, University of Michigan Law School
I. Different Meanings of the Word ‘State’ 609

II. The Unitary State and the Nation 610
   1. Civic and Ethnic Conceptions 610
   2. National Minorities and their Territorial Relevance 611

III. The Organization of the State’s Territory 613
   1. Centralist Tendencies and the Prefects 613
   3. Regions with Legislative Powers in the Unitary States and other Regional Solutions 617

IV. The Organization of the Central Executive Branches of the State: The Role of the Parliament 621

V. The Droit Administratif and the Advent of the Sozialer Rechtstaat 623

VI. The Hierarchical Structure of the Executive: Civil Servants 625

I. Different Meanings of the Word ‘State’

The word ‘state’ (as well as similar words in other languages: the German ‘Staat’, the French ‘État’, the Italian ‘Stato’, etc.) has many meanings even in the legal language, which is generally technically accurate and unambiguous. As such, it allows for frequent misunderstandings. An important distinction of meaning deserves underlining in view of the focus of this chapter. On the one hand, the word ‘state’ is frequently used to refer to the free and independent association of a people in a territory under an organized and stable authority. On the other hand, however, the word ‘state’ can often be reserved to the central branches of that authority. In this latter case, the state is but one of the institutions which exercises public functions within the territory in question, coexisting with other organized entities which have their own designated responsibility for certain territorial or subject-limited areas. These other entities can be independent of the central state, and their governing bodies may either be directly elected by the people living in the territory concerned (or affected by the subject in question), or they may be branches of the central authorities which directly appoint their leadership and control their activity.

The distinction is evident in many European constitutions. According to Article 20 of the German Constitution, the Federal Republic of Germany is defined as ‘a democratic and social federal state’, and ‘all state authority is derived from the people’. In this case, the state includes both the central organization of the power and the Länder, the member entities of the federal Republic. On the other hand, however, in Article 7, state and Länder are clearly distinguished: ‘the entire school system shall be under the supervision of the state ... private schools that serve as alternatives to state schools shall require the approval of the State and shall be subject to the laws of the Länder.’ To take another example, Article 1 of the Belgian Constitution states that ‘Belgium is a Federal State constituted of Communities and Regions’, but Article 170 clearly separates ‘taxes to the benefit of the State’ and ‘taxes to the benefit of Communities or Regions’.

This linguistic inconsistency is also present in the constitutions of states which are not organized along federal lines. On the basis of Article 1 of the Romanian Constitution, the Romanian state ‘is a sovereign, unitary and indivisible National State’. This provision clearly refers to the overall organization of the Romanian people within its territory, but then Article 137 makes separate mention of ‘the State budget ... and the local budgets of communes, towns and counties’. This also occurs in the Irish Constitution, which refers to Ireland as a ‘sovereign, independent, democratic state’ in Article 1, but can be contrasted with Article 28, s 4.2, which does not refer to the overall Irish state when, in regarding the organization of the government, it provides that ‘the Government shall be collectively responsible for the Departments of State administered by the members of the Government.’ In Italy as well, the Constitution provides that the Constitutional Court shall pass judgment on conflicts arising ‘from allocation of powers of the State and those allocated to State and regions’ (Art 134), but state and regions, as well as municipalities, provinces, and metropolitan areas, are part of the Republic, and as such part of the overall legal order of the state (Art 114).

II. The Unitary State and the Nation

1. Civic and Ethnic Conceptions

As the Romanian Constitution demonstrates, the concept of the national unitary state uses the word ‘state’ according to the first meaning mentioned above: it refers to the association of a people under an organized authority within a territory which is supposed to be indivisible. Romania is not the only example of this model of state; indeed it has been adopted by many other European states. The cradle of the unitary state was France, whose history largely coincides with the history of the origins of the state itself. Alexis de Tocqueville contested the idea that the centralization of the power in France was the result of the Revolution alone, demonstrating that the work of the Revolution was anticipated by the centralization of power which had occurred within the monarchical central administration's assumption of control over the functioning of the fragmented feudal authorities which were spread in large numbers over the territory of France.1

(p. 611) On the basis of this construction, the existence of a unitary state as one indivisible territory implied the creation of a central body to which the main public functions were entrusted: it was the establishment of an organization which we can call a ‘state’ in the second of the meanings previously mentioned. After the French Revolution, the source of all sovereignty was no longer the ruling dynasty but the nation: the people's will and the equality of human beings before the law was substituted for the God-given origins of monarchical legitimacy and of the social hierarchy.

During the nineteenth century, this development was voiced in two different ideologies affecting the terms themselves of the coexistence of a people within the frame of the state and the criteria to be used to identify the nation. On one hand, the nation was considered the association of the persons who shared the civic and constitutional values of a state (ie, the citizens of the state), and, on the other hand, the identification was based on the common ethnic and linguistic heritage of a people, if not the natural bonds of blood and territory which connected the interested persons. The first conception implies an open idea of the state, that is a commitment to common civic and constitutional values by persons who want to be included as citizens in the state's people. According to the second conception, the unitary state is the realization of the self-government of people identified by pre-existing cultural or natural bonds. To this kind of state is especially reserved the qualification of national state since European nations, identified on the basis of their ethnic and linguistic characteristics, gained their independence from the great, multinational Empires (the Austrian–Hungarian monarchy, the Russian and the Turkish Empires). The idea became increasingly attractive in Italy, Germany, and the Balkans in the second part of the nineteenth century, and the nation-state became the norm in all Europe after the First World War and had a new epiphany when the old member states of the Warsaw Pact and the Yugoslav Federal Republic substituted the nationalistic ideology for the old, communist one in shaping their new identity and adopting the new constitutions.

For instance, the preamble of the Croatian Constitution connects ‘the inalienable and indivisible, non-transferable and non-exhaustible right of the Croatian nation to self-determination and state sovereignty’ to ‘the millenary identity of the Croatian nation’, and Article 4 of the Polish Constitution states that ‘the supreme power in the Republic of Poland shall be vested in the Nation’, whose ‘identity, continuity and development’ have their source in the ‘cultural goods’ to which the Republic shall provide conditions for equal access to all the people (Art 5).

2. National Minorities and their Territorial Relevance

The coincidence of the ethnic and linguistic identity of a state and the parallel characteristics of its people has never been complete. Therefore, with the advent of national states, the problem of protection of national minorities arose. The geographic boundaries of the new states necessarily also included autochthonous people who did not share the ethnos and the language of the nation which was in the majority in the state where they resided: they often identified themselves with the nation represented by another state (so-called kin-state). If the concession of citizenship was allowed on an ethnic and linguistic basis, the principles of the national state deprived these autochthonous people of the possibility of becoming citizens of their state of residence, or, if they obtained citizenship, they were discriminated against in the enjoyment of their rights and freedoms and failed to have their historical and cultural identity recognized and safeguarded. The problem of the protection of national minorities (p. 612) has gained—during the twentieth century—an international dimension and it was unsuccessfully dealt with on a state-by-state basis by the peace treaties entered into after the First World War. The international institutions created after the Second World War (the United Nations, the Council of Europe, the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe) first tried to solve the problem through the recognition of universal human rights and fundamental freedoms, and—later—adopted general international instruments to provide the required protection, even if in some cases the solution to the problem was directly agreed by bilateral treaties between the state of residence of the minority concerned and the relevant kin-state.

However, international rules for the protection of national minorities, when implemented within the frame of the internal legal orders of the state, avoid discrimination of the state’s citizens on an ethnic and linguistic basis, but do not eliminate the relevance of their difference from the members of the nation which is identified in the state itself. The Hungarian Constitution is an interesting exception as far as its Article XXIX states that the minorities living in the Republic of Hungary ‘participate in the sovereign power of the people: they represent a constituent part of the State’. Minorities are a territorial presence with historical roots, and, as a consequence of their request for recognition of the right to self-determination, some states have agreed to allow self-government of ordinary institutions in the territorial areas in which the interested minorities live. This is the case of the Swedish-speaking community in the Åland Islands (Finland), of the Russian-speaking populace in Crimea (Ukraine), and the German-and, respectively, French-speaking people in the Regione Trentino-Alto Adige/Südtirol and in the Regione Valle d’Aosta/Vallée d’Aoste (Italy), where special territorial autonomies have been established in view of ensuring the extension of the protection of the rights of the linguistic and ethnic minorities to participate in the exercise of public functions. The same result is obtained in Spain through the institutions of the Autonomous Communities, for instance in Catalonia and the Basque country in coherence with the statement in Article 2 of the Constitution which recognizes the right of nationalities and regions to achieve self-government. This solution implies the permanence of those minorities within the concerned states and avoids the danger of tentative secession moves by those communities under the auspices of exercising the right of self-determination, which international law is not yet ready to recognize.

Obviously, the territorial government which is created in this way interests not only the persons belonging to the minority but also all the people living in the area, even if they do not belong to the national minority whose protection is the main aim of autonomous self-government. Therefore, in Article 20 of the Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities, reference is made to national minorities which ‘are in a minority nationally but form a majority within one area of the State’, binding them to ‘respect the national legislation and the rights of others, in particular those of persons belonging to the majority or to other national minorities.’

The United Kingdom is an interesting case, where the policy of devolution has at the same time taken into consideration the historical, unitary sovereignty of the Parliament and self-government of domestic affairs in Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland by establishing different institutions with different modalities of devolution of the state's functions to those institutions.

(p. 613) III. The Organization of the State's Territory

1. Centralist Tendencies and the Prefects

The end of the previous paragraph touches upon aspects of internal organization of the state and its central authorities, which deserves to be dealt with taking into consideration the territorial dimension. Territory is an essential element of the state, and therefore one aspect of special interest in internal organization is the distribution of public functions across the territory, which can imply, on the one hand, the creation of bureaucratic structures at the centre and at the periphery of the state, or, on the other hand, the erection of autonomous territorial agencies according to the different historical traditions of the particular territories. France is again an interesting model from which we can proceed in dealing with the problems of centralization or decentralization of power within a state: the analysis will also cover the state as the central structure of power and the state as the organization of all the people living in that state's territory.

After the French Revolution, since the 1791 Constitution, the territory of the French state—which was proclaimed indivisible—was divided into 83 departments. Notwithstanding the tendency of the monarchy towards a growing centralization of decision-making, the feudal system involved the presence of many different agencies within the frame of the state's territory, which was heavily conditioned by the causal effects of the distribution of prerogatives by the king and the hereditary transfer of property, and which therefore did not completely ensure the unity of administration and implementation of the ideal of equality of all citizens. The purpose of the creation of the departments was a surgical reorganization of power at the local level to substitute a rational division of the national territory for the casual feudal arrangements with a view to ensuring uniformity of the state's territorial institutions and guaranteeing the equality of relations between the people and the ruling authorities across the state. Until recent times, the fundamental governing text was the Law of 10 August 1871, which revised the innovations introduced after the fall of the feudal monarchy. The departments have been only one of the elements in a system of territorial units, whose task has been the adoption of decisions involving the operation of functions which can be better exercised at a local level. More recent constitutional developments have again opened the discussion about the coexistence of departments and other more autonomous agencies of local government. This discussion, with which France has been occupied since a legislative Act in 1831, provided for the election of deliberative bodies for the communes, even though the mayors were appointed by the state's authorities until the reform of 1884. However, the idea that the municipalities are administrative (ie, not political) authorities has prevailed in France and that opinion is still largely accepted today according to the view of Pierre Rosanvallon.

In principle, the state's departmental organization was arranged according to the rule of centralization. In that regard, the decision-making power for all the territory of the state is held by the central administration which operates through territorial services, whose functions are the result of a déconcentration of central functions and constitute the competences of the state's local services. The hierarchical subordination of these services to central authorities was intended to guarantee the unity of the direction of public power. A heritage of this centralistic approach, which was connected to the existence of the departments, is the presence in the current French Constitution of a provision entrusting the representatives of the state in the territories to guarantee ‘the national interests, the administrative supervision and the observance of the law’. The conception of the executive as the guarantor of the unity of the state required the presence of state offices in all parts of the state, even in the institutions of local government. The mandate of those offices was both to preserve the state's interests and to supervise the activities of local government agencies with a view to ensuring an absence of conflict with those interests. While the constitutional history of the United Kingdom is characterized by the progressive expansion of the democratic autonomy of local government institutions with the disappearance of sheriffs and justices of the peace appointed by central government, in France the post-revolutionary choice of entrusting the newly created prefects with the task of representing the executive across the territory of the state has been a constant feature of the state's organization, notwithstanding evident and frequent frictions with the system of local government. Also, after the recent revision of the Constitution, its Article 72 provides for the for the advantage to the people living in that territory. Undoubtedly, the interests dealt with by the local collectivities to rule and manage important areas of public interest within the frame of the law. Therefore, the concept of local autonomy covers not only the legal and formal attribution of functions affecting local businesses but also the concrete and material (ie, financial) conditions of the exercise of those functions for the advantage to the people living in that territory. Undoubtedly, the interests dealt with by the local

It can easily be seen that the principle of unity and uniformity of the state's public administration has been competing with the principle of territorial self-government, which means the right of local collectivities for management of their interests in a free and autonomous way. In France, besides the departments, there are municipalities, regions, and collectivities with a particular statute. All of them are freely self-governing entities entrusted with their own functions and resources whose decision-making bodies are elected by the people of that territory. This modality of administration, which is an evident manifestation of the principles of democracy and freedom, is called decentralization (especially in countries with a tradition of centralization) and implies the creation of entities which are distinct from the central and local organization of the state and which have a separate legal personality. Presently, the local entities constitute an intermediate level of separate autonomous authority between the state and the citizens. Decentralization should give special emphasis to the local interests of the communities which are not supposed to coincide with the interests of the state and are not meant to be a mere territorial expression of them.

This model is very common in continental Europe, where it has found scientific elaboration since the nineteenth century. Especially in the German-speaking world, the recognition of local government entities was traditionally connected, on the one hand, to the theory of independence of territorial self-government elaborated by Gneist, taking into account the experience of the voluntary (ie, without salary) service of local administrators in the United Kingdom, and, on the other hand, the extension of the organic theory elaborated by Gierke to self-governing institutions, according to the principle that every organic community is able to create law and, therefore, to exercise powers of self-government.

The concept which inspires this model of organizing the exercise of administrative functions at the local level is local autonomy. Local autonomy is a flexible concept. It can be defined as the right and effective capacity of local collectivities to rule and manage important areas of public interest within the frame of the law. Therefore, the concept of local autonomy covers not only the legal and formal attribution of functions affecting local

Page 5 of 16
collectivities are connected with the national interests of the state and have clear public relevance. But they are primarily considered by the law as interests of the local collectivities and have to be promoted according to the choices and the will of the local electors.

Local autonomy does not require local collectivities’ qualification as legal persons. However, in terms of their judicial standing, there is a need for the free exercise of their competences through effective judicial remedy. This was a consideration in the jurisprudence in England during the 1980s, in cases dealing with central/local conflicts concerning finance.\textsuperscript{18}

Respect for local autonomy is not unconditionally constitutionalized but, in the twentieth century, it is frequently reflected in the presence of provisions concerning local government in the constitutions.\textsuperscript{19} The differentiation between local interests and the interests of the central authorities of the state has been seen as requiring a constitutional guarantee of the independent existence and functioning of the institutions of local government against overwhelming measures taken by the central bodies of the state aimed at curtailing their powers or depriving them of resources which are necessary to their efficiency. An interesting and advanced example of this tendency of the modern constitution is offered, inter alia, by Article 28 of the German Constitution. According to which municipalities must be guaranteed the right to regulate all local affairs on their own responsibility, within the limits prescribed by the law. ... The guarantee of self-government shall extend to the bases of financial autonomy; these bases shall include the right of municipalities to a source of tax revenues based upon economic ability and the right to establish the rates at which these sources shall be taxed.

In addition, Article 106 entrusts to the federal legislation the apportionment of tax revenues which are shared by different levels of government.

The competences of the local units are not explicitly listed in constitutions. They certainly deal with interests which are primarily considered by law as interests of the local collectivities and have to be promoted according to the choices of the local electors. However, on the basis of the principle of subsidiarity, municipalities are usually entrusted by the ordinary law with services affecting individual needs and interests of the persons belonging to the territorial communities (in the matters of health, primary education, social assistance, local transport, and so on).

In this context, the position of the United Kingdom is certainly uncharacteristic insofar as a constitutional guarantee of local government is missing. Therefore, for instance, the Parliament—even in situations of international engagements—could apparently abolish local government or deprive it of its main functions and of its resources. Historical developments point in the opposite direction, insofar as they evidence a progressive substitution of one local authority entrusted with all services in its area for the pre-existing ad hoc bodies for specific and sectional purposes. Certainly, the councils governing the local collectivities do not derive their legitimacy by Crown appointment, as happened historically with sheriffs and justices of the peace, but—since the introduction of the 1888 Local Government Act—from their election by the residents of the relevant local areas. For that reason, they cannot be seen as a territorial (p. 617) expression of a unitary national government. However, the absence of constitutional rules binding the national authorities does give these authorities some freedom of movement, as evidenced by the reforms adopted by Parliament at the end of the twentieth century. In principle, most of the local authorities are today single-tier authorities, but in some parts of rural England the two-tier model has been retained, notwithstanding the revisions of the 1972 Local Government Act.\textsuperscript{20}

With these exceptions, which also include the special solutions adopted for London, this choice of simplification differentiates the United Kingdom\textsuperscript{21} from other countries where the coexistence of different levels of local government is possible.\textsuperscript{22} Moreover, the UK reform introduced other novelties into the organization of local government agencies providing for the delegation of functions to committees of councillors and for the possibility of establishing executive bodies directly elected by the people or appointed by the councils. Eventually the rigidity of the ultra vires principle was relaxed, thereby allowing the local councils to manage a greater part of the local interests according to their own requirements.

3. Regions with Legislative Powers in the Unitary States and other Regional Solutions

The legal and political doctrine clearly differentiates unitary states from federal states,\textsuperscript{23} which are created by the union of pre-existing states and have a composite structure made up of the organizations of different state-like entities, which are historically and politically distinguished by their different processes of formation and consolidation of their constitutional identity. Notwithstanding the presence of interesting historical events and doctrinal opinions which support the idea of identification of federal states and regional states resulting from a process of devolution, the best solution is to avoid all too easy comparisons and adhere to the relevant provisions of the constitutions of the respective states. The establishment of a regional state is always the result of the restructuring of a unitary state in order to ensure the promotion and the management of specific territorial interests within its frame. It takes into consideration the exigencies of a decentralization of the power to reduce the impact of a previous centralized state organization (Italy), existing traditional territorial differences (Spain), or the promotion of an articulated system of economic and territorial planning (e.g., France, but with organizational solutions different from those adopted in other states).

The creation of an intermediate level of government between the central state and minor local governmental entities provided for by the constitutions both of Italy and Spain entailed the creation of the Regions and the Autonomous Communities, whose territorial borders were defined taking into account the traditional connections and the new economic and social needs of geographical areas larger than those of the municipalities. Therefore, they are entrusted with legislative and administrative competences in many fields transferred to them from the central, national level of the state. But both of their constitutions exclude the possibility of finding any similarity with the processes of formation of federal states and make a completely different choice: the Italian Constitution states that the Republic is ‘one and indivisible’, and therefore local autonomies are recognized and promoted by the state and are not a founder or a constituent part of the process of its formation. The Regions—whose creation is provided for by Title 5 of the Second Part of the Constitution—are autonomous entities comparable to municipalities and provinces, although their competences do not depend on the ordinary law because they are explicitly listed in the Constitution, which affords them a specific guarantee enforceable before the Italian Constitutional Court. On the other hand, in Spain, according to Article 2 of the Constitution, ‘the Constitution is based on the indissoluble unity of the Spanish Nation, the common and indivisible country of all the Spaniards.’ But even if this statement did allow a federal solution (insofar as the second part of the same article declares that nationalities and regions are component parts of the Spanish nation), only the right of autonomy is recognized and guaranteed to them: therefore the constitutional position of specific nationalities and regions does not have a separate and independent legitimacy but is derived from the basic decision made by the Spanish Constitution. Obviously, it could be said that constitutional texts do not offer a conclusive basis for the elaboration of scientific doctrines. We have to look at the concrete functioning of both the constitutional systems and the relations of the Autonomous Communities and of the Regions, with the central bodies of the national state. In fact, taken from this point of view, elements supporting a similarity with federal states are extremely sparse.

For instance, both the Spanish Autonomous Communities and the Italian Regions have legislative powers with regard to minor matters. Those matters are given to them by way of exclusive competence; in addition, they have legislative powers subordinate to principles, bases, and guidelines established by state legislation. But, at least in Italy, they cannot legislate in matters covered by the key civil and criminal codes or by the civil, criminal, and administrative judicial procedure legislation and, according to the Italian Constitutional Court, the principle of subsidiarity can justify the substitution of the national legislator for the regional one in matters of national interest. Moreover, neither the Spanish Autonomous Communities nor the Italian Regions have constituent powers because the Statutes of the Autonomous Communities (i.e., their ‘constitutional charters’) have to be adopted by the central Parliament, and those of the Italian Regions, even if they are approved by the regional councils without the intervention of the Chamber of Deputies or the Senate of the Republic, have to be ‘in compliance with the Italian Constitution’, which determines their main bodies and entrusts to state legislation the laying down of the fundamental principles of the system of election for their executive and legislative assembly. In both of the Constitutions, a provision similar to Article 79 of the German Constitution (stating the inadmissibility of amendments to the Basic Law affecting the division of the federation into Länder) is missing. Even if recognition and the guarantee of the right to autonomy is one of the fundamental principles in the Preliminary Title of the Constitutions of Spain and Italy, together with other basic principles, it is evident that in both states the national legislative power has greater flexibility and discretion in revising the Constitution in matters of organization of the autonomies than has the German legislator. Neither the Italian nor the Spanish Constitution requires the direct participation of the regional entities in the process of adoption of constitutional amendments. Taking into account these differences, the majority of legal doctrine distinguishes Spain and Italy from the federal states and classes them together (even if the Spanish communities have more power than—at least—the ordinary Italian Regions) in the above-mentioned special category of regional states.

In Italy, special constitutional laws were approved by the national parliament to adopt the statutes of five special Regions which have a differentiated autonomy—Sardinia, Sicily, Friuli Venezia Giulia, Trentino Alto Adige/Südtirol, and Valle d’Aosta/Vallee d’Aoste—in view of the economic and social aspects of the ethnic and linguistic peculiarities of those territories. These entities have greater legislative and administrative powers than the powers of the ordinary Regions. Therefore, they have the chance of managing matters which directly affect their social and economic development and of providing for the promotion and management of the specific identity of their ethnic and linguistic minorities. Italy can be defined as an asymmetric regional state. However, the Italian Constitutional Court decided that the unity of the state requires that even these constitutional laws have to comply with the fundamental principles of the Constitution, leaving to its own jurisprudence the identification of those principles on a case-by-case basis.

According to the Spanish Constitutional Court, ‘autonomy makes reference to a limited power … autonomy is not sovereignty … in no case can the principle of autonomy be opposed to that of unity’, and recently the same judge stated that ‘the Constitution recognizes only the Spanish Nation and the Unitarian sovereignty of the Spanish people’. But Article 147(2) of the Constitution correctly underlines the importance of preliminary identification of individual communities, stating that the relevant statutes must contain both the name of the community which best corresponds to its historical identity and the delimitation of its territory. In fact, the Spanish Constitution does not list the communities to be instituted (as opposed to the Italian Constitution which does so in Article 131), and therefore the choice has to be made at the time of the institution of the specific community and the approval of the relevant statute. Again, the central state has a constituent task in the conformation of the system of autonomy.

The recent decision by the French constitutional legislator of providing for the institution of regions does not apparently have any connection with the Spanish and Italian model of the regional state. The French regions are not especially differentiated from the other territorial units of the Republic and do not have legislative powers: the new Article 72 of the French Constitution mentions them along with the communes, departments, units with a special statute, and overseas territories. The protection of the French Constitution only covers the existence of the regions and—in principle—their autonomy. Therefore, extension of their powers, the amount of their financial resources, and their interrelation with the state have to be decided by the Parliament; in the regions a representative of the state is entrusted with the functions of controlling their activity and ensuring respect for the national interest. Moreover, the territorial units are not organized hierarchically and there are no superior bodies charged with the task of controlling them. However, assistance with interpretation of this reform is offered by the previous case law of the French Constitutional Council, which recognized the power of the legislator to institute local self-governing entities not explicitly provided for by the Constitution (in this case, the Region of Corsica) on the conditions of respecting constitutional principles and rules, ensuring the exercise of self-government through free elections, and restraint from transferring to them powers concerning ‘matters to be regulated by the parliamentary law’, even where it is admissible to authorize the relevant regional bodies to ask the delegation of regulatory powers ‘to adapt [the national rules] … to specific circumstances’.

After the adoption of the recent measures for devolution for Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland, the United Kingdom can also be distinguished from federal states, notwithstanding that these measures take into consideration the specific historical identities of the three countries. The United Kingdom does not have a written constitution, the concerned territorial entities are not involved in the amendments of the relevant rules, and the guarantee of the distribution of powers between the centre and the periphery is not ensured by a specific court. This means that the superiority of the Westminster Parliament is preserved. But the devolution arrangements are different in each of the three countries. In Scotland, they are Westminster-based with a Scottish Parliament and government, which means that central government maintains control and oversight of the devolved powers and which also provides for a clear distribution of issues between the UK authorities and the Scottish governing bodies and for the establishment of a multi-layered democracy. In Wales a more restrained policy was adopted, granting secondary powers to the relevant institutions, and especially to its National Assembly. For Northern Ireland, a ‘peace’ solution for the conflict—which saw the majority of the population aiming at a union with Great Britain and a minority favouring unification with the rest of Ireland—was adopted at a midway point between a large degree of devolution and a preparatory move in view of a possible merging with the Irish Republic. The 1998 Belfast Agreement, while providing for the establishment of the relevant assembly and executive, consolidated the institutions for cooperation between the concerned parties (Great Britain, Republic of Ireland, and Northern Ireland) according to a trend which developed during the long process of negotiations to settle the conflict.

The creation of regions is envisaged for the remaining part of the United Kingdom, that is, England. The idea is to establish elected assemblies for each of the eight regions into which England is divided. The implementation of the choice depends on the decision of the Secretary of State to call a referendum on the matter in view of evidence of a sufficient level of interest among the population of England. These assemblies will not have legislative powers but will focus on promoting economic and social developments, public services, and the protection of the regional environments, while taking into account the exigencies of geographical areas larger than those of the municipalities.

IV. The Organization of the Central Executive Branches of the State: The Role of the Parliament

The arrangements concerning the branches of the central state is a practical matter but it has a well-known constitutional dimension. Here we concentrate on the impact of such organization on the powers of the executive branch. The historical formation of unitary states is strictly connected with the growth of the power of the European monarchies. The example of France is again impressive: the progressive establishment of the unitary state resulted in concentration of power in the hands of the king, with particular emphasis on his executive functions and on the officials depending on him. These functions were retained by the new monarchical executives when, after the Revolution, they took up the heritage of the absolute monarchy, while they shared or renounced the legislative function in favour of a representative parliament. It was not only a technical arrangement, it also had a political relevance as far as it was justified by the idea that the unity of the state had to be preserved by the unity of power in the executive branch and through the central exercise of relevant functions. Dealing with the termination of the Revolution, Michel Troper has correctly underlined the peculiarity of the position and of the role of executive power after the Directorate (in the French Constitution of 1795). This was the starting point of developments that interested all European countries. Frequently justified—from the perspective of European history—by the threat of or actuality of continental wars and by the complexities of the social question, the executives moved to occupy a central position in the internal ordering of the state, with a tendency to be identified with the unitary state. Such developments have had, in some instances even in times of peace, perverse effects when they offered a basis for the epiphany of authoritarian and dictatorial changes of systems of the government with the progressive reduction of the role of parliament (eg Italy, Spain, and Germany). However, in other countries, commentators can also easily be found who criticize the growing enlargement of the executives notwithstanding the presence of an active elected parliament and the absence of really authoritarian regressions.

In principle, in modern and contemporary constitutions, the introduction of the separation of powers should have resulted in the submission of the executive bodies of the state to the legislative arm, but the executive did not easily accept being fully subordinated to the elected assemblies and having its functions limited to execution of the law: it always, and also successfully, aimed at managing political coordination and the administrative direction of all actions concerning the government of the country and management of the armies. First, this enlargement interested the constitutional monarchies and, later, the parliamentary governments with their increasing ruling role and separation of government—made up of political personnel—from the monarchy. In spite of the fact that, in light of democratic principles, the parliament, which is supposed to be the representative body of the unity of the nation, has been charged not only with the legislative function and also with exercising control and scrutiny of the government, the executive was seen as the main body responsible for the unity of the state and also as the operator of public administration and state-provided public services—which were often identified with the state, at least in the eyes of the general public.

But the continental constitutional practice in the field of the central branches of the state was especially based, even before the advent of parliamentary government, on attempts by the legislator to regulate and control the activities of the executive by the adoption of normative (p. 622) Acts the application of which should be the task of the executive according to the political purposes of government. With the advent of the constitutional state, the competences of the central authorities are often listed in the constitution, and not only in the regional unitary states such as Spain, Italy, and, partially, Portugal, but even in France with special regard to the parliament.

The main obstacle to these developments, which required an expansion of the legislative shaping of the organization and functions of the executive, was the traditional recognition for it of a specific autonomy and self-sufficiency in creating and ruling its own branches which was strictly connected, at least before the advent of parliamentary government, with an interpretation of the principle of the separation of powers aimed at keeping the executive dependent on the authority of the monarchy and independent of parliament. If it is true that even in the Germany in the eighteenth and the nineteenth centuries, the existence of a preliminary law was required in view of administrative interference in the exercise of rights and freedoms, the above-mentioned difficulties in the field of the arrangements of the executive branches were explicitly overcome only when the dependence of the administrative organization on the legislative decisions of the parliament began to be stated in the constitutions. In the United Kingdom where, inter alia, the executive has always had the guide of parliamentary activities, in the absence of a written constitution the intervention of parliamentary statutes in shaping the departments of central government has emerged only in the twentieth century.

Constitutional provisions which entrust parliamentary laws with the task of organizing the offices and branches of the executive powers can be found in many European constitutions. For instance, in Spain Article 103 of the Constitution not only provides that ‘the Public Administration serves the general interest with objectivity and acts in accordance with the principles of efficiency, hierarchy, decentralization, deconcentration and coordination, being fully subject to justice and the law’, but also states the rule that ‘the organs of the State Administration are created, directed and co-ordinated in accordance with the law’. According to Article 116 of the Constitution of Romania, ‘Ministries shall be set up, organized, and function in accordance with the law ... Autonomous administrative authorities may be established by an organic law.’ In Italy, on the basis of Article 97 of the Constitution, ‘public offices are organized according to the provisions of law, so as to ensure efficiency and the impartiality of administration.’ Perhaps the Hungarian Constitution leaves more room for the self-regulation of the executive when it only states that ‘the Ministries shall be listed in a special Act’ (Art 17), even if it does not specifically list the matters falling within the competence of the legislator and of the regulations adopted by the executive. Such a distribution is present in the French Constitution but did not prevent a progressive enlargement of the parliamentary legislation's space by the case law of the Conseil Constitutionnel.42

Ministries and departments are normally the main constitutive branches of the executive. Their number usually matches the number of members of the Cabinet or Council of Ministers, which is chaired by the Premier and is the top executive's deliberative body. But we also have examples of countries where there are ministries or departments entrusted to the responsibility of ministers who are not members of the Cabinet (United Kingdom) or to Undersecretaries of State (recently in Italy). The distribution of the functions among these branches of the executive is normally made on the basis of the homogeneity of the concerned fields of activity: they are supposed to work in coordination with the national agencies or corporations and the entities of local government which have concurring competences in the respective matters. Only the Premier has a power of general political coordination.43

Moreover, the constitutional experience offers examples of increasing relevance of the chiefs of the state's offices outside the presidential or semi-presidential regimes. This phenomenon is taken into consideration by some new constitutions. In Poland, Article 143 of the Constitution provides for the establishment of the Presidential Chancellery as ‘the organ of assistance to the President of the Republic. The President of the Republic shall establish the statute of the Presidential Chancellery and shall appoint and dismiss its Chiefs’, and in Croatia, for instance, the President shall appoint—in case of special necessity—advisory bodies to be assisted in the performance of his duties, while advisory, expert, and other tasks shall be normally performed by the Office of the President, whose organization and competence shall be regulated by law and internal rules.44 The phenomenon is present even in the absence of constitutional provisions. For instance, the President of the French Republic avails himself of 800 people, who are organized on the basis of areas of activity (foreign affairs, culture, economic and social matters etc) which are in parallel with the branches of government.45 The rules concerning this structure are adopted by the President directly.

V. The Droit Administratif and the Advent of the Sozialer Rechtstaat

The new social and economic demands of the twentieth century have called for an enlargement of the functions of the executive with important consequences for compliance with the principle of the rule of law.46 The problem was taken into consideration by the legal doctrine as it occurred in the Germany of the Weimar Republic with the emergence of the idea of the Sozialer Rechtstaat, which implicitly expanded the state's functions in view of the implementation of social and economic principles and within the frame of compliance with the principle of the rule of law. But it was not easy to implement these doctrines. With the exception of the United Kingdom, continental European countries have seen, at least since the nineteenth century, the advent of a new special branch of law essentially devoted to regulating the activities of the executive. The starting point was the idea—especially elaborated in France by the administrative judges and by the scientific doctrines of legal scholars—that a particular legal nature should be accorded to the administrative acts of the executive, taking into consideration the typical characteristics of public agents and their management of public interests. These acts required specific rules and the submission of possible and relevant claims by the people affected to a special jurisdiction—administrative justice—which was intended to have exclusive knowledge to deal with conflicts between the state's administration and its citizens and which would be entrusted with the competence to resolve them in compliance with public interests. This was another product of the long story of the claimed independence and self-sufficiency of the executive, but—step by step—it moved far away from being an instrument (p. 624) of privilege for public officials and resulted in the transformation of the originally authoritarian profile of the administrative organization into a system attentive to the exigencies of protection of the rights and freedoms of the people.

According to its common law tradition, the United Kingdom followed a different approach in dealing with the same problems. The interpretation of the rule of law has been first and more directly connected with the protection of rights and freedoms, which is ensured by the ‘ordinary’ judiciary through its case law which is the direct source of law. Therefore, while the continental constitutional practice in the field of the central branches of the state was based, even before the advent of parliamentary government, on the attempt by the legislator to regulate and control the activities of the executive by the adoption of normative acts the application of which should be their task according to the political purposes of the government, the English model of rule of law evolved through the action of the courts. At the end of the nineteenth century, the late A.V. Dicey suggested that, while in France the acts of the public officers were submitted to a distinct system of administrative courts, the English law was based on the principles that every man, whatever his formal rank or position, shall be subject to the ordinary law and the jurisdiction of the ordinary tribunals. However, in more recent times, even the English case law, legal doctrine, and legislation have opened the way for recognition of the peculiarity of the position of public authorities, whose functions have a discrentional profile, which Dicey’s theory denied. If the phenomenon was labelled ‘Administrative State’ only in the twentieth century, today opinion is generally shared that discretion is necessarily connected with the powers of choice of the public authorities and affects private persons who interrelate with the public administration. The rule of law is respected as far as the possible openness of the provisions of the law is balanced by their implementation through consensual regulations and by the procedural fairness of the executive’s activities.

Both in continental Europe and in the United Kingdom, the development of a public industrial and commercial sector resulted in great innovation. The traditional administrative rules were not sufficient for public authorities dealing with the economic and social problems whose solutions were newly entrusted to the states. They were not adequately flexible and their usually strict application was a disadvantage in implementing rules that were to be complied with by the operators of the private economic sector. Everywhere, the administrative law has been revised to cope with the new exigencies of the state. These developments led to the creation of new structures which were to be autonomous with regard to the executive authorities and were frequently regulated by ad hoc amendments to the general legislation concerning private corporations. For instance, in France and Italy measures of nationalization were adopted with the establishment of new public institutions (in France établissements publics nationaux) and of entirely public or mixed public-private corporations (in Italy società a partecipazione statale), while their governing boards were appointed by the governments in view of ensuring the coherence of their activity with its general policies, even if they had the great freedom of choice and movement required by the exigencies of industrial and commercial management. Only with the advent of new European economic regulations was this tendency abandoned, but the heritage of the past is still present in some places after the claimed reduction of powers of the public authorities in the economic field to mere regulatory functions (eg in Italy). In the United Kingdom, the presence of independent regulatory and advisory bodies entrusted with the task of regulating public enterprises in some specific fields, coexisted with the executive bodies set up to manage nationalized enterprises since the advent (p. 625) of the initial interventions of the state in the economy at the beginning of the twentieth century. With the expansion of the private market, the legislation has preserved their peculiar relevance to ensure the fair and correct provision of services and goods for the benefit of the general community.
VI. The Hierarchical Structure of the Executive: Civil Servants

The internal organization of the state's executive branches has been reformed not only in connection with the expansion of the Sozialstaat. The requisite of the hierarchical structure of the public administration which is present—for instance—in the previously quoted Article 103 of the Spanish Constitution, was in the past the common feature of the European unitary states. It was generally accepted that the organization of the executives could ensure the unity of the administrative activity of the state only through the establishment of different levels of bureaucratic structures held by officers, whose legal status was not regulated by private law but by specific legislation to ensure their neutrality, liability, and stability (eg by allowing dismissal only for misconduct). The high position of the superior offices resulted in their power of commanding the inferior departments by the adoption of orders and guidelines which were supposed to take into consideration the state's unitary interests and produce their effects down the pyramid, to affect and bind the functioning of the inferior branches of the executive which were in direct contact with the practical application of the law. In this way, all levels of the administrative organization were supposed to be—through the personal dependence of their holders—under the controlling and supervisory functions of the state's bodies which were in charge of the unity of the executive and, therefore, of the unity of the state. The advent of new public entities in the field of the state's economic and social intervention broke the machinery of the hierarchical organization: they required autonomy of management and functioning outside the strictures of administrative law and implied substantial changes of the regulation of the concerned personnel's status which was deprived of the guarantee of stability, but had great freedom of movement.

Interesting developments have also affected the traditional performance of the state's administration. The administrative hierarchy has always implied, on the one hand, difficulties in keeping separate the political and the legal dimensions of the state's activities and has, especially in recent times, complicated, on the other hand, the relations between the technical and legal profiles of administrative actions. The neutrality of civil servants was endangered by the request from the top political bodies to have their commands complied with, while the dependence of the inferior offices of the public administration on the guidelines of the superior authorities reduced their capacity to cope with the growing exigencies of the technical requirements of practical administration. These problems were extensively dealt with in a constitution for the first time in Articles 128 to 131 of the Constitution of the Weimar Republic on the basis of the principle that the state's civil servants have to serve the entire community and not solely the interests of a political party. After the fall of the fascist dictatorship in Italy, its new constitution stated that the ‘civil servants are exclusively at the service of the Nation’, providing that ‘public offices are organized according to the provisions of law, so as to ensure efficiency and the impartiality of administration. The regulations of the offices lay down the areas of competence, duties and responsibilities of their functionaries.’ A similar tendency is present in the recent Greek Constitution which was adopted after the advent of the democratic regime: ‘civil servants shall be the executors of the will of the State and shall serve the people, owing allegiance to the Constitution and devotion to the Fatherland’, and in Spain the above-mentioned Article 103 introduces principles limiting—in the name of the objectivity, efficiency, and compliance with justice and law—the relevance of the hierarchical organization. Similar considerations appear in new post-totalitarian constitutions. For instance, in Bulgaria, the state's employees are required to be ‘the executors of the nation's will and interests. In performance of their duty they shall be guided solely by the law and shall politically neutral’, and in Slovenia, the Constitution provides that ‘duties and functions associated with the public administration shall be conducted independently and at all times pursuant to, and consistently with, this Constitution and the law.’ Consequently, the tendency of adopting solutions of delegating state functions to autonomous agencies, which are separated from the public administration branches, should be appreciated. One noteworthy point is the example of the English government of creating quasi-governmental organizations and quasi-non-governmental organizations, or entrusting the regional decentralized offices with ‘general decisive authority on matters of their district’ as has happened in Greece. Another solution as regards regulation of the decision-making process itself, which frequently implies an emphasis on the administrative functions close to the interested people, is that, according to Article 105 of the Spanish Constitution, ‘the law shall regulate the hearing of citizens directly, or through the organisations and associations recognized by law, in the process of drawing up the administrative provisions which affect them.’

Bibliography
Bibliography

Costantinos Bacoyannis, Le principe constitutionnel de libre administration des collectivités territoriales (1993)
Francis Hamon and Michel Troper, Droit constitutionnel (2005)
Hermann Mangoldt and Christian Starck, Das Bonner Grundgesetz (5th edn, 2005)
Peter Pernthaler, Der differenzierte Bundesstaat (1992)

Notes:

(1) Alexis de Tocqueville, L’ancien régime et la révolution, II.

(2) On citizenship see Chapter 48.

(3) See Chapter 23.

(4) Explanatory report, subsection III.

(5) According to the distribution of the matter in this volume, which assigns the legislative and judicial powers to other chapters, this chapter will discuss the organization of the administrative functions only.

(6) Title II, Art 1.

(9) Art 72.

(10) German Constitution, Art 83.

(12) 1948 Italian Constitution, Art 124.

(13) While the original purpose of the model of the déconcentration, which was the basis for the creation of the departments, was instead the establishing of a direct link between the state’s central administrative bodies and the citizens, in view of the implementation of national interests and legislation.

(14) Heinrich Rudolf Gneist, *Geschichte und heutige Gestalt der englischen Communal Verfassung und des Selfgovernment (1866).

(16) Its general relevance in Europe is confirmed by the European Charter of local autonomies adopted by the Council of Europe (Strasbourg, 15 October 1985). This document does not pretend to introduce a binding organizational uniformity across the different institutions of local government in Europe; rather, it elaborates principles which are supposed to be part and parcel of the common constitutional heritage of those countries.

(17) See Art 3 of the Charter.

(20) Leigh (n 18), 307.

(21) But see eg Arts 163–4 of the Polish Constitution and Art 78 of Icelandic Constitution.

(22) See Art 72 of the French Constitution, providing for the existence of communes, departments, and regions; in Italy, see Art 114 enlisting municipalities, provinces, metropolitan areas, regions; in Hungary, see Art 41 mentioning the capital, the counties, the cities, the communities, and the districts.

(23) See Chapter 27 on federalism.

(24) The advent of a federation implies the unanimous adoption of a constitution by the participant states or other territorial entities entrusting some important functions (eg foreign policy, defence, finance, and markets) to a new organization, the central federal state.

(25) However, in some places, from the point of view of historical developments, there is no radical distinction between federalism and regionalism. Eg, the formation of the Belgian federal state followed an unusual path. The cultural and linguistic diversities of Belgium fostered in the second half of the twentieth century the creation of three (French, Flemish, and German) cultural communities (which were given a limited autonomy in cultural matters by the 1970 constitutional revision) and (by the revisions of 1980 and 1988–89) of three (Flemish, Walloon, and Brussels–Capital) regions, which were empowered with the relevant social and economic functions. These reforms were the basis for the final transformation of the previous unitary state into a federal state with a new constitutional revision in 1993 followed by the adoption of the entirely revised Constitution which entered into force in 1994. The Belgian constitutional developments affect the credibility of the traditional model of the process of the federal state’s formation insofar as they apparently remind the different phenomenon of the devolution of the state’s competences to local and regional authorities within the frame of a unitary state. See Francis Delpérée, La Belgique, État fédéral? (1972), 607.

(26) Article 5: ‘the Republic, one and indivisible, recognizes and promotes local autonomies’.

(33) Decisions 91-290 DC and 2001-454 DC.
(34) eg in the case of Scotland see Whaley v Watson of Invergowrie, 2000 SC 340.

(35) See the Government White Paper, Your Region, Your Choice: Revitalising the English Regions (Cm 5511, May 2002).

(38) Spanish Constitution, Art 149.

(39) Italian Constitution, Art 117.

(40) Portuguese Constitution, Arts 164 and 165.

(41) French Constitution, Art 34.

(43) In Germany, ‘the Chancellor shall determine and be responsible for the general guidelines of policy’: German Constitution, Art 65.

(44) Croatian Constitution, Art 106.

(45) Francis Hamon and Michel Troper, Droit constitutionnel (2005), 621–2.

(48) On the constitutionalization of these concerns and the resulting need for neutrality, see below the Weimar experience.

(49) Italian Constitution of 1948, Art 98.

(50) Italian Constitution of 1948, Art 97.

(51) Art 103.

(52) Art 116.

(53) Art 120. Arts 195–7 of the recent Constitution of the Republic of South Africa (1996) provided a long list of the basic values and principles governing public administration and for the establishment of a Public Service Commission whose functions have to be exercised ‘in the interest of the maintenance of effective and efficient public administration and a high standard of professional ethics in the public service.’ The expression ‘public service’ refers to persons who are employees in the public administration according to terms and conditions regulated by national legislation. In the Nordic countries, safeguarding the public interests of the efficiency and the high professional standards of public administration is the main task of a particular organ which has recently also attracted the attention of other states, the Ombudsman: see Donald Cameron Rowat, The Ombudsman: Citizens Defender (1965).

(54) Art 101.

Sergio Bartole

Sergio Bartole is Emeritus Professor of Constitutional Law, University of Trieste
Presidentialism

Oxford Handbooks Online

Presidentialism
Héctor Fix-Fierro and Pedro Salazar-Ugarte
The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Constitutional Law
Edited by Michel Rosenfeld and András Sajó
Print Publication Date: May 2012
Online Publication Date: Nov 2012
DOI: 10.1093/oxfordhb/9780199578610.013.0031

Abstract and Keywords
Presidentialism as a form of government was born as an alternative to both monarchy (absolute or constitutional) and parliamentarism (republican or monarchical). This article discusses the history and evolution of presidentialism; debates as to whether, and to what extent, both institutional designs — presidentialism and democracy — are compatible with each other; and trends in a number of presidential systems from the 1990s onwards.

Keywords: presidential system, form of government, democracy

I. Concepts 628
II. History and Evolution 631
   1. The Birthplace of Presidentialism: The United States of America (1787) 631
   2. The First Expansion of Presidentialism: Latin America (Nineteenth Century) 634
   3. The Struggle against Colonialism and the Challenges of Development: Africa, the Middle East, and Asia (Twentieth Century) 636
   4. The Compromise between Past and Present: The Former Soviet Union and the ex-Socialist Countries after 1989 638

III. Debates 639
IV. Trends and Positions 643
V. Comparative Perspective and Recapitulation 646

I. Concepts
A presidential system is a form of government in a republican state. From this perspective, it is an alternative to monarchy. However, its historical origins and theoretical background are found in monarchical government. The idea that one and the same person holds the offices of head of state and head of government is akin to both presidential systems and traditional monarchies. Whenever these two roles are separated, the foundations are laid for either a constitutional monarchy or a parliamentary government. Thus, presidentialism as a form of government was born as an alternative to both monarchy (absolute or constitutional) and parliamentarism (republican or monarchical).

In terms of the historical evolution of the theory of forms of government, we can say that presidentialism takes on a republican dimension as opposed to a monarchy,1 while within a (p. 629) republican order, it takes on a democratic dimension as opposed to an aristocracy.2 Indeed, even though it incorporates some elements of a monocratic tradition, our definition of presidentialism is based on a broad concept of democracy, rather than on an...
Presidentialism

idea of autocratic rule.³

To characterize presidentialism as a republican and democratic alternative implies the conceptual exclusion of other systems of government in which one person plays the role of head of state and head of government at the same time. Regimes such as sultanes,⁴ military dictatorships, ‘hereditary’ presidential systems (eg Haiti under the Duvaliers, or, until recently, Egypt, Tunisia, Yemen, and Algeria), or executive monarchies (Saudi Arabia and Oman) cannot be considered presidential systems of government in the proper sense. We justify such exclusion on two theses that complement each other: (1) the presidential form of government is, broadly speaking, a subspecies of modern democracy (the latter being a subspecies of the republican form of state), that is, a system in which the head of government is periodically and institutionally renewed via popular election; and (2) presidentialism is an alternative to parliamentarism, the main difference between both democratic systems being that the separation of powers is one of the essential features of a presidential constitution.

Certainly, depending on the extent to which power tends not to be distributed but is concentrated in the hands of a unipersonal organ (the presidency or the executive power), presidentialism can easily lead to authoritarian deviations. By the same token, however, it can also easily respond to democratic expectations. This occurs, in the first place, because it enjoys a legal-rational legitimacy of its own,⁵ and secondly, because such legitimacy finds its basis in popular elections. Clearly, not every source of legal-rational legitimacy and not every kind of election are democratic per se. However, in the case of presidentialism, both elements are generally linked to a democratic perspective. In comparison with traditional and charismatic sources of legitimacy, the source of presidential legitimacy is impersonal.⁶ And in contrast with its autocratic alternatives, presidential legitimacy flows bottom-up as an expression of citizens’ political autonomy.⁷

The source of legitimacy of presidential power lies, then, in a set of rules (laws and institutions) that broadly correspond to the forms of modern democracy. More precisely, these rules provide for the necessary, regular and periodic replacement of the head of the executive power through popular vote. The decision as to who will be elected president in a democratic setting depends on the outcome of an electoral process that must satisfy specific conditions: all the adult members of the community may participate peacefully and on an equal, non-discriminatory basis; every vote carries the same weight; and the vote of the majority determines the outcome of the election.⁸ If these conditions are met, and furthermore, the political minorities who lost the election are given the possibility to participate and win in a future electoral round, then we may conclude that the election of the president has been fairly democratic.⁹

If, on the contrary, one or more of the conditions and rules described are ignored, and, if minorities are structurally excluded from exercising power, we must then conclude that the regime is presidential in nature, but only democratic in appearance. This is, for example, the case of presidential systems under the rule of a hegemonic party,¹⁰ or of the authoritarian presidential governments of some Latin American (eg the regime of President Hugo Chávez in Venezuela) and African countries. In any case, presidentialism is characterized by the periodic renewal of the branches of power through presumably democratic processes. Whenever a political leader holds on to power for an indefinite time, even if he is called the President of the Nation (like Fidel Castro in Cuba), the system can no longer be considered presidential, but dictatorial. Presidentialism is therefore compatible with democratic governments, as well as with some instances of electoral authoritarian systems, but must not be mistaken for lifelong or hereditary autocracies.

Presidentialism stands on one of the conceptual and institutional pillars of liberal constitutionalism: the separation of powers. This pillar forms the basis for two other fundamental principles of modern constitutionalism: the principle of legality and the principle of impartiality. The former requires a separation between the main state functions while according priority to the legislative function over the executive and judicial functions. Impartiality, on the other hand, requires the separation of the organs authorized to carry out these state functions, taking particular care that the independence of the judicial branch vis-à-vis the other two branches of power is guaranteed. The priority given to the legislative function has a logical explanation: the executive and judicial functions presuppose the existence of general and abstract laws. The independence of the judiciary is explained by teleological arguments: effective compliance with the law is only possible if judges are independent from the political branches of government.¹¹ This relationship between state functions and the state organs that carry out these functions is crucial in defining presidential systems. Moreover, the manner in which executive and legislative branches are linked to and interact with each other is of particular relevance.
In order to understand the way in which these principles operate in presidentialism, it is important to consider how a presidential system differs from a parliamentary government. Two criteria will be mentioned here: first, the source of legitimacy of the legislative (parliament or congress) and executive (president) branches, and secondly, some of the substantive powers vested in them. In presidentialism, citizens directly elect the members of each of these branches, so both are institutionally and organically independent from the other. A government with dual legitimacy emerges because each of the branches of power—the executive and the legislative—may claim their own independent source of legitimacy. Each one enjoys a considerable degree of political independence vis-à-vis the other: the legislature may not remove the government by a vote of no confidence, nor can the government dissolve the parliament and call for new elections. In consequence, a complex system of institutional checks and balances emerges, which must operate for a fixed term without the possibility of anticipated citizen intervention (new elections).

The renewal of the presidency is provided for in the constitution and carried out at fixed intervals. Besides exceptional circumstances such as impeachment, death, resignation and the like, the president stays in office for a fixed period (generally between four and six years), with or without the possibility of being elected for more than one term. Re-election for a limited number of terms is possible, as in Angola, Argentina, Brazil, South Africa, and the United States, while it is absolutely prohibited in Mexico and Nicaragua.

The renewal of the legislature also follows fixed terms, which may, or may not, be concurrent with presidential elections. The terms of office of the members of the judiciary tend to be much longer (a career judiciary exists in most countries) and non-concurrent, for the sake of judicial independence, with the terms of office of the other branches of power.

Between parliamentarism and presidentialism other intermediate forms of government are possible (semi-presidentialism or semi-parliamentarism). They also observe democratic rules and recognize the principle of the separation of powers, but the relationship between the legislature and the executive adopts different modalities. If the legislative power is preeminent, the form of government is called semi-parliamentarism. If the executive power enjoys a privileged position, then we are speaking of semi-presidentialism. From among the different modalities that these intermediate forms of government may adopt, the design of coincident powers is especially favorable to a flexible and stable operation of the particular separation of powers. Mechanisms providing for shared responsibilities (eg joint appointment of cabinet members, or joint design and implementation of governmental programs) seem to be fairly common.

II. History and Evolution

Presidentialism as a form of government was born in the United States in 1787. The US model was later adopted and adapted by other newly independent countries, whether in nineteenth-century Latin America or twentieth-century Africa. Thus, it appears to be especially well suited to countries facing the complex tasks of independent nation-building and development. The emergence of authoritarian or dictatorial governments in most of these countries seems to be a frequent side effect of adopting a presidential constitution before a more democratic and balanced system can be established.

1. The Birthplace of Presidentialism: The United States of America (1787)

The presidential form of government was conceived by the 1787 Philadelphia Constitutional Convention. Certainly, it was not born in the full and complete shape it has now, but the Founding Fathers defined the essential features that have marked its development in the United States and its diffusion and adoption, with numerous variations, in other regions of the world: the president is both the head of state and the head of government, and is elected for a fixed term that is independent from that of the legislature or national representative body.

The final design of the presidency in the Federal Constitution of the United States was the result of arduous debates and continuously revised solutions based on compromises. The Framers were sufficiently clear on the type of national government they wanted to establish, as well as the role the executive power would play in it: the president had to be independent from the legislature if he was to serve as the check and counterbalance of legislative power. However, unlike the ineffective executive power created by the states after the Declaration of Independence in 1776, the president had to possess legitimacy, energy, and a decision-making capacity of his own. At the same time, it was necessary to prevent the president from becoming an oppressive, tyrannical power—as the British monarch and colonial governors had often behaved—or a demagogue who was subject to the demands and whims of the masses.

Nevertheless, at the opening of the Congress there was insufficient clarity on the specific nature and powers the institution was to assume. The so-called Virginia Plan (drafted by James Madison) was quite vague regarding the executive power. Thus, the delegates had to discuss whether the executive power was to be single or plural (single); whether the president could be re-elected or appointed for life (re-election with no limits, but not for life); whether he was to be appointed by the legislature or independently (election by a special body, the Electoral College); and whether his term of office should concur with the terms of office of the other powers (non-concurrent term). The delegates also had to resolve a number of other significant issues raised by the presidential institution: such as the requirements for holding office and the corresponding oath or affirmation; succession in case of resignation, disability, or removal; incompatibility with other offices; and even the president's compensation for rendering services. The name of the officer itself—the title of ‘president’ was usually assigned to the officer presiding over assembly or legislature sessions—was adopted without debate.

The Framers also defined the particular powers the president was to exercise:

- a veto power over legislation (which can be overridden by Congress);
- the role of commander-in-chief of the armed forces (but only Congress has power to declare war);
- the power to make treaties (with the advice and consent of the Senate), as well as the power to recognize foreign nations;
- the power to appoint ambassadors, officers of the United States, and judges (with Senate confirmation);
- the power to issue pardons;
- the power to inform Congress on the state of the Union and the power to recommend legislation;
- the power to call Congress to special sessions.

The enumeration of presidential powers in the constitutional text notwithstanding, its exercise in practice has been shaped by the personal character and political beliefs of the presidents themselves, as well as by the debates that constitutional life has posed over the course of time (eg the meaning and scope of the phrase ‘he (the president) shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed’), and which have been the main motor of its evolution.

Shortly after the new Constitution went into force, two diverging conceptions of the role of the presidential institution and the scope of its powers arose: on one hand, the ‘Hamiltonian’ view of the president as the leader of a vigorous national government, vested with all the necessary powers, and even implicit ones; and on the other, the ‘Jeffersonian’ perspective, aimed at circumscribing and limiting the role of national governmental powers and, in particular, those of the president. This latter vision triumphed with the election of Thomas Jefferson as president of the United States in 1800. It marked the beginning of a long cycle of growing dominance of Congress over the presidency that lasted throughout almost the entire nineteenth century. Its lowest point was reached after the Civil War, with the attempt to impeach President Andrew Johnson (1865–69) and the enactment of the Tenure of Office Act, which prohibited the president from removing any Senate-ratified executive officer without the consent of the Senate. Significantly enough, in 1885 Woodrow Wilson—who would later be elected president (1913–21)—published his classic treatise on the constitutional system of the United States entitled Congressional Government. Certainly, many presidents of those times fought hard to restore the powers of the presidency and won many a victory over Congress.

The predominance of Congress notwithstanding, the exercise of presidential power itself underwent major transformations during the nineteenth century. Such transformations would set the stage for the new tasks the presidential institution would assume in the twentieth century. The most significant changes lie in the emergence of political parties as central and preeminent organizations in political processes, as well as in the growing connections and responsiveness of the president towards the demands and expectations of a dynamic, expanding citizenry. Thus, US presidents arrived at the conviction that they—not the legislators who represented rather their district or state constituencies—were the true representatives of the nation. They felt obliged towards citizens’ aspirations, and this belief led them to seek direct contact with them (the role of the press in this sense became crucial), including the possibility of directly appealing to the people when faced with situations of conflict with Congress or national emergencies. Presently, the consummate manifestation of those direct links between the president and citizens lies in the primaries for selecting presidential candidates (thus sidestepping the political parties) and the media-driven (and more recently internet-driven) election campaigns.

The enormous changes and dislocations that the United States witnessed over the last decades of the nineteenth century and first decades of the twentieth century—accelerated economic growth, urbanization, increasing presence and influence in the international arena—propelled the presidency towards the center of political action, and made it the vehicle of governmental activism geared towards the regulation of change, particularly economic change, as well as the arbitrator of conflicts between social groups and classes.

This new transformation finds perhaps its beginnings in the Theodore Roosevelt Administration (1901–09), during the so-called Progressive Era, but it picked up pace and reached its peak with President Franklin Delano Roosevelt's New Deal (1933–45) and President Lyndon B. Johnson's Great Society (1963–69). It has been accompanied not only by an extraordinary growth of the administrative apparatus of government, but also of the office of the president itself. In 1939, President F.D. Roosevelt established the Executive Office of the President based on a law passed by Congress. This office, which comprises several agencies placed under the immediate authority of the president, is designed to give him the tools he needs in order to start and carry out his projects and policies, as well as to control an ever-growing and increasingly complex administrative apparatus. As a result, the influence of the Executive Office of the President has expanded and grown, even under those presidents who came into office promising to reduce Big Government, to the point of it becoming a type of government within government, and even, as some authors put it, a fourth branch of government: the presidential branch.17

In the first decade of the twenty-first century, the president is still the most salient and powerful figure in the political life of the United States, and perhaps of the world. However, the increasing intricacies of society and of the interests that contemporary government must regulate make (p. 634) bargaining, approving, and implementing domestic reforms, in a context of a persisting and insidious financial crisis, ever more difficult and painful. Even the international arena, which used to be where presidential power could be displayed most freely, is increasingly complex and obstacle-ridden. If the United States is truly in (relative) decline, this cannot fail to have an impact on the institution that has most contributed to the unfolding and consolidation of its status as a superpower: the presidency.

2. The First Expansion of Presidentialism: Latin America (Nineteenth Century)

Between 1809 and 1830, the territories that have come to be known collectively as Latin America attained their independence from the Spanish and Portuguese empires. The new nations adopted a republican form of government and, in particular, presidentialism, under the inspiration of the 1787 Federal Constitution of the United States. However, its adoption was not immediate, nor was it exempt from national nuances and variations. Moreover, at different times and for short periods, several Latin American states experimented with parliaments and parliamentary formulas, particularly in the twentieth century (e.g., Chile 1891–1923, Uruguay 1934–42, Cuba 1940–52, and Brazil 1961–63). Latin American states introduced four models of government at the time of independence and in the immediately ensuing period.18

The first model is embodied in monarchical projects since monarchical ideas were popular in the early years after independence and even beyond. We can mention Henri Christophe in Haiti (1811–20) and the ephemeral Mexican Empire of General Agustín de Iturbide between 1822 and 1823 (a second attempt between 1864 and 1867, with Maximilian of Habsburg as the emperor, who was also short-lived). Brazil remained an empire from 1822 to 1889 because Peter I, the heir to the Portuguese crown, proclaimed Brazilian independence and crowned himself emperor.

The second model adopted by the first Latin American constitutions was the plural executive. Its sources can be found in the ideas of Rousseau and the 1793 and 1795 French revolutionary constitutions, as well as in the 'governing juntas' (juntas gubernativas) that sprung up with the Napoleonic invasion of Spain and the ensuing abdication of the Spanish kings in 1808. As examples of this model, we can cite the 1811 Constitution of Cundinamarca in the event that Ferdinand VII could not occupy the throne; the 1812 Constitution of Quito; the 1811 Constitution of Venezuela; and the 1814 Mexican Constitution, known as the Apatzingán Constitution. However, the flaws and drawbacks of this form of government soon surfaced and prompted it to be abandoned.
Presidentialism

Thirdly, we cite the presidency for life as suggested and inspired by Simon Bolívar. In Bolívar’s own words, referring to the Constitution of Bolivia:

The president of the Republic is to our Constitution like the sun, which, firm in its center, gives life to the universe. This supreme authority must be perpetual; because in systems without hierarchies, more than in others, a fixed point is needed, around which the magistrates and citizens turn. ... For Bolivia, this point is the president-for-life. On him our whole order is predicated, without having action because of this. His head has been cut, so that no one should be afraid of his intentions, and his hands have been tied, so that he does nobody harm.

Experimentation with this form of government was quite short-lived: no more than two years in Bolivia (1826–28) and seven weeks in Peru (1826).

(p. 635) Between 1821 and 1830 and based on the model of the US Constitution but incorporating some significant influences from Spanish constitutionalism, such as the countersignature of executive decrees and orders by ministers, the institution of the Council of State or government, or parliamentary interpellation (of which many survive to this day), the presidential system was finally adopted by almost all Latin American countries.19

The republican and presidential government of the United States enjoyed considerable prestige among the fathers of Latin American constitutions, who admired their northern neighbor not only for its political success, but also for its economic progress. Circulating copies and (bad) translations of the 1787 Constitution, as well of the Federalist Papers, were their main sources of knowledge about the US Constitution. However, active propaganda by US diplomats and agents also made a significant contribution. Joel Roberts Poinsett served as special agent or envoy to Argentina and Chile between 1810 and 1814, and to Mexico between 1822 and 1830; Stephen F. Austin, a US citizen who had moved to Spanish Texas to start a colony, arrived in Mexico in 1822, where he befriended several members of the First Constitutional Congress and drafted several projects that influenced the 1823 Constitutive Act of the Federation. The so-called Monroe Doctrine, proclaimed by US President James Monroe (1817–25) in 1823, not only rejected the intervention of European powers in the Americas, but also, by implication, their political systems.

The introduction of presidentialism did not result in a balance of powers nor in democracy, but in caudillismo. Caudillos were strong men—at first from the military, and later of civilian extraction—who dominated the political life of their respective countries for long periods (emblematic examples are the Perpetual Dictatorship of José Gaspar de Francia in Paraguay from 1816 to 1840, or the prolonged dictatorial government of Porfirio Díaz in Mexico from 1876 to 1910). These men strove to become the builders of their nations and the promoters of their social and economic development, but many of them became dictators, with paternalistic features to be sure, but dictators nevertheless (an inexhaustible motif of Latin American literature). From the presidency, they set out to mold constitutional institutions in their own image. As pointed out by several scholars, Latin American constitutional history became a study in biography. The period of caudillos extended to a good part of the nineteenth century (and in Mexico, to the first three decades of the twentieth century).

The factors leading to caudillismo are diverse and complex. On the one hand, despite the preeminence granted in many constitutional texts to the legislature, the strict separation of powers had the opposite effect, obstructing the control of Congress over the executive. The same enlightened argument that had served to entrench the autonomy of the parliament and deflect interference from the executive served the president equally well to evade any check the legislature may have wanted to wield against his powers.20 On the other hand, a number of social and cultural factors favored, and indeed required, the concentration of power in the hands of the president of the republic: the survival of economic and social structures from colonial times; the absence of a capable and consolidated ruling class; permanent civil strife and the fight against foreign interference or invasions; the lingering presence of a scarcely integrated and backward society, and so on. As these factors gradually began to recede and state structures gained in strength, so did the caudillos slowly begin to abandon the political stage.

In the twentieth century, Latin American presidential constitutions evolved towards a regime of clear presidential dominance over the other branches of government. According to (p. 636) Valencia (1979), the Latin American executive power displayed the following common features:

- a marked personal character of presidential power;
- some traces of parliamentarianism, in most cases of a purely formal nature (cabinet, ministerial countersignature);
- the constitutionally entrenched dominance of the presidency over the other two powers, as manifested in the president's broad powers to intervene in the legislative process (introducing legislative bills, the veto); to make appointments; to declare states of siege or emergency, a practice that, by virtue of its constitutional design, but also of its frequent use, amounted to 'constitutional dictatorship';
- a vast administrative apparatus, including the management of state-owned companies and monopolies, at the president's disposal;
- presidential regulation and promotion of development, with wide-ranging powers of economic and social intervention.

While most Latin American constitutions of the time sought to impose a few checks on presidential power, such as the precise and explicit enumeration of presidential powers or a non re-election clause, these limitations did not prevent several presidents from instituting oligarchic and repressive dictatorships after a time (as seen with the Somozas in Nicaragua, Stroessner in Paraguay, and the Duvaliers in Haiti), nor did they stop the frequent occurrence of coups d'état that resulted in the establishment of military governments and dictatorships. In fact, in most Latin American countries, the armed forces came to play the role of a 'reserve power' that was called upon to restore 'order' whenever social conflict or the reformist policies of some presidents threatened to get out of hand, that is, the interests of the ruling elites. The Cold War also fostered frequent military interventions, backed by the US government, under the pretext of the fight against the spread of communism in the region.

In the 1980s, Latin American countries under military rule slowly began to reinstate their civilian governments. The end of the Cold War and the disrepute of military governments for the serious human rights violations committed under them opened up an advantageous opportunity for democracy that has lasted to this day.

None of the countries in the region has abandoned presidentialism. The introduction of constitutional mechanisms of parliamentarian origin (see below) is intended to foster more stable and smoother executive-legislative relations, but the ever-present presidential temptation to seize supreme power has not been eradicated, as witnessed by the persistent (and successful) attempts to sanction presidential re-election or by enacting new constitutions and constitutional amendments tailored to the political projects of a new generation of caudillos.

3. The Struggle against Colonialism and the Challenges of Development: Africa, the Middle East, and Asia (Twentieth Century)

At the end of the Second World War, the decolonization process in Africa, the Middle East, and Asia brought forth the establishment of new states and the re-emergence of old nations that had fallen under the dominion of Western powers. A new period of expansion of presidentialism began. Suddenly, the newly independent nations were facing some of the challenges and dilemmas that Latin American countries had had to address in the early nineteenth century: both the complex task of nation-building and the urgent demands of economic and social development called for clear, decisive, and legitimate political leadership. Not surprisingly, most of these countries ended up adopting the presidential form of government, notwithstanding the fact that during their colonial periods they had received strong parliamentarian imprints from the European powers that had ruled their territories (France, Great Britain, Belgium, the Netherlands). It is true that in the years after their independence, the new states kept the parliamentarian legacy of their colonial masters, a legacy whose adoption had even been a condition for independence. But this state of affairs was short-lived.

A good example in Africa was Ghana, which became independent in 1957 and adopted the British system of government, even with Queen Elizabeth II as titular head of state. However, in 1960, a constitution establishing a unitary, presidential state was passed. Between 1960 and 1962, 13 African states proclaimed new constitutions or amended the existing ones for the purpose of replacing parliamentarism with presidentialism; following the model President Nkrumah had introduced in Ghana. But like the Latin American experience, the new African presidential systems were soon transformed into personal autocracies, if not outright dictatorships, under the rule of a strong... man who frequently proclaimed himself president-for-life. Coups d'état by the armed forces were also a frequent consequence of power struggles.

In many countries, presidential supremacy was reinforced by various factors unique to the region and the historical moment. There was a conscious movement in Africa towards the suppression of multipartyism, seen as a divisive factor that weakened the new nations, and subsequently towards the concentration of power in the hands of one party and, ultimately, of one man. The adoption of various versions of socialism, including Marxist socialism, also contributed to strengthening authoritarian rule.23

In the 1980s and particularly in the 1990s, African countries did not escape the transformations that swept over other regions of the world in response to economic and social crises, and to the democratic demands of civil society backed by world public opinion. Multiparty systems were restored and market reforms introduced. Reluctantly and under intense pressure from the people, many of the strong men either had to resign their positions or submit to the judgment of voters, who did not hesitate to send them packing, thus giving way to a new phenomenon: the ‘retired African president’.24 A visible, institutional consequence of these democratic changes has been the inclusion of presidential term limits in more than 30 African constitutions (but many others still do not provide for them).

Despite the evident moderation of presidential absolutism in post-authoritarian Africa, presidential supremacy persists.25 The debate on the causes of such persistent oscillations between ‘cultural’ explanations, focused on the traditions and practices of African kingship, and ‘rationalist’ accounts, which point out that the pending tasks of national integration and socio-economic development, together with the lack of a liberal and parliamentarian background that can be traced back to the colonial era, still support the centrality of the state and (p. 638) of executive administration as vehicles for development. Undoubtedly, the still unfinished process of constitutional reform, particularly that pertaining to defining presidential powers and the relationship between the branches of government, also plays a significant role in maintaining alive the ‘imperial presidency’.

The history and evolution of presidential systems in several Middle Eastern countries (such as Egypt, Syria, Iraq), as well as in Asia (the Philippines, Indonesia, South Korea), are not much different from the post-colonial experiences in Latin America and Africa. The names of Mubarak in Egypt, Hussein in Iraq, Marcos in the Philippines, and Suharto in Indonesia suffice to evoke long periods of individual, despotic, and corrupt rule, which finally yielded to the pressures and demands of citizens and of world opinion. These advances notwithstanding, they should be viewed as constitutional systems in transition, particularly due to the fragility of their party systems.

4. The Compromise between Past and Present: The Former Soviet Union and the ex-Socialist Countries after 1989

Finally, the ‘third wave’ of democracy in the late 1980s and early 1990s brought a fourth wave of presidential constitutions in most of the former Soviet republics after the dissolution of the Soviet Union in 1991.

We should recall that in the Soviet model of government, all power was placed in the hands of the Supreme Soviet as the highest body of people’s representation. All other powers and functions derived from it and were subject to its control. In practice, however, the Politburo of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU) and its secretary general had complete control of the State apparatus in their hands.

Mikhail Gorbachev’s appointment as secretary general of the CPSU in 1985 marked the beginning of a reform process (known as glasnost, or openness, and perestroika, or restructuring), which, among others things, had the purpose of institutionalizing state functions by wresting them away from the monopoly the CPSU had over all public offices. Thus, between 1988 and 1990 Gorbachev prompted a series of amendments to the 1977 Brezhnev Constitution that were designed to establish a new executive power, the ‘President of the Soviet Union’, a position to which he was afterwards elected.

Prior to the attempted coup d’état that led to the dissolution of the Soviet Union in 1991, the constitutional amendments of March and December 1990 defined the president as an officer who was to be elected by direct popular vote (although not the first time) for a five-year term with the possibility of a second term. The president was both head of state and head of government, and he had the power to appoint a prime minister and a cabinet who were responsible to both him and the Congress of the People’s Deputies.26
The 1993 Constitution of the Russian Federation established a strong presidency, resembling a semi-presidential constitution in certain aspects, but it ultimately entrenches presidential supremacy. The president of the Russian Federation is elected by popular vote for a period of six years, and he cannot hold this position for more than two consecutive terms. The president appoints the prime minister as head of government with the consent of the Duma (parliament), and when proposed by the prime minister, he appoints and dismisses the rest of the cabinet of ministers. In case the Duma casts a vote of no confidence in the government, the president may dismiss the government or, alternatively, dissolve the Duma and call for new elections.

With the exception of the Baltic states of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia, the rest of the former Soviet republics in Europe and Central Asia (Armenia, Azerbaijan, Belarus, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Ukraine) have established presidential systems of government in which the president is both head of state and head of government, but under one of three basic modalities: first, the government is solely in the hands of the president; secondly, the president appoints a prime minister and a cabinet of ministers who are solely responsible towards him; and thirdly (as is the case in six of nine countries), the president appoints a prime minister and a cabinet that require the support of the national assembly, or must be nominated by the assembly.

However, in most of these republics, the lack of a democratic tradition and of an effective separation of powers has resulted in authoritarian and even dictatorial governments under the control of strong men who, in some cases, have held the presidency uninterruptedly since the dissolution of the Soviet Union. In this sense, we do not perceive any essential differences with respect to the trajectory of presidential systems in other regions of the world. For the same reason, a process towards a more democratic and balanced form of government may be expected in the future.

III. Debates

Even though we have described presidentialism as both a subspecies of modern democratic government and an alternative to parliamentarism, the debate remains as to whether, and to what extent, both institutional designs—presidentialism and democracy—are compatible with each other. In principle, presidentialism is related to those autocratic forms in which political power is concentrated at the summit of the pyramid of authority. If democracy evokes the ideal of a distribution of power legitimized from the bottom, then presidentialism would be incompatible with democracy. However, from our perspective, such incompatibility does not exist. Although the origins and trajectory of presidentialism are not necessarily democratic, and even if its institutional characteristics do encourage the concentration of power in the hands of the president, it is also true that, unlike other forms of monocratic government, presidentialism finds its legitimacy at the bottom of the pyramid of power by way of rules and legal institutions; it provides for the necessary and periodic renewal of political offices (the presidency in the first place); and it incorporates the principle of separation of powers, which is a legacy of political liberalism.

The elements we have just mentioned are, therefore, the main reason why presidentialism and democracy are compatible. Moreover, they display a tendency toward distributing and limiting power that moves presidentialism away from monocratic and autocratic forms of government. This is not to say that presidential systems may not be subject to decay; quite the opposite is true. They may more or less be easily turned into autocratic and absolutist systems, and consequently, into undemocratic and illiberal polities. As we have stated before, in such cases, we cannot speak of a presidential system in the proper sense, despite the fact that many political regimes will continue to apply this term to themselves (e.g. the ‘hereditary’ presidency or the ‘presidency-for-life’ that have existed in some Arab countries for several decades), and notwithstanding the fact that a democratic presidential government may have existed at the beginning of the process of decline. In our view, a presidential system ceases to exist because the institutional channels that allow for the periodic renewal of political legitimacy, including the separation of powers, no longer operate.

A second set of relevant issues are closely related to the one just discussed. Scholars of democracy have asked themselves whether a presidential system increases the risk of instability (p. 640) in democratic institutions and, consequently, of autocratic degradation. This debate finds itself at the very core of the democratic paradigm, that is, it purports to determine which institutional elements, whether presidential or parliamentary, enable democratic consolidation or, on the contrary, increase the risk of authoritarian rule.

Critics of presidentialism point out that: (1) presidential regimes are more fragile than parliamentary systems in times of political crisis; (2) presidentialism tends toward immobility, especially in situations of ‘divided government’, that is, the president does not have the support of a majority in Congress; (3) presidents may easily deceive themselves regarding the meaning of their public mandate in an election based on ‘the winner takes all’ principle; and (4) presidentialism often favors conditions in which improvised characters with little political experience and even fewer democratic convictions manage to get elected as presidents. Each of these statements needs to be considered separately.

The alleged weakness of presidential systems is mainly attributed to its inflexible terms of office. A fixed term of office for the president makes it more difficult to find institutional solutions to sudden political and economic crises. Thus, while presidential rule appears to enjoy considerable stability in comparison with the frequent turnover of prime ministers and cabinets in parliamentary systems, the truth is that it does not have the appropriate instruments successfully to face a political crisis. While parliamentary systems incorporate institutional mechanisms, such as votes of no confidence and anticipated elections, that offer an internal and democratic answer to a moment of political crisis, mechanisms that would allow for the anticipated renewal of the mandate or legitimacy of the government in exceptional circumstances are not available in presidential systems. Consequently, presidents are often compelled to declare a ‘state of emergency’ (witness the experience of many Latin American countries during most of the twentieth century), with all the risks and perils associated therewith, but they are just as often tempted to suspend or even terminate the democratic process through extra-institutional means. Impeachment and social unrest leading to the removal or resignation of the president before the end of his or her term has recently emerged as a possible outcome of political conflict in presidential systems (see below).

In our perspective, there is real cause for this concern. Certainly, the stability of a democratic system may be reinforced by institutional means geared towards a more flexible process of presidential succession or replacement (eg shorter terms of office, constitutional mechanisms for appointing temporary presidents, and the like). Nevertheless, parliamentarism seems definitely to have the upper hand in this respect.

The possibility of political paralysis in presidential systems is another recurring concern for scholars. Whereas parliamentary systems invariably operate on the basis of legislative majorities or coalitions that support the sitting government, in presidential systems so-called ‘divided’ or ‘minority’ governments are fairly common. A president who does not enjoy the support of a legislative majority to carry out his or her policies becomes politically and institutionally weakened as a result. In turn, governmental ineffectiveness, either because the president is politically unable to govern or because he or she chooses confrontation and conflict with the legislature, may endanger the stability of the system as a whole. For this reason, some scholars support the introduction of mechanisms designed to guarantee a legislative majority to the party of the president (‘majority clauses’, ‘legislative governability bonds’).

Once again, the risks associated with divided or minority governments in presidential systems are a real cause for concern. Political immobility will most certainly convey a sense of a loss of legitimacy in the eyes of citizens. A perceived or real, systematic obstruction of his or her policies by the legislature may easily induce the president to explore potentially authoritarian alternatives.

The possibility that presidents come to view their election as a manifestation of citizens’ consent detached from the mandate given to the legislature, and in effect losing sight of the relativity of political consensus, is nothing but yet another consequence of the two issues analyzed above. In fact, combined with fixed presidential terms of office, an election based on ‘the winner takes all’ principle may cause the winner to disregard the need to build alliances and coalitions with other political forces, even if the election was won by a narrow margin, a common occurrence in presidential systems. (A runoff election apparently addresses this problem, but it may only produce an ‘artificial’ majority in support of the winner, and not an absolute mandate.) The election of President Salvador Allende in Chile in 1970 is a good case in point. Allende received about 36 percent of the popular vote, and the Congress elected him as president only after Allende reached an agreement with the Christian Democratic Party. However, his left-wing political allies pressured Allende into behaving as if a majority of the Chilean people had actually chosen a Socialist transformation. Allende’s decisions were the cause of tremendous political tensions, in the end resulted in the tragic coup d’état led by General Augusto Pinochet in September 1973.

The adverse effects of this institutional flaw of presidential systems are compounded if the person elected president lacks political experience, is not familiar with traditional party politics, displays features of an authoritarian personality, or intends to establish a charismatic leadership. Although such concerns have an institutional basis and are born of historical experience (see Fujimori in Peru or Chávez in Venezuela), the danger of political leadership turning into a kind of ‘postmodern caudillismo’ that drags down all democratic institutions is not alien to parliamentary systems either (see Berlusconi in Italy). The problem of ‘delegative democracy’, then, is latent in both forms of government.

A useful institutional element to take into consideration, to the extent that it is present in some presidential constitutions, is federalism. Only a few of the existing presidential systems (the United States, some Latin American and African countries) have adopted a federal organization. Federalism implies a twofold separation of powers: a horizontal separation of the three traditional branches of power (the executive, legislative, and judicial branches), and a vertical separation between the various levels of government (commonly the national, state, or provincial, and local levels). In this context, federalism means that presidentialism, with all its flaws and virtues, is also reproduced at the level of the constitutive entities of the union: states or provinces elect governors and legislatures that follow the main features of the national presidential constitution. Thus, the federal organization may serve as an additional check to the power of the president of the republic, particularly if state governments are in the hands of a party other than the ruling party or parties at the national level. But these positive effects, reinforced by the liberal logic of the distribution of power, may be offset by adverse consequences, to the extent that national political leadership is weakened and instability becomes more likely.

Aside from the discussion on the dangers posed to democracy by presidential systems in comparison to parliamentarism, another broad vein of the debate focuses on the relative merits or deficiencies of both systems in terms of democratic governability. A few aspects of this debate have already been examined in the previous paragraphs, but some others are worth adding here, because, according to some scholars, they provide arguments favoring presidentialism over parliamentarism. Paradoxically, or only apparently so, if parliamentarism seems to be more favorable to the consolidation of democratic government from a certain perspective, presidentialism may provide a better anchor for governability. We may come to this conclusion by inverting the logic we used to analyze the rigidity of presidential mandates and cast a critical glance at the possibility of votes of no confidence and anticipated elections in parliamentary systems instead.

From this alternative vantage point, parliamentarism may generate conditions that are more favorable for political instability than presidentialism (Italy during the second half of the twentieth century is a good example in this respect). As we can see, the rigidity of presidential constitutions and the flexibility of parliamentary ones may both be viewed as factors that favor either the stability or instability, as the case may be, of a political system. The difference in judgment depends on the criterion applied in each case: democracy or governability. Thus, scholars apparently agree that parliamentarism can better secure democracy, but may lead to ungovernability. Presidentialism, by contrast, seems to be a better guarantor of a stable government, but tends to unsettle democratic institutions. Not surprisingly, and as a possible corollary of this consensus, the current debate no longer turns on the dilemma between parliamentarism and presidentialism. As far as presidentialism is concerned, scholars now prefer to examine the question of how to ‘make presidentialism work’ (or, at least, ‘work better’).

In order to stabilize presidentialism and prevent it from becoming an autocratic regime, it is necessary to increase the governing capabilities of the executive branch without unbalancing the democratic institutions. There are two possibilities in this direction: either the president's ability to influence legislative work is strengthened, or the ability of the members of the legislature to influence the operation of the government is reinforced. In other words: the dilemma now lies between strengthening the executive and increasing the power of parliament.

The first possibility may be accomplished by a wide array of measures: by strengthening the president's veto power on legislation passed by the legislature; by giving preference to the legislative bills introduced into the legislature by the president (any such bill must be passed or rejected within a peremptory time); by giving the president more powers to issue decrees with legislative force, or, ultimately, by reserving the power of introducing legislative bills to the president. The first type of measure is reactive, the rest are proactive. Conversely, the legislature can get involved in the appointment and removal of cabinet members; it can strengthen its powers to make the government accountable (periodic reports and appearances by cabinet members); or, more generally, its powers to shape public policy can be broadened.

Modulating these and similar alternatives define the more or less parliamentary character of presidentialism, and the more or less presidential character of parliamentarism, described as semi-presidentialism and semi-parliamentarism, respectively. In this context, other institutional factors, like party systems and electoral rules, may also play a relevant role. These are distinctive features of all democratic systems and they have a crucial impact on the governability of both presidential and parliamentary systems, as well as of their hybrid or intermediate forms. It is a complex issue that has been the object of much discussion by political scientists, and for this reason we only make a passing reference to it.

Finally, in trying to assess the accomplishments and failures of the various models of political organization—in terms of the level of their democratic engagement, their degree of governability and stability, and so on—besides the institutional factors we have already cited, scholars draw attention to environmental and contextual factors, such as the geographic dimension, the population and its associated variables, other economic and cultural factors, and so on. Since institutions operate within specific contexts, it is only reasonable to assess presidential systems within such contexts.

IV. Trends and Positions

We open this section by pointing out an intriguing trend in a considerable number of presidential systems from the 1990s onwards: the attempts to remove unpopular presidents, or presidents charged with corruption and other abuses, through impeachment proceedings before the legislature, as well as the fall of those presidents who saw themselves forced to leave office before the end of their terms as a consequence of popular and media pressure. This trend has been particularly visible in Latin America, if for no other reason than the prevalence of this form of government throughout the region. Between 1992 and 2005, no less than 12 Latin American presidents had to face impeachment proceedings, many of which were successful and resulted in their removal from office (eg Presidents Fernando Collor de Mello in Brazil in 1992 and Carlos Andrés Pérez in Venezuela in 1993), or else were not able to remain in office for their full term due to popular unrest (eg Argentinean President De la Rúa in 2001). However, the presidents of several countries in other regions of the world, such as the Philippines, Russia, Madagascar, Nigeria, or South Korea, have also recently faced serious impeachment challenges.

Interestingly and paradoxically enough, even in cases in which the president resigned or was removed from office, democracy did not break down and the crisis was somehow managed by peaceful and institutional means. Certainly, we may or may not qualify this trend as a new form of instability, but impeachment (and, to a certain extent, this is also true of street protests and media scrutiny) appears to be an effective check on executive power that is similar—a sort of functional equivalent—to, but more extreme than, a vote of no confidence in parliamentary systems. In fact, the main discernible trend of recent decades may be called the ‘parliamentarization’ of presidential systems, that is, the abandonment of ‘pure’ presidentialism and the adoption of mechanisms of parliamentary origins for the purpose of making executive-legislative relations more stable, flexible, and collaborative.

(p. 644) A few authors propose the denomination of ‘parliamentary-presidential system’ (also called ‘constrained parliamentarism’) to describe systems in which institutions of both subspecies of republican democratic government are combined, giving form to either ‘constrained’ presidentialism or to ‘constrained’ parliamentarism. In fact, there is also a reverse trend whenever institutions of a presidential origin are incorporated into parliamentary systems. In these cases, we refer to the ‘presidentialization of parliamentary systems’ (eg Italy after 1994 or Israel, where the prime minister was directly elected by popular vote from 1992 until 2001).

The trend toward the parliamentarization of presidential systems implies that, despite the introduction of institutions and mechanisms of parliamentary control, the basic structure of the receiving presidential constitution is preserved. A more balanced interplay of the branches of government is intended, in turn, to foster greater stability in the constitutional system as a whole, without fully abandoning presidentialism. Typically, parliamentarization carries adjustments and changes in the following strategic areas: (1) the election of the head of government and the appointment of his or her cabinet; (2) the procedures for the exercise of power; (3) the term of office of the head of government; (4) the system of responsibilities; and (5) the relationship between chief of state and head of government. This reaffirms the idea that the separation of powers is a central element for characterizing presidential systems and their alternatives.

The trend towards parliamentarization implies broadening the legislature's capacity to control the executive. This,
The reason why constitution-makers do not simply adopt a full parliamentary system from the beginning is practice many nominal semi-presidential constitutions operate as parliamentary systems (e.g., Finland or Portugal). In the latter case, a relationship of shared political responsibility between the legislature and the government is established beyond mere parliamentary control.

With respect to African countries, most constitutions also tend towards a 'hybrid' or mixed model of institutional designs seeking a better balance of power. In Francophone and Lusophone Africa, this has been mainly accomplished by reinstating the prime minister. In Anglophone countries that have adopted a hybrid form, such as Zambia, Uganda, and Ghana, a nationally elected president typically rules with a cabinet of ministers, all (or at least a majority) of whom have been selected from among the members of the legislature.

Another sphere in which the parliamentarization of presidential systems may be observed is in the operational dynamics of executive-legislative relations. It concerns, for example, the rules governing the attendance of members of the government in the legislative chambers. Such appearance is called for whenever the laws vests them with the power to attend or participate in parliamentary sessions; whenever they are obliged to be periodically present at those sessions, or whenever, by contrast, the legislature is the body empowered to compel their attendance.

The great majority of democratic presidential constitutions provide for the power of the legislature to call for the ministers to appear before it. In some systems, ministers have the possibility of making use of the legislative rostrum (in Latin America, this is a possibility in Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Peru, and Venezuela). In others, they may appear only before legislative committees. In any case, the purpose is to transfer control over the executive to the legislative seat.

Some of these controls are soft (e.g., interpellation or parliamentary questions). Others are hard (this is the case of the vote of no confidence). Interpellations and questions represent a soft form of control that may be expressed in written form, or directly (orally) in the parliamentary seat. Their essential purpose is to keep open channels of communication, as well as information exchanges between the parliament and the government. The vote of no confidence is a hard type of control (widely instituted in Latin American constitutions: e.g., in Argentina, Colombia, Costa Rica, Ecuador, El Salvador, Guatemala, Panamá, Paraguay, Peru, Uruguay, and Venezuela) that translates into the censure of a minister or of the cabinet as a whole.

This latter hypothesis—the censure of the government by the legislature—may result in the removal of one or more ministers, or even the dismissal of the prime minister, but, in contrast to parliamentary systems, not of the president himself as the head of government. For the same reason, constitutions that give the president the power to dissolve the congress (e.g., as in Ecuador, Peru, Uruguay, Venezuela, and the Russian Federation) place in his or her hands an excessive power that may reinforce the authoritarian tendencies of presidentialism, especially where presidents continuously seek plebiscitary legitimacy.

Taking the dilemmas and debates described in the previous section into account and following the logic of democracy, we approve of parliamentary controls over the executive within a context of separation and balance of powers, and in contrast reject potentially authoritarian measures, such as the dissolution of the legislature by the president.

Another visible trend in recent decades has been the proliferation of constitutions establishing systems of government that can be categorized as 'semi-presidential'. According to one distinguished scholar, semi-presidential constitutions today represent about a quarter of democratic systems in the world. In terms of 'parliamentarized' presidential systems, semi-presidential constitutions go a step further on the road towards full parliamentarism. Not surprisingly and beyond the definitional problems posed by this form of government, in practice many nominal semi-presidential constitutions operate as parliamentary systems (e.g., Finland or Portugal). The reason why constitution-makers do not simply adopt a full parliamentary system from the beginning is apparently the belief that a popularly elected president may serve as an adjudicator of political conflicts and ultimately a leader who is not subject to the whims of a majority and, therefore, an effective check on the power of parliament.\textsuperscript{45}

Observing available models in comparative perspective, we find the 1958 French Constitution emblematic. It is an institutional arrangement that is not easy to categorize within the distinction between parliamentarism and presidentialism, since it operates with the dominance of one or the other model, depending on the specific political constellation. This ambiguity lies at the heart of the tensions among its creators—along with a strong undercurrent of presidentialist tendencies promoted by General de Gaulle—which were finally resolved by means of the following principles: (1) universal suffrage as the source of legitimacy for both the executive and legislative powers; (2) the separation of powers; and (3) the government's accountability to parliament. To these principles, the distinction between head of state (p. 646) (president of the republic) and head of government (prime minister) was added. Thus were the foundations laid for a model that allows for periods in which the system emphasizes its presidentialist features (when the president's party has a majority in the legislature and, consequently, control over government), and periods in which the system operates under parliamentarian premises (in times of 	extit{cohabitation}, which Duverger defines as a ‘state in which a president of the Republic coexists with a parliamentary majority of a different political orientation’).\textsuperscript{46}

This flexible scheme—which allows for alternations between a system with strong presidentialist features and another with parliamentary tendencies—is made possible by a constitutional design that combines elements of both forms of government, as well as concrete devices (such as the distinction between head of state and head of government; the incompatibility of exercising a parliamentary role in a cabinet position; the vote of no confidence over the government, and holding of legislative elections after the presidential election) that integrate the institutional elements with the political vicissitudes of the day. Under particular circumstances, the president and the prime minister find themselves in a situation of political rivalry that triggers the existing institutional checks, thus weakening the presidentialist features of the model; at other moments, the president may have a parliamentary majority effectively situating him above the head of government.

We have made reference to the 1958 French Constitution (including its later amendments) because it exemplifies a hybrid formula between presidentialism and parliamentarism that, under a flexible and dynamic design, has achieved a balanced combination of stability and governability. It embodies the tension that in practice can be observed between the parliamentary and the presidential poles. The dominance of one or the other depends on the particular correlation between the political forces of the day.

\textbf{V. Comparative Perspective and Recapitulation}

In previous sections we have presented a brief overview of presidentialism, its evolution and development, its problems and transformations. We now close this chapter with a broad summary and a few general conclusions.

In 1949, Professor Karl Loewenstein, in his classic essay on ‘The Presidency Outside the United States’, wrote the following:

\begin{quote}
The economic and technological prestige of the United States is not equaled by the popularity of its form of government. In this period of hectic political reconstruction remarkably few among the nations seem inclined to follow the constitutional pattern commonly spoken of as presidentialism under the separation of powers. While its suitability for this country is conceded, the adoption of either this pattern as a whole, or of its most distinguishing feature, presidential leadership, is generally considered abroad to be at variance with the national environment. This is not surprising, in view of the fact that in the past the transplantation of the American model was likewise the exception and that in its primary area of adoption, Latin American it rarely if ever produced lasting political stability.\textsuperscript{47}
\end{quote}

In light of the constitutional developments of the following decades, Professor Loewenstein turned out to be both right and wrong. Wrong, because after the end of the Second World (p. 647) War, a good number of newly independent countries, especially in Africa and Asia, adopted some form or another of presidentialism. A new wave of presidential constitutions also emerged after the collapse of the Soviet Union and its allies. Even in its ‘primary area of adoption’, some of the Latin American countries that had been experimenting with parliamentary mechanisms returned to the fold of the presidential form of government (in 1993, the Brazilian people voted to keep a republican and presidential form of government, rejecting both the monarchy and parliamentarism). So, at present, over 75 countries (most of them in Latin America and Africa) have a presidential system of government, and to these we should perhaps add a significant number of nations that have established a semi-presidential constitution.

But Professor Loewenstein was correct in the sense that some of the central features of American presidentialism, as adopted by other countries, ‘are at variance with the national environment’. Undoubtedly, the history and development of the presidential system in the United States has been completely different from its evolution and functions in other regions of the world, where it has assumed particular modalities and variations that preclude speaking of a single, ‘pure’ model of presidential government.

Countries that have instituted a presidential system reveal great diversity in terms of territorial expanse, history and culture, levels of economic and political development etc., but all of them seem to share a common and deliberate reason for adopting presidentialism: the need to build strong and decisive political leadership, capable of guaranteeing the defense of national independence and sovereignty, and, at the same time, carry out the tasks of economic development and social integration. With this in mind, presidentialism appears to be better equipped than other systems of government for successfully facing these challenges.

However, the same capacities that make presidentialism attractive hide the ever-present temptation of presidential supremacy over the other branches of government, especially in countries lacking a democratic tradition and the means effectively to check presidential power. At the extreme, presidential supremacy may give way to dictatorial and corrupt governments, which increases the likelihood of coups d’état and violent regime changes. A recurring cycle of instability and authoritarian government ensues, until the prevailing political conditions make a democratic transformation both necessary and possible. Democratization, in turn, translates into changes and adjustments to the existing regime, not only for the purpose of an enhanced balance of powers but, more importantly, for the sake of a more stable, flexible, and cooperative system of government. A few instruments deemed suitable in this respect can be found in parliamentary systems, and their adoption by presidential constitutions (‘parliamentarization of presidentialism’) has even led to the creation of hybrid or mixed systems, such as semi-presidentialism.

The above considerations summarize, to a great extent, almost two centuries of experience in Latin America with presidentialism, and this experience can serve as a valuable reference point for countries in other regions that want to transform their presidential constitutions in a democratic direction. To be sure, Latin American countries have not solved many of the problems associated with their systems of government, but they have come a long way in the process of institutional reform.

Finally, we have said that presidentialism is compatible with democratic government, but we have equally asserted that their mutual relationship is fraught with considerable complexities and difficulties. Herein lies perhaps the source of relentless dynamism and the transformational capabilities of presidential government. And this is also the reason why this chapter can at most offer an incomplete snapshot of presidentialism in the contemporary world.

Bibliography

Bibliography

Andrew Ellis, J. Jesús Orozco Henríquez, and Daniel Zovatto (eds), Cómo hacer que funcione el sistema presidencial/Making Presidentialism Work (2009)

Kathryn Hochstetler, ‘Rethinking Presidentialism: Challenges and Presidential Falls in South America’ (2006) 38(4) Comparative Politics 401

Juan Linz and Arturo Valenzuela (eds), The Failure of Presidential Democracy (1994)

Presidentialism

2003)

Charles, McIlwain

Presidentialism in the Southern African States and Constitutional Restraint on Presidential Power

Dieter Nohlen and Mario Fernández (eds), Presidencialismo versus Parlamentarismo (1991)

Matthew Soberg Shugart and John M. Carey, Presidents and Assemblies (1992)

Roger Southall and Henning Melber (eds), Legacies of Power. Leadership Change and Former Presidents in African Politics (2006), available at (http://www.hsrcpress.ac.za)

Alfred Stepan and Cindy Skach, ‘Presidentialism and Parliamentarism Compared’ in Juan Linz and Arturo Valenzuela (eds), The Failure of Presidential Democracy (1994)

Michel Troper, La séparation des pouvoirs et l’histoire constitutionnelle française (1973)

Diego Valadés, ‘El presidencialismo latinoamericano en el siglo XIX’ (1982) XVI(44) Boletín Mexicano de Derecho Comparado 613

Diego Valadés, El gobierno de gabinete (2nd edn, 2005)

Diego Valadés, La parlamentarización de los sistemas presidenciales (2nd edn, 2008)

Salvador Valencia Carmona, El poder ejecutivo latinoamericano (1979)

Notes:

(5) Weber (n 4).

(7) Kelsen (n 3).

(8) Bobbio (n 6).

(12) Linz (n 4).

(16) On political parties, see Chapter 41.

(23) Tordoff (n 22).

(27) Scott Mainwaring and Matthew Soberg Shugart, Presidentialism and Democracy in Latin America (1997); Linz and Valenzuela (n 4).

(31) Linz (n 4). See further Chapter 27.

(32) Sartori (n 10).

(35) Linz (n 4).

(39) Ibid.

(40) Valdés (n 20).

(42) Valdés (n 20).

(43) Prempeh (n 22).

(44) Cheibub (n 33).

(45) Ibid.

(47) Loewenstein (n 28).

Héctor Fix-Fierro
Héctor Fix-Fierro is Senior Researcher, Instituto de Investigaciones Jurídicas, Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México (UNAM)

Pedro Salazar-Ugarte
Pedro Salazar-Ugarte is Senior Researcher, Instituto de Investigaciones Jurídicas, Universidad Nacional Autónoma de México (UNAM)
Abstract and Keywords

This article begins with a discussion of the British model of parliamentarism. It then discusses continental Europe's original version of parliamentarism; how a common consent was finally reached on the meaning of 'parliamentarism'; the waves of democratization and the worldwide diffusion of the parliamentary system; forms of government and separation of powers; the status of member of parliament; differences and analogies within the family of parliamentary systems; and whether parliamentarism is declining.

Keywords: parliamentary system, Britain, continental Europe, democratization, forms of government, separation of powers, member of parliament

I. The British Origins 650

II. Continental Europe's Original Version 653

III. How a Common Consent was Finally Reached on the Meaning of 'Parliamentarism' 654

IV. The Waves of Democratization and the Worldwide Diffusion of the Parliamentary System 656

V. Forms of Government and Separation of Powers 657

VI. The Status of Member of Parliament 660

VII. Differences and Analogies within the Family of Parliamentary Systems 663

1. Making and Unmaking Governments 663

2. Legislative Function 665

3. Controlling Functions 667

VIII. Is Parliamentarism Declining? 668

I. The British Origins

A classical statement of the model of parliamentarism as it had developed in the United Kingdom was given in 1858:

It is a distinguishing characteristic of Parliamentary Government that it requires the powers belonging to the Crown to be exercised through Ministers, who are held responsible for the manner in which they are used ... and who are considered entitled to hold their office only while they possess the confidence of Parliament, and more especially the House of Commons.¹

The long history of parliament in the United Kingdom may be said to have begun in 1265, when representatives of the cities and boroughs in England were summoned to join the feudal nobles, bishops, and knights of the counties in a gathering derived from the Curia Regis.² By the sixteenth century, the bicameral structure of Parliament was already established, and the two chambers of Lords and Commons authorized taxation, appropriated revenue to the use of the Crown, made new laws (eg creating the Church of England when Henry VIII broke from the Pope), and expressed the grievances of the people. During the seventeenth century, the struggle... between Crown and Parliament involved the execution of one king, a bitter civil war, a period of republican government under Cromwell, restoration of the monarchy, and the removal of another king in the Glorious Revolution of 1688–89. The Bill of Rights 1689 left executive power with the monarch, but imposed conditions upon exercise of that power to protect the interests of Parliament. Those conditions, and the emergence of the office of Prime Minister from 1723, required the king to ensure that his ministers were supported by the two Houses of Parliament, in particular by the House of Commons which had the exclusive privilege of funding the policies of the government that were conducted in the name of the monarch. The continuing development of responsible as well as representative government was affected by reform of the electoral system from 1832 and by evolution of the party system. It became a firm convention of the unwritten constitution that ministers of the Crown were chosen by the Prime Minister but must command the confidence of the elected House, failing which the Prime Minister must either resign or advise the monarch to dissolve Parliament to enable a general election to be held.

The essence of parliamentarism in modern constitutions is that executive power is exercised by the Prime Minister and other ministers, who have the confidence of the legislature; if this confidence is withdrawn, the Prime Minister loses authority to govern and must either advise the head of state (monarch or president) that a general election be held, or must resign so that a different government can be formed. In the latter event, if a different government can be formed that has the support of a majority in parliament it will enter into office; if not, a general election must be held. The British model of parliamentarism emphasizes that (1) ministers must be Members of Parliament (mainly in the elected house, although in Britain a few ministers may sit in the House of Lords and may be granted peerages for this purpose); (2) ministers must account to Parliament for their policies and decisions, and are thus ultimately accountable to the electorate.3

The general features of parliamentary government are found in many countries today, but variants from the British model are also found.

(1) In some countries, Members of Parliament (MPs) who become ministers are required to give up that membership; the constitution or other law may provide for the election or appointment of a substitute member, and (possibly) for the original member to return to Parliament when he or she ceases to be a minister.

(2) In Britain, the decision that a government has lost the confidence of the Commons does not require that a motion to this effect has been adopted; a similar result will follow if a government motion seeking the confidence of the House fails, and possibly if the government is defeated on other essential issues—for example on a budget resolution or on a bill that the government insists is essential to its programme. In other countries, the constitution may specify the form of decision required if the government is to be held to have lost the confidence of the assembly.

(3) In the United Kingdom, following the appointment of a new government, ministers may take up their duties at once and no decision in Parliament is needed to confirm that the government is supported by a majority; if that support is in doubt, an opportunity for a vote on the matter may be provided or will in any event arise in relation to the government's proposed programme. In other countries, a formal resolution in parliament may be required before a new government is confirmed in office.

(4) While in the United Kingdom a general election must be held after five years from the previous election, an earlier election may be held at a date chosen by the Prime Minister. Whenever an election is held, the new Parliament may serve for the full five years. In some countries where the constitution provides for a fixed-term parliament, it may also provide that an early election does not affect the regular cycle of elections, thus creating a strong disincentive to hold an early election.

Some other underlying points may be noted.

(A) Since the United Kingdom has no written constitution, the parliamentary system is founded upon “constitutional conventions”—customary practices affecting government, Parliament, and the political parties that have developed during the history outlined above. Disputes as to whether a convention has been observed are in principle outside the jurisdiction of the courts. Where a constitution contains the essential rules of the parliamentary system, it may also specify the circumstances in which the ministers are deemed to have lost the confidence of the legislature, and also such matters as the procedure to be followed while a new government is formed. In these cases the supreme court or a constitutional court may have jurisdiction to decide disputes on these matters, but in practice...
Parliamentarism

the court may avoid deciding questions that are essentially political in character.

(B) For the same reason that there is no written constitution, the British model of parliamentarism is linked with the legal doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty: in its classical formulation, as expressed by Dicey, there are no legal limits upon the laws that may be enacted by Parliament and there is no judicial review of Acts of Parliament. We must emphasize that there is no necessary connection between parliamentarism and parliamentary sovereignty. As mentioned in the previous paragraph, constitutions that are founded on parliamentarism often provide for judicial review of legislation and a special procedure for constitutional amendment.

(C) Under parliamentarism, the ministers who form the government are themselves able to exercise executive powers (whether acting in their own name or in the name of the head of state in whom powers are vested de iure) and are accountable to parliament for use of these powers. Thus, there is no formal separation between legislative and executive powers, a matter that is of some importance from the standpoint of constitutional theory. It does not, however, follow that the legislative and executive powers may be said to be ‘fused’, a claim that was central to Bagehot's analysis of the British constitution. Nor is it correct to regard the ministers who form the cabinet as being a committee of the legislature. One reason for this may be found in John Stuart Mill's emphasis on the practical significance of parliamentarism:

There is a radical difference between controlling the business of government, and actually doing it. ... It is one question, therefore, what a popular assembly should control, another what it should itself do. ... Instead of the function of governing, for which it is radically unfit, (p. 653) the proper office of a representative assembly is to watch and control the government; to throw the light of publicity on its acts ... and, if the men who compose the government abuse their trust, ... to expel them from office, and either expressly or virtually appoint their successors.5

We now turn to consider the question of whether aspects of parliamentarism are found in other constitutions.

II. Continental Europe’s Original Version

While in the United Kingdom the parliamentary system was established and developed mainly through constitutional conventions, in other democratic countries in Europe it was based from the beginning on written constitutional provisions, albeit that these afforded only a general framework for the development of conventional relationships among governmental institutions. These relationships, together with parliamentary regulations, electoral laws, and the structure of the political system, play everywhere a major role in shaping the parliamentary model.

Before we address its main institutional mechanisms, it is worth recalling that in France, and in the rest of continental Europe, ‘parliamentarism’ was originally identified with democracy, being intended more as a principle of legitimacy for the exertion of public power than as a form of government. Such connection with democracy resulted from the reaction against absolutism. While under the ancien régime the monarch's legitimacy relied on the unchallenged tradition of the absolutist state, according to the revolutionary ideal of 1789 parliament's legitimacy derived from the people that it represented. But, although opposed to each other on the ground of their content, both these principles of legitimacy corresponded to an absolute conception of sovereignty: parliament was put at the top of the institutional machinery under the new democratic system, as the king had been under the ancien régime.

No other authority, be it the executive or the judiciary, could thus bind parliament, nor could any other act override legislation. Reflecting the political philosophy of the Enlightenment, the 1789 Déclaration des droits de l’Homme et du Citoyen presumed that legislation was per se aimed at pursuing the public good, both because it expressed the volonté générale, and because it was expected to consist of general and abstract rules. The authors of the Déclaration, as well as of the constitutional texts of the Revolution epoch, were driven by the presumption that legislation would ensure the best protection to citizens’ rights, rather than by the suspicion that it might infringe them. Nor was the separation of powers, solemnly affirmed in Article 16 (stating that ‘Any society in which the guarantee of rights is not secure or the separation of powers is not determined has no constitution at all’), interpreted in the sense that powers were put on an equal footing. Given the premise of parliamentary supremacy, judges were intended to act as ‘bouches de la loi’, and the executive’s functions were the same with respect to the parliamentary will.
Parliamentarism

The fact that, at that time, and throughout the nineteenth century, parliamentarism was understood to mean parliament's supremacy over the other powers, needs to be distinguished from developments in constitutional history. Under the German Empire, and to a certain extent under the Italian Kingdom and in France, the prevailing form of government was one of constitutional monarchy. It was grounded on the separation of powers between parliament (p. 654) and the monarch, due to the compromise that the latter, heir to absolutism, was forced to accept with the former. In chairing the cabinet, and directing the whole government through a prime minister responding to his own will, the monarch was head of the executive. Parliament, in turn, would legislate on matters concerning liberty and property.

Exceptions to the separation of powers arose from the possibility of impeaching ministers for illegal acts, and this sometimes functioned as an indirect way of ascertaining whether the cabinet still had the confidence of the parliamentary majority. On the other hand, the monarch was entitled to participate in the legislative process through giving the royal assent, and, first and foremost, he had the power to dissolve the assembly at his discretion, namely whenever he reputed that the parliament was acting contrary to the state's interests. This institutional setting was intrinsically unstable, being strongly affected by conflicts concerning the very constitutional foundations of the state. In spite of their increasing popular legitimacy due to the progressive extension of the franchise, the assemblies were in fact threatened by the monarch's claim to represent the continuity of the state beyond the contingent parliamentary majorities.

It was only under the Third Republic in France (1875–1940) that a parliamentary system was established in continental Europe. Notwithstanding the Constitution's attempts to balance the assembly's power of designating the cabinet with the power of the president of the republic to dissolve the assembly whenever a parliamentary majority failed to be reached, in practice the power to dissolve was never exercised, with the consequence that the legislative branch gained an effective supremacy over the executive. A tradition républicaine recovering the ideals of 1789 was thus formed. However, given the scarce solidity of parliamentary majorities, governments were frequently forced to resign: it was as if democracy could flourish at the cost of a permanent instability in government. Parliamentarism, in the specific form of 'gouvernement d'assemblée' practised under the Third Republic, thus revealed a gap between its democratic legitimacy and the capacity for decision-making that it sought to ensure. It was an extreme form of parliamentarism that has an unhappy record.6

III. How a Common Consent was Finally Reached on the Meaning of 'Parliamentarism'

At the same time, a different version of parliamentarism demonstrated that the system was not per se condemned to governmental instability. Depicted in terms of ‘the close union, the nearly complete fusion, of the executive and legislative powers’,7 the British version was grounded on the relationship between those powers, namely the confidence that the executive received from the legislature, whichever might prevail over the other in the exertion of political power.

Once the old suspicion towards the executive was left behind, both constitutional scholarship and the political elites of European countries gave attention to the already consolidated, and allegedly successful, British version, albeit in the awareness that its conventional sources were due to specific historical circumstances. The issue of parliamentarism thus shifted from an ideological to a technical dimension, that consisted of discovering how the same result might be achieved in the absence of such circumstances. This is the reason why most European (p. 655) constitutions enacted throughout the twentieth century not only provide that the government's staying in office depends on its maintaining the confidence of parliament, but also afford institutional devices and procedures, conceived as alternative means to the British conventions.

Such attempt to ensure stability for governmental action, already afforded in the Constitutions of Weimar (1919), Austria (1920), Czechoslovakia (1920), Poland (1921), and Spain (1931), was called ‘rationalisation du régime parlementaire’ by Boris Mirkine-Guétzevitch8. But these constitutions were overwhelmed with the rise of the Nazi or of fascist regimes.

Parliamentarism as such was then under attack, on theoretical not less than on political grounds. According to Carl Schmitt, parliamentarism was connected with the nineteenth century's liberalism rather than with democracy,9 since its claim to legitimacy consisted in truth-seeking through discussion and openness, which might however be pursued even by a small group of disinterested persons. Democracy, to the contrary, required ‘an identity between law and the people's will, presupposing the maintenance of national homogeneity at the expenses of the outsiders, and, on the other hand, the superiority of a dictator's acclamation over the secret ballot for electing the MPs. Contrary to those of Mrkine, Schmitt's assumptions went far beyond a technical criticism of parliamentarism, and anticipated in many respects the Nazi regime's ideology.

After the Second World War, the model of rationalized parliamentarism was again introduced in a series of European constitutions. It may consist inter alia in establishing a certain quota of MPs for the proposal of a no confidence vote and in delaying the parliamentary debate on such a proposal in order to avoid a sudden withdrawal of support for the government (eg the 1948 Italian Constitution), or, according to the German Basic Law (1949) and the Spanish Constitution (1978), in binding the supporters of such a motion to propose at the same time the election of a new premier on the basis of an alternative majority ('constructive motion of no confidence').

Furthermore, while maintaining the position of head of the state, be it the president of the republic or the monarch, these constitutions generally do not designate him or her as head of the executive. Accordingly, provided that a definite parliamentary majority exists, the powers of appointing the prime minister and of dissolving parliament are exercised only as a formal matter by the head of the state. These powers, apart from the case of constructive motion of no confidence, might acquire a substantial meaning only in the face of a government crisis the solution of which appears uncertain. The role of the head of the state in managing these situations is not merely discretionary. Being driven by the aim of restoring a parliamentary majority, it is essentially an arbitral rather than a political role. Even in this respect, European constitutions broadly follow the British model, in particular the transformation in the monarch's functions since the advent of the parliamentary system.

Contrary to the failures encountered in the first half of the twentieth century, in the last decades the model outlined above succeeded in reconciling governmental stability with democracy, with the exceptions of the Fourth French Republic and of Italy. That success depended to a large extent on the changed historical context, given the apprehension of the evils of totalitarianism and the democratic commitment of major national parties, together with electoral laws that corrected purely proportional representation with a view to enhancing competition for government among two main political parties or coalitions. Constitutional provisions alone, as we have already seen, afford no more than the general framework of a certain form of government.

This account matches the conclusion reached by Armel Le Divellec:

The ‘family’ of parliamentary regimes is diverse yet united. It brings together governments emanating from a democratically elected parliamentary majority, and unable to work except in accordance with it.

Dissimilarities arise in relation to the law, which in most European countries differs from the British model. In other words, the fact that, ‘In the British version of democracy we rely mainly upon an elected House of Parliament to check, control, and call to account those who exercise the executive power’, and that ‘The doctrine of ministerial responsibility is an essential feature of the arrangements which exist for these purposes’, is common to most European countries, with the difference that the rules capturing the substance of parliamentarism, together with the devices already mentioned that aim at ensuring governmental stability, are there generally provided for in constitutional texts.

Far more significant diversities lie outside the mechanisms of parliamentary government. Unlike the British model, most European constitutions are not only rigid, but have introduced judicial review of legislation, a federal or regional structure, and, frequently, a referendum, with the effect that the machinery of government and even the very functioning of democracy, appear more complex than in the United Kingdom. These elements were introduced with a view to limiting the possible tyranny of parliamentary majorities, and, at the same time, to guarding against the excesses of a purely representative democracy, which had revealed its fragility with the advent of totalitarian regimes. But they were not believed to counteract the already mentioned devices aimed at ensuring the good functioning of parliamentarism, and therefore at achieving with partially different means the same results of parliamentarism as in the United Kingdom.

Bruce Ackerman has labelled the continental model as ‘constrained parliamentarism’, and distinguished it from that of Westminster on the ground that ‘no single institution is granted a monopoly over lawmaking power’. The notion of ‘constrained parliamentarism’ presupposes that ‘parliamentarism’ is per se ‘unconstrained’, namely sovereign in the Diceyan sense. Such presumption leaves on one side the essential meaning of parliamentarism as the mechanism through which the executive is able to stay in office through the consent of a democratically elected parliamentary majority. As we have already seen (Section I above), this meaning of parliamentarism is not necessarily connected with parliamentary sovereignty, and it appears not only more respectful of the historical background. It also serves, as we will see, to distinguish the parliamentary system from other forms of government.

IV. The Waves of Democratization and the Worldwide Diffusion of the Parliamentary System

We must add that the recent waves of democratization have gradually engendered a worldwide expansion of parliamentarism. The new democratic states that followed the dissolution of European colonial empires, in particular those that achieved independence of British rule, whether before or after the Second World War (including Australia, Canada, New Zealand, and India, as well as states in Africa and the Caribbean) were mostly established through a written constitution that provided for the parliamentary form of government. A similar phenomenon occurred later in Eastern Europe with the collapse of Communism, and in South Africa with the end of apartheid.

Nonetheless, in Africa, in Asia, in Latin America, and even in Eastern Europe, a significant number of young democracies have adopted the semi-presidential or the presidential model. Some of these should be classified as ‘illiberal democracies’, given the unchecked violations of fundamental rights that occur and the scarce respect for the rule of law. But the number of fully democratic regimes adopting semi-presidential or presidential systems suffices to demonstrate that democracy is no longer to be identified with parliamentarism, as was sustained even by Hans Kelsen, the most important theorist of democracy in continental Europe. Rather than on the ground of their capability in ensuring democracy, these systems of government differ in terms of the relationship between public powers, and of their respective legitimacy.

V. Forms of Government and Separation of Powers

Contrary to parliamentarism, presidentialism is grounded on the separation between the legislative and the executive branches, each of which is occupied by a popularly elected authority. Accordingly, the executive's term of office is directly established by the constitution and the executive does not depend on the confidence of the legislature for staying in office. It is true that the legislature (“Congress” under the US Constitution) might remove the President by means of impeachment. But such possibility is very different from the power of a parliament to withdraw its confidence from a prime minister or from the whole government.

Conversely, the absence of a parliamentary majority to sustain the government in office does not mean that parliament is subject to dissolution. Given the separation, no impartial authority is needed to oversee the relationship between legislature and executive, and the president holds the office of head of the state together with that of chief of the executive; he or she has the power to appoint and dismiss ministers without the need for parliamentary approval (except that under the US Constitution, the appointment of key officials takes place with the advice and consent of the Senate). The presidential form of government differs therefore from the parliamentary, both because of the concurrent popular legitimacy of the legislative and executive branches, and because of the separation between them.

The semi-presidential model combines a popularly elected fixed-term president with a prime minister and a cabinet who are responsible to the legislature; this brings together the presidential system's type of legitimacy with the relationship among political institutions that characterizes the parliamentary system. This means that the term ‘semi-presidential’ fails to give an accurate account of the basis of the model, but despite scholarly criticism, it is still widely adopted due to the lack of consensus over an alternative formula.

In examining the costs and benefits of the parliamentary system vis-à-vis the presidential and the semi-presidential, attention should first be given to their respective basic structure. To the extent that it is grounded on a single popularly elected authority, the former tends not only to avoid conflict between political institutions, but also to concentrate power in the hands of one political authority, be it parliament or government. The opposite is true for the latter, given the concurrent popular legitimacy that characterizes these systems.

A caveat should, however, be added. ‘Conflict’ and ‘concentration of power’ are not necessarily an evil. Provided that it does not threaten the system's stability, conflict might ensure pluralism, thus enhancing democracy. And concentration of power might enhance the accountability of the rulers as well as the efficiency of the political process, and it should not be seen as paving the way to absolutism as far as the functions of non-majoritarian authorities, and of courts in particular, are respected. To some extent, then, both conflict and concentration of power are likely to pursue objectives that are compatible with constitutional democracy. The diverse objectives that these forms of government are respectively likely to achieve appear to be sufficiently balanced on normative grounds.

In discussing the merits and demerits of parliamentarism and presidentialism, James Bryce observed that the former is calculated to secure swiftness in decision and vigour in action, and enables the Cabinet to press through such legislation as it thinks needed, and to conduct both domestic administration and foreign policy with the confidence that its majority will support it against the attacks of the Opposition. To these merits there is to be added the concentration of Responsibility. For any faults committed the Legislature can blame the Cabinet, and the people can blame both the Cabinet and the majority.

On the other hand, presidentialism, "by dividing power between several distinct authorities ... provides more carefully than does the Parliamentary [system] against errors on the part either of Legislature or Executive, and retards the decision by the people of conflicts arising between them."16

In descriptive terms, however, the above account gives only a preliminary idea of the costs and benefits of the diverse institutional models, and should be complemented with the analysis of their effective functioning, and of further structural features affecting contemporary democracies.

As for their functioning, conflicts arising from the concurrent popular legitimacy of the legislature and of government are differently managed according to various factors, among which are the structural differences between the presidential and semi-presidential systems, and the role of political parties. In the United States, given the separation of powers, the legislature is likely to paralyse the executive's political agenda to the extent that the party that does not occupy the White House may possess a majority in either or both houses of Congress. Nonetheless, party discipline in Congress may be sufficiently loose to give the President some chance of obtaining the support of single representatives from the party opposing his policy and thus limiting the existence of complete gridlock. Hence, it may be that an apparent political stalemate does not reach the point of threatening the system's stability.

Such a result is hardly imaginable in Europe, because of a traditionally far stricter party discipline in the assemblies. This is perhaps the most important reason why the presidential system has never been adopted there. Even the semi-presidential model's functioning usually resembles that of the parliamentary model, to the extent that previous agreements among parties and/or the country's tradition have created constitutional conventions that deprive the President of significant political power, in spite of his being popularly elected (see inter alia Austria, Portugal, and Finland). The same happens under the Fifth Republic in France, (p. 659) whenever the presidential majority diverges from the parliamentary, thus bringing in a state of cohabitation between the two institutions. But where these majorities coincide, the President holds together the constitutional powers of head of the state with those of chief of the executive, resulting from his leading the parliamentary majority, with the effect that both the appointment and the dismissal of the Prime Minister are at his disposal. No higher concentration of political power is granted to a sole authority in the landscape of contemporary democracies, including those adopting the parliamentary model.

A wide concentration of power may also derive from unchecked resort to emergency powers by the elected president, as occurs frequently in Latin America irrespective of the formal adoption of a semi-presidential (Argentina) or of a presidential system (Brazil). That practice goes far beyond the need for remedying exceptional situations, tending to substitute presidential decrees for ordinary legislation and therefore extinguishing the role of parliament. Once again, an understanding of the functioning of the institutional machinery requires an examination of specific practices that goes beyond the distinction between forms of government.

Moreover, the territorial distribution of power in its various forms, in particular the unitary and the federal (or regional) systems, is also likely to have a crucial effect on that functioning. While the former presupposes a sole legislature within the state, and sometimes is even founded on a unitary administration, the latter enhances pluralism, and is likely to engender competition and conflict among diverse governmental authorities. Parliamentary systems, as well as other forms of government, correspond increasingly to federations, with important consequences for the national decision-making process, including the fact that a second chamber representing the regional components of the federal state is usually established (for the operation of parliamentary systems in such states, see the instances of Australia, Austria, Germany, India, and South Africa).
Parliamentarism

However, the traditional association of federalism with the ideal of divided government does not necessarily correspond to its functioning. Federal systems are inter alia differentiated according to whether powers among the federation and regional territories are strictly separated (‘dual federalism’), or mostly shared (‘cooperative federalism’). In countries adopting the cooperative system, the upper chamber is usually composed of regional representatives, with the effect that the majority may differ from that in the elected lower chamber. The political stalemate thus arising in Germany between the Bundestag and the Bundesrat led in 2006 to a major constitutional reform of the federal system.\textsuperscript{17}

These references suffice to demonstrate that the territorial distribution of power is not less significant than the national form of government in ascertaining the degree to which power is concentrated or, by contrast, is subject to the coexistence of conflicting authorities. Following this criterion, the US system appears less concentrated than the German and the French, being founded on the presidential model and on dual federalism. The German system, combining a parliamentary model with cooperative federalism, appears more concentrated than the United States but less so than in France, that exhibits the greatest concentration of political power, since it combines a unitary state with the above-mentioned version of the semi-presidential model.

The above account is referred to the functioning of, and to the interplay between, political institutions. But, as already mentioned, concentration of power should not be seen as paving the way to absolutism as far as the functions of non-majoritarian authorities are respected. \textsuperscript{(p. 660)} These authorities, namely courts, including constitutional courts wherever distinguished from the ordinary, and independent authorities, usually acting in the market field, are entrusted with the task of ensuring the fundamental rights of citizens, and more generally constitutional principles and rules that are believed to stand above the appreciation of parliamentary majorities. Hence derives the need for granting them independence from the political branches, which is commonly achieved in contemporary constitutional democracies irrespective of their forms of government.

In particular, the establishment of judicial review of legislation has deeply transformed the role of the judiciary, vis-à-vis its resilient definitions as a ‘pouvoir en quelque façon nul’ (Montesquieu), or as ‘the least dangerous branch’ (Hamilton). As was already noticed in a general survey of constitutional justice in Western democracies, ‘constitutional review proves to have become the irreplaceable counterweight to the supremacy of the majority principle.’\textsuperscript{18} And the more recent waves of democratization (see Section IV above) were regularly complemented with the establishment of constitutional courts.

While taking account of the structural connection between the executive and the legislative power affecting parliamentarism (and to a great extent the semi-presidential system), and, on the other hand, the independence of the judiciary from the political branches, in our time the ultimate meaning of the separation of powers appears closer to that emerging from Henry de Bracton’s distinction between \textit{gubernaculum} and \textit{iurisdictio}, or from the medieval dichotomy between \textit{leges} and \textit{iura}, than from Locke’s and Montesquieu’s celebrated theories.

\textbf{VI. The Status of Member of Parliament}

The rules concerning the status of the individual members of the national parliament include their rights, privileges, responsibilities, immunities, and obligations. These rules are fundamentally related to the existence of Parliament as an institution, whether it functions within a parliamentary, semi-presidential, or presidential system. However, reference to the status of members is justified here, because many aspects of that status have resulted from the historical development of parliamentary government.

In the United Kingdom, the history of Parliament and the common law are the basis for the bundle of rights, responsibilities, and immunities that are together referred to as ‘parliamentary privilege’. Since the granting of special privileges to any group of individuals is often questioned today on grounds related to the equality of all persons, the existence of parliamentary privilege must be justified as being in the public interest. In 1999, a committee of both Houses at Westminster declared:

Parliamentary privilege consists of the rights and immunities which the two Houses ... and their members and officers possess to enable them to carry out their parliamentary business effectively. Without this protection members would be handicapped in performing their parliamentary duties, and the authority of Parliament itself in confronting the executive and as a forum for expressing the anxieties of citizens would be correspondingly diminished.19

In the United Kingdom, parliamentary privilege has never been the subject of comprehensive legislation. The essential privileges include some that inhere in the collective body (p. 661) (including the exclusive right of a house to regulate its own proceedings)20 as well as privileges of the collective body which confer a direct benefit on the individual member, notably the absolute freedom of speech in parliamentary proceedings, that has long been protected by Article 9 of the Bill of Rights 1689.21 Arising from that freedom of speech is the protection that MPs enjoy as individuals for what they say or do in the course of parliamentary proceedings against certain aspects of the criminal law and civil law that might otherwise restrict the freedom of speech in Parliament.22 However, the exercise by MPs of their freedom of speech in Parliament is subject to the control that the House of Commons exercises over the conduct of debates. Moreover, British MPs enjoy no general immunity from the criminal law, whether relating to arrest, prosecution, trial, conviction, or penalty; and disqualification from the Commons follows upon certain sentences of imprisonment.23 In 2010, the UK Supreme Court held that, since the ordinary criminal law applies fully to MPs, the making by them of false claims for parliamentary expenses is outside the area of parliamentary proceedings covered by privilege.24 In Australia, where the parliamentary system is derived from that in the United Kingdom, the law of parliamentary privilege has been placed on a modern legal basis by statutory codification.25

In nearly all constitutions (particularly in Europe), there is provision for the status and privileges of MPs. These privileges vary greatly, but they often include both a statement of non-liability for what is said or done in the course of parliamentary debate (l‘irresponsabilité) and also some form of individual immunity from the criminal process (l‘inviolabilité), especially in respect of personal liberty.26 One aim of such immunity may be to protect members from being harassed by politically motivated prosecutions, and it may not apply when a member is arrested flagrante delicto. It is generally limited to the period of a member’s electoral mandate: often the immunity may be taken away by a resolution of the parliament or by a parliamentary body. Even with these limitations, the existence of immunity from criminal process raises issues of principle as to the application of the ordinary law to elected persons.27 This immunity can be abused in a corrupt political system, and not all parliaments have effective rules requiring the disclosure of a member’s financial interests.

(p. 662)  A wide variation exists in the extent of the protection from civil liability for the making of statements that would otherwise be defamatory. As we have seen, in the United Kingdom this protection is limited to statements made in Parliament itself. In other countries the protection may extend to statements by an elected member that concern matters of current political significance, even though they are made outside the course of parliamentary debate. This extension in its scope enhances the risk that this protection may conflict with the fundamental rights of the victim of the damaging statements.28

Another constitutional guarantee that, in the public interest, is intended to preserve the personal freedom of MPs to decide how to exercise their parliamentary functions derives from Edmund Burke’s celebrated doctrine that MPs are not delegates of a local or political or economic caucus but represent the whole nation.29 This doctrine has sometimes been seen as going to the heart of a representative system, in justifying the making of decisions in parliament that are based on the will, or sovereignty, of the entire people, and in giving members protection against attempts by local or other sectional interests to dictate how they shall vote. In various forms it is found in very many constitutions. Thus in France, the mandat impératif is excluded; in Germany, members of the Bundestag must be ‘representatives of the whole people, not bound by orders or instructions, and responsible only to their conscience’; in Greece, MPs ‘enjoy unrestricted freedom of opinion and right to vote according to their conscience’; and in Italy, each MP ‘represents the Nation and carries out his duties without constraint of mandate’.30 It is difficult to reconcile these statements of principle with the constraints that arise from the system of political parties, the result of which is that a member will, except on rare issues that give rise to a question of personal conscience, be likely to support the position of the party on whose platform he or she was elected: and great pressure may be brought to bear on members by the party organization to vote as its leaders wish, especially on an issue upon which the continuance of the party in government may depend. However, one consequence of the principle is that members whose conduct in Parliament disappoints the expectations of their party or their electorate have constitutional protection against being removed from their seats during the period for which they were elected. These venerable rules are found in very many democracies, but it is arguable that their continuance today involves a wide degree of hypocrisy regarding the democratic process. It may be questioned whether they will preserve their significance and legitimacy in the future, as popular demands are made for securing the greater accountability of those involved in the political process. In some political systems, electors already have a right to recall their representative in some situations. In the United Kingdom, the coalition government formed in May 2010 undertook to legislate to introduce a power of recall, allowing a petition signed by 10 per cent of voters in a constituency to force a by-election where their member had been found to have engaged in ‘serious wrongdoing’.

(p. 663) VII. Differences and Analogies within the Family of Parliamentary Systems

Parliament's functions are deeply affected not only by the adopted form of government, but also by differences emerging within each form, of which the following are the most significant with respect to parliamentarism.

1. Making and Unmaking Governments

In parliamentary systems, the parliament is rarely entrusted with the formal power of investing government with its functions. Once members of government are appointed by the head of the state, the confidence of the house is generally presumed to exist, except in the case of the Italian Constitution, according to which both the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate must approve the incoming cabinet in an investiture vote within ten days of its appointment.

Under the German Basic Law and the Spanish Constitution, the prime minister is elected from the elected house on the proposal of the head of the state, and he or she is then appointed by the latter together with the ministers. A further variation is afforded by the Japanese Constitution, which requires that the prime minister, after having been elected from the lower house and then appointed by the emperor, appoints, and may dismiss, the ministers. Finally, South Africa's Constitution provides that the republic’s president, elected from the National Assembly, is head of the executive; members of the government are invested with their functions after being appointed by the president and ‘are accountable collectively and individually to Parliament for the exercise of their powers and the performance of their functions’ (s 92(2)).

These differences need to be taken into account in considering the nature of parliamentary government. As already mentioned, the British convention that cabinet ministers should be MPs is not generally adopted. Even among countries strongly influenced by the Westminster model, that rule is not absolutely followed: under the Indian Constitution, there is no bar to the appointment as minister of a person from outside the legislature, although he or she is bound to secure within six months a parliamentary seat by election or nomination. In many democratic countries, the two positions are merely compatible as a matter of law, although, given the importance of being a MP for ensuring the minister’s accountability before the electorate, in practice ministers are usually chosen from among MPs. Finally, some constitutions (such as the Belgian, the French, and the Dutch) provide that, once appointed minister, the MP is bound to resign his parliamentary seat in order to ensure the separation of powers.

A further significant difference is that under parliamentarism disequilibrium may occur between the parliamentary majority’s power to force the cabinet to resign and that of the prime minister to dissolve parliament. Given all these diverging features, scholars tend to give a minimal definition of parliamentary government, as consisting of that system ‘in which the Prime Minister and his or her cabinet are accountable to any majority of the members of parliament and can be voted out of office by the latter.’131 Once having entered into office, can members of a government be voted out by parliament? And, if so, what are the consequences of such a crisis? Within the family of parliamentary systems, there are many diverse answers to these two questions.

(p. 664) Concerning the former matter, the accountability of the government to parliament is in general secured through motions that expressly deal with the issue of confidence or no confidence. According to a widely diffused convention, that is codified under the Italian Constitution (Art 94(4)), a government should not have to resign because of the rejection of a government bill.

Motions of no confidence, namely the motions put before a parliament by the opposition with the intent of defeating the government, and thus distinguished from the constructive motions of no confidence, differ significantly on procedural grounds according to national experience. These differences include the quota of MPs required for proposing such motions, the time limit applying to such motions, and the majorities requested for the motion to be approved. The stricter these requirements, the more counterproductive a motion of no confidence on trivial matters may appear to its proposer.

The individual accountability of ministers is also attained in many parliamentary systems through no confidence motions, be they provided for in the constitution or established by convention as in the United Kingdom. Ministers are responsible ‘in the sense that they are answerable to Parliament for their departments. In this way individual ministerial responsibility describes a “chain of accountability”. Officials answer to ministers, who answer to Parliament, which, in turn, answers to the electorate.’ However, in the United Kingdom, ‘attempts to challenge the credibility of a minister are seldom successful when the government in power enjoys a substantial majority in the House of Commons’. The same occurs in other systems where a minister is called to account before Parliament.

Motions of confidence may be proposed by the government with the aim of ensuring that it has the support of the majority for its complete programme, or for a single bill or policy. Rather than challenging the opposition, these motions are likely to prevent dissident members of the parliamentary majority from voting against the government. Article 49(3) of the French Constitution goes even further, stating that the government may make the passing of a bill an issue of the government’s responsibility to the National Assembly, with the effect that the bill shall be considered adopted unless a resolution of no confidence is introduced within the next 24 hours and adopted. Such provision appears unique on the ground of legislative procedure: its effect is to replace the ordinary approval of a bill by parliament with a challenge to a vote of no confidence issued by government.

In principle, a government must resign whenever parliament approves a no confidence motion, or rejects a confidence motion. This duty is inherent in the accountability rule, and is common to the whole family of parliamentary systems. The only exception is when, as an alternative to resignation, the government has power (as in the United Kingdom) to order the dissolution of parliament and the holding of a general election. The resignation of the government will be followed by the formation of a new cabinet, if that proves possible. The rules that apply in such situations usually result from constitutional conventions, but they may be explicitly laid down in the constitution, as in Japan. The hypothesis of a new cabinet following a governmental crisis demonstrates that parliamentarism does not require that fresh elections be held whenever a government has lost its parliamentary majority resulting from earlier elections. Indeed, the opposite possibility is presupposed where there is provision for the constructive vote of no confidence, notwithstanding the fact that this interrupts the ‘chain of accountability’ between the government and the electorate.

Finally, significant differences within the family of parliamentary systems emerge with respect to the dissolution of parliament, both on the ground of its limits and of its functions. Dissolution is in some systems excluded for one year after early elections (France, Spain) or in the first period after a general election (Norway, Russia), or admitted only in the event of a deadlock in cabinet formation and after the loss of a vote of confidence (Germany), or is limited by the strong disincentive that a new parliament would be elected only for the remainder of the dissolved parliament’s term (Sweden). In the United Kingdom, the power to advise the monarch to dissolve Parliament is accepted to be a strategic instrument in the hands of the prime minister that he may wish to use to remain in power; there would have to be highly exceptional circumstances before the monarch would be justified in rejecting that advice. By contrast, in Italy the dissolution of parliament may be required to maintain a parliamentary majority, whenever this is unavailable in the current legislature; in this case the head of state acquires substantial powers, to the extent that an impartial authority is needed for the final decision that the current composition of parliament fails to produce a majority.

2. Legislative Function

Most students of parliamentarism have recently noticed the declining role of parliaments in the process of legislation, in spite of the traditional pre-eminence of legislation among the functions of parliament. Two indicators of this decline are not only the increasingly rare approval of bills that are not proposed by the government but initiated within parliament, but, first and foremost, the huge number of government bills that pass through parliament without being amended (except possibly when ministers have been persuaded to amend their own original proposals).

It is difficult to generalize about this situation, but there is no doubt that in many countries the role of parliament in practice is to give the stamp of formal approval to the government's proposals. Even in the United Kingdom, this often appears to be the role of the elected House of Commons, and it is left to the appointed House of Lords to examine in detail bills that have been approved by the Commons without any scrutiny. This is possible in part because no single party has a majority in the Lords and members of the House hold their places for life and are not subject to being re-elected. By this central paradox of parliamentarism, while the majority in the elected House of Commons has the primary duty of maintaining the government in power, this necessarily diminishes their ability to scrutinize the government's proposed legislation. Accordingly, in the United Kingdom, and in countries where the Westminster model applies, the government's bills often pass through the House of Commons without having been modified, but subject to the ability of the upper house (if there is one) to make the government think again. Elsewhere, however, including many European democracies, parliaments may play a more active role. These differences are not simply due to the governing party's dominance over the legislative process that generally exists in the Westminster model, by comparison with the reduced power of coalition governments. Further elements to be taken into account include the British executive's monopoly on introducing financial measures, and the limited opportunities to introduce legislation on their own initiative which backbench MPs at Westminster may exercise.

On the other hand, the fact that certain parliaments play some role in amending governmental bills appears significant to the extent that their function in lawmaking is believed to consist in making autonomous decisions. This assumption presupposes, in turn, that the power of parliament vis-à-vis that of government is likely to be assessed as if the two institutions were structurally separated one from the other. But this hypothesis corresponds to the presidential system, and applies wherever the legitimacy of the government is not dependent on maintaining the confidence of parliament. It was for that reason that, until the Lisbon (p. 666) Treaty, the European Parliament's powers were likely to be limited by those of the European institutions. The possibility of an autonomous role for parliament is, to the contrary, impeded by the very dynamic of the parliamentary model, which is founded on a constant connection between parliament and government that requires a parliamentary majority for maintaining government in office.

Given this premise, the better the parliamentary model happens to function, the more parliament is reduced to that of a forum where the cabinet's decisions are only formally discussed and approved. The obvious question that arises is why the legislative procedure is even in that case still followed, notwithstanding the common awareness of its merely formal nature. On that basis, what is the role that parliament is likely to play?

It is worth recalling that, in a parliamentary system, the representative assembly alone is provided with the resource of democratic legitimacy, which it exercises not only by voting on issues of confidence, but also while carrying out its other functions, including legislation and deliberation on matters of national importance. Democratic legitimacy is exercised through a process of deliberation that necessarily includes the opposition parties, and at the same time takes place in public. Contrary to decision-making within a closed system of government, where the absence of openness reflects the need for internal cohesion, the functioning of parliament is driven by the principle of publicity exactly because it is entrusted to a democratically elected institution. A century and a half ago, John Stuart Mill captured these features of parliamentarism by affirming:

I know not how a representative assembly can more usefully employ itself than in talk, when the subject of talk is the great interest of the country, and every sentence of it represents the opinion either of some important body of persons in the nation, or of an individual in whom such bodies have reposed their confidence.\(^{33}\)

However, the fact that contemporary politics is strongly conditioned by the media, if not media-driven, affects deeply the meaning of political representation, and the principle of openness that characterizes parliamentary procedure. It is in this respect, rather than for the loss of a decision-making capacity, that the issue of parliament's decline should properly be addressed. In a media-driven scenario, the core of the public debate shifts from the adequacy of governmental policies to the prime minister's capability in persuading the people of his own political, if not private, virtues. The content of parliamentary debates is in turn anticipated, and distorted, through the lens of the media. The traditional view that the debates shed light on the executive’s most important decisions, and determine the public’s support for the contending political parties, is thus challenged.
Parliamentarism

According to political scientists, the increasing personalization of government due to the media, together with the increasing importance of foreign policy and the related expansion of the executive’s action, drive towards a ‘presidentialization of politics’. The fact that political leaders seek an informal popular legitimacy for their own actions through media exposure affects parliamentarism in particular, since democratic legitimacy pertains to a collective body which is traditionally less at ease than the presidential model with the personal element. However, it does not follow that the mechanisms of presidentialism are likely to be inserted within the structure of parliamentarism, as the formula of presidentialization might induce (p. 667) one to believe. Given their informality, media circuits appear rather juxtaposed to the mechanisms of the diverse forms of government. Their effects amount, therefore, to a ‘personalization of politics’, namely to a phenomenon that was designed in these terms half a century ago, although it has become since then increasingly important.

3. Controlling Functions

The dynamic of the parliamentary system conditions the exertion of parliament’s controlling functions no less than its role in legislation. Given that a majority backs the government, control or oversight of administrative activities is less significant than it is within a presidential system.

Differences emerge, however, even here according to different countries, and to different mechanisms of control. In some parliamentary democracies, ministers use reports not to respond to control but to anticipate possible criticism by efficient propaganda to show their efficacy. But this is not always the case.

As for the power to authorize spending, one of parliament’s oldest functions, the fact that this has become nominal in most countries depends not only on the rules governing the parliamentary system, but also on the lack of effective parliamentary control over the budget: this would require inter alia an effective committee system, sufficient time, and access to essential information on revenue and spending. Nonetheless, in the United Kingdom, the Public Accounts Committee, operating in a less partisan way than most other parliamentary committees, and being supported by an independent authority (the National Audit Office), is believed to provide the House of Commons with ‘some degree of control over government finance’. Similarly, in India the independence of the Comptroller and Auditor-General is assured.

As regards the scrutiny of foreign and defence policy, the Bundestag is constitutionally provided with more significant powers than those usually conferred on parliaments, including the requirement to consent to the deployment of the military. These features, stemming from the constitutional climate in Germany since the Second World War, have shaped the whole relationship with the government in the field, although the Federal Constitutional Court has affirmed that it is not the exemption from parliamentary decision-making in foreign affairs that needs to be justified, but parliament’s involvement.

Questions and interpellations addressed to ministers relate to further, although less effective, forms of parliamentary control over the executive. While the former are exhausted with the minister’s answer, the latter demand a prompt response which in some parliaments is followed by a short debate and a vote on whether the government’s response is deemed acceptable. This technique is sometimes linked to a vote of no confidence or a censure motion, although it seldom reaches the point of dismissing government. Furthermore, the purposes of such inquiries frequently consist in the elected member’s aim of drawing attention to a certain interest of his or her constituency. Given these premises, the introduction of television cameras in some parliaments has revitalize the culture of control by question and has enhanced transparency, but it is also exploited for propaganda purposes.

In general, parliamentary control of the executive is perceived as being particularly needed given the great expansion in the importance of international relations, and in governmental activities connected with the adhesion to supranational organizations. An example of this may be seen in the efforts of European parliaments to recover in terms of the scrutiny of governmental action what they have lost in terms of decision-making at the EU level (the European ‘democratic deficit’). These efforts were rewarded in 2009 with the Lisbon Treaty, that significantly enhances the role of national parliaments within the EU decision-making procedures. But the issue must be seen in light of a wider range of phenomena, those relating to the structural gap between the still national dimension of politics and the global or continental scale of markets, media, and technocratic agencies. In that domain, states may have a chance of playing an active role through their governments, rather than through representative assemblies. Inevitably, the latter are left on one side, and even their potential for providing a checking function appears modest.

VIII. Is Parliamentarism Declining?

These factors, together with those connected with the increasing mediatization and personalization of politics, are likely to deprive parliamentary deliberation progressively of its meaning. Hence there is emerging among the political elites of mature democracies a common concern for the decline of parliament, and for the consequences of this on the legitimacy of political institutions. In the United Kingdom, the Green Paper entitled ‘The Governance of Britain’, presented to Parliament by Prime Minister Brown in July 2007, aimed inter alia at ‘limiting the powers of the executive’, ‘revitalising the House of Commons’, and ‘renewing the accountability of Parliament’. In the event, the legislation that emerged as a result of this initiative (the Constitutional Reform and Governance Act 2010) did not rise to this challenging rhetoric. It included changes affecting two areas of executive power, only one of which was expressly calculated to extend the functions of parliament; and it seems unlikely that legislation alone will modify political attitudes that are based on long-seated practice rather than on law. However, a desire for change in the same direction of greater accountability appeared to drive both the ambitious constitutional reform in France in 2008 and the reform in 2006 of the German federal system (already mentioned). These various measures, arising in different political cultures and affecting different institutional mechanisms, may reflect a need to redress what has become an increasingly unbalanced relationship between parliament and government: but we cannot be confident that those who wield executive power will willingly expose themselves to the prospect of more effective and transparent political challenge.

In discussing the main features of parliamentarism in this chapter, we have outlined the historical antecedents to forms of parliamentary government that exist today and we have explained that many differing forms of parliamentarism exist today. We have not examined the question whether, as a system of government, it is superior to or more stable than forms of presidentialism. Nor have we sought to review empirical evidence on which an answer to this question might be based. In 1990, in a celebrated analysis of ‘the perils of presidentialism’, Juan J. Linz concluded that parliamentary democracies have had a superior historical performance and that parliamentarism is more conducive to stable democracy; among the difficulties posed by presidentialism is greater rigidity and the existence of dual legitimacies when executive and legislature are separately elected. Criticism of this conclusion emphasized the possibilities for conflict that may exist in parliamentary systems, the variable stability of systems of political parties, the lack of legislative check on the executive when the government has a clear majority in the legislature, and the wide range of different versions of presidentialism and parliamentarism that exist.

More recently, José A. Cheibub has argued that it is not the nature of presidential institutions as such that causes instability in presidential systems, since there are many other factors that determine how these systems operate: thus the instability of presidential regimes is seen most often in countries where in any event democracy of any type would be unstable. This debate has often been based on the experience of countries in Latin America and to a lesser extent on that of new constitutional systems in Eastern Europe. In countries with a longer record of democratic government, as in Western Europe, the model of parliamentarism, with all its potential variants, is more commonly found than the model of presidentialism, despite the pressures in the modern world that work towards the personalization of political decision-making.

Bibliography

Parliamentarism

Edmund Burke, Speech to the Electors of Bristol (1774), reported in Philip Kurland and Ralph Lerner (eds), The Founders’ Constitution (vol I, 1987)

José Antonio Cheibub, Presidentialism, Parliamentarism, and Democracy (2007)

Joseph LaPalombara and Myron Weiner (eds), Political Parties and Political Development (1966)

Juan J. Linz and Arturo Valenzuela (eds), The Failure of Presidential Democracy: Comparative Perspectives (1994)

Katja S. Ziegler, Denis Baranger, and A.W. Bradley (eds), Constitutionalism and the Role of Parliaments (2007)

Notes:

(3) For an extensive survey of British parliamentary government, see Vernon Bogdanor (ed), The British Constitution in the Twentieth Century (2003), in particular ch 4 (the cabinet system, by Anthony Seldon), ch 5 (the House of Commons, by Paul Seaward and Paul Silk), and ch 8 (ministerial responsibility, by Diana Woodhouse).

(10) Ibid 15.

(20) This right includes the power to maintain order and discipline within the House. Issues of human rights may arise when non-members of the House are penalized for contempt of Parliament, as in Demicoli v Malta (1991) 14 ECHR 47.

(21) Absolute privilege for speech during a debate was held by the European Court of Human Rights in A v UK (2003) 36 ECHR 917 to be compatible with human rights, the Court placing weight on the established practice in many European states. In the United Kingdom, the privilege does not extend to statements made outside Parliament, eg in public speeches or in media interviews. Cf CGIL & Cofferati v Italy (ECtHR, 24 February 2009).

(22) Protection is not only against civil liability for defamation, but also against criminal liability for such matters as obscenity, incitement to disaffection, and racial hatred.

(23) Disqualification results from being sentenced to prison for more than a year (Representation of the People Act 1981) and disqualification also results from conviction for electoral offences.

(26) See eg Austria (Constitution of 1920, Art 57); Belgium (Constitution of 1994, Arts 58, 59); Cyprus (Constitution of 1960, Art 83); Czech Republic (Constitution of 1992, Art 27); Denmark (Constitution of 1953, s 57); Finland (Constitution of 1999, ss 28, 30, 31); France (1958 Constitution, Art 26, as amended in 1995); Italy (Constitution of 1948, Art 68); Turkey (Constitution of 1982, Art 83). On parliamentary immunity in Turkey, see Kart v Turkey (ECtHR, 3 December 2009).

(28) As well as CGIL & Cofferati v Italy (above), see De Jorio v Italy (2005) 40 EHRR 42 and Cordova v Italy (No 1) (2005) 40 EHRR 43 (parliamentary immunity held to violate the right of access to the courts under Art 6(1), ECHR).

(29) In his Speech to the Electors of Bristol (1774) (reported in Philip Kurland and Ralph Lerner (eds), The Founders’ Constitution (vol I, 1987), 447), Burke argued that while a representative ought to give great weight to the interests of his constituents, he owed it to them to exercise ‘his unbiased opinion, his mature judgement, his enlightened conscience’ in his parliamentary acts.

(30) In the respective constitutions see for France, Art 27; for Germany, Art 38(1); for Greece (Constitution of 1975), Art 60(1); for Italy, Art 67. And see eg Austria, Art 56(1) (no binding mandate); Bulgaria (Constitution of 1991), Art 67; Poland (Constitution of 1997), Art 104(1); Turkey, Art 80.

(37) Turpin (n 12), 57ff.

(39) Leyland (n 32), 110.

(41) References in Katja S. Ziegler, ‘Executive Powers in Foreign Policy: The Decision to Dispatch the Military’ in Ziegler, Baranger, and Bradley et al (n 11), 148ff.

(42) Von Beyme (n 36), 82.

(44) The legal basis of the civil service and its management was removed from the royal prerogative but this was unlikely to affect ministers’ control of the civil service. More significant was the conferment on Parliament of a role in approving approve treaties concluded by the executive.

(45) See Chapter 29 on presidentialism in this volume.

(47) Scott Mainwaring and Matthew Shugart, ‘Juan Linz, Presidentialism, and Democracy: A Critical Appraisal’

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Anthony W. Bradley</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Anthony W. Bradley is Emeritus Professor of Constitutional Law, Edinburgh University and Research Fellow, Institute of European and Comparative Law, Oxford University</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Cesare Pinelli</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Cesare Pinelli is Professor of Constitutional Law, Università ‘Sapienza’, Rome</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Abstract and Keywords

The challenges to constitutional law raised by the modern administrative state take contrasting forms in presidential and parliamentary systems. This article focuses on the differences between the US presidential system and the procedural requirements of its Administrative Procedure Act (APA), on the one hand, and parliamentary democracies where the government must maintain the confidence of the legislature, on the other. The need to assure technical competence may clash with both public accountability under the APA and political accountability to parliament. The article is organized as follows. Section II discusses delegation of policymaking authority outside the legislature. Section III concentrates on the creation of independent agencies and their connection to regulatory policy and government oversight. Section IV considers the role both of economic analysis in the policy process and of procedural requirements designed to further political and public accountability. Section V brings in the courts’ role in reviewing and overseeing the regulatory process in the rest of government. Section VI concludes with some reflections on the connection between administrative law, public policymaking, and democratic legitimacy.

Keywords: constitutional law, administrative state, United States presidential system, Administrative Procedure Act, parliamentary democracy, public accountability

I. Introduction 671
II. The Political Economy of Delegation 673
III. Independent Agencies 676
IV. Administrative Procedures, Public Participation, and Technocratic Analysis 678
   1. Cost-Benefit Analysis 678
   2. Public Participation in the Regulatory Process 680
V. Judicial Review 682
VI. Conclusions 684

I. Introduction

The modern regulatory state challenges settled constitutional doctrines. These challenges reflect the differing histories of the relation between the state and the market across modern democracies. Public law is the product of statutory, constitutional, and judicial choices over time; it blends constitutional and administrative concerns. Contrasting the United States with its long tradition of private ownership that includes public utilities with Europe where the state has traditionally operated public companies supplying those services. Recent trends to deregulate and privatize these services raise distinct constitutional challenges.

The regulation of complex economic and social phenomena forces all modern democracies to confront the constitutional and democratic legitimacy of delegated policymaking. A rigid separation of powers—where the legislature is the only source of legal norms, the government bureaucracy implements the law, and the judiciary oversees compliance with the law—cannot withstand the pressures of modern policymaking realities. In the United States the non-delegation doctrine has long provided only a weak background constraint on the writing of statutes. Invoking the constitutional separation of powers, the federal courts accept statutory decisions to vest rule-making power in the executive branch and in independent agencies. In Germany with a very different constitutional structure, the Federal Constitutional Court has been similarly permissive, interpreting the language of the Grundgesetz to permit delegation and finding that it does not violate either the legislative primacy of the parliament or the protection of individual rights. The French Constitution explicitly recognizes the legitimacy of delegation in specific areas, and the British courts, with no written document, similarly reject rigid ideas of parliamentary sovereignty.

However, judicial acceptance of delegation does not end the matter. Acceptance leads the courts to assess the constitutional exercise of that power to assure that it comports with democratic values and does not violate rights. Very few constitutional texts, however, deal explicitly with the administrative process. Most leave it to the courts to apply the constitution to the administrative process and to the legislature to enact procedures to guide the exercise of delegated power. Some constitutional courts, especially in parliamentary systems, have been very hands off. Most statutes that mandate policymaking procedures do not include provisions to make them judicially enforceable. This situation contrasts with the United States where the Administrative Procedure Act mandates certain rulemaking procedures and makes their use subject to judicial review. This legal framework can be understood as a way to assure the democratic acceptability of policymaking delegation. In contrast, the administrative procedure acts in most other polities concentrate on administrative acts, usually defined to exclude broad rulemaking activity that determines general norms. Thus, from a constitutional point of view, there is an important practical gap in the operation of legitimate democratic government in many political systems. Delegation of policymaking is inevitable and desirable in the modern regulatory/welfare state, and for that very reason, it ought to be carried out consistent with democratic values. Ideally, this principle ought to have constitutional status, yet in most states it does not. Even in the United States, where the APA and other statutory provisions help to fill the gap, the principles expressed by the APA have a contested constitutional pedigree. Several scholars, however, do argue that the APA is a ‘landmark’ or a ‘super statute’ with constitutional or quasi-constitutional status.

In other modern democracies, the claim that the policymaking process inside ministries or agencies should be legally constrained clashes with notions of the proper division between politics and law. Because it seems to risk politicizing the courts, the judiciary pulls back from review. One problem outside the United States is the lack of clear legal standards for judicial review of government or agency rulemaking. Of course, much of US administrative law concerns ambiguities in the judicial review provisions of the APA. However, the text does limit judicial review of the substance of regulations, and Supreme Court opinions have outlined the extent of judicial deference to agency interpretations of their own statutory mandates. Elsewhere, the field is open, and it is not surprising that courts have resisted entering into the review of rules and norms absent any constitutional or statutory standards. Sometimes courts do review general rules if the plaintiffs claim that their rights have been violated, but review as a way to maintain democratic legitimacy occurs only indirectly or under cover of the review of rights. Finding a proper place for judicial review is not the only problem that arises at the intersection between constitutional and administrative law. A second trend in the administrative process also highlights the tension between democratic values and delegated rulemaking. That is the push by social scientists and some public officials to import stronger commitments to cost–benefit analysis, risk assessment, and impact assessment that challenge traditional modes of policymaking. Debates over the proper role of technocratic analysis and public participation and accountability raise issues of constitutional moment.

The challenges to constitutional law raised by the modern administrative state take contrasting forms in presidential and parliamentary systems. I particularly focus on the differences between the US presidential system and the procedural requirements of its APA, on the one hand, and parliamentary democracies where the government must maintain the confidence of the legislature, on the other. The need to assure technical competence may clash with both public accountability under the APA and political accountability to parliament.

This chapter considers four key issues. Section II discusses delegation of policymaking authority outside the legislature. Section III concentrates on the creation of independent agencies and their connection to regulatory policy and government oversight. Section IV considers the role both of economic analysis in the policy process.
and of procedural requirements designed to further political and public accountability. Finally, Section V brings in the courts’ role in reviewing and overseeing the regulatory process in the rest of government. The chapter concludes in Section VI with some reflections on the connection between administrative law, public policymaking, and democratic legitimacy.

II. The Political Economy of Delegation

Regulatory policy can be made through detailed statutes administered by agencies on a case-by-case basis. However, in practice, such a high degree of specificity would be extremely impractical. Most regulatory laws allocate considerable discretion to the executive or to specialized agencies not just to set enforcement priorities but also to make policy under delegated authority.

Why are legislators willing to delegate policymaking authority to agencies and executive departments? There are, of course, many functional reasons for delegation—agency technical expertise, the legislators’ lack of time, the value of removing implementation decisions from overtly political fora. However, besides these prudential arguments for delegation, legislatures delegate for political reasons. Three seem most important.

First, delegation may reflect the legislators’ self-interest. Elected representatives satisfy their constituents, not only by taking positions on broad legislative initiatives, but also by doing individual favors for voters. Thus, they may design laws with opportunities for ‘casework’ that aids constituents or campaign contributors. After the law is on the books, legislators can earn points with constituents by intervening in agency processes. They may prefer agency administration to direct enforcement by the courts because there may be few opportunities for politicians to aid constituents when enforcement depends upon private lawsuits. Secondly, delegation is a way to pass on difficult choices to bureaucrats while claiming credit for the broadly popular aspects of policy. Delegation represents a compromise when politicians want to enact a statute in a particular area but cannot agree on the details because of conflicting political constituencies. As a general rule, legislators will delegate the implementation of policies with concentrated costs and diffuse benefits so that agencies must make the hard choices. Conversely, when benefits are concentrated and costs are diffuse, the legislature will want to specify the beneficiaries itself and claim credit.

Thirdly, the degree of delegation may depend upon whether or not the interests of the executive and legislature are aligned. In a presidential system, bureaucrats may be given more discretion under unified government. The US Congress is willing to delegate more power the less it thinks the exercise of that power will diverge from its own preferences. If some agencies, such as the Federal Trade Commission, are independent of direct presidential control, the legislature may give such agencies more discretion compared to executive departments. In a parliamentary system, the cabinet can propose statutory texts that delegate power to itself confident that the supporting coalition in the legislature usually will enact the government's draft bills.

Operating against these reasons for delegation is the worry that agencies will either be captured by the industries they regulate or, conversely, will be overly subservient to other groups such as labor unions, consumer groups, or environmental organizations. Older research stressed the possibility of agency capture by regulated entities able to offer private inducements or to dominate agency deliberations. These claims have been challenged by research that points to the legislators’ ability to draft statutes that give them an ongoing ability to monitor regulatory agencies. Matthew D. McCubbins and Thomas Schwartz contrast two types of oversight: ‘police patrols’ and ‘fire alarms’. The former involves members of the legislature in direct oversight. The latter sets up a process, embedded in the original statutory scheme, under which private individuals and groups carry on the monitoring. McCubbins then collaborated with Roger Noll and Barry Weingast to argue that the APA is a prime example of such oversight where the legislature ‘stacks the deck’ in favor of the groups favored by the enacting coalition. The APA’s requirements for notice, hearings, and reason-giving help to assure third-party participation and to limit closed-door decision-making. Even though the constraints are nominally procedural, they have substantive effects.

The deck-stacking hypothesis is a bold and interesting thesis and has generated a range of critical responses. Jeffrey S. Hill and James E. Brazier detail the restrictive conditions under which deck stacking can operate effectively. According to them, ex ante controls only operate well when
In a similar vein, David Spence questions the ability of elected politicians to constrain the policy choices of agencies over time through structural and procedural means. His study of the US Federal Energy Regulatory Commission shows that such controls may not have the intended impacts. Steven Balla shows that the hypothesis has little explanatory power for reimbursement policies under Medicare, the US public health insurance system for the elderly.

Of course, in the limit, if an agency makes choices that diverge too far from the preferences of lawmakers, it will invite the politicians to amend the law. In the US presidential system, an agency, operating under an existing statute, can strategically pick a policy between its own preferred choice and that of the legislative oversight committee so that the committee will take no action. However, the possibility of a presidential veto constrains the legislature and may give the agency more leeway. The limits of ex post control then ought to affect the design of statutes in the first place. Legislators might balance political control against expertise as they look to the future.

Delegation to the executive branch and to independent agencies may be a preferred strategy for legislators under the conditions outlined above, but what about the preferences of voters? In a presidential system, Jerry Mashaw argues that voters may favor delegation to executive agencies because of the President's accountability to a national constituency. David Spence and Frank Cross point to other reasons why voters may favor delegation and argue that delegation is often a route to more effective policy. According to them, agencies are not always more subject to capture than lawmakers. Delegation permits the use of expertise, favors specialization, encourages professional distance from politics, permits decisions to be tailored to diverse conditions throughout the country, and leads to procedures that are open to public participation.

In short, as a normative matter, delegation has many desirable features, and as a positive matter, it is an ongoing feature of modern government. Even if the legislature tries to control agencies by stacking the deck in various ways, discretion will persist as an important aspect of regulatory policy and implementation.

III. Independent Agencies

The functional tasks facing the modern state, along with public demands for transparency and accountability, pose a challenge to conventional constitutional thinking that stresses the threefold division of the state into legislative, executive and judicial branches. Substantive policy demands have led to institutional innovations, beginning with the creation of independent regulatory agencies, ranging from central banks to broadcasting commissions. Furthermore, the need for oversight and control of delegated authority has led to the creation of monitoring organizations, such as supreme audit agencies and ombudsmen, and to judicial review. In designing a regulatory program the legislature must decide whether to assign its implementation to an agency under the political control of the president or the cabinet or whether to create a body that is somewhat independent. Independence generally means that a public entity falls outside the cabinet structure of government and has some degree of separation from day-to-day political pressures. Independence is defended as a way to assure that decisions are made by neutral professionals with the time and technical knowledge to make competent, apolitical choices. The heart of the controversy over independence stems from the agencies' disconnect from traditional democratic accountability. Attempts to legitimate such agencies in democratic terms often stress the importance of processes that go beyond expertise to incorporate public opinion and social and economic interests. The ideal is an expert agency that is independent of partisan politics but sensitive to the concerns of ordinary citizens and civil society groups. In contrast, others defend independence as a way to avoid just such influences and to assure a stable, market-friendly business environment. Critics worry about capture by narrow interests.

The worldwide growth of independent regulatory and oversight agencies is a consequence both of the privatization of public utilities and of increasing calls for monitoring of core government activities. Whatever the agencies' functional merits, their constitutional status is often in question. Most so-called independent agencies are not in fact free-standing entities. Independence is a relative concept.
Even in the United States, with a history that goes back to the establishment of the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1887, independent agencies are not completely independent. The President appoints commissioners with Senate approval and selects the chair. Most agencies operate with appropriated budget funds and face congressional scrutiny. The legislature frequently builds oversight of some kind into the statutory scheme. However, even if the appointment process is highly political, staggered terms that exceed the terms of the President and members of Congress, political-party balance requirements, and removal only for cause limit executive control, compared with departments directly in the presidential chain of command.

In Europe, under pressure from the European Union, Member States have privatized many state-owned public utilities, although many states still retain a partial ownership share and a role in the selection of the board. These privatizations created the need for the ongoing regulation of firms to constrain monopoly power and to further other goals, such as universal service, energy conservation, and environmental protection. Especially if the state has an ownership stake, the regulatory body needs to be independent of the rest of government to avoid conflicts of interest. This raises a contested issue in constitutional design. Most member states are parliamentary or quasi-parliamentary systems. Such constitutional structures tend to look askance at public institutions that operate independently of the rest of government, subject only to weak parliamentary control. Yet, the functional argument for independence is especially strong in these cases. As long as the state retains an ownership share, an independent regulator can help to avoid conflicts of interest. The challenge that independent agencies pose to unitary constitutional traditions varies across parliamentary systems. Thus, Germany and Britain have been more resistant to the creation of independent bodies than the French. France has a history of independent regulatory bodies that dates from at least the 1970s, and it has recently enhanced agency independence by borrowing extensively from American and EU models while retaining some distinctive features. In contrast, in Germany faith in the capacity of the legislature and executive to define and pursue rational policy remains reasonably strong. Outside certain narrow, functionally specific domains, there are few calls for independent administrative agencies. In common law parliamentary systems, such as the United Kingdom and other countries of the Commonwealth, notions of unitary government policymaking and agency independence are also often in serious tension. As a consequence, the new German and English agencies that regulate privatized public utilities are formally under the authority of an individual cabinet minister or the cabinet as a whole. This strengthens their claims to be acting in politically accountable way.

At the level of the European Union, agencies have proliferated, but their lack of strong democratic legitimacy has meant the substitution of ‘technocratic for democratic legitimacy’. Agency boards include member state representatives, but this is a political compromise. In practice, it leads to the dominance of technical experts, who are appointed by member states and interact with specialized member state ministries.

Elsewhere, transplanted institutional structures may operate quite differently than in their countries of origin. For example, in Brazil's presidential system independent agencies, although borrowing from American models, are clearly subordinate to the executive whatever their nominal form. Hence, they struggle to provide credible commitments to investors both domestic and foreign. Taiwan's independent regulatory agency for telecommunications ran up against a Supreme Court that struck down the appointments process for giving too large a role to the legislature.

A growing number of independent agencies police the accountability of the government itself. Here the case for independence is particularly strong, but so is the need for oversight to prevent either their capture by regime opponents or their lapse into inaction. The political coalitions that created these bodies may not be able to maintain the bodies' efficacy over time. Controversy surrounds the operation of independent electoral commissions, human rights ombudsmen, anti-corruption agencies, and supreme audit offices throughout the world. Yet, in spite of the controversy, they can serve as important checks on incumbent regimes if professionally run and if granted sufficient independence and authority.

IV. Administrative Procedures, Public Participation, and Technocratic Analysis

The constitutional challenges facing the modern regulatory state arise not only from structural issues involving political control and the separation of powers. In addition, even a regulatory body that is entirely within the cabinet structure of government can act in ways that raise questions of democratic and popular accountability. Public accountability goes beyond purely structural relations between government institutions.

Administrative law imposes constraints on agencies’ delegated authority, and it gives the courts a tool to monitor the exercise of that authority. Constitutional constraints frequently take the form of protections for individual rights, as in the due process and equal protections clauses in the US Constitution or the protections for both substantive and procedural rights in the German Grundgesetz. Recently, the European Convention on Human Rights, as interpreted by the European Court of Human Rights and national courts, has been influencing judicial review and administrative practice throughout Europe. Without denying the importance of these rights-based constraints on government action, this chapter focuses attention on a different issue—assuring the democratic accountability and legitimacy of policymaking inside government departments and independent agencies. Public agencies promulgate regulations for many different purposes. They seek to correct market failures, protect rights, and distribute the benefits of state actions to particular groups—ranging from the poor or disadvantaged minorities to politically powerful industries such as agriculture or oil and gas. All representative democracies face the need to balance democratic accountability against the use of technical expertise to assure the competent implementation of complex statutes. I begin by discussing the role of cost–benefit analysis as an analytic tool that can serve political purposes. I then discuss the potential tensions between assuring competent technocratic policymaking in the executive and permitting public participation and accountability.

1. Cost–Benefit Analysis

In the regulation of the economy, a prominent form of expertise derives from economics. However, such expertise does not merely represent technocratic competence. Rather, it is bound up with normative commitments that may clash with popular sentiments. The normative position espoused by most public policy analysts trained in economics is the cost–benefit test, a criterion that recommends choosing policies to maximize net social benefits measured in monetary terms. The aim is to avoid waste and inefficiency and to maximize the size of the social pie. A statement in favor of the use of cost–benefit analysis in health and safety regulation by a group of leading policy economists argues that it should be carried out for all major regulatory decisions. It ‘has a potentially important role to play in policymaking, although it should not be the sole basis of such decisionmaking.’ If the costs of a policy are out of line with the benefits, an agency ought to be required to justify its choice. In its pure form the cost–benefit test ignores the distribution of the benefits and only asks if it would be possible for the gainers to compensate the losers. This leaves open the question of the fairness of the distribution of benefits and costs—a question that cannot be answered by economics standing alone. Public policy analysts argue for the use of cost–benefit analysis in the promulgation of regulations and government programs designed to improve efficiency and argue that distributive justice concerns should be reflected in taxes, subsidies, and spending levels. On this view, cost–benefit analysis is an input into the subsequent regulatory process that sets policy, not the decisive determinant of policy. This is a fine response in principle, but, in reality, policy choices cannot be so neatly cabined.

In the United States economists have been active critics of existing regulatory programs that fail to pass cost–benefit tests. This work has spurred calls for reform that concentrate on the use of better analysis inside agencies and in the drafting of statutes. However, those urging greater reliance on economic criteria need to recognize that these approaches can themselves be used as tools to obtain political advantage. If cost–benefit criteria are applied by an office that reports to the President or the Prime Minister, the cost–benefit tool, which appears neutral on its face, can be manipulated for political ends. This is possible because many judgment calls must be made in any analysis. Seldom will there be a single ‘right’ answer that anyone trained in the technique will accept. For example, the choice of a discount rate and proper way to monetize morbidity and mortality are both fraught with controversy even among those committed to the method.

Recent US presidents have instituted White House review of regulations in the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs (OIRA) using cost–benefit criteria. Although originally policy analysis was applied to spending programs, recently the emphasis has shifted to regulatory programs, where most of the costs and benefits are not included in the government budget. The Executive Order that requires executive branch agencies to carry out cost–benefit analyses for major rules has the effect of strengthening the President's hand in the regulatory area.

In response to concerns about the political uses of analysis, some commentators have suggested special science courts or other types of independent reviews. Justice (then Judge) Stephen Breyer, for example, urged the creation of a separate expert agency with the mission of rationalizing regulatory policy across programs that regulate risk.40 Bruce Ackerman recommends the creation of an integrity branch—concerned with transparency and limiting (p. 680) corruption—and a regulatory branch insulated from day-to-day political influences but required to justify its actions publicly.41 I argue for a more limited reform that separates OIRA review of regulations from technical debates over the proper analytic methods. I argue for the creation of an independent office that I call ORPAT or the Office for the Review of Policy Analytic Techniques within the Government Accountability Office or perhaps the National Academy of Sciences.42

How does research on cost–benefit analysis contribute to our understanding of the constitutional legitimacy of regulatory policymaking? At one level, this work is a plea for the use of expertise in the drafting and implementation of statutes. Proponents of cost–benefit analysis favor more delegation to technocrats trained in these techniques. If, however, the use of cost–benefit analysis essentially serves to strengthen the hand of the president or the prime minister over cabinet departments and agencies, it may be resisted by legislative committees and interest groups that have more impact at the ministry or agency level than with the chief executive. Cost–benefit analysis and its sisters, risk assessment and cost-effectiveness analysis, are universalizing techniques that cut across substantive fields and provide a way to compare programs and allocate funds using uniform criteria. In the US Congress with its strong substantive committees, this is unlikely to be a favored outcome. Thus, the rational choice approach to legislative studies suggests that Congress will not support a generalized imposition of cost–benefit tests unless their own preferences are very far from those of the executive and close to the conclusions of the cost–benefit test. For example, during the Clinton Administration under divided government, members of Congress introduced several bills to mandate cost–benefit analysis and other related techniques. In a unitary parliamentary system such legislative initiatives are unlikely, but the underlying conflicts may still exist beneath the surface.

2. Public Participation in the Regulatory Process

Discussions of ‘good’ policy by social scientists, risk analysts, and other specialists sometimes clash with the democratic accountability of agency policymaking. In the United States the APA requires notice, consultation, and reason-giving for most federal rulemaking.43 The final rule can then be subject to judicial review, which reaches beyond compliance with the procedural demands of the APA to consider the rational underpinnings of the rule and its consistency with the implementing statute. Moves in this direction are occurring elsewhere as regulatory agencies have begun to introduce consultation and transparency requirements. However, these reforms are seldom legally enforceable, essentially leaving their continued viability to the regulators themselves, who may or may not find them to be politically expedient.

The tension between technical competence and democratic legitimacy may be less evident in legal systems outside the United States where the law does little to constrain policymaking processes compared with the adjudication of individual administrative acts.44 Judicial review, except where human rights or other constitutional prescriptions are at stake, does not usually take on the merits of broad policy choices. However, even if the tension is not so obvious elsewhere, it is still present, but the American model is not the only way to deal with the issue.

40 [Page 7 of 14] In Europe there is a lively debate on the benefits of expanded public participation and transparency requirements in rulemaking. This debate is occurring at the same time as substantive policymaking principles are also being scrutinized under the rubric of Impact Assessment.45 However, administrative law remains relatively untouched; it concentrates on decisions in individual cases as opposed to the policymaking process.

However one views the debate over policymaking as an administrative law matter, it is a key area of contestation over regulatory policy. Tensions between technical expertise and democratic accountability exist in many countries, and the courts have frequently tried to manage that tension. Courts uphold statutory public participation requirements but seldom impose them on their own initiative. According to one study, in the United States and the European Union, courts act as a counterweight to the prevailing ethos—upholding expertise in the United States, and treating claims of expertise with caution in the European Union. The UK courts view both public participation and expertise with skepticism and they legitimate administrative action based on a Weberian understanding of a hierarchical, professional, politically neutral civil service.46
The Regulatory State

The tension between public participation and competent policy implementation is frequently overstated by committed technocrats. Participation and transparency can serve not just as ways to protect rights but also as means to the end of better policy outcomes. Greater public involvement may both produce more effective policy and increase the acceptability of the regulatory process both in representative democracies and in entities, such as the European Union, that also seek public legitimacy. As a practical matter, however, regulatory agencies may not move toward greater participation and stronger standards of transparency and reason-giving absent a concerted public outcry. In the United States the APA arguably arose from congressional effort to constrain delegated policymaking under a separation-of-powers system. No such incentives exist in parliamentary systems.

Paradoxically, however, many new regulatory agencies in Europe have introduced accountable procedures on their own initiative even though they are isolated from electoral politics. Regulators in France, the United Kingdom, and Sweden supported greater public involvement because they needed outside support to survive and could imitate established models in the United States and elsewhere. More participatory and transparent processes were seen as a way of increasing their own legitimacy. However, these moves did not always have that effect. Sometimes they simply increased the power of the regulated industry. In some cases, however, the agencies reacted to the risk of capture by taking steps to facilitate consumer input.

For policies where a cost–benefit test seems appropriate, the regulator could combine cost–benefit analysis with transparency as a means of blocking agencies from adopting measures that benefit narrow interests. Cost–benefit criteria could be a default criterion for regulations designed to improve the efficiency of the economy, subject to override by statutory mandates and to constitutional limits. In spite of the potential inconsistency between democratic choice and cost–benefit analysis, the courts could impose policy analytic techniques on agencies as a way to limit capture by narrow interests. The legislature would be able to override the norm with explicit statutory language, but non-transparent efforts to induce agencies to benefit narrow interests could not be implemented. This requirement could have legal force if applied by the courts. A judicial presumption in favor of net benefit maximization increases the political costs for narrow groups, which would have to obtain explicit statutory language in order to have their interests recognized by courts and agencies. This proposal is, of course, controversial even in the United States and would presumably be unworkable in legal regimes with little court review of rulemaking. Yet it raises an important question that is central to the following discussion of administrative litigation. What should be the judiciary’s role in reviewing the policymaking activities of modern executive branch bodies and regulatory agencies? Going further, should the courts review the process of statutory drafting, particularly in unitary parliamentary regimes?

V. Judicial Review

The final piece of the administrative law and policy puzzle is the judiciary. Statutes often include provisions for judicial review of regulatory action. Why would the legislature write such provisions into statutes when they know that the courts either may not share their policy preferences or may be constrained by their judicial role? According to William Landes and Richard Posner, the US Congress includes judicial review so that courts will ratify the original statutory deal if agencies overreach. There is obviously some tension between the view of courts as carrying out oversight functions for the legislature and courts as composed of judges with their own policy preferences which may differ from those of the enacting legislature.

To see how the US courts actually operate begin with Chevron, USA, Inc v National Resources Defense Council. Consistent with the Landes and Posner view, the decision holds that courts should be sure that agencies have followed congressional intent. However, departing from that view, it goes on to hold that if the intent is unclear, courts should be deferential to reasonable agency interpretations of their statutory mandates. Writing soon after the decision, however, Justice (then Judge) Breyer argues against such a strict interpretation of the decision and at the same time urges that courts should show more deference to agency expertise on policy matters. William N. Eskridge Jr and John Ferejohn, in contrast, argue that aggressive judicial review of both law and policy is desirable to rein in agencies that have become too independent of the legislature. Thus, for them, Chevron is an unfortunate move in the wrong direction. Why would judges tie their own hands when it comes to statutory interpretation? One explanation comes from Linda R. Cohen and Matthew L. Spitzer who explain the puzzle with a self-interest explanation that is contingent on the political configurations of the time. They claim that by the mid-1980s both the Supreme Court and the agencies had become more conservative than the lower courts. Chevron was a way for the Supreme Court to rein in the lower courts and give more leeway to agencies.\(^5\)

The strategic interactions between the courts and agencies cannot be measured by looking only at decided cases. Agencies seek to avoid the time and trouble of lawsuits and also seek to avoid the consequences of an unfavorable outcome. If they tailor their actions to avoid judicial challenges, one should be able to see a connection between the ideological composition of the courts and agency behavior even if no cases have been litigated. To test this proposition, Brandice Canes-Wrone collected data on the Army Corps of Engineers’ decisions to grant or to withhold permits to develop wetlands. The Corps operates throughout the United States, and US district judges have jurisdiction over lawsuits filed against the Corps. Canes-Wrone found that ‘officials were significantly less likely to issue a permit the more liberal the lower courts in which the decision could be litigated.’\(^6\)

Finally, one needs to consider the regulated entities themselves and the organized beneficiaries of regulation, such as labor unions and environmental groups. Judicial review is not automatic and will not occur unless someone has an incentive to bring a case.\(^7\) One benefit of court review may be a delay in the implementation of a final rule. As Mashaw argues, the current situation gives regulated entities too few incentives to comply promptly. He supports a reduction in the possibilities for pre-enforcement review so that the courts would only get involved after the rule has gone into effect. This would limit the strategic options for firms, but there are difficulties. Challenges to agency rulemaking processes, which are at the heart of the democratic justification for delegation, would then be very difficult to bring successfully if considerable time has elapsed between the promulgation of a rule and its review by a court.\(^8\)

Comparative analysis takes account of the differences in constitutional structures and permits one to assess some of the general claims made by political economic research on the United States. Under the Landes and Posner view, judicial review is a result of the legislature’s desire to check the executive, and its inability to do this effectively on its own. The legislature is the dominant actor that can assign tasks to the courts. Hence, parliamentary systems ought to provide for lower levels of judicial oversight of the administration than presidential systems. In a parliamentary system the same political coalition controls both branches, and so legislators from the majority coalition do not want the courts to intervene to oversee executive action. Court review of administrative action cannot lock in past political choices because statutes are quite easy to change when executive and legislature are under unified political control. In contrast to these expectations, Elizabeth Magill and Daniel Ortiz find that courts in the United Kingdom, France, and Germany are quite active in reviewing administrative actions.\(^9\) Either the theory of legislative behavior has limited force, or other factors prevent the government from constraining the courts. The courts themselves seem to be independent actors at least insofar as they assert jurisdiction and oversee the executive. Tom Zwart argues (p. 684) that if the legislature does not provide aggressive oversight of the executive, the courts will be under pressure from the public and interest groups to take on this role. Under this dynamic view of checks and balance, if judges believe that executive discretion needs to be controlled and if the legislature is doing little, they may step in, grant standing to public interest plaintiffs, and limit executive power.\(^10\)

VI. Conclusions

As the regulatory state emerged over the course of the twentieth century, administrative law helped to mediate the exercise of public power. It operates at the borders between the private and public sectors. Its constitutional role extends beyond the assurance of fair and transparent procedures and the protection of individual rights. It also concerns the democratic legitimacy of government policymaking. A fair and open policymaking process helps democratic citizens to hold modern government to account in the face of demands for delegation and regulation, both within and beyond the state. Thus, administrative law must be in dialogue with constitutional law as the modern state develops.

Recent research in economics and political economy can help one to understand why delegation accompanied by judicial review occurs and how the self-interest of political, bureaucratic, and judicial actors interacts with institutional structures to determine outcomes. It can also illuminate the normative role of economic analysis in helping politicians and policymakers design and implement policies. However, a number of limitations of existing scholarship suggest directions for future research. The political economy literature is often quite impoverished in dealing with normative issues. To the extent a normative position can be inferred, accountability is generally couched in terms of the compatibility between what the Congress wants and what the agency does. However, a full evaluation of the accountability of agencies needs to bring in the preferences of the public. If the representative character of the lawmaking and oversight processes in Congress is in doubt, then government accountability to citizens may be enhanced by delegation.

Proponents of deliberative democracy support a strong version of this view. For example, Mark Seidenfeld defends APA procedures on a civic republican theory under which ideal policy is made through a deliberative process that produces consensus. However, the hope for consensus is a false promise as a general ideal for policymaking. At the heart of public choice problems are often deep disagreements over values that go beyond narrow self-interest. Nevertheless, in the United States informal rulemaking under the APA can increase the range of interests consulted and produce more transparent and defensible policies. The Act's rulemaking provisions, which require notice, open hearings, and reason-giving, not only permit Congress to find out about and influence what is happening, but also help to assure that those especially concerned with a particular issue have their say. The final decision is made by the agency, subject to the political oversight of the President and the legislature and to judicial review, but the process gives a role to those outside government with an interest in the matter. Far from being a subversion of constitutional, democratic principles, these procedures are a check on agency action and indirectly on congressional actions (p. 685) as well. Parliamentary systems with quite different administrative law traditions face the same need to justify government and agency policymaking. Constitutional reformers thus need to consider expanding judicially enforceable rights of participation, transparency, and reason-giving even in such systems where the dynamics of ordinary politics will not produce statutes that require more accountable policymaking inside government. (p. 686)

Bibliography

Stephen Breyer, Breaking the Vicious Circle (1993)
Paul Craig and Adam Tomkins (eds), The Executive and Public Law: Power and Accountability in Comparative Perspective (2006)
Peter Lindseth, Power and Legitimacy: Reconciling Europe and the Nation-State (2010)
Susan Rose-Ackerman, Controlling Environmental Policy; The Limits of Public Law in Germany and the United States (1995)
The Regulatory State

Susan Rose-Ackerman and Peter Lindseth (eds), Comparative Administrative Law (2010)

Luc Verhey, Hansko Broeksteeg, and Ilse Van Den Driessche (eds), Political Accountability in Europe; Which Way Forward? (2008)

Notes:

(1) For a recent compilation of scholarship that illustrates these alternative models see Susan Rose-Ackerman and Peter Lindseth, Comparative Administrative Law (2010). Portions of this chapter are drawn from our introductory chapter.

(2) Susan Rose-Ackerman, Controlling Environmental Policy; The Limits of Public Law in Germany and the United States (1995), 57–8.

(7) For a discussion of the German case see Rose-Ackerman (n 2), 72–81, 125–31.

Economics 211.

(19) John Ferejohn and Charles Shipan, ‘Congressional Influence on Bureaucracy’ (1990) 6 Special Issue Journal of Law, Economics, and Organization 1, reprinted in Rose-Ackerman (n 8), 207.

(23) This section is derived from one part of the introduction to Rose-Ackerman and Lindseth (n 1).

(26) Dominique Custos, ‘Independent Administrative Authorities in France: Structural and Procedural Change at the Intersection of Americanization, Europeanization and Gallicization’ in Rose-Ackerman and Lindseth (n 1), 277.

(30) Catherine Donnelly, ‘Participation and Expertise: Judicial Attitudes in Comparative Perspective’ in Rose-Ackerman and Lindseth (n 1), 357.

(31) Marianna Mota Prado, ‘Presidential Dominance from a Comparative Perspective: The Relationship between the Executive Branch and Regulatory Agencies in Brazil’ in Rose-Ackerman and Lindseth (n 1), 225.

(32) Jiunn-rong Yeh, ‘Experimenting with Independent Commissions in a New Democracy with a Civil Law Tradition: The Case of Taiwan’ in Rose-Ackerman and Lindseth (n 1), 246.
The Regulatory State

(33) John M. Ackerman, ‘Understanding Independent Accountability Agencies’ in Rose-Ackerman and Lindseth (n 1), 265. On the way presidents can subvert oversight agencies, see the cases of Argentina and the Philippines discussed in Susan Rose-Ackerman, Diane Desierto, and Natalia Volosin, ‘Hyper-Presidentialism: Separation of Powers without Checks and Balances’ (2011) 29 Berkeley Journal of International Law 246.

(41) Ackerman (n 24), 688–714.

(42) Rose-Ackerman (n 38).

(43) APA §§ 553 and 706.

(44) Rose-Ackerman (n 2); Susan Rose-Ackerman, From Elections to Democracy: Building Accountable Government in Hungary and Poland (2005).

(46) Donnelly (n 30), 357.

(47) On the EU see Peter Lindseth, Power and Legitimacy: Reconciling Europe and the Nation State (2010).

(48) McCubbins et al (n 14).

(51) Susan Rose-Ackerman, Rethinking the Progressive Agenda: The Reform of the American Regulatory State (1992); Sunstein (n 37), 191–228.

(60) M. Elizabeth Magill and Daniel R. Ortiz, ‘Comparative Positive Political Theory’ in Rose-Ackerman and Lindseth (n 1), 134.

(61) Tom Zwart, ‘Overseeing the Executive: Is the Legislature Reclaiming Lost Territory from the Courts?’ in Rose-Ackerman and Lindseth (n 1), 148.

(63) Rose-Ackerman (n 2); Rose-Ackerman (n 43); Rose-Ackerman (n 57); Mashaw (n 21).

---

Susan Rose-Ackerman

Susan Rose-Ackerman is Henry R. Luce Professor of Jurisprudence (Law and Political Science), Yale University
The provisions of national constitutions, like other laws, are often ambiguous, vague, contradictory, insufficiently explicit, or even silent as to constitutional disputes that judges must decide. In addition, they sometimes seem inadequate to deal appropriately with developments that threaten principles the constitution was intended to safeguard, developments that its founders either failed or were unable to anticipate. How judges resolve these problems through ‘interpretation’ is problematic and controversial, mainly because legitimate interpretation is difficult to distinguish from illegitimate change. This article discusses the interpretive methodologies of the courts of six federations that were the subject of a recent comparative study and then provides some explanations of the differences between them. These are Australia, Canada, Germany, India, South Africa, and the United States.

Keywords: constitution, interpretation, courts, judges, Australia, Canada, Germany, India, South Africa, United States

I. Interpretive Methodologies and the Rule of Law 689

II. Comparing Interpretive Methodologies 693

1. The United States 696
2. Canada 698
3. Australia 700
4. Germany 701
5. India 703
6. South Africa 705

III. Explaining the Differences 706

1. The Nature and Age of the Constitution 707
2. Legal Culture 709
3. Judicial Appointments and Homogeneity 710
4. Political Culture 712
5. ‘The Felt Necessities of the Time’ 715

I. Interpretive Methodologies and the Rule of Law

The provisions of national constitutions, like other laws, are often ambiguous, vague, contradictory, insufficiently explicit, or even silent as to constitutional disputes that judges must decide. In addition, they sometimes seem inadequate to deal appropriately with developments that threaten principles the constitution was intended to safeguard, developments that its founders either failed or were unable to anticipate.

How judges resolve these problems through ‘interpretation’ is problematic and controversial, mainly because legitimate interpretation is difficult to distinguish from illegitimate change.\(^1\) Judges thought to have improperly changed the constitution while purporting to (p. 690) interpret it are vulnerable to criticism for usurping the prescribed power of amendment, violating their duty of fidelity to law, retrospectively altering litigants’ legal rights, flouting the principles of democracy and federalism (if the amending procedure requires special majorities to protect regional interests), and straying beyond their legal expertise into the realm of politics.

How judges interpret other laws can also be controversial, but the stakes are much higher where constitutions are concerned. As fundamental laws, they allocate and regulate the powers of government and the rights of citizens. Their interpretation can have profound effects on the institutional structure of society, and the exercise of political power within it. It can affect the distribution of powers or rights between organs of government (legislature, executive, and judiciary), levels of government (national and state), and government and citizen. Moreover, legislatures can readily change other laws if they disapprove of the way judges have interpreted them, but constitutions are usually much more difficult to amend, and erroneous or undesirable judicial interpretations therefore more difficult to correct (except by the judges themselves).

This is why political scientists rightly depict constitutional courts as political institutions that wield enormous power. Whenever judicial decisions change the law, judges exercise political power, and when that law is their nation’s constitution, they exercise the highest political power that exists in the state. Yet judges, perhaps even more than other political actors, are supposed to be constrained by laws, including the very laws they are responsible for interpreting. Any study of the behaviour of political actors in a society that aspires to the rule of law must include some account of how effectively their exercise of power is ruled by law.\(^2\) Crucial to such an account, in the case of a constitutional court, is the methodology that it uses to interpret the constitution: the considerations it takes into account, explicitly or implicitly, and their relative priority or weight. It is crucial partly because such a court is rarely subject to regular review by any other institution: its fidelity to law depends mainly on its judges’ commitment to their own professional ethic, implemented by the procedures and methods of reasoning they follow. Their interpretive methodology constitutes their response to the tension between fidelity to the terms of the constitution, including its amending procedure, and the need to act creatively to resolve indeterminacies in its meaning or (perhaps) even to modify that meaning to deal with other pressing difficulties. That methodology also implicitly defines the boundary between interpretation aimed at revealing or clarifying the meaning that the constitution already possesses, and interpretation that is essentially creative, supplementing or modifying that meaning. This is implicit because judges rarely acknowledge the creative component of their interpretive function.

In drawing this boundary, some courts are more attracted to what can be called, solely for convenience, ‘legalism’. This term is used here in a purely descriptive sense, neither to applaud nor to denigrate, but merely to denote interpretive philosophies motivated by distrust of discretionary judicial lawmaking: that is, decision-making guided by subjective values rather than objective legal norms, which changes the law by establishing authoritative precedent. As previously suggested, there are many reasons for this distrust, including equity among litigants, predictability, democracy, and the rule of law.\(^3\)

(p. 691) Legalists would prefer law to be objective, determinate, and comprehensive, so that it can provide answers to every dispute, which judges can reliably ascertain and apply. We have already noted that this ambition is impossible to realize in practice, because constitutions inevitably include ambiguities, vagueness, inconsistencies, and ‘gaps’. Judges cannot wash their hands of a dispute and leave the parties to fight it out in the street. It follows that they must act creatively to resolve stubborn indeterminacies and gaps in the constitution, by using extra-constitutional principles of justice or public policy to ascribe to it meanings that it did not previously possess. In the real world, legalists must accept the inevitability of both legal indeterminacy and consequential judicial discretion.\(^4\) They can, however, advocate maximal determinacy.

Legalism in constitutional law has been associated with various tendencies, including literalism, formalism, positivism, and originalism. For present purposes, it is useful to characterize legalism as a preference for positivism rather than normativism, and originalism rather than non-originalism. Neither distinction is a dichotomy: each pair of alternatives represents a spectrum of possibilities. Judges, courts, and legal cultures adopt positions somewhere between the two ends of each spectrum, sometimes closer to the legalist end, and sometimes closer to the opposite end. Particular interpretive philosophies could be plotted on a graph, with these distinctions forming the two axes. But they are somewhat opaque, and require further elaboration.
By ‘positivism’ I mean, in this context, a conception of a constitution as a set of discrete written provisions, whose authority derives from their having been formally adopted or enacted. By ‘normativism’, I mean a holistic conception of a constitution as more than the sum of its written provisions: as a normative structure whose provisions are, either explicitly or implicitly, based on deeper principles, and ultimately on abstract norms of political morality that are the deepest source of its authority. At one extremity of this spectrum, positivism degenerates into literalism: the meanings of the constitution’s written provisions are taken to be fixed by conventional word meanings and rules of grammar, independent of the founders’ purposes. Less extreme versions of positivism are purposive: they are prepared to interpret the words of express provisions in light of their purposes, without allowing those purposes to either supplement or override the words, or to have independent normative force. A stronger version of purposivism permits the recognition of implications, provided that they are necessary for express provisions to achieve their purposes. As one moves even further towards the normativist end of the spectrum, increasingly abstract formulations of purpose are preferred, and to implement them more effectively, the enacted words may be stretched or compressed, supplemented or overridden—in effect, rewritten. At the extreme end, the most abstract norms attributed to the constitution are directly enforced in their own right, independently of express provisions.

By ‘originalism’, I mean the thesis that the content of a constitution is determined partly by the intentions or purposes of its founders, or the understandings of the founding generation. ‘Non-originalism’ treats these considerations as either irrelevant or of little weight, and licenses judges to interpret the constitutional text according to the supposed meanings, values, (p. 692) or understandings of contemporary society. There are, again, more or less moderate versions of both alternatives. Each one is compatible with either positivism or normativism. An originalist may be a positivist, who maintains that the meanings of express provisions are determined by original intentions or understandings, or a normativist, who equates the constitution’s deepest norms with the founders’ deepest purposes. Similarly, a non-originalist may be either a positivist or a normativist, regarding either the meanings of express provisions, or the constitution’s deepest norms, as determined by contemporary understandings or values.

Non-originalist normativism is a particularly potent agent of substantive constitutional change through judicial interpretation. If a constitution is regarded as based on unwritten, abstract norms of political morality, which can trump the specific terms of written provisions or even be independently enforced, and if those norms can change according to the judges’ impressions of contemporary values or their personal values, then the judges possess a remarkable power to reshape the constitution. Indeed, extreme non-originalist normativism may be indistinguishable from natural law philosophies that regard law as a branch of political morality, to which positive law always remains subordinate. Both positions may also be practically indistinguishable from a strong form of pragmatism, which holds that judges should be guided by positive law only insofar as that is the best option, all things considered. Even originalist normativism can be difficult to distinguish from these positions, if the founders’ deepest purposes are formulated as abstractly as ‘to achieve justice’.

The relationship between these distinctions and the objectivity, determinacy, and comprehensiveness of law is debatable. Normativism makes law more comprehensive than positivism, because it offers much richer normative resources to guide decision-making. Discrete written provisions, even if they are interpreted purposively, provide less comprehensive guidance than abstract norms of political morality. But legalists believe that this greater comprehensiveness comes at the cost of objectivity and determinacy. They distrust the incorporation of moral and political norms into law, on the ground that the usual abstraction and vagueness of such norms compels judges to resort to discretionary value judgments. This is particularly the case if these norms can be used to trump, or be enforced independently of, the wording of enacted provisions.

Legalists fear that strong forms of non-originalism and normativism license judges to change constitutions in three ways: (1) by changing the meanings of their words; (2) by in effect rewriting their express provisions to better implement deeper values; and (3) by adding to them new, ‘unwritten’ principles. Legalists insist that judges should be bound not only by the founders’ ultimate ends, but also by the means they chose to achieve those ends. To be guided only or mainly by their ultimate ends is not to be significantly bound at all.

But legalist critiques are not necessarily persuasive. For example, there can be no doubt that implications are sometimes justified: the content of a constitution, as of any law and indeed any communication, is never completely explicit. Full comprehension of its meaning inevitably depends partly on an understanding of purpose, illuminated by contextual information, and on background assumptions that are taken for granted. Just as indeterminacy gives rise to a superstructure of judge-made law built on the constitutional text, inexplicitness requires a substructure of unwritten purposes to be excavated beneath the text. Furthermore, a strong case can be made for courts sometimes making adjustments for the inability of language in an old constitution, if strictly applied, to achieve its purposes in the modern world, because of technological or social developments that its founders did not anticipate. Take the provision in the US Constitution that vests exclusive power in Congress to raise and maintain ‘armies’ and ‘a navy’ and to regulate ‘the land and naval forces’. When military aircraft were developed, it would have defeated the provision’s obvious purpose if Congress had been denied the power to raise an air force. It is widely accepted that in such cases, the courts may adopt a purposive rather than a literal interpretation, by stretching the provision’s literal meaning to give effect to what it originally meant, in a broad sense of ‘meant’ that is informed by its purpose. But if ‘rewriting’ to this small extent is justified, where should the line be drawn?

Consider also the extent to which courts should remedy failures on the part of the constitution’s founders expressly to provide for problems, even if they should have foreseen them. When interpreting statutes, judges usually refuse to rectify failures of that kind, on the ground that the legislature should do so. But when dealing with a constitution, they should arguably be more willing to provide a solution. If a constitution fails to achieve one of its main purposes, the potential consequences are grave. They include the danger of constitutional powers being abused, of the democratic process or the federal system being subverted, and of human rights being violated. If the constitution is difficult to amend formally, or if amendment requires action by the very politicians who pose the threat needing to be checked, there may be good moral reasons for judges to intervene. True fidelity to the constitution may require some adjustment of its terms. On the other hand, legalists worry that such reasoning can be used to justify extensive judicial rewriting of the constitution, especially if the founders’ purposes are pitched at a very abstract level (‘they wanted to achieve a just society, and this is necessary to achieve justice’). Legalists deny that judges are ‘statesmen’, appointed to fill the shoes of the founders and continue the task of constitution-making as an ongoing enterprise.

One conclusion that should be drawn from this brief discussion is that constitutional interpretation is an extraordinarily difficult enterprise, which requires striking an appropriate balance between competing, weighty considerations. The distinction between legitimate and illegitimate change depends on a host of other difficult distinctions, such as between determinacy and indeterminacy, purpose used to clarify meaning and purpose used to change it, genuine implications and spurious ones, evidence of intentions or understandings that illuminates original meanings and that which does not, changes in the meaning of a provision and changes in its application, and so on. The sheer difficulty of drawing such distinctions, even for philosophers after prolonged reflection, let alone for busy judges, should make anyone pause before criticizing judges too forcefully. It is doubtful that the most appropriate balance is, even in principle, determined by wholly objective, ‘strictly legal’ considerations. Ultimately, it requires normative judgment. And how the balance should be struck no doubt varies, depending on the unique circumstances in which any constitutional court finds itself.

II. Comparing Interpretive Methodologies

Comparative studies of how constitutions have been interpreted in different legal systems have a variety of objectives. Sometimes the objective is wholly practical: to help to interpret a provision in one constitution by learning how similar provisions have been interpreted elsewhere. Courts around the world increasingly seek this kind of guidance. Indeed, why, how, (p. 694) and to what extent they do so has itself become a subject of comparative study. But this can be part of a much broader inquiry into the interpretive methodologies that different courts employ, and their underlying philosophies, in negotiating the tension previously noted between fidelity to the terms of a constitution, including its amending procedure, and the necessity or desirability of some measure of judicial creativity.

Such an inquiry can be of value to lawyers and political scientists, who are both concerned with practical implementation of the rule of law. Moreover, it can broaden lawyers’ horizons by dispelling any sense of false necessity and expanding their sense of what is possible. Learning how foreign courts tackle interpretive problems might reveal that one’s own courts ‘simply fail adequately to address arguments that apparently sensible people in other nations have addressed’. Of course, it does not follow that practices appropriate in one country are universally applicable: another potential benefit of comparative study is to help to explain or even to justify differences in terms of institutional, political, social, and cultural circumstances. For example, a recent study of constitutional interpretation in Australia, Canada, and the United States attempts to explain the rise of originalism in US academic, political, and judicial circles since the 1980s in terms of cultural circumstances unique to that country. What is necessary or appropriate to the rule of law in one country might not be the same in another. On the other hand, if it turns out that some approaches to constitutional interpretation are almost universal, that might strengthen the case in their favour.
Constitutional Interpretation

Such an inquiry must not be confined to the interpretation of constitutional provisions that protect human rights, although most of the comparative literature has that focus. Constitutions are not mainly or even primarily about protecting rights from the powers of governmental institutions. Before doing that, they must establish and empower those institutions, and resolve numerous ‘structural’ issues concerning methods of appointment, decision-making procedures, demarcations of powers, checks and balances, and so on. Just as important as rights guarantees are provisions dividing powers between chambers in a bicameral legislature, between the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of government, and between the national and regional polities in a federation. An overemphasis on rights protection leads to exaggerated claims, such as that the principle of proportionality has made textual interpretation mostly redundant in constitutional cases, or that the main function of constitutional review is to articulate, promote, and enforce the political morality of the community. A fixation with rights might also distort an analysis of interpretive methodologies, for reasons given below.

In what follows, I attempt to summarize the interpretive methodologies of the courts of six federations that were the subject of a recent comparative study, and then provide some explanations of the differences between them. They are Australia, Canada, Germany, India, South Africa, and the United States. A more comprehensive comparative study would be desirable. For example, it has been claimed that in Europe, ‘recourse to originalism is virtually non-existent’. But constitutional interpretation in Austria, at least in relation to the federal division of legislative powers, involves a combination of originalist and structuralist reasoning.

Attempting an overall characterization of the interpretive philosophy of any court is hazardous. It may be distorted if undue emphasis is given to a small number of prominent but only partially representative decisions (eg decisions exclusively about rights guarantees rather than structural provisions). It involves generalizing about interpretive philosophies that are rarely well theorized by judges and never wholly coherent, using terminology such as ‘originalist’ that is often ambiguous, vague, and contested. Judges may disagree about these interpretive philosophies, and it may be unclear whose views predominate. Courts that have been in business for a long time may have changed their interpretive approach, possibly more than once. Moreover, to some extent all courts are guided by a diversity of considerations, pursuing what Mark Tushnet calls ‘eclecticism’. Consequently, observers may reasonably disagree in characterizing the predominant interpretive methodology even in a single case, and a fortiori in a large number of cases. Nevertheless, there is often widespread agreement among comparativists about the general tendencies and patterns of reasoning of different national courts. It is universally agreed, for example, that the Australian High Court has traditionally been much more legalist (as previously defined) than its Canadian, German, Indian, and South African counterparts.

Constitutional interpretation is guided by much the same set of considerations in all six countries studied. The main ones are: the words of the constitutional text, understood in the context of related provisions; other evidence of the intentions, understandings, or purposes of the founders; presumptions favouring broad, or purposive, interpretations; so-called ‘structural’ principles regarded as underlying particular provisions, groups of provisions or the constitution as a whole; precedent and judicial doctrine developed from it; and considerations of justice, practicality, and public policy. Other considerations include additional presumptions and maxims of interpretation, sometimes counselling deference to long-standing practice or the elected branches of government, international and comparative law, and academic opinion.

But it would be a mistake to overemphasize this similarity in judicial methodology. Careful discrimination is required. Judges rarely attempt rigorous theoretical analysis of interpretive problems or the methods they use to resolve them. In particular, they seldom acknowledge the difference between attempting to clarify a constitution’s pre-existing meaning, and creatively supplementing or modifying it. Most of the considerations just listed can be used for either purpose: for example, considerations of justice and public policy can be used as evidence of the framers’ intentions (‘they could not have intended that’) or as independent guides to creative gap-filling. Moreover, there are substantial differences in the relative priorities or weights given to these diverse considerations in the six countries studied. For example, precedents and established judicial doctrine naturally play a larger role in common law jurisdictions, and in the interpretation of older constitutions (partly because they have more precedents); academic opinion has far more influence in Germany than in common law jurisdictions; original intentions or understandings are relied on more in the United States and Australia than elsewhere; ‘structural’ principles play a more pervasive role in Canada, Germany, India, and South Africa than in Australia or the United States; justice and public policy seem more influential in India than anywhere else; and comparative law is given much less attention in the United States than in the other countries. These differences cannot be demonstrated in detail here; particulars are provided in the comparative study previously cited.22

Perhaps even more significant are substantial differences in the underlying philosophies of interpretation favoured by courts in the six countries. Australian and US judges have tended to be more attracted to legalist philosophies than their Indian and Canadian counterparts, who changed their approaches, in the 1970s and 1980s respectively; German and South African judges arguably sit somewhere in between; and US judges appear to have been more divided than others over these issues.

1. The United States

Professor Tushnet has depicted constitutional interpretation in the United States as, for the most part, straightforwardly legalist. When the Supreme Court interprets a constitutional provision without the assistance of precedent, either because the issue is novel or because the Court regards existing precedents as erroneous, it starts with the constitutional text, understood in the context of related provisions, and in light of original understandings and the political theory that the Court finds in the text.23 But in most cases, relevant precedents do exist, and are the predominant consideration, followed by text-based and originalist considerations that ‘often go hand in hand’.24 Professor Tushnet asserts that ‘some version of a jurisprudence of original understanding remains an essential element of nearly all practical resolutions of interpretive controversies’.25 In the recent case of Heller, evidence of original meaning notoriously prevailed over a 69-year-old Supreme Court precedent and hundreds of (p. 697) federal court opinions based on it.26 Resort to ‘structural’ principles is less frequent, except in separation of powers and individual rights cases, and is used mainly to support other arguments; and explicit reference to moral or political philosophy is rare except when the text expressly incorporates moral principles.27 Where the text does so, the Court is entitled to ignore the founders’ possibly mistaken expectations about the proper application of those principles; any accusation of ‘activism’ in such cases is therefore unfair.28 Sometimes the Court is criticized for excessive formalism.29

Yet the Supreme Court has acquired a reputation for activism, because of perceived innovations such as substantive due process, the ‘incorporation’ of the Bill of Rights in the Fourteenth Amendment, broad interpretation of some provisions contrary to the apparent original understanding, and unenumerated rights, such as the right to privacy recognized in Griswold v Connecticut and extended to abortions in Roe v Wade.30 Professor Tushnet acknowledges that the Warren Court had an ‘aggressive agenda’, which aroused considerable controversy over its alleged activism from the 1950s onwards.31 But he maintains that its decisions fell well within the bounds set by standards of professional competence.32 Some if not all of those decisions can be defended on orthodox legalist grounds: substantive due process, for example, reflected a technical meaning acquired by the words ‘due process’ before they were inserted into the Constitution, and the implied right to privacy is arguably as legitimate as implied intergovernmental immunities.33

Professor Tushnet argues that orthodox interpretive considerations—text, original understanding, precedent, and so on—have been unable to significantly constrain decision-making.34 Precedent, for example, has not provided ‘stability’ partly because the judges have been unwilling to subordinate their views to those expressed in the precedents. Consequently, the precedents have come to provide an array of alternatives from which current judges can choose.35 And original understandings have failed to constrain, partly because they often merely reveal disagreements among the founders themselves, and partly because they can be specified at different levels of generality, which point to different conclusions.36 Consequently, judges can implement their own ‘values and visions’ by choosing appropriate interpretive methods, without exceeding the bounds set by standards of professional competence.37

But to the outside observer, the impression conveyed by the political battles that often attend the confirmation of Supreme Court nominees is that interpretive standards are deeply conflicted in the United States. Decisions attacked as activist fall outside the standards accepted by some sections of the profession, even though they are within the standards accepted by others. If so, US constitutional culture might best be characterized as a site of conflict over interpretive philosophies, within the profession as well as outside it.

Professor Tushnet's chapter includes some evidence that professional standards are conflicted, with many lawyers accepting normativist standards that others repudiate. First, he points out that the early debate between Justices Iredell and Chase in Calder v Bull, about the legitimacy of 'unwritten principles' of reason and justice, was never resolved. Consequently, a controversial strain of natural law thinking seems to have persisted in US constitutional jurisprudence. For example, Justice Chase's insistence that all governments in the United States are necessarily limited may have provided the crucial 'structural' pre-supposition behind the much-criticized right to privacy.

Second, Professor Tushnet claims that the American people have come to accept that constitutional interpretation 'is the means by which the Constitution is recurrently revised to accommodate the general values embodied in the Constitution with the realities of governance in a changing world.' This view can be traced back to Chief Justice Marshall's influential statement in McCulloch v Maryland, that the Constitution was 'intended to endure for ages to come, and, consequently, to be adapted to the various crises of human affairs'. According to Professor Tushnet, this became 'the touchstone for everyone who defended the idea of a living Constitution'. The notion of a 'living constitution' that the courts can 'adapt' to changing circumstances is ambiguous: it could mean either that broad but unchanging meanings must be applied to new and unexpected phenomena, or that the meanings themselves must sometimes be changed for that purpose. As Professor Tushnet explains, the principal method of adapting the Constitution to external change has been to identify the general purposes or principles underlying specific constitutional terms, and then to determine how those principles apply to contemporary problems. It is notable that in Heller, the principal dissenting judgment involved just such reasoning. This is what I have called 'originalist normativism'. If the underlying principles are couched at a sufficiently abstract level of generality, the specific terms may lose their grip. That, one suspects, has been a bone of contention.

2. Canada

The Privy Council almost took a literal approach to the Canadian Constitution, refusing to consult legislative history to ascertain the founders' intentions or purposes. The text itself had been drafted in a deliberately ambiguous fashion, and the ambiguities were resolved according to the judges' preconceptions of the nature of a genuine federation. In other words, the judges' own ideology proved decisive. It generally favoured broad interpretations of provincial powers and narrow interpretations of national ones, which may have suited Canadian society better than the founders' intentions, by mollifying separatist sentiment in Quebec. This is a good example of how literalism, by excluding extra-textual evidence of legislative purpose and intention, can increase textual indeterminacy and the consequent need for discretionary judicial lawmaking.

The Privy Council described the Constitution as a 'living tree capable of growth and expansion within its natural limits', but probably did not have in mind changes in the meaning of the text resulting from judicial interpretation. It probably intended merely to endorse 'generous', rather than 'dynamic', interpretation. But the modern Supreme Court has enthusiastically employed the metaphor to justify dynamic interpretation: the notion that, without any need for formal amendment, the Constitution should be capable of 'growth, development and adjustment to changing societal needs'. Professor Hogg states that originalism has 'never enjoyed any significant support in Canada', and 'indifference to the original understanding lingers on in the modern Supreme Court'. Indeed, the lawyers and politicians who drafted and adopted the Charter apparently assumed that the Court would not be bound by their intentions. Consequently, the Court has held that a provision embodied the US doctrine of substantive due process, even though it had been deliberately drafted so as not to do so. The judicial choice of the opposite meaning to the one intended goes well beyond 'adaptation' of the provision to cope with developments unanticipated by its framers: it involves altering the provision's intended meaning in circumstances that they fully anticipated. Professor Hogg describes the principle of 'progressive (or dynamic) interpretation' as 'the dominant theory of interpretation in Canada'. It should be noted, however, that originalist reasoning has played a large part in so-called 'confederation bargain' cases, concerning constitutional provisions thought to embody pragmatic compromises rather than high principles.
Over the last quarter of a century, the Supreme Court seems to have shifted from a positivist to a normativist conception of the Constitution, giving to fundamental, unwritten principles a normative force that is independent of specific provisions. Professor Hogg asserts that the Court has sometimes invented, rather than discovered, these principles, thereby amending the Constitution by judicial fiat in defiance of the prescribed procedures for amendment. The supposed unwritten principle of judicial independence is a product of non-originalist normativism, since the principle runs counter to textual evidence of the founders’ intentions. While such principles could be found ‘to accommodate virtually any grievance about government policy’, Professor Hogg notes that lately, the Court has shown ‘some sign of reigning in its creative impulses’. An example is a recent unanimous statement that ‘in a constitutional (p. 700) democracy such as ours, protection from legislation that some might view as unjust or unfair properly lies not in the amorphous underlying principles of our Constitution, but in its text and the ballot box.’

The Supreme Court has interpreted Charter rights more broadly than their US equivalents have been interpreted, and has enthusiastically adopted an activist approach. Its judges seem much more united in embracing non-originallism and normativism than their US counterparts.

3. Australia

Of all six courts studied, the High Court of Australia has been the most legalist. Its judges have frequently expressed aversion to changing the Constitution through creative interpretation. At least since 1920, the Court has devoted itself to a predominantly positivist methodology. Many of its judges have praised ‘dry legal argument’, insisted on not straying too far from the text, repudiated political and pragmatic considerations, and spoken disparagingly of reasoning from such abstractions as the ‘spirit’ of the Constitution or ‘vague and imprecise expressions of political philosophy’. Indeed, much of the Court’s jurisprudence before the late 1980s can fairly be described as literalist and formalist. The Court’s commitment to positivism is epitomized by Chief Justice Latham’s declaration that even if the Commonwealth used its financial supremacy to destroy the federal system, the Court might be powerless to stop it.

The judges have often referred to ‘underlying principles’ such as federalism, representative and responsible government, the rule of law and the separation of powers, but have generally used them to aid the interpretation of express provisions. They have tended to be wary of implications, which are usually required to be ‘necessary’ for express provisions to achieve their purposes. They have recognized a limited doctrine of implied intergovernmental immunities, and a much more robust doctrine of the separation of judicial power, but the latter has plausible support in the constitutional text. Recent attempts to derive implications directly from the principle of representative government were scotched, on the ground that it must not be treated as a ‘free-standing’ principle.

The Court has usually endorsed a moderate version of originalism. It has maintained that the meaning of the text (its ‘connotation’) cannot be changed through interpretation, even though its application to external facts (its ‘denotation’) can change, and it has often relied on historical evidence of what a provision was originally understood to mean. Its commitment to moderate originalism has been fortified in recent years by its willingness to consult the Convention Debates and other historical evidence of original understandings and purposes. Only a handful of judges have expressly endorsed a ‘living tree’ theory of the Constitution.

The Court’s approach became less legalist after 1987, when Sir Anthony Mason became Chief Justice. The Court repudiated literalism and formalism, and adopted a more purposive and substantive approach. It purported to find an implied freedom of political communication in the Constitution, which was criticized as an example of its increasing activism. Commentators spoke of a ‘Mason Court revolution’, but this was an exaggeration. After Mason’s retirement, the Court’s refusal to expand the recognition of implied rights, together with some decisions remarkable for their legalism, suggested that the movement away from legalism had stalled. But the Court continued to be more willing than formerly to interpret and apply provisions purposively, and to acknowledge the need for judicial discretion on policy grounds to resolve stubborn indeterminacies. Recent judges have also been less certain as to whether the meaning, or connotation, of constitutional terms cannot change, but in most cases their reasoning has remained predominantly positivist and moderately originalist. The main exceptions to this are cases dealing with judicial authority and independence, which the Court has always been eager to protect even when that has required an unacknowledged compromise of its usual legalist methodology.
4. Germany

The interpretive philosophy of Germany’s Federal Constitutional Court is extremely normativist, partly because the Basic Law virtually dictates a normativist approach. Like other post-war constitutions, it expressly enumerates many ‘structural principles’ that its detailed provisions are intended to implement.83 Opinions have differed as to the nature and source of authority of these principles, with ‘higher law’ conceptions—especially popular after the War—recently losing ground to originalist theories.84 But the Court has not limited itself to the interpretation and application of enumerated principles. It has inferred other, unwritten or ‘supra-positive’, principles from ‘the normative realities underlying the Basic Law’.85 For example, it has inferred ‘objective values’ from constitutional rights, values that are taken to impose positive obligations on all organs of the state in addition to the negative obligation of not infringing the rights.86 Moreover, the Court does not regard constitutional norms as separate from extra-legal political or social norms: the constitutional order and the broader community are regarded as interdependent, each helping to define and refine the other.87

Professor Kommers observes that ‘Structural reasoning is deeply ingrained in Germany's culture of interpretation.’88 In comparison with the United States, where it is resorted to only occasionally, when other interpretive considerations are indeterminate, in Germany it is ‘as standard as doctrinal reasoning in the common law tradition’.89 According to him, the Federal Constitutional Court has had to maintain a ‘creative balance’ between the many competing principles of the constitutional order, and also to creatively adjust the Basic Law to ‘necessity’.90

Yet German lawyers are not attracted to the notion that substantive constitutional change may be brought about through interpretation. The Court frequently relies on evidence of the founders’ intentions or purposes, including the Basic Law’s legislative history, especially in cases involving federal-state conflicts.91 Indeed, it has been said that ‘the importance placed on historical considerations is the most distinctive feature of German scope [of legislative power] doctrine.’92 When political or social realities begin to diverge from the founders’ handiwork, Germans turn to formal amendment, which has been frequently utilized.93 ‘Any judicially imposed remodelling of the Basic Law—enduring and binding changes in particular—would diminish the clarity, precision, and predictability required of the constitutional Rechtsstaat.’94

Although many judges agree that there is no ‘slide rule’ to calculate how to weigh and balance the competing values set out in the Basic Law, so that some judicial discretion is inevitable, most ‘are reluctant to admit publicly that they are doing anything other than engaging in objective constitutional interpretation.’95 They generally insist that the process of interpretation is apolitical, even though most would concede that its effects are political.96 The old civil law conception of written laws as self-sufficient codes lingers on: ‘many judges regard the Basic Law, like the civil code, as a unified body of rules and principles that contain the right answer to almost any constitutional dispute.’97 Despite the quasi-legislative nature of its role, it ‘was expected to employ strictly judicial methods of interpretation, methods designed, in (p. 703) the FCC's perception of its task, to determine rationally and objectively the true meaning of the Basic Law.’98

The theory that the Basic Law embodies an ‘objective order of values’, which are hierarchically ordered, in itself suggests that subjective judicial value judgments and discretion are unnecessary.99 These values are considered to be specified by the constitutional text, as informed by history, rather than a product of judicial precedent.100 Basic constitutional doctrines, according to the Federal Constitutional Court, ‘reflect the normative realities underlying the Basic Law’.101 Moreover, German jurisprudence continues to rely heavily on formal reasoning: ‘the emphasis in legal education ... on theory, conceptual clarification, deductive reasoning, and systematization ... [is] reflected in general commentaries on the Basic Law.’102 Definitional refinement and doctrinal elaboration, as well as normative theorizing, dominate the Court’s opinions, which aim to prove the ‘rightness, neutrality, and integrity of decisional outcomes’.103

Many observers will be sceptical about this aspiration to apolitical, objective legalism. But even if German constitutional reasoning is not objective, in a strong sense of the word, it may articulate a greater degree of intersubjective agreement than exists in, say, the United States. The key to reconciling normativism and legalism in Germany seems to be professional consensus, which is converted into judicial doctrine and then steadfastly maintained. Leading journals are edited by practitioners, judges, and professors, and the Federal Constitutional Court pays as much if not more attention to leading academic commentaries as to judicial precedents. ‘[T]he “ruling opinion” in the literature takes pride of place in the interpretation of the Basic Law.\textsuperscript{104} The process by which the Court prepares its opinions is one of genuinely collegial decision-making aimed at achieving consensus within the Court, and general acceptance outside it,\textsuperscript{105} especially within the legal academy, which the opinions are mainly aimed at convincing.\textsuperscript{106} The Court’s standard practice of handing down single, unsigned opinions also emphasizes the law’s ‘rationality, objectivity, and depersonalisation’.\textsuperscript{107}

5. India

The Indian Supreme Court has radically changed its interpretive philosophy. For two decades, its philosophy was very similar to that of the Australian High Court. This is not surprising, since both courts initially adopted the rules of statutory interpretation that had been developed by British judges in the nineteenth century. The position adopted in \textit{Gopalan} (1950), that courts can only enforce limits found in the Constitution by express provision or necessary implication, rather than ‘a spirit supposed to pervade the Constitution but not expressed in words’,\textsuperscript{108} is identical to that adopted in the leading Australian case of \textit{Engineers} (1920).\textsuperscript{109} The \textit{Supreme Court} did not always adhere to its early positivism: in a series of cases, it adopted strained interpretations of constitutional provisions in order to protect private property from expropriation without full compensation.\textsuperscript{110}

The Court shifted to a more normativist approach when it circumscribed Parliament’s power of constitutional amendment. In \textit{Golaknath} (1967), it purported to adopt a literal, positivist interpretation of the relevant provisions, but constitutional experts regarded this as obviously erroneous, and concluded that the Court had really been guided by the anti-majoritarian sentiments expressed in the judgments.\textsuperscript{111} The Court also, for the first time, adopted prospective overruling, which ‘flew in the face of the theory that the judges did not make law, but merely interpreted it’.\textsuperscript{112} In \textit{Kesavananda} (1973), the Court read into the amending power a limitation nowhere expressed, nor contemplated by the founders.\textsuperscript{113} Although the Court purported to rely partly on the words ‘the Constitution shall stand amended’, they were interpreted in light of the underlying structure or spirit of the document, comprised of enduring constitutional values.\textsuperscript{114}

Since then, the Court has applied the ‘basic structure’ doctrine in other contexts,\textsuperscript{115} overturned government action that violated broad, unwritten principles rather than specific provisions,\textsuperscript{116} taken the non-justiciable Directive Principles into account in interpreting the Fundamental Rights,\textsuperscript{117} interpreted an article that was deliberately drafted so as not to incorporate substantive due process as doing the opposite,\textsuperscript{118} found many new, unenumerated, ‘positive’ rights to be implied by the right to life and personal liberty,\textsuperscript{119} and interpreted several of the Fundamental Rights as incorporating international human rights that did not exist when the Constitution was adopted.\textsuperscript{120}

In some of its most creative decisions, the Court relied on a ‘basic structure’ argument, as well as a Directive Principle, to interpret a provision requiring the government merely to ‘consult’ with the Chief Justice, before making judicial appointments, as requiring it to act on his recommendations. It then added a novel requirement that the Chief Justice must consult with four senior colleagues before tendering any recommendations.\textsuperscript{121} Although this interpretation seems completely unsupported by the provision’s express words, especially when understood in light of appointment practices at the time the Constitution was adopted (‘consulted’ never meant ‘obeyed’), the Court did claim to be guided by the founders’ purposes.\textsuperscript{122} As recently as 2001, the Court stated that ‘it is the function of the Court to find out the intention of the framers of the constitution’.\textsuperscript{123} The judges’ strategy therefore seems to be to appeal to (p. 705) the founders’ purposes at a very abstract level, and then to ‘adapt’ their words to give better effect to those purposes. That is very a strong form of normativism.

On several occasions, Professor Sathe comments that the Court interpreted the Constitution in ways that were clearly inconsistent with the founders’ intentions.\textsuperscript{124} It has said that the Fundamental Rights have ‘no fixed contents’, and acknowledged that it may be justified in finding ‘new rights’.\textsuperscript{125} It has openly embraced a creative role in interpreting the Constitution, which it has described as ‘a vibrant document alive to the social situation [rather than] as an immutable cold letter of law unconcerned with the realities’—a ‘living organ’ that must change to meet the ‘felt necessities of the time’.\textsuperscript{126} In \textit{Golaknath} (1967), Chief Justice Subba Rao stated that:

\begin{quote}
Arts. 32, 141 and 142 are couched in such wide and elastic terms as to enable this court to formulate legal doctrines to meet the ends of justice. To deny this power to the \textit{Supreme Court} on the basis of some outmoded theory that the Court only finds the law but does not make it is to make ineffective the powerful instrument of justice placed in the hands of the highest judiciary in this country.\textsuperscript{127}
\end{quote}
6. South Africa

It is difficult to characterize the jurisprudence of a Constitutional Court that has been in existence for such a short period. So far, it seems to have adopted a moderately normativist approach, which does not subordinate the language of the text to underlying values.

The South African Constitution expressly incorporates abstract values and principles. Section 1, for example, declares that the state is ‘founded on certain basic values’ including human dignity, equality, human rights, the rule of law, and democracy. Section 39(1) requires the Court to interpret constitutional rights so as ‘to promote the values that underlie an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom.’ Governing principles also precede specific chapters, including those dealing with cooperative governance, public administration, and the security services. In a striking innovation, section 39 requires that international law be taken into account in interpreting the Bill of Rights. This could reasonably be construed as a sign that the founders intended constitutional rights to be interpreted dynamically, in response to global developments in the understanding of human rights.

Such provisions clearly encourage a normativist approach. Concerned that this might be taken too far, Justice Kentridge warned that if the language of the text were ignored in favour of a general resort to values, the result would be ‘divination’ rather than interpretation, allowing the judges to make the Constitution mean whatever they would like it to mean. The Court subsequently declared that interpretation should be ‘generous and purposive’, giving expression to the Constitution’s underlying values, ‘whilst paying due regard to the language that has been used’. Professor Klug provides several examples of cases in which rights were not interpreted as broadly as they might have been, because of textual, contextual, and purposive considerations.

The Court takes into account the circumstances in which the Constitution was adopted, and even its legislative history, but only when this clearly illuminates the purpose of a provision. It does not examine the comments of individuals who participated in the constitution-making process in order to construct an ‘original intent’.

Some of the Court’s decisions seem strongly normativist. In one case, a majority adopted a non-literal interpretation of section 241(8) of the ‘interim’ Constitution, which provided that ‘pending cases shall be dealt with as if the Constitution had not been passed’. Although the case had commenced before the Constitution was adopted, they held that the petitioners were entitled to the benefit of new constitutional rights. They interpreted the section as including an implied qualification limiting its effect to the preservation of the jurisdiction of courts in which pending cases had been commenced. Despite the apparent breadth of the enacted words, the Constitution’s founding values and emphasis on rights was thought to constitute stronger evidence that a narrower meaning had been intended. Justice Mahomed expressly treated the Constitution as ‘a holistic and integrated document with critical and important objectives’. But the majority’s reasoning exemplifies originalist rather than non-originalist normativism. Justice Sachs insisted that:

This is not a case of making the Constitution mean what we like, but of making it mean what the framers wanted it to mean; we gather their intention not from our subjective wishes, but from looking at the document as a whole.

The Court has also inferred, from the reference to the rule of law in section 1, an implied requirement of legality that is independent of the administrative justice clause. Neither the Parliament nor the President may act capriciously or arbitrarily, and the President must exercise his powers in good faith. This principle is treated as an additional requirement that underpins the express rights, including the right to administrative justice, which are treated as elaborations of it.

III. Explaining the Differences

What explains these different interpretive philosophies? Judges are not, of course, automatons whose opinions are entirely ‘caused’ by external factors. They have reasons for their opinions, such as the principled reasons for preferring non-originalism to originalism, or vice versa. The simplest explanation might therefore be that judges in different countries just happened to find different sets of reasons persuasive. But a deeper explanation seems called for, given that these highly intelligent people did not find the same reasons compelling and converge on the same interpretive philosophy. It seems undeniable that social, cultural, political, and institutional circumstances help to explain the differences.

(p. 707) 1. The Nature and Age of the Constitution

The nature of a constitution is surely an important factor in determining how it is interpreted. The Australian Constitution deals mainly with structural matters such as establishing governmental institutions and dividing powers among them. Its origins as a British statute, its relatively prosaic nature, and its lack of both a ringing appeal to national aspirations and a bill of rights, have surely contributed to the High Court’s legalist approach to its interpretation. Structural provisions, such as those dividing powers, are often interpreted by more legalistic methods—focusing on text, structure, and original intent—than rights guarantees. This may be because divisions of powers are often interdependent components of historically contingent ‘package deals’, reflecting deliberate and hard-won compromises between competing interests, which constitute ‘original intentions’ that courts are reluctant to disturb. The meaning of provisions embodying such contingent and specific bargains seems less amenable to illumination by reference to abstract principles reflecting general human experience than is the meaning of rights guarantees commonly found throughout the world. As a study of judicial doctrine in federalism cases concludes, ‘The comparative evidence does not indicate that there is a core of universal federalism values or principles that motivates courts.’ This is no doubt a matter of degree rather than kind: indeterminacies in structural provisions are also resolved partly by appealing to their purposes, which usually involve political principles as well as pragmatic compromise. Moreover, some structural principles such as judicial independence are as ubiquitous as human rights.

Constitutions that protect abstract rights require judges to make moral choices that arguably should not, and probably cannot, be governed by the framers’ opinions or expectations. Some modern constitutions explicitly require judgments of political morality rather than original intent. Section 39 of the South African Constitution requires that rights interpretations ‘must promote the values that underlie an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom’, and section 1 of the Canadian Charter refers to ‘such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society’. The adoption of the Charter of Rights in 1982 inspired a transformation in the interpretive philosophy of the Canadian Supreme Court, which adopted a strongly normativist approach and a pattern of enthusiastic activism throughout its jurisdiction, in non-Charter as well as Charter cases.

But there may be significant differences between bills of rights. Professor Robertson argues that bills of rights in some older constitutions are treated as merely ‘list[s] of highly individuated and specific things’ that governments have a negative duty not to violate, whereas more modern ones appear more integrated, holistic, and purposive, intended to embody a coherent hierarchy of values that government has a positive duty to promote. (p. 708) Those of Germany and South Africa are examples of ‘transformative’ constitutions, designed to make a fresh start and repudiate discredited past values and practices by including founding values and structural principles whose interpretation requires a normativist approach. As a result, the German Federal Constitutional Court is always able to invoke values integral to the Constitution, whereas the US Supreme Court, although it can appeal to structural principles embedded in the Constitution, often appeals to values external to the Constitution.

The structure of a constitution can have many effects on interpretive methods. Constitutional rights appear to be interpreted more expansively in Canada and South Africa than in the United States, partly because their constitutions expressly mandate a two-stage inquiry, in which infringements of rights established at the first stage can be justified to the court at the second stage. The possibility of justification at the second stage relieves the courts of the need to adopt narrow interpretations of rights in order to accommodate legitimate competing interests. Also, the presence in the Canadian Charter of the famous ‘notwithstanding clause’, which enables legislatures to insulate their statutes from judicial invalidation for violating the Charter, might have encouraged judges to be more expansive in construing Charter rights and less deferential to legislatures in enforcing them. It has also been suggested that the relative terseness of the US Bill of Rights, and its impractical depiction of rights as absolutes, has made it necessary for the Supreme Court to be more creative, and more reliant on subjective judicial ideology.

The degree of difficulty in formally amending a constitution may also be a factor. Professor Tushnet argues that because the US Constitution is inherently difficult to amend, and the political culture averse to formal amendments, the Supreme Court has felt compelled to make adaptations through creative interpretation, and the American people have accepted this as the appropriate method of updating the Constitution.\textsuperscript{151} The Supreme Court of Canada has explicitly cited the difficulty of amending its Constitution as a justification for allowing ‘growth and development over time’.\textsuperscript{152} This is corroborated by the German experience where, Professor Kommers suggests, the comparative ease of formal amendment has reinforced judicial reluctance to bring about substantial changes through interpretation.\textsuperscript{153} But this factor can also cut the other way: in India, the Constitution was so easy for the dominant Congress Party to amend, that the Supreme Court felt compelled to act creatively to restrict the amending power.\textsuperscript{154}

Professor Tushnet suggests that the age of the US Constitution, as well as the difficulty of amending it, has encouraged adaptation through judicial interpretation.\textsuperscript{155} It does seem inevitable that, as a constitution ages, its language will become less capable of fulfilling its underlying purposes, when applied to unanticipated technological and social changes. The development of an air force in the United States, mentioned previously, is an example.\textsuperscript{156} On the other hand, the degree of difficulty of the constitution’s amendment procedure is probably the more important factor. The pattern of legalism versus activism in the six countries studied does not correlate strongly with the relative ages of their constitutions. The two most activist (p. 709) courts, in India and Canada, deal with a Constitution, and a Charter of Rights, that are both relatively new.\textsuperscript{157}

The greater age of the US Constitution is significant in two other respects. First, the fact that comparative jurisprudence is paid much less attention in the United States than elsewhere is surely due partly to that Constitution having been adopted before any of the others. To the extent that the meaning of a constitution (or a constitutional amendment) is determined by the intentions or understandings of its makers, the interpretation of constitutions adopted subsequently in other countries is of little relevance.\textsuperscript{158} The constitutions of all the other countries studied here include provisions copied wholly or partly from other constitutions. It is often reasonable to assume that such a provision was intended to have a meaning similar to the meaning it had in the country of origin at the time it was copied. Even in the United States, British constitutional traditions up to 1789 have often been examined to shed light on concepts and principles derived from them.\textsuperscript{159}

The second respect in which relative age is significant is that precedents naturally play a much larger role in the interpretation of older constitutions, simply because there are more of them. When constitutions are young, courts have a greater need to seek guidance elsewhere, which diminishes as they build up their own stock of indigenous precedents.

2. Legal Culture

An obviously important factor is the legal culture in which judges receive their legal education, and practise their profession before appointment to the bench. The judges responsible for interpreting the constitutions of Canada, Australia, and India—the Privy Council and the Canadian Supreme Court, the Australian High Court, and the Indian Supreme Court respectively—were all steeped in the British legal tradition, and initially set out to apply British principles of statutory interpretation.\textsuperscript{160} By the end of the nineteenth century, if not before, the British legal tradition had become much more legalist than that of the United States.\textsuperscript{161} Not that British principles of statutory interpretation were monolithic: they were themselves open to rival interpretations, which helps to explain early disagreements between the Privy Council in Westminster and courts in Australia and Canada.\textsuperscript{162} But on any interpretation they were strongly positivist and moderately originalist. They did not permit judges to stray far from the text: any implications had to be ‘necessary’. Although they did not permit recourse to legislative history to establish the lawmakers’ intentions, they did allow reference to the legal and historical context in which a statute was enacted, in order to reveal the ‘mischief’ it was intended to remedy. And they did not permit the meanings of statutory terms to change over time, except through formal amendment or fidelity to erroneous judicial precedent.

(p. 710) Legal education and scholarship in Australia, Canada, and India were less receptive to sociological jurisprudence and legal realism, which swept through US law schools in the early twentieth century, and to the scepticism about legal determinacy that they preached. It seems likely that the post-Charter shift in Canada, to an enthusiastic judicial activism, is partly due to its proximity to the United States, and consequent influence of US jurisprudence on the Canadian legal academy and profession.\textsuperscript{163} In Australia, the controversial emergence of a limited and tentative form of judicial activism in the 1990s has been attributed partly to the introduction of more pragmatic, consequentialist theories at Sydney Law School in the 1950s.\textsuperscript{164}
In South Africa, widespread condemnation of the legal positivism that dominated legal thinking in the apartheid era, and which some feared would stunt implementation of the new Constitution, has no doubt inspired judges to adopt a more normativist approach.\textsuperscript{165}

The importance of legal culture is also evident in the section on Germany. The Federal Constitutional Court's legalist philosophy clearly owes much to what Professor Kommers calls the ‘civillian-positivistic’ tradition, which treats legal codes as ‘unified bodies of law covering all possible contingencies arising out of human interaction’.\textsuperscript{166} He depicts legal education in Germany as highly formalistic, its main objective being mastery of pre-existing legal rules and principles, with an emphasis on ‘theory, conceptual clarification, deductive reasoning, and systematization’.\textsuperscript{167} In Germany, too, ordinary principles of statutory interpretation were carried over to the field of constitutional law.\textsuperscript{168}

On the other hand, inherited legal culture is clearly not determinative. Professor Sathe observes that in India, a tradition of narrow, technical, ‘black letter’ legal education continued until quite recently. This was well after legalism in constitutional jurisprudence came to an end in the 1970s, which must be attributed to other factors.\textsuperscript{169}

3. Judicial Appointments and Homogeneity

In Australia, the social and intellectual homogeneity of the High Court bench—drawn almost exclusively from the conservative Melbourne and Sydney bars—has probably helped to preserve the tradition of legalism inherited from Britain, and broad judicial consensus as to the proper interpretive methodology.\textsuperscript{170} Recent appointments to the bench have been deliberately designed by the government to preserve that consensus.\textsuperscript{171} Another relevant factor is the function of a court charged with constitutional review. If it is a court of general jurisdiction, whose tasks also include the interpretation and application of ordinary law, then its judges are naturally inclined to apply the same professional techniques and habits of thought to all aspects of their work. That has certainly been the case in Australia and the United States, and initially, in Canada and India. On the other hand, judges in exclusively constitutional, or ‘Kelsenian’, courts are more likely to approach constitutional review in a different spirit.\textsuperscript{172} In Germany, judges of the Federal Constitutional Court have until recently been recruited from a broader field than ordinary judges, including prominent politicians, civil servants, judges, and academics (they are now appointed mainly from the judiciary and academia).\textsuperscript{173} It has been suggested that the Court would have been much less adventurous had its judges been appointed from the same career hierarchy as private law judges, many of whom strongly (p. 711) resented its intrusions into their field.\textsuperscript{174} The same point has been made about the South African Supreme Court.\textsuperscript{175} On the other hand, all German Federal Constitutional Court judges have had legal training of a kind that strongly encourages professional consensus.\textsuperscript{176} It has also been suggested that, although Canadian judges seem less homogeneous in terms of regional and professional background than their Australian counterparts,\textsuperscript{177} they have generally been of unquestioned professional standing and seem broadly to agree on the Court's non-originalist and relatively activist stance.

In the United States, there appears to have been even greater diversity in judicial appointments, which until recently were sometimes used to reward a President's friends and supporters, or appease powerful lobby groups.\textsuperscript{178} One suspects that politicians such as Earl Warren, upon appointment to the bench, were less committed to professional craft norms than life-long practising lawyers or serving judges.\textsuperscript{179} Indeed, a recent study purports to demonstrate a correlation between the more highly politicized appointments of US Supreme Court judges, and the greater influence of personal ideology in their decision-making, compared (in both respects) with their Australian and Canadian counterparts.\textsuperscript{180} In addition, the legal profession in the United States seems, to an outsider, much more diverse—socially, culturally, politically, and intellectually—than in many other countries. Even today, when concerns about judicial activism have prompted a new emphasis on technical legal expertise and prior judicial experience as qualifications for appointment to the Supreme Court, intense political battles over confirmation reflect competition between rival interpretive philosophies.\textsuperscript{181} The inference is not that the Supreme Court is more activist than other constitutional courts: on the contrary, the Indian Supreme Court seems to deserve that title.\textsuperscript{182} Rather, the inference is a more sharply divided bench in the United States compared with other countries. Professor Tushnet points out that US judges have been socialized into a professional culture that frowns upon judicial wilfulness, making them unlikely to be wilful in any interesting sense.\textsuperscript{183} Yet Supreme Court judges regularly attack one another for being wilful, which suggests that instead of a generally unified professional culture sharing interpretive norms, there are distinct sub-cultures—‘liberal’ and ‘conservative’—that are almost deadlocked in a competition for influence.

It has yet to be seen how the express constitutional requirement in South Africa, that the judiciary should reflect the racial and gender composition of the nation, a requirement that the composition of the Constitutional Court already satisfies, will affect its interpretive methodology.\textsuperscript{184}

There is some evidence that the method of judicial appointment affects the way federal distributions of powers are interpreted. The power of appointment enjoyed by national governments in Australia and the United States have probably contributed to the relatively generous (p. 712) interpretation of national powers in those countries.\textsuperscript{185} Professor Tushnet argues that this is part of a broader pattern of Supreme Court decisions reflecting the ‘regime principles’ of the national political elite to which its judges belong.\textsuperscript{186} In both Canada and Germany, on the other hand, a jurisprudence much more sympathetic to regional governments was constructed by judges whose appointments were either completely independent of the national government (the Privy Council), or partially dependent on the regional governments (the Federal Constitutional Court).\textsuperscript{187} In Canada, after appeals to the Privy Council were abolished in 1949, the main lines of its federal-state jurisprudence were not changed by the Supreme Court, perhaps partly because statutory requirements and constitutional convention require the Court’s judges to be representative of different regions.\textsuperscript{188} Australia and Canada are particularly strong contrasting examples, because in both cases the result of judicial interpretation was the opposite of what the founders intended (weak and strong central government respectively).\textsuperscript{189} Evidence is lacking in India, where federal-state disputes have arisen less often, and have usually been resolved politically rather than legally.\textsuperscript{190}

4. Political Culture

The judges charged with interpreting the Canadian, Australian, and Indian constitutions had imbibed the British constitutional tradition of parliamentary sovereignty. In these countries, the adoption of new national constitutions was not the consequence of armed struggle against perceived tyranny, but of pragmatic reform assisted by the imperial government (albeit, in India, only after much popular agitation). Although not strictly applicable to any legislature operating under a written, federal constitution, the principle of parliamentary sovereignty was nevertheless very influential. It encouraged broad interpretations of legislative power, trust in legislative rectitude, and deference to legislative will.\textsuperscript{191} It was inhospitable both to broad interpretations of express rights, and to the imposition of new, supposedly implied, constraints on legislative power.

In the United States, on the other hand, the War of Independence was fought largely over Britain’s resolve to impose the sovereignty of its Parliament over its American colonies, and in prosecuting the War, some of the new state legislatures adopted draconian measures.\textsuperscript{192} One consequence was ingrained distrust of legislatures, which favoured narrow interpretations of their powers, broad interpretations of express rights, and the recognition of additional, implied constraints.

As for Germany, the Nazi experience profoundly disturbed the traditional European veneration of parliaments, and subordination of courts to ‘apolitical civil service-like agencies entrusted with faithfully carrying out the will of legislative majorities’.\textsuperscript{193} ‘Profound distrust of politicians as a consequence of the disastrous policies of the Third Reich ... made the soil particularly fertile for expansive rule by untainted constitutional judges’.\textsuperscript{194} As the chief guardian of the Constitution, the Federal Constitutional Court was accorded a constitutional status and administrative autonomy that is unique among German courts.\textsuperscript{195} Many Germans were (p. 713) attracted to notions of a ‘higher law’ that neither positive law nor the will of the people can alter or override,\textsuperscript{196} and at least in its early years, the Court rejected the legal positivism of the Weimar period.\textsuperscript{197} Similarly, in South Africa, the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty that prevailed under the former apartheid regime was decisively rejected in favour of a form of constitutionalism emphasizing the protection of human rights.\textsuperscript{198} The Constitutional Court often refers to the founders’ deliberate decision to make a clean break with the values of the pre-existing legal order.\textsuperscript{199} Professor Robertson argues that this is typical of constitutional review under ‘transformative’ constitutions, which are designed to inaugurate a new era based on new principles such as human dignity and equality.\textsuperscript{200}

Political culture can change. In India, judicial attitudes of deference to the legislature were initially reinforced by the superior prestige of elected politicians compared with that of judges. But politicians’ abuses of power during the 1975 emergency, and increasing corruption, diminished their superior prestige and the trust that had been reposed in them, not least by the judges. This provided judges with both the motivation, and the opportunity, to act creatively to impose new limits on the executive and legislature. Public esteem for the Supreme Court was enhanced by activist decisions designed to check abuses of power by the political branches of government. Indeed, Professor Sathe suggests that one reason the Court assumed an activist stance after 1977 was to restore its credibility, by demonstrating that it was prepared to stand up to the politicians.201

The influence of prevailing political culture is also evident in the impact of the recent global ‘rights revolution’ on judicial philosophies. In Canada, the adoption of the Charter coincided with this transformation of political attitudes, propelled by increasing distrust of majoritarian democracy. The result has been enthusiastic judicial activism in non-Charter as well as Charter cases.202 It is as if the Canadian Supreme Court has adopted what Professor Tushnet calls ‘holistic’ interpretation, whereby the adoption of an amendment (in this case, in a non-technical sense, the Charter) is taken to change the overarching ‘spirit’ of the entire constitution, so as to justify new readings of older, unamended provisions. This is a technique not yet accepted by the US Supreme Court.203 The ‘rights revolution’ has no doubt transformed public attitudes as well as judicial ones. Consequently, Canadian politicians are not well placed to resist perceived judicial activism. Their inability to use the ‘notwithstanding clause’ (s 33) to override judicial interpretations of the Charter, suggests that the general public is unlikely to condone any political attack on the judiciary.204

The rights revolution no doubt influenced Australian judges as well, contributing to the High Court’s greater creativity in the 1990s, evident in the ‘discovery’ of an implied freedom of political speech. But the Court’s perceived departure from its long-standing tradition of legalism did not, as in India, enhance its standing relative to the elected branches of government. Australian politicians reacted to nascent judicial activism in a way that was not open to their Indian counterparts. They were angered by it, and used their power of judicial appointment to turn the Court back to a more legalist approach.205 This may corroborate an opinion that Australian judges have sometimes expressed, that ‘strict legalism’ is the best means of maintaining public confidence in the Court as a neutral umpire.206 If that is so, the contrast with (p. 714) India and Canada is stark. Australia may have a more robust political culture than Canada, in terms of the willingness of politicians to denounce judicial decisions in strong language. It also differs from Canada in lacking what Charles Epp has called ‘a support structure for legal mobilization’: a body of well-funded human rights lobby groups that use litigation to advance their political objectives. In Canada, these groups form part of a ‘court party’ that vigorously defends the judiciary from political attack.207

Political backlash also seems to have affected judicial methodology in the United States, where the rise (or perhaps revival) of originalism since the 1980s has been the explicit goal of a populist political movement opposed to the perceived ‘judicial activism’ of the Supreme Court since the 1950s.208 This movement has perhaps been assisted by the US tendency to venerate the Constitution and its Founding Fathers to an extent unknown in most other countries.209 It has also been suggested that the Constitution’s quasi-sacred status might be associated with its crucial role in forging the nation’s identity, and with the higher levels of religiosity in that country compared with other Western democracies.210

Another example of how political culture influences interpretive methodology is the impact in the United States of the ideology of autonomous individualism, evident in the expansive interpretation of free expression, and hostility to social and economic rights,211 compared with the greater openness of German jurisprudence to communitarianism, which led to a strikingly different treatment of abortion.212 The Constitutional Court in South Africa has also struggled with tensions between individualist and communitarian conceptions of freedom, which may in the future be resolved through development of the indigenous concept of ubuntu.213

Regional heterogeneity has clearly been a factor in some countries, although it can cut in different ways. In Canada, the Quebeckers’ concern to protect their language and culture led them to demand provincial rights, which other Canadians accommodated due to fear of Quebec separatism.214 On the other hand, in the United States, regional heterogeneity may have had the opposite effect. According to Professor Tushnet, the activism of the Warren Court reflected the distrust held by national political elites for white majorities in the American South, as well as distaste for ‘outlier’ legislation in other states that had fallen behind progressive developments in the rest of the nation.215 Fear of religious fundamentalism and intolerance that are more prominent in some regions than others may also have been a factor in decisions of the Indian Supreme Court.216 And no doubt differences between the Kwazulu-Natal Province and other provinces in South Africa will have an impact on interpretive methods there.217 Strong regional variations of this kind are absent in Australia, which is more culturally homogeneous.\textsuperscript{218}

\textit{(p. 715) 5. ‘The Felt Necessities of the Time’}

There is a popular perception that no matter what their stated interpretive philosophy, judges somehow manage to find ways of adjusting their constitutions to ‘the felt necessities of the time.’\textsuperscript{219} That might explain, to take just one example, why the Privy Council consistently interpreted national powers in Canada narrowly, while the Australian High Court interpreted national powers broadly, in both cases contrary to the founders’ intentions, despite both courts purporting to apply British principles of statutory interpretation.

Are the interpretive philosophies described in this chapter mainly rhetoric, that conceal essentially result-oriented decision-making? Two issues must be distinguished. The first is the extent to which law remains stubbornly indeterminate, whatever interpretive methodology is employed, thereby requiring judges to exercise discretion on moral or policy grounds. The second is the extent to which judges are willing either to misapply, or to abandon, their orthodox methodology in order to reach strongly desired conclusions.

Professor Tushnet argues that in the United States, orthodox interpretive methods have proved sufficiently indeterminate that judges have been able to ‘do the jobs [they] think need to be done at any specific time’.\textsuperscript{220} Whether his argument holds universally is debatable. The judicial interpretation of national powers in Canada and Australia, contrary to the founders’ intentions, might be examples of indeterminacy: British principles of statutory interpretation did not allow recourse to legislative history to resolve textual indeterminacy. On the other hand, many cases can be cited in which the Australian High Court’s legalist methods led to very different conclusions than the US Supreme Court had previously reached. They include cases on interstate commerce, freedom of religion, and electoral equality. It is possible that such differences merely reflect the judges’ different political ideologies. Alternatively, they might be the result of the larger number of abstract, and therefore less determinate, principles in the US Constitution, of a broader range of interpretive methods being accepted within the US judiciary as orthodox, or of the accumulation in the United States of a larger and more diverse body of precedents that can be used to rationalise result-oriented decisions.

As for the second issue, it is clear that judges sometimes feel they have no alternative but to act creatively in order to defuse a crisis, or to prevent or remedy what seems to them a particularly outrageous breach of some important constitutional value. When judges previously committed to legalist methods find them an obstacle in that regard, they sometimes either covertly misapply them, or abandon them (temporarily or permanently) in favour of normativism. From a legalist perspective, such cases involve a conflict, whether or not the judges perceive it, between their sense of moral responsibility, and their limited legal authority, to intervene. From a normativist perspective, especially a non-originalist one, there is less likely to be a conflict.\textsuperscript{221}

Professor Hogg describes three examples of what he calls ‘crisis management’, where the Canadian Supreme Court exceeded the normal limits of its authority to craft an unorthodox solution to a looming political or legal crisis. In each case the Court adopted a normativist strategy, by resorting to ‘unwritten principles’. Professor Hogg acknowledges that in one case, it is hard to see how the Court could responsibly have reached any other conclusion.\textsuperscript{222} But he implies that in the other two cases, the Court’s solution was neither necessary nor clearly desirable.\textsuperscript{223} In one of them, it adopted a novel idea that had never been publicly suggested before or even argued by counsel.\textsuperscript{224}

In India, the shift from a predominantly positivist to a strongly normativist approach was initially motivated by fear that the power of constitutional amendment would be abused, a fear subsequently vindicated during the 1975 emergency.\textsuperscript{225} The Supreme Court’s post-emergency activism was aimed at curbing minoritarian threats to constitutional values, political corruption, and oppression of the most marginalized and deprived segments of Indian society.\textsuperscript{226}

Professor Tushnet notes that the US Supreme Court has sometimes relied on moral concepts to surmount limitations inherent in other interpretive approaches.\textsuperscript{227} The Warren Court’s activism was motivated by strong disapproval, shared by national political elites, of the distinctive culture of the American South, and archaic laws in a few other states that were out of step with progressive developments in the rest of the nation.\textsuperscript{228} The paradigm example is \textit{Brown v Board of Education}, concerning racial segregation in schools, whose moral authority even originalists have found difficult to challenge, although it is hard to defend on originalist grounds.\textsuperscript{229} \textit{Griswold v Connecticut}, dealing with a state prohibition of contraception, is another example.\textsuperscript{230}

One relevant factor, then, is the number of occasions that judges are confronted, or fear they may be confronted, by executive or legislative measures they regard either as contrary to a vital national interest or as morally outrageous. One is reminded of Oliver Wendell Holmes’ famous ‘puke’ test—any law that made him want to puke must be invalid—which Felix Frankfurter converted into a ‘shocks the conscience’ test.\textsuperscript{231}

Of all potential threats to constitutional values, encroachments upon their own exclusive authority or independence often cause the greatest shock to the judicial conscience. In Australia, the most legalist of the six countries, the High Court first began to construct a doctrine of strict separation of judicial power in a case where it was contrary both to the constitutional text and the founders’ intentions.\textsuperscript{232} More recently, the Court partially extended this doctrine to most state courts, although this was inconsistent both with previous authority and with strong disapproval of ‘free standing’ unwritten principles expressed in recent cases.\textsuperscript{233} This was followed by an even more radically novel interpretation of provisions that mention state courts, based on a patently implausible appeal to original intent, in order to invalidate state legislation restricting judicial review of decisions of inferior courts and administrative agencies.\textsuperscript{234} In Canada, even the Privy Council before 1949 and, later, the Supreme Court, struck down laws granting judicial power to administrative tribunals, although ‘the basis for the decisions was unclear or implausible’.\textsuperscript{235} In 1997, the Supreme Court invoked an ‘unwritten principle’ of judicial independence, and proceeded to construct ‘an elaborate edifice of (p. 717) doctrine with little or no basis in the text in order to protect the power, influence, salaries and perquisites of themselves and their colleagues.’\textsuperscript{236} The Indian Supreme Court, arguably with stronger moral justification, implausibly interpreted a provision requiring the Chief Justice to be consulted before new puisne justices were appointed, as requiring his advice to be followed, and then added a requirement with no textual support whatsoever, that the Chief Justice must consult with his four most senior colleagues before tendering that advice.\textsuperscript{237} In South Africa, many of the grounds on which the Court initially objected to the draft constitutional text related to its own jurisdiction and authority.\textsuperscript{238}

Creative decisions that give principles highly valued by the judges greater protection than is warranted by the constitutional text, as originally understood, are not always ‘progressive’. Judges share the values, including the prejudices, of the social class from which they are drawn.\textsuperscript{239} In India, for example, the Supreme Court during its most legalist phase attempted to limit the legislature’s efforts to enhance social justice by redistributing property.\textsuperscript{240} In the United States, the doctrines of substantive due process and freedom of contract were notoriously applied before 1937 to invalidate labour laws and other legislative reforms designed to improve social welfare. In Canada, the ‘unwritten principle’ of judicial independence was invoked to protect judges’ salaries from public sector budget cuts that posed no conceivable threat to their independence.\textsuperscript{241} And in Australia, an implied freedom of political speech was ‘discovered’ and used to invalidate legislation aimed at reducing the dependence of political parties on the wealthy individual and organizations that donate the funds needed for expensive political advertising.\textsuperscript{242}

The object of this chapter, however, has not been to criticize the interpretive methods and philosophies described in this book. It has merely been to compare and explain them.

\textbf{Bibliography}

David Robertson, \textit{The Judge as Political Theorist} (2010)

Notes:

(1) This chapter is confined to constitutional interpretation by courts. It is based on the introduction and final chapter of Jeffrey Goldsworthy (ed), Interpreting Constitutions, a Comparative Study (2006), referred to hereafter as ‘Interpreting Constitutions’.

(2) The concept of the ‘rule of law’ is notoriously contested, and itself the subject of political debate. Moreover, this Anglophone concept differs from its European counterparts, such as the German Rechtstaat and the French État de droit. It is assumed here that the latter incorporate the former. For a full discussion, see Michel Rosenfeld, ‘Constitutional Adjudication in Europe and the United States: Paradoxes and Contrasts’ (2004) 2 International Journal of Constitutional Law 633, 638–52. Also see Chapter 10.

(3) See the second paragraph above.

(4) This should be uncontroversial except, perhaps, in Germany where the Basic Law still ‘tends to be regarded as a self-sufficient code of law’ which ‘contain[s] the right answer to almost any constitutional dispute’: Donald P. Kommers, ‘Germany: Balancing Rights and Duties’ in Interpreting Constitutions 161, 207–8. The Basic Law is expressly based on abstract moral principles, but even if these are objective moral truths accessible to human reason, human choices are often necessary to apply such principles to specific circumstances: see eg John Finnis, Natural Law and Natural Rights (1980), 281–9.

(9) See eg Interpreting Constitutions.

(12) See Vicki C. Jackson, ‘Comparative Constitutional Federalism and Transnational Judicial Discourse’ (2004) 2 International Journal of Constitutional Law 91, 93–4, 100. Two recent comparative studies of federalism are Gerald Baier, Courts and Federalism: Judicial Doctrine in the United States, Australia and Canada (2006) and Greg Taylor, Characterisation in Federations: Six Countries Compared (2006). However, Baier is concerned mainly with the role of judicial doctrine (judicially constructed principles, tests etc) in adjudicating federalism disputes, rather than with the interpretive methods used to construct those tests, while Taylor is concerned mainly with one kind of judicial doctrine—that which is used to decide whether legislation deals with subject matters allocated to the enacting legislature. See also Chapter 27.

(14) See text between nn 138 and 143 below.

(15) Interpreting Constitutions.

(16) Rosenfeld (n 2), 656; see also 634.

(17) See Taylor (n 12), ch 6, esp 98–106 (Austrians use the term ‘petrification theory’ to describe this approach).
(18) There have been remarkable changes in the approaches of the Supreme Courts of Canada and India: see Interpreting Constitutions, chs 2 and 5.

(20) Jeffrey Goldsworthy, ‘Australia: Devotion to Legalism’ in Interpreting Constitutions, 106; Greene (n 11); Baier (n 12); Taylor (n 12); Vicki C. Jackson and Jamal Greene, ‘Constitutional Interpretation in Comparative Perspective: Comparing Judges or Courts?’ in Rosalind Dixon and Tom Ginsburg (eds), Handbook in Comparative Constitutional Law (2011).

(21) These can all be sorted into Philip Bobbitt’s well-known ‘modalities’ of constitutional interpretation, namely, textual, historical, structural, doctrinal, ethical, and prudential: see Philip Bobbitt Constitutional Fate: Theory of the Constitution (1982).

(22) Interpreting Constitutions. These observations are generally confirmed by Greene (n 11) and Jackson and Greene (n 20).

(23) Tushnet (n 19), 40 and 48–9.

(24) Ibid 42 and 47.

(25) Ibid 38.

(26) District of Columbia v Heller 128 S Ct 2783 (2008) and US v Miller 307 US 174 (1939), discussed in Greene (n 11), 12.

(27) Tushnet (n 19), 32, 39–40 and 47.

(28) Ibid 39.

(31) Tushnet (n 19), 14, 52.

(32) Ibid 50–1 and 54.

(33) Ibid 28, citing John V. Orth, Due Process of Law (2003); see also Tushnet (n 19), 20 and 32 esp n 77. See also Chapter 44.

(34) Ibid 50.

(36) Ibid 35–8 and 50–1.

(37) Ibid 50–1.

(39) Tushnet (n 19), 26–7, discussing Calder v Bull 3 US 386 (1798).

(40) Tushnet (n 19), 32.

(41) Ibid 49; see also 7, 16–17 and 54.

(42) McCulloch v Maryland 17 US 316, 415 (1819).
(43) Tushnet (n 19), 24.

(44) Ibid 37.

(45) District of Columbia v Heller (n 26), Stevens J dissenting.

(46) Peter Hogg, ‘Canada: From Privy Council to Supreme Court’ in Interpreting Constitutions, 66.

(47) Ibid 75–6.

(48) Ibid 76, 104.

(49) Ibid 104.

(51) Bradley W. Miller, ‘Origin Myth: The Persons Case, The Living Tree, and the New Originalism’ in Grant Huscroft and Bradley W. Miller (eds), The Challenge of Originalism; Essays in Constitutional Theory (2011); Hogg (n 46), 84.

(52) Ibid 87.

(54) Hogg (n 46) 83; also 78–9.

(55) Ibid 87.

(56) Re British Columbia Motor Vehicle Act [1985] 2 SCR 486. Admittedly, the choice of the words ‘fundamental justice’ to avoid that result was a remarkably inept piece of drafting.

(57) Ibid 87. See also Greene (n 11), 18–40. Bradley W. Miller argues that Canadian legal theory has failed to grapple with these issues with any sophistication, and consequently overlooks many critical distinctions: ‘Beguiled by Metaphors: The “Living Tree” and Originalist Interpretation in Canada’ (2009) 22 Canadian Journal of Law and Jurisprudence 331.

(58) Miller (n 57), 345.

(59) Hogg (n 46), 90–1.

(60) Ibid 90 and 104.

(61) Ibid 91–2.

(62) Ibid 92.

(64) Robert Harvie and Hamar Foster, ‘Ties that Bind: the Supreme Court of Canada and American Jurisprudence’ (1990) 28 Osgoode Hall Law Journal 729. See also Hogg (n 46), who uses the term ‘activist’, 71, 81, 88 and 103–5, and Roach (n 63), 118.

(65) Many cases are cited by Jeffrey Goldsworthy (n 20), 119–20, 121–2, 133, 141–2, 146, 151, 153, and 154–5.

(66) Sir Garfield Barwick, A Radical Tory (1994), 66; A-G (NSW) v Brewery Employees Union of NSW (1908) 6 CLR 469, 559.

(67) Henry v Boehm (1973) 128 CLR 482 (Gibbs J).

(68) SA v Commonwealth (First Uniform Tax case) (1942) 65 CLR 373, 411–12.
(69) Huddart, Parker and Co Pty Ltd v Moorehead (1909) 8 CLR 330, 388 (Isaacs J); A-G (Cth) (ex rel McKinley) v Commonwealth (1975) 135 CLR 1, 17 (Barwick CJ).

(70) South Australia v Commonwealth (1942) 65 CLR 373, 429 (Latham CJ).

(71) Goldsworthy (n 20), 128 and 136. See eg McGinty v Western Australia (1996) 186 CLR 140, 427 (McHugh J).

(72) Goldsworthy (n 20), 128–9.

(74) Many cases are cited by Goldsworthy (n 20), 124–7 and 150–2.

(76) Ibid 150.

(79) Compare Jason Louis Pierce, Inside the Mason Court Revolution: The High Court of Australia Transformed (2006), with Fiona Wheeler and John Williams, ‘Restrained Activism’ in the High Court of Australia’ in Dickson (n 63), 19.

(81) For a brief discussion of recent trends, see Goldsworthy (n 20), 144–52; Wheeler and Williams (n 79); Greene (n 11), 50–61; Jeffrey Goldsworthy, ‘Original Meanings and Contemporary Understandings in Constitutional Interpretation’ in H.P. Lee and Peter Gerangelos (eds), Constitutional Advancement in a Frozen Continent, Essays in Honour of George Winterton (2009) 245, 262–8.

(83) Although these have been supplemented by the FCC: Kommers (n 4), 191.

(84) Ibid 180, 182–3, and 189.

(85) Ibid 189. The trend started with Southwest State Case 1 BVerfGE 14, 61 (1951), the landmark decision that has been compared to Marbury v Madison 1 Cranch 137 (1803).

(86) Kommers (n 4), 180–1.

(87) Ibid 178.

(88) Ibid 199.

(90) Ibid.

(92) Taylor (n 12), 84 (summarizing 77–84).

(93) Kommers (n 4), 179.
(94) Ibid 171; see also 179.

(95) Ibid 179 and 213; see also 207.

(96) Ibid 213, which seems to qualify the statement at 179. See also 211.

(97) Ibid 208.

(98) Ibid 207.

(100) Ibid 180 n 70.

(101) See n 85 above.

(102) Kommers (n 4), 209.

(104) Ibid 193.

(105) Ibid 211–12.

(107) Ibid 208.

(108) Gopalan v India AIR 1950 SC 27 (Kania J).

(109) Amalgamated Society of Engineers v Adelaide Steamship Co Ltd (1920) 28 CLR 129, discussed in Goldsworthy (n 20), 120.

(111) Ibid 242–3.

(112) Ibid 224.

(113) Kesavanand Bharati v Kerala AIR 1973 SC 1473, discussed in Sathe (n 110), 244.

(114) Ibid 246.

(116) See eg the principle of secularism, in Ismail Faruqui v India (1994) 6 SCC 360; Aruna Roy v India (2002). See Sathe (n 110), 262.

(117) See eg Hanif Qureshi v Bihar AIR 1958 SC 731, cited by Sathe (n 110), 251.

(118) Maneka Gandhi v India AIR 1978 SC 597, cited by Sathe (n 110), 252.

(119) See many cases discussed in Sathe (n 110), 252–3.

(120) Vishaka v Rajasthan (1997) 6 SCC 241, discussed by Sathe (n 110), 254.

(121) SP Gupta v India AIR 1982 SC 149; Supreme Court Advocates on Record Association v India (1993) 4 SCC 441; discussed by Sathe (n 110), 259–60.

(122) Ibid 260.

Constitutional Interpretation

(124) See eg Sathe (n 110), 252.

(126) Kapila Hingorani v Bihar (2003) 6 SCC 1 and Indra Sawney v India (1992) ATC 385, respectively; quoted by Sathe (n 110), 253 and 262.

(128) S v Zuma 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC) para 17, quoted by Heinz Klug, ‘South Africa: From Constitutional Promise to Social Transformation’ in Interpreting Constitutions, 292.

(129) Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC) para 9, quoted by Klug (n 128), 292.

(130) Klug (n 128), 293–5.

(132) S v Mhlumgu 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), discussed by Klug (n 128), 292–3.

(133) S v Mhlumgu, para 15.

(134) Ibid paras 100, 102.

(135) Ibid para 112.

(137) Ibid; discussed by Klug (n 128), 278–9.

(138) Goldsworthy (n 20), 109, 113, 153, and 155.

(139) Jackson (n 12), 102–8.

(140) Ibid.

(141) Baier (n 12), 159; see also ibid 18–19.

(142) Robertson (n 13), 361–2 and 370.

(143) See text accompanying n 28 above. The framers’ intentions are arguably binding only insofar as they illuminate the meaning of the law they made: their opinions and expectations as to how judges should apply that law are not part of the law that the judges are bound to accept.

(144) Hogg (n 46), 71, 88, and 103. The term ‘activism’ is used by Professor Hogg.

(145) Robertson (n 13), 355; see also ibid 27.

(146) Ibid, see also 256.

(147) Rosenfeld (n 2), 661–2.

(148) Hogg (n 46), 70, 103; Klug (n 128), 293.

(149) Canada Constitution Act 1982, s 33.

(150) Robertson (n 13), 27.

(151) Tushnet (n 19), 7, 16–17, and 54.

(152) Hunter v Southam [1884] 2 SCR 145, 155, quoted by Hogg (n 46), 77.

(153) Kommers (n 4), 171–2.
(154) Sathe (n 110), 242–5.

(155) Tushnet (n 19), 7.

(156) See n 6 above.

(157) This assessment is corroborated in a recent comparative study of judicial activism: Dickson (n 63), 12–13 and 15.

(158) Tushnet (n 19), 45–6. But only ‘to that extent’, because the interpretation of constitutions elsewhere can be useful for other purposes.

(159) Ibid 28–9 and 45.

(160) Hogg (n 46), 104; Goldsworthy (n 20), 115–21; Sathe (n 110), 227.

(162) Hogg (n 46), 75; Goldsworthy (n 20), 115–19.

(163) Hogg (n 46), 81.

(165) Klug (n 128), 269 and 292.

(166) Kommers (n 4), 208 and 207 respectively.

(167) Ibid 209.

(168) Ibid 208.

(169) Sathe (n 110), 263.

(170) Goldsworthy (n 20), 112–13 and 155.

(172) Robertson (n 13), 12.

(173) Kommers (n 4), 174–5.

(174) Robertson (n 13), 380.

(175) Ibid 279.

(176) Kommers (n 4), 208–9.

(177) Hogg (n 46), 58–9.

(178) Tushnet (n 19), 14.

(179) Ibid 15.

(181) Tushnet (n 19), 14–15.

(182) This assessment is corroborated in Dickson (n 63), 12–13, 15, and ch 4.
(183) Tushnet (n 19), 54.
(184) Klug (n 128), 284.
(185) Goldsworthy (n 20), 156.
(186) Tushnet (n 19), 53.
(188) Hogg (n 46), 58, 62–3, and 95.
(189) Ibid 75–6, 104, and Goldsworthy (n 20), 108.
(190) Sathe (n 110), 232–4.
(191) Hogg (n 46), 56; Goldsworthy (n 20), 109–10, 148, and 156; and Sathe (n 110), 227.
(193) Kommers (n 4), 206.
(194) Rosenfeld (n 2), 641; see also ibid 665.
(195) Kommers (n 4), 172–3.
(196) Ibid 167 and 180.
(197) Ibid 182.
(198) Klug (n 128), 269.
(199) eg ibid 315.
(200) Robertson (n 13), 29; ibid 265 on South Africa.
(201) Sathe (n 110), 251.
(202) Hogg (n 46), 105.
(203) Tushnet (n 19), 29.
(204) Hogg (n 46), 69 and 99 n 162.
(205) Goldsworthy (n 20), 157–8.
(208) See Greene (n 11), 6–7, 13–14, and 17. Possibly ‘revival’ because a version of originalism was the dominant interpretive methodology in nineteenth-century America: ibid, 14 and 85.
(210) Ibid 66–9, 78–1; Rosenfeld (n 2), 657.
(211) Tushnet (n 19), 52. See also Chapters 49 and 50.
(212) Kommers (n 4), 178 n 60, 183, 190 and 213–14.
(213) Klug (n 128), 302–3 and 316–17.

(214) Hogg (n 46), 93–4.

(215) Tushnet (n 19), 52.

(216) Sathe (n 110), 262.

(217) Klug (n 128), 290–1.

(218) Goldsworthy (n 20), 156.

(219) A phrase famously used by Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr in The Common Law (1881), 1.

(220) Tushnet (n 19), 7. Tushnet acknowledges that they are not wholly indeterminate—e.g. the structural provisions of the Constitution are often clear-cut: ibid 27–8.

(221) See discussion of normativism in Section I above.

(222) Hogg (n 46), 98, referring to the Manitoba Language Reference case.

(223) Ibid 99–100.

(224) Ibid 96–100, quotation at 100, referring to Re Secession of Quebec [1998] 2 SCR 217.

(225) Sathe (n 110), 243, 247.

(226) Ibid 262.

(227) Tushnet (n 19), 39.

(229) Tushnet (n 19), 40–1.

(230) Ibid 32.

(232) New South Wales v Commonwealth (‘the Wheat case’) (1915) 20 CLR 54, discussed in Goldsworthy (n 20), 125–6 and 128–9.

(236) Hogg (n 46), 74, referring to Re Remuneration of Judges [1997] 3 SCR 3.

(237) Sathe (n 110), 259–61.

(238) Klug (n 128), 302.

(239) Sathe (n 110), 264.

(240) Ibid 239–41.

(241) Re Remuneration of Judges [1997] 3 SCR 3, discussed in Hogg (n 46), 73 and 92.

Jeffrey Goldsworthy
Jeffrey Goldsworthy is Professor of Law, Monash University, Melbourne
Proportionality (1)

Bernhard Schlink

The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Constitutional Law
Edited by Michel Rosenfeld and András Sajó

Print Publication Date: May 2012
Online Publication Date: Nov 2012

Subject: Law, Comparative Law, Constitutional and Administrative Law
DOI: 10.1093/oxfordhb/9780199578610.013.0035

Abstract and Keywords

This article presents a conception of the proper role of the proportionality standard. It begins by discussing proportionality and justice, the elements of proportionality, and approaches to proportionality analysis. It then discusses steps of proportionality analysis; the structure of proportionality analysis; evolution, constitutional foundation, and distribution of the principle of proportionality; the strength of rights and freedoms in proportionality analysis; and the future of proportionality analysis.

Keywords: proportionality standard, justice, proportionality analysis, rights, freedoms

I. A Triad of Justice 719
1. Proportionality and Justice 719
2. The Elements of Proportionality 719
3. Approaches to Proportionality Analysis 720

II. Steps of Proportionality Analysis 722
1. Categorically Prohibited Means 722
2. Legitimacy of the End 722
3. Fitness or Suitability 723
4. Necessity 724
5. Balancing 724

III. The Structure of Proportionality Analysis 725
1. A Right Order for Proportionality Analysis? 725
2. General or Particular Proportionality Analysis? 726
3. The Range of Proportionality Analysis 727

IV. Evolution, Constitutional Foundation, and Distribution of the Principle of Proportionality 727
1. The Evolution of the Principle of Proportionality 728
2. The Constitutional Foundation of the Principle of Proportionality 729
3. Distribution of the Principle of Proportionality 731

V. The Strength of Rights and Freedoms in Proportionality Analysis 732
1. Strength through the State’s Interest in Rights and Freedoms 732
2. Strength through the Exclusion of Reasons 732
3. Strength through Imposition of the Burden of Proof 733
4. Strength through Balancing 734

VI. The Future of Proportionality Analysis 735
1. Proportionality Analysis and Judicial Activism 735
2. The Standardizing Effect of the Principle of Proportionality 736

(p. 719) 1. A Triad of Justice

1. Proportionality and Justice

For Aristotle ‘the just is the proportional, the unjust is what violates the proportion’. When society distributes honour, money, or other goods to reward merits, Aristotle demands that the goods be in proportion to the merits; and when transactions occur he demands that what one side gives and gets is in proportion to what the other side gets and gives. When one person robs or hurts another person, Aristotle discusses involuntary transactions; here too, the damage and the compensation or punishment must be in proportion. ‘Evil for evil … good for good’.

Aristotle knows that proportionality is not a simple concept. Proportionality requires a measure for the distribution of goods and the reward of merits. It has to use money to make commensurable what both sides give and get in a transaction; it has to weigh and balance crime and compensation and crime and punishment. That a person suffers what he or she did is not enough. One must take into consideration the circumstances under which and the state of mind in which the person committed the crime. But as difficult as each of these requirements may be, Aristotle believes that the proportion can be determined and realized.

For Perelman, more than 2,000 years later, justice still concerns proportionality. He summarizes the discussion since Aristotle as a fight over whether justice requires giving each according to his merits, or to his work, his needs, or his rank in society. Accounts of justice giving each the same or each according to his legal entitlement do not lead far enough. To give each the same can only mean to give each member of the same category the same, and shifts the problem to categorizing people justly. To give each according to his legal entitlement shifts the problem to determining which legal entitlements are just. The remaining accounts of justice differ as to the property with which the goods a person gets should correlate, but agree that the correlation should be proportional. Indeed, however socialist, liberal, or conservative notions of justice disagree, however ideas of meritocratic justice and affirmative justice, free market justice and social justice clash in the political arena, justice always requires that the share everyone gets be in proportion to something.

2. The Elements of Proportionality

Many lawyers and laypersons alike associate the principle of proportionality first and foremost with criminal law and with the proportionality of crime with punishment. That punishing a person justly means punishing in proportion to the crime seems obvious. This idea fosters an understanding of proportionality as a principle determining the proper correlation between two elements: between the punishment and the crime; between the goods that one deserves and one’s merits, work, needs, or rank; between the goods that one party gives and gets and the goods that the other party gives and gets. According to this understanding a decision on proportionality requires a comparison between punishment and crime, goods and merits, goods and work, goods and needs, goods and rank, the results of a transaction for both parties.

(p. 720) But proportionality has a triadic rather than a dyadic structure. As any comparison needs a tertium comparationis, the comparison of proportionality analysis requires a reference point. The reference point is not just a tool for comparison; it is the pivotal point of the decision on proportionality.

Giving each according to his merits builds on the idea of a mission that people have that they may accomplish or fail to accomplish. Giving each according to his work builds on an idea of work, as opposed to other, unproductive activities, on what its purpose is and its results should be. Similarly the relevant needs cannot be determined without understanding whether the goal is mere survival or a fulfilled life and what mere survival and a fulfilled life require. Rank can be a criterion of justice only in a hierarchically ordered society where the hierarchy deserves to be upheld. To uphold the hierarchy, to grant mere survival or a fulfilled life, to foster productivity or to support people in accomplishing their mission are the ends for which proportional giving is crucial.
The same holds for infringement and penalty, crime and punishment. In 1979 the European Court of Justice found the penalty for failing to report the use of a license disproportionate, because the penalty for failing to use the license was the same.\(^4\) The two infringements are serious in different degrees and therefore deserve different penalties, reflecting the regulation's goals. The goals are to make sure that the licenses are used as applied for, and that the administration knows about the use. To achieve these goals, the regulation must use the threat of a severe penalty to force licensees who do not use their licenses and want to hide their non-use to report it, while the threat of a mild penalty suffices to remind licensees who use their license and have nothing to hide merely of their duty to report.

In 2003 the US Supreme Court did not find disproportional a life sentence for defendants who committed a felony and had been convicted of two or more serious or violent felonies.\(^5\) It found that the State of California had ‘a reasonable basis for believing that dramatically enhanced sentences for habitual felons advance the goals of its criminal justice system in a substantive way.’ The goals were ‘to deter and to segregate habitual criminals’. The Court viewed the sentence as a sufficiently plausible deterrent and therefore sufficiently proportional to the crime.

One could argue that the US Supreme Court should explore the problem more deeply. That it should question whether the State of California defined the goals of its criminal justice system properly: Is it proper to exclude rehabilitation, reintegration, and appreciation of the defendant's guilt? That it should investigate whether the effects of California's sentencing practice are desirable: Is it desirable to drive parolees out of California into other states? The Court did not feel the need to raise these questions because it applied ‘a narrow proportionality principle, which forbids only extreme sentences that are grossly disproportional to the crime’. But even when understood narrowly, proportionality requires more than just comparing two elements of a dyad. Proportionality operates as a triad, with a goal as the reference point to which both elements are related.

3. Approaches to Proportionality Analysis

That proportionality, though triadic in structure, can seem like a correlation between two elements, leads to two different approaches to proportionality analysis.

(p. 721) Under one approach, proportionality analysis starts with comparing, weighing, and balancing the two elements—on one hand the crime, on the other the punishment. Is the balance right or should there be a correction for a harsher or a milder punishment? Balancing requires weighing, and weighing in turn leads to identifying the goals of the criminal justice system. Crimes are assigned different weights in light of different goals; and punishments are more or less suited or necessary for achieving the different goals.

This balancing approach is not confined to issues of punishment. In 1985 the US Supreme Court reviewed the use of deadly force against fleeing felons and balanced the state's interest in preventing the escape of a criminal with the individual's interest in life.\(^6\) To find the proper balance, the Court focused on the goal of using force against fleeing felons—as it often focuses on the goal.\(^7\) The goal is to protect citizens; therefore the use of deadly force is constitutional only when necessary against a fleeing felon who poses a serious physical threat. Similarly in English human rights jurisprudence, courts have come to use a means–ends analysis as part of their balancing approach.\(^8\) Accordingly, in the literature on proportionality balancing is often presented as the framework for proportionality analysis.\(^9\)

Under the other approach proportionality analysis acknowledges the triadic structure from the outset. It starts with the search for the end—what is the end of the challenged measure?—and turns to an inquiry of the measure's quality as a means to this end. What are the goals of punishing? Does the punishment help to achieve the goals? How helpful, how necessary, is the punishment to this end? Here balancing comes into play as a controlling last step. Even though the punishment is a helpful and necessary means for the criminal justice system's goals, it may still feel wrong. Is there maybe an imbalance that must be corrected? How serious is the crime in light of the goals? Does the harshness or mildness of the punishment reflect the seriousness?

This approach, too, pertains to all conflicts concerning rights and interests, not just to issues of punishment. In 1963 the German Federal Constitutional Court reviewed whether the state could extract a defendant's cerebrospinal fluid in order to determine his mental capacity.\(^10\) The Court decided that determining his mental capacity was a legitimate goal; the extraction was helpful and necessary. However, the Court recognized that since extraction is painful and dangerous, the state may require an extraction to resolve only a serious crime. As there is literature that presents balancing as the framework for proportionality analysis, so too there is literature that presents balancing as the last step of proportionality analysis. One way or the other, the relation between balancing and proportionality analysis is close.

So whether there is a conflict between state and citizen or between two citizens or even between two state agencies, the attempt to solve these conflicts can—and does in the practice of the courts—start in two different ways: comparing, weighing, and balancing the conflicting interests or rights; or with an inquiry into the goal or end of the contested measure or action, whether that goal or end is legitimate, and whether the measure or action is a helpful and necessary means for achieving that goal or end. The first approach leads to the second: weighing and balancing gains substance in evaluating, for both sides, the contested measure or action’s meaning or goal, in evaluating what one side gains from it and what the other loses, and whether there are alternatives more acceptable to one side or even both sides. Similarly the second approach easily yields the final comparison, whether the conflicting rights or interests are equally important or different, and deserve equal or different acknowledgement.

In practice, more crucial than the approach to the analysis is the diligence with which it is pursued. One can accept the weight that a legislature implicitly gives the interest of the state over a citizen’s right in enacting a freedom-restricting statute, as long as it does not look completely unacceptable, or only after a rigorous analysis. One can accept the relevant reality on which the means–end correlation depends as the legislature sees it, or one can investigate that reality independently. One can reduce the whole analysis to whether the contested statute looks somewhat reasonable or completely unreasonable.

II. Steps of Proportionality Analysis

Regardless of the approach to proportionality analysis and the degree of diligence, proportionality analysis has different steps, each distinctive in its own right.

1. Categorically Prohibited Means

Proportionality analysis concerns the review of governmental, legislative, administrative, and judicial measures and even citizens’ actions as means to an end. Once categorically prohibited, a measure or action may not be considered a means to an end. Once torture is understood as a violation of human dignity and prohibited under all circumstances, it is prohibited even if it seems to be the only means to an end of paramount importance. The prohibition precludes proportionality analysis. This does not mean that proportionality analysis cannot do justice to deontological constraints. Deontological constraints have no place within proportionality analysis, but limit and define its terrain from the outside.

This makes clear from the outset that the use of proportionality analysis depends on the quality of the citizens’ rights upon which the measure or action intrudes. When rights are protected categorically, intrusions are equally categorically prohibited and not subject to proportionality analysis. When a right does not permit at least some intrusion, the question whether a particular intrusion is a proportional means is meaningless.

2. Legitimacy of the End

Once one considers a measure or action as a means to an end, the proportionality analysis obviously requires considering whether the end is legitimate. The legitimacy of a governmental, administrative, or judicial measure follows from the constitution and the relevant statutes. The legitimacy of a legislative measure, that is, a statute, follows from the constitution alone. A federal form of government distinguishes the ends that may be pursued into those of the federal and those of the state legislatures. Apart from that and given the democratic legitimation that the legislature enjoys, a legislative end is legitimate as long as the constitution does not clearly forbid the legislature to pursue it. A democracy in which citizens are free also presumes the legitimacy of a citizen’s action, as long as a relevant law does not refute it.

There are illegitimate legislative ends. Freedom of speech and freedom of religion make it illegitimate for the legislature to proselytize. The legislature must not advocate good as opposed to bad ideas, beneficial as opposed to dangerous cults; the end that it pursues when it infringes speech or religion must be viewpoint-neutral. Nor is it legitimate in a democracy that grants freedom and equality for the legislature to pursue paternalistic or discriminatory ends. It is not for the legislature to enforce ideals of high as opposed to trash culture, of heterosexual as opposed to homosexual relationships, of nuclear as opposed to patchwork families. It is for society to consent or not to consent to such ideals.

Sometimes the constitution substantiates the legitimacy of an end by requiring particular ends for limiting and intruding upon particular rights. The German Constitution, for example, allows for limitations of the freedom of movement and for intrusions into the home only if they are necessary to protect and defend public safety and order and also life or health against specific dangers.

Sometimes when deciding the legitimacy of a particular end courts move into some kind of balancing. In a trend-setting 1986 decision, the Supreme Court of Canada required an end ‘of sufficient importance to warrant overriding a constitutionally protected right of freedom’. The Court left the balancing of the specific right and its specific intrusion or limitation with the legislative end for a later step, but required some balancing in advance of the specific determination. The European Court of Human Rights has a similar requirement, but a different approach; it requires that the end, in addition to being legitimate, be a ‘pressing social need’ justifying the breach of a fundamental right in the interests of democracy. But the court checks this additional quality of the end in the context of balancing only in a later step in the analysis.

3. Fitness or Suitability

A measure or action that is a proportional means to a legitimate end participates in the end's legitimacy. The measure or action can be a proportional means only if it is truly a means, that is, if it is truly helpful and contributes to achieving the end. The contribution may be big or small, obvious and agreed upon, or in doubt and open to debate. But if the measure or action fails altogether to contribute to achieving the end, then it is not truly a means to the end. Then the measure immediately fails the test of proportionality.

This step in proportionality analysis is often called the fitness or suitability test. It requires an empirical check: whether extracting cerebrospinal fluid to determine a person's mental capacity or whether draconian sentences deter future crimes, are matters of fact, not norms. The facts may be hard or even impossible to determine. Then the analyst must decide who gets the benefit of the doubt, the intruder or the one intruded upon. Nevertheless the decision requires a review of actual facts.

(p. 724) 4. Necessity

That a measure or action is an appropriate fit or suitable means to an end does not mean that it is the only means. There may be other means and among them means that intrude less upon the citizen's right. Then, the state has no good reason to use the more rather than the less intrusive means; the less intrusive means serves the citizen's interest better and serves the state's interest just as well. The more intrusive means is unnecessarily intrusive or, stated more simply, unnecessary. The less intrusive means optimizes the potential to resolve the conflict. Sometimes this optimization is identified as a legal counterpart to Pareto-optimality in welfare economics: the resolution of a conflict is optimal only if making one party better off than he is in the resolution would make the other party worse off.

This step in proportionality analysis is often called the necessity test. The alternative means actually has to work; this test is first of all once again an empirical test, creating the same problem of doubt and offering the same solution of allocating the benefit of the doubt to one or the other party to the conflict. Whether the alternative means is less intrusive is a value judgment. But it is an easy one: it reflects the perspective of the citizen who suffers the intrusion. What matters is the intensity of the intrusion to the citizen, not valuation of the intensity in light of the end.

5. Balancing

The attempt to evaluate the intrusion in light of the end is part of the next element or step of proportionality: balancing. The least intrusive means may yet be too intrusive. The only and therefore also least intrusive means to ensure that a determined woman does not have an abortion to imprison her. Even fervent advocates for the unborn believe that imprisonment goes too far and that legislating imprisonment would be too intrusive. But others go that far and argue that the value of life and specifically unborn life takes priority over the value of autonomy and specifically the pregnant woman's autonomy. Both sides disagree about how to weigh and balance the value of unborn life against the value of the woman's autonomy. Since some regard this weighing and balancing as the core of proportionality analysis, this step is also called the test of proportionality in the narrow sense.

Since balancing involves not facts but values and value judgments, it is the most contested step of proportionality analysis. The question is how balancing can be saved from being a playground of subjectivity. Is it possible to verify or falsify a value judgment? How precise can weighing and balancing be? Can the result be objective?

Aharon Barak tries to answer. He acknowledges that the different sides—interests, rights, principles, values—do not have weights that can be accurately measured. Talk of weighing and balancing is metaphorical. The task is to research the relevant case law; to determine the proper status of the conflicting rights and interests in the legal system, particularly their statutory and constitutional status; to examine their societal value in the totality of societal values; and, finally, to decide on the relative value of the conflicting rights and interests on the national scale of values. The result ‘is not always dictated by the legal system, and it is related to the use of judicial discretion’.

Robert Alexy tries to suggest a more precise process. His three-step approach to balancing requires first, determining the detriment to one side if the other side should win; secondly, determining the detriment to the other side if the first side should win; thirdly, determining whether the importance of one side winning justifies the detriment to the other. Alexy advises measuring detriment and importance with a scale that distinguishes between a low, a moderate, and a high degree of realization in order to compare, weigh, and balance the different sides ("Weight Formula"). Like Barak's solution, Alexy's relies on judicial discretion, though Alexy's three-step approach provides for a more appealing presentation of the results.

David M. Beatty seeks to transform balancing from a subjective to an objective process, from a matter of value judgments to a matter of fact finding. He wants judges to respect and enforce the values that society as a whole and individual parties empirically accept, share, and cherish. But sometimes it is hard to find what a society actually values; sometimes a society is deeply torn as to how to value rights and interests; and sometimes not even a strong consensus of the majority helps, because the minority has a right to be protected against the majority. Sometimes Beatty himself recognizes that parties may become so caught up in the battle that they distort their values; it then becomes necessary for a court to make its own evaluation. Again, judicial discretion inevitably comes into play.

The process of balancing remains methodologically obscure. There seems to be a consensus among those who favor the process that it requires an open eye for all relevant facts, interests, rights, principles, and values, as well as a careful analysis of how different outcomes of the conflict may inflict, burden, threaten, or enhance these factors. Assigning weights to the conflicting interests and rights, principles and values, and comparing the weights, entails an insurmountable element of subjectivity. In order to reduce the subjectivity somewhat, one may take into account, as far as is possible, the legal and moral values to which a society adheres, both by tradition and in actual fact, and also the relevant case law.

III. The Structure of Proportionality Analysis

1. A Right Order for Proportionality Analysis?

Since the different accounts of proportionality analysis differ in the order of using their elements, Dieter Grimm asks whether there is a right order. His answer is that order matters. He argues that going from an inquiry into the legitimacy of the end to the fitness test, then to the necessity test and finally to balancing has a 'disciplining and rationalizing effect ... Each step requires a certain assessment. The next step can be taken only if the law that is challenged has not failed on the previous step.'

There is a logic in starting with the inquiry into the legitimacy of the end. If there is no legitimate end, there can be no legitimate means. There is also a logic in testing the facts before balancing the values. First, it is often easier to agree on an assessment of facts than on a value judgment. Secondly, the value judgment often relies on factual knowledge. There is finally a logic in testing the fitness of a means before testing its necessity; it means taking the easier step (p. 726) before the more difficult one, the step that opens up the field of factual investigation before the step that has to go closely into factual alternatives and comparisons.

But the sequence of the inquiry and performance of the tests is of minor importance. If a court sees that the real issue in a case is the necessity of the means and therefore jumps right to the necessity test, there is no reason to criticize its neglect of the first and second steps. If it becomes clear immediately that a means is necessary but might exceed its end, the court's immediate turn to balancing makes sense. Following the order Grimm suggests may sometimes protect against balancing conflicting rights and interests that do not have to be balanced because, as the necessity test shows, one side can be helped without the other being harmed. But, as shown above, the balancing step requires an in-depth examination of the relevant facts that inevitably involve issues of fitness and necessity.

The true problem is not the sequence of the steps, but their application. How thorough should the court be? What role should each step play? Is it right for a court to replace the legislature's balancing of conflicting rights and interests with its own? Balancing is unavoidably subjective and political. Why should the court's subjectivity and political assessment matter more than the legislature's? Should the court simply stick to determining, in an objective and empirical manner, issues of fitness and necessity? And with these issues other problems arise. The fitness and the necessity of a means may sometimes be hard or even impossible to determine. How much political discretion should the legislature enjoy in judging the fitness and necessity of a means to achieve a legitimate end? Who should bear the burden of proof? Who should get the benefit of the doubt? The state claims that it pursues a legitimate end. But, the citizen does not understand why he should sacrifice his freedom if the sacrifice does not reliably pursue the end. These questions involve constitutional issues, foremost the interplay between the supreme or constitutional courts and the other powers.

2. General or Particular Proportionality Analysis?

Similar questions arise in relation to another structural problem: the level of particularity or generality of proportionality analysis. Frank M. Coffin uses the term ‘balancing’, but means ‘proportionality analysis’:

Balancing can degenerate into such a microscopic, particularistic, fact-specific decision that it offers no guidance for future cases. ... The opposite danger, when a problem is addressed at a very high level of generality, is that a far-reaching rule will be announced, far beyond the needs of the case.23

Both dangers are serious. The structural problem cannot be resolved by encouraging courts to avoid one danger by turning to the side where the other danger lurks. Sometimes the case itself provides an orientation: It can be the case of a particular citizen defending his freedom against a particular intrusion or, where a constitutional court permits it, the case of a minority in parliament challenging the constitutionality of a statute passed by the majority. The first case must deal with particulars, the second with the statute's general effect. But courts can neglect the particulars and address the problems of the particular citizen and the particular intrusion on a high level of generality, when their aim is providing guidance for future cases. They can also focus on this or that particular effect of a statute, because they see the particular effect as the crux of the (p. 727) constitutional problem. Again, the true issue is not the level of particularity or generality, but the questions mentioned above. If the state bears the burden of proving the necessity of its intrusions, the court must examine and develop the particular facts in order to determine whether the particular intrusion into the particular citizen's freedom is actually necessary. If, on the other hand, the legislature enjoys substantial political discretion in choosing the means, the court will focus less on particulars and more on general issues. Again, the interplay between the courts and the other powers—a constitutional determination—is what matters.

3. The Range of Proportionality Analysis

The last structural issue in proportionality analysis is its range. Proportionality certainly prohibits going too far, further than a legitimate end requires, further than what is suitable, further than what is necessary, so far that the balance tips. Does it sometimes also prescribe going further? Further than the legislature went in protecting someone's rights and interests?
The German Federal Constitutional Court views proportionality as a protection against the state, whether the state extends its reach too far or not far enough, whether the state has done too much or too little: too little to protect a right or interest. This aspect of proportionality is supposed to come into play particularly in conflicts between individuals. The more the law of landlord and tenant protects the landlord's interests, the less it protects the tenant's interests, and vice versa; the greater the protection an abortion law provides to a pregnant woman, the less the protection for the fetus and, again, vice versa. The idea of the German Federal Constitutional Court is that proportionality not only keeps the state from intruding too far but also from not intruding far enough if protection of the conflicting right or interest should require. The Court rejected the legislature's abortion law twice for not adequately protecting the life of the fetus.25

Again what is at stake is a constitutional issue—the interplay between the court and the other powers. Proportionality as a protection against the state not doing enough is not a problem concerning the legitimacy of an end or the suitability or necessity of a means; it is pure balancing. If the court has the right to substitute its own balancing for the legislature's, there is no reason to limit the court's power to correct only for the legislature's over-extensive reach and not also for its insufficient reach. It is no surprise that the Supreme Court of Canada refrains from balancing and also argues that the legislature is not constitutionally obliged to furnish protection, 'only that it may do so if it wishes'.26

IV. Evolution, Constitutional Foundation, and Distribution of the Principle of Proportionality

How proportionality analysis should be performed, how thoroughly a court should inquire, who should get the benefit of the doubt when questions of suitability and necessity cannot be answered, what role balancing should play—resolution of these problems follows from the constitutional locus and impact of its founding principle, the principle of proportionality. Where is the principle found in the constitution? What is its impact on the interplay of the powers?

1. The Evolution of the Principle of Proportionality

The principle already had a long career before becoming a constitutional principle. As indicated above, it played and plays a crucial role in the philosophical quest for justice. It also played and plays a crucial role in moral discourse, whenever the discourse concerns resolving a conflict between different individuals, their freedoms and interests. Let us suppose that one family member wants his quiet, another wants to play the piano. Resolution requires asking obvious questions: Why does one want his quiet? Is he sick? Why does the other want to play the piano? Does she have to practice for an exam? Is it a sickness where one should lie down or maybe take a walk and get some fresh air? Can he lie down in a room that is not his, but quieter? Can she practice at her friend's house? If both should be able to do what they want only if they are right next door to each other, then how severe is his sickness, how unpleasant or threatening, how important is her exam, can it be repeated or is it a once in a lifetime chance to get into a master class? These questions are the access to a proportionality analysis.

In law the principle of proportionality is often traced back to German roots.27 In Germany the principle came into its own in administrative law when the police acted to protect the public. From the late eighteenth to the early twentieth century, the relevant norm provided little more than a definition of the task of the police: The police had to do what was necessary to fight dangers to public safety and order.28 The norm was meant to give the police wide discretion in fighting dangerous behavior of all sorts: from offending the Prussian king at a socialist rally to building a house without proper structural engineering or to running a chemical plant without proper waste disposal. In the beginning, the norm was even meant to give the police uncontrolled discretion. But once the ideas of individual rights and the Rechtsstaat (the state under the rule of law) began to prevail, the courts started to institute controls over the police. The days of uncontrolled discretion were over. In the last decades of the nineteenth century the Prussian High Administrative Court developed this norm, a norm that did no more than define the task of the police into a jurisprudence of proportionality. The police were entitled to use only means that were fit, necessary, and proportional in the narrow sense. The means had to work, there was to be no other means that would be equally effective but less intrusive, and the end was to be important enough to justify the intrusion.

The court had two and only two normative premises. First, the police were entitled to do what is necessary to fight dangers to public safety and order. Secondly, citizens' life, liberty, and property were protected against police
Proportionality (1)

In this perspective the proportionality principle is one of the general principles of law, without which law does not work.

Robert Alexy has found something of a following for his interpretation of fundamental rights as principles and the proportionality principle as a consequence of the principled quality of fundamental rights. As principles, so goes his idea, fundamental rights express values and require optimization of the values they express, their realization to the greatest extent possible. Thus fundamental rights unavoidably conflict with other fundamental rights that require optimization of their own sets of values. Also fundamental rights may conflict with the principles that guide the state in pursuing its goals. The only resolution of these conflicts is to search for a Pareto-optimum that satisfies both sides in the conflict, and if that is not enough, to balance the two principles. So for Alexy fundamental rights are the constitutional foundation of the principle of proportionality—because they are principles.35
Proportionality (1)

The interpretation of fundamental rights as principles expressing values is a problem in its own right. Once rights are interpreted as expressing values, it is a small and easy step to distinguish between a valuable and a valueless use that an individual makes of them—a step towards paternalism and discrimination. Since the constitution does not offer a hierarchy of principles, each conflict between a citizen's fundamental right and the state's interest in pursuing a goal is a conflict of equally strong principles. Fundamental rights are in danger of losing their prominence. The interpretation of fundamental rights as principles may seem to promise a particularly rich meaning and strong impact for fundamental rights, but it does not ensure that the exercise of fundamental rights may take priority over the state's interest.

It is not helpful to link the principle of proportionality to the controversial interpretation of rights as principles. Nor is it necessary. Fundamental rights that protect against limitations and intrusions but also allow them can protect only against some limitations and intrusions and must allow others. The principle of proportionality provides a plausible method for finding out which limitations and intrusions to allow. The method is open to variation: Proportionality analysis can be carried out with more or less rigor; it can emphasize the factual assessments of the suitability and necessity tests or the value judgments of the balancing step; it can put the burden of proof on or give the benefit of the doubt to the limiting and intruding state or to the affected citizen. It is open to various understandings of the relationship between citizen and state, and between the supreme or constitutional court and the legislature. This openness is an asset. It makes proportionality analysis the arena in which the different (p. 731) understandings of the relationship between citizen and state and between the supreme or constitutional court and the legislature can rationally confront one another.

3. Distribution of the Principle of Proportionality

Wherever courts find themselves with two premises and not much more, the first that rights and freedoms are protected against limitations and intrusions, the second that these rights and freedoms can be limited and intruded upon, the answer must be that the limitations and intrusions must not be arbitrary, but proportional.

But rights can also be granted in a different way. The Bill of Rights of the US Constitution protects fewer rights than other constitutions, but protects the most prominent among them categorically. The free exercise of religion must not be prohibited; freedom of speech, freedom of the press, the right to assemble peaceably must not be abridged. The legislature is not empowered to limit these rights or to intrude upon them. This does not mean that the rights do not conflict with goals that the state pursues or with rights of other citizens. But without a caveat for legislative limitations and intrusions, demarcations and categorizations help to resolve the conflict. The jurisprudence draws lines: the exercise of religion must end where a religion-neutral law as opposed to a religion-specific law states its commands or prohibitions; speech must end when it turns into a fight or commercial action or, as obscenity or defamation, lacks the value of speech; and it must also end where restrictions are not content-specific, but content-neutral, and refer only to the time, place, and manner of what is said. That does not mean that proportionality analysis does not come into play. Whenever US courts review limitations and intrusions with strict scrutiny or a middle tier of scrutiny or with a requirement of mere rationality, theirs is a means–end analysis that is a more or less thorough proportionality analysis.36 The often-mentioned, praised, or criticized US exceptionalism exists. What it means is that the word ‘proportionality’ appears only rarely; that the means–end analysis is somewhat haphazard and that balancing and means–end analysis come systematically later; the first approach is to fine-tune the realm of the right, to specify its inner limitations before allowing for outer limitations by the legislature.

Other than the US Constitution, most modern constitutions protect a plethora of rights and freedoms, with the effect that all behavior, all action, all expression is protected, but the state can limit and intrude upon these protections, as long as it does so proportionally. Sometimes the constitutions were the response to a previous totalitarian or dictatorial regime; lack of freedom in all areas of life leads to an emphasis on the protection of freedom in all areas of life as well. But even without the experience of totalitarianism or dictatorship, in a world ever more crowded and ever more narrow, freedom in all areas of life is ever more valuable. With the far-reaching constitutional protection of rights and freedoms, the principle of proportionality spread across Europe, into the Commonwealth, to Israel, Central and South America, and beyond. In European countries lacking constitutionally protected rights and freedoms or constitutional review, implementation of the European Convention on Human Rights into the national legal system leads also to implementation of the principle of proportionality in the national jurisprudence. The European Court of Justice, the European Court of Human Rights, and the Panels and the Appellate Body of the World Trade Organization all operate under the principle of proportionality.

V. The Strength of Rights and Freedoms in Proportionality Analysis

A frequent criticism of the proportionality principle is that it dilutes and relativizes rights and freedoms: a right or freedom is protected only to the extent that a state does not have a legitimate interest that requires its intrusion or limitation; it is not stronger than the state’s legitimate interest; in fact, it is weaker, because, once one position can be saved only at the cost of the other position, the collective interest of the people as represented by the state must trump the single right of the individual citizen.

1. Strength through the State’s Interest in Rights and Freedoms

However, this criticism is based on an oversimplification. It is a mistake to view individual rights or freedoms as always in opposition to the state’s interest. A conflict about a newspaper’s publication of military plans and projects is not just a conflict between the newspaper’s freedom of speech and the state interest in national safety. That a marketplace of ideas exists—a marketplace in which the press follows, monitors, and criticizes the state’s and also the military’s actions—is also in the state’s own interest; the state has an interest in its citizens’ use and enjoyment of freedom of speech.

Still, proportionality analysis is basically the same whether the publishing newspaper’s freedom of speech is viewed as an individual freedom only or also as a constituting element in the marketplace of ideas. The issues of suitability and necessity are the same, and if national security requires prohibiting a publication, acknowledging the importance of a free marketplace of ideas will be no more than rhetorical.

2. Strength through the Exclusion of Reasons

Rights and freedoms show their strength in other ways. They do so by excluding reasons. Proportionality analysis is a reasoning process in which, prima facie, everything can be argued for or against the suitability or necessity of a means and the balance of the means and the end.

Rights can reduce this universe of discourse. Underlying freedom of speech is the notion that the state is not entitled to judge viewpoints, that for the state one viewpoint must be as good as another. Therefore, as shown above, the legislature cannot be allowed to proselytize; such ends are illegitimate. But viewpoint neutrality goes even further. The justifications for restricting freedom of speech must be viewpoint neutral. To argue that a limitation on freedom of speech for the legitimate goal of public safety and order is proportional because it affects only false, wrong, and evil ideas is unacceptable. Similarly, a limitation on religious freedom cannot be justified on the ground that it affects only particularly superstitious and unenlightened religious beliefs. Since equality prohibits not only open discrimination based on gender, race, or age but also arguments based on gender, race, or age as justification, homosexuals can be excluded from the military neither because they are homosexuals nor because homophobic traditions, conventions, or sentiments in the military must be respected in order to keep the military efficient.

3. Strength through Imposition of the Burden of Proof

In proportionality analysis placing the burden of proof on the intrusive or restrictive state agency strengthens or bolsters individual rights and freedoms. But to do so creates problems. The problems that arise when an administrative agency or a court intrudes or restricts are relatively minor; an agency or court must act in accordance with the law setting conditions for intrusions or restrictions. The agency or court bears the burden of showing that these conditions are satisfied. However, the problem is severe when a legislature intrudes or restricts. If there is doubt whether a statute is a necessary means to a legitimate end, is it not enough that the legislature, subject only to the constitution and legitimized by election, thinks so? Should the legislature not enjoy a substantial margin of appreciation or discretion? On the other hand, placing the burden of proof on the citizen means that the citizen must justify his exercise of the freedom. Does freedom not include the right not to account for its exercise?

It may seem as if the solution to the problem raised by burden of proof is to assign courts responsibility for the evidence, for finding and hearing experts, for collecting and assessing the relevant empirical data. While the US Supreme Court says that it does ‘not sit to weigh evidence in order to determine whether the regulation is sound or appropriate’, even though it sometimes does, in the continental legal tradition courts are responsible for compiling and weighing the evidence. But assigning responsibility for compiling evidence to a court does not necessarily strengthen rights and freedoms; it can also weaken them. The court that is better trained and equipped than the parties before it may conclude that an intrusion is not necessary even though the legislature tried to prove that it is, but it can also conclude that the intrusion or restriction is necessary even though the legislature was unable to prove that it is. The court may even find that the intrusion or restriction is not necessary for the goal for which the legislature thought that it was necessary but rather for a different goal. In any case, the burden-of-proof problem cannot be solved that way: the court can still end up with an impasse when the information that it gathers does not provide a clear answer.

This arises frequently. Often experience, science, and scholarship do not provide the information necessary to determine whether a means works and whether it is necessary. Then all one has, may well be contradictory experiences and assumptions and as many expert opinions as there are interests. In the conflict over the route of the fence separating Israelis and Palestinians, the Israeli Supreme Court received contradictory opinions from two groups of military experts. The military commander argued that only the contested route provides safety: military experts from the Council for Peace and Security argued that this route intrudes on local Palestinians lives more harshly than necessary, and that it is also not safe. If the burden is on the government to prove the military necessity of the contested route, then local Palestinians would have the upper hand. If, on the other hand, it is the Palestinians who must prove that the route is militarily unnecessary, then it is the government that has the upper hand. The court placed the burden of proof on the local Palestinians and accepted the route as necessary. But in the last step of its proportionality analysis the court found the route’s intrusion on local Palestinians too harsh and unbalanced, and required the government to design a different route.

No country’s constitutional jurisprudence relies exclusively on either of the two burden-of-proof rules. Decision-makers find more flexible approaches in between. Often they shift the burden of proof according to what is at stake. The more the citizen’s freedom relates to his autonomy and the less important the end that the legislature pursues is for the common good, the more constitutional courts tend to require that the legislature demonstrates a statute’s effectiveness and necessity beyond reasonable doubt. On the other hand, the more important the legislature’s end and the less crucial the curtailed freedom, the more generous courts are to the legislature and allow it to act, even if many questions about the effectiveness and necessity of the statute remain unanswered. Of course, there are many degrees of more and less on this flexible scale and correspondingly many ways in which the burden of proof can shift or even be shared by the court itself; there are also many different notions of what doubts are reasonable and what doubts are unreasonable, and many different ideas about what is crucial to or at least relevant for citizens’ autonomy and what is important for the common good. So it comes as no surprise that different traditions exist and shift as to how to distribute the burden of proof between the legislature and the citizens.

4. Strength through Balancing

A third way to regard rights and freedoms as gaining strength is through balancing. This last step of the proportionality analysis allows the right or freedom to trump even if the intrusion or limitation is necessary for a legitimate end. Dieter Grimm presents the hypothetical of a statute that allows the police to kill someone if necessary to prevent him from stealing property and praises balancing as the only way for a court to acknowledge that the value of a person’s life is more important than another’s property and to reject the statute as unconstitutional.

But balancing comes with a high price. That life is more valuable than property is so obvious that the decision of the court has an objective aura. In fact it is so obvious that the hypothetical seems contrived, but for times of riot, commotion, and plundering when the result of the balancing and the decision of the court would not be obvious. In most cases the results of balancing are nothing less than obvious; they do not have an objective aura, but are unavoidably and plainly subjective. However, the question arises why justices should value their own subjectivity over the legislature’s. Subjective decisions about how to pursue the common good are intrinsically political, and the democratic process, the election of the parliament as legislature, is the first and foremost way of legitimizing political decisions. When decisions are made on objective grounds, experts are legitimized to make them, and normative decisions about the legitimacy of an end and empirical decisions about the fitness and necessity of a means are sufficiently objective to be made by judicial experts. But their legal expertise cannot legitimize their rendering political decisions—not any better at least than democracy legitimizes the legislature. Judicial balancing is unproblematic as long as courts correct the balancing of lower courts or administrative agencies; this balancing takes place within the space that the legislature has designated for the judiciary and administration. Judicial balancing that corrects the legislature is and remains a problem. There is, as Antonio Scalia says about determining the weight of a government’s need that conflicts with a private interest, ‘a world of difference between the people’s representatives’ determining the need … and this court’s doing so.’

Judicial balancing does not necessarily make rights and freedoms stronger. The balancing process can tilt in both directions; it can strengthen rights and freedoms and it can weaken them. In either case it is a problem for democracy.

VI. The Future of Proportionality Analysis

1. Proportionality Analysis and Judicial Activism

Tolerating judicial balancing means modifying the democratic standard. It means accepting indirect democratic legitimacy as tantamount to direct democratic legitimacy—the appointment of judges by the president or the parliament as tantamount to the parliament’s popular election. It also means a certain distrust in parliamentary decision-making and trust in judicial deliberation—the belief that experts in the law on a supreme or constitutional court have the wisdom and time to balance the crucial conflicts of a society more calmly and carefully than a legislature acting in the turbulence of political struggle. The courts that claim the right to control the balancing of the legislature and replace it with their own balancing know that balancing is democratically sensitive and never miss an opportunity to emphasize their respect for the legislature and legislative decision-making. Courts do not always interfere in the legislature’s balancing. They interfere only on those occasions when they wish to, some courts more and some less.

This activism of courts can be related to a country’s past, a past that may have bred more or less distrust or trust in the parliament or the courts. Countries with glorious revolutionary pasts tend to trust their parliaments more; parliaments were the offspring of the revolution, while courts were the conservative inheritance. Countries in which the democratic process set in motion fascist or communist dictatorships tend to hope that a strong supreme or constitutional court will reign in the political and legislative process and tame its dangerous tendencies. Countries with ethnic and religious conflicts tend to shift some of the burden of integration from politics to law and from the legislature to the supreme or constitutional court. But these are no more than tendencies, and grouping England and France into the first category, Germany, Spain, and Hungary into the second, and India and South Africa into the third can be done only with caution. The United States forms a group of its own and has developed its own brand of activism. There also seems to be a tendency at work that is unrelated to the past. If the court’s powers are not rigidly curtailed but allow some leeway, then courts embark on a journey into activism. Like all agencies, they expand to their limits.

Democracy is not the only ground for criticizing the activism of supreme and constitutional courts. Again and again criticism turns the principle of proportionality against itself; again and again politicians find proportionality analysis of legislation out of proportion. A statute has been prepared, deliberated, and decided in ministries, in committees, and in parliament—why now more empirical research into the efficiency and necessity of the statute, more balancing of rights and interests? It costs time, expertise, and patience, and in the end the court’s decision may be as subjective as the parliament’s. Is a fast decision not more productive and liberating than a fully researched and finely balanced decision that takes years? Is a decision that resolutely decides for or against the legislature not more pacifying than one that delves into proportionality and disproportionality and only emphasizes the complexity and difficulty of the issue?
Courts know about these criticisms as they know about the other problems of proportionality analysis. The twists and turns in their jurisprudence reflect not only the evolution of legal insight and doctrine on the bench but also the criticism that the courts encounter. They can affront the legislature once in a while, but not all the time. They have to develop a sense of how far they can push and where they have to give in. They have to develop a sense of their weight in the balance of powers. This is not opportunism; it is what an institution must do when its only authority—its shield and sword—rests on the word.

2. The Standardizing Effect of the Principle of Proportionality

The principle of proportionality has had a fantastic career: from a philosophical to a legal principle, from a principle of administrative law to a principle of constitutional law or even law as such. It has been named the ultimate rule of law, and even though there is no such thing as an ultimate rule of law, the principle of proportionality is definitely a rule, at which all courts ultimately arrive. Even the US Supreme Court, shy about using the term, follows the rule in substance again and again.

Application of the principle has had and will have a standardizing effect on different constitutional cultures. Constitutional cultures with a doctrinal tradition will progressively be transformed in the direction of a culture of a case law. The oft-praised asset of proportionality analysis is its flexibility; from case to case facts may be assessed differently and rights and interests weighed and balanced differently. The case-specific configuration of facts, interests, and rights becomes more important and more significant than the doctrine that surrounds the case. Judges become more interested in finding the proportional solution for the case than in a decision that fits into established doctrine or helps to modify and to refine it. On the other hand, the principle of proportionality has a certain structuring quality and potency that introduces a minimal doctrinal element into constitutional cultures with a case law tradition.

Another way of viewing this is that the principle of proportionality does not have a standardizing effect on different constitutional cultures, but rather that it is a standard that constitutional cultures share and that they become more and more aware of. That it is part of a deep structure of constitutional grammar that forms the basis of all different constitutional languages and cultures. It comes to the surface as constitutions grow in theoretical and practical meaning.

Bibliography

Robert Alexy, A Theory of Constitutional Rights (German edn 1986, 2002)

Bernhard Schlink, ‘Der Grundsatz der Verhältnismaessigkeit’ in Peter Badura and Horst Dreier (eds), Festschrift 50 Jahre Bundesverfassungsgericht, vol 2 (2001)

Notes:

(*) I would like to thank the Netherlands Institute for Advanced Study in the Humanities and Social Sciences for the fellowship in Fall 2010 during which much of this chapter was written.

(2) Ibid 1132b (30), 1133a (1), 1788.

(10) Spinal Tap Case, 16 BVerfGE 194 (10 June 1963).

(14) See Jowell (n 8), 679ff for a summary of the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights.

(17) Barak, Judge (n 16), 169.

(20) See besides the authors mentioned in nn 16, 18, and 19, Aleinikoff (n 7), 962f; Coffin (n 9), 22ff; Grimm (n 11), 395ff.
(21) Grimm (n 11), 397.

(22) Section I.3.

(23) Coffin (n 9), 33; see also Aleinikoff (n 7), 979ff on the ‘distinction between “definitional” and “ad hoc” balancing’ and Barak, Judge (n 16), 171 on ‘principled balancing and ad hoc balancing’.

(24) See on this new ‘Untermassverbot’ as a sibling of the old ‘Uebermassverbot’ Grimm (n 11), 392; on the similar jurisprudence of the Russian Constitutional Court see Alexander Blankenagel, ‘Werden die Letzten die Ersten sein? Die Rechtsprechung des russischen Verfassungsgerichts zum Wirtschaftsverfassungsrecht’ in Alexander Blankenagel, Ingolf Pernice, and Helmut Schulze-Fielitz (eds), Verfassung im Diskurs der Welt (2004), 605, 622ff.

(29) Allgemeines Landrecht für die die Preussischen Staaten, Teil II, Titel 17, §10.

(30) See Aleinikoff (n 7), 947 on US Supreme Court jurisprudence; Schlink (n 11), 449 on the jurisprudence of the German Federal Constitutional Court; Knill and Becker (n 27), 464 on the jurisprudence of the European Court of Justice.

(32) European Charter of Fundamental Rights, Art 52; the Constitutions of Greece, Art 25; Poland, Art 31; Portugal, Art 18; Russia, Art 55; Switzerland, Art 36; Basic Law of Israel: Human Dignity and Freedom, s 8.

(34) Dreier (n 33), 128ff.

(35) Alexy (n 11), 572f; see also Kumm (n 11), 136f; Stone Sweet and Mathews (n 15), 93ff.

(37) See with detailed references Cohen-Eliya and Porat (n 7), 13ff; Stone Sweet and Mathews (n 15), 74, 112ff.

(38) See, with detailed references for the United Kingdom, Jowell (n 8), 678ff.

(40) Stephen Breyer’s opinion in Bartnicki v Vopper US 1753 (2001); Aleinikoff (n 7), 981ff; Coffin (n 9), 28ff; Gewirtz (n 9), 157ff.

(41) Section II.2.

(42) Lustig-Prean and Beckett v United Kingdom, App nos 31417/96 and 32377/96, 27 September 1999, para 71; Kumm (n 11), 137ff, 146f; see also Pildes (n 12), 727ff.

(45) See Susnjar (n 36), 83ff on similarities and differences between the jurisprudence of the German Federal Constitutional Court, the US Supreme Court, the European Court of Human Rights, and the European Court of Justice; Grimm (n 11), 390ff on the different traditions of the German Federal Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of Canada; Mathews and Stone Sweet (n 7), on shifts in the jurisprudence of the US Supreme Court; Julian Rivers, ‘Proportionality and Variable Intensity of Review’ (2006) 65 Cambridge Law Review 174 on the jurisprudence of British courts; Barak, Judge (n 16), 226ff on the Israeli experience.

(46) Grimm (n 11), 396.

(48) Beatty (n 19).

Bernhard Schlink
Bernhard Schlink is Professor Emeritus of Public Law and Legal Philosophy, Humboldt University Berlin and Former Justice of the Constitutional Court of the State of Northrhine-Westfalia
This article focuses on one area governed by proportionality, namely, that of a right grounded in the constitution that is limited by a sub-constitutional norm (such as an ‘ordinary’ statute or common law rule). Such a limitation is constitutional only if it is proportional. It also considers the application of proportionality in those legal systems (such as the United Kingdom, New Zealand, and the Australian state of Victoria) in which there is no constitutional bill of rights and rights are based on a statute that provides, in its limitation clause, that the rights may be limited by law. The article begins by considering the methodological aspect of proportionality as the standard for determining the constitutionality of a sub-constitutional norm that limits a constitutional right. It examines the four elements of proportionality — proper purpose, rational connection, necessity, and proportionality stricto sensu (balancing) — and investigates the formal role of proportionality in limiting a constitutional right. The analytical investigation aims to determine the questions posed by the elements of proportionality, but analytical investigation alone cannot provide the answers to those questions. The answers are to be found primarily in the society’s understanding of democracy, separation of powers, and constitutional rights. It is these answers that give proportionality its moral depth.

Keywords: proportionality, sub-constitutional norms, constitutional rights, proper purpose, rational connection

I. The Distinction between a Constitutional Right's Scope and Limitations on It 739
   1. Scope and Limitation 739
   2. Scope of the Constitutional Right and Clash of Competing Rights 740
   3. The Role of Proportionality 740
   4. The Legal Sources of Proportionality 741

II. The Elements of Proportionality 742
   1. Preliminary Remarks 742
   2. Proper Purpose 743
   3. Rational Connection 743
   4. Necessity 744
   5. Proportionality Stricto Sensu—Balancing 744
      (a) The Social Importance of the Purpose and of Avoiding the Limitation on the Constitutional Right 744
      (b) The Rule of Balancing 746
      (c) Development of the Proportionality Stricto Sensu Element (Balancing) 746

III. The Zone of Proportionality 747
   1. Legislator and Judge 747
   2. The Zone of Proportionality and the Margin of Appreciation 748
IV. Assessing Proportionality 749

1. The Importance of Proportionality 749
2. Criticism of Proportionality and Responses to It 749
3. Alternatives to Proportionality 752
   (a) Proportionality Determined by the Legislator 752
   (b) US Categorization 752

(p. 739) Professor Schlink has surveyed the scope of proportionality in all respects. In this chapter, I want to focus on one area governed by proportionality, namely, that of a right grounded in the constitution that is limited by a sub-constitutional norm (such as an ‘ordinary’ statute or common law rule). Such a limitation is constitutional only if it is proportional. I will consider as well the application of proportionality in those legal systems (such as the United Kingdom, New Zealand, and the Australian state of Victoria) in which there is no constitutional bill of rights and rights are based on a statute that provides, in its limitation clause, that the rights may be limited by law. That limitation, too, is lawful only if it is proportional.1 In all of these matters I will concentrate on aspects that are complementary to those considered by Professor Schlink or on areas in which I disagree with him.

The starting point for my inquiry is the methodological aspect of proportionality as the standard for determining the constitutionality of a sub-constitutional norm that limits a constitutional right. That starting point is, by its nature, analytical, meant to investigate the legal construct on which proportionality is based. It will probe the four elements of proportionality—proper purpose, rational connection, necessity, and proportionality stricto sensu (balancing)—and investigate the formal role of proportionality in limiting a constitutional right.

The analytical investigation will determine the questions posed by the elements of proportionality, but analytical investigation alone cannot provide the answers to those questions. The answers are to be found primarily in the society’s understanding of democracy, separation of powers, and constitutional rights. It is these answers that give proportionality its moral depth.

I. The Distinction between a Constitutional Right’s Scope and Limitations on It

1. Scope and Limitation

The modern doctrine of constitutional rights took shape after the Second World War.2 It distinguishes between two fundamental concepts: the scope of a constitutional right and the limitations to which it is subject.3 The scope of a constitutional right defines the area that it covers—its content and its boundaries—and it can be changed only by constitutional amendment. The limitations on a constitutional right set the constitutional conditions under which the right may be less than fully realized. These conditions are based on the limitation clause, whether explicit or implied, and allow for a constitutional right to be limited, in a proportional manner, by a sub-constitutional (statutory or common law) norm. A small number of constitutional rights are absolute, subject to no limitations whatsoever.4 Most constitutional human rights, however, are relative, subject to limitation by sub-constitutional norms. In some legal systems, relative rights have a core that cannot be limited;5 that core is absolute. That a constitutional right is relative does not mean, however, that it is a prima facie right. A relative right is still a definite right.6

(p. 740) This distinction between scope and limitation establishes two stages of constitutional analysis. At the first stage, the inquiry pertains to whether a constitutional right is limited by a sub-constitutional norm. At this stage, the burden of proof is on the party asserting the limitation. At the second stage, the inquiry considers whether the limitation on the constitutional right is proportional. The burden of proof at this stage is on the party asserting proportionality.

2. Scope of the Constitutional Right and Clash of Competing Rights

The scope of a constitutional right is determined in accord with the principles of constitutional interpretation7—in my view, on the basis of the purpose or rationale that underlies the right. In determining scope, one should not take account of any opposing constitutional right or conflicting public interest.8 It follows that there will be many instances in which one constitutional right will clash with another. How are such conflicts to be resolved?9 I would answer that when one of the competing rights is formulated as a rule (or both are so formulated), the conflict is resolved on the constitutional plane by application of the usual maxims under which the later norm prevails over the earlier (lex posterior derogat priori) and the specific norm prevails over the general (lex specialis derogat legi generali). These maxims determine the validity of the competing rights and their scope. That is not the case, however, where the competing rights are formulated as principles. In that event, the two rights maintain their full validity on the constitutional plane, and the clash must be resolved on the sub-constitutional plane. The validity of a law that limits one right (formulated as a principle) in order to realize the other (also formulated as a principle) will be determined in accord with the limitation clause—and that determination will be reached pursuant to the rules of proportionality.

3. The Role of Proportionality

The elements of proportionality are part of the constitution, explicitly stated in the limitation clause. There may be a general limitation clause, applicable to all constitutional rights or a specific limitation clause for each of them. Sometimes, both will exist side by side. On occasion, a constitution will simply state that a constitutional right may be limited by law, making no explicit reference to proportionality, but the conventional view is that the limiting law must be proportional. In some cases, a constitution may declare the substance of a right without saying anything explicit about its limitation. The conventional view is that constitutional silence does not make the right absolute and that the right may be limited by law, as long as the limitation is proportional. In that situation, the proportionality is implied by the constitution; it is sometimes referred to as a ‘judicial limitation clause’.

The proportional limitation of a constitutional right must be grounded in law. In civil law jurisdictions, that means the limitation must be in a statute enacted by the legislator. In common law jurisdictions, the limitation may also be in common law norms. In the absence of a law limiting a constitutional right, the question of proportionality becomes irrelevant.

The formal role of proportionality is to ensure that a sub-constitutional norm limiting a constitutional right fulfills its four elements. If those elements are not fulfilled, the sub-constitutional norm will lack the force to limit the constitutional right, for a higher norm trumps a lower norm. In effect, then, the formal role of proportionality is to overcome the results of the constitutional norm’s superiority. It follows that where a constitutional right is limited by another constitutional norm, the four elements of proportionality do not apply. The clash will be resolved not on the constitutional level but on the sub-constitutional level.

We have seen that proportionality is a legal construct. It puts in place four elements whose fulfillment will allow a limitation placed on a constitutional right by a sub-constitutional norm to be found constitutional. Every legal system that adopts proportionality must determine for itself, however, how the elements of proportionality are to be satisfied. In reaching such a conclusion, the legal system will be expressing its society’s understanding of democracy. The conclusion will be derived from its position on the importance of constitutional rights and their relationship to the public interest and will reflect its approach to separation of powers and the role of each branch of government. Proportionality, then, is a framework that must be filled with content. The framework sets the four elements that must be fulfilled, but the content of those elements will be determined by a set of considerations that are external to proportionality and that inform it. That content therefore may vary from one legal system to another. But note: proportionality is not neutral with respect to human rights, and it is not indifferent to their limitation. It is grounded in the need to realize human rights. The limitations that proportionality imposes on the realization of constitutional rights draw their substance from the same source as the rights themselves; they are grounded in the society’s understanding of democracy.

In sum, the elements of proportionality reflect the idea that a sub-constitutional norm may impose limits on a constitutional right, but that those limits are themselves bounded. This is the concept of ‘limits on the limitations’.14

4. The Legal Sources of Proportionality

What is the legal source of proportionality? It appears by that name in only a handful of constitutions and, even there, questions of interpretation arise regarding its elements. That is all the more so when it is not explicitly mentioned and is only implied. Some trace the jurisprudential origin of proportionality to democracy itself. Insofar as democracy has constitutional standing, it implies a need to strike a balance between human rights and countervailing constitutional principles. That balance is expressed through proportionality. Similarly, the rule of law
Proportionality (2)

(Rechtsstaat, l'état droit) may be seen as a principle having constitutional standing, from which proportionality may be inferred. Some see the basis for proportionality in the formulation of constitutional rights as principles. On this view, maintained by Alexy, ‘principles are norms which require that something be realized to the greatest extent possible, given the legal and factual possibilities.’ The factual possibilities that limit realization of the principle are those set by the elements of proportionality pertaining to rational connection and necessity; the legal possibilities that limit realization of the principle are set by proportionality in the narrow sense, that is, balancing. It follows, according to Alexy’s approach, that there is a direct and firm linkage between rights formulated as principles and proportionality. Finally, the source for proportionality may lie in constitutional interpretation. On this view, even if proportionality is not explicitly mentioned in the constitution, it is implied by the architecture of human rights and public interest within it. These four explanations are complementary.

II. The Elements of Proportionality

1. Preliminary Remarks

Proportionality has four elements: proper purpose, rational connection, necessity, and proportionality in the narrow sense, that is, balance. Not all concur in that taxonomy, however. Some do not consider a proper purpose to be part of proportionality; others link the consideration of proper purpose to that of rational connection. At times, a legal system may not recognize one of the elements. The South African Constitution requires these four elements to be met, but states that they are not exclusive and that there may be other relevant considerations.

The four elements of proportionality pertain with respect both to negative rights and to positive rights. Negative rights define the limitations on a constitutional right that the state is precluded from imposing. Positive rights define the actions that the state is obligated to take in order to protect a constitutional right. With regard to negative rights, proportionality examines whether the limitation imposed by a law on the full realization of a constitutional right is proportional. With regard to positive rights, proportionality examines whether the failure to protect the full scope of the constitutional right is proportional. In both cases, the four elements noted above apply.

In some common law jurisdictions, a question has arisen regarding the relationship between proportionality (with its four components) and reasonableness. The latter is recognized in the administrative law of common law jurisdictions as a basis for judicial review of administrative actions, and it is sometimes applied in constitutional law as well. Does proportionality supplant reasonableness? The answers to these questions are not at all simple, given the lack of clarity regarding the elements of reasonableness. We may distinguish between reasonableness in the weak sense and reasonableness in the strong sense. Reasonableness in the weak sense sees an action as unreasonable if it is ‘so absurd that no sensible person could ever dream that it may lay within the powers of the authority’. Reasonableness in this weak sense is not constructed step by step. It does not differentiate among various elements and does not clearly recognize a need to balance competing considerations. This way of thinking is substantively different from that associated with proportionality, and the transition from reasonableness in the weak sense to proportionality may be difficult. Reasonableness in the strong sense, however, is based on a balancing of competing interests. A decision is reasonable in the strong sense, if it was reached after giving due consideration to the various factors that should be taken into account. Reasonableness in this sense strikes a proper balance among the relevant considerations, and it does not differ substantively from proportionality. Proportionality can be seen as a further development of reasonableness, and there need be no difficulty in principle in making the transition between them.

Finally, a question arises regarding when the four elements of proportionality must be satisfied by a law limiting a constitutional right. Is it enough that they are satisfied when the law is enacted? Or is it necessary that they are met on an ongoing basis? In my view, the requirements of proportionality are ongoing. The law to which they apply remains subject to them for as long as it remains in force.

2. Proper Purpose

The first element of proportionality requires that a law limiting a constitutional right has a proper purpose. This is a threshold requirement that does not entail concrete balancing. It is generally acknowledged that a limitation on a constitutional right is constitutional if it is intended to protect other rights (constitutional or sub-constitutional).
Proportionality (2)

One enters a gray area with respect to proper purpose, however, when the constitutional right is to be limited to promote the public interest. What public interest can justify limiting a constitutional right? At times, the constitution itself will specify the public interests whose realization will warrant limiting certain constitutional rights. But what does one do when the constitution says nothing in that regard? German constitutional law regards it as sufficient that the public interest is not contrary to the constitution.\textsuperscript{28} Canadian constitutional law, in contrast, requires that the public interest be pressing and pressing and substantial.\textsuperscript{29} In both systems, the requirement of proper purpose applies to all constitutional rights, without any effort to distinguish among rights on the basis of their importance.

3. Rational Connection

The second component of proportionality is that the means adopted by the law must be capable of advancing the realization of its proper purpose.\textsuperscript{30} This does not require that the means be the only one that can attain the purpose, or that it realize the purpose in full, or that it do so efficiently. The requirement is that the means have the potential to advance the purpose to some extent that is not merely marginal, scant, or theoretical.

(p. 744) 4. Necessity

The third component of proportionality requires that the proper purpose is not attainable by some other means less restrictive of the constitutional right.\textsuperscript{31} If there exists some equally effective alternative that would entail less of a limitation on the constitutional right, the law in question is not necessary.\textsuperscript{32} If, however, the alternative would intrude less on the constitutional right but would be able to attain the law's proper purpose only in part, the law would be necessary. It would be necessary as well if the alternative, though able to attain the law's proper purpose in full, would limit some other right or impair some other public interest. Accordingly, the law is necessary if an alternative is less restrictive of the constitutional right but more costly. Of course, rejection of those alternatives may not pass muster under the balancing test required by the fourth element of proportionality (proportionality stricto sensu).

The necessity test requires that the means selected by the law be tailored to realizing the proper purpose. One ‘cannot shoot a sparrow with a cannon’;\textsuperscript{33} the means must be suited to the ends. When the purpose can be attained by a means less restrictive of constitutional rights that means should be selected, and there is no necessity for the law under review. But while over-inclusiveness should be avoided, it becomes necessary when it is impossible to separate the narrower measures needed to realize the law's purpose from those that are over-inclusive. In these circumstances, the over-inclusiveness is dealt with in the context of the fourth component, that of balancing. As an example, consider a law whose purpose is to protect the public interest and the rights of the individual against terrorists. Given the inability to distinguish a terrorist from a non-terrorist by individual examination, a general prohibition may be imposed that affects the rights of non-terrorists as well. That inability to rely on individual examination (which imposes less of a limitation on the constitutional right) transforms the general prohibition (which limits the constitutional right comprehensively) into something necessary.\textsuperscript{34}

5. Proportionality Stricto Sensu—Balancing

(a) The Social Importance of the Purpose and of Avoiding the Limitation on the Constitutional Right

The fourth element of proportionality requires a proper relationship between the social benefit of realizing the proper purpose and the social benefit of avoiding the limitation of the constitutional right.\textsuperscript{35} The element of rational connection and the element of necessity deal with the relationship between the law's purpose and the means it adopts for realizing that purpose. The means–ends analysis conducted at that stage does not consider whether attaining the purpose is worth the associated limitation on the constitutional right: it is not based on balancing. But things are quite different when we come to proportionality stricto sensu. At that stage, we examine the relationship between the law's purpose and the constitutional rights that are affected, and that examination entails balancing.\textsuperscript{36}

(p. 745) To speak of ‘balancing’ is to speak metaphorically,\textsuperscript{37} but the mode of thought is normative. It is based on legal rules that determine when a proper purpose may be realized despite the limitation on a constitutional right. There is no consensus, however, regarding the substance of those legal rules. In my view, they should be based on a balancing of the social importance of the benefit gained by realizing the purpose (protecting rights or promoting the public interest) on the one hand and, on the other, the social importance of avoiding the limitation on the constitutional right.\textsuperscript{38}

The comparison does not consider the overall importance of the purpose or the overall importance of the constitutional right being limited. Rather, the comparison is between the status of the purpose and the status of the right before and after the limiting law. The social importance of the law's marginal effect on attainment of the purpose is balanced against the social importance of avoiding the law's marginal limitation of the right. The comparison, then, is made in terms of marginal social benefit.\textsuperscript{39}

On occasion, the scope of the comparison is even narrower. That is so when the inquiry into necessity considers an alternative less restrictive of the constitutional right but unable to realize in full the purpose of the law. Because it cannot realize the purpose in full, the less restrictive alternative does not preclude a finding of necessity. Nevertheless, insofar as the alternative is proportional, it may strike the proper balance between the importance of the marginal benefit of realizing the purpose and the importance of the marginal benefit of avoiding limitation of the right.

The social importance of the marginal benefit in realizing the purpose depends on the nature of the purpose. Not all proper purposes are of equal social importance. When the purpose is protection of a constitutional right, the marginal social benefit depends on the importance of the protected right. When the purpose is protection of a public interest, the marginal social benefit depends on the importance of attaining the purpose. That importance— with respect both to the protection of constitutional rights and to the advancing of the public interest—will be a function of the social history of the state, its socio-political ideology, its political and governmental structure, and its commitment to democratic values. In dealing with these matters, it is necessary to see society and its normative structure as a whole.

In determining the social importance of the marginal benefit in realizing the purpose, we must take account—when the purpose is protection of human rights—the degree of protection these rights enjoyed before the law and the protection they will be afforded under the law. That is the case as well with social purposes related to promoting a public interest. In all of these, we should consider the likelihood that the purpose will be realized if the law is allowed to stand. That likelihood depends on the factual situation and on a prognosis regarding the possibility that the purpose will be realized.\textsuperscript{40}

The social importance of avoiding the limitation of the constitutional right depends on the social importance of the right. The key question here is whether all constitutional rights are of equal social importance. That is an issue on which there is no consensus. I believe that all constitutional rights are not equal with respect to their social importance. The importance of a constitutional right is determined on the basis of both external and internal considerations. (p. 746) External considerations include the society’s basic concepts, its social and cultural history, and its particular character. That sort of external background allows us, for example, to understand the great importance assigned in post-Nazi Germany and post-apartheid South Africa to the values of human dignity and equality. Internal considerations take account of the relationships among the various rights. In that sense, a right that serves as a precondition to the existence and operation of another right is regarded as the more important of the two. Hence the high social importance of the rights to life, dignity, equality, and political expression.

The social importance of avoiding the limitation of a right is influenced by the scope of the limitation and its extent. The severity of the limitation also bears on the social importance of avoiding it. A limitation on one right, accordingly, is not the same as a limitation on several; a limitation that approaches the core of a right is not the same as one that affects it only on its margins; a permanent limitation is not the same as a temporary one; and a limitation very likely to eventuate is not the same as one whose probability of realization is more remote.

(b) The Rule of Balancing

The balance between the marginal social benefit in realizing the purpose and the marginal social benefit in avoiding the limitation on the constitutional right can be expressed as follows:\textsuperscript{40a} as the importance of avoiding the marginal limitation on the constitutional right and the likelihood of the limitation coming to pass increase, so do the required importance of the marginal benefit to the public interest or the competing private right and the required likelihood of that benefit being realized. This approach is consistent with the substantive law balancing developed by Alexy, according to which\textsuperscript{41} ‘the greater the degree of non-satisfaction of, or detriment to one principle, the greater must be the importance of satisfying the other.’ Note, though, the difference between Alexy’s approach and mine. Alexy does not take account of the importance of the right being limited but only of the degree of limitation. My balancing rule, in contrast, considers not only degree but also the importance of the purpose and the importance of the constitutional right. It thereby gives voice to the society’s perspective on the marginal importance of the social purpose that the law means to advance—its substance and likelihood of realization—and on the marginal social importance of avoiding a limitation on a constitutional right that the society wants to protect.

What happens if the balance is even, and the marginal social importance of achieving the purpose equals the marginal importance of avoiding the limitation on the constitutional right? The solution flows from fundamental concepts of constitutional democracy, regarding which there are likely to be differing and even conflicting opinions. It seems to me that where one constitutional right is limited in order to protect another, there is no reason to impugn the constitutionality of the limiting legislation. Where, however, the constitutional right is limited in order to advance the public interest, the constitutional right should be afforded priority: in dubio pro libertate.

(c) Development of the Proportionality Stricto Sensu Element (Balancing)

The central element of proportionality is that of balancing, expressed in the rule of balancing. That rule exists at a very high level of abstraction. It does not relate to specific aspects of various rights; does not focus on the principles that underlie the various rights and (p. 747) justify their being protected or limited; and does not reflect the considerations characteristic of proper protection of constitutionality. Against that background, I propose recognition of an additional level of norms, intermediate between the (highly abstract) basic rule of balancing and its practical implementation in each case (i.e., concrete balancing). It could be termed ‘principle balancing’, and it would translate the basic rule of balancing into rules of balancing in principle that would be formulated at a level of abstraction below that of the basic rule but above that of concrete balancing. That level of abstraction would express the considerations of principle that underlie a constitutional right and the justifications for limiting it.

Consider, for example, a law that limits the freedom of political expression, a right of the highest importance. Assume that the purpose of the restriction is to protect the public order against political speech that incites violence. The principle balancing in the clash between freedom of political expression and protection of public order against violent, inciting speech may determine that a limitation on political expression is acceptable only if the purpose of protecting public order against this speech’s incitement to violence is deemed vital to achieving some pressing social need, such as avoiding widespread, immediate harm to the public order. Principle balancing is marked by its operation at a level of abstraction below that of balancing’s basic rule but higher than that of concrete balancing. It operates at a level of abstraction that expresses the reasons underlying the right and justifying either its impairment or its protection.

III. The Zone of Proportionality

1. Legislator and Judge

The rules of proportionality are directed toward all branches of government. They grant governmental authorities discretion; that is, the power to choose among a number of constitutional options. But that discretion is not absolute. All governmental authority is restrained by the rules of proportionality, and the same rules of proportionality apply to all governmental authorities. Within the context of those rules, however, each governmental authority has its own characteristic sort of discretion, determined in accord with its role within the framework of separation of powers.

Under the separation of powers, the role of the judicial branch is to ensure that the legislative branch deploys its legislative authority within the constitutional framework. The legislative branch is independent within its area of discretion as long as it acts within its powers. Separation of powers does not grant the legislator license to violate the constitution. In the event of a dispute over the scope of the legislative branch’s constitutional authority, there must exist a mechanism for deciding whether the legislative branch has exceeded its authority. The mechanism must be independent of the legislative branch. It should be in the hands of the judicial branch. What follows from this is recognition of the judiciary’s power to exercise judicial review of the constitutionality of a statute, either by declaration of incompatibility or by decision that the law is void. Judicial review is not intended to replace the legislative structure with one enacted by the judiciary. The court does not step into the legislator's shoes and does not ask itself what purpose it would want to serve through legislation. It examines the constitutionality of the statute, not its wisdom.
Proportionality (2)

(p. 748) There is a widespread view, especially within common law systems, that in deciding the constitutionality of a statute, the court must defer to the decision of the legislative branch.\(^{45}\) That deference would cause no problem if it meant only that the judicial branch was required to respect the legislative branch and consider its positions with seriousness, care, and restraint. Separation of powers itself requires no less. But deference includes something more; not satisfied merely with respect, it calls for submission.\(^{46}\) On that approach, the judge is required to accept the legal position of the legislative branch with regard to the elements of proportionality in circumstances where, but for the commitment to deference, it would not accept it.\(^{47}\) In my view there is no place for deference as I have defined it. I reason as follows: if the position taken by the legislative branch with regard to the elements of proportionality is sound even in the absence of deference, the judge is obligated to follow it regardless of deference. If, on the other hand, the position taken by the legislative branch is unsound in the absence of deference, the judge is obligated to reject it regardless of deference. Either way, deference plays no role.

2. The Zone of Proportionality and the Margin of Appreciation

The rules of proportionality leave the legislator an area of discretion encompassing such matters as the need for legislation, its purposes, the means adopted for attaining those purposes, and the limitations that might be imposed on constitutional rights. The legislator may set the relationship among those items as long as the rules of proportionality are satisfied; within the zone of proportionality, the legislator has freedom to maneuver. The boundaries of the zone of proportionality are what separate legislator from judge, consistent with the separation of powers. The zone of proportionality is the domain of the legislator. Maintaining the boundaries of that zone is the domain of the judge.

We must distinguish between the zone of proportionality and the margin of appreciation.\(^{48}\) The latter affords an area of discretion to national bodies, in contrast to the discretion of the international court; among other things, it recognizes that there is no international consensus regarding the relative social importance of public interests and individual rights. Accordingly, it is proper to take account of the importance assigned them in the state whose law is being challenged as disproportionately restricting a human right set in an international agreement. Against that background, one can see the difference between the zone of proportionality and the margin of appreciation. The former reflects the constitutionality of a limitation on a right from a national point of view, while the latter reflects the constitutionality from an international perspective. The zone of proportionality expresses the boundary dividing the national legislator's discretion from that of the national judge; it is derived from the principle of separation of powers. The margin of appreciation, in contrast, expresses the boundary that separates the discretion of the national body—whether legislative, executive, or judicial—from the discretion of the international judge. It is not tied to the principle of separation of powers. Accordingly, margin of appreciation should not be relevant in the context of national law or to relationships between legislator and judge in that context.\(^{49}\) In those contexts, only the zone of proportionality is applicable.

(p. 749) IV. Assessing Proportionality

1. The Importance of Proportionality

Since the Second World War, the idea of proportionality (with balance at its core) has developed and come to be increasingly recognized. The principal reason for its success\(^{49a}\) has been its insistence that governmental bodies justify every sub-constitutional limitation on a constitutional right. That justification is always subject to review, and the result of the requirement has been the emergence of a 'culture of justification'.\(^{50}\) Democracy is based on human rights, and the restriction of those rights cannot become routine. It requires continuing justification, grounded in public reason.\(^{51}\) The mindset associated with proportionality looks toward ongoing inquiry into whether there exists a pertinent justification for limiting a right, taking account of the circumstances of each case.

Proportionality is based on structured discretion, a process offering numerous advantages.\(^{52}\) It requires the agent exercising that discretion to think in an orderly manner, overlooking nothing that should be taken into account. It makes the process transparent, allowing its stages to be traced. That transparency enhances faith in the constitutionality of the decisions reached by governmental bodies and makes it possible to understand their bases.

Understanding, in turn, promotes respect, even on the part of one who does not agree with the result. Transparency is the basis for intelligent public discourse and for a dialogue between the legislative and judicial branches, precluding ulterior considerations and guaranteeing a high degree of objectivity. Moreover, structuring the exercise of discretion promotes consideration of the proper factors within the proper contexts. It ensures, for example, that considerations related to the public interest or to protection of a constitutional right are taken into account at the stage in which restriction of the right is justified and not at the stage when the scope of the right is being set.

2. Criticism of Proportionality and Responses to It

Proportionality is subject to persistent criticism, directed primarily at the element of proportionality stricto sensu, that is, balancing. The criticism can be divided into internal and external aspects, and I will attempt to respond to both. I hope my responses are adequately reassuring; in any case—and this is the basis for my entire response—the alternatives offered by the critics are no better. Their deficiencies exceed those of proportionality.

The internal criticism maintains that the common denominator required for genuine balancing does not exist; the sides of the balance are incommensurable. In the absence of commensurability, the balancing is not rational; it is intuitive, improvised, subjective, and imprecise. Its use of the balancing metaphor conveys a false sense of being scientific.

My response to the internal criticism is that a common denominator allowing for rational balancing exists; it is the social importance of realizing one principle and avoiding limitation of another principle. The question posed is whether the marginal social benefit of the first principle suffices to justify the marginal limitation of the second. This contextual posing of the balancing affords it a common, rational basis. True, the balancing is not syllogistic and sometimes affords the balancer (be it legislator, executive, or judge) discretion, but the presence of discretion does not mean the balancing lacks rationality.

The external criticism takes several forms. It is urged, first, that the element of balancing affords the judge excessive discretion, thereby impairing both legal certainty and protection of human rights. It is argued as well that balancing is the role of the legislator. A judge who engages in balancing is acting without constitutional legitimacy, for he is trespassing on the legislator's turf, contravening the separation of powers, and behaving undemocratically. Moreover, it is claimed, the judge lacks the tools needed to conduct proper balancing. The characteristics of the judicial process make the judicial perspective too narrow, and the judge has only limited ability to deal with empirical data. Finally, judicial insight leads to a narrowing of the scope of discretion, to the point that proportionality will fail to include the element of balancing.

Certainly, the balancing component affords the judge discretion. But by what standard can that discretion be said to be too broad? If the standard is that of the alternatives to proportionality, they, too, afford the judge discretion, and it has not been shown that the discretion associated with proportionality is broader. Is the discretion of the German Federal Constitutional Court broader than that of the US Supreme Court? How could such an assertion be proven? But even if the discretion associated with proportionality is broader, what harm is there in that? It has not been shown, for example, that legal systems in which proportionality and its associated balancing are accepted manifest less legal certainty than do other systems. And if there is a flaw in the scope of discretion afforded the judge under proportionality, is that flaw outweighed by the associated benefit? The critics of the balancing element of proportionality have not responded adequately to those questions.

With respect to protecting human rights, two points should be made. First, there is no reason to assume a priori that judges will afford less protection to human rights under a system of proportionality (centered on balancing) than under its alternatives. Proportionality is a framework that needs to be filled with content, and it allows for varied degrees of protection. Secondly, no proof has been offered that, as a practical matter, protection of human rights is any less under legal systems applying proportionality and balancing than under other legal systems. Moreover, it is hard to see how such a claim could be proven. The picture tends to be complicated enough to preclude an unambiguous answer. A precise answer would require examination of each and every right, at both the theoretical and the practical levels.
The formal answer to the asserted illegitimacy of judicial balancing is that the authority to conduct judicial review in general, and the judge's authority to balance competing principles (in the context of ruling on the limitation of a right) in particular, are grounded (expressly or impliedly) in the constitution itself. Just as the constitution affords legislative authority to the legislator, it affords to the judge the authority to determine that a statute is not proportional.

The substantive response to the charge of being undemocratic is that judicial balancing in fact safeguards democracy and separation of powers, protecting the constitution and ensuring that any limitation of rights is proportional. That safeguarding is the role of the judiciary under the separation of powers. Of course, the legislator also strikes a balance between the rights of the individual and the public interest. But under the separation of powers, the final decision on the constitutionality of the balance struck by the legislator is vested in the judiciary. Just as separation of powers as applied in administrative law grants the judicial branch and not the executive final say with regard to balancing in the context of proportionality, so does the principle as applied in constitutional law grant the judicial branch and not the legislative final say with regard to balancing in the context of proportionality. Vesting the court with final say over balancing ensures the constitutional protection of human rights and realizes substantive democracy, based on a delicate balance between majority rule and individual rights.

The institutional structure of the court, its independence, and its remove from political pressures make judicial balancing closer than any other to the balancing required by the constitution. What really underlies the criticism of proportionality and balancing is nothing more than the general argument made against judicial review of a law's constitutionality—an issue beyond the scope of this chapter.

It is argued that the court lacks the tools needed to conduct the balancing required by proportionality, I believe that this argument is insufficiently supported. The structure of the system allows the court to assess the facts presented to it and examine whether they have been deployed in a proportional manner. That is what a judge does when he decides, in a tort case, whether a physician, a pilot, or an engineer acted negligently, and he can do the same thing in a constitutional law context, deciding whether the balancing has been done in a way that satisfies the requirement of proportionality. But note: the goal of the inquiry is not to enable the judge to put in place a new legislative structure that will be constitutional; it is to determine the constitutionality of the structure put in place by the legislator. The purpose of the court's examination is not to set national priorities; it is to decide whether the legislation enacted in accord with the priorities set by the legislator is proportional.

As for judicial insight, I note only that judicial insight cannot replace constitutional obligation. The court is not out to protect its power and its authority; it means to protect democracy and the constitution. If the constitution intends to preclude the court from implementing proportionality in general and balancing in particular, it should say so explicitly.

(p. 752) 3. Alternatives to Proportionality

(a) Proportionality Determined by the Legislator

Proportionality is a device used to resolve clashes among constitutional rights and between constitutional rights and the public interest. But it is not the only device available for that purpose; others exist as well. Central to them is the alternative that might be termed categorization, commonly used in the United States. Other alternatives include that proposed by Webber, who suggests that the scope of constitutional rights is set by interpretation and construction by the legislature. The limitations are themselves part of the constitutional right, neither impairing nor negating it; rather, they fix its substance in accordance with the society's understanding at any given time. These understandings are expressed through the legislator's ordinary legislative process, which expresses the popular will. The legislator acts subject to the direction of the limitation clause, which requires the legislator to give voice to the right's underlying justification within a free and democratic society. It is the legislator that determines the limits of the right itself. Once those limits are set, the right is absolute. Proportionality and the balance at its core play no role and do not constrain the legislator. The judicial role is limited to considering whether the legislator's exercise of discretion was arbitrary.

Underlying Webber's negative approach to proportionality and balance is his concept of constitutional rights, a concept that strikes me as erroneous. The conventional, and proper, approach regards constitutional rights as meant to protect the individual against the majority, whose will is expressed through the legislator. On Webber's approach, in contrast, it is the majority, again expressing itself through the legislator, that determines the scope of constitutional rights. The limitations on legislative power, according to Webber, are narrow. It seems to me that Webber’s understanding allows no room for a constitutional bill of rights; no room for limitations on legislative power with respect to human rights; no room for substantive judicial review of a statute that impairs constitutional rights; and certainly no room for proportionality and balancing as ways to limit that impairment. Webber’s approach, then, is not simply an alternative to proportionality; it is an alternative to the conventional idea of constitutional rights. By treating the constitution as an ongoing process of negotiation within society, resolved by the legislator, he effectively divests the constitutional bill of rights of its power to protect the individual against the majority. What is presented as a constitutional right is really nothing more than a right at the sub-constitutional level. Interpreting the right and setting its limits from time to time are entirely the province of the legislator.

(b) US Categorization

The accepted approach in US constitutional law distinguishes substantively but not exclusively among three categories of constitutional right, each subject to a different level of constitutional scrutiny. What the three categories have in common is a lack of concrete balancing between the benefit of realizing the goal and the impairment of the constitutional right. True, each category is based on a definitional or principled balancing that determines the scope of the right. But once such balancing is done, no further concrete (ad hoc) balancing is applied. The scope of this chapter does not allow for a full examination of the US system, including the way in which it determines the scope of the various rights and the limitations it imposes on each. US jurisprudence is extremely rich, marked by a range of different and even opposing perspectives on how the scope of a right is determined, how the limitations on it are set, and how the two processes interact. I will therefore confine myself to analyzing the three levels of scrutiny that are accepted in US constitutional law, without claiming thereby to have surveyed the US system in its full complexity.

First is the category of rights that US constitutional law terms ‘fundamental rights’. These include freedom of expression and assembly, freedom of religion, freedom of movement within the country, and the right to vote. Also within this category is the right to equality, that is, to be free of suspect forms of discrimination based on residence, race, or certain other categories. A law restricting any of the rights in this category will be subjected to strict scrutiny, extending both to the purposes of the statute and to the means selected for attaining them. With respect to purpose, a statute limiting a right in this category will be held unconstitutional unless it is meant to serve a compelling state interest or is a matter of pressing public necessity or substantial state interest. The means selected must be necessary and narrowly tailored to attaining the purpose. This idea entails two corollaries: that there not be some other means that would be less restrictive of the right and that the means not be over-inclusive or under-inclusive.

The second category includes equality, when the distinctions that are applied are ‘quasi-suspect’, such as those related to gender or age, among other things. It also includes restrictions on commercial expression and on expression in a public forum. Legislative action in this category will pass constitutional muster only if its purpose is to serve an important governmental objective. The means selected to carry out the purpose will be constitutional if there is a substantial relation between them and the purpose (intermediate scrutiny).

The third category encompasses all other constitutional rights. It includes the avoidance of discrimination on the basis of categories that are neither suspect (residence, race) nor quasi-suspect (gender, age), as well as other rights such as freedom of movement outside the United States. Restrictions on rights in this category are constitutional if they serve a legitimate governmental purpose; further inquiry into the importance of that purpose is not required. The means for attaining the purpose will be constitutional if they have a rational basis. In assessing rational basis, account is taken of consequences and of possible alternatives (minimal scrutiny).

It appears that US law’s intermediate and minimal levels of scrutiny allow for broader limitations on the rights to which they pertain than would proportionality. Comparing the effects of strict scrutiny and proportionality is more difficult, however. The difficulty is twofold: a theoretical difficulty flowing from US law’s lack of clarity regarding the terms of strict scrutiny, and a practical one related to comparing the effects of the differing requirements in practice.

When it comes to proper purpose, the requirements imposed by strict scrutiny appear more stringent than those required by most legal systems that make use of proportionality. The principal difficulty is centered on the US requirement that the means be ‘narrowly tailored’ to attaining the purpose, requiring, among other things, the avoidance of over-breadth. But what is the result if the excess breadth is inherent, incapable of being severed, and the statutory purposes cannot be attained without means that entail over-breadth? The answer in US jurisprudence is not without uncertainty. If US law holds that inseverable over-breadth means the statute is not narrowly tailored to its purpose, it affords greater protection to rights invoking strict scrutiny than they would enjoy under proportionality. If, however, US law treats an inseverably over-broad statute as narrowly tailored and hence constitutional, it would afford less protection to rights in this category than they enjoy under proportionality. It is also possible that in a case of inseverable over-breadth, US law might adopt concrete balancing. In that event, the gap between the systems would be narrowed.

Up to this point, we have compared strict scrutiny to proportionality on a theoretical level only and have not considered the practical aspect. The conventional view in the United States is that most restrictions on constitutional rights that invoke strict scrutiny are unconstitutional. Gunther’s observation in this regard is well known: strict scrutiny is ‘strict in theory and fatal in fact’. That is not the case under proportionality.

Proportionality is not beyond criticism, but categorization is not the answer. Every system has its pros and cons, and every system has developed against the background of the history and problems of the society in which it operates. It is fair to assume that the two systems will converge in the future, and US law is already showing the first signs of adopting proportionality. We cannot yet assess the outcome, and it is entirely possible that categorization will displace proportionality. Proportionality and categorization are both part of the jurisprudential architecture, each reflecting the society in which it is rooted and each influenced by events beyond the borders of that society. It is difficult to identify the vectors of development and influence.

Bibliography

Aharon Barak, Proportionality: Constitutional Rights and Their Limitation (2012)

Miguel Carbonell, El Principio de Proporcionalidad y Protección de Los Derechos Fundamentals (2008)

Moshe Cohen-Eliya and Iddo Porat, ‘Proportionality and the Culture of Justification’ (2011) 59 American Journal of Comparative Law 463

Proportionality (2)

Lorraine Weinrib, ‘The Supreme Court of Canada and Section One of the Charter’ (1988) 10 Supreme Court Law Review 469

Notes:

(*) Translated from the Hebrew by Joel Linsider.
(13a) See Barak (n 8), 118.

(14a) See Barak (n 8), 211.

(26a) See Barak (n 8), 245.

(40a) See Barak (n 8), 345.

(49a) See Barak (n 8), 457.

(60a) See Barak (n 8), 482.

(71a) See Barak (n 8), 515.

(71b) See Barak (n 8), 517.

(1) See Aileen Kavanagh, Constitutional Review under the UK Human Rights Act (2009).

(4) eg the right not to be tortured: see the United Nations Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment; under the German Basic Law human dignity is an absolute right: Art 1(1).

(5) See the German Basic Law, Art 19(2); Polish Constitution, Art 31(3).

(7) On constitutional interpretation, see Chapter 32 of this volume.

(9) See Alexy (n 6); Eva Brems (ed), Conflicts Between Fundamental Rights (2008).

(10) See Van der Schyff (n 3).

(11) Canadian Charter of Human Rights, s 1; South African Constitution, s 36; Universal Declaration of Human Rights, Art 29.

(14) See Alexy (n 6), 192.

(15) See Swiss Federal Constitution, Art 36(3); Turkish Constitution, Art 13.

(16) See Alexy (n 6), 47.

(20) See Kavanagh (n 1), 243; Barak (n 8), 371.

(22) See Wojciech Sadurski, ‘“Reasonableness” and Value Pluralism in Law and Politics’ in Giorgio Bongiovanni, Giovanni Sartor, and Chiara Valentini (eds), Reasonableness and Law (2009), 129.

(23) See Associated Provincial Picture Houses v Wednesbury Corporation [1948] 1 KB 223.

(24) See R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Daly [2001] 3 All ER 433.

(31) See Pulido (n 30), 737; Emiliou (n 30), 30; Barak (n 8), 317.

(34) See HCJ 7052/03 Adalah—A Legal Center for the Rights of the Arab Minority v Minister of Interior [2006] (1) IsrLR 442, para 88 (Barak P).

(35) See Grimm (n 28), 396; Barak (n 8), 340.

(39) See Grimm (n 28), 396.

(41) See Alexy (n 6), 102; Pulido (n 30), 767.

(42) See Alexy (n 6), 411; Carlos Bernal Pulido, ‘On Alexy’s Weight Formula’ in Agustín José Menéndez and Erik Oddvar Eriksen (eds), Arguing Fundamental Rights (2006), 104.

(43) See Cohen-Eliya and Stopler (n 36); Barak (n 8), 340.

(44) See Rivers (n 40), 108.

(45) On deference, see Barak (n 8), 379.

(48) See Yutaka Arai-Takahashi, The Margin of Appreciation Doctrine and the Principle or Proportionality in the Jurisprudence of the ECHR (2002), 2; Barak (n 8), 415.

(49) See Rivers (n 32), 175.

(53) See Sadurski (n 22), 139.

(55) See Beatty (n 52).

(60) See Robert Alexy, ‘Constitutional Rights, Balancing, and Rationality’ (2003) 16 Ratio Juris 131; Alexy (n 6), 101; Frederick Schauer, ‘Balancing, Subsumption and the Constraining Role of Legal Text’ in Matthias Klatt (ed), Rights, Law, and Morality: Themes from the Legal Philosophy of Robert Alexy (2009); Barak (n 8), 487.

Proportionality (2)

(62) See Kumm (n 51).

(63) See Porat (n 56).

(64) See Webber (n 56), 1087, 1088.

(70) See Chemerinsky (n 68), 540.

(71) Ibid.

(72) See Fallon (n 69), 1330; Stone Sweet and Mathews (n 64a).

(74) See Vicki C. Jackson, Constitutional Engagement in a Transnational Era (2010).

Aharon Barak
Aharon Barak is Professor of Law, Radzyner School of Law, Interdisciplinary Center (IDC), Herzliya, Israel
'Constitutional identity' is an essentially contested concept as there is no agreement over what it means or refers to. Conceptions of constitutional identity range from focus on the actual features and provisions of a constitution — for example, does it establish a presidential or parliamentary system, a unitary or federal state — to the relation between the constitution and the culture in which it operates, and to the relation between the identity of the constitution and other relevant identities, such as national, religious, or ideological identity. This article discusses the place and function of constitutional identity; the identity of constitutional models; identity and constitution-making; identity through constitutional interpretation; and the problem of identity in supranational constitutions.

Keywords: constitutional identity, constitutional models, constitution-making, constitutional interpretation, supranational constitutions
Constitutional Identity

The roots of constitutional identity go back to Aristotle who insisted that the identity of a state did not depend on its physical characteristics, but on its constitution. Placed in their contemporary setting, conceptions of constitutional identity range from focus (p. 757) on the actual features and provisions of a constitution—for example, does it establish a presidential or parliamentary system, a unitary or federal state—to the relation between the constitution and the culture in which it operates, and to the relation between the identity of the constitution and other relevant identities, such as national, religious, or ideological identity. To the extent that the ideal of constitutionalism requires constitutions to provide a definition and limitation of the powers of government, commitment to adherence to the rule of law and protection of fundamental rights, all constitutions that comply with those prescriptions can be said to share a common identity. That identity, however, cannot account for the fact that similar provisions found in a number of constitutions can lead to widely divergent interpretations and applications.

Three distinct general meanings of constitutional identity emerge. First, there is an identity that derives from the fact of having a constitution—polities with a constitution differ from those that do not; secondly, the content of a constitution provides distinct elements of identity—a federal constitution sets up a different kind of polity than one establishing a centralized unitary state; and thirdly, the context in which a constitution operates seems bound to play a significant role in the shaping of its identity—different cultures envision fundamental rights in contrasting and even sometimes contradictory ways.

Constitutional identity like national identity can be conceived as belonging to a collective self. Self-identity, moreover, can either connote sameness or selfhood. I can recognize myself either because I look the same as I did yesterday or because in spite of all the changes which I have experienced since childhood—I no longer look the same, think the same, feel the same, etc—I have endured as a single self that is distinct from all other selves. Or, in other words, I have remained myself as against all others. Analogously, constitutional identity can be constructed on the basis of sameness or of selfhood, or more precisely, based on dynamic interaction between projections of sameness and images of selfhood. Moreover, the interaction in question may at times evoke complementarity and at other times contradiction.

For example, for more than two hundred years, the text of the US Constitution has remained the same, except for the addition of 27 amendments. Interpretations of provisions contained within the original 1787 text have, however, evolved through the years. To the extent that these interpretations can be cast in organic terms as part of a process of adaptation and growth, they can be understood as constructing and preserving identity in the sense of selfhood. Furthermore, the combination of interpretive selfhood and textual sameness can be viewed as complementary for purposes of elaborating a distinct constitutional identity. Or, conversely, inasmuch as constitutional interpretations depart from textualism or valorize certain plausible meanings of the text at the expense of others, textual sameness may stand in contrast to, and seemingly contradict, the evolving sense of selfhood fashioned by shifting trends in constitutional interpretation.

This contrast regarding the relationship between sameness and selfhood can be illustrated by reference to the US Constitution’s Commerce Clause. That clause grants the national government the power to regulate commerce ‘among the several states’, and has been pivotal in the evolution of American federalism over the past two centuries. Indeed, the relative powers of the federal government vis-à-vis those of the states has fluctuated over the years, and has to a large extent depended on judicial line-drawing between interstate and intrastate commerce. In the early nineteenth century, interstate commerce was limited to trade, bartering, and commercial navigation across state boundaries. By the 1940s, in contrast, the cultivation of a small amount of wheat by an individual on his own farm was held to be subject to federal regulation on the ground that the cumulative effect of like activities by all those similarly situated in the several states would have a substantial effect on the national market for wheat. Both the relevant constitutional text and the categorical distinction between interstate and intrastate commerce remained the same between the early nineteenth and the mid-twentieth century. The scope of the federal power, however, changed dramatically during that period, from limited and confined during the early nineteenth century to nearly all-pervasive by the middle of the twentieth. Concurrently, the United States had been transformed from an essentially agrarian economy to the most powerful industrialized economy in the world.

Modern constitutional identity is distinguished from national identity—one can easily conceive of the French or German nation without reference to a constitution—but both originate in the late eighteenth century and both are identities constructed and projected by what Benedict Anderson has labeled ‘imagined communities’. As
Constitutional Identity

Anderson emphasizes, unlike the family or the tribe which form concrete groupings, the nation links together strangers who are bound together into an imagined community that came to replace 'the divinely ordained, hierarchical dynastic realm' whose legitimacy was undermined by the Enlightenment and the French Revolution. Modern constitutionalism and the constitutional identity associated with it are also products of the Enlightenment. They were launched by the eighteenth-century American and French Revolutions and by the respective constitutions to which these gave rise. The two imagined communities, the national and the constitutional, differ though they may overlap and though they may comprise the same exact membership or closely intertwined ones. As will be elaborated below, constitutional identity is constructed in part against national identity and in part consistent with it. More generally, constitutional identity must constantly remain in dynamic tension with other relevant identities.

Inasmuch as constitutional identity transcends the mere fact of constitutionalism or content of a particular constitution, it emerges in the context of a dynamic process that must constantly weave together self-identity’s two facets, sameness and selfhood. There are several different conceptions on how the dynamic in question yields a distinct constitutional identity. Robert Post, for example, asserts that ‘constitutional law and culture are locked in a dialectical relationship, so that constitutional law both arises from and in turn regulates culture.’ According to Gary Jacobsohn, in contrast, constitutional disharmony drives the dynamic in question, and the process is dialogical rather than dialectical. In Jacobsohn’s own words,

...[T]his identity exists neither as a discrete object of invention nor as a heavily encrusted essence embedded in a society's culture, (p. 759) requiring only to be discovered. Rather identity emerges dialogically and represents a mix of political aspirations and commitments that are expressive of a nation's past, as well as the determination of those within the society who seek ... to transcend that past.

For Michel Troper, constitutional identity results from a process of extraction of certain principles which can be posited as essential and as such distinguishable from other constitutional norms and which can be relied upon to protect the integrity of the constitution in cases in which it confronts threats that might erode its vital bond to the people or nation which it is meant to serve. A similar process for discovering (at least a partial) constitutional identity emerges from the European Court of Justice’s (ECJ) endeavor to extract meaning from ‘the common constitutional traditions’ of the European Union (EU) member states for purposes filling a perceived constitutional gap at the supranational level of the EU.

Conceiving of constitutional identity as belonging to an imagined community that must carve out a distinct self-image, I have argued that constitutional identity first emerges as a lack that must be overcome through a discursive process that relies on three principal tools: negation, metaphor, and metonymy. Thus, for example, the French and the American Revolutions overthrew working orders based on cohesive narratives and distinct self-images. The two revolutions that led respectively to the 1787 US Constitution and to the various constitutions elaborated in the course of the French Revolution yielded constitution-making that has been characterized as being akin to creation ex nihilo. Consistent with this, the ancien régime and its self-image must be shattered, hence creating a need for unleashing a process of negation. But negation alone only leads to a lack, and the new constitutional polity needs to build a frame of reference and a narrative that will allow it to perceive itself as a constituted imagined community. Negation must therefore be supplemented by tools that will facilitate construction of a distinct positive self-image. These tools are metaphor which consolidates relations of identity and metonymy which lays out relations of difference and paths of contiguity. Because a self-image cannot be built up in a vacuum, negation, metaphor, and metonymy must combine to reprocess pre-constitutional materials and extra-constitutional ones into a serviceable, flexible, and adaptable constitutional identity. Moreover, that identity must cohere both at the level of the constitution as a whole and of particular constitutional provisions and most notably those most likely to provoke contestation. Typical of the latter are rights to equality, including gender-based equality. Assuming that men and women are identical for some purposes and different for others in relation to constitutional equality, metaphorical reasoning seems best suited to buttress the former—for example, men and women are to be portrayed as identical for purposes of equality in employment—and metonymical reasoning most apt to lend support to the latter—for example, differences between the sexes relating to reproduction justify constitutionalization of abortion rights to give a woman the same control over her body as a man has over his.
Constitutional Identity

II. The Place and Function of Constitutional Identity

Constitutional identity necessarily has a place and function within the ambit of a constitution and of the ideal of constitutionalism. Moreover, depending on the particular constitutional identity involved, it may advance or hinder the relevant constitutional project to which it happens to be linked. For example, in a religiously pluralistic polity, a constitutional identity that promotes the majority religion and its values as against those of minority religions could well stand in the way of affording adequate constitutional protection to the latter. Conversely, within the context of the same polity, a constitutional identity that would counter rather than promote society’s tendency to favor the majority religion might best serve the constitutional objective of affording the best possible protection to all religions.22

What place and function constitutional identity has or ought to have depends to an important extent on one’s conception of such identity. Thus, for Troper who conceives of constitutional identity as being located within the constitution, its place is at the level of constitutional principles and its function is to make possible a cogent determination of what is and what is not essential in an EU member state constitution for purposes of distinguishing between permissible and impermissible delegation of state sovereign powers to supranational entities such as the EU.23 For the ECJ as mentioned above, on the other hand, the relevant (partial) constitutional identity is located among constitutions,24 and its function is to harmonize the EU as a supranational polity without an explicit constitution with what is common to the constitutions of its member states for purposes of acquiring a requisite minimum of constitutional legitimacy.25

Whereas Troper and the ECJ, in the context evoked above, ascribe a limited place and function to constitutional identity, Jacobsohn and I reserve a much more extensive place for it and envision its function in systemic terms. For both Jacobsohn and me, constitutional identity furnishes essential links between the constitution, its environment, and those who launched it as well as those for whom it was intended. Jacobsohn’s focus, however, seems narrower than mine.

For Jacobsohn, the essential function of constitutional identity is to deal with constitutional disharmony.26 Such disharmony, moreover, can arise within the text of the constitution or in the context of historical change or political contestation.27 Constitutional disharmony creates a need for adaptation and coping with conflict and dissonance, and constitutional identity must be shaped dialogically with a view to overcoming the causes of such disharmony.28 The range of adaptation and the precise nature and elasticity of the constitutional identity in play under a particular set of circumstances depend on the actual prescriptions found in the relevant constitutional text and on the prevailing historical and socio-political conditions within the polity involved. Jacobsohn distinguishes between militant constitutions and acquiescent constitutions.29 The former are characterized by a profound gap between the founding ideals and the entrenched reality making for a wide range of disharmony; the latter, by a tendency toward preservation of societal values rather than toward transformation, thus providing for a narrower range of disharmony.

As I conceive it in its broadest terms, the place and function of constitutional identity is determined by the need for dialectical mediation of existing, evolving, and projected conflicts and tensions between identity and difference—or, more precisely, identities and differences—that shape the dealings between self and other within the relevant polity committed to constitutional rule and favorably disposed toward the aims of constitutionalism. At its most abstract, constitutional identity figures in relation to the threshold decision of whether to pursue constitutionalism or to reject it altogether as would be the case in the context of a pure theocracy.31 Once one opts in within the ambit of constitutionalism, constitutional identity must be molded to guide answers to three principal questions: To whom shall the constitution be addressed? What should the constitution provide? And, how may the constitution be justified?

‘To whom’ depends both on the constitution’s proponents or makers and on those who are addressed, and expected to become bound, by the constitution in question. The 1787 US Constitution was made in the name of ‘We the People’, yet African-American slaves were excluded. Moreover, to the extent that the US population is made up today principally of the descendants of waves of immigration spreading over two centuries, how can today’s ‘We the People’ identify with its 1787 counterpart and accept the latter’s constitution as its own? Much more recently, the 1982 Canadian Constitution was intended for all Canadians, yet it was rejected by Quebec.32 In short, constitutional identity should be channeled into a cogent narrative that will guide the determination under a particular set of circumstances of whether a multi-ethnic or mono-ethnic or a national or multinational constitution would best bind together the diverse groups and/or ideologies or interests within a polity into a sufficiently unified and cohesive constitutional self.

‘What’ should be included in the constitution also depends on a narrative based on a constitutional identity apt to unify the various competing selves and others within a polity into a single polity-wide constitutional self. For example, a multi-ethnic, multi-religious polity such as India may cohere into a single constitutional self in spite of profound differences and divisions provided, inter alia, a suitable federal structure is erected. Thus, each principal contending group could be granted its own federated entity upon assenting to cooperation on those matters entrusted to the federal government. In this context, neither the federation nor the federated entities, but their particular interrelation would furnish the locus of identity for the operative constitutional self. Moreover, the role of constitutional identity in shaping consti (p. 762) tutional content extends from broad structural provisions to design of the rule of law to designation of the specific rights meant to count as fundamental and to specific interpretations of the latter.

Finally, concerning ‘how’ constitutions may be justified to a diverse and pluralistic constituency, constitutional identity figures at various levels of abstraction ranging from the highly theoretical to the fairly concrete ones relying on actual history or living traditions. The relevant justifications that must become integrated in an appropriate constitutional narrative are of three principal kinds: those based on a common history or traditions; those based on a hypothetical or actual consent; and those emanating from normative precepts deemed to be universally valid or indisputably valid for those meant to be subjected to the constitutional regime sought to be justified. Often these justifications or some of them may be combined. Thus, originalism, which enjoys a significant following in the United States, combines a narrative on tradition with one on consent (based on the ratification of the 1787 Constitution in state ratifying conventions).

To fully grasp the place and role of constitutional identity, one must realize that constitutions rest on a paradox as they must at once be alienated from, and congruent with, the very identities that make them workable and coherent. Thus, the ‘we’ that gives itself a constitution must commit to renounce part of its pre-constitutional self, must agree to certain levels of self-constraint and self-restraint to guard against some of its potentially constitutionally undermining tendencies—for example, an ethnically divided polity may only thrive as a constitutional unit by downplaying ethnicity in its constitutional and everyday politics. At the same time, however, a constitution should not veer too far off its constituent groups’ identities for that would impair its viability and undermine its implementation—for example, a minority group that feels excluded from, and unjustly treated by, the constitution may become completely alienated from the polity’s overall self and give in to separatist inclinations. Consistent with this, constitutional identity must operate constantly and at all levels ranging from that of the polity and the constitution as a whole to that of the interpretation of a single constitutional provision. Moreover, such constitutional identity must at once differentiate itself from all other relevant pre- and extra-constitutional identities while preserving or reincorporating enough of the latter to secure a minimum of acceptance among all those who are meant to come under its sweep.

III. The Identity of Constitutional Models

Constitutional identity leaves a distinct imprint on every constitution and its broad contours allow for delimitation of diverse constitutional models that emerge as useful prototypes. One can distinguish at this writing seven distinct constitutional models. These are: the German, the French, the American, the British, the Spanish, the European, and the post-colonial models. These models are constructed with reference to actual historical experiences. The first five refer to their country of origin. The sixth model, the European one, in contrast, refers to its transnational historical setting, the EU, and differs from the five preceding ones in that the (p. 763) actual constitutional experience to which it is linked is one that has arguably not yet borne fruit. Finally, the seventh model, the post-colonial one, refers not to a single actual historical experience, but to a number of them that may differ significantly from one another but that nonetheless can be subsumed under the same overall model.

1. The German Constitutional Model

The central defining feature of the German constitutional model is the ethnos which stands in sharp contrast to the demos, its counterpart in the context of the French model. In essence, the German model is built upon the concept of self-governance by and for a single homogenous ethnic group. Based on its reliance on ethnos, the German model imagines the existence of indissoluble pre-political bonds cemented through a common language, culture, ethnicity, religion etc., which enjoy absolute primacy. Consistent with this, the ethnic-based nation is conceived as indivisible, homogenous, and fully formed prior to the adoption of any constitution or to the advent of the state. In the German model, therefore, the state figures as a mere vehicle at the disposal of an already well-defined nation rather than as an indispensable instrument for nation-building purposes.

2. The French Constitutional Model

In contrast to the German model, in the French model, the nation is built upon the demos with the ethnos receding to the point of becoming almost invisible. Like the German model, the French conceives the constitutional polity on the scale of the nation-state. But whereas the German model is difficult to imagine beyond the confines of the nation-state, given its inextricable grounding on ethnos, the French model's ties to the nation-state appear to be historically contingent. Indeed, the French model is grounded on democratic self-government for a polity of equal citizens bound together by a social contract. Consistent with this model, each citizen regardless of her ethnic origin, enjoys rights conceived as universal. The French model is thoroughly individualistic and leaves no room at the constitutional level for recognition or deployment of group or national identity. The French revolutionary Abbé Sieyès envisioned the nation as 'a body of associates living under common laws and represented by the same legislative assembly'. Within this conception, the constitution is meant to enshrine a democratic nation united through equal citizenship with a political framework suited to give an effective voice to the people as a whole.

3. The American Constitutional Model

The American constitutional model is closer to the French than to the German. But whereas the French model requires an existing nation, the American model does not. Indeed, the 'We the People' that stood behind the 1787 US Constitution were but an embryonic prefiguration of the United States which was to be assembled gradually through multiple waves of immigration. For these highly diverse successive waves of immigrants to be able to cohere into 'E Pluribus Unum', the motto inscribed on the Great Seal of the United States, it would be first necessary for them to become immersed in a 'melting pot' fueled by the norms and values (p. 764) enshrined in the US Constitution. Consistent with this, in the American model, the constitution frames and provides a launching pad to the state and it precedes and anticipates the nation. Accordingly, what is crucial and constitutes a key feature of the American constitutional model is the pivotal role that the Constitution and constitutional identity have had in transforming over time a diverse multi-ethnic and multicultural population into a veritable people and into a unified distinct nation that coheres into a dynamic polity.

4. The British Constitutional Model

One may think that Britain does not have a constitution for although it has had laws that are constitutional in nature going as far back as the Magna Carta, these have not been gathered into a single written document. From a functional standpoint, however, Britain does have a full-fledged constitutional system. Though formally unrestrained, pragmatically the British Parliament exercises significant self-restraint. Britain also has a long tradition of adherence to the rule of law and its governmental institutions have consistently afforded substantial protection to fundamental rights, even if these are not guaranteed by a higher law. The British constitutional model is one of immanent constitutionalism that emerges gradually by means of a process of accretion. This gradualism and organic growth is due to many factors peculiar to Britain and to its history. These include the existence of some form of representative government since the end of the thirteenth century, no conquest or domination by a foreign power since 1066, and a cautious common-sense-oriented pragmatism that primes adaptation and abhors radical change and rupture. It is peculiarly British that institutions that were traditionally incompatible with constitutionalism or democracy such as the monarchy or the hierarchical and hereditary House of Lords, were gradually adapted to serve the institutional and political needs of a contemporary constitutional democracy. What ultimately sets apart US constitutionalism from the British model is that in the United States the constitution made in 1787 transcends the legal order in which it is deployed whereas under the British model the constitution remains immanent within the corresponding order.
5. The Spanish Constitutional Model

The Spanish model is distinct in two principal ways. First, it sets a framework for a multi-ethnic polity. And, secondly, it imports transnational norms, which it incorporates within the ambit of the nation-state. One of the most daunting challenges confronting the making of the 1978 Spanish Constitution was finding a proper balance between national unity and according a meaningful measure of autonomy to ethnic communities, such as the Basques and the Catalans, who had been suppressed ruthlessly during the Franco regime. The Spanish constitutents found an ingenious solution that sought to bridge over contentious disputes over national identity—or more precisely, between national and subnational identities—through masterful use of open-endness and ambiguity. The Spanish Constitution provides for ‘autonomous communities’ (‘comunidades autónomas’) with significant, though by no means fully spelled out, regional self-government powers.\(^4\) Although both Spain and the United States are multi-ethnic societies, the Spanish constitutional model is multi-ethnic whereas the American one is not. That is because through constitutional accommodation of subnational ethnic groups, the Spanish model is suitable for a multi-ethnic polity. In contrast, the US Constitution (p. 765) and the American model are compatible with a multi-ethnic society, but not with a multi-ethnic polity. The second important respect in which the Spanish model differs from the previously examined ones is in its incorporation of transnational (then European Community now) EU norms as part of its recasting the relationship between the Spanish nation and the Spanish state. With a view to its incorporation into the larger European polity, Spain imported and internalized European democratic values. These values though originally ‘external’ thus became ‘internalized’.

6. The European Transnational Constitutional Model

As mentioned above, the attempt to endow the EU with a formal constitution ended in failure.\(^4\) Nevertheless the EU experience is instructive for purposes of exploration of a transnational constitutional model tailored to constitutionalism in the EU. The main difference between the models fitted to the nation-state concerns the relative importance that each gives to particular elements, such as demos or ethnos, and how each model combines or approaches the elements common to all. In contrast, the EU appears to lack a sufficient common ethnos or identity and its institutions may well hinder the development of a workable demos. The lack of a common ethnos is not by itself deterministic as attested by the success of various constitutions that come within the ambit of the Spanish model. However, none of the working multi-ethnic constitutions on the scale of the nation-state involve as extended an area or anything approaching the number of languages or cultures as those found within the confines of the EU. Moreover, though not comparable to its equivalents in nation-states, the EU does share several characteristics that may converge toward a common identity.\(^4\) With that in mind, and postponing exploration of further details till Section VI below, it is possible to imagine a transnational EU model. That model, like the American, would be future-oriented; like the Spanish, it would be multi-ethnic. Furthermore, for the EU model to foster a proper balance between unity and diversity, most likely it would not do for it to become a supranational version of a nation-state model. Instead, the EU model would have to promote novel vertical and horizontal apportionments of powers allowing supranational, national, and infranational governance to work in harmony without being constrained by traditional forms of federalism or confederalism. The European model would have to find its own balance between demos and ethnos, a balance that would not be like that of the French or the German. Whether a European constitutional identity and a European constitutional model will emerge depends on the EU’s will and capacity to generate a genuine constitutional practice and culture—a matter that remains an open question.

7. The Post-Colonial Constitutional Model

Unlike all the previously discussed constitutional models, the post-colonial one is not anchored in any single historical experience. Furthermore, the post-colonial model by no means extends to all constitutions adopted by former colonies. Indeed, the United States, Canada, Australia, Mexico, and Brazil are all former colonies that enacted post-colonial constitutions yet none of them fits within the post-colonial model. The post-colonial model encompasses above all constitutions adopted by former colonies in Africa and Asia that (p. 766) achieved independence after the Second World War, including India, Nigeria, and several former French colonies in Africa. Finally, it is important to stress that whereas it was routine for former colonies to adopt a constitution upon achieving independence in the post-Second World War period, many of these were purely nominal. The most salient feature of the post-colonial model is that both the constitutional order and identity of the newly independent former colony are elaborated in a dialectical process involving an ongoing struggle between absorption and rejection of the former colonizer's most salient relevant identities. At the most abstract level, the former colony adopts a constitutional order fashioned in the image of that of its former colonizer and then seeks to fine-tune it to serve its own institutional and identity-based needs. The latter, moreover, will require adjustments to, and departures from, the colonizer's constitutional framework, but the work needed to adapt the inherited constitutional legacy to the needs of the new polity will almost inevitably happen to be defined in terms of the colonizer's political and constitutional framework. The case of India generally fits within this overall paradigm. In devolving power and granting India's provinces limited self-rule during the colonial period, the United Kingdom paved the way for the establishment of federalism in India, thus allowing for transformation and adaptation of the colonial institutional legacy to suit the particular constitutional needs of the newly independent former colony. From the British perspective, the grant of limited provincial self-rule may have been for purposes of containment, co-optation, and of dividing opposition within India to colonial rule. In contrast, for India besides facilitating the path to independence, provincial self-rule pointed to, and opened the doors toward, federalism. In sum, the post-colonial constitutional model is characterized by the predominance of a process involving an ongoing struggle between identification with, and differentiation from, the colonizer's constitutional identity, through concurrent negation and affirmation of the latter.
Constitutional Identity

IV. Identity and Constitution-Making

Constitutional identity depends not only on the constitutional model involved, but also on the type of constitution-making that led to its adoption. Indeed, it seems logical that if constitution-making is preceded by a violent revolution, the relationship of the new constitutional order to pre-constitutional identity would be different than if there had been a peaceful transition to a new constitution. With that in mind, one can generally distinguish six different models of constitution-making which taken together with the seven constitutional models discussed above substantially circumscribe the formation and evolution of the main different types of constitutional identity. The six models of constitution-making are: (1) the revolution-based model; (2) the invisible British model; (3) the war-based model; (4) the pact model; (5) the transnational model; and (6) the internationally grounded model.

1. The Revolution-Based Model

Both a break with the past and a selective and transformative partial repression and partial reincorporation of certain of its key elements are necessary preconditions to successful constitution-making and to the viability of the resulting constitution. The revolution-based model seems best suited to the tasks of breaking away from the past through negation and of providing for an interim period for settling accounts according to the revolutionaries' conception of (p. 767) political justice. On the other hand, the revolution-based model may seem inherently unsuited for successful reincorporation of the pre-constitutional and extra-constitutional materials originating in the ancien régime. Upon further inquiry, the key distinction may be less that between constitution-making as the result of a revolution as opposed to in the absence of any revolutionary break, and more that between a revolutionary break that does not go beyond the minimum necessary to allow for a new constitutional beginning and a more radical revolution that makes it difficult to rethread the indispensable links between past and future. This last point is well illustrated by the salient difference between the French Revolution and the American Revolution. As Hannah Arendt underscores, the French Revolution created such a radical break with the past that the revolutionaries could not muster sufficient legitimacy or continuity successfully to lay down the new law of the land. In sharp contrast, the American revolutionaries—who had just won a war of liberation rather than a revolution in the strict sense of the term—overthrew the colonizer, but not the basic political organization of the newly emancipated colonies. Indeed, the people of the colonies were already organized into self-governing bodies prior to the conflict with England. This, moreover, provided a significant measure of legitimacy and continuity creating propitious conditions for the making of state constitutions, which in turn provided a stepping-stone for the making of the 1787 US Constitution. In the last analysis, the success of revolution-based constitution-making depends on striking a proper equilibrium between a sufficiently emancipated constituent power and an adequately legitimated constituted power. This depends, in part, on how much and what of the past is destroyed. It also depends, in part, on how convincing a narrative of the new constitution's creation and contents can be elaborated on the basis of reworked pre-constitutional and extra-constitutional materials weaved together into an emerging and evolving account of constitution-making that can be productively meshed into a vibrant and dynamic working constitutional identity.
2. The Invisible British Model

As stressed above, the British constitutional model is an immanent one that unfolds through a process of accretion. Accordingly, the British Constitution seems grown not made and British constitutionalism independent from any discrete instances of constitution-making. Unlike the eighteenth-century French Revolution, the English revolutions of the seventeenth century did not result in abolishing the monarchy. Nonetheless, the constitutional conflicts that played out in seventeenth-century England resulted in significant, even if not full-fledged, constitution-making and in concerted efforts to concealment. In the first place, the source of legitimacy of the king's power, which was traditionally conceived as being divinely grounded, became recast as originating in the people. This led to a second major development: the invention of the concept of constituent power and its location in the ‘people’. The third major development, which originated at the time of the restoration of the monarchy in 1660, consisted in the systematic negation of the second above-mentioned development. Specifically, the sovereignty of the people as such and their role as actual holders of constituent power were discredited in favor of the view that parliament was the true representative of the people, thus emerging as the ultimate source of constitutional legitimacy. The concealment and displacement of constituent power from the people to the Parliament had two major effects that set a sharp contrast between British and French (p. 768): revolution-based constitution-making. First, unlike French Revolution constitution-making, its British counterpart, though surrounded by severe traumatic breaks in continuity—the execution of the king, followed by Cromwell's rule, the subsequent restoration, and the 1688 Revolution—was nonetheless shrouded in an appearance of continuity. This fostered a partial and ill-defined newly made constitution. Secondly, by making the Parliament the locus of the people's sovereignty, the British model triggers the collapse of the constituent power into the constituted power, thus abolishing the formal division between constitution-making and merely legislating. Constitution-making can thus become disguised as ordinary legislating, with the inevitable consequence of dissipating constitutional identity. The collapse of the constituent power into the constituted power can thus have both advantages and drawbacks. Where the constitution can be plausibly depicted as grown rather than made, and as drawing on deep-seeded traditions that lend support to the pursuit of the ideals of constitutionalism, the collapse in question may, on the whole, play a positive role. In contrast, where the traditions involved are significantly at odds with constitutionalism, and the blurring between constitutional and ordinary legislation can be easily manipulated to cast expediency as principle, then the absence of an independent constituent power can easily turn into a major liability.

3. The War-Based Model

The two salient examples of war-based constitution-making are those of post-Second World War Germany and Japan. Both in the case of Nazi Germany and of Imperial Japan tyrannical belligerent regimes experienced total defeat and unconditional surrender followed by a transition to constitutional democracy imposed by the victors. The war-based model, just like the revolution-based one involves a radical rupture with the past. Unlike the latter, however, the war-based model can only result in successful constitution-making if the citizenry of the defeated polity eventually embraces as its own the resulting constitution launched by the victors. In the context of the war-based model, the negation of the pre-constitutional past is first imposed by the victors, and so is the nature of the new constitution, at least in its broad outline. For a constitution made pursuant to this model to succeed, the defeated polity must accept the repudiation of its own (recent) past and embark upon the reconstruction of a constitutional identity initially framed by former foreign enemies to whom it was forced to surrender. Although the opportunities for negation of the pre-constitutional past are similar under the two models, the war-based model confronts serious obstacles that are much less likely to challenge the revolution-based model. In the latter case, much of the citizenry is likely to identify with the revolutionaries as did most Frenchmen with those who spoke on behalf of the Third Estate and most Americans with those who led them to their newly gained independence. There was obviously no comparable identification between the defeated Germans and their British, French, and American occupiers, or between the vanquished Japanese and their American military rulers. Notwithstanding this serious obstacle, war-based constitution-making has succeeded both in Germany and in Japan, though, in many key respects, the war-based model has proven a greater success in Germany than in Japan. This is in large part due to major differences in the circumstances in each of the two countries after the foreign occupiers eliminated their respective pre-constitutional orders and imposed on them the task of crafting a new constitution. West Germany, under the stewardship of the Adenauer government, moved quickly to make the foreign-initiated constitution-making project its own. In contrast, the constitution crafted in Japan was much more an imposed one bearing General MacArthur's implacable imprint.
4. The Pacted Transition Model

The pacted transition model is best exemplified by the making of the 1978 Spanish Constitution. Pacted transition as it occurred in Spain is contrasted to constitution-making stemming from revolution or war in that it occurs in a context in which no clear-cut winners or losers emerge. Negotiation and eventual pact leading to a new constitution depend on both the leadership of the ancien régime (or in Spain their heirs) and the proponents of a new constitutional order being too weak to impose their will or to overtake their opponents by force. Pacted negotiations, moreover, take place without break in legality, thus avoiding ‘bootstrapping’ problems that beset revolution or war-based constitution-making. In Spain preservation of legality became possible only because of the certain remarkable and unpredictable events, such as the Franco-empowered Cortes voting for free elections, thus knowingly assuring their own political demise. Furthermore, pacted constitution-making depends on a confluence of internal and external factors. In Spain, the painful memories of the civil war combined with the desire to obtain membership of what would become the EU. The former provided a powerful internal impetus to move away from the past; the latter, inspiration and guidance in relation to the future constitution which needed to be crafted. In other words, memories of the past suggested what had to be negated and visions of a European future contributed elements to be incorporated in Spain’s constitution-making undertaking and in the constitutional identity designed to emerge from it. In the last analysis, the principal virtue of the pacted transition model, besides the avoidance of violence, is that it unfolds in an ambit of legal continuity and that it affords far greater opportunities for compromise among a plurality of constitutional interests. The principal drawback of this model, on the other hand, is that it may lead to failure of genuine constitution-making in cases where there is a break with the past, but no resulting constitutional order or in those where there is simply no break from the standpoint of constitutional tradition or identity.

5. The Transnational Model

The members of the EU straddled the distinction between constitution and treaty while making the eventually rejected 2004 European Constitution—which they characterized as a ‘treaty-constitution’. Initially the EU Treaty- Constitution was made in the name of ‘We the Peoples of Europe’. Later, the constituents listed in the preamble shifted, and became the heads of state of the EU members, rendering the Treaty-Constitution, formally at least, more akin to a treaty than to a constitution. Treaties are inherently distinguishable from constitutions as the former typically regulate external relations among two or more distinct sovereigns whereas the latter regulate internal relations within a unified whole. Beneath the surface of this basic distinction, however, matters are more complex. Some contemporary multilateral treaties, such as the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), involve an (external) interstate relationship in relation to a subject matter, fundamental rights, that are typically internal. From the standpoint of fundamental rights, the ECHR looms as a hybrid between a treaty and (part of) a constitution: a treaty in form; part of a constitution in substance. The fact that a constitution for the EU may originate in a treaty rather than a constituent act of the peoples of Europe proceeding as one, may not in the end be that significant. This would seem especially true if the eventual European Constitution establishes an altogether new constitutional model that is radically different from all the models tailored to the particularities of the nation-state. One can imagine, for example, relations among the peoples involved, among the member states, and among the multiple institutional features deployed by the constitutional treaty to (p. 770) be neither purely vertical nor purely horizontal, neither purely external nor purely internal. In that case, the distinction between contract and treaty would most likely lose much of its importance for the new European order. The difference between treaty and constitution seems more significant if the European Constitution were to promote a supranational version of any of the models tailored to nation-states, or some hybrid version of these models. Even in that case, however, the difference need not be that significant if, for example, the treaty-constitution were to be ratified by referendum in each of the member states. As the plurality of legal regimes—both national and transnational such as the ECHR—bearing on the relevant legal actors multiplies, and as most of these regimes tend to become internally constitutionalized, how constitution-making is crafted and brought forth seems less crucial and less determinative. Unlike in the case of all other constitution-making models, where overcoming a pre-constitutional order that is mostly, or at least to a large extent, constitutionally deficient is a necessary prerequisite, that is not the case in the context of a European Constitution. Indeed, all the EU member states which approved the now failed Treaty- Constitution have nation-state constitutions that stand in harmony with the fundamental tenets of modern constitutionalism. The challenge confronting the EU constitution-makers was not, therefore, to eliminate some objectionable pre-constitutional order, but to recast the entrenched constitutional way of life within each of the member states and to redeploy it at the interstate level carved out by the EU. Under these circumstances, the most important negation does not target unacceptable pre- or extra-constitutional norms, but the settled conviction that the horizon for constitutional ordering stops at the boundaries of the nation-state.

6. The Internationally Grounded Model

In the last few decades, the international community has initiated, guided, and supervised constitution-making in particularly troubled nation-states. These initiatives involve ‘constitutional intervention’ to launch constitution-making in countries mired in political conflict and not otherwise in a position to embark on a successful constitution-making journey. Many of these ‘interventions’ were launched by the UN, starting with UN Security Council Resolution 544 of August 17, 1984. That resolution declared South Africa’s new 1983 apartheid constitution ‘null and void’. Whereas in the latter case, the intervention was essentially a negative one, the many subsequent cases, such as Cambodia in 1992 (SC Res 745), East Timor in 2001 (SC Res 1338), and Afghanistan in 2005 (SC Res 1589), the UN undertook positive interventions. Furthermore, other international actors besides the UN have also intervened in various countries ranging from Bosnia to Sudan. Many of the countries in which constitution-making by international intervention was launched were in, or just coming out of, a foreign war, civil war, or a combination of both. Nevertheless, the internationally grounded model clearly differs from the war-based model and from the pacted transition model. In countries in which international intervention has played an important role, opposing political forces have either been at war with one another or unable on their own to convene and to undertake a genuine pacted constitutional transition. The nature and degree of international intervention has varied greatly from one country to another. Nevertheless, in terms of an emerging model of constitution-making, three principal factors stand out. First, no genuine constitution-making process could have occurred absent the international intervention. Secondly, the international intervention leads to incorporation of certain external constitutional norms and standards into the actual constitution to which it eventually leads. And, thirdly, substantial decision-making power over the substantive particulars of the constitution-in-the-making must be left in the hands of relevant political actors within the nation-state affected. Viewed in terms of constitutional identity, these three factors add up to a requirement that the input introduced through international intervention not be regarded as biased or as serving the selfish interests of the intervening countries or organizations; to the acceptance of the legitimacy of incorporating external constitutional norms and standards into one’s country’s new constitution; and to the need that local actors be in a position to internalize the process coming from abroad and to incorporate substantive norms compatible with plausible legitimate articulations of their country’s national and constitutional identity.

V. Identity through Constitutional Interpretation

Constitutional identity plays an important and multifaceted role in constitutional interpretation. The precise nature of this role varies depending on the theory of constitutional identity involved. Thus, in the context of the ECJ, as discussed in Section I above, the EU adjudicator must set out to seek commonalities among the constitutions of member states, thus focusing on similarities and analogies across national constitutions. For Troper, on the other hand, the national constitutional adjudicator must seek out constitutional identity in the face of ever greater encroachment by the EU, through a distillation of constitutional principles for purposes of setting apart those that are essential from the rest. In Post’s view, the US Supreme Court regards its constitutional interpretations as being independent from culture when ‘the Court in fact commonly constructs constitutional law in the context of an ongoing dialogue with culture, so that culture is inevitably (and properly) incorporated into the warp and woof of constitutional law.’

Viewed systematically and dialectically, constitutional interpretation produces constitutional identity and is at the same time shaped, filled, and molded by the latter. Moreover, in some cases the constitutional adjudicator deliberately appeals to constitutional identity to guide her interpretation; in other cases, the adjudicator may be unaware that her interpretation is influenced, or her decision triggered, by factors rooted in constitutional identity.

A prime example of constitutional interpretation shaping the course of constitutional identity is provided by the US Supreme Court decision in Roe v Wade. Roe recognized for the first time a constitutional right to abortion in the face of a total textual and precedential silence on the question. Undoubtedly, the act of judicial construction that resulted in the holding in Roe had an unmistakable and significant impact on the constitutional identity of the United States. On the one hand, given the nature of the religious, moral, and political debate concerning abortion, recognition of a constitutional right to abortion projects a noticeably different image of American constitutional identity than that which would have emerged had the Supreme Court refused to recognize such a right. On the other hand, given the bitter controversy that followed the Roe decision and the vigorous efforts over the years to have the Roe decision overturned, it is hardly an exaggeration to claim that it provoked a crisis regarding an important aspect of the constitutional identity of Americans.

Conversely, constitutional interpretation can be influenced by constitutional identity, and a good example of a deliberate reliance on the latter by the adjudicator is provided by the German Holocaust Denial Case. Where a Holocaust denial is protected speech in the United States, it is criminalized in Germany despite fairly similar freedom of speech provisions in the two countries. The German Federal Constitutional Court held the criminal prohibition against Holocaust denial to be constitutional, emphasizing that to hold otherwise would deprive Jews living in Germany full integration in the larger community. To a large extent, the German Basic Law was intended as an unwavering repudiation of the country’s Nazi past, thus fostering a constitutional identity that strongly encourages full integration of German Jews within the German polity.

An example of unconscious influence by constitutional identity on constitutional interpretation is found in the US Supreme Court decision in Lynch v Donnelly. In Lynch, the Court upheld a city’s Christmas display that included a crèche, located at the heart of the shopping district, as not violative of the constitutional prohibition against state establishment of religion. To reach this result, the Court had to find that there was a secular purpose to the display of the crèche, and that its display did not amount to an official endorsement of religion by the city. Since the crèche depicts the nativity scene, which is of profound religious significance to Christians but not to those who profess other faiths, the hurdles confronting the Court’s majority seemed rather formidable. Nevertheless, the Court managed to decide that public display of the crèche was constitutional. As against non-believers, justices in the majority argued that display of the crèche did not endorse any particular religion any more than generally accepted practices, such as printing ‘In God We Trust’ on coins. As against both non-Christians and Christians for whom the crèche evokes strong religious convictions, the Court's majority trivialized the crèche, by stressing its display in the context of commercial and other national secular traditions now associated with the Christmas holiday. By nurturing the antagonism between these two entrenched positions, the Court’s majority in Lynch manages to promote mainstream religion, portraying itself as carving a predominantly neutral middle course between ardent secularists and profoundly committed adherents to religion. At bottom, however, Lynch promotes, by placing upon it the imprint of constitutional identity, a particular brand of religion which is ultimately neither neutral, nor religiously pluralistic.

Finally, constitutional identity can influence constitutional interpretation even where there is a heated and entrenched conflict of interpretation among adjudicators. This is well illustrated by the recent controversy over citation of foreign authorities in interpreting the US Constitution that has sharply split the justices on the Supreme Court. This split corresponds to an intensification of the divide among the respective proponents of two opposed visions of the United States. The first of these is the exclusivist vision. Under this view, the United States is a country with a unique destiny, exemplary values and ideals, which serves as a model for the rest of the world. Under the universalist view, on the other hand, the United States is a diverse cosmopolitan nation which is as much influenced by trends and developments coming from abroad as the rest of the world is influenced by it. The exclusivist view focuses on divergences; the universalist view, one centered on convergences. In their current incarnation, the exclusivist view is mainly held by political conservatives; the universalist, by progressives. Moreover, for the exclusivists the US Constitution must remain purely American and free from foreign influence or contamination. For the universalist, in contrast, there is a convergence of norms and values, at least among advanced constitutional democracies, which makes constitutional cross-fertilization attractive and often useful. The split between these two constitutional visions is sharp and seemingly irreconcilable and reveals how closely related a particular conception of national identity may be to its corresponding conception of constitutional identity.

Exclusivists and universalists appear to sketch out different conceptions of national identity and of constitutional identity, though in both cases the former is closely interwoven with the latter. This raises the question of whether it would be more accurate to speak in the plural of competing national and constitutional identities rather than in the singular. Moreover, if the answer were in the affirmative, then it would seem that at both the national level and the constitutional one a clash of identities would be more likely than the consolidation of a commonly shared identity.
When viewed more closely, however, the controversy between exclusivists and universalists reveals that both American national identity and constitutional identity are dynamic, conflictual, and multifaceted. Exclusivists and universalists, however, are ultimately dialectically linked as they represent two distinct competing facets of the United States’ self-perception as a country of destiny called upon to set an example for the rest of the world. For the exclusivists, the United States can only accomplish this by strictly adhering to what makes it different. For the universalist, on the other hand, overemphasis on such differences led the United States to lag behind the most advanced constitutional democracies in certain respects, thus requiring that it catch up to them before it can legitimately reassert its leadership role. Overall, exclusivists and universalists provide two different means to the same end, but in the course of aiming at that end, they each seem to reinvigorate the very obstacle that the other seeks to overcome. Hence, the vehemence among the two, and its strong impact on national and constitutional identity.

VI. The Problem of Identity in Supranational Constitutions

As attested by the ill-fated EU 2004 Treaty-Constitution, supranational constitutions seem intrinsically problematic both on account of demos and of ethnos. Nevertheless, it seems indisputable that there is a widespread movement toward supranational and even perhaps global constitutionalization. Some even claim that the UN Charter amounts to a world constitution. Upon reflection, neither the UN Charter nor transnational documents such as the ECHR—though they may contain certain norms that are functionally equivalent to constitutional ones—can be properly deemed to approximate full-fledged constitutions. In contrast, the 2004 EU Treaty-Constitution has all the trappings of a full-fledged constitution, but it was never ratified. Was that primarily because of a lack of transnational constitutional identity? Can such identity be envisaged? Could supranational constitutions do without it? And, if so, what would replace it at the supranational level?

One tempting way to attempt to overcome the lack of transnational ethnos is by combining the formal and structural attributes that are common to all constitutions with constitutional patriotism as advocated by Jürgen Habermas. The first of these two tasks seems quite plausible as there is a clear trend toward adoption of formal constitutional structures in all types of transnational and extra-national legal regimes, both public—for example, the World Trade Organization—and private. Constitutional patriotism, which essentially seeks to redirect patriotism—an affective bond usually directed toward one’s own nation-state—toward the ideals of constitutionalism, on the other hand, seems highly problematic. Can one profoundly and affectively identify with a conceptual ideal? And even if one could, would that provide a thick enough layer of identity to glue together all those coming within the sweep of a global or transnational constitution?

Whereas any answer at the global level would be purely speculative, the EU’s experience does afford a basis for useful reflection regarding the possibility of sketching a viable supranational constitutional identity. To begin with, one can identify several aspects of a common EU identity: common origins, common values, common destiny, and a common differentiation from American identity. Can these, though seemingly insufficient standing alone, nevertheless serve to sustain a viable constitutional identity through projection into the future along the lines of the American model? This possibility cannot be ruled out, but the American future-looking model seems at best of limited relevance for Europe. This becomes apparent through a comparison of the American motto ‘E Pluribus Unum’ with the EU motto ‘united in diversity’ adopted in connection with the now failed Treaty-Constitution. The American motto projects a dynamic and evolving image with the Constitution acting as catalyst for the integration over time of successive waves of immigration into a single nation. In contrast, the European motto aptly characterized as ‘weak’ is static and flat. Indeed, nothing thus far suggests how this abstract aspiration may be transformed into a vibrant process of mutual adaptation.

There may be another plausible interpretation of ‘unity in diversity’ that could prove more productive. In this reading, the unity in question would be taken to symbolize a dynamic process against Balkanization within and, by extension, among nation-states. Seen in this light, unity at the European level may serve to defuse tensions within multi-ethnic states and between individual states and their own ethnic minorities. By transferring some powers from the member states to the Union, more room may be made for greater regional autonomy and diversity. In that case, moreover, the identities in question would seem more in keeping with the multi-ethnic Spanish model than with its American counterpart.
With this in mind, a narrative concerning origins looms as a crucial component of a viable constitutional identity, and the reference to Europe’s ‘bitter experiences’, introduced into the failed Treaty-Constitution’s preamble, provides a promising starting point. It is true that this reference is ‘minimal’, but that may be more than a vice.62 The reference itself does not provide a sufficient narrative, but it opens the door to one. It is clear that Nazism and Soviet communism are both European phenomena and the main culprits behind most of the human-caused misery perpetrated in the twentieth century. Moreover, the European project arose from the ashes of Nazism and, recently, has been extended to incorporate within the EU many of the formerly communist countries of Eastern Europe. Accordingly, a European constitutional identity could easily ground its narrative of origins on a repudiation of Nazism and (p. 775) Soviet communism and on the need to create a political order that would minimize the chances of any return to tyrannical totalitarian rule.

From the perspective of constitutional identity, origins depend, in part, on negation. Negation alone, however, is insufficient to create a distinct image of origins. In the European case, therefore, rejection of Nazism or Soviet communism does not of itself suggest why a transnational constitutional order would be needed rather than a series of sound national constitutional regimes. However, if Nazism is regarded as involving a pathological and highly disproportionate promotion of ethnus, and Soviet communism as fostering excessive suppression of it, a narrative of origins could link the repudiations, mentioned above, to the building of a transnational multi-ethnic order promoting a proper equilibrium among a multiplicity of diverse ethnicities. In other words, if transnational constitutionalism can create a space that is particularly well suited for the coexistence of a multiplicity of ethnicities while minimizing the potential excesses of ethnus, then rejection of the ‘bitter experiences’, when coupled with the need for a lasting commonly shared framework that neither unduly magnifies nor unduly represses ethnus, provides a seemingly viable narrative of origins susceptible of successful incorporation into an emerging European constitutional identity.

The other elements of collective identity referred to in the failed Treaty-Constitution, namely, Europe as ‘a community of destiny’, as ‘a special area of human hope’, and as a ‘community of values’, could well figure in a European constitutional identity at some point in the future. They sound hollow at this juncture, however, because they remain abstract and largely generic. But this does not mean that in time common threads, found in the history and culture of the various member states, could not be woven together into, for example, a distinct and sufficiently differentiated ‘community of destiny’.

Constitutional identity like national identity can also be defined, to some degree, by who ‘we’ are not, as opposed to who we are. Accordingly, anti-Americanism could have a genuine role to perform in circumscribing and thus defining a European identity. American constitutional identity is adamantly fixed on the nation-state and wary of international and transnational norms that are constitutional in substance if not in form. In contrast, the starting point for a new European constitutional identity is the rejection of a constitutional order imprisoned within the nation-state combined with the search for harmonization between national, supranational, and international constitutional norms. To be sure, a similar harmonization is sought under the Spanish model, which is tailored to the nation-state. Nevertheless, if one adds to existing transnational institutional arrangements within the EU its transnational constitutional aspirations, the contours of a plausible European constitutional identity begin to emerge.

It is quite possible that eventually the EU will create a European constitutional identity and lead to a new transnational European constitutional model. That model, like the American, would be future-oriented; like the Spanish, it would be multi-ethnic. Furthermore, for the European model to foster ‘unity in diversity’, most likely the European model would have to promote novel vertical and horizontal apportionments of powers allowing supranational, national, and infranational governance to work in harmony without being constrained by traditional forms of federalism or confederalism. Whether a genuine European constitutional identity and a European constitutional model will emerge depends on the EU’s will and capacity to generate a genuine constitutional practice and culture—which is very much an open question. Be that as it may, constitutional identity may find new vessels of expression and transmission, but its relational dialectical engagement with concretely grounded pre- and extra-constitutional constructs seems unlikely to be transcended or replaced by disembodied ideals such as constitutional patriotism.

Bibliography
Bibliography

Seyla Benhabib, Ian Shapiro, and Danilo Petranovich (eds), Identities, Affiliations, and Allegiances (2007)

Michel Rosenfeld (ed), Constitutionalism, Identity, Difference and Legitimacy: Theoretical Perspectives (1994)

Mark Tushnet, ‘Referring to Foreign Law in Constitutional Interpretation: An Episode in the Culture Wars’ (2006) 35 University of Baltimore Law Review 299

Notes:

(4) See Rosenfeld (n 1), 27–33.

(5) See Frederic Schauer, ‘Free Speech and the Cultural Contingency of Constitutional Categories’ in Michel Rosenfeld (ed), Constitutionalism, Identity, Difference and Legitimacy: Theoretical Perspectives (1994), 353 (similarly phrased free speech provisions given different meanings depending on the culture in which they are embedded).

(7) US Constitution, Art I, s 8, cl 3.

(8) On federalism, see Chapter 27.

(9) See Gibbons v Ogden 22 US 1 (1824).

(12) Ibid 7.

(13) Post (n 3), 8.

(14) Jacobsohn (n 1), 13.

(15) Ibid 7 (original emphasis).

(16) See Troper (n 1), 202.

(18) See Rosenfeld (n 1), 45–65.

(19) See Ulrich Preuss, ‘Constitutional Powermaking for the New Polity: Some Deliberations on the Relations Between Constituent Power and the Constitution’ in Rosenfeld (n 5), 143.

(20) On gender see Chapter 19.

(21) See Rosenfeld (n 1), 61–2. See also Chapter 51.

(22) Cf Cass R. Sunstein, ‘On Property and Constitutionalism’ in Rosenfeld (n 5), 383, 398 (arguing that the 1990's constitutions of former communist states should pull back from extensive protection of social and economic rights to aid transition from state dependency to creation of a vibrant private sector and civil society). On freedom of religion, see Chapter 43.

(23) See Troper (n 1), 201–3.

(24) See n 17 and accompanying text.

(25) The above statement refers to the situation prevalent in the mid-1970s. Since then, the EU did attempt to adopt a formal written constitution. The Treaty establishing a Constitution for Europe (TCE) was signed on October 29, 2004 by all the (then) 25 member states, but failed due to rejection in 2005 referenda in France and the Netherlands. However, the substantive provisions of the TCE were subsequently incorporated almost intact in the Treaty of Lisbon which entered into force on December 1, 2009. See Norman Dorsen et al, Comparative Constitutionalism: Cases and Materials (2nd edn, 2010), 77.

(26) See Jacobsohn (n 1), 4.

(28) Ibid.

(29) Ibid 23.

(30) Ibid.

(31) A theocracy may be less than fully comprehensive on a political plane and thus combine with some attributes of constitutional democracy or it may adopt, for strategic reasons, a purely formal constitution meant to be exclusively nominal rather than substantive.

(32) See Re Quebec Objection to a Resolution to Amend the Constitution [1982] 2 SCR 793 (Supreme Court of Canada) (technically, the 1982 Constitution was the product of amendments rather than of constitution-making from scratch).

(34) See Michel Rosenfeld, ‘Hate Speech in Constitutional Jurisprudence: A Comparative Analysis’ (2006) 24 Cardozo Law Review 1523 (comparing US toleration of Nazi hate speech as against Germany criminalization of it on the basis of differences of self-perception relating to the Holocaust).

(35) For a discussion of originalism, see Dorsen et al (n 25), 219–24.

(36) See Rosenfeld (n 1), 10–11.

(37) The following discussion summarizes that provided in ch 5 of Rosenfeld (n 1).

(38) See n 25.

(39) Emmanuel Joseph Sieyès, What is the Third Estate? (1789), 58.

(40) On citizenship, see further Chapter 48.

(41) See 1978 Spanish Constitution, Arts 143–158.

(42) See n 25.

(44) The following discussion summarizes that provided in ch 6 of Rosenfeld (n 1).

(46) See Post (n 3), 8.

(49) 90 BFVerfGE 241 (1994) (German Federal Constitutional Court).

(51) US Constitution, Amendment 1 (1791).

(54) See ‘The Relevance of Foreign Legal Materials’ (n 52), 525.

(58) See Jürgen Habermas, Between Facts and Norms; Contributions to a Discourse Theory of Law and Democracy (1996), 118.

(59) See Rosenfeld (n 1), 267–8.

(60) See von Bogdandy (n 43).

(61) Ibid 360.

(62) Ibid 310.
Michel Rosenfeld

Michel Rosenfeld is Justice Sydney L. Robins Professor of Human Rights and Director, Program on Global and Comparative Constitutional Theory, Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law
I. Introduction

Values and principles are a familiar part of the landscape of constitutional adjudication, yet their jurisprudential status is a subject of considerable contestation, and their meaning and significance for courts vary markedly across national boundaries. Much of the controversy surrounding these terms relates to concerns over their potential abuse by judges in the interpretive process and the resulting impact this experience could have on the legitimacy of the judicial function. Another point of contention is entwined in a specifically terminological quandary; thus in one account invoking values and principles is mainly redundant, whereas alternatively the two references might be seen as implicating quite different constitutional lines of inquiry. Moreover, the meaning and significance of values and principles to the constitutional enterprise display additional variation when viewed against the broad panorama of comparative possibilities.

However, contentious values and principles may be within the context of scholarly debate, they function in important ways to affect the shape and substance of constitutional outcomes. Constitutions incorporate them formally or informally, judges invoke them liberally or grudgingly, and political actors respond to their deployments... negatively or positively. In India and Ireland, for example, principles are explicitly enumerated within the constitutional text to serve as a directive source for political and social development. In South Africa the elevated status of constitutional principles is traceable to that nation's unique constitution-making process, in which the adoption of a final document was contingent on the Supreme Court's certification that a set of mandated principled commitments had been scrupulously followed \( p. \text{778} \) in establishing a code of governance. In Germany the operative assumption of post-war constitutional jurisprudence has been that there exists an ‘objective ordering of values’ according to which the Constitutional Court’s adjudication of cases will culminate in rulings supportive of the country’s constitutive obligations.

This chapter considers some of the ways in which values and principles have influenced contemporary constitutional law and discourse. Although the two terms are often used interchangeably, the discussion proceeds on the basis of a distinction in their meanings that highlights certain key areas of dispute surrounding the enterprise of constitutional adjudication. The distinction is one that may be gleaned from the numerous textual invocations of the words in constitutional documents. Indeed, inspection of such documents reveals a ubiquitous designation of values and principles in a great variety of provisions that are subject to judicial interpretation. While many of these references do not help much in providing definitional clarity, a number of them point to a criterion for distinguishing these terms that is concerned with the contrast between general and particular concerns. Thus, constitutionally inscribed mentions of principles are associated more often with matters that are less culture-bound than one usually finds in the citation of values.

For example, the Costa Rican Constitution refers to ‘the history and the values of the country’.\(^1\) A provision in the East Timor document speaks of ‘the culture and traditional values’ of that nation.\(^2\) The Egyptian Constitution mentions the ‘character of the Egyptian family—together with the values and traditions it embodies’.\(^3\) Rwandan constitutional language requires the ‘prom[otion of] positive values based on cultural traditions’.\(^4\) Turkey’s Constitution invokes ‘Turkish historical and moral values’.\(^5\) Uganda’s recognizes ‘cultural and customary values which are consistent with fundamental rights’.\(^6\) And in Venezuela there is a constitutional provision that details ‘the duty of assisting in the dissemination of the values of folk traditions and the work of artists’.\(^7\)

Other constitutional references to values are focused on more universal themes. The Argentina Constitution, for example, calls for ‘the fostering of democratic values’;\(^8\) a theme often found in passages in many constitutions where one finds specific allusions to principles. Similarly, Brazil’s Constitution marks ‘equality and justice as supreme values of a fraternal, pluralist and unprejudiced society’.\(^9\) Such assertions are consistent with an aspirational human rights agenda whose substantive commitments are not mainly determined by the indigenous conditions of particular constitutional polities. This more universally framed commitment is observable in a great many of the constitutions’ enunciations of principle. Typical of such references are: Algeria, ‘The State is based on the principles of democratic organization and social justice’;\(^10\) Croatia, ‘universally accepted principles of the modern world’;\(^11\) Iraq, ‘No law may be enacted that contradicts the principles of democracy’;\(^12\) and Lithuania, ‘Lithuania shall follow the universally recognized principles and norms of international law’.\(^13\)

Then there are the invocations of principles that are not really universal in scope but are seemingly less culture-and tradition-bound than is generally the case for the textual articulations of values. In this category are appeals to state-specific principles, principles that give expression to commitments that manifest critical aspects of a nation’s constitutional identity.\(^14\) \( p. \text{779} \) The precise substance of these principles is not always obvious from the immediate textual context; the ambiguity surrounding meaning constitutes an implicit invitation to engage in constitutional interpretation. Indonesia’s Constitution requires compliance with ‘the principles of the Unitary State of the Republic of Indonesia’.\(^15\) The Russian document voices similar dependence on ‘the basic principles of the constitutional order of the Russian Federation’.\(^16\) In Venezuela ‘the principles of Bolivarian thought’ are to provide criteria for observance of constitutional obligations.\(^17\) In such instances, principles have been assigned constitutive prominence in order to underscore the importance constitutional framers attached to precepts of political morality that possess a certain sovereign distinctiveness. Presumably they could be identical with principles of justice that transcend sovereign borders, or they could overlap tradition-based sources more familiar to the discussion about values.\(^18\) An example of the first might be the United States, whose Constitution (which does not explicitly mention principles) is often thought to embody the universally applicable self-evident principles of the Declaration of Independence that are the basis of ‘US exceptionalism’. Examples of the latter are those constitutions—for instance, Afghanistan, Egypt, Ireland—that point to the existence of certain religious principles as privileged sources for the resolution of constitutional questions.
While the categorical boundaries separating these different types are anything but precise, the distinctions drawn are necessary to inform the analysis of values and principles in the following sections. The first discusses the vexed nature of principles as sources of constitutional interpretation. While the claim often made on their behalf, that they are the cornerstones of the very concept of constitutionalism, provides a powerful adjudicative resource for jurists, the ease with which such principles are amenable to interpretive manipulation offers a counter-rationale to those troubled by the discretionary excesses they afford these actors. The next section is similarly concerned with the uses and abuses of values, which are distinguishable from principles by their association with the local environment and the traditions and histories that give definition to the constitutional identity of a given polity. Sometimes these different associations produce jurisprudential tensions, but the resulting dissonance may as easily lead to creative and productive results as dysfunctional ones. The concluding section further elaborates on the distinction by situating the contrast within the debate over the appropriateness of foreign law as a source for resolving constitutional disputes.

II. Principles: Universal Aspirations and Practical Accommodations

The status of principles as legitimate legal sources for judicial interpretation in constitutional adjudication is a hotly and long-contested issue. Consider, for example, this strong statement by the former President of the Israel Supreme Court, Aharon Barak: 'The interpretation of legal texts is dictated by fundamental principles, since they constitute the objective purpose of every legal text.' That there might be disagreement about the substance of these fundamental principles is not excluded in this account, but that their deployment by judges deciding cases is an inevitable and necessary component of the judicial task is taken here as a given. Not everyone, however, sees it that way, and so it has been with equally strong conviction affirmed (p. 780) that, 'the invocation of legal principles is misguided'. Again, it is not the application of the wrong principles that is per se problematic, rather it is that there is no justification for the judicial use of any such principles.21

The disagreement over the use and appropriateness of principles in constitutional law has figured prominently in the jurisprudential literature, inspired to a great extent by Ronald Dworkin's famous critique of legal positivism. Directed mainly at H.L.A. Hart's version of legal positivism, it provocatively laid out the case for broadening the fundamental test for law to include, in addition to the legal rules of a sovereign community, standards that function differently than rules and that generically can be subsumed under the rubric of principles. As Dworkin explained, a principle is 'a standard that is to be observed, not because it will advance or secure an economic, political, or social situation deemed desirable, but because it is a requirement of justice or fairness or some other dimension of morality.' Principles, according to his account, are necessary for the correct judicial resolution of legal questions, although their application does not require a particular result in a given case. A dimension not present in regard to rules sets them apart, namely the weight these principles carry in the legal order within which they function. Another way of expressing this phenomenon is to claim, as Lawrence Tribe does, that principles in constitutional law 'go beyond anything that could reasonably be said to follow simply from what the Constitution expressly says.' Thus, in the case of the US, there are postulates—for example, the anti-secession principle—whose importance is unrelated to the absence of any explicit mention in the text of the Constitution. In deciding cases a judge must, therefore, give due weight—which may of course be deemed considerable—to such constitutive principles.

As we have seen, however, explicit textual references to principles are very common in constitutional documents; they need not, in other words, appear to the observer as the foundation of an 'invisible constitution'. Many of these specific inscriptions—for example, Ireland's 'principles of social policy' (Art 45)—suggest that another attribute of principles in the Dworkinian model—their special connection to individual rights rather than collective goals—is not a universal fixture in the constitutional domain. This empirical reality—the nexus between principles and things other than rights—need not be fatal to Dworkin's argument as long as we hold to the idea that the pursuit of collective or policy goals can proceed along a justice- or morality-based line of approach, that they need not, as Dworkin's rights thesis contends, be grounded in purely utilitarian calculations. Indeed, the inclusion of sections on 'directive principles' in a number of constitutions is predicated on the idea that the governing institutions of these societies have a constitutional responsibility to create law and policies consistent with (p. 781) the animating principles of the regime. Inasmuch as the attainment of the goals established by these directive principles is necessarily an incremental, cumulative process, there are sure to be political and economic trade-offs along the way, which, if the strict distinction between principles and policies is adhered to, means that the achievement of such non-individuated goals would technically be lacking a principled basis. When a constitutional decision is taken expressly to improve the average welfare of members of the community it is not, in the strict sense of Dworkin's model, a principled act, even if it manages to succeed in securing its policy objectives. Perhaps that explains why Justice Barak, otherwise an admirer of Dworkin's jurisprudence, 'do[es] not insist on this distinction'.

A clear distinction between principles and policies may, however, provide some useful cover against the charge of judicial activism. Policymaking is conventionally viewed as an activity done by politicians within the executive and legislative branches and subject to the constraints of electoral accountability. To the extent that the application of principles is recognized as a distinctly judicial task, it may enhance the legitimacy of an institution whose standing in the democratic community depends in part on its perceived commitment to dispassionate justice. Even so, this may prove a difficult sell; witness Richard Posner's critique of the Dworkinian distinction to the effect that in practice a principle is nothing more than a policy with which we are in agreement. Yet more difficult is the challenge faced by nations transitioning from authoritarian rule to democratic constitutionalism. For example, Iraq's new Constitution mandates that 'No law may be enacted that contradicts the principles of democracy'. One measure of how well the new regime succeeds in convincing its people that fundamental change has indeed occurred will be popular acceptance of the idea that Iraqi courts are both committed to such principles and able to enforce them against the policies of entrenched interests. Given the extended dismal history that preceded the new constitutional arrangements in that country, achievement of this acceptance will doubtless not be easy.

Those for whom the invocation of principles is a misguided judicial exercise will not be persuaded that a principled approach to constitutional adjudication can immunize judges from the accusation that their use of non-rule-based interpretive methodologies necessarily furthers the prospect of a result-oriented judicial abuse of authority. Consider in this connection the so-called 'level of generality' problem. As Mark Tushnet has pointed out, 'different interpreters will specify the principles underlying particular constitutional terms differently, some at an abstract level of generality, some at a more concrete level.' Far from being an objectively grounded decision detached from the social and political realities of a given time and place, particular specifications are, a critic might say, surely to involve calculations mainly focused on attaining the judicially desired policy or ideological outcome. 'The fact is that all adjudication requires making choices among the levels of generality on which to articulate principles, and all such choices are inherently non-neutral.'

To see this process at work one need look no further than the aforementioned Justice Barak. The unresolved dilemma in Israel's constitutional predicament is highlighted in that nation's Proclamation of Independence, with its particularist commitment to a Jewish State coexisting with a universalist promise of liberal democratic politics. The resulting—and perhaps inevitable—constitutional project is one of bringing clarity and unity of purpose to this predicament by mitigating the inner tensions of these dual aspirations. For many Israelis this means moving into a constitutional future that resembles the experience of other liberal democracies. Accordingly, judicial interpretation, in Justice Barak's view, must be 'purposive', with the goal of 'achieving unity and constitutional harmony'. Mirroring the Proclamation, the Basic Law on Human Dignity (adopted in 1992) requires upholding 'the values of the State of Israel as a Jewish and democratic State'. How is this to be understood from an interpretive point of view?

The content of the phrase 'Jewish State' will be determined by the level of abstraction which shall be given it. In my [Justice Barak's] opinion, one should give this phrase meaning on a high level of abstraction, which will unite all members of society and find the common ground among them. The level of abstraction should be so high, until it becomes identical to the democratic nature of the state.

For obvious reasons, this approach has engendered controversy in Israel. The attempt to mute, if not eliminate, the discordant notes in the nation's revolutionary legacy has surely politicized the Court by leading many, rightly or wrongly, to conclude that the justices identify with one side of this divided legacy. But the example also reflects a dynamic that can occur when the two kinds of principles earlier cited in the texts of various constitutions clash within the adjudicative arena as part of a nation's broader struggle to instantiate a constitutional identity. Thus there are principles and values that embody precepts of political morality rooted in a nation's past, whose meaning derives from experience within a specific political and cultural context, and whose reach may not extend beyond that local context. Other principles make a claim of universality, such that the moral truths they are said to embody are precisely the ones whose recognition is required for a constitution to exist in more than name only. Sometimes the jurisprudential response to the tensions that result from the presence of these two types of principles—one of which is hard to distinguish from values—is to accept the tension as an enduring component of the constitutional predicament, a posture that incorporates the implicit understanding of a nation's constitutional identity as one that develops dialogically, thereby entailing interpretive and political activity reflective of the inevitable disharmonies endemic to the constitutional condition.\footnote{33}

\textit{(p. 783)} A seemingly less accommodationist view has come to be associated with German jurisprudence. In the early landmark \textit{Southwest Case}, the Federal Constitutional Court proclaimed: ‘Every constitutional principle must always be interpreted in such a way as to render it compatible with the fundamental principles of the Constitution as a whole.’\footnote{34} Known as the principle of ‘practical concordance’ (praktische Konkordanz), it requires a holistic understanding of the Constitution, in which the principled commitments of the document are to be harmonized so that none are enforced at the expense of others. As Donald Kommers has shown, ‘The principle flows from the conception of the Basic Law as a structural unity.’\footnote{35} How distinguishable this approach really is from the effort in Israel to reconcile ostensibly antagonistic governing principles is debatable; an important difference, however, is the existence in the German case of a broad consensus regarding the ‘objective order of values’ that is to guide the interpretive process.\footnote{36} ‘Taken as a unit, a constitution reflects certain overarching principles and fundamental decisions to which individual provisions are subordinate.’\footnote{37}

The practical implications of such an objective ordering extend to one of the more fascinating issues in constitutional theory: whether a constitutional court should have the authority to invalidate an unconstitutional amendment. The German Court has never issued such a ruling, but it has been in the forefront of establishing the jurisprudential rationale for doing so. In the \textit{Southwest Case} it affirmed:

That a constitutional provision itself may be null and void, is not conceptually impossible just because it is a part of the constitution. There are constitutional provisions that are so fundamental and to such an extent an expression of a law that precedes even the constitution that they also bind the framers of the constitution, and other constitutional provisions that do not rank so high may be null and void, because they contravene those principles.\footnote{38}

It could hardly have gone unnoticed that in the course of elaborating on the conceptual plausibility of nullifying a constitutional provision through an assertion of judicial review, the Court expressly invoked the nation’s recent nightmarish past to affirm that never again would formal legal means be used to legalize a totalitarian regime.

Indeed, proximity to the abyss has a way of concentrating the mind on the essentials of constitutionalism, which is to say that there are experiences in the life of a nation that may incline one to accept substantive limits on certain kinds of formal constitutional change. If we posit (p. 784) that there are moral/political principles whose adoption and enforcement are the necessary condition for a regime to be recognized as genuinely constitutional, then the extraordinary exertion of judicial power to declare an amendment destructive of those principles invalid could understandably strike one as justifiable. Yet what if the principles under assault were not of the kind that threatened the existence of constitutional governance; instead involving a particular expression of that governance, perhaps a polity constitutionally committed to principles requiring a strict separation of church and state? Imagine, in other words, an amendment that had as its target a specific variant of constitutional identity, albeit without disturbing the fundamentals of constitutionalism. In such an instance would we not be less inclined to accept a judicial ruling nullifying an amendment than if the very identity of the constitutional project were thought to be in jeopardy?

Of course, in the face of a perceived danger to constitutional principles the distinction between state-specific principles and those possessing a more generic significance could very well pass unnoticed by political actors directly involved in an immediate controversy or crisis. Either through misapprehension or strategic calculation, people invested in the status quo are likely to exaggerate the scope and reach of a threat to the continuity of settled constitutional practice. They might, then, in their defense of principle, portray such a threat as one that placed at risk the future of constitutional government in the nation rather than what might be more plausibly the case, the maintenance of its particular expression.

For example, in the landmark Indian case, \textit{Kesavananda Bharati v State of Kerala}, a justice on that country’s Supreme Court declared: '[Our Constitution] is based on a social philosophy and every social philosophy like every religion has two main features, namely, basic and circumstantial. The former remains but the latter is subject to change.'\footnote{39} In this judgment the Court, fully conversant with the reasoning of its German counterpart, decided it could invalidate a constitutional amendment that was in defiance of the ‘basic structure’ of the Indian Constitution. Under the theory that constitutional change must not destroy what it modifies, the Court affirmed its institutional authority to annul any amendment whose adoption would, in its view, result in radical transformation of regime essentials. Left uncertain and unresolved, however, were the criteria that would enable one to distinguish basic features from circumstantial ones. When does a change portend the subversion of principles essential to constitutional government, at the core of which is the rule of law and the impartial administration of justice; and when does it undermine principles critical to the nation’s self-understanding as manifested in a distinctive identity embedded in its constitution?

Thus it may have been obvious to the Court in a subsequent case involving the efforts of Prime Minister Indira Gandhi to entrench dictatorial rule in India that the nullification of her amendments to the Constitution was vital to the preservation of constitutional government. The government had argued that Parliament could do anything it wanted through the amendment power, no matter how revolutionary or destructive, a repudiation of the very fundamentals of constitutionalism that the Court felt compelled to resist. Said one of the justices, ‘the Constitution is a precious heritage; therefore you cannot destroy its identity’. But how should an amendatory challenge to, say, secularism be viewed? Surely it would have the potential of transforming Indian constitutional identity; however, are the principles underlying this featured constitutional commitment so vital to the generic identity of a constitution that their possible evisceration would justify a similar intervention by the Supreme Court? Indeed, secularism has been declared a ‘basic structure’ of the Constitution, but the accompanying disagreement over the substance of the principles that comprise this hallowed regime feature reminds us that even if we demur from the idea that ‘the invocation of principles is misguided’, we might still question how in the end they should be deployed.

III. Values: Finding Constitutional Meaning in ‘Local Habits’

Disagreement over the substance of principles is ubiquitous, an inherent aspect of the constitutional condition. So too is dispute over the import of values in constitutional discourse, which, given the common conflation of the term with principles, can be taken as just another way of expressing the same thing. As suggested earlier, however, it will clarify matters if we maintain a distinction between the two concepts, even if this requires that the manner in which designations of this kind are officially conveyed not be taken at face value. For example, the German ‘objective order of values’ (eine objektive Wertordnung) in fact refers to fundamental constitutional principles in the sense that, as the German Court once affirmed, it functions in that nation’s jurisprudence ‘as a yardstick for measuring and assessing all actions in the area of legislation, public administration, and adjudication’. In this account an objective value is, as Donald Kommers has suggested, ‘one specified by the constitutional text as informed, inter alia, by history and which the state, apart from any individual claim, must foster and protect.’ This understanding may be contrasted with the notion of ‘fundamental values’, as it operates, for example, in the US context, where, as Kommers points out, it appears in a more subjective role as a feature of common law jurisprudence and precedential reasoning. Or, as it has been more strongly asserted, ‘Values and principles are, from many points of view, antithetical to each other’.

Thus, while both principles and values are always contestable, the latter has a culturally determined meaning that provides it with a particularistic significance that effectively severs the idea of values from any universalistic claims. Recall in this context the textual constitutional references to values in constitutional documents and their emphasis on history and tradition. In these constitutional settings judges must be attentive to societal values that are embedded in a nation’s long-standing traditions. To be sure, this focus is not unique to those judges whose constitutions are explicit in their evocation of such values—witness the prominence given to the subject in US substantive due process jurisprudence—but their predicament displays in a sharply defined way the problem that all judges must confront in constitutional interpretation.

For example, Turkey’s Constitution invokes ‘Turkish historical and moral values’. How is such language to be understood? The governing Justice and Development Party’s (AK Party) determined efforts to open the public sphere to Islamic influences, under the theory that a dominant religious tradition must not be confined to the realm of the purely personal, would no doubt identify that tradition with the people’s historical and moral values. But a judge inclined to accept that identification would have to address the argument that the framers of the Turkish Republic, inspired by a vision of a radical transformation of state/religion relations, also believed that their fervently held goal of Western-style modernization would not be achieved unless the impediment of traditional Islam were effectively overcome. Hence they incorporated a principle that was in essence a Western import—radical secularism—in order to ensure the ultimate success of their constitutional project.

Still, the pervasiveness of Islamic traditions in Turkish society, and the values attached thereto, strongly suggests that the content and parameters of the Constitution's secular mandate possess a mutability that varies with the relative strength of these traditions and their more worldly competitors. These values have been mainly championed in the national legislature, as when in 2008 it adopted two constitutional amendments enabling Turkish women to wear headscarves in institutions of higher learning. This was followed by the Constitutional Court's decisive ruling striking down these amendments for violating secularism, 'the basic principle of the Republic'. Unlike the Indian Constitution, the Turkish counterpart includes a provision (Art 2) that specifically immunizes certain principles (including secularism) from the amendment process. Yet much like in India, disagreement about which policies are inconsistent with the fundamental principle is an ongoing feature of the country's constitutional politics. Do the values that support a greater visibility for religion in public life in fact threaten the secular principle?

While posing the question in this way suggests that principles and values are indeed antithetical to each other, the dialogical progression unfolding in Turkey, as it has elsewhere, reveals a much more complicated relationship, in which the boundary line that separates the two concepts is not as impermeable as the oppositional characterization of the terms might lead one to believe. Principles may be distinguished by their universalistic reach, but their success or failure in concrete application will depend on how they are adapted to the circumstances and contexts of a given time and place. Such adaptation entails absorbing and integrating values from the society's dominant traditions, culminating in some modification in the scope and depth of constitutional principles without leaving them transformed with respect to their underlying and most fundamental commitments.

This process received its classic formulation with Edmund Burke, who saw constitutions as embodiments of unique histories and cultural traditions. His emphasis on particularities and prescription, and on the constitution as something that evolves to conform to the circumstances and habits of a people, is upon first glance suggestive of a moral sensibility strongly deferential to entrenched cultural norms. But the deference was unqualified, as illustrated in Burke's rejection of Warren Hastings' main argument for his morally questionable actions in India. Hastings had framed a defense of 'geographical morality', which held that whatever happened in India was compatible with local customs and therefore could not be judged by external standards. Burke was categorical in rejecting this moral perspective, arguing in response that the governance of Indians had to respect the same universal laws of right conduct that applied to Englishmen. Necessary, for Burke, was a prudential balancing of the universal and the particular. 'The foundations of government [are ... in the constitution] laid ... in (p. 787) political convenience and in human nature; either as that nature is universal, or as it is modified by local habits.'

Two centuries later the interactive dynamic involving principles and values in independent India echoes the earlier balancing of universal and local interests in the colonial precursor. This may be seen in the various and persistent political contests between the forces of inclusive secularism seeking a transformation of traditional Indian society and those of religious nationalists in pursuit of a more culturally homogenous and dominant Hindu value system. This contestation has manifested itself in landmark constitutional rulings in which the Supreme Court has been challenged to accommodate the demands of a principled commitment to a composite, more egalitarian identity with a deeply entrenched way of life premised on a contrary vision of social ordering. Burke's idea of the prescriptive constitution includes a presumption in favor of settled practice, which in contemporary India extends a measure of legitimacy to the very values that support the structural foundations of a society targeted for deconstruction by the Constitution's underlying principles. Interestingly, the judicial response to this challenge has been attacked from both ends of the political spectrum, underscoring the Court's cautious juridical strategy of selective incorporation of traditional values into the basic structure of the Constitution, while retaining the essential principled thrust behind that framing vision.

The practice of selective incorporation is a staple of US constitutional jurisprudence and further illuminates the principle/value distinction, as well as the interpretive problem associated with its application. It arises in the Fourteenth Amendment context, specifically in connection with the decision about which of the rights included in the first ten amendments as protections against the national government were incorporated in the Due Process Clause as applicable to the states. For many years it had been an issue of jurisprudential concern for prominent jurists, notably Justice Benjamin Cardozo. In his most influential book, Cardozo wrote: ‘A constitution states or ought to state not rules for the passing hour, but principles for an expanding future’. Later in his most famous Supreme Court opinion, he concluded that only those liberties that were ‘of the very essence of a scheme of ordered liberty’ were to be guaranteed against state infringement by the Fourteenth Amendment.\(^{50}\) Thus a right such as trial by jury had ‘value and importance’, but its abolition would not, he believed, violate ‘a principle of justice so rooted in the traditions of our people as to be ranked as fundamental’.\(^{51}\) Unclear, however, from Cardozo’s discussion is whether we recognize something as a principle (p. 788) of justice because it has been so validated by tradition, or whether its independent standing as a fundamental component of a scheme of ordered liberty means that it must therefore have been entwined in the habits of the people.

‘Due process traditionalism’—the idea that ‘long-standing cultural understandings are both necessary and sufficient for the substantive protection of rights’\(^ {52}\)—bears directly on the principal concern of this chapter. Thus when courts affirm or reject the existence of rights on the basis of their appearance or absence as protected interests in the dominant tradition of a society, they are in effect declaring that constitutional recognition and legitimation are to be exclusively extended to claims whose normative standing is a function of their historic validation. Or as Justice John Marshall Harlan II wrote in the landmark case of Griswold v Connecticut, there should be a ‘continual insistence upon respect for the teachings of history [and] solid recognition of the basic values that underlie our society’.\(^ {53}\) But again, the absence of any guarantee that these values will be consistent with the truth of the normative claims that a judicially enforceable regime of rights might be expected to display is at the core of the interpretive dilemma. As Christopher Eisgruber has asked, ‘What should it matter whether a claimed constitutional right has solid foundations in traditions? Traditional practices may, after all, be exquisitely unjust.’\(^ {54}\)

The question may be more difficult to answer in places where the constitutional text is explicit in its invocation of value-laden traditional sources. In the United States, where a jurisprudence of ‘traditionalism’ is a purely judicial construction, the suggestion that ‘judges question traditions by the light of reason’\(^ {55}\) is surely a sensible and quite defensible approach to the problem of morally deficient values. If, for example, a question arises as to whether a particular configuration of the family warrants constitutional protection, a judge might fashion a response by assessing the ‘traditional family’ according to standards traceable to sources less rooted in historic practices.\(^ {56}\) On the other hand, a judge in Egypt might be more constrained in adopting such a course of action in light of his constitution’s specific reference to the family and ‘the values and traditions it embodies’. The options he faces might be further limited by theological considerations, which doubtless would be required once those constitutionally preferred values were subjected to exacting judicial scrutiny. Unlike his US counterpart, the judge would have a hard time declaring, as Justice Felix Frankfurter once did, ‘Local customs, however hardened by time, are not decreed in heaven ... ’.\(^ {57}\)

Of course the political reality that these and all judges confront is that heavenly prescribed values are, whatever one’s theological convictions (or lack thereof), ultimately rooted in the mores of a people.\(^ {58}\) It was William Graham Sumner, the nineteenth-century American (p. 789) sociologist, whose classic analysis of societal mores was well known in legal circles, and whose depiction illuminates the key distinction drawn in this chapter. ‘[T]he standards of good and right are in the mores. ... For the men of the time there are no “bad” mores. What is traditional and current is the standard of what ought to be.’\(^ {59}\) A more jurisprudential rendering can shape the judicial task to one of translating into law the prevailing standards of right conduct, irrespective of their agreement or disagreement with norms of right conduct derived from a more transcendent conception of justice. The latter may be understood to incorporate principles whose presence are necessary to certify the existence of constitutional government, while the former implicates those values that will either remain in persistent tension with these principles, or coexist with them in a reconciled state of constitutional equilibrium.

IV. Conclusion: Values, Principles, and the Debate Over Foreign Sources

 Constitutional globalization is surely one of the most significant developments of recent decades. One of its many consequences has been the increased attention directed to the variety of ways in which the practice of constitutionalism can be realized. This development in turn has spawned an accelerated effort by judges to use the enlarged resources of foreign law and jurisprudence to assist in the adjudication of domestic constitutional cases. Such assistance may lead to emulation, wherein a court in one country follows the example of another in how it addresses a similar constitutional issue, or it may culminate in a heuristic exercise in which the differences between the two settings serve simply to enhance understanding of the local circumstance through comparative scrutiny of relevant alternatives.
As constitutional borders have become more permeable to the entry of foreign legal ideas and precedents, controversy has arisen over the use of these materials. Although mainly a US phenomenon, the disagreement involves considerations that all judges must weigh as they calculate the costs and benefits of constitutional borrowing. Even in India, before the practice became fairly routine in that country's judicial experience, a justice warned:

The craze for American precedents can soon become a snare. A blind and uncritical adherence to American precedents must be avoided or else there will soon be a perverted Constitution operating in this land under the delusive garb of the Indian Constitution. We are interpreting and expounding our own Constitution.

All constitutional polities represent a blend of characteristics revealing what is particular to the constitutional culture as well as what are widely viewed as common attributes of a universal culture of constitutionalism. And so the Indian judge's concern was surely understandable, as is the question raised in connection with the judge most closely associated with the critique of transnational judicial activities: 'Scalia the judge roots himself in an America whose values (p. 790) he purports to be able to identify. If the job of the judge is to identify and then apply these distinctive values, why would it be relevant to study how other cultures approach similar questions?'

An answer to this question also connects with the main point of this chapter. That a presumption against the deployment of a comparative judicial methodology should resonate strongly in some places makes sense to the extent that the importation of foreign materials is also viewed as a threat to the integrity of the indigenous constitutional experiment. If a judge believes that the correct answer to a constitutional problem is entwined in the values and traditions of her society, and that these sources are expressive of what is unique and exceptional about her political community, she might properly reject inputs from an alien culture predicated on a contrasting value system. Even if such inputs could be justified by the possible benefits of dialogical engagement with another legal culture, the risks associated with the effort might well be thought prohibitive. But suppose it were the case that much of what contributed to a nation's exceptionalism was a constitutional commitment to principles whose validity was not tethered to the cultural and historical particularities of that nation? Would it not be prudent, which is to say just plain sensible, for a judge to consider the practices of other constitutional settings, if only to confirm that the norms held to be of transcendent significance were indeed manifest in the experiences of very different societies? And would it not then be instructive to learn of any contrasting perspectives and arrangements whose purpose was to achieve the realization of commonly held principles?

Returning, then, to the written constitutional texts with which we began, we might conclude that very little advantage is to be had from looking abroad to illuminate such nation-specific language as 'positive values based on cultural traditions', or 'the duty of assisting in the dissemination of the values of folk traditions and the work of artists'. Where, contrariwise, courts attempt to interpret and apply 'the principles of democracy' or 'the universally recognized principles and norms of international law', they are likely to benefit from, or at least not be undermined by, consideration of how others have addressed these aspirations in the various structural and interpretive choices that define their unique constitutional identities. Although the distinction between values and principles is not etched in bright lines—indeed the terms, as we have seen, are sometimes used interchangeably—the linkage of the former with the local environment and the latter with a more cosmopolitan milieu both explains and determines a good bit of cross-national jurisprudential behavior. If we imagine the grand antimony between the universal and the particular as providing the backdrop against which the many narratives of constitutionalism have been and are being played out, values and principles, in conjunction with political interests and ambitions, are the instruments that have powered, and will continue to power, the corresponding constitutional storylines.

Bibliography

Aharon Barak, The Judge In a Democracy (2006)
Alexander Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics (2nd edn, 1986)

Benjamin Cardozo, The Nature of the Judicial Process (1921)

Joseph Raz, ‘Legal Principles and the Limits of Law’ (1972) 81 Yale Law Journal 823

Notes:

(1) Tit II, Art 15.

(2) Tit II, s 59.

(3) Ch II, Art 9.

(4) Ch II, Art 51.

(5) Preamble.

(7) Ch VI, Art 101.

(8) Ch IV, s 75, para 19.

(9) Preamble.

(10) Ch III, Art 14.

(11) Preamble.

(12) Section 1, Art 2B.

(13) Ch 13, Art 135.

(14) On constitutional identity, see Chapter 35.

(15) Ch VI, Art 18B.

(16) Ch III, Art 77.

(17) Ch VI, Art 107.
(18) On the constitution and justice, see further Chapter 16.

(21) A less categorical rejection of principles has been articulated by the philosopher Joseph Raz, who allows that there be a comparative dimension to such an assessment.

Some of the reasons for preferring rules to principles in the direct regulation of human behavior have to do with the particular conditions of various countries. ... But at least one general reason for this preference is fairly obvious. Principles, because they prescribe highly unspecific acts, tend to be more vague and less certain than rules.

(23) Ibid 22.

(25) ‘Arguments of principle are arguments intended to establish an individual right; arguments of policy are arguments intended to establish a collective goal’, Dworkin (n 22), 90.

(26) Barak (n 19), 58.

Original understanding avoids the problem of generality ... by finding the level of generality that interpretation of the words, structure, and history of the Constitution fairly supports. This is a solution applicable to all constitutional provisions as to which historical evidence exists.

Robert Bork, The Tempting of America (1990), 150. There is an extensive literature that challenges such claims of neutrality that are used in support of the theory of originalism. See in particular, Mark Tushnet, ‘Following the Rules Laid Down: A Critique of Interpretivism and Neutral Principles’ (1983) 96 Harvard Law Review 781. Moreover, it is a theory that varies markedly from country to country in terms of its interpretive significance. As Jeffrey Goldsworthy points out, in places such as Canada and India, there is much less interest in the doctrine than one finds in the United States. Goldsworthy (n 28), 325.

(33) This point is explored at length in Gary Jeffrey Jacobsohn, Constitutional Identity (2010).

(34) The Southwest Case, 1 BVerfGE 14 (1951).

(35) Donald Kommers, ‘Germany: Balancing Rights and Duties’ in Goldsworthy (n 28), 203.
In the absence of a consensus, however, the achievement of ‘practical concordance’ may still be an important jurisprudential goal. As Gustavo Zagrebelsky has argued, [Constitutional principles] do not produce a unity statically realized, but a unity to be achieved dynamically. The requisite principles come into play through their combinatorial possibilities, and legal science is challenged to produce the ‘practical concordance’ of discordances.

The Constitution now contains an objective normative value system, which must permeate all aspects of the law. ... The courts are obliged to develop the law to bring it in conformity with [the Constitution’s value system].

Ibid 14.

Minerva Mills, Ltd v Union of India, AIR SC 1789 (1980), 1798.

Luth Case, 7 BVerfGE 198 (1958).

Kommers (n 35), 180.

Ibid. Kommers’ example for the US contrast is the right of marital privacy.

Zagrebelsky (n 36), 628. Zagrebelsky makes the distinction in order to denounce the deployment of values in constitutional jurisprudence: ‘he who parades values is often a cheat. The rule of values is: judge and act as seems congruous with regard to the goal you wish to reach. ... [V]alues cannot be traceable to reasons subject to rational controls.’ Ibid.

As Bernard Lewis has observed, ‘Westernization has posed grave problems of identity for a people who, after all, came from Asia, professed Islam, and belonged by old tradition to the Middle Eastern Islamic world, where, for many centuries, they had been unchallenged leaders.’ Bernard Lewis, The Emergence of Modern Turkey (3rd edn, 2002), xi.

See eg Prabhoo v Kunte, 1 SC 130 (1996), and SR Bommai v Union of India, 3 SC 1 (1994). For an extended discussion of these cases, see Gary Jeffrey Jacobsohn, The Wheel of Law: India’s Secularism in Comparative Constitutional Context (2003).

In an oft-quoted observation, Alexander Bickel claimed, ‘No good society can be un-principled; and no viable society can be principle-ridden’. Alexander Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics (2nd edn, 1986), 64. The lesson from this for Bickel was that the Supreme Court should avoid principled decisions when confronted by strong public opposition. In this connection, the ‘passive virtues’ are to be recommended. But another lesson might be that the too rigid enforcement of principle is ill-advised; and that rather than avoiding principles in fraught circumstances, courts should endeavor to lessen the severity of their implementation through prudent co-optation.

Benjamin Cardozo, The Nature of the Judicial Process (1921), 83.

Constitutional Values and Principles

(51) Ibid. What leads to this judgment is not clear. Thus in 1774 the Continental Congress declared, the first grand right is that of the people having a share in their own government by their representatives chosen by themselves, and in congruence, of being ruled by laws, which they themselves approve, not by edicts of man over whom they have no control. ... The next great right is that of trial by jury.

Continental Congress to the Inhabitants of Quebec, October 26, 1774 in Philip Kurland and Ralph Lerner (eds), The Founders’ Constitution (1987), 442.

(55) Sunstein (n 52), 119.

(56) What is more likely to occur is a ‘level of generality’ debate over exactly which version of the family is deeply rooted in the traditions of the country. See eg Moore v East Cleveland 431 US 494 (1977), and Michael H v Gerald D 491 US 110 (1989).

(57) Cooper v Aaron 358 US 1, 25 (1958).

(58) As Joseph Raz has pointed out, ‘In most countries one of the general principles restraining judicial discretion enjoins judges to act only on those values and opinions which have the support of some important segment of the population.’ Raz (n 21), 849. With respect specifically to the religious question, it has not gone unnoticed that throughout the world there has been a ‘tremendous increase of popular support for principles of theocratic governance’. Ran Hirschl, Constitutional Theocracy (2010), 2. The challenge this poses for judges beholden to both the values entrenched in popular mores and the principles of constitutional government is arguably one of the great challenges of the twenty-first century.

(60) One close observer has noted, ‘The migration of constitutional ideas across legal systems is rapidly emerging as one of the central features of contemporary constitutional practice.’ Sujit Choudhry, ‘Migration as a Metaphor in Comparative Constitutional Law’ in Sujit Choudhry (ed), The Migration of Constitutional Ideas (2006), 13. See also Chapter 64.

(61) Mahadeb Jiew v Dr Sen, AIR 1951 Cal. 563 (1951). Decades later Justice Antonin Scalia echoed this sentiment without, we must surmise, having been influenced by it. ‘We must never forget that it is a Constitution for the United States of America that we are expounding’. Thompson v Oklahoma 487 US 815, 868 n 4 (1988).

(64) As an example of the interchangeability of the terms, consider this observation by Justice Barak:

   In principle, judges should recognize only values that appear to be fundamental to the society in which they live and operate. The social consensus around fundamental values is usually what ought to guide judges with regard to both the introduction of new fundamental principles and the removal from the system of fundamental principles that have become discredited.

Barak (n 19), 61. The argument of this chapter is captured very well by Gustavo Zagrebelsky: ‘Much of the criticism directed at a “jurisprudence of values” should not be leveled against a “jurisprudence of principles”. But the fact that this happens can be explained by unwarranted confusion of the two.’ Zagrebelsky (n 36), 629.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Gary Jeffrey Jacobsohn</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Gary Jeffrey Jacobsohn is H. Malcolm MacDonald Professor of Constitutional and Comparative Law, Department of Government, University of Texas at Austin</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
This article shows several key instruments on how to ensure that a constitution's rights and rules are being respected and guaranteed effectively. It discusses constitutional courts versus parliamentary sovereignty; non-judicial methods and constitutional efficacy; and judicial review and constitutional efficacy. In guaranteeing the effectiveness of a constitution, important constitutional principles, such as the supremacy of parliament, may sometimes have to be limited. Furthermore, the effective application of constitutional norms can (or maybe even needs to) reduce the efficiency of political systems, especially in federal or supranational systems. All in all, there can be no general conclusion on which instruments are better suited to guard the constitution's efficacy. The result varies from country to country depending on many factors, such as political culture, the constitution's length and precision, or even contradictory rights and principles within a constitution, to name but a few.

Keywords: constitution, rights, rules, constitutional courts, parliamentary sovereignty, judicial review

I. Introduction 795
II. Constitutional Courts versus Parliamentary Sovereignty 796
   1. Evolution Towards Judicial Review 796
   2. The Alternative Model: Parliamentary Sovereignty 797

III. Non-Judicial Methods and Constitutional Efficacy 799
   1. Preparing Legislation 799
   2. Parliament as Guardian of the Constitution 800
      (a) On Supervision 800
      (b) On Lawmaking 801
      (c) Multilevel Governance and Subsidiarity 802
   3. Promulgation: The Head of State as Co-Guardian of the Constitution 803

IV. Judicial Review and Constitutional Efficacy 805
   1. Judicial Review ex ante 806
   2. Judicial Review ex post 807
      (a) Constitutional Courts 807
      i. Abstract Review 808
      ii. Disputes between State Organs 809
      iii. Concrete Review and Preliminary Reference 810
      iv. Constitutional Complaint 811
      (b) Decentralized Judicial Review 813
Ensuring Constitutional Efficacy

V. Conclusion 815

I. Introduction

A clear and general definition of ‘constitutional efficacy’s has not yet been established. On a general level the term can be understood to cover all the requirements for a constitution to work well once it has been set in place. More precisely, constitutional efficacy relates to the difference between the ‘written’ constitution and constitutional reality: the smaller this difference, the higher the degree of efficacy. Naturally, a constitution's effectiveness depends on its (p. 796) own writing and design. While a short and basic constitution might work for some countries, others might be in need of a much more detailed constitution; an interrelated factor is a constitution's rigidity or flexibility: a short constitution tends to leave more room for judicial adaptations, whereas cumbersome constitutional amendment procedures are needed to adapt the text of a detailed constitution to circumstances changing throughout a constitution's lifetime.

Generally, a constitution is designed to create a network of prevention and control mechanisms—checks and balances—throughout all levels of the exercise of state authority and thereby remove the application of constitutional principles, in particular civil liberties, from the arbitrary discretion of those in power. Constitutional efficacy describes and measures if these methods used to secure constitutional rights and rules are successful. In contrast constitutional efficiency usually describes how smoothly government is able to function.¹

In order to analyse how constitutional efficacy is ensured, this chapter will concentrate on identifying the different methods used in constitutions to safeguard the rights and rules enshrined. In the end it remains to be seen whether ‘the important roles of Congress and the courts to ... safeguard individual liberty’ are sufficient, or whether ‘we must rely on ... leadership and constitutional due diligence to ensure [that] the Constitution's promise is redeemed in a system of separated and shared powers.’²

II. Constitutional Courts versus Parliamentary Sovereignty

Installing a constitutional court as ‘guardian of the constitution’, with the principal task to watch over the adherence to the constitutional rules by all state authorities is a seemingly obvious mechanism to ensure the efficacy of a constitution.

1. Evolution Towards Judicial Review

However, what seems to be an obvious choice today was highly disputed during the last century’s inter-war period in Germany.³ Scholars of constitutional law such as Heinrich Triepel and Carl Schmitt held that there was a certain contradiction between the nature of a constitution and the nature of a constitutional judiciary.⁴ Constitutional disputes, they argued, were political disputes and not to be confounded with legal disputes. The more political a dispute, the less it was considered adequate to be resolved in court. The most outspoken opponent of this theory was Hans Kelsen who, on the basis of his practical experience in aiding in the design of the Austrian constitutional court in 1920, argued in favour of a constitutional court and the introduction of strictly legal solutions to constitutional conflicts.⁵

(p. 797) According to Kelsen's theory of the hierarchy of norms the constitution is the paramount norm providing a framework to determine the validity of all ordinary law inferior to it. Accordingly, there must be an institution to resolve whether the frame had been transgressed.⁶ Schmitt retorted that the consequence of judicial review would mean a loss of both legislature and judiciary as it would end up in a ‘juridification of politics’ and a ‘politicization of the judiciary’. The debate can even be dated back as early as 380 bc, when Plato generally regarded ‘democracy’ as a bad form of government and opted for the rule of intellectuals/philosophers instead.⁷ At the centre of Plato’s thoughts was the general distrust in the democratic power of the uneducated masses. Rule should be given to ‘wiser men’.

The set-up of the German Federal Constitutional Court, the Bundesverfassungsgericht, after the Second World War can be regarded as a late triumph of Kelsen over his opponents. The German Constitution endowed the Bundesverfassungsgericht with ample powers ranging from the control of laws, the resolution of conflicts between constitutional institutions, and especially the constitutional complaint (Verfassungsbeschwerde) by individuals claiming a violation of their constitutional rights by state authorities. Post-war Germany can therefore be regarded as an example of a political system with ample legal control of the constitutionality of political acts by a constitutional court acting as guardian of the constitution.8

In democratic societies where judicial review is centralized in a constitutional court, such centralization was often the consequence of an experience of totalitarianism, that is, the experience that the constitutional limits to political power were ineffective. This is true for the aforementioned case of Germany (the Bundesverfassungsgericht was established in 1951) and Italy (Corte costituzionale, 1956), but also for Spain (Tribunal Constitucional, 1980), Portugal (Tribunal Costitucional, 1983), and the Eastern European countries where constitutional courts were established in the 1990s.9 In comparison, countries with comparably long democratic traditions and no totalitarian experience tend to opt for systems with either little (the United Kingdom, the Netherlands) or a decentralized (the United States, the Nordic countries) control of the legislator;10

2. The Alternative Model: Parliamentary Sovereignty

Whereas in many European countries and democracies around the world, a constitutional court was introduced into the judicial system—in many cases in the second half of the twentieth century—there are countries, like the United Kingdom and the Netherlands which opted for the sovereignty of parliament and do without a constitutional court as explicit guardian of the constitution instead.11 They question the practice of judicial review and ‘whether the judicial safeguarding of those [constitutional] rights does not imply a failure of democratic institutions’.12

(p. 798) The United Kingdom is a good example of a country that, because of traditionally strong social conventions and a stable political system, has fared well with the dogma of the sovereignty of parliament, the corresponding limited judicial control of legislative acts, and no written constitution. Until 1998, courts were (and often still are) only competent to examine whether legal executive acts are compatible with parliamentary law. However, in 1998, the British system experienced a significant change when the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR) was transformed into national law via the Human Rights Act.13 Since then, courts can examine the conformity of primary legislation with the ECHR.14 This examination may lead to a declaration of incompatibility. Such a declaration has no immediate effect on the pending proceedings, but may result in fast-track legislation to rectify the incompatibility, even with retroactive effect.15

As social conventions become more fragile and diversification is on the rise in modern society, it will be interesting to assess whether the Human Rights Act was a first step towards a stronger judicial control of the legislature or whether the Westminster model will remain largely unchanged in the future.16 The newly created ‘Supreme Court of the United Kingdom’, as the direct successor to the judicial duties of the House of Lords, unifies several competencies under a single new roof.17 Whether this new court will try to expand its competences with regard to judicial review by way of a British Marbury v Madison,18 remains to be seen.19

In the Netherlands, the constitution itself explicitly states that judges shall not assess the constitutionality of laws (art 120 of the Grondwet).20 Here, judicial review is a complex issue and can only be exercised—if at all—indirectly. Although ‘judges have power to test all national laws against the supra-national standards of European Union Law’, they are prohibited from testing national laws ‘against the constitution, ... or [even] general principles’.21 The Netherlands therefore focuses on parliamentary sovereignty like no other written constitution in Europe. The provision was even upheld in all constitutional amendments, proving that the choice in favour of parliamentary sovereignty is still present today.22

A quite unique solution to the question of judicial review and parliamentary sovereignty can be found in the Canadian ‘notwithstanding clause’.23 This clause gives the elected legislature the power to overturn and nullify judicial review—at least in certain selected policy fields.24 These clauses are initially applicable for five years only, so that the people may have the possibility to then again overturn this decision through regular elections. By regarding judicial review as the ordinary procedure in securing the effective enforcement of constitutional rights, this solution tries to secure the constitution's fundamental rights, on the one hand, while on the other hand the notwithstanding clause allows for the protection of parliamentary sovereignty. By 2005 the provincial legislatures had invoked this provision 17 times, but it was never invoked on the federal level.25
III. Non-Judicial Methods and Constitutional Efficacy

Although judicial control has been established as a last resort in many countries to ensure the efficacy of those rules, there are also other procedures through which state actors either control themselves or others when exercising state powers.

1. Preparing Legislation

The legislative procedure itself provides for many opportunities and mechanisms contributing to the recognition of state powers or fundamental rights and freedoms. This helps to ensure constitutional efficacy in the early stages of the legislative procedure and allows for governmental self-control.

Self-control begins with consultations between ministries on governmental legislative proposals—there may even be specific divisions of government charged with ensuring compliance with the constitution. In Germany, for example, an advanced federal initiative to introduce a general ban on smoking in restaurants and bars came to a standstill because the federal ministry of the interior, responsible for constitutional questions, issued an opinion that the ban fell within the exclusive powers of the regional entities, the Länder.

Some countries have a specialized, more independent body to assist in the preparation of legislation in the form of a ‘Council of State’. These councils and their powers are often explicitly provided for in the respective constitution, as for example Article 160 of the Belgian Constitution provides for the Conseil d’État/Raad van State/Staatsrat, Article 76(2) and (3) of the Constitution of Luxembourg for the Conseil d’État, Articles 37 to 39 of the French Constitution provide for the Conseil d’État, Articles 100, 103, and 108 of the Italian Constitution for the Consiglio di Stato, Articles 73 and 75 of the Dutch Constitution for the Raad van State, or Article 107 of the Spanish Constitution for the Consejo de Estado.

While these bodies often exercise judicial functions, as in the case of the French Conseil d’État, their participation in legislation is not judicial in nature. They issue opinions on proposed legislation and in this context can examine their constitutionality. However, opinions are not binding, but only advisory. For example, France recently passed legislation banning the burqa, even though an opinion of the Conseil d’État declared such a ban unconstitutional. The example shows that such opinions contribute to public debate, but do not effectively sanction any possible infringement of constitutional rights. Nevertheless, they provide an extra system of checks with regard to ensuring constitutional rights.

2. Parliament as Guardian of the Constitution

A system of checks and balances is essential to a modern democracy. The theory of separation of powers assumes that parliament will make laws and supervise the executive. Both roles imply that parliament will aim to ensure the respect of the constitution and thereby contribute to constitutional efficacy. However, in parliamentary democracies, the executive branch is often intertwined with the legislative branch, since the executive is usually formed and elected by parliament’s majority and dependent on its continued confidence. This affects both roles of parliament. However, this situation can be different in political systems with traditions of minority governments. Here, issues of constitutionality may become important political arguments during legislative debates. Parliamentary independence from the executive is also much stronger in presidential systems like the United States or South American states, where the executive is decoupled from parliamentary confidence due to popular elections or in the complex system of the European Union, where the Commission balances the interests between the European Parliament and the member states, represented in the Council.

(a) On Supervision

In parliamentary democracies, rights of parliament to check and supervise the executive have to be regarded as ineffective tools of constitutional efficacy if they are tied to a regular majority requirement. The first option to strengthen parliamentary control rights therefore lies in the introduction of minority rights and providing for super-minority requirements only to initiate such control rights: control rights, like the right to initiate a parliamentary hearing or investigation, the right of interpellation and questioning members of the executive or—where applicable—the right to bring a legal-review case before the constitutional court. Although the ‘talking out’ of a bill (United Kingdom) or filibuster (United States) may be seen as a classic parliamentary minority right, it is usually not directed at ensuring the efficacy of constitutional provisions or rights, but to obstruct legislation and to pursue political objectives instead. It should therefore not be counted amongst parliamentary control rights.
Ensuring Constitutional Efficacy

(p. 801) The probably most frequently used minority right is the right of interpellation, the which may be used by each individual member of parliament. Other examples underline the importance of super minority requirements for minority rights to be effective. A parliamentary investigation by a special committee, for example, can be initiated by one-quarter of the German parliament and is therefore being used regularly, although not extensively (between 1949 and 2009 a total of 38 parliamentary investigations were launched).

In most other systems, however, a parliamentary investigation has to be set in motion by a regular majority, which significantly limits its practical application. In Denmark, for example, this led to the replacement of parliamentary investigation committees by judicial investigation committees composed of independent judges rather than members of parliament. Although such judicial committees also require a regular majority to be implemented, their composition with independent judges makes it easier for the majority parties to agree to such a committee.

(b) On Lawmaking

The strong relationship between the parliamentary majority and the executive is particularly evident in the field of legislation. Here, the executive often starts serving as the legislative branch. In Germany, for example, 57 per cent of all legislative proposals are made by the executive (success rate: 89 per cent), whereas only 35 per cent are from within the first chamber, the Bundestag (success rate: 34 per cent) and only 8 per cent come from within the second chamber, the Bundesrat (success rate: 27 per cent). From this perspective, it is unlikely that the parliamentary majority will exercise very strict constitutional scrutiny of legislative proposals.

The parliamentary minority can only assume a very limited role in such systems. One of the stronger minority rights with regard to the constitutionality of legislation is the option to initiate judicial review in a constitutional court. But such a review removes the assessment of constitutionality from parliament.

A means to strengthen the assessment of constitutionality in parliament is the creation of a specific body for this task. The Finnish Constitution, for example, provides for a special Constitutional Law Committee that is to be established within parliament (Art 35). This committee shall issue statements on the constitutionality of legislative proposals and other matters brought for its consideration, as well as on their relation to international human rights treaties (Art 74). Because of this advanced monitoring system for the constitutionality of legislation, no separate constitutional court was established, though this does not exclude judicial review by ordinary courts. It can be assumed that the specific constitutional mission of this committee can help to reduce the impact of party politics.

In parliamentary systems with two chambers it is possible that one of them is not dominated by the parliamentary majority of the chamber carrying the government. For example the German Bundestag represents regional governments, the members of the Austrian Bundesrat are elected by the regional parliaments, the first chamber of the Dutch parliament is composed of members elected by an assembly of all regional parliaments, and the composition of the UK House of Lords is only indirectly determined by political positions. Such chambers can be expected to exercise a more critical constitutional review of government proposals. However, the greater distance of such chambers from the electorate usually also implies a reduction of their influence on the legislative process.

An interesting example in this regard is the Constitution Committee of the House of Lords in the United Kingdom which examines bills for constitutional implications. As the Lords enjoy a certain independence from the political parties, this examination promises to be more impartial than a procedure controlled by a parliamentary majority. However, constitutional doubts of this Committee can be overridden by a regular majority in the House of Commons. Therefore, the impact of this assessment could be comparable to the role that the Councils of States play in other systems.

(c) Multilevel Governance and Subsidiarity

Multilevel governance, in particular federalism and supranationalism, is not necessarily limited to the composition of parliamentary chambers but can result in specific mechanisms to ensure the efficacy of constitutional rules on the distribution of powers between the different levels of government. The political dynamics of such systems pose the risk that levels encroach on each other. Usually, one can observe a trend towards centralization, in which the federal level acquires powers which were once exercised by the regional level, but in recent times there have been notable instances where regionalization reduced the powers of the central government.\textsuperscript{35}

The European Union is characterized by a trend towards centralization. To control this trend, the principle of subsidiarity\textsuperscript{36} was introduced by the Treaty of Maastricht in 1992.\textsuperscript{37} It states that ‘the Union shall act only if and in so far as the objectives of the proposed action cannot be sufficiently achieved by the Member States, ... but can rather, by reason of the scale or effects of the proposed action, be better achieved at Union level.’ Consequently the subsidiarity test consists of two steps: while the first one is to check whether the objectives of the proposed Union action cannot be sufficiently achieved by the member states, the second step requires an assessment of whether by reason of the scale or effects of the proposed action, these objectives can be better achieved at Union level. Both stages leave great room for interpretation, insofar as the assessment of the sufficiency of national measures and possible better achievement at Union level require value judgments.

It is not surprising that the mere statement of this principle did not create a demonstrable limitation of the EU’s activities. Therefore, the Treaty of Amsterdam of 1997 introduced a protocol with specific rules to ensure the principle’s observation.\textsuperscript{38} In particular, the Commission was required to analyse in detail, whether the principle of subsidiarity was respected and to document these findings transparently for every new bill proposed. The Commission should also hold wide consultations on legislative proposals. As such it is an interesting example of procedural requirements that aim to ensure the efficacy of a specific constitutional principle.

Nevertheless, member states and regions of the EU were still not satisfied with the efficacy of the principle of subsidiarity. The Treaty of Lisbon therefore strengthened once more the (p. 803) procedural safeguards of this principle.\textsuperscript{39} Now, the legislative proposals will be widely distributed and will be subject to consultation with the relevant stakeholders.\textsuperscript{40} National parliaments in particular are called upon to examine whether proposals comply with the principle of subsidiarity and, if necessary, they are supposed to raise objections. If a sufficient number of national parliaments object, the proposal needs to be reviewed.\textsuperscript{41} Additionally, the Lisbon Treaty also introduced the right of national parliaments to initiate judicial review of EU legislation with regard to the principle of subsidiarity.\textsuperscript{42}

This way, national parliaments can influence the legislative process of the EU. It is to be expected that the institutions, in particular the Commission, will carefully monitor the discussion of legislative projects in the member states and take objections more seriously. Of course, national parliaments can only expect an increase of influence in EU politics if they themselves sufficiently engage in this task. Interestingly, initial practical experiences show that national parliaments use this procedure not only if they have doubts with regard to the principle of subsidiarity\textsuperscript{43} but also if they consider that this principle is respected,\textsuperscript{44} simply to express their position on a legislative draft.\textsuperscript{45}

It remains to be seen whether this mechanism can alleviate the impression that the EU encroaches on national or regional powers.

3. Promulgation: The Head of State as Co-Guardian of the Constitution

Mechanisms of final examination and promulgation by the Head of State can also serve to promote constitutional efficacy. However, they can create tension with the principle of democracy and with the division of powers, especially in countries where the head of state is not elected, but hereditary instead.

Luxembourg and Belgium recently dealt with the latter issue. Article 34 of the Constitution of Luxembourg provided that the Grand Duke approves and enacts the laws adopted by Parliament. When a law on euthanasia\textsuperscript{46} was being debated, the Grand Duke indicated that for reasons of conscience he would not be able to promulgate the law if it was to be adopted. As a consequence, and to guarantee the political neutrality (‘irresponsabilité politique’) of the monarch, the Constitution was amended and the role of the head of state was limited to the simple enactment of laws without any mention of approval.\textsuperscript{47} Luxembourg is therefore now in line with other states, like Israel, Japan, or Spain.

A similar situation with a different solution occurred 1990 in Belgium, where a bill on abortion was passed against the objections of the Head of State, King Baldouin I. Article 93 of the Belgian Constitution provides that Parliament can declare that the King is unfit to rule. It was in all likelihood intended to deal with questions of royal succession due to physical or mental inability to rule, and resembles rudimentarily the Twenty-Fifth Amendment of the US Constitution. Parliament used this provision to declare the King unfit to rule for one day, on which the law was passed. The King was then reinstated. In this case, constitutional efficacy is at risk, since the provision was misused to circumvent the ordinary promulgation procedure.

In parliamentary democracies, where the head of state is directly or indirectly elected, such concerns are less pronounced than in parliamentary or constitutional monarchies. In this case the office enjoys democratic legitimacy. Nevertheless, even in such cases the power to examine the constitutionality can be disputed. Article 82 of the German Basic Law, for example, provides that the German president shall certify and promulgate laws enacted in accordance with the provisions of the Basic Law. While there is broad agreement that the president has to examine whether the procedural requirements of the constitution have been respected, there is some dispute with regard to a substantial examination. In 1960 the German President for the first time refused to sign a bill because of substantial reasons. In 1991 and 2006 bills on airline security respectively and in 2006 on consumer rights were not signed into law because of substantial constitutional concerns. Some believe that the substantial examination of legislation is primarily the domain of the constitutional court; others consider the lesser democratic legitimacy of the indirectly elected president in comparison with parliament. However, the German Federal Constitutional Court assumes that it is part of the responsibility of the president to assess the constitutionality of legislation before it is certified and promulgated.

Other systems are more reluctant with regard to the examination of constitutionality by the head of state. Though the Austrian President enjoys the same rights and power on promulgation as the German President, but a much higher democratic legitimacy due to his popular election, he has only refused to sign a bill into law once, where he saw the principle of ‘ex post facto law’ violated. An even weaker form of promulgation and veto power is the one used in Italy or Latvia, where a president's veto leads to the law being sent back to parliament but without any special majority requirements to override the veto. This solution is far more flexible, as it depends—even more so than in the German case—on the head of state’s moral authority.

A variation of the presidential veto on constitutional grounds is the referral of a bill to the constitutional court. Here, the role as constitutional co-guardian is dependent on another state actor. This is the case in Ireland, where the head of state can refuse to sign a bill into law, but has to consult with a specially designed Council of State (Comhairle Stáit) before doing so. A refusal to sign automatically leads to the case being brought before the Supreme Court. In France, Estonia, or Portugal the president can—but is not obliged to—request a ruling of the constitutional court on the constitutionality of a bill that is submitted for signature.

A presidential system in which the head of state is by definition also the head of government—as for example in the United States or almost every Central and South American country—usually has more politicized veto powers. Here, a president's refusal to sign a bill into law is much more part of the system of checks and balances than that of a constitutional guard. While such strong veto powers do not exclude an assessment of the constitutionality of legislation it may be that political considerations become more important if legislation concerns presidential policy. Still, even in a presidential system the president's veto is almost never absolute, but may be overridden by a qualified majority of Congress. This is another way of the constitution trying to establish equilibrium between parliamentary sovereignty and constitutional review.

IV. Judicial Review and Constitutional Efficacy

Judicial review is a strong instrument to ensure constitutional efficacy. The separation of powers as such is already considered to promote respect for the constitution and in particular of fundamental liberties. Nevertheless, judicial intervention can help to protect human and minority rights from majoritarian zeal. This judicial intervention—or judicial review to be more precise—can be exercised a priori (ex ante) or a posteriori (ex post). It can further be categorized as concrete and abstract. Concrete judicial review will be applied with regard to actual legal cases that raise constitutional questions in the context of ordinary litigation. In contrast, abstract review typically entails specific procedures in a constitutional court. Usually, such litigation can only be initiated by privileged actors, for example parliamentary minorities or regions in federal systems.
Ensuring Constitutional Efficacy

Although judicial review, as a method to guard individual rights enshrined in the constitution, has without a doubt many advantages when it comes to effectively guaranteeing those rights, it also has certain disadvantages. It may encourage parliamentary minorities to try to implement their political choices as ‘constitutional rules’ with the help of a dynamic constitutional court. The idea of a politicization of the court was also the origin of Roosevelt’s 'court packing plan'—a proposal aiming to influence the US Supreme Court by the appointment of additional judges. Such appointments could have undermined the authority of the court and could have provoked a constitutional crisis.

Nevertheless, judicial review can surely be counted as being one of the most important, if not the most important, instruments in ensuring a constitution’s efficacy. Aside from the (p. 806) actual exercise of judicial review, the mere existence of such an instrument also has an anticipatory effect, insofar as the actors in the political process try to anticipate the possible outcome of judicial review and take those findings into account when drafting (and applying) legislation.

Of course, judicial review can only function effectively in a system with true separation of powers and, in particular, an independent judiciary. Interrelated are the procedures of selection and nomination of judges, which are of significant importance. Constitutional judges must unquestionably be excellent lawyers. But in addition to this requirement, constitutional judges must have a certain political sensitivity and sense of responsibility. After all, the efficacy of constitutional justice depends on its acceptance by the people as well as by the other branches of government. Such acceptance is a matter of the legal culture of a country, but also of the way in which constitutional justices exercise their responsibilities.

1. Judicial Review ex ante

Ex ante judicial review (or ‘preventive norm control’) is abstract in nature. The legislation in question is not tested with regard to a specific case or situation but in a very general manner. The assessment is similar to the assessments undertaken during the preparation and adoption of legislation. However, the result is not a mere opinion but a binding judgment.

Where present, judicial review ex ante is typically reserved for a very narrow group of privileged applicants. It has already been mentioned that in some systems presidents can refer draft legislation to a constitutional court for assessment before promulgation. In some countries, this right is also given to other state powers such as the government, the president of a parliamentary chamber, or even a certain number of members of parliament. The restricted access to this type of review indicates that it may have been created as a strengthened version of advisory opinions on legislation, as they are delivered by many councils of state.

Ex ante review may also result in reduced scrutiny in comparison with ex post review. For practical reasons, such an examination is often dealt with in a fast-track procedure. Article 61(3) of the French Constitution, for example, requires a decision within one month; a time limit which can even be reduced to eight days. In such a short time, the assessment can only be superficial. Moreover, at the time of an ex ante review, the practical effects of the legislation at issue are still unknown. The review may be based on excessive fears or may ignore significant problems that only become visible when law meets reality.

On the level of legal theory, ex ante review—even if it is binding—can also be understood as respecting the supremacy of parliamentary law: review is not applied to already binding law but to a draft only. The authority of parliament does not suffer from a ruling of unconstitutionality. From this perspective it is logical to provide for ex ante review of legislative bills but not for ex post review, as was the case in France before the Constitution was substantially amended in 2008.

Ex ante judicial review can contribute significantly to constitutional efficacy, mainly because it is able to stop unconstitutional legislation before any infringement can occur. However, ex ante review can also be considered a problem for the democratic political process as it intervenes at a very early stage. Many countries do not opt for the method of preventive norm control, because the danger of the courts becoming too involved in the day-to-day political debate is too great. It raises concerns with regards to the constitutional separation of powers.

Another, less controversial, case of ex ante review is applied when assessing the constitutionality of international agreements; before such an agreement is signed and/or ratified, certain specific state organs can request that a court assess its conformity with the constitution. As such agreements can only be accepted or refused in their entirety in the course of ratification and since parliament usually has no direct influence on negotiations, this review is less problematic with regard to democratic legitimacy. But while this procedure is known in the European Union—Austria, Bulgaria, the Czech Republic, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Romania, Slovakia, and Spain—this form of ex ante review is exactly the one which the US Supreme Court refused to exercise in one of its early decisions when George Washington requested such an opinion of the Supreme Court.

2. Judicial Review ex post

Ex post review is the more typical version of judicial review. It is the essential nature of courts to assess the legality of measures after they have been taken. Systematic difficulties arise, if they are called to assess the legality of the law itself. After all, according to the separation of powers, courts are still bound by law. Therefore, any review of legislation seems to be excluded. One solution to this conundrum is the creation of specific constitutional courts which are only bound by the constitution. Another option lies in the hierarchy of legal acts: if ordinary legislation is subordinate to the constitution and courts are to apply the constitution like any other law, it is logical that they assess the validity of ordinary legislation in light of the constitution. This approach results in a decentralized version of judicial review of constitutionality.

(a) Constitutional Courts

Many countries have now explicitly opted in favour of judicial review exercised by a constitutional court. It is safe to assume that the formal existence of a centralized constitutional court tends to at least increase the degree of judicial review. The more a constitutional court deals with legal review cases, the likelier it is for the legislature to try to anticipate any constitutional hurdles before a bill becomes law. Furthermore, judicial review can also lead to political deadlock or can be used as leverage by the opposition. This is why a high degree of judicial review tends to correlate with a consensus democracy, while a lesser degree or the absence of judicial review tends to correlate with a majority system.

The typical form of judicial review in countries with centralized legal review in form of a constitutional court is the ex post control of compatibility of primary legislation with the constitution. The three main approaches to constitutional review are the abstract review, the concrete review, and, in some countries, the individual constitutional complaint. The extent of judicial review mainly depends on two dimensions: the institutions/persons able to initiate such judicial review procedure and the degree of judicial self-restraint.

(p. 808) i. Abstract Review

The procedure of judicial review is abstract in cases where political institutions question the constitutionality of a given law and ask the constitutional court to assess its conformity with the constitution without the need of any actual case or specific infringement being present. In abstract review cases, the condition that a plaintiff is directly and individually concerned, does not apply. Abstract review can be exercised both ex ante (see above) and ex post. Abstract review exercised ex post has an important political dimension. In Germany it is common that the parliamentary opposition challenges important legislation before the Federal Constitutional Court and thus tries to stop political choices on legal (constitutional) grounds. Examples are abortion (1975 and 1993), the budget (2007), or genetically modified crops (2010).

The more a constitution allows political actors (especially the opposition) to launch a judicial review procedure, or the easier the modalities, the more judicial review can be exercised by a constitutional court. This is where either political culture and/or the degree of judicial self-restraint come into play. On the one hand, if hurdles to launch a judicial review procedure are low (ie the number of members of parliament to launch such a procedure), political actors can make use of their right more often. For example, in Germany and Austria, the federal government, governments of the Länder, one-quarter (Germany) or one-third (Austria) of the members of the federal parliament—and in Austria additionally also one-third of the members of a regional parliament—can question the constitutionality of a law, in Belgium this is determined by law and therefore open to amendment, and in Spain the President of the Government, the ‘Defender of the People’, 50 members of parliament, 50 Senators, the executive body of a Self-governing Community and, where applicable, its Assembly can question a law's
Ensuring Constitutional Efficacy

But constitutional efficacy is not only dependent on the actors able to initiate the procedure. Another form of political (judicial) culture may be even more important: the degree of judicial self-restraint. The question of the constitutionality of abortion serves as an example, where the German Federal Constitutional Court twice annulled legislative attempts at liberalization, while the Austrian constitutional court allowed such a law. In the United States, the situation was reversed when an active Supreme Court annulled legislation prohibiting abortion in Roe v Wade. Although the extent of judicial self-restraint or activism can be difficult to determine, the matter is highly topical in terms of effectively guaranteeing constitutional rights.

(p. 809) In the US model of decentralized judicial review, abstract review can also be exercised by means of a ‘facial challenge’ especially when dealing with First Amendment issues. In such cases, the plaintiff files a motion on the grounds that a law would injure him/her in some significant way. Such motions are filed immediately after a law is adopted but before it is applied. Even more than abstract review, facial challenges are ‘the most difficult challenge to mount successfully’.

ii. Disputes between State Organs

The procedure on disputes between state organs differs from abstract review cases insofar as it is not primarily the content of legislation which is concerned, but questions of state powers. Often, principles of state organization are at stake, and sometimes the procedure is also being politically (mis)used to question the procedural legality of an unfavourable law.

In the European Union, these questions probably arise more often than elsewhere. Here, Article 263 TFEU provides that the European Court of Justice (ECJ) ‘have jurisdiction in actions brought … on grounds of lack of competence, infringement of an essential procedural requirement, … or misuse of powers.’ With regard to legislation, such actions can only be initiated by EU institutions or member states. In such cases, questions often concentrate on the specific type of legislative procedure which should be used (co-decision procedure, consultation procedure, consent procedure, or Council and Commission acting alone), but also on whether the Union was competent to act at all. Examples in the EU can be found in the cases on tobacco advertisement (2000 and 2006), on the legal protection of biotechnological inventions (2001), on the working time of road transport workers (2004), or on data retention (2006).

In Germany, the Federal Constitutional Court also deals with competence questions (Organstreitverfahren), between different branches of government. This type of procedure can also be found in parliamentary systems as a minority right, since it is ordinarily used by the parliamentary opposition. Examples in Germany are the dissolution of the Bundestag in 1983 or 2005, on participation rights of the Bundestag in military out-of-area deployment cases, the stationing of nuclear weapons, or on parliamentary budget control of the intelligence services.

Though formally concerned with state powers in some of these cases, the actual question concerns the policy issue underneath. Therefore, it could be argued that this type of procedure is in a narrow sense ineffective, because it is being used as an instrument to secure parliamentary opposition rights instead of issues of state powers. In a wider sense, this judicial method on issues of state powers is effective, when speaking of parliamentary opposition rights and legislative control rights. Other countries like Bulgaria, Italy, Spain, or Switzerland also have judicial control on questions of state powers, each with their own degree of politicized usage.

Because this judicial procedure can lead to political abuse, some countries such as the United States, France, the United Kingdom or Malta explicitly opted against such a procedure. Here, constitutional competence conflicts are settled by other means—be it by public debate and/or by one or several of the non-judicial methods described above. That these measures may not always suffice can be witnessed in US security policy where, officially, war may only be declared by Congress. However, in over 125 instances, military intervention was ordered by the President without such a formal declaration, leading—after the undeclared Vietnam War ended—to the ‘War Powers Resolution’ of 1973. Although this complex legal question on the constitutional powers of the President and Congress cannot be discussed in detail here, the example shows that some countries try—some more effectively than others—to insure constitutional efficacy in competence questions by non-judicial ways and means.
iii. Concrete Review and Preliminary Reference

Although there are different ways to conduct concrete constitutional review, it can only be exercised ex post since it results from the application of constitutional law to a specific case. In systems with a decentralized constitutional review, ordinary courts will apply constitutional law to their case and—if necessary—invalidate ordinary legislation that is in conflict with the constitution. If constitutional review is centralized, issues of constitutional law can be brought before the constitutional court by way of a concrete review procedure and preliminary references (and in some cases even directly by way of a constitutional complaint, which will be dealt with later on). Taken together, these are probably the most commonly applied forms of constitutional review.\(^\text{105}\)

Decentralized review guarantees that all aspects of a case are dealt with by the same court: it will assess the issues of ordinary law and—if necessary—correct the results in view of constitutional law. This may require the interpretation of ordinary law in conformity with the constitution or even the annulment of specific norms of ordinary law. A system of appeals can then be used to ensure the coherence of the legal system.

Concrete review in systems of centralized review typically results in a division between issues of ordinary law and issues of constitutional law related to any given case. Ordinary courts will only apply ordinary law although they may be required to take constitutional law into account.\(^\text{106}\) If irreconcilable conflicts with constitutional law become apparent, it should be possible to refer the issue to the constitutional court, which can clarify the interpretation of the constitution and invalidate ordinary laws which do not comply with the constitution. However, to resolve the issue once and for all, the case usually needs to be sent back to the referring court. Although the preliminary reference procedure of the ECJ\(^\text{107}\) is not the same as the procedure of concrete review, it is somewhat comparable—especially when analysing it with regard to its contribution to constitutional efficacy. Preliminary references to the ECJ can be made about ordinary legislation (how to interpret regulations and directives), which should obviously not be encompassed when analysing constitutional efficacy. But the procedure can also be applied to the Treaties themselves and therefore to assess the European ‘constitutionality’ of European legislation,\(^\text{108}\) or—in cooperation with the referring national courts—the ‘constitutionality’ of national legislation.

The practical effect of these types of concrete review depends on the attitudes of the courts involved. If ordinary courts accept the powers and position of the constitutional court (the ECJ) over their cases they will be inclined to refer cases. It may be particularly attractive for lower courts to refer a case to the constitutional court directly in order to circumvent the jurisprudence of other or higher courts. This has been noted in particular with regard to the preliminary references to the ECJ.\(^\text{109}\) To avoid this questionable phenomenon of circumventing the ordinary court system, the latest French constitutional reform does not provide for a direct reference to the constitutional court but requires that lower courts first address the respective supreme court of their hierarchy, the Cour de Cassation or the Conseil d’État, which then decide whether the question will be referred to the constitutional court.\(^\text{110}\)

Another determining factor is whether the constitutional court is open or restrictive in accepting references for concrete review. On the one hand, the German Federal Constitutional Court, for example, sets very high standards for the admissibility of such references. A court may only make a reference if it is convinced that the norm in question is unconstitutional. This position must be exhaustively reasoned on the basis of existing jurisprudence and doctrine, taking all possible interpretations into account. Moreover, it must be convincingly shown that the reference is necessary to decide the case.\(^\text{111}\) The ECJ, on the other hand, is much more open to preliminary references. Here, the only requirements are that the question is comprehensible and not obviously hypothetical.\(^\text{112}\) This position is based on the idea that individuals contribute to the enforcement of EU law in the member states if they seek judicial protection of their rights resulting from the Treaties.\(^\text{113}\)

Another factor which is purely practical, but no less important, may be the actual workload of the constitutional court. A system of preliminary references has a higher chance of reaching acceptance, if a decision is handed down within a reasonable time frame.

iv. Constitutional Complaint

The constitutional complaint can be an alternative or an addition to the system of preliminary references. The EU and some countries, such as France, do not provide for such a procedure, but many other countries, like the Czech and Slovak Republics, Germany, Poland, Spain, \(^\text{(p. 812)}\) Mexico, or many other Latin American countries provide for the possibility for any natural or judicial person to bring a case directly before the constitutional court.
Ensuring Constitutional Efficacy

by means of a constitutional complaint or ‘writ of amparo’. In Slovenia, this constitutional complaint can only be initiated via a specially designated ombudsman. Moreover, all member states of the Council of Europe fall under the jurisdiction of the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg. Therefore, they are subject to complaints alleging the infringement of the ECHR.

A common characteristic of a constitutional complaint is the exhaustion of ordinary or—in the case of the Strasbourg Court—domestic remedies, meaning that all other judicial appeals need to be exhausted before a constitutional complaint is admissible. This guarantees the best possible assessment of the whole case by the ordinary courts, including appreciation of the necessity of a reference to the constitutional court where such a reference is possible. However, in contrast to the reference, the constitutional complaint avoids all external filters. Therefore, the constitutional complaint bears an even greater risk than the preliminary reference procedure that the constitutional court is flooded with cases.

An overloaded constitutional court is a problem with regard to constitutional efficacy, a problem best summarized by the maxim ‘justice delayed is justice denied’. Only an efficient court is able to guarantee individual rights within a reasonable time (cf Article 6 of the ECHR): judicial efficiency therefore leads to constitutional efficacy. If a constitutional court is flooded with cases, constitutional rights cannot be guaranteed for all citizens in time, simply due to a lack of human resources and time available. The European Court of Human Rights, for example, has a backlog of over 151,600 cases. To overcome this backlog, Protocol No 14 recently amended the ECHR, providing for judgments by a single judge and reducing in general the requirements for the number of judges necessary to decide a case. The German Federal Constitutional Court tries to handle the massive number of applications by deciding most cases in chambers of only three judges, rejecting many complaints without providing any reasoning and sometimes issuing fees for an abuse of the procedure.

In contrast, the US Supreme Court enjoys broad discretion which cases it chooses to hear. This ‘writ of certiorari’ was established in 1891 with the Evarts Act; after the Court became clogged with pro forma appeals, such an approach can be justified in a system of decentralized constitutional review, where at least the lower courts can ensure that the constitution is respected. In centralized systems, discretionary review bears the risk that in some cases the infringement of constitutional rights is not subject to sufficient judicial review. Therefore, a very difficult balance has to be struck between judicial efficiency and judicial efficacy in order to guarantee constitutional efficacy in the end.

In spite of these practical problems, concrete judicial review is generally perceived as one of the most effective instruments in securing individual rights of the constitution. Countless rulings in many countries by constitutional courts have already struck down legislation or administrative acts because of their unconstitutionality.

A possible downside of ensuring constitutional rights in this way is the increased role which constitutional review plays in the political process—judicial activism. As constitutions often cannot be amended easily, some argue that the judicialization of the political process reduces parliamentary and public debate which may very well lead to political deadlock. If the constitutional court gets involved in cases where it ‘should’ exercise judicial self-restraint; the ineffectiveness of constitutional provisions on state powers and the separation of powers may be the result and the judiciary might be perceived as a de facto legislative body.

(b) Decentralized Judicial Review

As already mentioned, some countries did not opt for centralized constitutional review of legislation by a constitutional court but have ‘decentralized’ this task. In such a decentralized system, there is no single institution charged with the task of controlling the constitutionality of legislation. Instead the task is conferred on all courts of the country’s legal system. This model is often referred to as the ‘American’ model, whilst the centralized model is referred to as the ‘European’ model. Nevertheless, the ‘American’ model is certainly not limited to the United States, but is also in use in the Nordic countries, and to a certain extent also in Greece. Further examples are Argentina, Australia, Canada, India, and Japan, as well as Mexico. Even in continental Europe, the introduction of the ‘American’ model had been considered by some countries, in particular in France, Germany, and Italy during the inter-war period.

It is a specific characteristic of many decentralized systems that it was not the constitution but the judicial system itself that introduced judicial review of legislation. Following the famous US Supreme Court decision Marbury v
Madison of 1803\textsuperscript{128} similar rulings of the respective supreme courts were issued in Norway and Denmark in the nineteenth and the beginning of the twentieth century. The Swedish Reichsgericht gave its blessing to the judicial review of legislation in 1964.\textsuperscript{129} Whereas to this day there is no explicit constitutional backing for the judicial review of legislation in the United States, the Finnish (s 106) and Swedish (Ch 11, s 14) Constitutions explicitly state the right of courts to control the constitutionality of legislation—a competence which is in practice only rarely applied.\textsuperscript{130}

Where the judicial system imposed itself as guardian of the constitution, a paradox regarding constitutional efficacy appears: on the one hand, the constitution did not explicitly opt for judicial review by the supreme court or any court at all. To declare oneself competent as guardian of the constitution in order to ensure its efficacy can undermine constitutional efficacy (p. 814) with regard to the distribution of powers. After all, the founding fathers might have had other methods, or no method at all (meaning parliamentary sovereignty), in mind to ensure the constitution’s effectiveness. On the other hand, if the constitution is regarded as binding law, it is logical to turn to the courts for its protection. Moreover, other considerations, such as the degree of judicial activism or judicial self-restraint should also be taken into account.\textsuperscript{131} If de jure self-created competencies are de facto not being used, the constitution’s allocation of competencies is being abided by and constitutional efficacy therefore ensured from a competence perspective.

The differences between the two concepts of centralized and decentralized judicial review reflect different understandings of the separation of powers.\textsuperscript{132} While legislative action can be assessed from a rather abstract point of view in a centralized system, decentralized judicial review takes a more direct approach because it can only start from specific disputes.\textsuperscript{133} For example, Article III, section 2 of the US Constitution restricts jurisdiction of federal courts to ‘cases or controversies’. Accordingly, it has been decided that there can be no abstract judicial review.\textsuperscript{134} However, as long as there is a specific case, judges are called upon to control the constitutionality of legislation. In Marbury v Madison, the US Supreme Court held that ‘a law repugnant to the Constitution is void’ and that, in consequence, courts must disregard the specific law and decide the case only on the basis of the superior constitutional principles.\textsuperscript{135}

Another major difference between centralized and decentralized review lies in the binding force of the respective decisions. While centralized judicial review conducted by a constitutional court anchored in the constitution has a universal (\textit{erga omnes}) binding effect and can thus declare a law to be unconstitutional with respect to all possible cases,\textsuperscript{136} the question whether a ‘decentralized’ decision has the same binding force, is not as evident. A priori, such a decision has a binding force upon the parties involved in the specific case.\textsuperscript{137} However, the outcome of a decentralized review decision by one of many lower courts cannot automatically have the same binding effect as a decision of a constitutional court. Consequently, the \textit{erga omnes} effect of decentralized constitutional review is a difficult question as is exemplified by the US system. The judgment of lower courts develops a binding force insofar as they create precedents which may be relied upon for the resolution of similar questions in other cases. Nevertheless, in general, only judgments by the US Supreme Court have been treated as authoritative and binding for everyone.

Furthermore, in cases in which constitutional rights are at stake, and are resolved without the supreme court, the question of differing rulings in similar cases arises. Greece, which also favours a decentralized model, solved this problem by allowing appeals to the highest court of each respective branch. If different constitutional interpretations arise, an ad hoc constitutional court is formed to resolve the dispute.\textsuperscript{138} \textit{(p. 815)} As a consequence of these considerations, the decentralized judicial model can be regarded as somewhat of an in-between solution between parliamentary sovereignty and a centralized constitutional court. In general, the legislature is being trusted and only if and when constitutional rights of an individual are concerned, is the judiciary allowed to intervene.\textsuperscript{139} This concept excludes, in particular, the abstract review of legislation and can also limit the scope for disputes between state organs.

V. Conclusion

This chapter has shown several key instruments on how to ensure that a constitution’s rights and rules are being respected and guaranteed effectively. In guaranteeing the effectiveness of a constitution, important constitutional principles, such as the supremacy of parliament, may sometimes have to be limited. Furthermore, the effective
Ensuring Constitutional Efficacy

Application of constitutional norms can (or maybe even needs to) reduce the efficiency of political systems, especially in federal or supranational systems. All in all, there can be no general conclusion on which instruments are better suited to guard the constitution's efficacy. The result varies from country to country depending on many factors, such as political culture, the constitution's length and precision, or even contradictory rights and principles within a constitution, to name but a few.

However, if we believe that constitutions matter, at least some of the instruments to ensure the constitution's efficacy are necessary. They are safeguards of these fundamental rights, rules, and principles. In detracting their alteration from the usual legal process and imposing super-majorities on possible amendments, the constitution provides a solid rock of and for a society and country, fundamentals all citizens can rely on and immune from the opportunistic daily life of politics.

Bibliography

Dan Diner and Michael Stolleis (eds), Hans Kelsen and Carl Schmitt—A Juxtaposition (1999)

Notes:

(2) Scott Matheson, Presidential Constitutionalism in Perilous Times (2009), 2.

(3) Arguing against judicial review in the United States and in favour of ‘populist constitutional law’ see the politicized contribution by Mark Tushnet, Taking the Constitution Away from the Courts (1999).

(5) The debate is recounted in detail in ibid 187ff.

Ensuring Constitutional Efficacy

constitutional court in 1986.

(11) On parliamentarism, see Chapter 30.

(12) Thomas Lundmark, Power and Rights in US Constitutional Law (2nd edn, 2008), 7; see also Grimm (n 6), 103–20.

(13) 1998, c 42.

(14) For a detailed analysis see Aileen Kavanagh, Constitutional Review under the UK Human Rights Act (200c9).

(15) Bernd Wieser, Vergleichendes Verfassungsrecht (2005), 120ff; for a detailed overview of policy changes in response to litigation see ‘Review of the implementation of the Human Rights Act’ of 25 July 2006, 22, available at (http://www.conorgearty.co.uk/pdfs/HRAfull_review.pdf), and for an appreciation by the ECtHR, Burden v United Kingdom, App no 13378/05, 2008 (Grand Chamber), paras 21–4 and 40–4.

(17) eg devolution issues (questions on the legal competences of the devolved legislative and executive authorities in Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland and, in some cases, the executive authorities in England, formerly exercised by the Privy Council).

(18) 5 US 137 (1803).

(22) Adams and van der Schyff (n 20), 403.

(23) The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s 33, reads:

(1) Parliament or the legislature of a province may expressly declare in an Act of Parliament or of the legislature, as the case may be, that the Act or a provision thereof shall operate notwithstanding a provision included in section 2 [fundamental freedoms] or sections 7 to 15 [legal rights and equality rights].

(2) An Act or a provision of an Act in respect of which a declaration made under this section is in effect shall have such operation as it would have but for the provision of this Charter referred to in the declaration.

(3) A declaration made under subsection (1) shall cease to have effect five years after it comes into force or on such earlier date as may be specified in the declaration....

(24) Ibid.

(27) This dual function can call the impartiality of the judicial branch of the Council of State into question, see ECtHR, Procola v Luxembourg, 1995-A362, para 45.

(29) Also used eg in France by means of excessively amending legislation.

(31) German Basic Law, Art 44(1), Art 226 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU) provides a similar threshold to initiate an investigation by the European Parliament.

(33) Beckedorf (n 30), 177.

(35) Belgium, Spain, the United Kingdom, and Italy come to mind though huge differences in the degree of decentralization can be observed.

(36) Article 5(3) of the Treaty on European Union (TEU) (ex Art 5 EC Treaty).

(40) Ibid Art 2; see also Art 11(1)–(3) TEU.

(41) Ibid Arts 6 and 7.

(42) Ibid Art 8.

(44) eg Council Docs 15057/10 and 15665/10.

(45) eg Council Docs 15683/10 and 16340/10.

(46) Mémorial A—No 46 of 16 March 2009, 615.

(47) Mémorial A—No 43 of 12 March 2009, 586.

(48) ‘Should the King find himself unable to reign, the ministers, having observed this inability, immediately summon the Chambers. Regency and guardianship are to be provided by the united Chambers.’

(49) Section 3 of Amendment 25 provides that when the President transmits a written declaration to the Heads of the Senate and the House, stating that he is unable to discharge the office of the Presidency, and until he sends another written declaration declaring himself able to resume his office, the Vice President serves as Acting President. Section 4, which has never yet been invoked, provides the modalities on how the Vice-President and Cabinet can declare the President unfit to discharge his duties. The latter provision resembles the Belgian solution much more than section 3.

(51) eg in 1951 or 1976, when legislation was submitted to the President without the necessary consent of the second chamber, the Bundesrat, or in 1969 and 1970, where the President concluded that the federal level was not constitutionally competent for the policy issues at hand, but the Länder instead. For an overview, see Sueddeutsche Zeitung, 24 October 2006.

(53) BVerfGE 34, 9 (23).

(54) Austrian Constitution, Art 47(1).

(56) Italian Constitution, Art 74 and Latvian Constitution, Arts 71 and 72.

(57) For other examples, see Chapter 0.

(59) French Constitution, Art 61(2).

(60) Estonian Constitution, Art 107.

(61) Portuguese Constitution, Art 278.

(62) Cf the Presidency of Andrew Johnson (1865–1869).

(63) See eg US Constitution, Art 1, s 7.

(65) Lundmark (n 12), 1.

(67) On the risk of judicial review, in particular judicialization of the political process, see Grimm (n 6), 112ff.

(69) Kavanagh (n 14), 357 with practical examples; see also Grimm (n 6), 111.

(70) See Grimm (n 6), 109.

(71) eg in the Constitutions of France (Art 61), Portugal (Art 278), or Romania (Art 146).

(72) Cf François Luchaire, Le conseil constitutionnel (2nd edn, 1997), para 27, who discusses why the French Conseil d'État could not be used as a constitutional court.

(74) Article 218(11) TFEU.

(75) See CEP (n 66).

(76) Joan Gundersen ‘Advisory Opinion’ in Kermit Hall et al (eds), *The Oxford Companion to the Supreme Court of the United States (2nd edn, 2005).

(77) Ibid 216.

(79) BVerfGE 39, 1 and BVerfGE 88, 203.

(81) BVerfG, 1 BvF 2/05 of 24 November 2010.

(82) Article 93(1) No 2 of the German Basic Law and Austrian Constitution, Art 140.

(83) The Belgian Constitution, Art 142, states: ‘A matter may be referred to the Court by any authority designated by the law'; as of right now, these comprise the Council of Ministers, the Government of a Community or Region of Belgium, the Presidents of the Chamber of Representatives, Senate and the Community and Regional Parliaments, at the request of two-thirds of its members.

(84) Spanish Constitution, s 162, cl 1a.

(86) 410 US 113.

(88) 481 US 739.

(89) Ibid 745.

(94) German Basic Law, Art 93(1) No 1.

(95) BVerfGE 62,1.

(96) BVerfGE 114, 121.

(97) BVerfGE 90, 286.

(98) BVerfGE 68, 1.

(99) BVerfGE 70, 324.

(100) The actual question behind the constitutional complaint on military out-of-area deployment actually was whether such deployment was constitutional, not whether parliamentary rights were being respected in this instance.

(101) Bulgarian Constitution, Art 149(1) no 3, Italian Constitution, Art 134, Spanish Constitution, s 161, cl 1c, and Swiss Constitution, Art 189.
(102) US Constitution, Art 1, s 8.

(105) For EU Member States see CEP (n 56); for the ECJ see (http://curia.europa.eu/); for others, see Lijphart (n 87).

(106) For Germany, see BVerfGE 2, 266 (281).

(107) Article 267 TFEU.

(109) Cf ECJ, Case C-173/09 Elchinov [not yet published in the ECR], para 32.

(110) See French Constitution, Art 61(1) and Arts 23(1) ff of the Law 2009-1523, JORF No 287, 21379.

(111) eg BVerfGE 105, 61 (67).

(113) ECJ, Case C-26/62 van Gend en Loos [1963] ECR 1, 26.

(114) Slovenian Constitution, Art 159.

(117) German Constitutional Court, 2 BVR 1806/95.

(118) 26 Stat 826.

(120) Cf Grimm (n 6), 111ff.

(122) Sceptical towards the concept of judicial self-restraint, see Grimm (n 6), 116.

(124) Favoreu (n 123), 40.

(125) Ibid 46ff.
(126) Greek Constitution, Art 100 provides for a ‘Supreme Special Court’ which only serves as a constitutional court when the three supreme courts take contradictory decisions or judge differently the constitutionality of a legal provision.

(128) Marbury v Madison 5 US 137 (1803).

(129) Wieser (n 15), 122ff.

(130) Hautamäki (n 10), 5.

(131) On the different degrees of judicial activism, see Lijphart (n 87), 225ff.

(132) Favoreu (n 123), 42.

(133) Above Section IV.2(a); Michel Rosenfeld, ‘Constitutional Adjudication in Europe and the United States: Paradoxaes and Contrasts’ in Georg Nolte (ed), European and US Constitutionalism (2005), 197.

(134) Muskrat v United States 219 US 346 (1911); cf also Raines v Byrd 521 US 811 (1997) (challenge by members of Congress on the losing side of legislation granting the President a ‘line item veto’ held to be not justiciable) as cited by Rosenfeld (n 124), 198.

(135) Marbury v Madison 5 US 137 (1803).

(136) Favoreu (n 123), 41; see eg the German Act on the Constitutional Court, s 31(2).

(137) Favoreu (n 123), 41.

(138) Greek Constitution, Art XXX100.

(139) Rosenfeld (n 133), 220.

Juliane Kokott
Juliane Kokott, First Advocate General, Court of Justice of the European Communities.

Martin Kaspar
Martin Kaspar is Chief of Staff, City of Schwäbisch Hall, Germany
Abstract and Keywords

This article provides an introduction to the basic institutional features of constitutional courts (CCs), as well as an overview of the small but growing comparative literature on their design, function, impact, and legitimacy. It presents the CC as an ideal type, with its own functional logics, and surveys the comparative scholarship seeking to explain commonalities and differences across systems. It emphasizes inter-disciplinarity, in part, because political scientists have been at the forefront of empirical research and, in part, because powerful CCs have shaped and reshaped their own political environments. Successful CCs routinely subvert separation of powers schemes, including elements on which their legitimacy was originally founded. In consequence, new legitimacy questions and discourses have emerged.

Keywords: constitutional court, separation of power, legitimacy

I. Introduction 816
II. Origins, Models, Diffusion 817
III. Design and Functions 820
   1. Functional Logics and Commitment 820
   2. Jurisdiction 822
   3. Appointment and Composition 824

IV. Effectiveness and Impact 825
   1. Effectiveness 825
   2. Democratic Transition 826
   3. Constitutional Lawmaking 827

VI. Conclusion: Legitimacy Discourses 828

I. Introduction

Prior to the Second World War, only a handful of high courts in the world had routinely exercised the power of constitutional judicial review: the authority to invalidate statutes and other acts of public authority found to be in conflict with a constitution. In the 1950s, Western Europe began to emerge as the epicenter of a 'new constitutionalism', a model of democracy and state legitimacy that rejects the dogmas of legislative sovereignty, prioritizes fundamental rights, and requires a mode of constitutional review. With successive waves of democratization, this new constitutionalism spread across the continent. By the 1990s, the basic formula—(1) an entrenched, written constitution, (2) a charter of fundamental rights, and (3) a mode of constitutional judicial review to protect those rights—had diffused globally. The availability of the constitutional court (CC) has been crucial to this process. For reasons to be discussed, the framers of new constitutions have been more attracted to the ‘centralized model’ of constitutional review, with a specialized CC at its core, than to the ‘decentralized (or American) model’ of judicial review exercised by the judiciary as a whole.

This chapter provides an introduction to the basic institutional features of CCs, as well as an overview of the small but growing comparative literature on their design, function, impact, and legitimacy. Every CC that operates with any effectiveness exhibits certain unique attributes that have been important to its success, however relative, in making a constitution effective as enforceable law. Although important monographs have been produced on specific courts, this chapter is pitched at a higher level of abstraction. It presents the CC as an ideal type, with its own functional logics, and surveys the comparative scholarship seeking to explain commonalities and differences across systems. The chapter will emphasize inter-disciplinarity, in part, because political scientists have been at the forefront of empirical research and, in part, because powerful CCs have shaped and reshaped their own political environments. Successful CCs routinely subvert separation of powers schemes, including elements on which their legitimacy was originally founded. In consequence, new legitimacy questions and discourses have emerged.

II. Origins, Models, Diffusion

A CC is a constitutionally established, independent organ of the state whose central purpose is to defend the normative superiority of the constitutional law within the juridical order.

Prior to the turn of the twentieth century, several specialized, constitutional ‘jurisdictions’ had appeared in Europe, notably in Austria and the Germanic states. The modern constitutional court, however, is largely the invention of Hans Kelsen. Kelsen developed what is now called the ‘centralized’ or ‘European’ model of review, first, in his role as a draftsman of the constitution of the Austrian Second Republic (1920–34), and then as a theoretician. The founders of the present German and Italian systems constructed new CCs from the template Kelsen laid down. His legacy was secured when constitutional reformers in Southern, Central, and Eastern Europe later rejected American-style judicial review, while embracing the Kelsenian court.

As an ideal type, the ‘centralized’, or ‘European’, model of constitutional review can be broken down into four constituent components. First, CCs possess a monopoly on the power to invalidate infra-constitutional legal norms, including statutes, as unconstitutional. Meanwhile, the ‘ordinary’ courts (the judiciary, including specialized jurisdictions) are prohibited from doing so. In the United States, review authority inheres in judicial power: all judges possess it. Secondly, CCs resolve disputes about the interpretation and application of the constitution. The US Supreme Court is the highest court of appeal for almost all legal disputes in the American legal order, of whatever type. In contrast, CCs do not preside over litigation, which remains the purview of the ordinary courts. Instead, specifically designated authorities or individuals ask questions of CCs, challenging the constitutionality of specific legal acts; constitutional judges are then required to answer these questions, and to justify their answers with reasons. The rulings of CCs are final. Thirdly, CCs have links with, but are formally detached from, the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of government. Constitutional judges occupy their own ‘constitutional space’, which is neither clearly ‘judicial’ (the enforcement of preexisting legal norms in the course of litigation) nor ‘political’ (the creation of new legal norms) in classic continental terms. Fourthly, unlike the US Supreme Court, whose jurisdiction is constrained by the ‘case or controversy’ requirement, most CCs may review statutes ‘in the abstract’, before they have been enforced. ‘Abstract review’ is typically justified as a means of eliminating unconstitutional legislation and practices before they can do harm.

The successful diffusion of the Kelsenian court within Western Europe after the Second World War depended heavily on three factors. First, framers of new constitutions believed that the concentrated system of review would ‘fit’ a parliamentary system of government better than the decentralized, American system. A CC can be attached to the existing architecture of the state with minimal disruption to established orders, notably the separation of powers notions associated with legislative sovereignty. Under the European model, it remains possible to defend the notion that the ordinary courts are bound by the supremacy of statute, while constitutional judges are charged with preserving the supremacy of the constitution. More generally, whenever groups that negotiate new constitutions are dominated by political parties who are hostile to sharing their power with the judiciary, centralizing review authority in a single organ will appear to be a less costly option, compared to adopting the American system. Moreover, framers can easily design CCs so that their composition will reflect outcomes of political processes: members of CCs are typically appointed by elected officials or after bargaining among political parties; and members serve fixed terms.

Secondly, the new constitutionalism, with its heavy emphasis on rights and review, emerged first in Germany, in reaction to the horrors of the Holocaust and the destruction of the Second World War. As authoritarian regimes collapsed in Southern Europe in the 1970s, and then across Central and Eastern Europe and the Balkans in the 1990s, that situation was reproduced in key respects, and the Austro-German approach to constitutionalism was adopted (p. 819) and adapted. In each of these episodes, the framers of new constitutions saw no contradiction between democracy and rights protection (at a time when the prestige of political parties and legislative authority was relatively low). On the contrary, a robust system of rights protection was viewed as a pre-condition for democratic rule. The Kelsenian court offered a means of prioritizing rights protection, while maintaining the prohibition of judicial review.

This last point raises a contradiction for the original model that deserves attention. In his seminal paper of 1928, Kelsen laid out a blueprint for CCs, and a defense of the political legitimacy of the centralized model of review. Although he recognized that a constitutional judge’s authority to invalidate unconstitutional statutes comprised a type of legislative power, he labored to distinguish between legislating and constitutional adjudication. Members of parliaments, he argued, are ‘positive legislators’; they make law freely, subject only to constitutional constraints, such as the rules of legislative procedure or federalism. Constitutional judges are ‘negative legislators’: their lawmaking authority is restricted to the annulment of legal norms that conflict with the constitutional law. The distinction between the positive and the negative legislator rests on the absence, within the constitutional law, of enforceable rights. Kelsen equated rights with (open-ended) natural law, and thought that, through the process of discovering and enforcing rights, a CC would inevitably obliterate the distinction between the negative and the positive legislator. The judges would become, in effect, supreme legislators. He therefore argued against conferring rights jurisdiction on CCs. The passage to the new constitutionalism proved Kelsen correct: any CC that protects rights with any measure of effectiveness will, at the same time, act as a positive legislator. Today, Kelsen’s warning is usually politely ignored.

A third factor concerns the recursive nature of the diffusion process. Each adoption and adaptation of the Kelsenian court increases the likelihood that the next generation of constitutional framers will follow suit.

Constitution-makers tend to copy arrangements that are considered successful. The CC has proved its worth as an instrument for consolidating constitutional democracy. In the 1970s, the framers in post-Franco Spain quite consciously copied the German system, without seriously considering the American model; in the 1990s, the drafters of new constitutions in Central and Eastern Europe, as well as in Latin America, looked to Germany and Spain; the South African Constitution too was heavily influence by Germany. In Asia, where American political influence is pronounced, the Austro-German model also served as a prototype for constitutional reform, most notably in South Korea. As the institution has diffused, so has epistemic support for the decentralized model. Today, regional and global networks of judges, law professors, and rights-based non-governmental organizations actively defend the legitimacy of the model, further facilitating its broader diffusion.

As noted, virtually no one writes a constitution today without providing for rights protection and a mode of review. In 2005, of the 138 national systems of constitutional review that an analyst could clearly classify as conforming to either the American or the Kelsenian model, 85 (62 percent) were Kelsenian. CCs comprise the dominant organ of review in Europe, Africa, and the Middle East, and have made in-roads into Asia, South East Asia, and Latin America (where ‘mixed’ systems of various types are common). The American model clearly dominates only in North America and the Caribbean. Two of the world’s most active and effective CCs are found outside Europe, in Colombia and South Africa. Finally, leaders of authoritarian regimes, who may have no intention of democratizing or weakening one-party rule, may nonetheless establish CCs. As Moustafa has shown, with respect to Egypt in the 1980s and 1990s, rulers may create a CC as a way of signaling to the international community that it is committed to reform, legal security, and property rights, not least to attract needed foreign investment and external support more generally. Similar dynamics can be found in Latin America.

III. Design and Functions
The establishment of a system of constitutional review raises a primordial question. Why, at the foundational moment, would the most powerful political actors in a state choose to constrain the future exercise of their own lawmaking authority? After all, in most places where new CCs have been adopted, the various dogmas of legislative sovereignty had previously reigned as embedded orthodoxy. In responding to this question, scholars have gradually developed what is, in effect, a functional theory of delegation to CCs. The Kelsenian court helps those who build new constitutional arrangements to resolve certain dilemmas, including problems of imperfect contracting and commitment. These problems are especially acute in the domains of federalism and rights. Although functional logics may help us to understand, in broad-brush terms, the turn to constitutional review, more fine-grained analyses are necessary to explain variation across cases, or the design and functioning of any specific CC.

1. Functional Logics and Commitment

A diverse group of scholars have developed variants of delegation theory to explain why the founders of new constitutions would establish and confer authority on CCs. In this account, the availability of the CC gives drafters the confidence to strike constitutional bargains ex ante, as well as a means of guaranteeing the credibility of commitments made ex post.

Ginsburg has elaborated and tested an ‘insurance model of judicial review’ that explains variation in the design of systems of review with reference to the extent to which political authority (or the party system) is fragmented at the ex ante moment. In a system dominated by one person or political party, rulers have little incentive to construct a review system that would constrain them. When they do establish a CC, it is often to consolidate a regime meant to benefit them while disadvantaging their opponents; examples include many authoritarian regimes, but also the Gaullist-dominated France of 1958. More interesting: to the extent that a competitive party system exists, or can be foreseen, each negotiating party will have an incentive in building a more robust mode of review, in order to protect its interests when it is out of power. Ginsburg’s work is exemplary in that he supplements deductive theorizing and quantitative analysis with detailed case studies of the creation and subsequent operation of CCs in Asia.

More generally, CCs help framers resolve a bundle of contracting problems. Modern constitutions are contracts that are typically negotiated by political elites—representatives of competing groups or political parties—seeking to establish the rules, procedures, and institutions that will permit them, under the cloak of constitutional legitimacy, to govern. In establishing a democracy, each contracting party knows that it must compete for office, through elections. As Ginsburg emphasizes, constitutional contracting allows each to constrain opponents when the latter are in power. The constitution thus produces two common goods for the new polity: a set of enabling institutions, and a set of constraints. If the system is to be federal or strongly regional, review will provide a means of settling boundary conflicts. It is an old truism that federalism needs an umpire, which helps to explain why all federal constitutions provide for review in some form. To be credible, contracting rights, too, necessitates delegation of review powers.

All contracts are ‘incomplete’ to the extent that meaningful uncertainty exists as to the precise nature of the contract’s terms. Due to the impossibility of negotiating specific rules for all possible contingencies, and given that, as time passes, conditions will change and the interests of the parties to the agreement will evolve, most agreements of any complexity are generated by what organizational economists call ‘relational contracting’. The parties to an agreement seek to broadly ‘frame’ their relationship, by agreeing on a set of basic ‘goals and objectives’, fixing outer limits on acceptable behavior, and establishing procedures for ‘completing’ the contract over time. Constitutions negotiated by multiple parties, and modern rights provisions, in particular, are paradigmatic examples of relational contracting.

Take the following scenario, which is a stylized version of what has recurred across the globe since 1945. Once the founders choose to include a charter of rights in their constitution, they face two fierce dilemmas. The first concerns disagreements about the nature and content of rights. The left-wing contingent favors positive, social rights, and limits on the rights to property. The right is hostile to positive rights, and they want stronger property rights. They compromise, producing an extensive charter of rights that (1) lists most of the rights that each side wants, (2) implies that no right is absolute or more important than another, and (3) is vague about how any future conflict between two rights, or a right and a legitimate governmental purpose, will be resolved. Secondly, they face a problem of credible commitment: How will rights be enforced? Delegating review powers to a CC helps them... manage both problems, allowing them to move forward.

(p. 822) Delegation theorists assume that the more acute are the problems of imperfect commitment and incomplete contracting, the more authority—or discretion—the framers must delegate to the review court if constitutional arrangements are to be successful. Relational contracting—the reliance on relatively imprecise legal provisions to express important objectives—can help divided framers to reach agreement in the first place. Yet, in the context of review, textual imprecision, if it is not to paralyze the review court ex post, must be understood to comprise a tacit, second-order form of delegation to the Agent. The decision rules that govern constitutional amendment are also built into the delegation of discretion to the CC: the harder it is to nullify the effects of the CC’s rulings ex post, through constitutional amendment, the more the CC will determine how constitutional arrangements evolve.

These points can be formalized in terms of a theoretical zone of discretion—the strategic environment—in which any CC operates. This zone is determined by (1) the sum of powers delegated to a CC, or possessed as a result of a CC’s own accreted rulemaking, minus (2) the sum of control instruments available for use by other constitutionally recognized authorities to reverse outcomes resulting from the court’s performance of its delegated tasks. Most CCs operate in an unusually permissive strategic environment, to the extent that even their most important rulings are unlikely to be overturned. Entrenchment is a commitment device. Most contemporary constitutions are far more difficult to amend than statutes; and many constitutions declare off-limits to revision certain core constitutional elements (the most common of which are rights, parliamentary democracy, and federalism). Further, some CCs have the express authority to review the constitutionality of amendments to the constitution, or have asserted on their own that the constitution imposes substantive constraints on amendment.27

For these reasons, the analyst may conceptualize CCs as ‘trustees’ of the constitutional order, rather than mere ‘agents’ of the contract.28 In a judicial system based on statutory supremacy, the courts are ‘agents’ of the legislature. If judges construct the codes in ways that are undesirable, legislators, as ‘principals’, may amend the law to put things right. The CC, however, has no permanently constituted ‘principal’ that supervises its work. Once a constitution has been ratified and enters into force, those who negotiated it possess no authority to change it, at least not as the founders. Instead, the CC typically exercises its powers in the name of a fictitious entity: the sovereign People. Meanwhile, political elites compete for and exercise state power under rules and procedures laid down by the constitution, of which the CC is the authoritative interpreter.

2. Jurisdiction

The functional logics just discussed will apply to any bargaining context in which the framers set out to build a system of constitutional review—of whatever type. Compared with the major alternative, however, the specialized CC has a powerful advantage, in that the framers can more easily tailor the details of jurisdiction to specific purposes. The standard design questions—What acts are to be subject to review, through what procedures?—will be supplemented by another: What important control functions should be withheld from the ordinary courts? Thus, in addition to providing for the constitutional review of legal norms and acts, the framers may charge the CC with resolving electoral disputes, banning undemocratic political parties, presiding over the impeachment cases of elected officials, and so on. Put bluntly, (p. 823) CCs are given functions that would be viewed as too ‘political’, or constitutionally important, to confer on the ordinary courts. Partly for this reason, CCs are loath to develop formal deference doctrines, such as the ‘political question’ doctrine of the US Supreme Court, which would signal abdication of their duties.

The most important function of the modern CC is the protection of rights by constitutional review. As noted, once the protection of fundamental rights is prioritized, sharing lawmaking power with a CC will usually be viewed a less costly option than giving all judges review powers. The American and the European models differ with respect to the pathways through which cases arise. In the United States, rights review is activated once a litigating party properly pleads a right before a judge—any judge. In countries with constitutional courts, a range of different procedures organize rights review, although not all systems have established all of them, or in the same way.

The first is abstract review: the pre-enforcement review of statutes. As Sadurski puts it, in this mode of review, ‘it is the textual dimension of the rule [in abstracto] rather than its operationalization in application to real people and ... legal controversies that is assessed by judges.’29 Some systems require the statute to be reviewed before entry into force, others after promulgation but before application. Abstract review is also called ‘preventive review’, since its purpose is to filter out unconstitutional laws before they can harm anyone. In its most common form, abstract review is politically initiated: executives, parliamentary minorities, the heads of regions or federated entities, and so on, are authorized to refer laws considered to be unconstitutional to the CC.

The second mode is called concrete review, which is initiated by the judiciary in the course of litigation in the courts. Ordinary judges send questions—Is a given legal norm, judicial decision, or administrative act constitutional?—to the CC. The general rule is that the presiding judge ought to go to the CC if two conditions are met: (1) the constitutional question is material to litigation at bar (who wins or loses will depend on the answer to the question); and (2) there is reasonable doubt in the judge’s mind about the constitutionality of the controlling norm. Referrals suspend proceedings pending the CC’s response. Once rendered, the CC’s ruling is sent back to the referring judge, who then uses it to dispose of the case. Ordinary judges are not permitted to invalidate a statute on their own. Instead, aided by litigants, they are enlisted to help the CC detect unconstitutional laws and practices. Concrete review is ‘concrete’ because the CC’s intervention constitutes a stage in ordinary litigation taking place in the courts.

The third procedure is called the ‘constitutional complaint’, which brings individuals into the mix. Individuals, firms, and groups may be authorized to petition the CC when they believe that their rights have been violated, after all other remedies have been exhausted. Because of this threshold requirement, most individual complaints are, in effect, appeals of final judicial rulings. Thus, when adjudicating individual complaints, the CC performs functions more closely associated with appellate review in the American system (see Section IV below).

These three modes of review are basic to the rights-protecting mission of the German Federal Constitutional Court, arguably the most powerful and influential CC in the world. As the centralized model diffused, they were routinely adopted. The drafters of subsequent European constitutions added new features, pathways to the CC that the German and Italian founders did not even consider. In Europe, the rights ombudsman first appeared in the Spanish Constitution of 1978; the institution then spread across Central and Eastern Europe. The ombudsman may refer cases to the CC on her own, including petitioning for abstract review. Post-Communist constitutions in Central and Eastern Europe have also expanded the right to initiate abstract review to a diverse range of other actors, including prosecutors, state auditors, courts, local government officials, and even trade unions. Thus in many newer systems, there are few if any jurisdictional or standing obstacles to getting to the CC. Under the constitutions of Hungary and Colombia, for example, everyone possesses the right to petition directly the CC, through an actio popularis. The ‘popular action’ initiates abstract review of statutes, although the petitioner need not show that the law referred has actually harmed her personally.

As a formal matter, any constitutionally-based system of rights protection can be considered to be less robust, or ‘complete’, the more it permits or tolerates gaps in rights protection. Since the end of the Second World War, one important trend has been toward completeness: presumptively, no legal norm, no public act, no violation of a right should be beyond the control of the constitutional judge. The situation contrasts sharply with the American system, where the case or controversy requirement, inter-branch comity, and ‘political question’ and other deference doctrines are expected to constrain the exercise of review will routinely produce gaps in rights protection. It is important to recognize in this regard that, unlike the US Supreme Court, many CCs were created, explicitly and as a constitutional priority, to protect rights.

3. Appointment and Composition

In a recent volume on CCs, edited by Harding and Leyland, contributors report valuable information on appointment rules and politics across Africa, Asia, Latin America, and Europe. Although procedures and recruitment patterns vary widely, several general points can be made (with the caveat that none covers all cases).

First, appointments to CCs are treated differently than recruitment to the ordinary courts. Elected politicians dominate these procedures, which may require bargaining and compromise among officials and/or legislative majorities and oppositions. In Germany, for example, the lower house appoints its quota of members to the Court through a special committee, composed of representatives of the political parties and reflecting their respective strength in the Bundestag, pursuant to a two-thirds majority vote. In Spain, the Congress and the Senate appoint members on the basis of a three-fifths vote, which in practice gives the opposition a veto. In some countries in Central and Eastern Europe, two branches of government (e.g., the Senate and the President in the Czech Republic) must reach consensus to appoint. Requiring compromise among political elites is less likely to produce a polarized court. Secondly, members of CCs do not enjoy lifetime tenure, but are typically appointed for a fixed 9–12-year term (often non-renewable). Thirdly, although many constitutions require that a minority of seats be filled by career judges drawn from the high courts, many CCs are composed of a majority of law professors and former governmental officials and elected politicians. As Perreres Comella has argued, diversity in the make-up of these courts counts as an important ‘virtue’. All significant constitutional questions mix the abstract and theoretical with the practical and governmental, and thus law professors and former politicians nicely complement one another. (p. 825) Taken together, these three elements are likely to contribute to the political legitimacy of a CC, when it enforces the constitutional law in ways that the political majority find unwelcome.

IV. Effectiveness and Impact

Scholars would have little interest in these developments if CCs do not influence broader processes: the consolidation of new democracies, the development of the constitution, the protection of rights, the making of public policy, competition among political elites, and so on. To the extent that constitutional review is effective, CCs will have impact such processes in ways that can be described and measured empirically.

1. Effectiveness

Constitutional review can be said to be effective to the extent that the important constitutional disputes arising in the polity are brought to the CC on a regular basis, that the judges who resolve these disputes give reasons for their rulings, and that those who are governed by the constitutional law accept that the court's ruling have some precedential effect. On this definition, effectiveness is a variable: it varies across cases and across time in the same country.

Most review systems throughout world history have been relatively ineffective, even irrelevant. Political actors may seek to settle their disputes by force, rather than through the courts, sometimes with fatal consequences for the constitutional regime. Rulers may care much more about staying in power at any cost, or enriching themselves, or rewarding their friends and punishing their foes, or achieving ethnic dominance, then they care about building constitutional democracy. Dictators of various stripes may also design and deploy review courts to administer and maintain their own rule, as an important research project organized Ginsburg and Moustafa details. Despite the odds, some CCs have operated with measurable effectiveness in authoritarian settings, as in Egypt and Pinochet's Chile.

Where review systems are relatively effective, constitutional judges manage the evolution of the polity through their decisions. There are three necessary conditions for the emergence of effective review systems; each is conditioned by the court’s ‘zone of discretion’. First, constitutional judges must have a caseload. If actors, private and public, conspire not to activate review, judges will accrete no influence over the polity. Secondly, once activated, judges must resolve these disputes and give defensible reasons in justification of their decisions. If they do, one output of constitutional adjudication will be the production of a constitutional case law, or jurisprudence, which is a record of how the judges have interpreted the constitution. Thirdly, those who are governed by the constitutional law must accept that constitutional meaning is (at least partly) constructed through the judges’ interpretation and rulemaking, and use or refer to relevant case law in future disputes.

Some might quibble with this account of ‘effectiveness’. Harding, Leyland, and Groppi, for example, argue that effectiveness should be gauged against the following criteria: (1) ‘whether the court’s interventions are consistent with the norms set out in the constitution, and (p. 826) whether these norms themselves are consistent with principles of “good governance” as we understand this term in international law and development discourse’, and (2) ‘whether the court’s pronouncements are then actually embedded in practice, that is, whether they are followed’. Trustee courts, however, have the capacity to alter the ‘norms set out in the constitution’, not least in order to enhance the centrality and enforceability of the constitutional law as a framework of ‘good governance’. To take just two examples of many to be found, in 1971 the French CC incorporated rights provisions into the Constitution of the Fifth Republic, against the express wishes of the framers; and in 1958 the German CC ordered the ordinary courts to enforce the rights contained in the Basic Law when they adjudicate private law disputes.
Why only some countries are able to fulfill effectiveness criteria is a controversial question in the social sciences. The achievement of stable system of constitutional justice depends heavily on the same factors and processes related to the achievement of stable democracy, and we know that democracy is difficult to create and sustain. Among other factors, the new constitutionalism rests on a polity’s commitment to: elections; a competitive party system; protecting rights, including those of minorities; practices associated with the ‘rule of law’; a system of advanced legal education and advocacy. Each of these factors is also associated with other important socio-cultural phenomena, including attributes of political culture, which may be illiberal and fragmented. Constitutional judges can contribute to the building of practices related to higher law constitutionalism, but there are limits to what they can do if they find themselves continuously in opposition to powerful elites, institutions, and cultural biases in the citizenry. In Russia, the new CC was curbed after it began to build effectiveness, by the same elites who claimed to be committed to building constitutional rule of law. Not surprisingly, one finds relatively effective review mechanisms in areas where one finds relatively stable democracy. Ranked in terms of effectiveness, the author would place the systems of Colombia, the Czech Republic, Germany, Hungary, Indonesia, Poland, Slovenia, South Africa, and South Korea on top of the list.

2. Democratic Transition

Since the Second World War, rights and review have been crucial to nearly all successful transitions from authoritarian regimes to constitutional democracy (including the countries just listed). Indeed, it appears that the more successful any transition has been, the more likely one is to find an effective constitutional or supreme court at the heart of it (Japan may be the most important exception). A CC performs several functions that facilitate the transition to democracy. It provides a system of peaceful dispute resolution for those who have contracted a new beginning, in light of authoritarian and violent pasts. It provides a mechanism for purging the laws of authoritarian elements, given that the new legislature may be overloaded with work. And a CC can provide a focal point for a new rhetoric of state legitimacy, one based on respect for democratic values and rights, and on the rejection of former rhetoric (of fascism, military or one-party rule, legislative sovereignty, the cult of personality, and so on).

3. Constitutional Lawmaking

Constitutional judges make law through interpreting the constitution. Constitutional lawmaking is typically registered on two levels, simultaneously. In resolving a specific policy dispute under the constitutional law, the CC will help to make that policy; at the same time, the CC will construct the constitutional law, clarifying, supplementing, or amending it outright. The polity cannot access the benefits of review without activating the court’s prospective lawmaking capacity. In a system of constitutional trusteeship, the CC will usually have the last word on any dispute about meaning, thereby generating normative guidance for future lawmaking and judging. In this way, constitutional case law, as it unfolds, creates the conditions for the ‘judicialization of policymaking’ (the impact of a CC on the legislative process) and for the ‘constitutionalization of the law’ (the impact of a CC on the judiciary).

The present author has developed a theory of ‘the judicialization of politics’, a process conceptualized as a structured set of ‘constitutional dialogues’ between the CC and legislators. The impact of CCs on legislative activity varies as a function of three factors: the existence of abstract review, the number of veto points in the policy process, and the accretion of a policy-relevant jurisprudence. The more centralized is the policy process—the greater the parliamentary majority, the more that majority is under the control of a unified executive, and the fewer veto points there are in legislative procedures—the more opponents of governmental initiatives will go to the CC to block important initiatives. In Western Europe, legislative politics have become highly ‘judicialized’, as the web of constitutional constraints facing legislators has grown and become denser, as registered in the jurisprudence of CCs. Sadurski has elaborated a related model to explain constitutional politics in Central and Eastern Europe. The more effective the CC, the more law it will make. In Kelsenian terms, it is indisputable that CCs across Europe have developed into powerful ‘positive legislators’ when they protect rights.

With respect to impact on the judiciary, the development of constitutional review is gradually transforming the role and function of the law courts, at least in Europe. This complex process, called ‘the constitutionalization of the legal order’, has generated the following major outcomes: constitutional norms—especially rights provisions—become to constitute a source of law, capable of being invoked by litigators and applied by ordinary judges in private law case; the CC, through its jurisdiction over concrete review referrals and individual complaints, evolves into a kind of high court of appeal for the judiciary, involving itself in the latter's tasks of fact finding and rule application; and the techniques of constitutional decision-making become an important mode of advocacy and decision-making in the ordinary courts. 48 (p. 828) Constitutionalization is partly the normative consequence of the horizontal effect (between private parties) of constitutional rights, 49 and in part the product of complex dialogues between constitutional judges and the judiciary.

Cross-national differences in the pace and scope of constitutionalization is closely tied to the existence of particular modes of review. Where concrete review and the individual constitutional complaint procedures coexist, extensive constitutionalization has proceeded rapidly, the paradigmatic examples being Germany and Spain. For a CC to decide on the merits of such claims, it must delve deeply into the workings of the judiciary, and it has the power to impose its own preferred outcome on any recalcitrant judge (if need be, by invalidating the judicial ruling as unconstitutional). The absence of the individual complaint reduces the capacity of the CC to control judicial outcomes. The paradigmatic case in Europe is Italy, where the CC must negotiate terms of engagement with the Supreme Court (Cassazione) on a continuous basis. 50

VI. Conclusion: Legitimacy Discourses

Most CCs enjoy extensive formal legitimacy. Typically, the constitution itself designates the CC as the authoritative interpreter of the higher law, establishes enforceable rights, and lays out a blueprint for how the CC will interact with the other branches of government and the citizenry. The legitimacy resources that flow from explicit constitutional arrangements are enormously important. The contrast with the American situation—where the constitution does not expressly provide for judicial review, and rights protection, haunted by the ‘counter-majoritarian difficulty’, needs special justification—is palpable. Nonetheless, in every system in which a CC has been successful at enhancing the effectiveness of rights and review, legitimacy questions have been raised. In response, judges and scholars have been led to develop a range of defenses. 51

This chapter has already noted variants of several dominant discourses. Today, for example, one still finds scholars invoking Kelsen’s classic arguments, though these appear to be increasingly impotent. The more rights review is effective, the more the CC will function as a positive legislator, the more the legislative process will be judicialized, and the more the boundaries that once separated the respective jurisdictions of the CC and the ordinary courts will be blurred. The functional logics of delegation provide one type of response. We—the framers, the People, the epistemic community—delegated to the CC in order to realize certain higher purposes, such as protecting rights. The erosion of traditional separation of powers notions is the tax we pay for these benefits. Under this rubric, new questions (mixing the normative and the empirical) are posed. Do governments and parliaments legislate better, do the courts perform their functions better, by being placed under the supervision of CCs? The concept of effectiveness (discussed above) endogenizes a process-based source of legitimacy (the third necessary condition). Political legitimacy is created through use: CC’s can only build effectiveness with the active complicity of political elites. After all, the same politicians that (p. 829) complain of the CC’s influence on policymaking do not hesitate to activate it through abstract review referrals when in opposition. More generally, the political and social demand for rights review has steadily increased, and most effective CCs are now chronically overloaded.

In today’s world, the ideology of rights has, arguably, achieved the status of a civic religion. A precept of the new constitutionalism is that regimes are not democratically legitimate if they do not constrain majority rule through rights and review. It should not shock that Scheppele 52 and others are able to claim that CCs can be more democratic than elected officials. At times, constitutional judges are more responsive to citizens’ concerns than politicians, and they may cajole officials to be more democratic than they would otherwise be. Today, even after the consolidation of stable party systems, CCs typically score far higher than do executives and legislatures in opinion polls. The civic religion of rights also grounds a global discourse on the legitimacy of review. Many successful review courts do not conceive of constitutionalism in restricted national terms, but in terms of an emerging ‘global constitutionalism’ with human rights at its core. The CCs of Colombia, Hungary, Indonesia, Poland, Slovenia, and South Africa, for example, do not hesitate to cite international human rights treaties and the decisions of other CCs.
The ultimate measure of legitimacy for any CC may well be its success at helping the polity construct a new ‘constitutional identity’—a massive undertaking. Most CCs are expressly created as part of new orders established in opposition to prior, now thoroughly illegitimate, regimes. Party systems may be in disarray or flux; lawmaking institutions may be paralyzed by partisanship and overwhelmed with pent-up demand for reform; judiciaries may be tainted by association with past abuses; citizens may have unreasonable hopes for fundamental change, while the problems that beset the former regime persist. Yet, as Scheppele writes, a CC is often ‘the primary mechanism’ for organizing the transition away from the former ‘regime of horror’ to constitutional democracy. Insofar as CCs are successful, the legitimacy of the constitution, as a basic framework for the exercise of public authority, will become indistinguishable from the regime’s political legitimacy.

Bibliography

Andrew Harding and Peter Leyland (eds), Constitutional Courts: A Comparative Study (2009)
Hans Kelsen, ‘La Garantie Juridictionnelle de la Constitution’ (1928) 45 Revue de Droit Public 197
Kim Lane Scheppele, ‘Constitutional Interpretation after Regimes of Horror’ in Susanne Karstedt (ed), Legal Institutions and Collective Memories (2009), 233ff

Notes:

Constitutional Courts

(8) The major exception is Greece, which adopted a mixed American/European system.

(9) Americans occupied West Germany and Italy during the founding period, and insisted that new constitutions include rights and review.

(10) Kelsen (n 6).

(12) Lach and Sadurski, ‘Constitutional Courts of Central and Eastern Europe: Between Adolescence and Maturity’ in Harding and Leyland (n 3), 52.

(15) Tom Ginsburg, ‘East Asia: Constitutional Courts in East Asia: Understanding Variation’ in Harding and Leyland (n 3), 291.

(16) Navia and Ríos-Figueroa (n 13).

(17) See the website maintained by Arne Mavčič, at (http://www.concourts.net/).

(20) For an introduction to delegation theory as applied to a range of political institutions, including courts, see Mark Thatcher and Alec Stone Sweet, ‘Theory and Practice of Delegation to Non-Majoritarian Institutions’ (2002) 25 West European Politics 1.

(21) Ginsburg (n 3).

(23) Ibid; see also Tom Ginsburg, ‘Constitutional Courts in East Asia: Understanding Variation’ in Harding and Leyland (n 3).

(26) Stone Sweet (n 3), ch 2.

(29) Sadurski (n 3), 5.

(31) Harding and Leyland (n 3).

(32) Perreres Comella (n 3), 39–43.

(33) On ensuring constitutional efficacy, see further Chapter 37.

(34) Ginsburg and Moustafa (n 18).

(35) Moustafa (n 4); Clark Lombardi, ‘Egypt’s Supreme Constitutional Court: Managing Constitutional Conflict in an Authoritarian Aspirationally “Islamic” State’ in Harding and Leyland (n 3), 217.

(36) Barros (n 3).

(37) Andrew Harding, Peter Leyland and Tania Groppi, ‘Constitutional Courts: Forms, Functions and Practice in Comparative Perspective’ in Harding and Leyland (n 3).

(42) Also see Marcus Mietzner, ‘Political Conflict Resolution and Democratic Consolidation in Indonesia: The Role of the Constitutional Court’ (2010) 10 Journal of East Asian Studies 397.

(43) On democracy, see Chapter 11.

(45) See further Chapter 32 on constitutional interpretation.

(46) Stone Sweet (n 3), chs 2–3.

(47) Sadurski (n 3), chs 3–4.

(48) Stone Sweet (n 24), ch 4.

(50) Tania Groppi, ‘Italy: The Italian Constitutional Court: Towards a “Multilevel System” of Constitutional Review’ in Harding and Leyland (n 3), 125.

(51) The most comprehensive attempt to defend the legitimacy of CCs, as activist courts, is Perreres Comella (n 3). Also see Sadurski (n 3).

(53) On the concept of constitutional identity see Gary Jeffrey Jacobsohn, Constitutional Identity (2010); and Michel Rosenfeld, The Identity of the Constitutional Subject (2010).

(54) Kim Lane Scheppele, ‘Constitutional Interpretation after Regimes of Horror’ in Susanne Karstedt (ed), Legal Institutions and Collective Memories (2009), 233.

Alec Stone Sweet

Alec Stone Sweet, Leitner Professor of International Law, Politics, and International Studies, Yale Law School, New Haven, Connecticut, United States.
Abstract and Keywords

This article presents a comparative approach to judicial independence grounded in three interrelated claims: that judicial independence is a particular kind of normative concept that is best understood through a particular normative theory; that this concept is made effective through institutional design choices; and that the socio-political features of specific contexts will dictate which design choices are normatively appropriate or politically possible. The article is organized as follows. Section II elaborate upon the first of these claims, arguing that judicial independence is both an essentially contested concept and a solution concept. Section III develops the second and third of these central claims. It presents frameworks for analyzing the design choices that polities make when implementing and sustaining institutions and procedures that are meant to support judicial independence.

Keywords: judicial independence, institutional design, constitutional theory, normative theory

I. Introduction 831

II. Preliminary Questions and Methodological Perspectives 835
   1. Judicial Independence: An Essentially Contested Solution Concept 836
   2. The Intrinsic Value of Judicial Independence and the Concept of Judicial Virtue 838
   3. Delimiting the Scope of Judicial Independence 840

III. The Comparative Law of Judicial Independence 842
   1. Judicial Independence and the Politics of Institutional Design 843
      (a) Insurance Theory 843
      (b) Commitment Theory 844
      (c) Rule of Law Theory 845
   2. Contexts for Judicial Independence 846
      (a) Authoritarianism and Its Effects on Judicial Independence 847
      (b) The Influence of Cultural Norms Downplaying Adjudication 848
      (c) A Commitment in Civil and Political Society to Judicial Independence 848
      (d) Civil Law versus Common Law 850
   3. The Virtues of Judging 852

IV. Conclusion 855

I. Introduction

Contemporary constitutional theory gives pride of place to a small number of concepts, three of which—separation of powers, the rule of law, judicial independence—directly implicate the role of the judiciary in a state’s governance regime. The precise meaning of these three concepts (p. 832) and the manner of their instantiation varies widely among the 192 states that are members of the United Nations. Our first goal, consequently, is to situate the present chapter by clarifying the inquiries that it will address.

The nouns and adjectives of the title serve as organizing themes for framing our portrait. The topic is judicial independence but the word judicial is not free from ambiguity. The standard case is easy: a judge is a third party decision-maker occupying an institutional office deciding disputes between parties in an adjudicative proceeding. Yet each of these qualifiers is of uncertain dimension. Analysis could focus on the institution, on the decision-maker, on the substance of the matter being decided, or on the specific function or tasks being performed.

In many states there is a plethora of institutions performing court-like functions. These include state-created bodies such as administrative tribunals, central agencies of government such as inspectorates and licensing bodies, and even low-level decision-makers such as justices of the peace, and small claims court referees. In addition, in fields like labor law, commercial law, private law, and international law there are a wide variety of consensual arbitrators performing state-recognized judicial functions. To these must also be added international tribunals such as the International Criminal Court, the International Court of Justice, and the European Court of Human Rights.

Alternatively, were we to focus on the decision-maker, regardless of the institution, we would examine the entire range of activities performed by anyone called a judge, regardless of the institutional setting in which the tasks were performed. For example, in some states in the parliamentary tradition judges are routinely called upon to lead commissions of inquiry or even to oversee the distribution of benefits under ad hoc compensation programs.

In some states, the key criterion for defining the judicial power relates to the substance of the decision being taken. The jurisdiction of courts is held to involve hearing and deciding cases and controversies. Advisory opinions, political decisions, and hypothetical reference cases are not governance functions of a judicial character, even though in many states they may be part of a judge’s normal activity.\(^1\)

Finally, the judicial function is delimited in some states by the character of the tasks performed. A judicial function involves adjudication—the determination of the rights and obligations of the parties to a dispute by the rendering of a decision following the presentation of proofs of facts and arguments of law. Even when performed by a judge, and even when performed in a courtroom setting, allocative decisions such as the awarding of a license among numerous applicants, legislative acts such as the promulgation of rules of practice, mediation of family disputes, or purely managerial decisions such as the design and ongoing administration of school districts are not properly considered as judicial decisions.

The notion of judicial independence is equally polysemic. The root idea is that the judicial function requires judges to decide matters brought before them strictly on the basis of the record as presented by parties to a dispute. They are to decide uninfluenced by considerations particular to the parties but not relevant to the case, and to do so free from considerations relating to their own self-interest or the interest of the person or body that named them to their office. One might summarize the point by affirming that judges are independent when they decide by taking into account all relevant considerations, by not considering irrelevant considerations, by not acting to achieve an improper purpose, and by not acting to achieve a purely personal objective.\(^2\)

Independence can be understood \textit{ex ante} as a description of the structural, procedural, and personnel decisions that conduce to uncorrupted decision-making. A primary inquiry is, therefore, to answer the question, ‘Independence from whom or from what’? Invariably the initial response is ‘the state’, and the goal is to shield judges from reward or retaliation for judgments they render. But there are other private actors who may equally corrupt the process through money, threats, blackmail, or the promise of favor. Even other judges acting in disciplinary matters through Judicial Councils, or a Chief Justice allocating workloads, can act in ways that compromise the independence of individual decision-makers. Considerations such as selection processes, guaranteed tenure, protected salaries and benefits, and independent collegial governance loom large when independence is presented in this light.\(^2\)

The above considerations also point to the need to distinguish between independence and impartiality, for even where an institutional structure may promote independence in general, particular judges in particular cases may, for a variety of reasons, not be impartial. In such cases one must also account for whether judges do in fact respond to guarantees of independence by rendering impartial justice.

There are three distinct ways in which the idea of constitutional independence can be understood. The focus may be on the judge, the function, or a particular office. Most obviously, constitutional independence may refer to explicit provisions of a constitutional document (although in some countries with partially unwritten constitutions, there may also be common law constitutional norms)\(^{3}\) by which the status of all judges is meant to be protected from political and other interference, whether from one or both parties, from powerful third party economic interests, or from criminal threats, blackmail, or extortion.

A second sense of the idea lies in the protection of the judicial function. Some constitutions explicitly define or implicitly point to tasks deemed by their nature to be judicial. Performance of these tasks cannot be assigned by the legislature to any body that is not a court (eg an administrative agency), or to any person (eg a public servant or a minister) who is not appointed according to the procedures applicable to judges and vested with a guarantee of independence.\(^{4}\)

In most states that are committed to judicial independence, the institutional and procedural guarantees extend to all judges within the judicial hierarchy. In some countries, however, the idea of constitutional independence has a more limited sense. It means that there is a separate body—a constitutional court—that has exclusive jurisdiction, whether \textit{ex ante} or \textit{ex post}, to decide constitutional questions.\(^{5}\) This body is independent not only of the political branches of government, but also is separate from the regular judicial branch. In some states, independent constitutional courts are not even adjudicative bodies in the conventional sense, but are rather specialized multi-member bodies with a protected jurisdiction and enhanced guarantees of independence for their members.

The last term of the title, \textit{virtue}, points to a number of considerations relating to the actual performance of the role of judge. A first of these relates to judicial ideology. If a judge is working within a system that involves a professional magistracy, the manner in which virtue is manifest will be different from that in a system where judges are recruited from the legal profession either through appointment or election. Moreover, the explicit recognition or denial of a \textit{(p. 834)} judge's personal responsibility in decision-making will shape the manner in which independent judging is assessed in a given system.

Secondly, judicial virtue cannot mean judicial license. Judges must be accountable, and the central question is what type of accountability (and to whom) independence is meant to foster. Here again there are different dimensions in play. Independence is compromised when accountability is to a political process rather than to the disinterested pursuit of the rule of law. The idea of integrity is most often deployed to capture a judge's commitment to craft: respect for precedent, fidelity to established principles of statutory interpretation, and strict adherence to the norm of impartiality.\(^{6}\)

Integrity also signals a third aspect of judicial virtue—\textit{phronesis}: sobriety, wisdom, courage, modesty, and the capacity to resist the siren song of notoriety for righting all wrongs regardless of one's formal jurisdiction to do so.

In measuring the degree of judicial independence in any state, the importance of attending to judicial virtue cannot be understated. The whole panoply of formal constitutional guarantees will not lead to the outcomes that judicial independence is meant to ensure if those named to courts are comfortable soliciting and acting upon illegitimate factors when deciding cases. Conversely, the absence of all structural and procedural mechanisms to insulate judges from inappropriate pressure will not prevent courageous and virtuous judges from displaying true independence and impartiality in maintaining the rule of law.\(^{7}\)

The above considerations illustrate only some of the difficulties of definition and scope in developing a concept of judicial independence that could be used to organize a worldwide evaluative survey. The potential complexity of such an inquiry may suggest that a comparative approach to judicial independence is best undertaken by setting out an exhaustive list of institutional structures, procedural mechanisms, and constitutional guarantees that are related to judicial independence (conceived in the broadest possible sense), and then examining the extent to which these features are present in any given jurisdiction.\(^{8}\) So, for example, a comparative table may list the following factors: (1) sources of threats to independence (external; internal); (2) targets of these threats (the judiciary as an institution; individual judges); (3) nature of the threats (structural threats; conditions of office-holding such as appointment, tenure, removal, promotion, remuneration, training, and discipline; court administration; direct attacks and exposure to reprisals); and (4) political culture (independent bar; free press; NGOs supportive of the judiciary; free elections to political office with a strong opposition). In pursuing such a descriptive taxonomic undertaking, one might, for instance, also provide a catalog of judicial pronouncements about what concepts such as budgetary independence or judicial self-governance require.
Judicial Independence as a Constitutional Virtue

We reject formalistic checklist approaches to a comparative survey of judicial independence and instead ground our inquiry in three interrelated claims: that judicial independence is a particular kind of normative concept that is best understood through a particular normative theory; that this concept is made effective through institutional design choices; and that the socio-political features of specific contexts will dictate which design choices are normatively appropriate or politically possible.

In Section II, we elaborate upon the first of these claims. We argue that judicial independence is both an essentially contested concept and a solution concept. The fact that judicial independence is an essentially contested concept means that the nature and scope of the concept's characteristics are persistently open to question. The fact that the idea of judicial independence is a solution concept means that it poses a specific set of normative questions which all reasonable participants in the debate about the concept's content attempt to answer. We conclude Section II with the claim that the concept of judicial independence is best captured by a virtue ethics account and that such an account is superior to the main consequentialist alternatives.

In Section III we develop the second and third of our central claims. We present frameworks for analyzing the design choices that polities make when implementing and sustaining institutions and procedures that are meant to support judicial independence. One framework posits the factors that influence whether a state will, in the first instance, choose to establish institutions that support judicial independence. A second framework sets out contextual factors which influence whether members of the judiciary will in fact decide cases independently. A third framework focuses on normative and evaluative, rather than causal or predictive claims and assesses the extent to which institutional structures and procedures support or frustrate judges in their exercise of judicial virtues. The first two frameworks illustrate the claim that judicial independence is an essentially contested concept which requires context-specific institutional supports to be made effective. The third framework illustrates the normative nature of inquiries into the nature of judicial independence.

In our view, the comparative approach to judicial independence advanced in this chapter is an advance over alternatives which deny that the idea of judicial independence has any normative content, or assume that a simple description of the concept and the factors that conduce to it is either possible or desirable, or claim that there is a uniform set of institutional structures which is necessary and sufficient for the concept of judicial independence to be given effect in any specific context. We begin with a discussion of our normative conception of the idea of judicial independence.

II. Preliminary Questions and Methodological Perspectives

In this section, we elaborate our understanding of what kind of a concept judicial independence is, and what consequences for comparative analysis flow from this understanding. Our basic claim is that judicial independence is an essentially contested solution concept. Hence, there are no generally accepted criteria by which the widely differing experiences of states that claim to adhere to the concept could be compared. Consequently, much of the comparative evaluation will depend on how one assesses the normative value of judicial independence. If, as we argue, judicial independence is an intrinsic good, the assessment one makes of its various instantiations will be much different from an evaluation based on consequentialist accounts such as judicial independence being important because it promotes liberal-democratic constitutionality. Next, we argue that the judicial independence is best understood from the standpoint of virtue ethics. These considerations enable us, in Section III, to examine the utility of different comparative approaches for assessing the extent to which a polity actually shows a commitment to judicial independence.

1. Judicial Independence: An Essentially Contested Solution Concept

A number of foundational concepts of constitutional law have been characterized by scholars as essentially contested concepts. Among these are the rule of law and judicial independence.
Jeremy Waldron has argued that an essentially contested concept is normative and complex: participants in a debate about such a concept may agree that the achievement of that concept is valuable and that it involves multiple constituent parts, but disagree about the identity and relevance of the parts. In our view, judicial independence is just such a concept. Moreover, we see judicial independence as an example of Waldron's claim that some essentially contested concepts are ‘solution concepts’. A solution concept:

is the concept of a solution to a problem we’re not sure how to solve, and rival conceptions are rival proposals for solving it or rival proposals for doing the best we can in this regard given that the problem is insoluble.

This understanding of the idea of judicial independence is particularly salient for present purposes because it permits us to put aside two general critiques of the concept of judicial independence. First, we take those involved in debates about the nature of judicial independence to be engaged in serious and purposeful discussion about the meaning and importance of the concept in constitutional design. We therefore do not attend to arguments raised by those who invoke judicial independence for exclusively rhetorical and strategic reasons.

Secondly, we exclude from our discussion those who argue that judicial independence is an idea devoid of content. Some scholars argue that the idea of judicial independence raises definitional controversies, and that invocations of it merely serve to obscure genuine disagreements about the nature of adjudication, and about the effects of institutions on judicial performance. In response, it may be noted that definitional uncertainties, flowing from competing normative theories, necessarily inhere in essentially contested concepts. Nonetheless, if such concepts are valuable in orienting debate teleologically, then the fact that there is uncertainty about the precise content of judicial independence does not undercut this value.

We now consider in what respects judicial independence is a ‘solution concept’. Generally speaking, scholars engaged in debates about the content of judicial independence understand that protections for judicial independence serve the salutary purpose of insulating those charged with adjudicating disputes from pressures that would lead them to decide cases on the basis of irrelevant or inappropriate considerations. These considerations may relate to the actions of parties to a dispute, or of third parties such as the state, or to their personal self-interest. The relevant protections may be designed to safeguard the integrity of the process of adjudication, of the judiciary as a whole, or of individual judges. Particular conceptions of judicial independence aim to clarify the nature of the objective of safeguarding the decision-making capacity of judges and to identify the institutional, political, and cultural conditions necessary to bring about that objective, in a particular context. Viewed in this light, contestation between rival conceptions not only enriches understanding of the legal-political problems that judicial independence marks out and is meant to solve, but also of the conditions propitious to its flourishing.

Seeing judicial independence as a contested solution concept has implications for one other general objection sometimes advanced by critics. According to that objection, because empirical evidence demonstrates that judges do not make decisions based exclusively on existing formal legal considerations, the notion of judicial independence is a myth. Yet one can accept the empirical claim and still have productive discussions about judicial independence. This is because the objective of limiting the influence of improper influences on judicial decision-making is not coextensive with the objective of eliminating from such decision-making considerations that go beyond the facts and law as presented by litigants.

Most contemporary legal theorists accept that courts cannot resolve difficult legal questions by appealing to existing legal materials alone. There may be disagreement about the appropriate degree and extent to which other considerations bear on judicial decision-making, and indeed even on the scope of the considerations that may be invoked. Nonetheless, all reasonable participants in the debate accept that some considerations and some influences are inappropriate. For instance, no one contends that the ‘telephone justice’ of Soviet courts, wherein political actors dictated to judges the results of cases before them, and judges followed those dictates because they wanted to receive perquisites in exchange for doing so, reflects an appropriate conception of judicial independence.

This limit on what the idea of judicial independence can reasonably entail reinforces the claim that judicial independence is a solution concept whose aim is to delineate the influences that can be appropriately brought to bear on judicial decision-making and the considerations that can be appropriately considered by judges. Despite what various authors have claimed, judicial independence is not a mere rhetorical device, nor is it a concept devoid of content, nor is it a form of ex post justification for judicial preferences. It is, rather, an essentially contested concept that presents a particular normative question to which scholarly and professional participants in debates about judicial independence attempt to respond.

2. The Intrinsic Value of Judicial Independence and the Concept of Judicial Virtue

If one accepts that judicial independence is an essentially contested concept and that those engaged in debates about the idea's content are involved in a normative undertaking, one would want to know more about the nature of this concept. The previous section argued that preserving decisional independence for judges is a good in itself. In this section we consider what the nature of that good is. Some contemporary scholars claim that judicial independence is inherently instrumental. Judicial independence is not an intrinsic good, they argue, because no one would advocate for judicial license, unlimited by any constraints. This argument rests on a non sequitur. It is possible to conceive of judicial independence as an intrinsic good without claiming that such a conception implies that judicial independence entails unfettered judicial discretion. Indeed, we shall argue that a virtue ethics approach to judicial independence, which conceives of judicial independence as an intrinsic good, is superior to instrumental approaches.

In order to explain why judicial independence is an intrinsic good, we must consider two ideas that often arise in debates about judicial independence: impartiality and accountability. Scholars routinely argue that independence and impartiality are distinct concepts. The judiciary and individual judges may enjoy independence from improper external influence, scholars argue, yet judges may nonetheless fail to decide cases impartially if they fail to weigh relevant considerations when making their decisions. Other scholars have argued that a central challenge for constitutional systems lies in designing institutions that ensure the correct mix of judicial independence and judicial accountability. Close consideration of the ideas of impartiality, independence, and accountability, leads us towards a non-consequentialist, virtue-centered justification for judicial independence.

Kim Scheppele has claimed that in order for judges to be truly independent they must be in a position to examine the rules of positive law in light of principles that are at some greater level of generality and at some temporal remove from the statutes that judges are called on to apply. Where judges are protected from improper external influences by institutional safeguards, this recourse to higher law acts as an additional guarantee that judges are properly restrained, and are not deciding cases in accordance with mere whims or personal predilections. We interpret Scheppele to be arguing that a judge makes appropriate use of her independence when she properly fulfills her role as a judge, and part of that role involves acting impartially, or in Scheppele's terms, in accordance with a reasoned understanding of norms that are not commands dictated to her by political actors or interested parties. Scholars claim that the requirement to give reasons grounded in ex ante principle distinguishes courts from the political branches. It is primarily through this kind of reason-giving that judges are held accountable to citizens for their decisions, and this form of accountability is distinct from the political mechanisms that render political actors accountable. One might say that judges most fully occupy their institutional role when they engage in principled reasoning.

This focus on the role of the judge characterizes virtue jurisprudence, which positions itself as an alternative to consequentialist approaches to jurisprudence. Virtue jurisprudence focuses on the characteristics or virtues associated with the judicial role, rather than on the consequences of judicial decision-making. In this chapter, we claim that, in any given context, a particular admixture of procedural, institutional, and personal mechanisms for safeguarding independence and accountability can be designed to provide decisional contexts in which judges can be faithful to the role of the virtuous judge. What distinguishes our approach from consequentialist ones is that we do not assess the value of judicial independence in terms of its potential extra-judicial consequences, such as the realization of liberal-democratic values, market efficiency, or socio-political stability. Rather, we understand the idea of judicial independence and the role of the judge that this idea implies, to be a good in itself.

One problem with consequentialist approaches is that the ends to which judicial independence can be said to aim are various and in some instances conflicting. For example, some scholars argue that in established liberal democracies an independent judiciary secures particular ends, including: (1) the regulation of relations among citizens and between citizens and the government according to well-defined laws which clearly set out rights and duties and (2) the provision of a mutually acceptable third party adjudicator to settle disputes about the content of those rights and duties. But established liberal democracies are not the only polities that value judicial independence. Authoritarian regimes may create either the patina or the substance of independent judicatories not to safeguard liberal-democratic ends, but rather, among other reasons: (1) to secure social control, by providing an appearance of legitimacy and by monitoring administrative agencies, (2) to send credible signals of market stability to foreign investors, and (3) to offload controversial policy decisions. Similarly, governing parties in emerging democracies may create independent judicatories either as a form of ‘political insurance’ against subsequent electoral reversals or as ‘commitment’ mechanisms to safeguard their policies should they lose office.

This variety of possible extra-judicial objectives which the concept of judicial independence can be said to advance makes it difficult to conceive of a coherent instrumentalist approach to the concept. By contrast, a virtue-centered approach to judicial independence focusing on the role of the judge can be broadly captured in a formulation that applies across contexts. It is, for this reason, superior to an instrumentalist approach which must respond to the existence of contestable and sometimes conflicting ends. It is to our understanding of the judicial role and its attendant virtues that we now turn.

3. Delimiting the Scope of Judicial Independence

In this chapter, we adopt Martin Shapiro’s concept of judicial activity. He writes:

> Cutting quite across cultural lines, it appears that whenever two persons come into a conflict that they cannot themselves solve, one solution appealing to common sense is to call upon a third for assistance in achieving a resolution. So universal across both time and space is this simple social invention of triads that we can discover almost no society that fails to employ it. And from its overwhelming appeal to common sense stems the basic legitimacy of courts everywhere. In short, the triad for purposes of conflict resolution is the basic social logic of courts, a logic so compelling that courts have become a universal political phenomenon.

The utility of a broadly cast concept of the judicial action is that it enables us to focus on important substantive features of the judicial role, and in so doing avoid two problems that arise from approaches that attend only to those entities of the modern state which are denominated as ‘courts’.

First, in our view, such a formalist approach is under-inclusive and treats the peripheral case as central. By contrast, if the mechanisms of judicial independence are understood to safeguard a social institution that supports a particular role, then a functionalist, rather than a formalist, approach to the scope of the concept seems warranted. Such an approach enables one to see how and to what extent both state and non-state entities that fulfill this socio-political role should have their independence safeguarded. A functional approach flows, moreover, from adopting a virtue-centered conception of judicial independence. Such a conception points to the personal characteristics of judges which enable them to fulfill this socio-political role. A virtue-centered approach looks to how institutional and cultural conditions that protect judicial independence both facilitate the exercise of judicial virtues including temperance, courage, intelligence, and wisdom, and discourage judges from falling prey to judicial vices such as corruption, cowardice, incompetence, and foolishness. Since we are concerned with how the role of the judge and its attendant virtues and vices plays into the concept of judicial independence, we are not preoccupied with whether actors fulfilling that role occupy a particular office denominated in a particular way by the state.

The second pitfall that we avoid in adopting this functional conception of judicial action is that of over-inclusiveness. Not all activities undertaken by those state entities denominated as ‘courts’ are judicial, and not all activities undertaken by those named as judges involve adjudication. As a consequence, not all protections of judicial independence need extend equally to all the activities of all courts and all the activities of all judges. For instance, if courts are engaged fundamentally in lawmaking, rather than in the resolution of conflicts in accordance with preexisting rules, then it is foreseeable that a variety of institutional mechanisms will aim at curtailing the independence of courts and ensuring that they are responsive to public opinion. In short, we adopt an open-ended and functionalist understanding of what constitutes judicial activity because such an understanding opens avenues of research and permits fine-grained analyses that a formalist approach forecloses.
A virtue-centered functional approach also enables us to take a broad view of the concept of constitutional independence. We consider courts that have a constitutional function. In addition, we examine the question of what structural and institutional features appear to have a constitutional foundation, whether that be elaborated in a text or in unwritten constitutional principle, and whether these features apply only to state institutions or whether they apply to non-state domestic and international institutions as well. With this virtue-centered approach to judicial independence and this conception of the judicial role in view we can set out our comparative law methodology and illustrate its pertinence with specific examples.

III. The Comparative Law of Judicial Independence

Comparative private law scholars have long engaged in taxonomic exercises, often with reference to legal systems or legal families understood in formalistic terms. Even those who use functional analysis to contrast particular legal doctrines, rely on traditional taxonomies—civil law, common law, socialist law, customary law—as analytic categories. More recently, public law scholars have favored instead a comparative methodology that focuses on generating testable hypotheses about institutional design choices. This type of approach is particularly useful for exploring a virtue-centered understanding of judicial independence. It is evident in several studies considered in this section where scholars advance hypotheses about which social, economic, and political factors influence political actors constitutionally to entrench judicial independence or judicial review. It is also reflected in studies of how various institutional and socio-cultural influences can determine how broad the scope of independent judicial decision-making is.

These comparative studies reveal that different institutional, cultural, and political contexts give rise to different understandings of the appropriate influences that can be brought to bear on judicial decision-making. Those differences can be internal to a particular jurisdiction, or revealed in comparisons drawn across jurisdictions or across time. As we shall soon see, the significance of judicial independence and the configuration of institutional arrangements that safeguard it may differ depending (inter alia) on whether the judiciary belongs to the common or civil law system, on whether courts have effective enforcement powers, and on whether there is broad societal support for an independent judiciary. These background conditions can influence the configuration of appointments procedures, modes of determining remuneration and of advancing through the hierarchy and securing tenure, as well as the degree of the judicial branch's administrative independence and the extent to which the legislative and executive branches respond to judicial pronouncements.

Each context-specific variation represents, in our view, a particular understanding of the concept of judicial independence. By examining this diversity of understandings, we advance our ability to assess the value of judicial independence, of its attributes, and of the institutional and cultural conditions necessary for its flourishing.

In the sections that follow, we present different comparative approaches to judicial independence. The first section considers the kinds of incentives that scholars believe lie behind political decisions to establish independent judiciaries and cites examples of states whose decisions appear to be responding to these incentives. The second section examines the influences that scholars have claimed affect the nature and scope of judicial accountability and judicial discretion in a given state. We close our discussion by making normative, rather than explanatory or predictive, claims about judicial independence. Ultimately, we claim that a comparative law methodology aimed at different elements of institutional design reveals the value of a virtue-focused conception of judicial independence and that this methodology is superior to alternatives that aim at pure description or purportedly exhaustive taxonomies.

1. Judicial Independence and the Politics of Institutional Design

According to the first group of scholars that we examine, governments choose to create constitutionally independent judiciaries in response to political incentives. In this section, we examine three theories that purport to identify the incentives that motivate governmental decisions to establish constitutionally independent judiciaries: (1) insurance theory; (2) commitment theory; and (3) rule of law theory.

(a) Insurance Theory

Perhaps the most prominent proponent of the insurance theory is Tom Ginsburg. Ginsburg builds his argument on... empirical evidence that strongly suggests that constitutional designers are motivated by their own short-term interests, rather than by the long-term interests of their societies. He formulates his general prediction as follows: ‘Explicit constitutional power of and access to judicial review will be greater where political forces are diffused than where a single dominant party exists at the time of constitutional design.’

Where a majority party dominates at the moment of constitution-making and anticipates continued domination, argues Ginsburg, there are few incentives to create a neutral judiciary charged with enforcing the constitutional bargain. The majority party will instead seek to maximize its ability to exercise power flexibly and will resist any measures or institutional checks that would limit that flexibility. By contrast, where there is political competition at the moment of constitutional founding, the party in power will anticipate the possibility of political reversal and will introduce institutions that limit the powers of subsequent majorities. An independent judiciary vested with a power of judicial review is one such institution and is a low-cost means by which constitutional founders seek to protect themselves and their policies against reversal by subsequent majorities. An independent judiciary provides a forum, outside majoritarian institutions, for minority voices to exercise political influence.

Ginsburg and others have tested the insurance theory in a variety of contexts and have found that the data seems to confirm the theory. For instance, scholars note that only after the Labor Party in Israel ceased to dominate the political scene, and there emerged a pattern of alternation between Likud and Labor were legislators sufficiently motivated to eventually pass two Basic Laws that enabled the Israeli Supreme Court to void legislation that contravened those laws.

Jodi Finkel's examination of the judiciaries in Argentina, Peru, and Mexico in the 1990s offers a nuanced version of the insurance theory that distinguishes between the initiation and the implementation stages of judicial reform. In the initiation stage, ruling parties create independent judiciaries to hedge against potential political downturns, and typically need to seek the support of opposition parties to satisfy super-majority requirements for constitutional amendment. However, once the initiation phase is completed, legislative reforms are necessary to implement the changes, and such implementation only requires the support of legislative majorities. At this point, the ruling party may aggressively assert executive control over the judiciary as the Fujimori regime did in Peru in the 1990s. But once faced with the risk of losing power due to political scandals, the regime reversed its policies and introduced reforms that sharply lessened executive control over the judicial branch.

(b) Commitment Theory

A second theory meant to explain why states may constitutionalize judicial independence propounds that legislative bargains struck by political interest groups are best preserved both by legislative procedural rules that increase the cost of repealing legislation and by judicial review by an independent judiciary. According to this version of commitment theory, which has been developed by William Landes and Richard Posner, an independent judiciary will interpret legislation in accordance with the original legislative bargain.

The hypothesis is that because the value to political actors of an independent judiciary is a function of the predictability of judicial decisions and of the judiciary's willingness to enforce original legislative bargains, judges themselves are incentivized by self-interest to enforce those bargains and not to interpret legislation in ways that reflect the preferences of shifting legislative majorities. In addition, standard measures of protecting judicial independence, such as lengthy tenures and rules against ex parte contact insulate judges from interest group pressure. Those who adopt this theory also predict that where courts are willing to nullify legislative bargains, legislative actors will create administrative adjudicative bodies, with fewer safeguards for independence, even though these bodies, because of lower degrees of independence from interest group and legislative pressure, will generate less consistent decisions over time than will the judiciary.

Commitment theorists hypothesize that the scope and extent of a polity's constitutional protections for judicial independence will depend on the expected duration of legislative bargains. Scholars claim that when legislators enjoy tenures long enough to credibly offer to interest-groups long-term commitments, the value of an independent judiciary to legislators is lower. Legislators under these conditions will limit the independence of the judiciary by shortening the tenure of judges, either through introducing judicial elections or by appointing older judges. In addition, commitment theorists predict an inverse relationship between legislative tenure and judicial tenure; they posit that the longer the tenure of the legislators, the greater will be judicial turnover. The United States has been the primary site for testing the commitment theory approach, although others such as Mark Ramseyer have extended the analysis to jurisdictions, including Japan in the period in which that country was dominated by the Liberal Democratic Party, and concluded that this dominance correlated with a less independent judiciary.57

(c) Rule of Law Theory

We label ‘the rule of law theory’ a third approach to explaining when states will create and support independent judiciaries. According to this theory, an independent judiciary is one element of a rule of law regime which secures property rights and guarantees the enforcement of contracts.58 La Porta et al have undertaken a global survey of jurisdictions, using a variety of measures ranging from subjective perceptions of the security of property rights to the extent of state ownership of commercial banks to evaluate degrees of economic freedom.59 Their multi-jurisdiction survey of de jure and de facto institutions and procedures concludes that, in a given state, there is a strong causal relationship between judicial independence and high degrees of economic freedom.

Gretchen Helmke and Frances Rosenbluth dispute this claim about the causal effects of judicial independence, arguing that judicial independence does not automatically lead to respect for rule of law values, or to economic progress.60 They conclude that whether the rule of law thrives is dependent on a range of factors, including a culture of public commitment to the institutions that support the rule of law and a system of separation of powers, of which an independent judiciary may be, but need not be, a part.

However this debate about the causal effects is resolved, it bears notice that some regimes will create at least the appearance of an independent judiciary in order to offer assurances to foreign investors. China is often cited as a case in point, although the efforts of the Chinese Communist Party have drawn criticism on the basis that they do not satisfy minimum criteria for judicial independence.61 Moreover, as Randall Peerenboom argues, to assess the extent to which Chinese judges enjoy independence, it is important to examine closely the institutional and socio-political facts, rather than simply cataloging de jure indicators, and weighing vaguely formulated de facto measures.62 The point is that scholars should be sensitive to context, and to the internal complexity of the Chinese judicial and political system.

Peerenboom notes that although the Communist Party exerts influence on the judicial system (as is inevitable in a one-party socialist state), such influence cannot simply be presumed to be pernicious. Sometimes Party policies will limit access to courts to enhance the authority of the courts. For example, the Party has instituted policies to direct socio-economic disputes away from the courts, which lack resources and are incompetent to deal with them, towards administrative reconsideration, mediation, arbitration, public hearings and the political process more generally. ... Forcing the courts to handle such cases had undermined the authority of the judiciary and contributed to a sharp rise in petitions and mass protests.64

This sensitivity to the particularities of the political, economic, and social context in which judiciaries are situated suggests that general context-independent causal claims about judicial independence should be advanced with care. Not only does context influence whether a particular state will claim to be promoting the constitutional independence of the judiciary, it will affect whether a state promotes judicial independence in practice. Context will also affect which of the inventory of possible design outcomes are necessary to achieve, in a particular state, the desired outcome of insulating judges from improper influence. In the next section, we argue that a productive path for scholars of comparative judicial independence lies in assessing factors that shape the context in which judges make decisions.

2. Contexts for Judicial Independence

The literature examined so far focuses on the factors that influence initial decisions by governments to create the institutions of an independent judiciary. In this section we look at studies that examine the factors that shape the extent to which judges can, in fact, exercise independent judgment. These factors include (1) the presence of an authoritarian regime, (2) the existence of cultural norms that downplay adjudication as a settlement device, (3) a commitment in civil and political society to judicial independence, and (4) whether the legal system falls within the civil law or common law tradition.
(a) Authoritarianism and Its Effects on Judicial Independence

Scholars have shown that authoritarian regimes create independent judiciaries for a variety of reasons. In addition, they have sought to describe the socio-political conditions under which authoritarian regimes are most likely to do so. In this section, we explore how these regimes create incentive-structures that influence judicial decision-making. Tamir Moustafa and Tom Ginsburg have cataloged several ways in which authoritarian regimes will set boundaries for the exercise of judicial independence. First, through the threat of retribution, these regimes can encourage courts to act with self-restraint. The authors note that courts under such circumstances may reason expansively in some areas of law, but not in areas that affect the core interests of the relevant regime. Egypt is a prime example of a state where the constitutional court offered rulings that expansively interpreted individual rights and limited the executive, but ‘never ruled on constitutional challenges to the emergency laws or civilian transfers to military courts, which formed the bedrock of regime dominance.’

A second way in which regimes can constrain courts is by fragmenting the judicial system. Regimes can funnel politically sensitive disputes away from ordinary courts and towards adjudicative bodies over which they exert substantial executive control. In so doing, regimes limit the power of courts, without directly undermining their independence. Moustafa and Ginsburg point to Franco’s Spain as an authoritarian regime in which the courts enjoyed considerable formal and de facto independence, but had a limited sphere of decision-making authority, since the regime had established a parallel adjudicative system to deal with politically sensitive matters.

Authoritarian regimes can further constrain the capacity of courts to display judicial independence by limiting access to them, either by imposing procedural and financial barriers to access or, more commonly, by tightly limiting the kinds of disputes that courts will hear. For example, in Mexico the autocratic regime created a procedure (the amparo trial) that enabled citizens to challenge state action in the courts, but limited the scope of the courts’ jurisdiction such that it precluded challenges based on ‘expropriation of property, harsh economic regulation, and the violation of due process’. The independence of these courts is limited because the reasons for which parties can access them are limited. The result, at least in the Mexican case, is that the regime can monitor low-level administrative actors, but insulates itself from rights-based challenges.

Finally, authoritarian regimes can constrain the courts by appealing to extra-judicial factors. Sometimes this is achieved by appealing to (or inventing) traditional cultural norms that promote dispute settlement by non-adjudicative means such as an appeal to elders or conciliation processes. Alternatively, some regimes seek to undermine supports for an independent judiciary—a strong bar, a free press, active NGOs, a popular culture of legalism in the general population—within wider civil society. We discuss these informal methods of limiting judicial independence, whether arising in authoritarian or democratic regimes, in the next two sections.

(b) The Influence of Cultural Norms Downplaying Adjudication

Some have noted that judicial independence can be curtailed in jurisdictions where there is no tradition of adjudication as a mode of dispute resolution. Graig Avino has argued that throughout China’s history, Confucianism has been considered the dominant ideology, and that Confucianism emphasizes persuasion, education, moral example, social hierarchy, and mediation as mechanisms for social control, and relegates traditional legal institutions, including courts, to a secondary status. In contemporary China the idea of an independent judiciary is unfamiliar because of this general preference for Confucian modes of social regulation, and because of the Cultural Revolution, which decimated a nascent legal system. Avino lists various indicators that support his claim. These include: (1) political control over judicial decision-making at every level of the judiciary; (2) judges who are not trained in law and are often appointed precisely because they can be expected to answer directly to political officials; and (3) endemic corruption in the judiciary. He concludes that recent judicial reforms, which aim to create an independent judiciary, are as yet insufficient to overcome these impediments.

As noted, some scholars consider such claims about judicial independence in China to be overdrawn. Others have directly challenged the claim about the influence of cultural beliefs like Confucianism on judicial independence. According to Ginsburg, a close examination of the recent history of Thailand, Korea, Taiwan, and Mongolia reveals that cultural barriers did not preclude the emergence of courts that were willing to engage in aggressive constitutional review and to significantly constrain political actors. This analysis is particularly striking because authoritarian regimes in East Asia have routinely invoked Confucian ideas to justify their rule, and because the intellectual history and resources of the region provide little to support indigenous theories of judicial review by independent courts.\textsuperscript{74}

Despite these cultural obstacles, countries in East Asia during the 1980s and 1990s joined in the global trend of instituting judicial review of legislative and executive action.\textsuperscript{75} Moreover, in each state he examined, Ginsburg found constitutional courts to be assertive in their judicial review function and that their institutional contexts supported this assertiveness. He concludes that two variables best explain the emergence of assertive judicial review in the countries he surveys: the existence of a middle class, and the diffusion of political power amongst political parties.\textsuperscript{76}

\textbf{(c) A Commitment in Civil and Political Society to Judicial Independence}

If the East Asian example provides mixed evidence about whether cultural variables influence a state’s receptivity to judicial independence and openness to the related phenomenon of aggressive constitutional review, other analyses suggest that judicial independence is likely to thrive in contexts where the civic and political culture supports the idea of insulating the judiciary from inappropriate political interference. Daniel Beers argues, based on two Central European case studies, that informal political and judicial culture is a better predictor of whether courts will exercise their judgment independently from external influences than are formal institutional indicia of judicial independence.\textsuperscript{77} Beers claims that in Romania, formal institutional structures supporting judicial independence were created in response to pressures from external actors, including the European Union, but without the support of domestic elites.\textsuperscript{78} By contrast, he notes that although the formal safeguards of judicial independence in the Czech Republic are much less sophisticated than those in Romania, Czech political and legal elites have fostered a culture of commitment to judicial independence.

Judges in the two countries were surveyed regarding judicial autonomy (their perceived degree of freedom from undue influence of outside actors or superiors), judicial integrity (susceptibility of judges to corruption), and the morale of the judiciary (professional satisfaction and commitment of judges).\textsuperscript{79} Czech judges perceived significantly higher degrees of autonomy and integrity in their judicial system than did Romanian judges in theirs. To the extent that such perceptions are accurate indicators of the degree of independence the judiciary in fact enjoys, Beers’ analysis suggests that, in states having recently become democracies, the informal culture of political and legal elites plays a more significant role in fostering judicial independence than do formal legal protections.

The experience of states in Latin America provides additional support for this conclusion. Rachel Sieder notes that significant investments in institutional reform of the Guatemalan legal system have not yielded an independent and effective judiciary, in large part because ‘historical processes, cultural understandings and material interests’ have militated against it.\textsuperscript{80} According to Sieder, despite wide-ranging legal reforms, some of which were instituted with the support of international organizations,\textsuperscript{81} there is pervasive corruption in the judiciary. Because Guatemalan judges are poorly trained and poorly paid, and largely immune from effective oversight, they are susceptible to corruption. Moreover, powerful elite groups, including the military, exercise significant influence in the judicial system and engage in extensive interference with judicial processes. As a consequence, she concludes, the public distrusts the justice system and relies instead on private solutions, including vigilante activities and extra-judicial executions, thus further undermining the authority of the state judicial system.\textsuperscript{82}

By contrast, Columbia’s Constitutional Court has effectively and actively controlled government abuses of power, in significant part because of widespread support for the court (p. 850) within civil society. Rodrigo Uprimny claims that this effectiveness can be explained by: (1) an established history of judicial review; (2) widespread disenchantment with the political processes, which led the population to seek from the judiciary resolutions of political disputes; (3) alliances between justices on the court and social actors to advance progressive constitutional values; and (4) a broad social understanding that it is appropriate for courts to engage in assertive judicial review.\textsuperscript{83} These social and cultural factors, combined with a range of institutional factors (i.e., a low-cost, accessible system of constitutional review, centralized authority in the Constitutional Court, and substantial financial investment in the Court), to support the actions of an independent-minded judiciary.\textsuperscript{84}

\textbf{(d) Civil Law versus Common Law}

Although the tendency of comparative public law scholars today is to shift attention away from legal families and towards particular legal institutions, legal family comparisons are sometimes adopted in order to examine ways in which institutional characteristics of common and civil law systems shape the extent to which judges can exercise independent judgment. This approach does not presume that legal traditions have distinct and incommensurable epistemologies; rather, scholars examine the institutional features of legal traditions in order to assess whether and, if so, how these features might affect the ways in which judges actually decide cases.85

Some have argued that the significant differences between common and civil law systems as to how judges are appointed and how they advance through the judicial hierarchy influence the extent to which they exercise independent judgment. For instance, Charles Koch has argued that because civilian judges are specifically trained to be judges, and self-select and self-regulate, they are more likely to exercise independent judgment than their common law counterparts.86 He claims that unlike common law judges, who bring to their positions prior experiences as lawyers, the civilian system of training inculcates in judges ‘an otherworldly objectivity’.87 Moreover, he notes that because civil law judges self-regulate they are not subject to external pressures, as are, for instance administrative law judges in the United States who do not enjoy security of tenure and who carry out the vast majority of adjudications.88 Finally, notes Koch, judges in the civilian tradition engage in peer monitoring, which occurs through mentorship and through training that leads to advancement. According to him, collective decision-making of this kind provides opportunities for judges to check corruption and to overcome cognitive biases.89

While Koch highlights these features of civilian courts to illustrate how they contribute to greater degrees of judicial independence, others have argued that some of these features can undermine judicial independence.90 Consider the issue of control over advancement in civil law systems. In the Japanese system, there is a judicial administrative office, the Secretariat, which is staffed by judges, is controlled by justices of the Supreme Court (who are politically appointed), and is responsible for assigning judges to (more or less prestigious) geographic locations and for moving judges up and down the judicial hierarchy. According to Ramseyer and Rasmusen, judges ‘who flout the ruling party in politically volatile cases pay a career penalty’;91 the Secretariat effectively punishes them through its assignment and promotion decisions.92 Garoupa and Ginsburg argue that common law judges, by contrast, have fewer opportunities for career advancement and for changes in assignment, and are therefore less susceptible to being influenced by decisions relating to these matters than are civil law judges.93

In addition to distinguishing common and civil law systems on the basis of their appointment, management, and advancement practices, scholars have argued that differences in degrees of bureaucratization and forms of reasoning have implications for the extent of judicial independence in the two traditions.94 Edward Glaeser and Andrei Shleifer claim that codification of law facilitates centralised state control over courts, whereas common law principles do not. The authors argue that civil codes are compilations of bright-line rules and that the underlying purpose of codification is for the legislature to control judges: these rules limit the scope of judicial discretion and allow the legislators to verify and monitor the decisions of judges.95 By contrast, Glaeser and Shleifer argue that common law judges have greater interpretive autonomy as they, rather than the legislature, establish the precedents that guide common law reasoning. Even when interpreting statutes and codified bodies of law, they also assert, common law judges do so in light of common law principles and of the specific facts of the case.96

These claims have attracted a range of criticisms, including that the differences between common and civil law traditions are exaggerated. Gillian Hadfield notes that comprehensive codes exist in common law countries, and that statutory regimes in civil law countries dealing with, for instance, environmental regulation are indistinguishable from those found in common law countries.97 Moreover, authors note that civil law judges do not necessarily ignore decisions by previous courts, nor do civil law judges deny that they sometimes exercise a policy-making function.98 Finally, the claims about relative degrees of legislative control over judges do not account for the fact that in civil law jurisdictions, as elsewhere, courts have been engaged in aggressive judicial review of legislation.99 Particularly relevant for the present discussion is the fact that constitutional courts in civil law jurisdictions have engaged in expansive modes of interpretation that do not conform to the image of a judiciary bound by legislative dictates. As Alec Stone Sweet has observed, in France, the Constitutional Council has generated novel constitutional principles and in Germany, the Federal Constitutional Court has engaged in broad interpretations of the constitutional text.100

This survey of the literature suggests that the correlation of degrees of judicial independence with membership in a particular legal family is not self-evident. Nonetheless, we suggest that the impetus underlying public law scholars’ arguments about correlations—namely, identifying factors that influence judicial decision-making—is a useful one.
It reflects, indeed, the contemporary focus in the judicial independence literature on those institutional design elements which are assumed to protect judicial independence.\textsuperscript{101}

3. The Virtues of Judging

In the previous section we explored what Lydia Tiede has called the ‘institutional approach’ to judicial independence, in which ‘certain institutional configurations, or rules of the game, affect the behavior of political actors’.\textsuperscript{102} We close this section with some reflections on the relationship between, on the one hand, the institutional and cultural contexts in which judges exercise judgment and, on the other hand, the role of the virtuous judge.

We begin our discussion by discussing two virtues identified by Pimentel: judicial courage and judicial integrity. According to Pimentel, this form of courage ‘enables the judge to withstand pressures and influences, even threats and exercise true independence in her decision-making.’\textsuperscript{103} Judicial integrity, he argues, is a necessary supplement to judicial courage and entails ‘a commitment to the highest principles of judicial decision-making’.\textsuperscript{104} These judicial virtues are related, but not reducible to the institutional analyses surveyed above. Features of their institutional context may provide incentives for judges to exercise independent judgment, or may offer disincentives for doing so. Nonetheless, a conception of judicial independence that emphasizes judicial virtues requires judges in some circumstances to resist the incentive structure in which they operate. Judges acting in accordance with the virtues exercise phronesis, or practical wisdom, and features of the contexts in which judges are trained, appointed, and work can cultivate and support the judicial capacity for practical wisdom.\textsuperscript{105} (p. 853)

But even (or perhaps especially) in the absence of such supporting features, judges can exercise independent judgment or judgment that does not respond to inappropriate influences.

In examining what such judgment entails, we fold what Tiede has called the ‘strategic interaction approach’ into our conception of the necessary connection between judicial independence and judicial virtue. According to this approach, judges are strategic actors who recognize that in order to attain their preferred outcomes on issues they need to understand and anticipate the preference of other institutional actors, including legislatures, the executive, and other judges or courts.\textsuperscript{106} An approach animated by the judicial virtues introduces two insights into this discussion. First, rather than conceive of judges as being motivated by a desire to induce legislators, executive actors and lower courts to comply with their personal policy preferences, a virtue-focused conception of judging understands judges to be making normative judgments that are not motivated by self-interest. Under such an approach, judges who exemplify judicial courage will write decisions that reflect their best interpretations of the law and relevant public policy. Of course, the elected branches may try to exert influence over the judiciary by, for instance, strategic appointments, limiting its resources, increasing the number of administrative agencies, and thus lessening the courts’ ability to supervise government decision-making or to enforce compliance with their judgments.\textsuperscript{107} The point we make here, however, is that when exercising the virtue of judicial courage, judges resist pressures on them to make self-interested judgments, whatever the institutional context in which they operate.

Recent examples of the virtue of courage include the experience of Judge J. Skelly Wright, a district court judge in Louisiana during the 1950s and 1960s who was the object of intense public criticism and threats of violence because of his desegregation rulings, and of Italian prosecuting magistrates such as Giovanni Falcone, who were murdered for their decisions. These examples are particularly striking, but there are myriad ways in which to exhibit judicial courage. Judges in systems that tie career advancement to judgments favoring the government can exhibit courage by ignoring these inducements. Similarly, judges in cultural and societal contexts in which corruption is endemic and political reprisals for decisions contrary to the interests of government are common can exercise their judgment without regard to these pressures. Finally, judges can exhibit courage by not seeking the approval of the press, the academy, or interest groups. In all of these instances, judicial courage is evidenced by a willingness to make decisions based on one's best understanding of the relevant legal principles. Of course, one can characterize the belief that one should be bound by legal principle as reflecting a personal preference. Yet, as others have argued, it is this kind of belief that marks out legal from non-legal reasoning, and moreover, it is a commitment to this kind of reasoning that characterizes the role of the judge.\textsuperscript{108} Difficult questions about judicial independence arise in circumstances where judges are called upon to make pragmatic judgments about how the political branches will respond to judicial decisions. Some scholars measure judicial independence by referring to the number of times that a court rules against the government. Sophisticated models have been developed to identify when courts will act strategically in anticipation of government reprisals. Scholars examining US courts argue that in the face of likely reprisals a judge will ‘forego his or her most preferred choice and instead choose the next best option that he or she believes the other relevant institutional actors will support.’ In her analysis of the Argentine judiciary in the period from 1976 to 1999, Gretchen Helmke has argued that where judges do not enjoy effective protections against government reprisals, judges will engage in ‘strategic defection’. This form of defection occurs when judges who share the preferences of the incumbent regime rule against it in anticipation of imminent regime change. Under these conditions, judges fear reprisals from the next government and render decisions to send signals in order to lessen the likelihood of potential reprisals from that government.

The challenge for a virtue-centered conception of judicial independence lies in distinguishing cases that represent a reasoned and pragmatic interpretation of the law from those that evidence judicial self-interest. Constitutional law scholars have argued that when courts construct constitutional doctrine, they make pragmatic judgments about their institutional competences and about the likely institutional effects of their decisions. These scholars argue against perfectionist accounts of constitutional law, which imagine constitutional reasoning to be coextensive with political theory. Yet if constitutional doctrine is not identical to political theory, neither are the pragmatic judgments embedded in doctrine simple calculations based on self-interest, although they may overlap with self-interested actions. For instance, judges may refrain from issuing certain kinds of judgments because they are concerned that such judgments will attract governmental reprisals or governmental indifference that will undermine the credibility of the judiciary. In such circumstances, they may be making considered decisions about the importance of protecting the credibility of the judiciary as an institution, at the same time as they are advancing their self-interest. What is significant for our account is that judges are only acting virtuously to the extent that their judgment is grounded in the former kind of justification.

Theunis Roux finds an example of pragmatic constitutional reasoning that can be characterized as exemplifying constitutional integrity in the jurisprudence of the South African Constitutional Court concerning the manner in which the government allocates public resources. The scholarly literature routinely expresses concern about whether courts enjoy a democratic mandate or the institutional capacity to undertake this kind of review. Nonetheless, in a case challenging the constitutionality of a municipality’s failure to provide temporary shelter to a homeless community, the Court arrived at a holding that enabled it to enforce a constitutional right, without substituting its judgment for the judgment of the political branches about how to manage budgets. According to Roux, the Court found, in a holding reminiscent of Brown v Board of Education that ‘it was unreasonable for the state to exclude a significant element of society from the national housing programme, especially where such a group was poor or otherwise vulnerable.’ While nonetheless insisting that the political branches undertake reasonable measures to fulfill their constitutional obligations, the Court left them discretion to decide the timing and the amount of funding to allocate. Roux points to a variety of factors which have permitted the Court successfully to build its legitimacy and safeguard its jurisdictional authority in a period of constitutional transformation, notably that the judges themselves are of high caliber and that the judges broadly share the political views of the governing elites. For our purposes, the South African Court’s jurisprudence illustrates how judges can display the virtue of integrity—making pragmatic decisions that benefit the judiciary, without acting exclusively in their self-interest.

IV. Conclusion

Citizens have a legitimate interest in the quality of justice that is delivered by the several governance institutions of the state. In many contemporary states, the assumption is that the difficult issues of interpersonal, social, and economic justice will be settled by legislatures and that legislative enactments will be fairly administered by the agents of an accountable executive. In these states citizens also assume that should there be a disagreement about the meaning of a statute or other legal rule—whether the conflict is between citizens (private law), between citizen and state (administrative law), between citizen and society (criminal law), between orders and institutions of government (constitutional law), or about the fundamental principles of the legal order (the rule of law, civil liberties, human rights)—an independent, impartial third party institution (invariably courts) will hear the dispute and render a just decision.
While citizen intuitions about judicial independence find confirmation in constitutional theory and in the institutional arrangements actually in place in many states, the meaning of the concept is typically not well understood by the general public. The above review of the theory and practice of judicial independence reveals the complexity of the inquiry. Nevertheless, when we turn away from current examples and even from current theories we see that, in a broader sociological framework, the formalistic inquiry into institutions and practices promoting judicial independence could better be cast as one related to the integrity of “processes of social ordering.” What kind of research agenda would such an inquiry command?

An initial challenge is to understand the total social, economic, and political context within which the concept of judicial independence is invoked in a given state. However conventional it may be to consider the judiciary as a necessary branch of modern government, it bears remembering that the decision to establish a judiciary is a political choice. Hence the question why almost all contemporary states have an official agency to decide disputes and, in doing so, to articulate fundamental legal-political commitments. Moreover, however much it may be that mediation is an appropriate mechanism for dispute-resolution in many fields, there are some tasks (typically involving the constitution: separation of powers, division of powers, bills of rights) where an authoritative third party decision is required.119

Yet even after we have decided what we want courts to do and the qualities we want to see reflected in our judicial system, we are still a long way from knowing what institutional design to adopt. For we also need to decide whether achieving a close match between the outcomes produced by a given judicial process and the substantive outcomes we desire is the only goal that we would attribute to a process of system design. The point can be illustrated by posing the following hypothetical alternatives: Do we want a judicial process that will generate the best substantive outcomes, even if that process is secret, mysterious, anti-democratic, corrupt, costly, and slow? Or do we want a process that is open, accessible, democratic, honest, efficient, and cheap, even if it generates suboptimal outcomes? Much of the challenge in institutional design is to recognize, organize, and justify the inevitable trade-offs among the different goals—procedural and substantive—we seek to achieve. Understandably, these trade-offs may not be made in precisely the same way in all states.

To imagine the concept of judicial independence as a central feature of political governance is to conceive the judiciary as an institution that enables citizens to achieve an impartial resolution of inter-subjective conflict, and to conscript the resources of the state to the enforcement of judgments courts render. A meaningful concept of the judiciary as a governance institution speaks as much to issues of interdependence as it does to issues of independence. That is, in order for a judiciary to function as a governance institution, other substantive and procedural features must be present in a constitutional system. A judiciary assumes that there exist ex ante legal rules upon which citizens in a conflict may base a claim of right; it also assumes a rational process for framing, presenting, and contesting rights claims—rules of civil procedure, rules of evidence, the existence of a legal profession, a reasonably cheap, expeditious, and uncomplicated process that effects accessible justice; the possibility of designing remedies that provide a reasonable proxy for the actual hurt or conflict between the parties; the need for an effective process of enforcement of judgments; and finally, that the whole process, beginning to end, not be tainted by any hint of partiality, prejudice, or special interest—that all be equal before the law and before the judge.

To see the judiciary as an independent governance institution means that it stands apart from other governance institutions in a state and that it has a mind and will of its own under a doctrine of separation of powers sufficient to provide an effective check on the abuse of power by the political branches of government. The judiciary must have a high degree of structural autonomy and immunity. Autonomy and immunity sustain both the independence and the related, but distinct, idea of impartiality in the judicial process. A judiciary may be in principle independent, but in a particular case, a judge may not be impartial—that is, may display favoritism towards one party. So, for example, in a law suit against the government, or in a criminal trial, or in a case of judicial supervision of administrative discretion it is important that the judiciary be independent of the apparatus of the state—notably of the executive that has selected it, or the judicial bureaucracy within which a judge operates. Where decisions favor the state, it may be that although the judiciary is independent, it is not impartial and its decisions are coloured by inappropriate considerations. But impartiality may flow in the other direction. A judiciary may be independent of the executive and legislature but partial in favor of interests other than the state. Corporations may well have the resources to influence judicial decisions improperly. Some judges may refuse to convict obviously guilty murderers because they disbelieve in a mandatory death sentence.
At its most general level, applicable to all human decision-making institutions and roles, whether official or unofficial, public or private, judicial or non-judicial, the fundamental objective is to ensure that persons who have been assigned such a responsibility perform their function with due regard to the internal integrity of the role. Do we get good judges because we have good judicial institutions, or do we get good judicial institutions because we have good judges? The evidence worldwide is equivocal. Yet this much is clear. Because there is no such thing as mechanical judicial decision-making, there will always be a moment of personal judgment in every judicial decision. This suggests that the most important criterion for judicial independence and impartiality is the quality and character of the judges appointed. Institutional structure and procedures help to ensure that those already inclined to perform their role faithfully will do so, but structure and procedure will not alone lead to integrity of character in a morally lax person.

Independence requires fidelity to role—the personal integrity of the person appointed. To achieve a virtuous judiciary, it is not enough simply to choose them wisely. It is also necessary to: (1) celebrate their selection; (2) provide them with the information necessary to understand the tasks they will be expected to perform; (3) generate a commitment to the mission and the importance of the institution they are joining; (4) train them well; (5) provide them with meaningful feedback about their performance; (6) pay them decent salaries; (7) publicly value the job they are doing; (8) praise them for their successes; (9) provide them with the necessary help to do their job better; (10) furnish them with ongoing opportunities to learn and reflect about their role and responsibilities; (11) treat them properly and with respect; (12) give them a mandate that is within the capacity of a normal human being to accomplish; (13) avoid overburdening them with a caseload that is soul-destroying; and (14) defend them against ill-tempered and ill-considered critiques from those who have no clue about the nature of their job, the pressures they face, the pathologies and inconsistencies of the law they are meant to administer, and the sometimes perverse behavior of those who appear before them.\footnote{120}

All of the above factors operate in tandem with each other. The absence of a rigorous vetting of the quality of judges at the time of appointment might be compensated by structures and processes of in-service encadrement. The absence of institutional protections like life tenure and guaranteed remuneration might be compensated by strong administrative autonomy vested in courts. The absence of formal guarantees of independence in a written constitution might be compensated by a strong political and social culture supporting judicial integrity. The absence of a professional magistracy backed with years of training and a collegial decision-making process might be compensated by a legal culture that lionizes judges. How each of these plays out in any particular state and any particular institution will vary. The challenges and optimal responses are embedded in the sets of pressures that actually exist in time and place.

The fact that judicial independence is both an essentially contested concept, and can be achieved with a wide variety of matches of formal and informal, institutional and customary, ex ante and ex post, substantive and procedural norms, depending on the legal, political, and socio-economic-religious culture in a state, has implications for future comparative research. In our view, the appropriate research agenda would aim at discerning the strength of the norm of integrity among judges and their actual decision-making practices. It would also examine the institutional and cultural factors that are central in particular context to the inculcation, promotion, and protection of judicial virtue. This empirical and normatively focused inquiry promises more significant insights than taxonomic inventories of ‘standard institutional and procedural features’ that are purportedly necessary components of an independent judiciary.

Bibliography

Judicial Independence as a Constitutional Virtue

Peter H. Russell and David O'Brien (eds), Judicial Independence in the Age of Democracy (2001)

András Sajó (ed), Judicial Integrity (2004)

Martin Shapiro, Courts: A Comparative and Political Analysis (1981)

Notes:

(*) We gratefully acknowledge the research assistance of Allison Rhoades and Owen Ripley, both BCL/LLB 2011 graduates of the McGill Faculty of Law and the financial support of the SSHRC and the Ratpan Fund.

(5) On constitutional courts, see Chapter 38.
(6) See generally the essays in András Sajó (ed), Judicial Integrity (2004).

(8) For an example of the ‘checklist inventory’ of essential characteristics of a legal concept meant to enable a comparative assessment of the degree to which a given state respects that concept, see the World Justice Project, Rule of Law Index 2010 (2010).

(10) For a survey of such judicial pronouncements, see Norman Dorsen et al, Comparative Constitutionalism: Cases and Materials (2003), 308–27.

(13) Ibid 158.

(14) Levinson (n 11), 1298, observes that the concept is often strategically wielded in attempts to justify, without argument, institutional design choices that favor one set of values (ie, judicial autonomy) over others (ie, political accountability).

(16) In this chapter we claim that the judicial function follows what Martin Shapiro has called the ‘logic of triad in conflict resolution’. Martin Shapiro, Courts: A Comparative and Political Analysis (1981), 1. See further A. Kojève, Esquisse d’une phénoménologie du droit: exposé provisoire (1981). As it does for Shapiro and Kojève, this open-ended conception of the judicial function allows us to include in our analysis a wide range of institutions in which participants would recognizably be seen to be exercising judicial functions, even if they do not correspond to what Shapiro identifies as ‘the ideal type’ of courts. For individual and institutional aspects of judicial independence, see John Ferejohn, ‘Explaining Judges, Dependent Judiciary: Explaining Judicial Independence’ (1999) 72 Southern California Law Review 353, 354–6.

(17) Typically, authors argue that judicial independence involves insulation from the influence of the executive and legislative branches. See eg Irving R. Kaufman, ‘The Essence of Judicial Independence’ (1980) 80 Columbia Law Review 671 and William R. Lederman, ‘The Independence of the Judiciary’ (1956) 34 Canadian Bar Review 769. Authors have noted that judicial independence, in the sense of the independence of individual judges, can also be compromised by institutional features of the judicial branch. Eg, lower court judges may seek to advance to higher courts by drafting decisions that appeal to those in charge of selecting appellate court judges. See Levinson (n 11), 1302. Or they may seek to curry favor and choice assignments by deciding in ways that please the chief justice of their court. See Roderick A. Macdonald, ‘Appoint Elect, Draw Straws or Sell to the Highest Bidder? On Judicial Selection Processes’ in Pierre Noreau (ed), Mélanges Andrée Lajoie (2008), 731. Similarly, in Japan, judges are incentivized, for career reasons, to avoid negative assessments by senior peers. See J. Mark Ramseyer and Eric B. Rasmusen, ‘Why Are Japanese Judges So Conservative in Politically Charged Cases?’ (2001) 95 American Political Science Review 331.

(18) See Waldron (n 12), 152.

(19) See eg Terri Jennings Peretti, ‘Does Judicial Independence Exist? The Lessons of Social Science Research’ in Burbank and Friedman (n 15), 103.

(21) Some appellate court judges themselves acknowledge that the extent of their discretion is relatively broad, and that their decisions can, as a consequence, be fairly described as ‘legislative’ in nature. See eg Richard A. Posner, How Judges Think (2008), 15.

(28) Kim Lane Scheppele, ‘Declarations of Independence: Judicial Reactions to Political Pressure’ in Burbank and Friedman (n 15), 227, 245.

(30) Paul J. Kelly, ‘Impartiality: A Philosophical Perspective’ in Sajó (n 6), 17.

(32) For a similar, virtue-centered approach to judicial independence and accountability, which also rejects instrumentalist arguments for judicial independence, see David Pimentel, ‘Reframing the Independence v Accountability Debate: Defining Judicial Structure in Light of Judges’ Courage and Integrity’ (2009) 57 Cleveland State Law Review 2. See also Macdonald (n 17).

(33) For a similar, non-consequentialist approach to judicial independence, see Ammon Reichman, ‘Judicial Non-Dependence’ in Adam Dodek and Lorne Sossin (eds), Judicial Independence in Context (2010), 438, 441 n 7.

(34) Russell (n 24), 9–10.

(37) Shapiro (n 16), 1. See also Kojève (n 16) and Macdonald (n 17).

(39) For this list of judicial virtues and vices and what they entail, see Solum (n 31), 185–200.

(40) Indeed, scholars have noted that in certain circumstances, state-controlled adjudication may yield perverse consequences. In other situations, non-state adjudication is simply more prevalent than state-controlled adjudication. For the former, see Javier A. Couso, ‘The Politics of Judicial Review in Chile in the Era of Democratic Transition, 1990–2002’ in Gloppen et al (n 29), 70 at 88. For the latter, see Siri Glopen, ‘The Accountability Function of Courts in Tanzania and Zambia’ in Gloppen et al (n 29), 112 at 131.

(41) For the classic analysis of how courts in public law cases embrace activities beyond simple adjudication, see Abram Chayes, ‘The Role of the Judge in Public Law Litigation’ (1976) 89 Harvard Law Review 1281.

(42) See on this point, Stephen B. Burbank, ‘Judicial Independence, Judicial Accountability and Interbranch Relations’ (2008) 137 Daedalus 16, Nuno Garoupa and Tom Ginsburg, ‘Guarding the Guardians: Judicial Councils and Judicial Independence’ (2009) 57 American Journal of Comparative Law 103, and Friedman (n 29). For a comparative analysis of institutional responses, see Shapiro (n 16), 32–5. For a catalog of powers that post-socialist courts exercise, including powers that are explicitly legislative in nature, see Tom Ginsburg, ‘Beyond Judicial Review: Ancillary Powers of Constitutional Courts’ in Ginsburg and Kagan (n 38), 225. Of course, some lawmaking, such as the promulgation of rules of practice, is intrinsic to the adjudicative function, and should be covered by the judicial independence norm.

(43) In so framing how we understand the concept of ‘constitutionalized judicial independence’, we are characterizing the judicial role in light of our understanding of the normative question posed by the concept of judicial independence. Other analyses, undertaken for other purposes might highlight other aspects of the judicial role. For a brief statement of those aspects see the ‘Introduction’ and ‘Conclusion’ to this chapter.

(44) The leading proponent of this kind of comparative law over the past half century has been René David. See R. David and C. Jauffret-Spinozi, Les grands systèmes de droit comparé (11th edn, 2002). For an overview of the literature, and a proposal for a novel innovative taxonomic scheme, see H. Patrick Glenn, Legal Traditions of the World (4th edn, 2010).

(47) See Ferejohn (n 16), 377.

(48) Some have noted that the overwhelming focus of US scholarship has been on the Supreme Court, and have

(49) We do not dismiss the informational usefulness of collections comprising state-specific descriptions of institutions, procedures, and practices that conduce to judicial independence. See eg Sajó (n 6), Burbank and Friedman (n 15), Russell (n 24), Dodek and Sossin (n 33), Ginsburg (n 35). Our claim is simply that our approach will prove more useful in evaluating the ‘on the ground’ success of law reform projects aimed at promoting judicial independence in individual states.

(51) Ibid 25.

(52) Ginsburg applies the theory in passing to the early history of the United States, to post-independence India, to post-war Japan, to post-Communist Hungary and to Russia after Yeltsin, ibid ch 4. The remainder of his book focuses on Taiwan, Korea, and Mongolia.

(54) Finkel (n 36), 31–3. In Peru, constitutional reform also required ratification by referendum, which had the similar effect of ensuring opposition input into the process: Finkel (n 36), 68–9.

(55) Finkel (n 36), 71–9. Measures to undermine the independence of the judiciary, included delaying appointments of tenured judges, imposing super-majority requirements on the constitutional court in cases of judicial review of government actions, and the creation of an executive oversight commission with the power to disband courts, to transfer judges out of politically significant postings, and to investigate judicial corruption.

(56) Landes and Posner (n 36), 878. Landes and Posner provide a variation on general theories about constitutional pre-commitment. For a general treatment, examining the facilitative and constraining aspects of constitutional pre-commitment, see Cass Sunstein, ‘Constitutionalism and Secession’ (1991) 58 University of Chicago Law Review 633, 636–43.

(59) See La Porta et al (n 9), 451–2.

(63) Cabestan (n 61), 47 describes a growing gap and a gradual disconnection between the most repressive and political aspects of Chinese law, in other words the Soviet (and imperial) legacy, on the one hand and the more modern, outward looking and Western inspired areas of this legal system on the other.

(64) Peerenboom (n 62), 79.

(65) Moustafa and Ginsburg argue that entrenched authoritarian regimes are more likely to create and support an independent judiciary than are those with a less secure position. The authors claim that secure regimes have greater latitude (1) to experiment with institutions, such as courts, that create conditions for long-term economic growth and set the foundations for complex administrative structures, and (2) to shift from a legitimating discourse that focuses on substantive outcomes to one that focuses on the rule of law. See Moustafa and Ginsburg (n 35), 11–12. For a fascinating variation on this literature, which focuses on the protections afforded the judiciary in the Indian subcontinent during states of emergency, see Anil Kalhan, ‘Constitution and “Extraconstitutional”: Colonial Emergency Regimes in Postcolonial India and Pakistan’ in Victor V. Ramraj and Arun K. Thiruvengadam, Emergency Powers in Asia: Exploring the Limits of Legality (2010), 89.

(66) Moustafa and Ginsburg (n 35), 15.

(67) Ibid 17.

(69) Beatriz Magaloni, ‘Enforcing the Autocratic Political Order and the Role of Courts: The Case of Mexico’ in Moustafa and Ginsburg (n 35), 180 at 181.

(70) Ibid.

(71) Avino (n 61), 370–5.

(72) Ibid 379–91.

(73) Peerenboom (n 62) and accompanying text.

(75) Ibid 3.

(76) Ibid 24.

(78) Ibid 35. Among the formal institutional safeguards were:

an independent self-governing council of judges (the Superior Council of Magistracy), one of the most well-developed and well-funded judicial training institutes in the region (the National Institute of Magistracy), and a strict system of exam-based hiring and promotion.

(80) Rachel Sieder, ‘Renegotiating “Law and Order”: Judicial Reform and Citizen Responses in Post-war Guatemala’ in Gloppen et al (n 29), 137.

(81) Ibid 145:

Multiple donors were involved in justice reform, including the World Bank, the IDP, USAID, the UNDP, MINUGA, the Organization of American States (OAS), the US Department of Justice, the European Union and numerous bilateral donors.

(82) Ibid 152.

(84) Ibid 61. For a series of empirical studies concluding that informal factors (including the confidence of citizens in the legal system) are a more significant influence than formal institutions on the extent to which a judiciary enjoys independence in fact, see Erik Jensen and Thomas Heller (eds), Beyond Common Knowledge (2003).

(86) Koch (n 85), 142. Of course, in speaking of ‘the civil law tradition’, one necessarily generalizes. Eg although there are family resemblances, there are important differences between the German and the Latin West European judicial systems, and there are, moreover, differences among the various countries in the latter category. For overviews, see Donald P. Krommers, ‘Autonomy versus Accountability: The German Judiciary’ and Carlo Guarnieri, ‘Judicial Independence in Latin Countries of Western Europe’ in Russell and O’Brien (n 24), 131 and 111 respectively.

(87) Koch (n 85), 144.

(88) Ibid 145.

(91) Ramseyer and Rasmusen (n 17), 341.

(92) See also David M. O’Brien and Yasuo Ohkoshi, ‘The Japanese Judiciary’ in Russell and O’Brien (n 24), 37, 48, noting the salary differentials between judges who are favored and disfavored by the Secretariat and the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

(94) See eg Glaeser and Shleifer (n 58).

(95) Ibid 1216.

(96) Ibid 1212.

(98) Ibid and citations therein.

(99) That review can be ex ante, ex post, or both. See Ginsburg (n 50), 38–9.

(101) The standard institutional features relate to the following four elements: neutral appointment, security of tenure, financial independence, and administrative autonomy (including court administration, training, discipline, promotion, and conditions of retirement). For a comprehensive discussion see Russell (n 24); see also Reference re Remuneration of Provincial Court Judges (n 3).

(103) Pimentel (n 32), 20.
Ibid 23. The idea of integrity is usually deployed to capture a judge's commitment to craft: respect for precedent, fidelity to established principles of statutory interpretation, and strict adherence to the norm of impartiality. For a multi-jurisdictional conspectus of integrity, see Sajó (n 6).

(105) See Solum (n 31) and Macdonald (n 25), 61–70, who identify sobriety, wisdom, courage, modesty, and resisting the temptation to right all wrongs regardless of formal jurisdiction to do so as central elements of judicial phronesis.

(107) Ibid 110. In one version of this strategic interaction literature, the US Supreme Court is understood to be a principal and lower courts and administrative actors its agents.

(109) See the overview of this literature, as applied to the Latin American context, in Larkins (n 22), 616–18. A related literature set examines the extent to which judges rule against the party that appointed them. See eg Lee Epstein and Jeffrey A. Segal, Advice and Consent: The Politics of Judicial Appointments (2005), 121–41; James Stribopolous and Moin Yahya, ‘Does A Judge's Party of Appointment or Gender Matter to Case Outcomes?: An Empirical Study of the Court of Appeal for Ontario’ (2007) 45 Osgoode Hall Law Journal 315.

(110) Gretchen Helmke, Courts Under Constraints: Judges, Generals and Presidents in Argentina (2005), 12, summarizing the work of Ferejohn (n 47).

(111) Helmke (n 110), 155.

(114) For a consideration of credibility costs, see Jesse H. Choper, Judicial Review and the National Political Process: A Functional Reconsideration of the Role of the Supreme Court (1980), 201–2, 258.

(116) Governor of the Republic of South Africa v Grootboom (CCT11/00) [2000] ZACC 19.

(117) Roux (n 115).

(119) Shapiro (n 16); Kojève (n 16).

(120) This list is taken from Macdonald (n 25).
The Judiciary: The Least Dangerous Branch?

Daniel Smilov

The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Constitutional Law
Edited by Michel Rosenfeld and András Sajó

Abstract and Keywords

This article argues that the judiciary is normatively framed by four major grounds of legitimation: separation of powers, the rule of law, sovereignty, and impartiality of arbitration. All these four grounds entail more specific principles for the organization of the judiciary, and imply different modes of accountability. The four normative grounds may have different weight in different societies, depending on their objective circumstances and on the perceptions of people of these circumstances. The bottom line is that different societies must prioritize some of these grounds in given periods of their development. The result is a wide variety of institutional organizations of the judiciary, animated, however, by a limited number of common normative foundations.

Keywords: judiciary, legitimation, separation of powers, rule of law, sovereignty, arbitration

I. Introduction: The Judiciary in Comparative Perspective 859

II. The Normative Foundations of Judicial Power 862
   1. Separation of Powers and the Judiciary 864
   2. The Rule of Law and the Judiciary 866
   3. The Judiciary, Sovereignty, and Statehood 869
   4. The Judiciary as an Impartial Arbiter 869

III. Conclusions: The Least Dangerous Branch? 871

I. Introduction: The Judiciary in Comparative Perspective

The judiciary is an essential element of all contemporary constitutional regimes, and yet, there is no single best model of institutionalizing the role of the magistrates vis-à-vis other branches of power. Most contemporary models envisage complex systems of checks and balances, or mutual interdependence. While it is clear the judiciary needs constitutional prerogatives and guarantees of independence in order to make sure that there is sufficient division of power, or that ‘Ambition [is] made to counteract ambition’, only a tentative checklist of such prerogatives and guarantees can be provided:

1. Judges and public prosecutors are only subject to the law.
2. Judges and public prosecutors should be appointed for life or for such other period and conditions, so that the judicial independence is not endangered. Any change to the judicial obligatory retirement age must not have retroactive effect.
3. Judges and public prosecutors should be selected through competitive examinations. The selection and each appointment of a judge or of a public prosecutor must be carried out according to objective and transparent criteria based on proper professional qualifications.
4. No influence should be given to the executive or to the legislative power in the process of selection of judges and public prosecutors.

(5) A High Council for the Judiciary should be established. The High Council for the Judiciary should be entrusted with the appointment, assignment, transfer, promotion, and disciplinary measures concerning judges and public prosecutors. This body should be composed of judges and public prosecutors, or at least have a majority representation of judges and public prosecutors.

(6) Judges and public prosecutors cannot be transferred, suspended, or removed from office unless it is provided for by law and then only by decision in the proper disciplinary procedure.

(7) Disciplinary action should be carried out by independent bodies that include substantial judicial representation. Disciplinary action against judges and public prosecutors can only be taken when provided for by preexisting law and in compliance with predetermined rules of procedure.

(8) Each judge and each public prosecutor has the right to be provided with an efficient system of initial and continuing judicial training; attendance at these two forms of training should be, for a certain period, compulsory for each judge or public prosecutor, or at least it should represent an essential condition for moving to a higher post. Judicial training should be provided by an independent institution.

(9) Judges and public prosecutors must be granted proper working conditions.

(10) Salaries of judges and of public prosecutors must be fixed by statute (and not by an act of the executive power) and linked to the salaries of parliamentarians or ministers. They should not be reduced for any reason.

(11) Judges and public prosecutors must be granted full freedom of association, both on the national and international level. Activity in such association must be officially recognized as judicial work.

These principles, or some such similar set, form the normative skeleton of the judicial power, especially in modern liberal democracies, but possibly in all types of regimes committed to constitutionalism. Yet, when it comes to concrete interpretations and the institutional implementation of these principles, consensus no longer exists. One focus of substantial disagreement in the interpretation of the status of the judiciary concerns principles (4) and (5) from the list above. Different constitutional systems allow for different degrees of checks and balances between the major branches of power. In some legal systems, contrary to the suggested (p. 861) checklist, the Minister of Justice, or its functional equivalent, is authorized to make judicial appointments upon the advice of or nomination from senior members of the judiciary and he may have certain powers related to the promotion and demotion of already appointed magistrates, as well as to the imposition of disciplinary sanctions.

The entitlement of the executive and the legislative branch to appoint members of the body governing the judicial system may be deemed necessary in order to preserve a degree of accountability of the judiciary vis-à-vis the political branches of power and—ultimately—the citizens as electors. The principle of judicial independence should always be balanced against the principle of accountability of the judicial branch.

Different legal systems of established democracies balance these competing values—accountability and independence—in different ways. For instance, some systems rely on highly unrepresentative judiciaries as a social group. Other systems attempt to achieve a greater degree of representativeness including through popular elections of magistrates. Further, different ideas of accountability of the judiciary are also in operation. Some systems rely on political accountability, and in them political bodies (like the minister of justice) have greater powers in determining personnel policies of the judicial branch. Other systems rely more on the professional ethics of the community of lawyers as a self-regulating body: in these systems, accountability is treated as accountability to peers on the basis of professional standards, rather than as accountability to other branches of power.

Another point of divergence among the legal systems of established democracies is the character of internal accountability within the judiciary. The legal systems of continental countries (especially those of Latin Europe) rely on strong internal accountability, which means that senior magistrates exercise significant control in terms of career promotion and demotion over junior magistrates. In contrast, in common law countries there is greater internal independence of the magistrates.

A further point of disagreement in the interpretation of the principles of judicial independence involves the position of public prosecutors in the constitutional model. In some systems, the prosecutors are part of the executive, and thus accountable to politically elected bodies. In other systems they are part of the judiciary and enjoy different degrees of autonomy both vis-à-vis the other branches, but also vis-à-vis the other parts of the judiciary.

Finally, a controversial issue worthy of mention is the elaboration and the adoption of the budget of the judiciary.
Again, different systems allow for various degrees of judicial ‘independence’ in this sense. In some, the government and parliament have greater leeway in the appropriation of funds for the judicial branch, while in other systems the draft budget is closely coordinated with the independent body governing the judicial system. The formulation of principle (10) from the list above could hardly address the complexity of the problem with the funding of the judicial system. Since financial independence is one of the key components of judicial independence in general, the vagueness of principle (10) illustrates a general point: convergence on normative principles exists only at a very high level of generality.

The existence of different institutional implementations of the principles of judicial independence could be interpreted in two ways. The first is that, from a constitutional point of view, there is a wide variety of legitimate competing solutions to the problem of the concrete status of the judiciary. Democratic constitutional regimes resolve this question in different ways depending on their traditions, the character of their political process, etc. There is no overall best solution: all of them have advantages and disadvantages. On this view, call it the pluralist view, there is a minimal set of abstract requirements—close to the checklist presented above but possibly even smaller—which all exemplary constitutional regimes must meet: after these requirements are met, however, a wide variety of institutional models, reflecting different conceptions of underlying principles and values, are acceptable. One disadvantage of this view is that it is not very helpful in the assessment of concrete constitutional arrangements: it leaves a vast number of options open, without being able to compare them in any meaningful way. Further, the pluralist view becomes heavily dependent on the local context: it relegates most interesting questions to the idiosyncrasies of different legal systems.

A second perspective on the divergence of institutional arrangements concerning the organization of the judiciary could be called interpretative. It would argue that all legal systems follow basically the same (or very similar) sets of normative principles or values. However, differences in the context lead to different balancing of the same values: in some countries one set of normative concerns takes priority over others, which leads to different institutional solutions. All models, however, try to satisfy as far as possible all common normative values, albeit subject to different prioritizations. If we have taken into account all the relevant social, political, and economic differences among the given countries, we would be able to explain how following similar normative principles leads to different institutional solutions.

In contrast with the pluralist, the interpretativist might still maintain that there is a common normative theory of the status of the judiciary in constitutional regimes. A difficulty of this position is that the theory in question must be very, very detailed and complex, so that it could explain away all institutional differences by simultaneously preserving normative unity and coherence.

In what follows, I will use a very modest and limited interpretative strategy. I will suppose that behind the jurisprudence of different courts there is a relatively small number of common values, which, set against a different context, produce an astonishingly rich institutional variety of models. All these models ultimately address similar, if not the same, normative concerns. One advantage of this strategy is that it allows for the simultaneous discussion of the jurisprudence of markedly different judicial bodies—indeed, it needs difference in order to demonstrate the universal validity of the normative principles. The interpretative strategy treats all models as equals, and this arguably makes it less parochial. Of course, in the absence of Herculean powers, the interpretivist is bound to end up with a parochial theory pretending to be universal. But hopefully this minor drawback could be excused on account of the good and theoretically ambitious intentions at the start of the exercise.

II. The Normative Foundations of Judicial Power

In contemporary constitutional regimes, courts and the judiciary draw their legitimacy and their normative power from at least four different sources. These four sources, I argue, form a universally valid (for constitutional regimes) set of values, which models—institutionally very different from each other—try to optimize, although they may balance the basic values in different ways. Societies have specific—sometimes unique—histories and experiences, which explain the stronger emphasis on one value or another. Yet, it will be odd and exceptional to find a model committed to constitutionalism which systematically denies the validity of some of the following four foundational values underlying the status of the judiciary: separation of powers; the rule of law; adjudication as a mark of sovereignty; and the need for independent arbiters in disputes between two parties. These four grounds of legitimacy presuppose different doctrinal principles, different institutional arrangements, and modes of accountability. Some of the four grounds could be optimized simultaneously, but it is virtually impossible to have a model which optimizes all of (p. 863)

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Normative grounds</th>
<th>Doctrinal principles</th>
<th>Basic instruments</th>
<th>Marks of success</th>
<th>Mode of accountability</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Separation of powers</td>
<td>Judicial independence</td>
<td>Non-political appointment procedures and tenure guarantees; separate budget; checks on the political branches (judicial review); independent decision-making; rigid constitution</td>
<td>Assertive, activist judiciary, vetoing decisions of the political branches of power</td>
<td>Checks and balances—limited dependence on the other branches in order to provide a guarantee against deadlocks</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rule of law</td>
<td>The judiciary is only subject to the law</td>
<td>Strict professional requirements for appointment; presumption against judicial discretion, judicial rulemaking, advisory opinions; giving of reasons for decisions</td>
<td>Non-politicized, highly professionalized, rule-bound judiciary</td>
<td>Only internal accountability in cases of violation of standards of professionalism</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sovereignty as expressed in adjudication of conflicts</td>
<td>Courts should have ultimate jurisdiction in cases of legal disputes</td>
<td>Finality of court judgments; presumption against legal pluralism; appointment by the supreme bodies of state power—parliament, president, king, etc</td>
<td>Judiciary committed to protect the statehood and the authority of main state bodies and rules</td>
<td>Judiciary accountable to the supreme highest representatives of the state: parliament, head of state, president, king, prime minister, etc</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Impartial arbiters in a dispute between two parties (the triad model)</td>
<td>Impartiality</td>
<td>Doctrinal limitations on programmatic, large-scale political action—case-by-case adjudication, limited grounds of reasoning, etc</td>
<td>Judiciary enjoying the trust of both the people and the main institutions</td>
<td>Judiciary responsive to the people and main institutions</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

(p. 864) them at the same time, since they have different (and sometimes incompatible) criteria of success and failure. In Table 40.1 and the sections below, I consider all four grounds of legitimacy of courts and the judiciary separately by drawing examples from a number of jurisdictions.

1. Separation of Powers and the Judiciary

Separation of powers is an instrumentally important guarantee of liberty: it prevents the concentration of powers in the hands of one holder, and ensures a minimum degree of pluralism at the highest level of government. Judicial independence is just one aspect of separation of powers—it guarantees that there is at least one other branch of power, different from the other (political) holders of power. Virtually all contemporary constitutional models consider the judiciary as a separate branch of power. A key to such institutionalization is the prerogatives effectively to check the political branches of power through some sort of judicial review—either constitutional or administrative. Equally important is the possibility of independent decision-making on specific cases: judges, courts, and magistrates more generally should be able to make their decisions in the absence of external influence from the other branches.8
The danger of political interference in the workings of the judiciary in countries with a history of such abuses.

The separation is complicated by the proximity of judicial decision-making to sovereignty and the sovereign. In the controversial Refah Partisi v Turkey case,9 the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) held that ‘legal pluralism’—a system where different religious communities are regulated separately and adjudicate conflicts separately—violates the requirements of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR). The fear of the judges was that if a pluralist system were introduced, the state would lose its capacity and prerogative ultimately to resolve legal disputes, and thus would lose its power to protect human rights. The ECtHR in practice endorsed the view that sovereignty and adjudication are closely connected, and that the exclusivity of jurisdiction, which is a mark of the sovereign, should be a feature of the work of the judiciary as well.

That the judiciary constitutes a separate branch of state power was an idea vehemently rejected by totalitarian ‘constitutional’ ideologies. The communist doctrines, for instance, acknowledged the functional division of labor within the state, but rejected the idea of division of power. And indeed, communist constitutionalism—which is probably an oxymoron—was based on the idea of concentration of power and the primacy of the Communist Party in public life.10 It is no surprise that, on the exit from totalitarianism, societies break with the past by endowing the judiciary with significant powers to check the political branches.

The other key element of independence—apart from the prerogatives to check the political branches—is the independence of judicial decision-making. The institutional variance on this issue is probably less pronounced, although there are certainly difficult cases, as for instance the powers of courts martial. In Morris v United Kingdom,11 the ECtHR interpreted the (p. 865) independence and impartiality requirement for a military tribunal, noting that in the relevant procedures of the United Kingdom ‘the presence of safeguards was insufficient to exclude the risk of outside pressure being brought to bear on the two relatively junior serving officers who sat on the applicant’s court martial.’ They had no legal training and remained subject to army discipline and reports. Further, the ECtHR found problematic the possibility for a non-judicial reviewing authority to overturn the sentence of the court, which undermined the binding character of the decisions of the tribunal. Other branches of power should not have the right to influence (to overturn, so to speak) decisions of judicial bodies.12

Once it is established that the judiciary is a separate branch of power, the issue of institutional guarantees of its independence comes to the fore. However, the practices here could hardly be systematized: the variance in terms of appointment, selection, promotion, and budgeting of the judiciary is great. Yet, a key explanatory factor of the variance seems to be the experience of previous abuse by political branches (in authoritarian or totalitarian models) and the professional reputation of the magistrates. The Italian constitutional model, for instance, has attempted to make the judiciary an almost self-sustaining body by granting it powers of appointment, tenure, and even influence in the budgeting of the judicial branch.13 These powers are exercised through the Superior Council of the Magistracy—a body composed of four members elected by the judiciary, and two members by Parliament. Similar arrangements exist in France and the Mediterranean countries in general, and the model has been picked up by East European countries such as Bulgaria and Romania. For instance, in the Bulgarian Supreme Judicial Council, about half of the members are elected by the judiciary.14 The Mediterranean model arguably provides the highest degree of institutional protection in terms of outside influence regarding personnel policy and budgeting, which reflects very high fears of possible intervention by political bodies and lack of a previous record of responsible behavior by the judiciary.

Even such rather extreme measures cannot always insulate the judiciary against political interference. For example, in Bulgaria political majorities have several times during the 1990s managed to dissolve the Supreme Judicial Council before the expiration of its constitutional term in office. Typically, this happened through an amendment to the law on the judiciary, introducing structural changes in the organization of courts, the prosecutorial office, and the investigators. The Bulgarian Constitutional Court invalidated most of these laws (with one exception) but because of the lack of retroactive effect of the decisions of the court, parliament had already managed to dissolve the old council and appoint a new one under the new law.15

The danger of political interference in the workings of the judiciary in countries with a history of such abuses
justifies high levels of institutional insulation of the judicial system from the other branches. But this insulation creates serious problems in terms of loss of accountability. Therefore, in order for the judiciary not to become over-politicized, separation of powers requires a degree of checks and balances and horizontal accountability among the different branches. The US federal model attempts to balance prerogatives and powers allocated among the branches, although problems also exist there. The possibility of politicization of the US Supreme Court is one example; another is the politicization of independent prosecutors, as the impeachment procedure against President Clinton demonstrated. The question of prosecutors is generally a sensitive one. In a number of countries, again due to fears of improper interference of political actors in judicial proceedings, prosecutors enjoy the same level of institutional insulation as the judiciary per se: Italy and Bulgaria are examples. In Italy, the independence of prosecutors and investigative judges led to spectacular successes against the Mafia and its links with the political establishment. But one negative side effect of this arrangement is the continuous involvement of the judiciary in the political process and its direct impact on the restructuring of the party system and political competition. The appearance of populist politicians, who thrive on the negative publicity generated by endless judicial trials, is a cost of the model, which needs to be taken into account. Generally, in order for the model to be successful, it must carefully balance independence with accountability: if the balance is wrong, the judiciary could grow progressively alienated from the problems of society at large, or could become over-politicized, pursuing partisan agendas.

2. The Rule of Law and the Judiciary

By focusing exclusively on separation of powers as a normative concern for the organization of the judiciary one question remains wide open: Why exactly judicial independence? Why not independence of the police, the postal services, or the medical profession? Why should judges enjoy a more privileged, constitutionally protected status than other authorities, professions, and businesses?

From a normative perspective the answer is that not only is it valuable to have divided powers, but it is also important to guarantee law-governed and rule-bound behavior in society. Judges’ main function—as professional experts on rules and following the law—raises their importance in comparison with other guilds and professions. The endorsement of rule-bound behavior, as well as the idea that all conflicts should be resolved on the basis of rules and the law, are the cornerstones of the rule of law ideal. In this way, the rule of law lends additional normative weight and legitimacy to the judiciary, and explains why exactly judges should enjoy a privileged status.

The main principle that follows from the rule of law ground of justification is that the judiciary should only be subject to the law. Of course, legal systems differ in their rigor in endorsing this principle doctrinally: for instance, in Germany judges are subject both to law and justice, although ‘justice’ has been invoked exceptionally rarely in the practice of the major German courts. From an institutional point of view, the rule of law ground of legitimacy is backed by specific requirements for a professional judiciary. Generally, becoming a judge or a lawyer requires specific training and education, apprenticeships, practice etc. The lawyers and the judicial profession more narrowly are strictly regulated. The selection of judges is normally based heavily on professional criteria. Everywhere, judges are treated as experts/professionals in procedures and rules—experts in ‘process writ small’, to allude to John Hart Ely’s famous portrayal of the judicial profession. Appointments, promotions, and demotions are supposed to reflect the expertise and the professional experience of judges.

The requirements of professionalism and specialized expertise have been central in many cases dealt with by high courts interpreting the status of the judiciary. Thus, in Ceylon in United Engineering Workers Union v Devanayagam Privy Council the court considered the issue whether judges, as part of the ‘judicature’, should be appointed by a specialized judicial body (judicial service commission) and not by the Public Service Commission. The issue was whether the acts of the labor tribunals, whose members were appointed by the Public Service Commission, were without jurisdiction and invalid because of the very fact of appointment. It was ultimately resolved that the office of president of a labor tribunal is not a judicial office, and may be appointed by a Public Service Commission: despite this, however, it was not disputed that the ‘judicature’ should be appointed on the basis of expertise and in highly specialized and professionalized procedures.

In Jamaica, Hinds v The Queen Privy Council, the judges interpreted the special function and professional role of the judiciary in society. In essence, they dealt with the question what makes a court a court. They started with the observation that it is not important whether a body is called a ‘court’ by the law, but:

What is the nature of the jurisdiction to be exercised by the judges ... Does the method of appointment and the security of their tenure conform to the requirements of the constitution applicable to the judges ... In conclusion, it was held that what Parliament cannot do, consistently with separation of powers, is to transfer from the judiciary to any executive body whose members are not appointed in the proper way as that for appointing judges, a discretion to determine the severity of punishment to be inflicted upon an individual member of a class of offenders. Rule application—especially concerning rights of people and punishments—is in the exclusive domain of the judiciary.

Another consequence of the rule of law being a ground for the legitimacy of the judiciary are the quite common presumptions against judicial rulemaking and judicial discretion. The idea behind these two presumptions is that courts and judges should follow the rules and apply them to specific disputes. They should not make rules.

The United States is famous for its rather rigorous endorsement of the ban on advisory opinions issued by courts to the other branches; a ban which is justified on the basis of the understanding that courts should not step into rulemaking areas. The issue of judicial rulemaking arose in the very first years of the application of the US Constitution, but still produces some interesting jurisprudence. Thus, in Mistretta v United States the US Supreme Court recognized the constitutionality of a ‘twilight area in which the activities of the separate branches merge ... That judicial rulemaking ... falls within this twilight area is no longer an issue for dispute ...’

(p. 868) The Supreme Court here was answering the question whether a commission composed of judges could come up with binding rules for courts aiming to harmonize sentencing practices. The commission in question was part of the judicial power, but was not a court and was fully accountable to Congress. The Court ultimately recognized the legitimacy of such ‘twilight’ judicial rulemaking, Justice Scalia, dissenting, argued that ‘the power to make law cannot be exercised by anyone other than Congress, except in conjunction with the lawful exercise of executive or judicial power ...’ His dire prediction was that there might emerge ‘all manner of “expert” bodies, insulated from the political process, to which Congress will delegate various portions of its law making responsibility’.

Twilight rulemaking by courts is rather common, however. In continental systems advisory and rulemaking prerogatives of the courts are deeply constitutionally entrenched. France is famous for its administrative law traditions, according to which the Conseil d’État is both a highest administrative court and an advisor to the government. Constitutional courts in many states have the right to interpret the constitutional text in abstracto—that is, without a link to a specific case or controversy: this power of the courts leads to incremental rulemaking. Furthermore, it is quite common that high courts are given powers to issue interpretative decisions, aiming to harmonize the practices of law application by the lower courts.

The issue of judicial discretion further illustrates the point. Here, there is a pronounced difference between continental and common law systems. In the common law world, the power of judges incrementally to make law is rather accepted, despite Ronald Dworkin’s famous theoretical campaign against it. In continental systems, however, doctrinally judicial discretion is very often ruled out: judges should only apply the law. Again, however, the most this amounts to is a significant presumption against judicial discretion. After all, universally courts are empowered to resolve disputes and cases on the basis of highly abstract and indeterminate rules. Courts normally cannot drop the case due to the lack of precise rules: they have to come up with a judgment. This naturally leads to discretionary decisions and to incremental rulemaking.

Thus, the rule of law justification of the legitimacy of courts and the judiciary leads to something of a paradox. On the one hand, it portrays the judiciary as a professional guild with expertise on existing rules and their application in specific cases. As such, the group—the argument goes—should be subject only to internal, professional forms of accountability. Judges should be appointed, promoted, demoted, dismissed etc: only on the basis of professional criteria and internal judicial system procedures. Yet, however, it cannot be denied that certain twilight rulemaking activities do exist, for which forms of external accountability are appropriate. In the Mistretta case, the rulemaking judicial commission was subject to supervision by Congress, for instance. So, even the rule of law justification might allow for certain, although rather limited, forms of external accountability of judges. Yet, when it comes to... their incremental rulemaking and implied discretionary powers, comparative analysis shows that such forms of external accountability are most commonly not in place.

The proximity of the judiciary to the sovereign determines special modes of accountability for judicial work. There should be some residual forms of accountability of the judiciary (p. 869) as to the highest bodies of power, expressive of sovereignty in the state. This accountability does not concern judgments in specific cases, of course, but may go beyond the appointment powers of the highest political bodies. Thus, senior magistrates may be called to inform parliament about systemic problems concerning the workings of the judiciary, as is the case in Bulgaria. Even forms of indirect accountability of individual judges to supreme bodies of sovereignty, like the parliament, could be envisaged. Staying with the Bulgarian example, an inspectorate dealing with the individual performance of the judges was established, appointed with a fixed term of office by the Parliament with a two-thirds majority: once appointed, the inspectors cannot be replaced. Their monitoring of the record of individual judges is meant to be decisive for promotion and disciplinary decisions taken by the Supreme Judicial Council. Such curious institutional innovations result from the existence of competing pressures on legislators: on the one hand they are supposed to respect judicial independence but, on the other, accountability always remains an issue when it comes to the exercise of sovereign powers.

3. The Judiciary, Sovereignty, and Statehood

Historically, the claim of resolution of disputes through adjudication has been the mark of sovereignty. This functional proximity to the sovereign has been another normative ground of the legitimacy of the judiciary, which produces a set of more specific normative principles and concrete constitutional doctrines defining the status of the magistrates. As one British senior judge argued:

Judicial power is the power which sovereign authority must of necessity have to decide controversies between its subjects, or between itself and its subjects ... The exercise of this power does not begin until some tribunal which has power to give binding and authoritative decision ... is called upon to take action.

On the basis of this understanding courts normally claim exclusive and final authority over the resolution of legal disputes. What is more, very often they themselves police the borderline between what is a legal dispute—falling in their jurisdiction—and a political one, which should be outside it. As the history of the US doctrine of ‘political question’ demonstrates, the courts may expand their reach into areas formerly considered ‘political’.

4. The Judiciary as an Impartial Arbiter

On the model presented in this chapter, the final normative ground legitimizing the status of the judiciary views courts and judges as adjudicators whose legitimacy depends on a relationship of a ‘triadic’ character, as famously pointed out by Martin Shapiro. In a ‘triadic’ model, two persons decide to call upon a third neutral umpire in order to resolve the disagreement.

The triadic model does not fit perfectly with the role of the judiciary. For a start, it does not fully appreciate the proximity of courts to the sovereign: normally, courts claim exclusive and binding jurisdiction, while the arbitrator is freely chosen by the disputing parties. Further, there are more elements of the triadic model in ordinary adjudication, in comparison to, say, constitutional review in abstracto. Yet, even in constitutional review one could possibly speculate that the outvoted parliamentary minority or the President, on the one hand, and the parliamentary majority on the other, could be seen as two parties going to a neutral umpire—the court.

Yet, Shapiro’s idea of courts as impartial arbiters in a triadic relationship does seem to capture a fundamental point. Courts generate trust when they become instrumental to broad sections of society in series of concrete disputes between two parties. There are numerous specific normative principles and institutional arrangements which follow from this ground of legitimation. First, all contemporary systems attempt to limit the exposure of the judiciary to partisanship and open politicization in order to make it attractive as a neutral arbiter—a topic, which has already been discussed. Courts normally do not stand to gain directly from the success or failure of a particular partisan governmental agenda in terms of re-election, for instance. Furthermore, they could hardly develop a complete and coherent agenda of their own, due to various well-known institutional and doctrinal constraints. To start with, courts react to petitions, and are generally constrained to ruling on issues involved in such petitions. Also, courts are prevented through a variety of instruments from endorsing coherent, comprehensive ideologies and programs in their jurisprudence: no matter how the constitutional ‘text’ is treated, judges can use only a limited set of doctrinal arguments, which are not sufficient for the creation of a truly comprehensive and coherent agenda. They are also not free in using generalizations and analogies but are governed by highly formalized rules of judicial reasoning. Courts are further prohibited from issuing ‘programmatic’ documents, and even if judges cannot resist the temptation of expressing their more general political views from time to time, these expressions are not systematic, coherent, or comprehensive as political programs claim to be. To sum up, courts seem to be intentionally handicapped as endorsers of comprehensive political programs and doctrines, which sets them quite radically apart from political bodies and legislatures.

Further, doctrines of access to the courts are of crucial importance for the generation of trust in the judiciary. If access is very difficult, if judicial proceedings are too expensive, courts will become detached from broad sections of society: they will be turned into a luxury instrument for the upper classes. If, however, access to the courts is too easy, then most probably there will be huge backlogs and inefficiencies, which will also lead to the loss of trust in the judicial system. Even extremely authoritative courts, such as the ECtHR in Strasbourg, for instance, may become vulnerable to efficiency problems due to unmanageable levels of petitions. Thus, a well-organized judiciary should correctly balance the competing values of accessible justice and manageable caseloads. Since judicial proceedings are in any event expensive and time-consuming, there should be alternative forms of extrajudicial settlement for specific groups of cases.

Finally, it does matter who the judges actually are. It is true that judges are to be selected primarily for their expertise, but if this criterion leads to very an unrepresentative character of the judiciary, trust in it may be undermined. In India, for instance, there have been efforts to include in the judiciary representatives of all social strata. Similar concerns were faced in South Africa after the end of the regime of apartheid. All these efforts are designed to make the judiciary more responsive and more accountable to the people in general, as the ultimate goal is to increase trust in the judiciary, trust, which is essential for its functions as a neutral arbiter.

III. Conclusions: The Least Dangerous Branch?

The judiciary is the least dangerous branch of power, because it does not keep either the purse or the sword of the polity, as it is well known. From this perspective, the metaphor of juristocracy is largely far-fetched: no matter how important in terms of decision-making, the judiciary is not on a par with the political branches of power in contemporary political regimes. Still, the judiciary is a branch of power in the constitutional regime, and very often it could play a crucial role in the determination of important state policies, as well as in the resolution of key controversies. In the course of such decisions, sometimes it might empty the purse of the polity, while at others it could make the use of the sword inevitable, as the US Supreme Court did with its infamous Dred Scott judgment.

In this chapter I have argued that the judiciary is normatively framed by four major grounds of legitimation: separation of powers, the rule of law, sovereignty, and impartiality of arbitration. All these four grounds entail more specific principles for the organization of the judiciary, and imply different modes of accountability. The four normative grounds may have different weight in different societies, depending on their objective circumstances and on the perceptions of people of these circumstances. The bottom line is that different societies must prioritize some of these grounds in given periods of their development. The result is a wide variety of institutional organizations of the judiciary, animated, however, by a limited number of common normative foundations.

Table 40.2 presents some of the most common prioritizations of the four normative grounds against different socio-political context:
Table 40.2 The Legitimacy of Judicial Power in Political Context

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th></th>
<th>Separation of powers</th>
<th>Rule of law</th>
<th>Sovereignty</th>
<th>Impartial arbiters</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Transition from authoritarian/totalitarian regimes</td>
<td>High priority</td>
<td>High priority(^{41})</td>
<td>Low priority</td>
<td>Medium priority</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Transition from apartheid or racism</td>
<td>Low priority</td>
<td>High priority</td>
<td>Low priority</td>
<td>High priority</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Aggressively majoritarian democracy</td>
<td>High priority</td>
<td>Medium priority</td>
<td>Low priority</td>
<td>Low priority</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Widespread corruption</td>
<td>Medium priority</td>
<td>High priority</td>
<td>Low priority</td>
<td>High priority</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Social inequality and widespread poverty</td>
<td>Low priority</td>
<td>Low priority</td>
<td>Low priority</td>
<td>High priority</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nation-building</td>
<td>Low priority</td>
<td>Low priority</td>
<td>High priority</td>
<td>Low priority</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

\(^{41}\) Table 40.2 suggests that when societies exit from a totalitarian or authoritarian rule, normally a very high priority is placed on the separation of powers and rule of law values. Sometimes this leads to specific overkill in the opposite direction: in order for the judiciary to prove that it is non-political and independent, it might become self-absorbed and irresponsible to the public in general, it may also become too formalistic in its activity, which might lead to further alienation from the people.

If the society is on the exit of a racist regime, then it is of key importance to restore the trust of the people in its impartiality as arbiter. Efforts need to be made to create a proper racial balance in the judiciary, reflective of the society at large. However, of equal importance will be the preservation of the professionalism of the judiciary and upholding the rule of law, as a sign of breaking with the old regime.

When the question of widespread poverty is concerned, courts need to build the trust of all social strata, and especially of those at the bottom of the ladder. The composition of courts needs to reflect the existence of different strata, but also their jurisprudence must be responsive to the claims of all, which may lead to a more aggressive and activist interpretation of socio-economic rights, for instance.

In addition, in a democratic context of aggressive majoritarianism—a situation in which a given political majority tries to impose its will on the opposition and independent institutions—emphasis should be put on the preservation of the separation of powers, which may entail activist jurisprudence of courts defending their autonomy in terms of budgeting, appointment etc.

A most interesting case presents the role of the judiciary in a society which is affected by widespread corruption. On the one hand, the judiciary needs to be highly independent in order to tackle political corruption, but it also needs to be accountable in order to be able to address its own internal corruption. It is very often the case that the judiciary itself is suspected of corrupt practices, which indicates that its independence of other branches should not be turned into a constitutional fetish.

Societies do not pursue only one priority at a time: they might want simultaneously to tackle corruption and poverty on the exit of a totalitarian regime, while trying to create a nation-state. Some compromises will always be necessary, and the question is of the right balance of values. Also, societies are not static: they go through different stages of development, which implies that priorities may change.
It is probably somewhat paranoid to think of power in terms of the potential dangers it might pose: after all power and authority are necessary for the rational guidance of human affairs. The judiciary is a sophisticated instrument of authority, the proper functioning of which depends on a complex process of fine-tuning carried out not only by experts on law and court management, but also by people with an ear for broader social and political problems. Without such fine-tuning the instrument could produce a cacophony of sounds, and may ultimately create a Kafkaesque socio-political environment, in which the villain and the hero, the rule and the exception, justice and injustice become indistinguishable.

Bibliography

Alexander Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch (1962)
Norman Dorsen, Michel Rosenfeld, András Sajó, and Susanne Baer, Comparative Constitutionalism (2003)
(p. 873) Ronald Dworkin, Law’s Empire (1986)
Denis Galligan, Discretionary Powers (1986)
John Arch Getty, ‘State and Society Under Stalin: Constitutions and Elections in the 1930s’ (1991) 50(1) Slavic Review 19
David Robertson, Discretion in the House of Lords (1998)
András Sajó, Limiting Government (1999)
Martin Shapiro, Courts: A Comparative and Political Analysis (1981)

Notes:

(1) András Sajó, Limiting Government (1999), 94.

(3) See eg the Universal Charter of the Judges of Taipei (1999). In the summary of the principles, I follow Giacomo Oberto, Deputy Secretary General of the International Association of Judges (http://giacomooberto.com/prague/1.htm).

(6) I borrow the term and the methodology from Ronald Dworkin, Law’s Empire (1986).

(8) On judicial independence, see Chapter 39.

(10) Article 126 of the Stalinist Constitution of 1936 stated that the Communist Party was ‘vanguard of the working people in their struggle to strengthen and develop the socialist system and is the leading core of all organizations of the working people, both public and state.’ For a discussion see J. Arch Getty, ‘State and Society Under Stalin: Constitutions and Elections in the 1930s’ (1991) 50(1) Slavic Review 19, 22.

(14) Bulgarian Constitution (SG 56/13 JUL 1991), Arts 129 and 130.

(17) The impeachment trial caused a certain politicization of theoretical constitutional debate as well. For a sample of the heated exchanges see eg Richard Posner, ‘Dworkin, Polemics, and the Clinton Impeachment Controversy’

(19) On the rule of law, see Chapter 10.

(22) [1967] 2 All ER 367.

(31) On sovereignty more generally, see Chapter 17.

(32) Huddart Parker & Co Proprietary v Moorehead (1909) 8 CLR 330, 357.

(33) In Baker v Carr 369 US 186 (1962) the US Supreme Court famously opened the door to judicial intervention in electoral law irregularities and mal-apportionment issues more specifically, which before that were considered a ‘political thicket’: Samuel Issacharov, Pamela Karlan, and Richard Pildes, The Law of Democracy: Legal Structure of the Political Process (2002), 147–62.

(40) Dred Scott v Sandford 60 US 393 (1857).

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Daniel Smilov</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Daniel Smilov is Associate Professor at the University of Sofia, Bulgaria and Programme Director of the Centre for Liberal Strategies, Sofia</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Political parties and party system dynamics are critical to understanding how constitutions work, and why they may not, in spite of well-intentioned designs. Unfortunately, much of the recent literature in comparative constitutional law has paid little attention to the multiple ways our basic constitutional structures are conditioned by political parties and party system dynamics. With a plea for greater integration between studies of parties and constitutions, this article offers an overview of the interaction effects between political parties and party systems, and the three constitutional types found in the democratic world today — presidentialism, parliamentarism, and semi-presidentialism. It concludes with an illustration of these effects from the case of Weimar Germany.

Keywords: party system, constitutions, political party, presidentialism, parliamentarism, semi-presidentialism

I. Introduction 874
II. Political Parties and the Party Space 875
III. Shaping the Party Space 876
   1. Designing Legislative Elections 876
   2. Designing Presidential Elections 877
   3. Fostering (Constitutionally) Party-Based Leadership 881

III. Comparative Configurations: Parties and Constitutional Dynamics 883
IV. An Empirical Illustration: Parties and the Weimar Constitution 884
V. Conclusion 887

I. Introduction

Shortly before his death, Max Weber published an op-ed in the Berliner Börsenzeitung, calling for the direct election of the Reichspräsident in the newly founded Weimar Republic. His colleague, Friedrich Ebert, a member of the German Social Democratic Party, had just been elected president, through an indirect method, by the members of the National Assembly. Weber cautioned that, were the next president not to be directly elected by the German people, the new constitutional order in Weimar and the unity of the republic would be gravely compromised—for Weber considered the proportionally elected parliament to be dominated by particularism and increasingly threatened by factious, regional political parties, vested economic interests, and as he put it, closed-minded, philistine MPs who cared little about national (p. 875) politics.1 Weber died in 1920, and so never knew that the twin unraveling of the constitutional order and the instability of the party system in the mid to late-1920s were indeed responsible, to a good extent, for the Republic’s inability to defend itself against the rise of fascism.
work, and why they may not, in spite of well-intentioned designs. Unfortunately, much of the recent literature in comparative constitutional law has paid little attention to the multiple ways our basic constitutional structures are conditioned by political parties and party system dynamics. The US Constitution makes no direct mention of political parties, but a non-negligible part of the US Supreme Court docket has directly concerned the role political parties play, and should play, in American democracy. Around the globe, and in the post-war constitution-making frenzy, founding documents paid greater attention to political parties, from explicitly sanctioning their role in democratic politics and delineating the ‘acceptable’ ideological space for their competition (German Basic Law, Article 21), to requiring the representation of minority parties in government committees, and requiring that national legislation provide funding for all parties on an ‘equitable and proportional basis’ (eg Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, section 236).

With a plea for greater integration between studies of parties and constitutions, this chapter offers an overview of the interaction effects between political parties and party systems, and the three constitutional types found in the democratic world today—presidentialism, parliamentarism, and semi-presidentialism. The chapter concludes with an illustration of these effects from the case of Weimar Germany.

II. Political Parties and the Party Space

As Weber noted in 1919, albeit with some trepidation, political parties are situated crucially between society and government. They are, as such, intermediaries, and, positively understood, key actors in any democracy founded on the principle of representation. Yet not every country with free and fair elections and political parties necessarily has a party system. According to one of the earliest comparativists to examine parties, Giovanni Sartori, political parties only ‘make for a “system” … when they are parties (in the plural); and a party system is precisely the system of interactions resulting from inter-party competition.’ A party system is then said to be institutionalized when it exhibits the following characteristics:

- regularity in the pattern of party competition (low volatility);
- stability of party roots in society and of citizens’ strong and consistent attachment to parties;
- citizens and other organized interests’ perception that parties are ‘the way to go’, and acceptance of them as the legitimate intermediary and means of influence in the democratic process;
- stability of party organization, with party influence at both national and local levels, and party elites’ loyalty to their parties.

Certainly no party system in the world meets all these characteristics in full. All party systems can be placed along a continuum running from non-institutionalized to institutionalized, and most democratic countries fall somewhere near the institutionalized pole. Institutionalization is a desirable quality if we care about the performance of a constitution, because where the party system is more institutionalized, parties are key actors that structure the political process;

where it is less institutionalized, parties are not so dominant, they do not structure the political process as much, and politics tends to be less institutionalized and therefore more unpredictable.

Non-institutionalized party systems have characteristics that are the reverse of institutionalized systems: low levels of predictability, high party fluidity, high volatility. These characteristics impede actors, such as candidates for office and party leaders, from having necessary information about their strengths and the strengths of their opponents. This lack of information makes bargaining difficult, and unless a polity can produce single-party majorities to support individual pieces of legislation or government programs, coalitions are a necessity, and thus so is bargaining.

III. Shaping the Party Space

1. Designing Legislative Elections

The number of parties in a country’s party system, and their relative ideological distance from one another, are usually first determined by social, economic, religious, and other cleavages in a society. Eventually, however, party systems are shaped and manipulated by other factors, including electoral systems. There are many electoral system tools, but all can be loosely divided into two types, with competing objectives: (1) those aimed at reflecting in the legislature the various cleavages and interests in a country in proportion to their strength in society, and (2) those aimed at distorting the ratio of votes to seats in order to manufacture majorities in the legislature, at the expense of smaller parties and less popular interests. Variations of majority electoral systems include the absolute majority with a second round limited to the top two candidates (ballotage), the absolute majority with a plurality in the second round, the alternative vote, and the first-past-the-post (or plurality) systems. The non-majority electoral systems include a variety of proportional representation systems (PR), and semi-PR or intermediary systems. PR systems vary in their degree of proportionality, depending on the mathematical method used to distribute seats, which varies from the very proportional Sainte-Laguë method to the least proportional d'Hondt formula.8

(p. 877) A constitutional democracy's choice of electoral system is often a negotiated decision, one as critical and contested as the constitution itself; and some countries prefer to sacrifice any gains in efficiency that might come with fewer political parties in order to privilege the representativeness of the system through PR. In these cases where PR is chosen, PR’s fragmentation-permitting effects, those of which Weber was so fearful, are in contemporary democracies often limited, either by (1) the d'Hondt method of seat allocation, (2) a high threshold requiring parties and party lists to meet a certain percentage of votes in order to be counted in the distribution of legislative seats, or (3) by reducing district magnitude.9 The smaller the district magnitude, the smaller the number of seats available for distribution.10 Thus, majority electoral systems can help to manufacture majorities or, in the case of corrected PR and semi-PR, at least encourage majorities by keeping smaller parties out of the legislature. This is not to say that majority electoral systems and corrected PR are, overall, a better choice for all constitutional democracies.11 In fact, sometimes the exclusion of a party through barriers such as thresholds and majority electoral formulae can lead to frustration with the institutions and push excluded parties to adopt an anti-system attitude, which may in turn threaten democracy. The important point here, which will be taken up below, is simply that majority electoral formulae seem quite crucial for effective and efficient government under certain constitutions, and yet, these majority electoral formulae may be incompatible with the goals and norms of a particular polity and its people.

2. Designing Presidential Elections

In presidential and semi-presidential constitutions, electing a president bears some similarity to electing a legislative representative for a single seat in a single, nationwide district. However, the presidential seat, unlike a legislative seat, is worth much more in the overall political game. It is also a non-divisible prize and presidential elections can have considerable effects on the development of the party system.12 Weber had argued that a directly elected president could (p. 878) preserve the unity of a constitutional democracy, suggesting that the electoral dynamics set in place through popular election would act as a ‘dam’ to divisive interests, ‘forcing’ parties to cooperate throughout the federation.13 There are two basic types of direct presidential electoral systems: the absolute majority system with two or more rounds, and the plurality system.14 In the plurality system, the candidate with the greatest percentage of votes wins and there is only one round of voting. A special type of plurality system is known as the concurrent plurality, in which candidates must win a plurality at the national level while simultaneously winning a specified percentage in each of several different regions of the country. This system discourages presidents from relying on regionally concentrated support, and is therefore thought to be a useful consociational tool for ethnically divided societies.15

The absolute majority system requires a second (or sometimes even a third) round of voting if none of the candidates gets the required majority in the first round. The second round may be direct and limited to the top two candidates (ballotage), or top three candidates; the second round may also be thrown to the decision of the legislature. The absolute majority run-off is sometimes advocated as a tool for encouraging a majoritarian norm in the political system, and in order to moderate party system polarization.16 However, the incentives in a two-round presidential electoral system do not have a single, simple logic. In fact the incentives are multiple, complicated, and even contradictory; and also depend on the context within which they function. Often this electoral system induces electoral campaigns that appear rather extreme in the first round, and then quite centripetal in the second. The first round serves in many ways like a presidential primary, drawing out the most popular candidate from within a party or party block; whereas the second round necessarily sees the losers within that party or party block offering support to the front-runner.\textsuperscript{17} If these incentives operate together and as anticipated, two majority blocks are expected to form, and these blocks are expected to lean towards the center, thereby creating, over time, a two-party system. But these incentives can only be expected to work as such when the party system is institutionalized and where two main ideological or programmatic blocks already exist or have the potential to form (which is unfortunately not the case for many transitional democracies). In pure form this is the Downsian logic.\textsuperscript{18} However, the Downsian logic only holds if the structure of competition is distributed such that the electorate is concentrated in the middle of the ideological (or other) spectrum, and if the two main party blocks compete for these middle voters. If the voter distribution is bi-modal with two concentrations on either far end of the spectrum, or if there is high voter (p. 879) abstention or indecision, then the two-round electoral competition may exacerbate existing voter divisions. Then, a two-round electoral system has little chance of bringing the party blocks closer together.\textsuperscript{19} Moreover, if the party system is inchoate and volatile, or when parties are so divided that not even a minimal winning coalition can be put together, a majority run-off election can exacerbate the polarization and fragmentation within the polity. This is so because the first round under these circumstances seems to encourage a ‘go for broke’ attitude. Recalling the incentives in this system, the first round is designed as a primary in which candidates from the same block try to distinguish themselves from the other members of their block, and thus candidates are induced to push themselves (programmatically or ideologically) away from each other. When there are no blocks, when the system is so polarized and fragmented that minimal winning coalitions are impossible, the second round cannot be expected to pull anyone together or towards the center. Thus the majoritizing incentives of the second round are made obsolete, and the ‘extremizing’ effects of the first round become the only effects of this electoral system.

Another potential difficulty of the two-round, absolute majority presidential electoral system, one which has proven particularly challenging for democratic constitutionalism, is that it may inflate the perception of the president’s legitimacy, especially when there are many candidates in the first round. To illustrate, assume that a first-round candidate having won 21 percent of the popular vote is admitted to the second round because he is one of the two front-runners. He then wins the second round with 53 percent of the vote. Is it accurate to count this 53 percent as a measure of his legitimacy, or is the 21 percent a more accurate reflection? His 21 percent in the first round seems to be the more accurate measure, given that the restriction in the second round to only two candidates manufactures and inflates his actual electoral popularity, which was demonstrated in the unrestricted first round. This is the actual percentage the French presidential candidate Jacques Chirac won in the first round of presidential elections on April 23, 1995. The second round, limited to the two front-runners, which included him and Socialist candidate Lionel Jospin, gave him 53 percent. This inflated legitimacy may, in some democracies, encourage anti-party presidential behavior, and turn problematic when a president finds himself faced with opposition in the legislature, and uses this inflated sense of legitimacy to push his powers beyond their constitutional limit, toward constitutional dictatorship.\textsuperscript{20}

A special form of majority voting called the alternative vote has also been suggested as a presidential electoral system for encouraging majorities. Voters list several of their preferences for the presidential office on one ballot. In the absence of a clear majority in the first preferences, the second and third preferences are counted until arriving at a winner. This system combines the psychology of two-round voting in one actual round, and is therefore much like the ballotage system; the ‘outsider effect’ and the ‘go for broke’ attitude are just as likely to occur.\textsuperscript{21} That is because an outsider candidate without party support has the same incentives to run as an individual under this system as he does under the ballotage system.

(p. 880) A final factor that affects the party system and, in turn, the performance of the presidential and semi-presidential constitutions, is the relative timing of presidential and legislative elections. Evidence to date indicates that presidential and legislative elections held simultaneously are more likely to give a president a majority in the legislature, than are non-simultaneous elections, other things being equal.\textsuperscript{22} The simultaneous holding of presidential and legislative elections is a possibility for presidential regimes in which the fixed terms of the president and the legislature coincide (eg four years each). In semi-presidentialism, constitutional prerogatives often allow presidents to call early legislative elections shortly after taking office (or during the term) to try to re-equilibrate the presidential and legislative majorities, as Mitterrand did after his election in 1981.

In a similar vein, the simultaneity of municipal and presidential elections is a possible tool for building concurrent majorities. While local elections do not directly affect the number of parties or the presence of majorities in the national assembly, the coincidence of elections may encourage the president's party (or majority) at the local level, weaving a multi-layer fabric of presidential support throughout the polity, particularly in federal or decentralized systems where substantial power over decisions might be delegated to subunits or local municipalities. These incentives, however, all assume that the presidential candidates are in fact ‘party men’, integrated into the party system and both supported by and supportive of parties. Presidential candidates who act as independent, non-party personalities are certainly possible, but more likely to emerge in non-institutionalized or weakly institutionalized systems where political society is underdeveloped. Since parties do not play an important channeling role in non-institutionalized or weakly institutionalized systems, the presidential door is open for independent candidates who may even employ an anti-party rhetoric and campaign on an anti-party and even anti-system platform. In this case, the incentive is for non-cooperative behavior, and it works against majorities. Of course, anti-party presidents can, and do, logically exist even in institutionalized party systems, but the linking of the incentives with the party system makes it more probable that they will emerge in non-institutionalized systems. It is no accident, then, that Yeltsin in Russia, and Kuchma in Ukraine, never became ‘party men’ presidents.

(p. 881) There is almost no safeguard to ensure that independents do not run for presidential office, and independent presidential candidates do emerge in institutionalized systems as well (as did H. Ross Perot in the United States in 1992). Neither semi-presidentialism nor pure presidentialism has any institutional incentive for chief executives to be ‘party men’. Only parliamentarism has such incentives, via executive responsibility to the legislature. At the legislative level in presidential and semi-presidential systems, closed party lists give parties more control over candidates, reducing the personalization of campaigns, enhancing the value of the party label in local elections, and enabling the party to reward the most loyal rank-and-file members by placing them on the list. But the lack of party control at the presidential level may lead to the ‘outsider’ phenomenon, exemplified by Perot in the United States, Fujimori in Peru, and Tyminski in Poland’s 1990 presidential race. Tyminski, described as an ‘unknown Polish expatriate businessman’, running on an anti-party campaign, was able to pass up the previous Solidarity Prime Minister Tadeusz Mazowiecki in the first round election by a 3.1 percent margin, and advance to the second round against Lech Walesa. When an outsider or anti-party president is actually elected, he must then face a legislature in which he will predictably have no initial party support, and may find it difficult to build this necessary support if his presidential campaign relied on anti-party discourse, which is typical of independent candidates. Without party backing, such a president is immediately in a more conflictual constitutional configuration than he would have been, other things being equal, with a party majority behind him in the legislature. This was the case with Russia’s Boris Yeltsin, who had no choice but to broker support for the government’s agenda in piecemeal fashion, as he was unable to count on a stable, coherent majority at any point throughout his terms. For non-conflictual constitutionalism, then, a party-man president, one that is integrated into the party system and is both supported by and supportive of parties, seems necessary. This mutual dependence increases the constraints on the behavior and discipline of both the president and his party.

3. Fostering (Constitutionally) Party-Based Leadership

Presidential and semi-presidential constitutions can differ widely with respect to the incentives they offer to individual leaders and political parties, given that the powers constitutionally granted to any president vary from country to country, and this differently affects the executive’s relationship to the legislature. A president’s constitutionally granted powers are usually specified in a country’s constitutional text, and are also usually amenable to measurement and quantification. Yet, any specific president’s use of these powers is not easily quanti (p. 882) fiable, and usually necessitates careful analysis of a president’s behavior over time. Not all presidents are ideal leaders; efficient, democratic presidents are required to have a very acute sense of political judgment and distinguished leadership qualities, which are in fact quite rare. As US President Lyndon B. Johnson noted:

Every President has to establish with the various sectors of the country what I call ‘the right to govern’. Just being elected to the office does not guarantee him that right … [e]very President has to become a leader, and to be a leader he must attract people who are willing to follow him. Every President has to develop a moral underpinning to his power, or he soon discovers that he has no power at all.

Yet when presidents exhibit special leadership characteristics and establish a personal ‘right to govern’, throughout various sectors of the country, they may also be more likely to push their constitutional powers to the limits, establish new presidential prerogatives, and, in semi-presidential systems, dominate their prime ministers.\textsuperscript{31}\footnote{31} This is most likely to happen when political parties are weakly institutionalized. Charles de Gaulle, for example, at the beginning of the Fifth Republic, set a trend of using his constitutional powers widely and established presidential precedents, such as using unilateral presidential referenda for policy decisions, with successive presidents of the republic using the referendum in a similar way.\textsuperscript{32} Problematically, in some cases, the president's use of powers can have far-reaching effects, especially if a particular president believes that 'he who has the right to set new laws therewith also has the power to change the goals of society'.\textsuperscript{33}

In addition to varying the powers of the president in a constitution, some modern constitutional drafters, suspicious of the potential harm of factious political parties or non-institutionalized party systems, not unlike Weber, have crafted special designs to enhance the power of the executive vis-à-vis the legislature (eg the vote\textsuperscript{bloqué} and the confidence vote procedure in France after 1958) offering the government greater control over the legislative process, and thereby insulating them from some of the divisiveness of party politics.\textsuperscript{34} French governments have often used these procedures in order to avoid parliamentary obstruction and immobilism, and have passed several important pieces of legislation, including national budgets, through these procedures. These measures, to the extent that they limit parliamentary discussion on crucial aspects of national policy, may be democracy-constraining, especially (p. 883) when they are used excessively by the executive, as a substitute for party backing. Less problematic for democracy is the constructive vote of no confidence, a constitutional design that is aimed at disciplining parties in that it allows a legislative majority to turn an unpopular or ineffective government out of office through a vote of no confidence,\textit{if and only if} that legislative majority is able to name a new prime minister to whom they guarantee immediate majority support. This procedure was first written into the 1949 German Basic Law and was 'meant as a safety-valve against the destruction of governments through negative majorities', and was later adopted in several countries, including post-Franco Spain and post-communist Hungary.\textsuperscript{35}

\textbf{III. Comparative Configurations: Parties and Constitutional Dynamics}

These party system characteristics, electoral system designs, and constitutional rules concerning executive powers vis-à-vis the legislature combine in ways that affect constitutional performance, explaining why comparable constitutional designs with extremely similar structures nevertheless produce very divergent outcomes; and why, given the nature of political parties and party systems in some countries, certain constitutional types might be more problematic than others. The key to understanding this variation is found by analyzing how an executive can find itself in a situation in which it does not have a legislative majority. In presidentialism, this situation results only from the interaction of the constitution and the voters’ choices. That is, the constitution stipulates the power structure among the branches of government and the fixed duration of executive and legislative terms. The voters, in turn, make their separate choices for the executive and legislative seats. In parliamentarism, the minority situation of the executive can result from the interaction of the constitution and the voters’ choices, plus the government’s decision, and the legislators’ decision. That is, the constitution stipulates the division of powers, the voters choose their legislators, the government that forms decides whether or not to form a minority or major coalition based on a variety of incentives and constraints, and the legislators decide whether or not to support that government. In semi-presidentialism, the situation can result from the interaction of: the constitution, the voters, the government, the legislators, and now also the president. The same interactions of parliamentarism occur, but the president often has dissolution and decree powers which also become part of the strategic interaction in the formation and duration of governments. Another way of stating this is that semi-presidentialism's strategic landscape is more complex than that of pure presidentialism, and more complex than that of parliamentarism; for as we move from a presidential country to a parliamentary country to a semi-presidential country, we also move toward more institutional players in the origins and demise of governments. (p. 884)
Table 41.1 Constitutional Dynamics: Comparative Configurations

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Subtypes where executive controls (50% of legislature)</th>
<th>Presidentialism</th>
<th>Parliamentarism</th>
<th>Semi-presidentialism</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>This division a function of:</td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Constitution + voters’ choice</td>
<td>Constitution + voters’ choice + legislators’ choice</td>
<td>Constitution + voters’ choice + president’s choice</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Divided government</td>
<td>Minority government (single party or coalition)</td>
<td>Divided majority government (cohabitation) or Divided minority government</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Simply put, this greater complexity comes from the presence of more strategic actors. See Table 41.1.

IV. An Empirical Illustration: Parties and the Weimar Constitution

Returning to Weimar Germany, where we began this chapter, it is interesting to reflect again on Weber’s concerns, remembering how dynamics between the party system and the constitution played a key role in the breakdown of the Republic. The semi-presidential constitution in Weimar set up a particular kind of political ‘neighborhood’, which became vulnerable to the mechanisms of rapid segregation. Democratic parties initiated the Republic, drafted the constitution, and controlled almost all of the Weimar cabinets at the onset of the republic. Figure 4.1 shows the 29 cabinets in Weimar, from 1919–33. Each point in time reflects one cabinet, and shows the percentage of that cabinet whose members were from democratic parties, versus the percentage of cabinet members whose members were from non-democratic parties.36

Members of three of the four main democratic parties in 1919—the Social Democratic Party (Sozialdemokratische Partei Deutschlands, SPD), the Zentrum Party (Ztr), and the German Democratic Party (Deutsche Demokratische Partei, DDP)—embarked on the challenge of constructing a democratic order and crafting a liberal constitution.37 Towards the center of the ideological spectrum one found the Zentrum Party. The Zentrum strongly advocated a political role for the Catholic Church, and this part of its mandate pushed it away from other democratic (but more secular) parties. The Bayerische Volkspartei (BVP) was an important regional splinter of the Zentrum Party, but with a slightly more conservative accent.38 For their part, (p. 885) the SPD were located ideologically toward the left and center-left, and provided the main party representation for German trade unions, which ‘were committed to the Republic ... [and] provided the backbone of the SPD’s support electorally’.39 On the ideologically conservative, but still democratic, end of the spectrum was the fourth democratic party, the DDP, which was strongly opposed to the increasing bureaucratization of the German economy, and the socialization of the forces of production.

In the non-democratic camp was the other liberal party, located further to the right on the ideological spectrum than the DDP, a supporter of democracy only in the very early Weimar years: the Deutsche Volkspartei (DVP). On the far right of the ideological spectrum was the nationalistic Deutschnational Volkspartei (DNVP), which advocated a strong state and compulsory military service and was generally skeptical of democracy and representative government.40 On the undemocratic, but far left part of the ideological spectrum, was the Kommunistische Partei (KPD). The Communists, for their part, never accepted the Republic as truly democratic, and opposed it on such Thus the division of the parties into the democratic camp (SPD, DDP, Zentrum, BVP) and non-democratic camp (DVP, KPD, DNVP, NSDAP). The SPD's center-left and pro-democratic placement in the complex party system of the Weimar Republic made it one of the most important, and most viable, coalition partners throughout the Republic. In terms of both votes in the national elections and seats in the Reichstag, the SPD also remained the strongest party until the penultimate year of the Republic, 1932. In the early years of the Republic, the SPD had participated in coalitions with the Zentrum, the DDP, and occasionally, the DVP. From November 1923 onward, however, the SPD remained in the opposition (with the exception of a last attempt to ward off fascism in 1928 with the formation of the Grand Coalition). Throughout the Republic, the SPD remained under intense pressure from the left. The SPD President Friedrich Ebert forged governing coalitions and alliances with moderate parties, but because of this, he risked losing the support of the SPD's working class base, and the more radical parties on the left and factions within the SPD were eager to capture this electoral support the moment the SPD lost it.

Over the course of the Republic, therefore, the SPD gradually began to remain in the opposition rather than form a government, in spite of the fact that it retained the plurality of legislative seats until 1932. Given that the SPD was still the largest party in the Reichstag for almost the entire duration of the Republic, and that it was centrally located in Weimar's multiple cleavage structure, the SPD actually blocked the formation of majority coalitions. Without the support of the SPD, most coalitions were often minority coalitions or, at best, held a slight, precarious majority. Thus the SPD's decision had far-reaching consequences for the entire party system, and this is what makes the segregation model of cabinet formation and dissolution extremely useful for understanding the processes that unfolded in Weimar.

The SPD's ambivalence toward forming and joining governing coalitions was found in the fact that the SPD, like many parties, was internally divided. The left wing of the SPD showed little interest in participating in broad government coalitions, particularly when these coalitions involved the center-right DDP, or the non-democratic parties of the right. Moreover, the SPD's earlier coalitions with the moderate right parties resulted in the loss of proletarian electoral support to the parties on the extreme and undemocratic left, especially the Independent Social Democrats (Unabhängige Sozialdemokratische Partei Deutschlands, USPD)—and the KPD. And yet, analysis of the SPD party program in 1925 shows that a majority of the SPD believed that the party ‘must try ... with all of its energy, to go out from opposition into coalition with the bourgeoisie middle and left, in order to take part again in government power.’ Unfortunately, the party leadership was not able to convince its Reichstag delegates of this plan.

Because the SPD preferred to remain in the opposition rather than take part in government, the middle-of-the-road parties tended to bring the right wing into their governments ... no parliamentary government could be formed without the acquiescence of the SPD, yet the logical consequence—Social Democratic participation in government—was not drawn.

The SPD's non-participation in government coalitions also pushed other parties away from the center, toward the extremes, exacerbating what was becoming a systemic polarization. As a consequence of the SPD's non-cooperative behavior, certain parties were forced to seek coalitions with parties located near the non-democratic extremes. For example, the anti-democratic prelate, Ludwig Kaas, was elected leader of the Zentrum Party in 1928. Kaas then moved the Zentrum, a democratic party and an important coalition partner for the SPD, toward the right in search of new coalition partners. The centrifugal trends in the system took control. The DNVP, always a party of the right, was pushed further toward the extreme right in 1928, when the party elected an extreme nationalist, Alfred Hugenberg, as party chairman. Hugenberg, upon taking control of the party, radicalized its program with the aim of enabling the DNVP to share in the 'social respectability, the political influence, and the financial resources of these [anti-system] circles and simultaneously to become part of a broad "National Opposition" to the Weimar Republic.'

Thus the ‘logical consequence’ of the SPD being the largest party during most of Weimar was for it to participate in governing coalitions. As Bracher suggests, however, that this did not happen because the parties had only very limited talent for coalition and compromise, and the inhibitions on both sides... were too great, due both to the traditional misgivings of the middle-class parties and to the immutable oppositional tendencies and feeble power drive of the SPD, which lacked full understanding of its role as the strongest party in a parliamentary democracy.48

V. Conclusion

One might conclude that Weber was indeed correct: constitutional drafters cannot help but pay attention to the nature of the political parties within the polity when thinking through various possible design models. For the complexity of interactions between parties, on the one hand, and constitutional rules and incentives, on the other hand—here illustrated with the case of Weimar—suggests that even democratic political parties can, when faced with the incentives of certain constitutions, contribute to democracy's collapse. Our efforts to understand comparative constitutional law need to pay heed to Weber's early warning, bringing political parties and party systems more systematically back to the study of constitutional law.

Bibliography

Bibliography
Anthony Downs, An Economic Theory of Democracy (1957)
Maurice Duverger, La monarchie républicaine (1974)
(p. 888) Maurice Duverger, Les partis politiques (1951)
Maurice Duverger, Political Parties: Their Organization and Activity in the Modern State (1954)
Werner Kaltefleiter, Die Funktionen des Staatsoberhauptes in der Parlamentarischen Demokratie (1970)
Dieter Nohlen and Rainer-Olaf Schultz, Wahlsysteme der Welt: Daten und Analysen, Ein Handbuch (1978)
Carole Pateman, Participation and Democratic Theory (1970)
Hanna Fenichel Pitkin, The Concept of Representation (1967)
Douglas W. Rae, The Political Consequences of Electoral Laws (1967)
Carl Schmitt, Verfassungslehre (1928)
Political Parties and the Constitution

Max Weber, Gesammelte Politische Schrifte (1921)

Notes:

(2) Note the similarities between early and more recent comparative-historical work on the role of parties in representative democracy, in Carl Schmitt, Verfassungslehre (1928), and Juan J. Linz and Alfred Stepan, Problems of Democratic Transition and Consolidation (1996). Another line of inquiry regarding variations in representation and its usefulness in democracy includes Hanna Fenichel Pitkin, The Concept of Representation (1967), with an attempt to respond to the idea of representation as useful to democracy found in Carole Pateman, Participation and Democratic Theory (1970).

(5) Mainwaring and Scully (n 4), 22.

(7) Sartori (n 3).

(11) Majority formation is only one possible goal of electoral system design. Accurate reflection of minority parties in the legislature is another—often opposite—goal. Majority electoral systems tend to satisfy the first goal, while PR systems tend to satisfy the second. A discussion of these goals and the respective electoral systems for achieving them is found in the classic handbook by Dieter Nohlen, Wahlsysteme der Welt: Daten und Analysen, Ein Handbuch (1978), 13–18 and 48–56, respectively. Also see Vernon Bogdanor and David Butler (eds), Democracy and Elections: Electoral Systems and Their Consequences (1983); Lani Guinier, The Tyranny of the Majority: Fundamental Fairness in Representative Democracy (1994); and Lijphart (n 9), 10–56.

(12) As Linz remarks, the control of the executive in presidential systems is in principle ‘winner take all’. In addition it is ‘loser loses all’ for defeated presidential candidates, who might end without any public office after the election and, unless they have strong positions as leaders of their party, might have gambled away all their political resources.

(13) Weber (n 1), 500.

(14) Empirically, variations on these two themes obviously exist. In Costa Rica, for example, the president is required to get 40 percent of the valid votes cast, which is, strictly speaking, neither a majority nor a plurality, but is known rather as a qualified plurality.
This system was used to elect the president of Nigeria between 1979 and 1983. It requires candidates to have cross-regional support in order to avoid the majority’s feeling of exclusion by regionally concentrated ethnic groups. See Donald L. Horowitz, _A Democratic South Africa? Constitutional Engineering in a Divided Society_ (1991), esp 206–10.

Downs’ model suggests that electors vote for policies, and that parties are political entrepreneurs that alter the policies they are not particularly attached to in order to attract the greatest percentage of votes and win office. See Downs, _An Economic Theory of Democracy_; also see Ian Budge and Hans Keman, _Parties and Democracy: Coalition Formation and Government Functioning in Twenty States_ (1990), esp 26–31.

In other words, a bipolar [party] system assumes a normal, bell-curve distribution (a Gauss-Laplace curve) of where the electors place themselves along a left-right (or other) continuum, whereas bipolarization assumes a double-peaked distribution of political opinion with an almost empty center.

See Sartori (n 16), 14 n 15.

The counter-argument is given by Horowitz, who claims that with this system, the only way to secure a victory is ... through interparty agreements. The president, therefore, cannot escape his party membership—it is the key to the vote exchanges that will elect him ... The presidential illusion of an independent mandate ... is extremely unlikely under these circumstances.

See Horowitz (n 15), 211. He goes on to argue:

This is particularly the case where the legislature is elected by the same method. Then the presidential election is likely to become part of a nation-wide interparty electoral arrangement that may also have the effect of building bridges between the separately elected branches of government.

Horowitz neglects the methodological point that presidential and legislative electoral systems need separate analysis. He transfers the effects of this system at the legislative level to the presidential level, which is analytically incorrect. Also see the critique in Shugart and Carey (n 10), 218–19.

Sartori notes, ‘Concurrent elections cannot fabricate undivided majorities that are not potentially in the works; but staggered elections do facilitate divided majority outcomes’: Sartori (n 16), 179. This said, it does seem to be the case that the electorate is encouraged to vote ‘usefully’ in concurrent elections. Also see Shugart and Carey (n 10), 229–58 and Appendix B.

On the critical role political parties and party systems play in holding federations together, see Jenna Bednar, _The Robust Federation_ (2008).

See Shugart and Carey (n 10), 171.

Not all powers are equal. Eg, Jack Hayward, in his discussion of the presidents of the French Fifth Republic, distinguishes between constitutional _powers_ and constitutional _prerogatives_, the latter not requiring countersignature but rather, ‘made on [the president’s] own nonaccountability’: Jack S. Hayward, _Governing_...
France: The One and Indivisible French Republic (1973), 101.

(27) See Shugart and Carey (n 10), 148–58. Shugart and Carey devised a scale to measure and compare presidents’ constitutional powers. While useful for demonstrating the variation in executive strength across countries, the scale fails to take into account the absolutely crucial idea of emergency powers. Moreover, this scale does not distinguish adequately between powers and prerogatives, nor does it measure the legislature’s powers in the areas where the president also has power, which obfuscates the dynamic between president and the legislature. Since power must be conceived of in relational terms (ie, power over whom, resistance to power, etc) it would be important to include the legislature in this scale.

(28) Also see Maurice Duverger, Échec au roi (1978), 31–44, for a discussion of presidential constitutional powers versus actual presidential practice in France, Finland, Weimar Germany, Portugal, Austria, Ireland, and Iceland.

(31) Werner Kaltefleiter contrasts the president with a majority, and what he considers the ‘opposite extreme’ of political reality, when there is no effective majority, as in the end of the Weimar Republic, ‘when the complete immobilization of the party system had led to paralysis of political power and the Reichspräsident recovered a monopoly over decisions without any sort of effective controlling institutions’: Kaltefleiter, Die Funktionen des Staatsoberhauptes (1970), 186–7.

(32) On the referendum as part of the presidential prerogatives, see Hayward (n 26), 101–2. Also see the discussion of the importance of informal presidential powers in Shugart and Carey (n 10), 58–61.

(35) Wolfgang Rudzio, Das politische System der Bundesrepublik Deutschland: Eine Einführung (1991), 245. A similar procedure, known as the doble confianza, was written into the constitution of the Second Spanish Republic (1931–36), but with a key difference. According to this procedure, the president could dissolve the legislature twice within his six-year term, but upon the second dissolution, the newly elected legislature would immediately investigate and determine the necessity of the president’s dissolution. If it determined that there were no grounds for such dissolution, the president would himself be automatically removed from office (hence the name, doble confianza). Contrary to the positive vote of no confidence, then, the doble confianza vote exacerbated governmental instability by allowing for a double dissolution of both president and parliament. See Gabriel Jackson, The Spanish Republic and the Civil War, 1931–1939 (1965), esp ch 3, ‘The Creation of a Constitution’; and Juan Linz, ‘Excursus: The President in the Spanish Republic, 1931–1936’ in Linz and Valenzuela (n 12), 56–7.

(36) I have assumed these categories of ‘democratic parties’ and ‘non-democratic’ to be static in composition, dichotomous, mutually exclusive, and jointly exhaustive, which is fairly reasonable given the parties in Weimar.

(37) The classification of these three parties, the ‘Weimar Coalition’, as democratic can be found in Rainer Lepsius, ‘From Fragmented Party Democracy to Government by Emergency Decree and National Socialist Takeover: Germany’ in Juan J. Linz and Alfred Stepan (eds), The Breakdown of Democratic Regimes (1978).

(38) The BVP’s conservatism made coalition formation problematic for its Catholic partner, the Zentrum, since the BVP refused most of the Zentrum’s cooperative efforts with parties further to the left. See Ellen L. Evans, ‘The Center Wages Kulturpolitik: Conflict in the Marx-Keudell Cabinet of 1927’ (1969) 2 Central European History 139; Rudolf Morsey, ‘The Centre Party Between the Fronts’ in Theodor Eschenburg et al (eds), The Road to Dictatorship:

(39) Anthony J. Nicholls, Weimar and the Rise of Hitler (1968), 49. The SPD also had among its members several distinguished German intellectuals, including Friedrich Naumann and Max Weber.

(40) Lepsius (n 37), 34–79.

(42) See the data collected and published in Informationen zur politischen Bildung: Die Weimarer Republik, No 109/110 (1988).

(43) Hans Mommsen, From Weimar to Auschwitz (1991), 50. The SPD, therefore, eventually had to abandon the policy of reaching out to the growing middle classes. However, this was not a sound strategy, in the end, given that the blue-collar workforce was in substantial decline as a result of the social re-stratification during the Republic. As a result, the SPD lost substantial electoral support from the working classes, and also failed to tap the growing middle class. See ibid 2–4; also see Hans Mommsen, ‘Die Sozialdemokratie in der Defensive: Der Immobilismus der SPD und der Aufstieg des Nationalsozialismus’ in Hans Mommsen (ed), Sozialdemokratie zwischen Klassenbewegung und Volkspartei (1974).

(45) Lepsius (n 37), 45; for the argument that the Zentrum had already moved to the right even before Kaas took over the chairmanship of the party in 1928, see Josef Becker, ‘Joseph Wirth und die Krise des Zentrums während des IV Kabinetts Marx (1927 bis 1928): Darstellung und Dokumente’, Zeitschrift für die Geschichte des Oberrheins, vol 109 (1961), 361–482.

Cindy Skach
Cindy Skach is Professor of Comparative Government and Law, University of Oxford
Abstract and Keywords

This article begins with a discussion of the constitutional significance of free expression. It then discusses constitutional freedom of expression clauses; interpreting freedom of expression clauses; balancing freedom of expression and other interests; and freedom of expression and the media.

Keywords: constitution, freedom of expression, constitutional rights, media

I. The Constitutional Significance of Free Expression 891

II. Constitutional Freedom of Expression Clauses 893

III. Interpreting Freedom of Expression Clauses 895
   1. The Scope of Freedom of Expression 895
   2. The Character of Freedom of Expression 897
   3. The Censorship Ban 900

IV. Balancing Freedom of Expression and Other Interests 902
   1. Hate Speech 903
   2. Libel and the Infringement of Privacy 904
   3. Pornography 906

V. Freedom of Expression and the Media 907

I. The Constitutional Significance of Free Expression

Constitutional courts have frequently emphasized that freedom of expression is essential in a liberal democracy. In one of its earliest rulings on the guarantee of the freedom in the post-war German Basic Law, the Constitutional Court in Karlsruhe said:\(^1\)

-To a free democratic constitutional order [freedom of expression] is absolutely basic, for it alone makes possible the continuing intellectual controversy, the contest of opinions that forms the lifeblood of such an order ... [I]t is the basis of all freedom whatever, ‘the matrix, the indispensable condition of nearly every other form of freedom’.

The quotation comes from the judgment of Justice Cardozo in Palko v Connecticut,\(^2\) in which the US Supreme Court had recognized that freedom of speech has a special status in the constitutional order. Freedom of expression is basic, in that its exercise enables democratic government to claim legitimacy when it regulates the conduct of its citizens, perhaps even (p. 892) when it restricts the exercise of other rights—for example, procedural or property rights—which are not basic in this sense. Only citizens who are free to challenge the wisdom of, say, economic or social legislation, can be expected to comply with its requirements.\(^3\)

Another argument for the special position of freedom of expression is that its exercise is essential for social progress and for the intellectual and moral development of individuals.\(^4\) There is also the argument from truth, which received its classic philosophical statement in the writings of John Stuart Mill.\(^5\) Truth, as Justice Wendell Holmes put it in his famous judgment in Abrams,\(^6\) should be determined in the marketplace of ideas, rather than by regulation. Even if we are sceptical of the claim that truth will triumph in the free market, we are probably less willing to allow governments to decide what is true and which expressions may be proscribed as false. Further, it is the role of constitutional courts to protect the people against the tyranny of ‘governing majorities’,\(^7\) so freedom of expression must be protected, even when its exercise is limited in accordance with the wishes of a freely elected parliament or congress.

The significance of freedom of expression for liberal democratic government may be shown by reference to the constitutional position in Australia. The Constitution of Australia (1900) lacks a Bill of Rights, so there is no explicit guarantee of freedom of expression.\(^8\) Yet its High Court has held in a number of decisions from the early 1990s that a freedom of political communication must be implied in the federal Constitution;\(^9\) it would make no sense for it to provide for democratic elections to the Senate and House of Representatives, unless people were free to debate political issues. This development is of considerable theoretical and comparative interest. Freedom of expression is narrower in Australia than it is under the constitutions of other jurisdictions, for it does not cover commercial or literary speech;\(^10\) on the other hand, the implied freedom shows that a constitutional state must recognize freedom of political expression, unless it is to forfeit its distinctive character.

Freedom of expression as a constitutional right must be distinguished from the freedom as a human right, guaranteed by international conventions such as the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), or the Inter-American Convention on Human Rights (IACHR). Both the ECHR and the IACHR have exercised an enormous influence on the development of the right to freedom of expression (and other rights) in the legal systems of the states which are parties to these conventions. For example, contempt of court law in the United Kingdom, which had significantly curtailed the freedom of the media to publish material prejudicing legal proceedings, was made less restrictive following the seminal ruling of the Strasbourg Court in the Sunday Times case.\(^11\) But national courts rarely treat the decisions of international courts as decisive. They must interpret and apply constitutional freedom of expression provisions in accordance with the text of the constitution as a whole, distinctive national principles of interpretation, and relevant precedents within their own jurisdiction, as well as the decisions of international courts and tribunals.

Constitutional freedom of expression guarantees must of course be distinguished from both statutory rights to freedom of speech and any speech and press freedoms recognized by ordinary civil law or by the common law in Anglo-American legal systems. The difference is that constitutional rights may trump limits imposed on the exercise of the freedoms by ordinary legislation or by competing civil or common law rights, say, to reputation or privacy;\(^12\) statutory free speech rights in contrast have no more weight than these conflicting rights or interests. However, sometimes the freedoms conferred by legislation or other texts may be treated as constitutional, even if they are not set out formally in the constitution itself. This is the position in Sweden, where freedom of the press,\(^13\) and freedom of expression by other means,\(^14\) have been conferred by fundamental laws, which cannot be amended by the usual legislative process, and in France, where ordinary legislation must comply with the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen (1789).\(^15\)

The status of the right to the freedom of expression is less clear in the United Kingdom. It is now protected by the Human Rights Act 1998 (HRA), incorporating (most of) the rights in the ECHR; UK courts must interpret legislation as far as possible in conformity with the right to freedom of expression,\(^16\) but they do not have authority to invalidate a statute, even if it plainly infringes the right.\(^17\) Even before the enactment of the HRA, the House of Lords (now the Supreme Court) had sometimes characterized the right to freedom of expression as ‘constitutional’,\(^18\) but it is doubtful whether it should really be accorded that status.

However, one final introductory point is very clear. There is no difference between ‘freedom of expression’ and ‘freedom of speech’. Common law systems have tended to use the latter term, while civil law systems use the former. An argument can be made that ‘freedom of expression’ has a broader meaning, in that it includes not only verbal and written communications, but the arts, for example dramatic performances, painting, and sculpture.
Freedom of Expression

Courts in common law jurisdictions have, however, been prepared in appropriate cases to hold that ‘freedom of speech’ covers all forms of communication, not just the written and spoken word. Nevertheless, the scope of the freedom, whether of expression or of speech, remains a difficult issue for the courts.\footnote{19}

II. Constitutional Freedom of Expression Clauses

The best known free speech clause is the First Amendment to the US Constitution. It is also one of the shortest: \footnote{(p. 894)}

> Congress shall make no law ... abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or of the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

But even this apparently simple provision bristles with difficulties. Among them are the following: Does the clause limit the competence of the executive and the states, as well as that of the federal Congress? What does ‘abridging’ mean, and how does the free press limb of the clause relate to ‘the freedom of speech’? Many of these problems have been resolved by the Supreme Court, although it has not provided a conclusive answer to all of them. In particular, it remains unclear whether the media enjoys greater rights under the free press limb than those conferred on individuals by the First Amendment.

The freedom of expression provisions in modern post-war constitutions are typically much more detailed. The German Basic Law of 1949 is a good example. Article 5(1) confers on everyone ‘the right freely to express and disseminate his opinion by speech, writing and pictures and freely to inform himself from generally accessible sources.’ The provision specifically guarantees press, broadcasting, and cinema freedom, and it also stipulates: ‘There shall be no censorship.’ But these rights may be limited by general laws and by provisions to protect young people, and in order to protect the right to personal honour.\footnote{20} Only freedom of the arts and science is more or less absolutely protected.\footnote{21}

The German provisions illustrate a number of features of modern free expression provisions. By conferring a freedom to receive and impart information, as well as a general freedom of expression, they recognize that the audience, as well as the speaker, may claim constitutional free speech rights.\footnote{22} Usually press freedom and that of the other media are guaranteed by these provisions.\footnote{23} Sometimes freedom of assembly, academic freedom, and freedom of literary, artistic, or scientific creation are additionally covered by the freedom of expression clause,\footnote{24} though they are often covered by separate constitutional provisions. Freedom of expression is regarded in Hungary as a ‘mother’ right, from which these other freedoms are derived.\footnote{25} An explicit ban on censorship is very common: for instance, the Spanish Constitution provides that the exercise of the rights conferred by the freedom of expression clause ‘cannot be restricted by any type of prior censorship’.\footnote{26} But the scope of this ban is rarely, if ever, spelt out, leaving the courts to decide whether it applies to court orders prohibiting a publication, as well as to administrative censorship.

While the First Amendment appears to provide an absolute right to freedom of speech, other constitutions, such as Article 5 of the German Basic Law, confer a qualified freedom: the exercise of the right to freedom of expression may be restricted by general laws or in order to safeguard other rights or interests. But a constitution may also limit the circumstances in which freedom of expression may be restricted. The Canadian Charter, for example, provides \footnote{(p. 895)} that rights, including the freedom of expression conferred by section 2(b), are ‘subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.’\footnote{27} The state may not, therefore, have unfettered discretion to restrict the exercise of freedom of expression whenever it thinks this course appropriate; there is a presumption in favour of freedom of expression.

The constitution may itself provide that the freedom does not cover certain types of expression. The South Africa Constitution,\footnote{28} following the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, provides that freedom of expression does not extend to war propaganda, incitement of imminent violence, or hate speech ‘based on race, ethnicity, gender or religion’, which amounts to incitement of harm. It cannot even be argued that these types of speech are covered by the right to freedom of expression. Other types of speech under this Constitution, for instance child pornography, are covered, though they are of little value and the state will find it easy to justify their proscription.\footnote{29}
Freedom of Expression

III. Interpreting Freedom of Expression Clauses

1. The Scope of Freedom of Expression

Often the crucial question in a particular case is whether a communication is covered by the freedom of expression clause. If it is not, in the absence of other constitutional arguments, its dissemination can be restricted or banned; on the other hand, if it is covered, it is for the state to show that any restriction on its dissemination is compatible with freedom of expression. Courts generally take a broad view of the scope of the freedom. A particularly generous approach is taken by the Supreme Court of Canada which has held that section 2(b) of the Charter covers any form of activity attempting to convey a meaning. Only violent acts are excluded, even if, as perhaps in the case of terrorist atrocities, one of their objectives is to convey a political message. It is immaterial whether the speech is valuable or not; even tasteless and trivial discourse is covered. But it is doubtful whether the Supreme Court would hold that the Canadian Charter covers expression such as perjury, bribes, and contractual promises. Although these types of expression amount to ‘speech’ or ‘expression’ in the dictionary meaning of these words, it is generally agreed that they are not covered by freedom of expression provisions. None of the reasons for recognizing a constitutional right to freedom of expression justifies their coverage; a bribe or false statement in court, for example, does not contribute to public discourse or the search for truth.

Two questions in particular have presented real difficulties. The first is how the line should be drawn in this context between expression on the one hand, and conduct on the other. The question creates acute difficulties when, for example, a demonstrator engages in an unorthodox form of protest such as desecrating or burning an army registration card or the national flag in protest against government policy, or when a nightclub presents nude dancing or live sexual activity. On one view these displays amount to conduct which can be regulated without free expression arguments. But they can equally be understood as radical messages communicated by non-traditional means. The most sensible approach to this issue is for the court to ask whether a public authority which, say, prohibits nude dancing intended to stop the dissemination of subversive ideas, rather than to prevent the concentration in a city centre of noisy night clubs. If the former was its aim, then the measure engages freedom of expression and should be subject to constitutional scrutiny. This principle has been applied in the United States and Canada to subject limits on election expenditure to scrutiny to ensure that they do not interfere disproportionately with freedom of expression during election campaigns of political parties, candidates, and their supporters.

The second issue is more general. It is whether the freedom of expression provision covers all types of speech, or is confined to communications on social and political issues, often described as ‘political speech’. The question has arisen most frequently with regard to commercial advertising and sexually explicit literature and art. For a court which adopts the approach of the Supreme Court of Canada to the freedom, there is no difficulty; freedom of expression naturally covers commercial and sexually explicit speech, though it may be easy for the state to justify the imposition of restrictions on its availability or particular content limits, for example on tobacco or alcohol advertising. The US Supreme Court used to take the view that commercial advertising, and some other kinds of speech, notably libel, fell wholly outside the scope of the First Amendment. That is no longer its position. The First Amendment now covers the publication of defamatory allegations, whether they concern public officials and figures or ordinary people. Its scope has also been extended to cover non-fraudulent commercial speech and advertising. Moreover, ‘obscenity’ has been defined restrictively; only a very narrow category of sexually explicit material, lacking any serious literary, artistic, or other value, may be proscribed without infringing the First Amendment.

Similar developments have occurred in other jurisdictions. In Germany, for example, the coverage of Article 5 has been extended to the publication of defamatory allegations, at least when they raise matters of public concern; the Federal Constitutional Court has also held that freedom of expression covers commercial advertisements, insofar as they contribute to the formation of public opinion, for example on environmental or health issues, and pornography, unless it is addressed to children. Unless the text of the freedom of expression provision, as in the case of South Africa, explicitly excludes particular categories of speech from its coverage, courts prefer to hold that it extends to all types of expression.

These developments are a little surprising. If the principal purpose of the freedom of expression guarantee is to protect uninhibited political discourse, it is unclear why its coverage should have been extended to types of speech, such as commercial advertising and pornography, which do not usually involve any discussion of political or social matters. One explanation is that it may be difficult to draw a sharp line between political speech on the one hand, and commercial or sexually explicit speech on the other. The author or publisher of pornography may argue, moreover, that he could not communicate libertarian ideas about sexual relationships unless he is free to illustrate his ideas with explicit pictures. The difficulty is most acute with regard to defamatory allegations, often impossible to divorce from their context which may be a matter of clear public concern. The seminal US case, New York Times v Sullivan, for example, involved the publication of a newspaper advertisement protesting against the harsh treatment of civil rights demonstrators, for which, it was suggested, the commissioner of police was responsible. Courts are rightly reluctant to trust the capacity of government to distinguish between speech which cannot lawfully be restricted and speech which can be regulated. This reluctance is particularly marked in the United States, where the Supreme Court will rarely uphold legislation which imposes ‘content-based’ restrictions on speech—that is, restrictions which allow the expression of some views, but not others, or which allow the discussion of only a restricted range of topics or confer privileges on particular speakers.

2. The Character of Freedom of Expression

Constitutional courts must sometimes determine whether the right to freedom of expression confers only a liberty to speak, free from interference by the state and public authorities, or whether in some contexts it also confers on individuals positive claim-rights to communicate their ideas or to disseminate, or acquire, information. Positive claims may be made in a variety of situations. It can be argued, for instance, that individuals should have rights to disseminate their views in the press or on television, or that the state should subsidize artistic expression. There are powerful arguments for recognizing some positive rights; otherwise only a few people, in particular the wealthy and the articulate, will enjoy effective opportunities to express their views to the public. But courts are reluctant to uphold wide constitutional positive rights, for their recognition would compel government, or a regulatory authority, to frame appropriate rules to determine when the rights should be respected, for example when a political party (p. 898) or pressure group should have a right to broadcast. That difficulty does not arise, of course, if a government chooses to enact legislation conferring access rights, say, to use public or private property for speech or to acquire information from public authorities.

Courts most commonly recognize constitutional positive freedom of expression rights in two categories of case. Claims to demonstrate on the streets or in other public places are often upheld, particularly if there is evidence that the authority had discriminated against the applicant when it refused permission to hold the meeting. As Chief Justice Lamer said in the Committee for the Commonwealth of Canada case, ‘the freedom of expression cannot be exercised in a vacuum… and it necessarily implies the use of physical space in order to meet its underlying objectives.’ Moreover, freedom of expression arguments are often strengthened by a specific provision in the constitution for freedom of assembly or public meeting. Courts have also upheld constitutional freedom of expression rights for the media and for the general public to attend legal proceedings, even when the parties would prefer them to be held in private. There seems no logical reason why the courts should be prepared to uphold positive rights in these cases, but not in others. The best explanation is probably that these rights have traditionally been respected in liberal democratic societies, so it is easy for courts to recognize them when their existence or scope is contested.

There is less uniformity in another important context: the treatment of the right of reply to media attacks. There are powerful freedom of expression arguments for recognition of this right; it enables individuals to communicate their version of events, when they feel they have been misrepresented by the media, and it gives readers and listeners access to both sides of a story. But the US Supreme Court has firmly rejected a statutory right of reply as incompatible with press freedom, in particular with the freedom of editors to determine the composition of their newspaper. So it is inconceivable that it would recognize a constitutional right to reply under the First Amendment, and it is unlikely that the UK Supreme Court or other Commonwealth courts would take that step. Rights of reply are generally provided in these jurisdictions by informal press codes, but are not legally enforceable.

On the other hand, an explicit constitutional right to reply and make corrections to inaccurate media stories is provided by some constitutions, while in other jurisdictions courts have upheld statutory provisions for such rights as protecting personality rights of the individuals concerned and promoting the freedom of expression of readers to hear both sides of a story. Indeed, a reply right may be considered necessary to safeguard personality rights which must be respected under the constitution. (However, the French Law of the Press of 1881 provides a very wide right of reply to articles naming or referring to a particular individual, irrespective whether they amounted to an infringement of the individual's personality rights.) The ‘right of reply’ controversy, therefore, nicely brings out many difficulties in interpreting freedom of expression: whether the right is only a liberty or may also confer positive rights, and the relationship of freedom of expression for individuals to the freedom of the institutional press and editorial freedom. To these difficulties are added, at least in some constituions, the balance between press freedom on the one hand, and on the other the rights of individuals to human dignity and the free development of their personality.

Freedom of expression may entail a positive right to acquire information from the state and public authorities. Without adequate information, citizens, it is argued, cannot properly exercise their freedom of expression to contribute to debate on political issues. Moreover, the press and other media will be unable to discharge their role as ‘watchdogs’ on behalf of the public, unless they have access to information from government and other official sources. These are strong arguments, but they do not show that freedom of information should be treated as an aspect of freedom of expression. The arguments prove too much, for they would also show that the law should regard rights to a good education and to travel as aspects of freedom of expression. Moreover, it seems odd to recognize freedom of expression rights in the absence of a willing speaker. Freedom of information involves rights to acquire information from authorities reluctant to supply it.

As has already been pointed out, freedom of expression clauses frequently provide a right to receive information, as well as a right to disseminate it. But recipient rights have ample content without bringing freedom of information within their protection. A recipient may be in a better position than the disseminator of the information to assert freedom of expression, for example when the latter is physically outside the jurisdiction and cannot easily claim the constitutional right. In these circumstances, the recipient right is a freedom to receive information from a willing speaker, or as the German Basic Law puts it, from ‘generally available sources’. It would be another step to hold that recipients have constitutional rights to acquire information from sources which do not want to provide it. US courts have declined to uphold First Amendment rights to acquire information; they draw a distinction between the freedom to communicate information which the media or other publisher has already acquired, and the freedom to gather information. Freedom of speech covers the former, but not the latter.

These points are not made to establish that freedom of information is misconceived. The argument is only that the freedom should be conferred by statute, as has been done in many countries. rather than treated as an aspect of freedom of expression. However, whatever the merits of these points, parties to the ECHR and to the IACHR may now be impelled to recognize freedom of information as implicit in the Convention rights to freedom of expression. For the Inter-American Court of Human Rights, and more recently the European Court of Human Rights, have recognized a right of access to state-held information as falling under the freedom of expression provisions in the Conventions. The Inter-American Court made plain that states have a positive obligation to provide the information or justify the refusal by reference to one of the exceptions allowed by Article 13 of the IACHR.

3. The Censorship Ban

Some freedom of expression provisions explicitly ban censorship and press licensing. That is because authoritarian regimes generally institute strict systems for the prior scrutiny of books, newspapers, and other printed matter to ensure that they do not contain subversive material or other disapproved content. The censorship ban is intended to outlaw this practice. It is unclear, however, whether it should be interpreted to cover all types of censorship, for example the censorship of exceptionally violent or sexually explicit films and videos, and whether it applies to injunctions and other court orders restraining the publication, say, of official or commercial secrets and confidential information.

The best answer to both these questions depends perhaps on the reasons for the special hostility to censorship or systems of ‘prior restraint’, the term often used in Anglo-American legal systems. On one view the vice of prior restraints is that they prevent a publication from seeing the light of day, so the public never has an opportunity to comment on it. As a prominent American constitutional scholar put it, ‘[A] criminal statute chills, prior restraint freezes.’ But that is too simple. The threat or fear of subsequent criminal prosecutions or civil actions may have as great an impact on the willingness of publishers to distribute radical and challenging ideas as any censorship system. Indeed, film distributors may prefer the security of a prior restraint system with which they are familiar; they know that if their film passes scrutiny by a censorship board, there is little chance it will face prosecution. The real drawback of censorship systems is that they are operated by administrative boards, generally applying unclear standards and without adequate procedural safeguards for the publisher or film distributor to explain his work. Moreover, censorship authorities are probably predisposed to refuse a permit from time to time, for otherwise there would be no point to their existence.\textsuperscript{67}

On this perspective, systems of film censorship may be unobjectionable, at least if they provide adequate procedural safeguards for film distributors. This is the position in the United States, where the Supreme Court has declined to hold them unconstitutional as such,\textsuperscript{68} but has imposed strict procedural safeguards: it is for the censor to show that a film did not meet clear standards spelt out in legislation, and a final order banning distribution should only be made by a court after a prompt adversary hearing at which the distributor could oppose its grant.\textsuperscript{69} Other courts have gone further. An Ontario court held that the system of censorship in that province was incompatible with the right to freedom of expression in the Charter, as the standards with which a film must comply for its release were stricter than the grounds on which a criminal prosecution could be brought. A comprehensive system of film censorship could not be sustained, although a more limited scheme to safeguard children would be compatible with freedom of expression.\textsuperscript{70} It is hard to see why a comprehensive film censorship system should be regarded as compatible with freedom of expression, when comparable controls over theatre have been abandoned in liberal democracies. On the other hand, it has been common for broadcasting programmes to be subject to some degree of prior scrutiny by a special regulatory authority, while governments may retain legal authority to stop particular material being broadcast.\textsuperscript{71}

The US Supreme Court and European courts have taken different positions on court injunctions. The Supreme Court will rarely uphold a judicial prior restraint, even in cases involving the publication of material likely to prejudice the outcome of pending or contemporaneous legal proceedings, where the defendant's constitutional right to a fair trial might be endangered.\textsuperscript{72} In the famous \textit{Pentagon Papers} case,\textsuperscript{73} it declined to continue a temporary order stopping the publication in two newspapers of confidential State Department documents relating to the involvement of the United States in the Vietnam War. Justices Black and Douglas would have declined to uphold a prior restraint in any circumstances, but other members of the 6:3 majority would have been prepared to uphold one if the government could show that publication would almost certainly result in ‘direct, immediate and irreparable damage to our Nation or its people’.\textsuperscript{74} A US court will grant an injunction to stop a publication only in very exceptional circumstances.\textsuperscript{75}

The general understanding of the censorship ban in European jurisdictions is that it applies only to administrative censorship systems, and not to court orders preventing a publication. That is certainly the position in Germany, where the issue has been considered by the Federal Constitutional Court on a number of occasions; it has explained that the \textit{Zensurverbot} applied only to systems requiring the submission of material to authorities for scrutiny prior to publication.\textsuperscript{76} It did not cover orders by a court for which an application must be made. In England and other countries injunctions are frequently granted to stop the publication of material likely to imperil commercial confidentiality, personal privacy, or state secrecy, or to endanger the fairness of legal proceedings. There is nothing objectionable in this practice, provided the media or other defendant has an opportunity to argue that it would be wrong to grant an injunction. It is imperative to ensure that these procedural rights are safeguarded.\textsuperscript{77} The European Court of Human Rights has rejected the argument that prior restraints are as such incompatible with the right to freedom of expression, though it has emphasized that they should be carefully scrutinized,\textsuperscript{78} and further that administrative orders must be liable to prompt judicial review.\textsuperscript{79} Court injunctions do not carry the same dangers for freedom of expression as systems of administrative scrutiny, for courts do, or should, not suffer from any prejudice in favour of censorship, they apply the law, rather than exercise administrative discretion, and they should provide both parties with adequate opportunities to argue their case.

\textbf{IV. Balancing Freedom of Expression and Other Interests}

In practice the most important issue for courts in free expression cases is how the right should be balanced against other interests. Their approach may depend on the character of the competing interest. If it is national security, public order, or some other general interest, they may require the state to show that the interest cannot be safeguarded without a constraint, or even a ban, on exercise of the right to freedom of expression and that this restraint is not excessive or disproportionate in the circumstances. In these cases there is a presumption in favour of the right. Courts sometimes defer to the government's assessment that, say, national security would be imperilled if the speaker were allowed to disseminate his ideas.\textsuperscript{80} Such deference legitimates, perhaps even encourages, the suppression of free expression and associated freedoms, particularly at times of tension, so it is much better for courts to insist there is evidence of a link between the spread of the (extreme) political speech and the insurrection or disorder thought likely to occur as a result. The latter approach is evidenced by the important decision of the US Supreme Court in \textit{Brandenburg v Ohio},\textsuperscript{81} when it required the state to show that incitement was \textit{likely} to lead to \textit{imminent} violence or other lawless action before it could penalize its dissemination.

Courts must adopt a different approach when they balance freedom of expression against another right, particularly if that other right is also guaranteed by the constitution. They cannot rely on a presumption in favour of freedom of expression, for the other right, for example to privacy or to a fair trial, may equally be entitled to constitutional protection. So courts must then consider the weight of the rival claims, to freedom of expression on the one hand, and to privacy, reputation, or intellectual property rights on the other, if they are to strike a fair balance between them. This entails asking questions about the value, say, of the particular communication or the degree of intrusion on the claimant's privacy. But detailed weighing of all the factors complicates the judicial process and makes the end result unpredictable, so some courts prefer to formulate clear rules, or guidelines, on the basis of which these conflicting claims can be resolved relatively easily.\textsuperscript{82}

It is impossible here to do justice to all areas of law in which courts balance freedom of expression (and associated rights such as freedom of assembly or academic freedom) against conflicting public interests or private rights. Some remarks should be made about three topics where balancing is particularly difficult and where national legislatures and courts have adopted radically different solutions: hate speech, libel and the invasion of privacy, and pornography.

1. \textbf{Hate Speech}

Many liberal democracies proscribe the dissemination of hate speech: communications inciting hatred against social groups defined by reference to their race, religion, or ethnic or national origins.\textsuperscript{83} Some hate speech laws also protect sexual minorities and the physically disabled.\textsuperscript{84} In many European states and in Israel, Holocaust denial is explicitly proscribed, while in others, notably Canada, deniers have been prosecuted under general criminal laws.\textsuperscript{85} Sharply different views have been taken about the compatibility of these laws with freedom of expression. At one extreme is the position in South Africa, where the Constitution excludes hate speech altogether from the guarantee.\textsuperscript{86} European constitutional courts and the Supreme Court of Canada have generally upheld the application of hate speech laws. In contrast, courts in the United States have almost always ruled them incompatible with the First Amendment guarantee of freedom of speech. Notably, the Supreme Court in \textit{RAV v City of St Paul}\textsuperscript{87} held that the city infringed the guarantee by enacting an ordinance singling out for proscription the expression of hatred ‘on the basis of race, color, creed, religion, or gender’. Either all forms of hate speech must be banned, or none. Racist hate speech must be permitted, as much as speech targeting Democrats or Republicans, or other types of extremist speech.\textsuperscript{88}

The usual perspective in the United States is that hate speech forms part of public discourse; only if racialists and extremists are allowed to express their ideas, can the state justify to them the application of anti-discrimination and other criminal laws regulating their conduct.\textsuperscript{89} Racists cannot then argue that they have not even been allowed to express their opinions. Another important argument is that of the ‘slippery slope’: once racist and other forms of hate speech are proscribed, it will be difficult to resist the extension of the criminal law to ban the dissemination of, say, radical anarchist or socialist ideas. Defenders of hate speech laws argue (p. 904) that they are needed to preserve community relations and in the long term to prevent a breakdown in law and order. But arguments of this kind are difficult to accept. They are incompatible with general perspectives underlying arguments for free expression, that it is better for a society to debate its underlying tensions and that the state infringes the freedom if it outlaws the dissemination of ideas which the majority dislikes or which are offensive, even insulting, to particular communities.

The proponents of hate speech laws may be on stronger ground when they argue that they protect the constitutional rights of the targeted groups, particularly their equality rights.\textsuperscript{90} For then the courts must balance the constitutional right to freedom of expression against another constitutional right, which presumptively is of equal weight. In assessing their importance, it can be argued, as Chief Justice Dickson said for the majority of the Canadian Supreme Court in its leading hate speech decision, that racist speech has 'low value'.\(^9^1\) However, it is unclear how hate speech, unlike the discriminatory denial of, say, housing or education, directly infringes the equality rights of the targeted group. Equality arguments carry little more conviction than the contention that hate speech 'silences' members of the targeted community, so infringing their own freedom of expression.

Another dimension of this discussion is, of course, that each country has a distinct historical experience of the dangers of hate speech. On that basis it is understandable that after the apartheid regime the framers of the South African Constitution decided wholly to exclude hate speech from the free expression guarantee. Equally, Holocaust denial laws make sense in countries which have recently experienced Nazi and other anti-Semitic regimes,\(^9^2\) or in which there is good reason to believe that, left unchecked, the fabrications of revisionist historians will be widely accepted. But with the passage of time, it would surely be wrong for the state to determine historical truth; a law banning the publication of 'revisionist' histories of the atrocities committed by religious communities, say, during the Crusades or the Thirty Years War, would infringe freedom of expression, however insulting these accounts are to their members now.

2. Libel and the Infringement of Privacy

In \textit{New York Times v Sullivan},\(^9^3\) the Supreme Court held for the first time that libel actions were not immune from scrutiny under the First Amendment. Like prosecutions for seditious libel, a civil action for libel damages could limit freedom of political expression, not only for the defendant in the particular action, but for other writers deterred from publishing out of fear of legal proceedings. The Court fashioned a broad rule under which libel actions brought by a public official could succeed only if he proved that the allegations were published with the knowledge of their falsity or with reckless indifference to their truth. The principle was extended to cover actions brought by any 'public figure', for example an army commander or sports personality, while private individuals must show fault if they are to succeed in libel proceedings.\(^9^4\) More controversially, it has applied the same principles to privacy cases, where the \textit{(p. 905)} public interest in publishing the intimate details of a politician's or celebrity's personal life is much weaker than it usually is in defamation actions.\(^9^5\)

The advantage of this approach is that it provides some certainty for the press and other media; they know that they can safely publish defamatory allegations about public officials and figures, which they believe to be true, even though it turns out that the stories are inaccurate. The \textit{New York Times} rule removes the 'chilling effect' of libel laws, which deter the press from publishing defamatory allegations it considers to be of public interest about political and other public figures when it is unsure it could prove their truth to the satisfaction of the libel jury. Under the rule an editor does not have to assess the weight of all the facts before deciding it is safe to publish the story; he has only to determine whether the claimant is a public official or figure. The same argument may apply in privacy cases, though in these circumstances the case for application of the \textit{New York Times} rule is much less persuasive; it is unclear that there is a real public interest in exposing details of even a politician's private life, unless their conduct interfered with discharge of their public duties.\(^9^6\)

On the other hand, the difficulty with \textit{New York Times} and later Supreme Court decisions is that they give too strong protection to freedom of expression, in particular of the media, at the cost to the individual's reputation or privacy. After all, a mistaken article might destroy the standing of a minor figure in, say, local government. For this reason, courts in England and other Commonwealth countries, in applying their own constitutional provisions, have rejected the US approach, while giving much more weight than they had under common law to freedom of expression in libel actions. Similarly, the German approach is to weigh all relevant factors before determining whether freedom of expression should trump the individual's interest in protecting his reputation.\(^9^7\) It adopts the same approach in privacy cases.\(^9^8\) The then House of Lords in England also examined all the facts carefully in these cases, most notably when it awarded Naomi Campbell damages after a tabloid newspaper published a photograph of her leaving a meeting of Narcotics Anonymous where she had been receiving treatment.\(^9^9\)

It is certainly right to apply freedom of expression principles to libel and privacy actions. But courts must take equal account of reputation and privacy rights, particularly when they enjoy constitutional protection. (One explanation of the approach in the United States is that reputation and privacy against media disclosures are not constitutional rights, so do not enjoy the same status as freedom of speech and of the press.) There is no good reason to privilege freedom of expression over human dignity, so individuals should be able to secure redress for egregious attacks on their privacy or constant harassment by the media. In this context it is worth emphasizing that most infringements of personal privacy are committed by the media, in particular the tabloid press, which is often ready to claim freedom of expression rights to defend their commercial interests in satisfying the public demand for celebrity gossip.

(p. 906) 3. Pornography

Courts adopt a number of approaches to pornography—sexually explicit literature, film, and other material. Extreme hard-core pornography may be excluded altogether from the coverage of freedom of expression, on the ground that it is indistinguishable from the provision of sex toys and does not communicate any ideas so as to constitute ‘expression’. This perspective is reflected in the constitutional definition of ‘obscenity’ in the United States; matter which appeals to a prurient interest in sex, is patently offensive, and lacks any serious artistic, political, or other value may be proscribed without the risk of First Amendment challenge. There is also no serious freedom of expression argument against bans on the circulation of child pornography when its production involved the participation of young children.

Attempts to control the spread of other types of pornography may, however, run into constitutional difficulties. A government may not justify tight regulation of sexually explicit literature simply on the argument that its consumption is morally wrong or lowers the tone of society; members of the public have a freedom of expression right to determine what they read and look at. The state must point to some specific harm. This might be the increased incidence of rape and other sexual offences, or the psychological damage to children from premature exposure to sexually explicit material. The weakness of these arguments is that it is unclear that the consumption of such material does cause, or even contribute to, these harms. Also controversial is the feminist case that pornography degrades women, and perhaps silences them, so denying them freedom of expression. The Supreme Court of Canada has decided that hard-core material can be proscribed if it degrades women, or gays and lesbians. The feelings of diminished self-esteem resulting from the dissemination of this material is a harm the state is entitled to prevent without infringing free expression. But US courts have rejected this justification for pornography regulation; it is not the business of the state to determine which views of women are acceptable.

Even US courts have been sympathetic to regulations concerning the location of sex cinemas and shops, on the ground that their siting in proximity to each other would lead to the development of a red-light district, or if permitted close to a residential area would damage the quality of life and reduce property values. It is striking that this type of regulation is regarded as compatible with freedom of expression, even though it plainly discriminates against the provision of one type of material—sexually explicit speech, regarded as expression of low value when balanced against the public interest in the general quality of life in a city or residential area. The same perspective was taken by the House of Lords when it upheld a Belfast City ban on the siting of sex shops in a city centre area. This approach is acceptable, given the availability of pornographic material by mail order and now over the internet: such regulation does not have the same impact on freedom of expression as a total ban on the dissemination of sexually explicit material.

(p. 907) V. Freedom of Expression and the Media

It goes without saying that the mass media—the press and broadcasters—may claim freedom of expression, whether or not they enjoy the protection of a specific right to press or media freedom, often conferred by the same constitutional provision. Indeed, in some contexts, notably libel and privacy proceedings, freedom of expression is almost invariably asserted by the media, rather than by individual writers. But the relationship between freedom of expression and media claims is far from straightforward. The media themselves inevitably limit the dissemination of information and ideas when they refuse, say, to publish an individual’s reply to a personal attack they have printed or broadcast, or deny a pressure group the opportunity to communicate its views in an article or television documentary. In these circumstances, the media and the individual may both assert freedom of expression, and courts must decide who has the stronger constitutional claim. It has been pointed out that the approaches of the US and European courts differ with regard to the constitutionality of reply rights. The former take the view that press freedom prevails over individual claims, even though that may be to the cost of readers’ understanding of events.

Of course, unregulated press and broadcasters are infinitely preferable to a mass media subservient to government. But sometimes the values underlying freedom of expression—the dissemination of a range of views on political and social issues—justifies media regulation, for example to ensure that they are not controlled by one or two press barons or media corporations. That is the reason why in European countries, and even sometimes in the United States, there have been limits on, say, the share of a newspaper or broadcasting market which can be controlled by a single media company. The French Constitutional Council, the Italian Constitutional Court, and the German Federal Constitutional Court have all ruled that media regulation to ensure pluralism is not only permissible, but required by constitutional freedom of expression provisions. The freedom does not give the mass media immunity from regulation to prevent oligopolies or to ensure that they transmit news and other serious programmes; moreover, it should never be forgotten that media corporations often claim to defend the freedom and press freedom, when they are really protecting their commercial interests.

Finally, it is important to consider whether the internet affects this perspective. Its advent certainly increases the effective opportunities for all individuals to communicate their views—often anonymously—to other members of the public. Further, some traditional arguments for broadcasting regulation—the scarcity of frequencies and the unique power of television—hardly apply to the new electronic media. But it does not follow that the internet undermines the case for mass media regulation. For the internet has not yet replaced, and may never replace, the print and broadcasting media altogether, though it may have contributed to the significant recent decline in newspaper readership. The point is that the internet is used most frequently by individuals to communicate their views to other individuals, rather than to a mass audience; its role is for the most part supplementary to that of the traditional press and broadcasting media. If there are good free expression arguments for regulation of the mass media, in order to ensure that they provide a forum for lively political debate, they are unaffected by the arrival of the new electronic media.

Bibliography

Bibliography

Ivan Hare and James Weinstein (eds), Extreme Speech and Democracy (2009)

Geoffrey Stone, ‘Restrictions of Speech Because of its Content: The Peculiar Case of Subject-Matter Restrictions’
Notes:

(2) 302 US 319, 327 (1937).

(4) Handyside v UK (1976) 1 EHRR 737, para 49 (European Court of Human Rights).

(9) Among the leading decisions are Australian Capital Television v Commonwealth (1992) 177 CLR 106 (invalidating restrictions on election advertising) and Coleman v Power (2004) 220 CLR 1 (holding that law prohibiting insulting speech must be interpreted in conformity with freedom of political communication).

(10) For further discussion of the scope of freedom of expression, see Section III.2 below.

(11) Sunday Times v UK (1979) 2 EHRR 245.

(12) But see Section IV.2 below for conflicts between freedom of expression and constitutional rights.

(13) The original Freedom of the Press Act was enacted in 1766 and is the oldest general freedom of expression clause in the world: see now Freedom of the Press Act 1949.

(15) This principle was established by the Constitutional Council in Decision 71–44 DC of 16 July 1971, and has frequently been applied to ensure that bills comply with the free communication of thought and opinion recognized by Art 11 of the Declaration.

(16) HRA 1998, s 3.

(17) They make a declaration that legislation is incompatible with the Convention (HRA 1998, s 4), but the government is not required by UK law to cure the incompatibility.

(18) See in particular, the speech of Lord Steyn in Reynolds v Times Newspapers [2001] 2 AC 127, 207.

(19) See Section III.1 below.

(20) Basic Law, Art 5(2).

(21) Ibid Art 5(3) which also protects freedom of research and teaching. Teaching freedom does not however absolve professors and teachers from loyalty to the constitution.

(22) eg see Spanish Constitution, Art 20(1)(d); Hungarian Constitution, Art 61, para (1); South Africa Federal (SA) Constitution, s 16(1)(b).
(23) The German Basic Law is unusual in singling out ‘freedom of reporting by means of broadcasts and films’. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (1982) and the SA Constitution refer to the freedom of ‘other media’ in addition to press freedom.

(24) Spanish Constitution, Art 20(1)(b) and (c); SA Constitution, s 16(1)(c) and (d).

(25) See the decision of the Constitutional Court in Case 30/1992 (V 26) AB.

(26) Article 20(2). Also see Japanese Constitution, Art 21. The post-war Constitution of Italy (1948) provides that the press may not be subject to licensing or censorship: Art 21, para 2.

(27) Charter, s 1. For a similar provision see SA Constitution, s 36.

(28) Section 16(2).

(29) De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions 2004 (1) SA 406 (Constitutional Court SA).

(31) The best discussion of these issues is in Kent Greenawalt, Speech, Crime and the Uses of Language (1989) ch 2.

(33) Courts often treat nude dancing as low value expression, so regulation can easily be justified: Erie v Pap’s AM 527 US 277 (2000), and Philips v DPP, Witwatersrand Local Division 2003 (3) SA 345 (Constitutional Court SA).

(34) The Court of Appeal in England has taken this approach, holding that a ban on the entry into the UK of an extremist preacher engaged freedom of expression: R (Farrakhan) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2002] 4 All ER 289.

(35) Among the leading cases in this controversial area of free speech law are Buckley v Valeo 424 US 1 (1976) and A-G of Canada v Harper (2004) 239 DLR (4th) 193. In the latter case, the Supreme Court of Canada upheld limits on advertising expenditure by individuals, as a proportionate measure to ensure electoral fairness. In contrast, in Buckley and many later cases the US Supreme Court has dismissed this justification for restrictions on election expenditure.

(36) See the statement of principle in Chaplinsky v New Hampshire 315 US 568 (1942) (some limited classes of speech such as libel, obscenity, and insulting or ‘fighting’ words do not raise constitutional problems) and Valentine v Chrestensen 316 US 52 (1942) (ban on distribution of commercial advertising did not raise freedom of speech issues).

(37) See the landmark decision of the Supreme Court in New York Times v Sullivan 376 US 254 (1964), more fully discussed in Section IV.2 below.

(38) Commercial speech was first fully brought within the First Amendment in Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v Virginia Citizens Consumer Council 425 US 748 (1976).

(40) The European Court of Human Rights has reviewed the compatibility of state libel laws with the ECHR guarantee of freedom of expression in a number of cases, notably Lingens v Austria (1986) 8 EHRR 407, and has held that commercial speech is covered by the guarantee: Markt Intern & Beerman v Germany (1990) 12 EHRR 161.

(41) See Flugblatt case, BVerfGE 43, 130 (1976), and the Strauss ‘coerced democrat’ case, BVerfGE 82, 272 (1990).

(42) BVerfGE 102, 347 (2001).

(45) See n 37 above.

(46) For a discussion of the range of circumstances in which such claims may be made and the difficulties in upholding them, see Eric Barendt, Freedom of Speech (2007), 100–8.

(47) See the Supreme Court denial of a First Amendment right to compel a broadcaster to transmit a political advertisement in Columbia Broadcasting System v Democratic National Committee 412 US 94 (1973) and the German Administrative Court rejection of a claim by a social welfare recipient for state payment of his travel costs to take part in a demonstration: BVerwGE 72, 113 (1985).

(48) For UK legislation requiring universities to permit visiting speakers (and members of their staff and students) to speak freely within the law on their campuses, see Education (No 2) Act 1986, s 43, discussed by Barendt (n 46), 501.

(49) eg decisions of the US Supreme Court in Hague v CIO 307 US 496 (1939), Cox v Louisiana 379 US 536 (1965), and Chicago Police Dept v Mosley 408 US 92 (1972), and of the Supreme Court of Canada in Committee for the Commonwealth of Canada v Canada [1991] 1 SCR 139.

(51) Edmonton Journal v A-G of Alberta [1989] 2 SCR 1326 (Supreme Court of Canada); BVerfGE 50, 234 (1979) (German Federal Constitutional Court).

(52) See the judgments of Burger CJ and Blackmun J in Richmond Newspapers v Virginia 448 US 555 (1980).

(58) Section II above.

(59) See the German cases, BVerfGE 27, 71 (1969), where the recipient challenged the confiscation of literature he had imported from the former German Democratic Republic, and BVerfGE 90, 27 (1994), when Turkish immigrants asserted a right to receive satellite television programmes from Turkey.

(61) eg Freedom of Information Act 1966 (USA); Freedom of information Act 2000 (UK).

(62) Marcel Claude Reyes v Chile, judgment of 19 September 2006, on which see Eduardo Andrés Bertoni, ‘The Inter-American Court of Human Rights and the European Court of Human Rights: A Dialogue on Freedom of

(63) Társaság a Szabadságjogokért v Hungary, Decision of 14 April 2009; Kenedi v Hungary (2009) 27 BHRC 335. It is unclear whether these rulings will be followed in later cases, since the state conceded it had infringed freedom of expression by denying access to official documents, and the European Court departed from earlier decisions in which it had refused to hold that access to information was an aspect of freedom of expression: Leander v Sweden (1987) 9 EHRR 433 and Guerra v Italy (1998) 26 EHRR 357.

(64) See n 62 above, para 77.

(65) See text accompanying n 26 above.

(67) All these arguments are deployed more fully in Barendt (n 46), 118–24.

(68) Times Film v Chicago 365 US 43 (1965).

(70) R v Glad Day Bookshops Inc (2004) 239 DLR (4th) 119. The Inter-American Court of Human Rights has held the Chile censorship system under which all films had to be submitted for screening before release incompatible with IACHR, Art 13(4), under which ‘public entertainments may be subject by law to prior censorship for the sole purpose of regulating access to them for the moral protection of children and adolescence’: The Last Temptation of Christ, judgment of 5 February 2001, Series C, no 73.

(71) See the UK Communications Act 2003, s 336. An earlier provision was upheld by the House of Lords as compatible with freedom of expression in R v Home Secretary, ex p Brind [1991] AC 696. The ECHR, Art 10(1) in its third sentence provides: ‘This Article shall not prevent States from requiring the licensing of broadcasting, television, or cinema enterprises.’

(74) Ibid, 730 per Stewart J, with whom White J concurred.

(75) In US v Progressive Inc 467 F Supp 990 (1979) a District Court granted a temporary injunction to stop publication of an article describing the manufacture of the H-bomb.

(76) BVerfGE 33, 52 (1972).

(77) See the UK HRA 1998, s 12(2) requiring that defendants should be notified of the application for an interlocutory order, unless there are compelling reasons why this should not be done.

(80) See the much criticized decision of the US Supreme Court in US v Dennis 341 US 494 (1951), reached during the McCarthy period when there was much nervousness at the possibility of a Communist insurrection.

(82) See Section IV.2 below for further consideration of the merits of factual and rule-based balancing in the context of libel and privacy claims.

(84) See the essays by Eric Heinze and Pascal Mbongo in Hare and Weinstein (n 83), 182 and 221 respectively. On issues of gender, see Chapter 19.

(85) In R v Zundel [1992] 2 SCR 731 a bare majority of the Supreme Court of Canada held the application of a law penalizing the dissemination of false news to a Holocaust denier a disproportionate restriction on freedom of expression.

(86) See n 28 above.

(89) See Post (n 3) and Ronald Dworkin, Foreword to Hare and Weinstein (n 83), vii.

(91) R v Keegstra [1990] 3 SCR 697, 760.

(92) In the famous Auschwitz lie case, the German ban on Holocaust denial was upheld against a freedom of expression challenge: BVerfGE 90, 241 (1994), discussed by Dieter Grimm, ‘The Holocaust Denial Decision of the Federal Constitutional Court of Germany’ in Hare and Weinstein (n 83), 557.

(95) Among the leading decisions are Time v Hill 385 US 374 (1967) and Bartnicki v Vopper 532 US 514 (2001). On privacy more generally, see Chapter 46.

(97) The approach of the courts in England, Commonwealth jurisdictions, and Germany to balancing in libel cases is discussed in Barendt (n 46), 211–22. A similar approach has now been adopted by the Supreme Court of Canada: Grant v Torstar Corporation 2009 SCC 61.

(98) See the Lebach case, BVerfGE 35, 202 (1973), discussed in Barendt (n 46), 236.

(100) See text accompanying n 39.

(103) American Booksellers Ass’n v Hudnut 771 F2d 323 (7th Cir 1985).

(105) See Lord Hoffmann and Lady Hale in Miss Behavin’ Ltd v Belfast City Council [2007] 1 WLR 1420, paras 16 and 38 respectively.

(106) Section II above.

(107) See text accompanying nn 53–6 above.

(109) Barendt (n 46), 67–71 and 429–33.

(110) See Reno v American Civil Liberties Union 521 US 844 (1997).

Eric Barendt
Eric Barendt is Emeritus Professor of Media Law, University College London
The formulation of freedom of religion and conscience as an individual right stems partly from placing religious choices in individual conscience, and partly from the fact that strong, privileged claims against the state are formulated most successfully in the language of rights. While concerns of free exercise of religion may prevail in the regulation of religion, considerations related to the collective aspects of religious exercise and historical traditions in matters of church-state relations continue to play a role in the regulatory area. This article discusses the changing meaning of freedom of religion; reasons for and justifications of freedom of religion; what is religion; what is protected as religious freedom; accommodation as a positive enforcement of freedom of religion; and models of church-state relations.

Keywords: freedom of religion, constitution, constitutional rights, religious choice, church-state relations

I. The Changing Meaning of Freedom of Religion

HISTORICALLY, freedom of religion evolved through the competition of state sovereign power and religious communities. The development of the applicable legal regime also depends of the nature and intensity of religious beliefs and the social functions of religion. Religions have different and changing theological positions regarding the scope of individual religious freedom, while religious organizations are known to have denied the religious freedom of believers of other religions. Nevertheless, from ancient times in a few historical instances people were allowed to worship their own God, due to a tolerant theological position prevailing at the moment or the pragmatic benevolence of the emperor in a multi-confessional state.

The formulation of freedom of religion and conscience as an individual right stems partly from placing religious choices in individual conscience, and partly from the fact that strong, privileged claims against the state are formulated most successfully in the language of rights. While concerns of free exercise of religion may prevail in the regulation of religion, considerations related to the collective aspects of religious exercise and historical traditions in matters of church-state relations continue to play a role in the regulatory area.

I. The Changing Meaning of Freedom of Religion

In Europe at the time of the Reformation (1517–1648), the competition of Catholic and Protestant churches resulted in persecution and extended civil and interstate wars. In the international regime that emerged the absolute supremacy of the state prevailed. As summarized in the adage of cuius regio, eius religio (whose realm, his religion) of the Peace Treaty of Augsburg (1555): subjects had to follow the faith of the ruling sovereign. As the history of the (p. 910) English Acts of Uniformity indicates, the centralizing state power was inclined to enforce uniformity in public worship.¹ The result of such religious homogenization was discrimination and persecution of all dissenters with lasting effects.² At this point, freedom of religion was primarily a matter of non-persecution and the permissibility of private worship for Christians.

With the emergence of competing religions and their fratricidal wars, the individual right of freedom of religion became an issue of the ‘liberty of moderns’.³ The earliest laws against religious persecution were concerned with the freedom of communities to choose their faith (priests), while the sovereign ruler was prohibited from imposing his own confession.⁴

A similar logic dictated by the needs of multi-ethnic and multi-religious societies prevailed slowly in the American colonies, which were settled by various persecuted religious minorities. Beginning in 1636, Rhode Island passed laws against persecution of non-Trinitarians and providing for the separation of church and state. Undeniably, the theological views of Roger Williams, who based universal religious freedom on the ‘right of their error’, did play an important role here.⁵ Other colonies enacted regimes of toleration to people of all or most faiths. Nevertheless, religious minorities were often persecuted and most colonies had their state church.⁶

At the turn of the seventeenth century a demand for toleration, partly based on philosophical considerations, emerged.⁷ John Locke in particular emphasized that it is not for the state to enforce religion: the duty of the civil government to take care of ‘civil interests’ does not and cannot include ‘care of the soul’.⁸

For rather peculiar historical reasons, some eighteenth-century societies became pluri-religious and the state could not easily take sides with one religion without running the risk of destabilization. As Voltaire stated, idealizing the situation in England: ‘If there were only one religion in England there would be danger of despotism, if there were two they would cut each other's throats, but there are thirty, and they live in peace and happiness.’⁹

During the American Revolution, free exercise was increasingly seen as an individual right pertaining to all believers. This extension is understandable in a struggle that is carried out in the name of freedom and in need of broad popular support. In the typical formulation of the Delaware Declaration of Rights of 1776:

> all men have a natural and unalienable right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences and understandings; and that no man ought or of right can be compelled to attend any religious worship or maintain any ministry contrary to or against his own free will and consent, and that no authority can or ought to be vested in, or assumed by (p. 911) any power whatever that shall in any case interfere with, or in any manner control the right of conscience in the free exercise of religious worship.

Beginning with the American Revolution, respect for individual conscience, in a personal moral sense, increasingly became the source of freedom of religion. It is understood as a matter of non-coercion. The 1776 Virginia Declaration of Rights (following George Mason's reinterpretation of Locke) proclaimed as fundamental and undeniable truth, ‘that religion or the duty which we owe to our Creator and the manner of discharging it, can be directed only by reason and conviction, not by force or violence.’ Nevertheless, while the First Amendment of the Federal Constitution prohibited the establishment of a state church at the federal level, the state of Massachusetts ended its multiple establishment system (public support to specific denominations) only in 1833.

Under the influence of Enlightenment Emperor Joseph II of Austria, his Patent of Toleration of 1781 granted protestants and some other denominations the right to have their churches, albeit without direct entrance from the street, and protestants became eligible for civil service.¹⁰ But only the revolutionary Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen of 1789 granted an individual right of free exercise and only in the form of a guarantee on non-persecution, subject to public order considerations.¹¹ During the French Revolution, the full equalization of believers and beliefs was provided at the expense of the monarchy's loss of authority, and it was more a matter of citizens' equality than of freedom of religion. The sovereignty of state (people) was recognized at the price of subordinating churches: an oath on the Constitution was demanded from the clergy.¹²
The emerging liberal constitutionalism resisted such radical anticlericalism. In fact, early liberal constitutions like that of Spain in 1812 recognize state religion; in this case the Apostolic Roman Catholic religion was the only true religion. While in the United States a ‘wall of separation between Church & State’ envisioned by Thomas Jefferson has gradually emerged, elsewhere a number of constitutions consolidated the privileged status of one or another, or of a few religious organizations. This caused unequal civil status among believers and the ease of manifesting a religion or belief was also affected. Notwithstanding such early institutional arrangements, thanks partly to the conflicts between state and church, the principle of free exercise of one’s religion as an individual right became gradually accepted in liberal constitutional systems in the nineteenth century. However, practical social and political discrimination of believers of non-privileged and new faiths and the faithless continue to exist well into our era.

Outside liberal constitutionalism, freedom of religion remained a matter of group protection in the form of group rights. The international law of the nineteenth century, partly reflecting increasing Western political interventionism, emphasized that religious minorities deserve international protection, favoring Christian communities in the form of international treaty guarantees. This principle was imposed in particular on the Ottoman Empire. The international protection of minorities continued to prevail in the League of Nations system, and various peace treaties treated freedom of religion as a matter of minority rights protection, which implied an understanding of free exercise as a collective right. After the Second World War, the individual right to free exercise had been recognized in the Universal Declaration as a distinct matter within the freedom of thought or conscience. The collective nature of religion remains reflected in the individual right to worship in community.

II. Reasons for and Justifications of Freedom of Religion

In the history of mankind, religion has proved itself a fundamental component of human existence. The centrality and power of religious beliefs for the individual and for the state (that intends to maximize control over the individual by controlling its belief system) explains why religious practices are endorsed by the state.

Religion satisfies basic psychological needs of the individual. For many people it serves to reduce existential uncertainty, it provides meaning to events as well as personal and collective (social) goals and identity. It has implications for people's mental and social life, including its contribution to prejudice and discrimination.

As to the social functions of religion, Émile Durkheim in particular considered religion to be a source of stability and cohesion: a shared set of religious beliefs creates a cohesive moral community and a collective conscience. Ceremonies and rituals are important tools of such processes. Religious homogeneity is believed to foster homogeneity in the state and without such homogeneity (that translates today into cultural community) the solidarity and loyalty that are the preconditions of a functioning state and provide a constitutional identity to the people behind the state become shaky.

E.W. Böckenförde, a former German constitutional judge, argues that religious and cultural coherence (homogeneity) is a prerequisite for a constitutional state. Until the nineteenth century, the (unitary) Christian religion was the fundamental power that provided coherence in public life inside the state. With the emancipation of the individual, first it was the nation-state to grant such coherence, while after 1945 only common moral values would provide such coherence. Subjectivity and positivism inherent in the private value system undermine coherence and freedom. In a system of open neutrality between state and religion (a system exemplified in the German constitutional system), the secular state recognizes the religion-ordered life of its citizens, and is based on and bound by a lived common culture (gelebte Kultur). This cultural-religious basis of coherence is undermined by increasing heterogeneity. Both Böckenförde and Cardinal Ratzinger (now Pope Benedict XIV) were of the view that when granting religious freedoms the state must preserve its cultural roots.

Contemporary behavioral sciences and evolutionary psychology indicate that religious beliefs and practices affect a wide range of behavioral outcomes. They not only contribute to the maintenance of hierarchical relations but they have the potential to disrupt the political order as they might lead one to disobedience, resistance, and martyrdom, which fuel destructive religious conflict. Religious fundamentalism is inclined to authoritarianism with important consequences for contemporary democracy.

The religious foundation of freedom of religion offers a controversial justification for a universal right to freedom of religion. Where religion is the way to truth and salvation it commands that its rules be strictly followed. Many religions (at least at certain stages of their development) have commands not to allow other forms of worship and force all people to the only salvation that they happen to offer. Such an approach lacks mutual respect for all the other religions and non-religious or non-collective beliefs, and cannot justify a universal right to religious freedom.
Freedom of Religion

Where freedom of religion originates from religious considerations, further complications will result from the uncertain relation between religion (religious organization) and the state. Sometimes, at least some churches (the Catholic in particular), claim sovereignty and organizational autonomy, and individual freedom exists within this autonomous organization. From the perspective of constitutional theory, such relation is a matter of sovereignty: the modern state (as a constitutional democracy) claims that the source of all political power be the sovereign state (and behind it the people). To the extent that religion is the source of religious freedom, state sovereignty might be challenged. Vice versa, sovereignty might be and is a limit to such freedom, among others in the form of public order.

The argument of toleration often refers to mutual respect for religions, although this approach should not be conflated with an equality-based approach. To being with, from a religious/moral perspective it is hard to respect what is considered wrong, especially where religious doctrine claims that the wrong religion endangers the salvation of its believers. The religious ground for toleration was not equality of beliefs, but that one cannot reach salvation through coercion. Hobbes and Locke turned this idea into a primarily secular argument, detaching it from its religious foundation. Locke related toleration (as a source of freedom of religious practice and even civic equality) to the functions of the civil government: given that the magistrate is concerned with life, liberty, health, and property and it is only for the preservation of those interests where coercion can be used, it follows that government has no mandate to use coercion in order to promote salvation. Locke accepted that many ‘other’ religions are objectionable; tolerance is a (public) attitude in front of error.

This position on tolerance is to be contrasted to the one that recognizes all beliefs and believers as equal (though not necessarily ‘right’ in their belief). Tolerance in this way cannot be a source of rights, but it is reasonable permissiveness towards socially non-harmful error. Tolerance can be argued on epistemological grounds. Locke himself talked about ‘true religion’ with some skepticism (as magistrates often believe in the wrong religion). According to the agnostic argument of James Madison, the majority has no power to legislate on matters of religion, while on the other hand the freedom to observe religion, which is of divine origin, has to be a right equal to all, as others may have a different view on religious matters. As equals, they cannot be coerced to support a specific view.

Pragmatic toleration based on concern of socially disruptive intolerance runs into objections. Jeremy Waldron has recently argued that religious persecution may serve the preservation of peace, and force may be effective in changing religious beliefs (an argument that is also used against the right to proselytize). Thus, it would not stop a person who used religious persecution for some end other than religious conversion, such as preserving the peace.

In the Enlightenment project that stood against religious persecution in the name of human reason, freedom of conscience did emerge as a background assumption demanding toleration, although the principal argument for religious tolerance referred to the human tragedy resulting from religious persecution. Because religion was considered a source of intolerant prejudice, Voltaire insisted on leaving religious prejudice at home. As religion is not accepted as a source of legitimate consideration in public, the equality of beliefs or at least believers became a possibility.

Equality-based toleration rests on the following personal assumption: ‘Even though we disagree, they are as fully members of society as I am … [N]either their way of living nor mine is uniquely the way of our society.’ This is certainly sufficient to deny the right to persecute and it enables religious manifestations as a matter of liberty, but this approach does not set a moral foundation for a right that would limit the state.

Toleration may need normative justifications to ground freedom of religion as an individual right. It can be argued that religious toleration is a specific application of tolerance, which is essential for democracy, where ‘proper social life is naturally based on reciprocal concessions and mutual tolerance’. It often relies on the limited or non-existent power of the state (as an entity that derives its powers from citizens) in matters of conscience. Respect for freedom of conscience serves as an independent justification for freedom of religion as a right, where freedom of religion follows from a fundamental personal choice. Here, religion or other core beliefs are central for the individual, and respect of the individual entails respect of his personal choices. In Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v Casey, the US Supreme Court relied on such respect:

> These matters, involving the most intimate and personal choices a person may make in a lifetime, choices central to personal dignity and autonomy, are central to the liberty protected by the Fourteenth Amendment. At the heart of liberty is the right to define one's own concept of existence, of meaning, of the universe, and of the mystery of human life.23

The individual, with her choices, is the constituent of society and the state. Therefore, society and its government shall respect personal autonomy and ensuing core decisions, including religion. The state's position shall reflect the respect its constituent citizens have to hold for each other: individuals have to respect each other 'because they seek truth in their own way, and because [man] respects in them human nature and human dignity ...'.24 If individual autonomy is the intrinsic value that justifies freedom of religion as a right, then religious freedom will fit into the fundamental rights structure. This would enable its coexistence with other fundamental rights, and freedom of speech in particular.25

(p. 915) III. What is Religion?

Reflecting a tradition of respect for individual conscience as fundamental moral autonomy,26 in international human rights law and constitutional jurisprudence the protection of individual freedom of religion or belief extends to religious as well as non-religious convictions, including pacifism and atheism.27 Article 18 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights opens with the statement that 'Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion', a formulation which is also mirrored in Article 18 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR).

A legal definition of ‘freedom of religion’ indicates the scope of protection a legal system is willing to provide to individuals and groups claiming that their religious liberty has been restricted. For instance, a definition of religion which is premised on the worship of ‘God’ or the ‘Creator’—and which ultimately seems adequate from a Judeo-Christian or a Muslim perspective—leaves Buddhism or Taoism outside constitutional protection.28 While an under-inclusive definition runs the risk of exposing followers of ‘foreign’, lesser known, or unpopular creeds to harm, or even persecution, an over-inclusive definition may open opportunities for misplacing or abusing benefits which may stem from constitutional protection.

Although religious liberty retains important collective (organizational) dimensions, these—though often complementary and reinforcing—in practice may collide with the individual dimension of the right. Prior recognition of a religious community (church) cannot become a precondition of individual free exercise of religion.29 Courts have afforded constitutional protection to such individual manifestations of religious freedom that clearly departed from the doctrine of the religious association to which the petitioners belonged.30 Churches do not get to determine what amounts to the proper exercise of a religion for the purposes of constitutional protection.31

Courts appear rather reluctant to craft general, abstract definitions of what amounts to religion, for fear of reaching an under-inclusive decision that leaves individual liberty without constitutional protection, and also because of genuine deference. As Chief Justice Latham for the High Court of Australia stated in Adelaide Company of Jehovah's Witnesses, Inc v The Commonwealth: 'It is not for a court, upon some a priori basis, to disqualified certain beliefs as incapable of being religious in character.'32

(p. 916) Courts cannot become arbiters of religious teachings and truth in this process, nor can they pass judgment on the legitimacy, value, or utility of religious teachings for the state or society. Thus, courts tend not to assess the contents of religious doctrine and teachings, but appear to focus on the function that a particular belief has in the individual's self-perception. As the US Supreme Court found, the judicial task is 'to decide whether the beliefs professed by (an applicant) are sincerely held and whether they are, in his own scheme of things, religious.'33 While this approach respects individual autonomy, its application admittedly might become problematic when courts are requested to assess the extent to which a religiously neutral law burdens an individual's religious beliefs or sentiments, especially in contexts (like prisons) where special treatment or benefits are sought in the name of religious liberty.
Freedom of Religion

Freedom of religion is typically defined in constitutional provisions as an individual right and not as an entitlement of churches or members of the clergy. While not all communities of believers aspire to formal legal recognition, lack of legal status, or the formal refusal thereof, however, is likely to undermine the success of individual claims in the future, especially where a state grants special legal status to (some) religious organizations. As the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) reiterated in Metropolitan Church of Bessarabia v Moldova, the Court cannot accept tolerance towards religious organizations "as a substitute for recognition, since recognition alone is capable of conferring rights on those concerned".

There is no international or constitutional obligation on any state to provide recognition to those religious communities which are seen as legitimate churches elsewhere. Religious or cultural tension, and ensuing threats, might prompt states to maintain ‘sect observatories’ or even to disband religious groups which are seen as a threat to public security or public order. It becomes a matter of special concern, though, when such governmental vigilance appears to single out particular religious communities, and when religious teachings themselves become the ground for government disapproval irrespective of the conduct of believers, or when governmental communication creates a climate of suspicion or intolerance towards certain religious communities.

IV. What is Protected as Religious Freedom?

Classic constitutions did not contain details on the scope of constitutional protection. Being one of the briefest among them, the First Amendment of the US Constitution prohibits Congress to pass a law ‘respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof’. Such short clauses leave the task of defining the scope of religious freedom to future legislation and court decisions. Modern liberal constitutions generally follow the more detailed formulation of the Universal Declaration.

Although there is no universally accepted formulation on freedom of religion, nor on its acceptable limitations, the prohibition of coercion in matters of conscience has remained a paramount concern. Freedom of religion (as a form of freedom of conscience) includes freedom from religion, which includes the right not to practice any religion and not to live according to the precepts of a given religion. This problem emerges, for example, in countries where one can marry, divorce, or be buried only according to specific religious laws administered by religious authorities. Freedom from religion is also at the heart of claims seeking exemptions from religious oaths for public office, and mandatory religious education in public schools.

While being mindful of grave national differences, Arcot Krishnaswami explained in 1960 that ‘Freedom to maintain or to change religion or belief falls primarily within the domain of the inner faith and conscience of an individual. Viewed from this angle, one would assume that any intervention from outside is not only illegitimate but impossible.’

In contrast, whenever the external display (manifestation) of such deeply held beliefs falls outside the absolute of the internal core, religious freedom may well be subjected to limitations as prescribed by international instruments and national constitutions. This divide is best traceable in the language of Article 9(2) of the ECHR providing expressly that > Freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs shall be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of public safety, for the protection of public order, health or morals, or the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.

As the ECtHR reiterates: ‘Article 9 ... does not protect every act motivated or influenced by a religion or belief’. It remains the duty of courts to determine permissible interference with manifestations of religious liberty. However, the core of free exercise remains the unhindered worship, non-persecution, and non-discrimination of believers in public life on grounds of their religion or belief.

Manifestations of religious freedom include not only such commonly recognizable acts of worship as individual or group prayer, religious services at designated places of worship, burial rituals, or pilgrimages to holy places.

Problems typically arise when a religious minority seeks to exercise practices in its own way that is distinct from the majority culture (like Hindus and Sikhs scattering ashes in rivers in Canada, or using open-air pyres to burn the dead instead of crematoriums in the United Kingdom). Other minority religious practices are not immune to limitations when the majority understands them as being without any spiritual significance and thus falling under... the scope of general secular rules. While Sunday may be a secular day of rest in many parts of the world, believers of certain religions may be required to refrain from work on other days of the week. Many religions retain dietary strictures ranging from designated periods of fasting to requirements of slaughter, preparation, or eating extending to all meals. Religious requirements on clothing and general appearance which are applicable not only for members of a clergy but also for ordinary believers are also a source of manifestation of religious beliefs.

Minority, new, or unknown religions are always at risk of being denied protection for what laws and courts are not prepared or not able to recognize as religious practice. Such bans often reflect majority prejudice and border on persecution. As the US Supreme Court per Justice Kennedy explained in Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye v City of Hialeah,\(^45\) in the context of an animal cruelty rule which—in reality—targeted a specific religious animal sacrifice: ‘The neutrality of a law is suspect if First Amendment freedoms are curtailed to prevent isolated collateral harms not themselves prohibited by direct regulation.’\(^46\) The lack of neutrality indicates discrimination.

Freedom to change one’s religion (apostasy), an inherent core aspect of freedom of conscience which is mentioned expressly in Article 18 of the Universal Declaration as well as in Article 9 of the European Convention is curiously missing from the ICCPR,\(^47\) perhaps because apostasy remains a most serious crime in parts of the world. Articles 26 and 27 of the Arab Charter on Human Rights (not yet in force) do not mention the right to change one’s religion.

Change of religion is closely related to proselytism. The term, while it is often used in a pejorative sense, refers to an invitation to convert to a belief, often by confessing one’s own religious convictions, which includes the duty to teach others about one’s religion.\(^48\) It is argued that certain ‘local’ religions are vulnerable, and therefore proselytism by financially strong missionary groups is a form of cultural imperialism or unfairness in the competition of ideas.\(^49\) Hostility towards proselytizing is best explained once the significance of the state or dominant religion in (re)shaping national identity is acknowledged.\(^50\) In Kokkinakis v Greece, the ECtHR accepted that ‘improper proselytism’ may be prohibited in national law to the extent it is incompatible with respect of individual religious freedom.\(^51\) However, the Court held that freedom to manifest one’s religion ... includes in principle the right to try to convince one’s neighbour, for example through ‘teaching’, failing which, moreover, ‘freedom to change [one’s] religion or belief’ ... would be likely to remain a dead letter.\(^52\)

(p. 919) V. Accommodation

The classic right of freedom of religion meant that no specific prohibitions were imposed on particular religious practices and no restrictions be applicable to believers of a specific faith; that is, religion was understood as a freedom. Note, however, that manifestations of religious beliefs may easily run counter to the prescriptions of generally applicable legal rules even when not targeted by mal-intentioned statutory prohibitions. When freedom of religion is understood as a principle in constitutional regimes, it commands a principled position that does not prevent the emergence of restrictive practices especially when it comes to minority and non-traditional religions and beliefs.

Contemporary constitutional debate in liberal democracies concerns mostly the level to which religion-dictated behavior must be exempted (accommodated) from generally applicable rules in everyday life. In this logic, individual manifestations do not call for invalidating an otherwise legitimate regulatory measure altogether, but may be respected by allowing an individualized exception for the believers adversely affected by the measure.\(^53\) Claims for accommodation arise in many aspects of everyday life including food, dress, alcohol, bodily integrity (see genital interventions), days of rest, workplace safety, and even in a broader context, in claims to organize the religious community’s life separate from the rest of society.\(^54\) The counter-argument is that such recognition would provide special benefits on grounds of religious beliefs. But for the person who is forced to disregard her fundamental belief, the disadvantage might be a greater burden and hence a more serious injustice than the unfairness that the ‘less privileged’ have to endure because of her privileged treatment.

The extent to which legislation is constitutionally required to afford accommodation to religiously-dictated personal life choices, especially to grant (some kind of) religiously motivated regulatory and jurisdictional autonomy to religious communities,\(^55\) is highly debated. The state interest in preserving the uniform application and enforcement of legal rules across the land is closely associated with the more fundamental claim to sovereignty, thus, accommodation of religiously motivated behavior comes at a potentially high price, endangering the cohesion of a political community under a single constitution.

The clash between sovereignty, concerns of equality, and generality (neutrality) of laws, on the one hand, and individual rights, on the other hand, is well illustrated in the US Supreme Court's decision in Employment Division v Smith\textsuperscript{56} concerning the constitutionality of a state unemployment law which deprived known drug offenders (among them religiously inspired users of a hallucinogenic substance, peyote, used in Native American ceremonies) from social welfare benefits. Justice Scalia writing for the majority—and departing in a way from previously established precedent—expressed the view that

To make an individual's obligation to obey such a law contingent upon the law's coincidence with his religious beliefs, except where the State's interest is 'compelling'—permitting him, by virtue of his beliefs, 'to become a law unto himself',—contradicts both constitutional tradition and common sense.\textsuperscript{57}

\textit{(p. 920)} This, of course, does not preclude the constitutionality of legislative exceptions that allow the individual to follow his beliefs in public life. Exempting facially neutral general laws from demanding judicial scrutiny is problematic as legislative sentiment against particular religious groups can easily be masked in general, seemingly neutral, statutory language.

When in response Congress restored the compelling interest test in the Religious Freedom Restoration Act\textsuperscript{58} a unanimous US Supreme Court applied the compelling interest standard and accepted a faith-based exemption from federal drug laws to another hallucinogenic substance (hoasca) used by a small religious group.\textsuperscript{59} On this occasion, the Court noted that the governmental interest in the uniform application of federal drug laws does not justify the limitation of religious freedom, partly because the government itself had already agreed to grant similar exemptions for otherwise banned hallucinogenic substances used for Native American religious ceremonies.

Among the most dramatic exemptions granted by governments to religious believers are various exemptions offered to conscientious objectors to military service. Here, individual religious freedom is balanced against national security considerations, translated into constitutional obligations of the citizen to defend the country.\textsuperscript{60} Although several national constitutions (eg the German Basic Law) provide some protection to conscientious objectors, conscientious objection is typically not mentioned expressly as a protected manifestation in the religion clauses in international instruments. Lacking a clear international obligation to this effect, the emerging international trend nonetheless provides access to alternative service for conscientious objectors.\textsuperscript{61}

In first decade of the twenty-first century, the debate on the scope of accommodation has been dominated by controversies on the display of religious symbols and clothing, especially but not solely of the Islamic veil.\textsuperscript{62} The intensity of the conflict between majority values and a religious minority has more to do with the extent of apparent divergence from a wide range of majority values than with the religious nature of the requirement per se, and courts are not in agreement on the factors which are decisive in such cases.

In 2001, the ECtHR found that in a neutral state it was acceptable to ban the Islamic headscarf of a primary school teacher.\textsuperscript{63} In the \textit{Dahlab} decision, the ECtHR noted that in the context of primary school education \textit{(p. 921)}

- It cannot be denied outright that the wearing of a headscarf might have some kind of proselytising effect, seeing that it appears to be imposed on women by a precept which is laid down in the Koran and which, as the [Swiss] Federal Court noted, is hard to square with the principle of gender equality.\textsuperscript{64}

Subsequently, in 2005, the ECtHR agreed with the Turkish Constitutional Court on how a Turkish law banning headscarves from university premises was acceptable in a religiously diverse, secular state, as "it may be necessary to place restrictions on freedom to manifest one's religion or belief in order to reconcile the interests of the various groups and ensure that everyone's beliefs are respected."\textsuperscript{65} Since then, the ECtHR has found several times that public safety and national security justifications permit the enforcement of legal rules demanding the temporary removal of religious garb, for example for airport security checks or ID photos. In all the above cases, the courts accepted the choice of the legislature. This seems to imply that accommodation remains a matter of sovereign choice, unless it becomes discriminatory, although in the judicial balancing process the extent of the impact of central religious beliefs\textsuperscript{66} plays a role in the context of third party impacts (eg indoctrination, competing...
freedom of religion

interpretations on the meaning and messages transmitted by these symbols etc).

Discrimination, and even the feeling of being discriminated against, may push courts to enforce accommodation against the will of legislation, as illustrated by the Canadian Supreme Court when it paid more attention to a symbol's religious nature in a case involving a ban on sharp objects in public schools which also applied to the Sikh ritual dagger (kirpan). The justices found that a "total prohibition against wearing a kirpan to school undermines the value of this religious symbol and sends students the message that some religious practices do not merit the same protection as others." In addition, the Court also noted that as a result of the ban the petitioner decided to leave the public school system, thus the ban interfered not only with his religious freedom but also impaired his right to attend public school.

It remains to be seen whether the arguments made by courts in the education setting, and premised on constitutional requirements of secularity or neutrality, will need to be reassessed in light of legislative attempts to ban religious clothing in public in general. The ECHR itself was seen to apply a different approach to the criminal prohibition of religious garments in public. Yet, in its decision on the law prohibiting the concealment of faces in public (known more popularly as the burqa ban), the French Constitutional Council accepted Parliament's argument that women wearing a burqa in public 'are placed in a situation of exclusion and inferiority patently incompatible with constitutional principles of liberty and equality', and approved the law as a proportionate restriction on individual rights in the name of public order.

(p. 922) While accommodation reflects a positive enforcement of freedom of religion, it may remain a matter of concern for religious minorities, especially where only majority practices are accommodated or where the neutral law enforces majority practices and beliefs. Blasphemy laws are a particularly potent instrument as they operate in a selective fashion and only protect a preferred God or creed, but do not work across religions. In particularly severe cases, blasphemy prohibitions may be used to persecute minority religious groups openly as happened with a minority Muslim sect, the Ahmadis, in Pakistan. Thus, in addition to being a curious instrument for limiting freedom of expression, blasphemy rules also highlight a profound equality problem associated with the protection of religious freedom. Repeated—and largely failed—attempts on the international scene to reinvigorate protection against 'defamation of religion' in order to protect the dignity of religions and to combat intolerance towards certain religions call on us to reinforce the precept that religious freedom protects the believer and not a particular church or belief.

Admittedly, many instances of denial of accommodation and of simple manifestation of religion could also have been addressed as matters of direct or indirect discrimination. The choice between an equality-based or a rights-based approach is often strategic, and does not always follow from deeper, theoretical considerations concerning the essence of religious freedom. A jewelry ban applicable in schools (which also applied to the wearing a Hindu nose stud) was challenged as a matter of indirect discrimination. In this context, Justice Langa of the South African Constitutional Court said that 'religious and cultural practices are protected because they are central to human identity and hence to human dignity which is in turn central to equality'.

Vi. Models of Church–State Relations

The actual relations between the state and religious organizations (hereinafter Church–State relations) are of direct relevance for freedom of religion and for the constitutional organization of the state itself, with far-reaching consequences for public life. The progression of Church–State relations is best understood in terms of secularization, meaning the churches' loss of public power and secular resources (e.g. nationalization of church property, demise of educational monopolies etc.). It would be wrong to assume that modernization necessarily leads to the permanent decline of religion: 'religious traditions throughout the world are refusing to accept the marginal and privatized role which theories of modernity as well as theories of secularization had reserved for them.'

Historically and logically, models of Church–State relations range from the total control of the state by the Church (theocracy) to the total prohibition of religion and, therefore, of churches (militant atheist communism). The state may dominate the state church, or it may establish public law relations of cooperation (concordats), or consider churches private actors. Indeed, many models of Church–State relations remain compatible with constitutionalism because in a secularized world churches have lost public power and therefore the conflicts with the state diminish.
Freedom of Religion

The current intensification of religious beliefs contributes to renewed public aspirations of religious organizations and increases demand of autonomy for religious communities organized within the church.

The principles governing Church–State relations are often spelled out in constitutions. The text of the constitution, however, is not decisive when it comes to provisions concerning the (former) state religion or state church(es). The specific ‘national’ religion and its church may receive special constitutional recognition in view of the role the Church played to sustain national identity in the absence of a nation-state (see eg Poland). In other instances, the constitution consolidates the status quo, which often amounts to the recognition of historical privileges.

The actual relations depend on—among others—the intensity of faith, the capacity of religious organizations to control the faith, and the power of the state to provide social services and control social organizations, as well as actual political needs of the political powers to be. Throughout its history, the Catholic (universal) Church was in competition with the state (royal power) and claimed supremacy. Islam, as state religion, was mostly subordinated to the state in the sense that the emperor as Caliph, at least in principle, was the supreme religious authority. A privileged constitutional position might be related to specific theological positions, as in the case of Eastern Orthodoxy which holds that ‘symphony’ shall prevail in the relation of the Orthodox Church to the state (see further the doctrine of the Church of England). Moreover, specific religious traditions of the majority church get characterized as cultural traditions and customs and thus become part of the legal system.

Notwithstanding secularization, some constitutional democracies have reserved the privileged public law status of a state religion in their historical constitution. For example, in England the monarch is the head of the state church and Norway has a state church. The (p. 924) special constitutional status of a church/national religion may remain symbolic and countered by practical measures of state neutrality and equality of religions and believers, but where a church or denomination is constitutionally recognized as the nation’s faith this may have potential discriminatory consequences in holding public office or in civil equality.

The formal legal status of the religious organization does not rule out a relation based on mutual respect. In this concept, exemplified by German constitutional doctrine, the state’s constitutional duty is benevolent non-interference in church affairs which goes beyond neutral respect of autonomy. It enables, and even requires, a positive attitude of the state to promote freedom of religion in a dialogue with churches. However, positive cooperation does not entail that the state has to endorse religion in public administrative activities.

The French-type laïcité and the US idea of non-endorsement and non-entanglement are often described as the alternative of the cooperation model. In the model of laïcité, as envisioned in the 1905 French law on separation of Church and state, religious organizations operate as entities recognized by private law, without the financial support of the state, and without public functions. In reality, buildings of the religious associations may be state-sponsored, and the state provides financial support to denominational (private) schools. A victim of stereotypes, French laïcité was and is sometimes labeled as anti-religious because it favors non-religious solutions in public life. But it was the Mexican Constitution of 1917 (as amended in 1934 and 1946) that showed how far-reaching separationism may go towards anti-clericalism.

What should the attitude of the state be to religious organizations if it intends to sustain its own sovereignty that is based on equal citizenship and democratic decision-making? Freedom of religion flourishes where life spheres are emancipated from the control of churches and religions (typically of the hegemonic religion). The Turkish Constitutional Court offers the justification of separationism in public life: ‘Within a secular state religious feelings simply cannot be associated with politics, public affairs and legislative provisions. Those are not matters to which religious requirements and thought apply.’ Other democracies are more permissive as to the presence of religion in the public sphere, but even here it remains contested to what extent religious grounds are acceptable in legislation. It is argued that without proper separation the state will divert the church and its tenets for its own purposes, it will not respect freedom of opinion, and state power will become factional and divisive. Thus, separation from the state ‘unburdens’ religion.

To the extent state interference in the internal affairs of religious organizations allows the state to influence the way the dictates to the religion are followed, the state may have political interests in shaping these very dictates. It is in this regard that the state’s position is subject to constitutional limits expressed in the concept of (internal) church autonomy. The German legal concept of autonomy entails that it is up to the churches to determine the scope of their religious mission and it entails regulatory autonomy within religious organizations.
Freedom of Religion

(p. 925) The concept of autonomy sets limits to the applicability of general non-discrimination laws. However, when the state supervises legal relations within religious organizations, this cannot be regarded per se contrary to church autonomy, as far as these matters affect the public order. Even where church autonomy is respected, the state may claim the right to determine the legal status of religious organizations, setting sometimes quantitative and qualitative thresholds (see also definition of religion, above) which, however, may not be so excessive as to make registration of religious organizations impracticable or impossible.

While the organizational differences among states are remarkable, in principle the democratic state is supposed to keep equal distance from all religions by not taking a stand on religious matters, favoring or disfavoring a position, or a group or organization standing for such position (neutrality). For example, it shall not identify in its functions with religions, their symbols and practices. As the Turkish Constitutional Court has stated, the neutral state is prevented from manifesting a preference for a particular religion or belief and constituted the foundation of freedom of conscience and equality between citizens before the law. Intervention by the State to preserve the secular nature of the political regime had to be considered necessary in a democratic society.

Does it follow from the principle of neutrality that religious organizations cannot undertake governmental functions? In such a case the public function would be identified with a religion or with religions. In practice, however, the differences are blurred because of the prevailing understanding of what constitutes public function (and the exercise of public power), a confusion that reflects historical developments. While in secular France and in cooperationist Germany marriage and civil registry are part of the state power monopoly, the strongly separationist Americans allow churches to carry out public functions in regard to marriages, probably because marriage and registration are considered private acts. Americans are keen on denying public funding to denominational schools, while this is well-established practice in France and it is constitutionalized in Germany to the extent that the absence of non-confessional schools is permissible in public education as long as the interdenominational public schools respect individual freedom of conscience.

The principle of state neutrality does not provide consistent guidance as to the proper role of religious organizations in public life and politics. Political and practical (public order) considerations may prevail here: in religiously divided societies political movements based on religion are viewed as dangerous and are sometimes constitutionally prohibited (see Bulgaria), or such restrictions are held constitutional (India). What matters for the emerging normative frames in contemporary secularized democracies is how strong the impact of religion on the mentalities (p. 926) (‘soul’) of individuals and their forms of social organization is, and what kind of division of labor in the provision of social services has been arranged (mostly outside public law).

It is argued that, in a democratic state, reasons justifying the law have to be accessible to all, without the privilege of religious revelation. According to the religious critics, this requirement of public reason-giving disadvantages the religious citizen who cannot formulate his arguments according to his genuine beliefs. However, the requirement of public reason does not preclude the use of religious arguments in the debate leading to legislation but the law itself will remain impermissibly biased as long as it is justified by non-secular arguments only. For example, a pro-life (anti-abortion) law may satisfy the requirement of neutrality as long as it reasonably serves the protection of the health of the mother or even a population policy (as long as it does not violate rights) without reliance on divine revelation, a source of knowledge not accessible to all.

Relying on demands of free exercise and reinforced by concepts of multiculturalism and the individual's right to live a life according to the tenets of one's religion, it is argued that a plurality of religiously-inspired legal systems should be allowed to function in a multi-religious state. Many religions have a set of elaborate 'legal' rules or legal systems (see, eg the Catholic Church, Judaism, and Islam). In secular states, the religious legal regime operates as a parallel universe with its own lawmaking and enforcement mechanisms, and—as far as laymen go—it is based on voluntary compliance. The recent demands for legalizing marriage law arbitration based on sharia expose the fragility of the status quo and impose clear demands on the state to recognize the consequences of religious legal rules. It is possible to see such state intervention as an opportunity to assist in freeing individuals from ties which are unacceptable in a constitutional regime due to being denigrating and utterly discriminatory.

At the same time, it is important to notice that in its purest form such a system would categorize everyone according to his religious beliefs and would allow him rights and freedoms not as an individual but according to his allegiance to a religious movement, perhaps with an opt-out (or opt-in) possibility. Such a system ‘would oblige individuals to obey, not rules laid down by the state in the exercise of its above-mentioned functions, but static rules of law imposed by the religion concerned.’ The European Court of Human Rights ruled that such a system would violate human rights, ‘as the State has a positive obligation to ensure that everyone within its jurisdiction enjoys in full' fundamental rights, ‘and without being able to waive them’ and that such system is discriminatory. In broader terms:

the secular state cannot tolerate a religiously required behavior … if the behavior contradicts the very essentials of the constitutional order. There is no obligation to sacrifice the identity of civil society to religious demands. The question of what belongs to these essentials will be answered for every society by itself.'

Bibliography

Pierre Bayle, Philosophical Commentary (1708)

Jürgen Habermas and Joseph Ratzinger, The Dialectics of Secularization (2005)

Freedom of Religion

Martha Nussbaum, Liberty of Conscience (2008)

Julian Rivers, ‘Religious Liberty as a Collective Right’ in Richard O’Dair and Andrew Lewis (eds), Law and Religion (2001)

Richard Rorty, ‘Religion As Conversation-Stopper in Contingency, Irony, and Solidarity’ in Richard Rorty, Philosophy and Social Hope (1999)

Roger Williams, The Bloody Tenent of Persecution for Cause of Conscience (1644)

John Witte, Law and Protestantism (2002)

Notes:

(2) eg in England the Catholic Relief Act restored the political and certain civil rights of Catholics only in 1829.

(3) See Benjamin Constant, ‘The Liberty of the Ancients Compared With That of the Moderns’ in Political Writings (Biancamaria Fontana ed, 1988).

(4) See the Transylvanian Diet’s (parliament) 1568 law; the Warsaw Confederation of 1573; and to some extent the Union of Utrecht of 1579 that served as the foundation of the modern Dutch state against Catholic Spain and referred to individual freedom of religion.

(5) See Roger Williams, The Bloody Tenent of Persecution for Cause of Conscience (1644).

(10) See also the 1787 Edict of Toleration in France.

(11) Article 10: ‘No one may be disturbed on account of his opinions, even religious ones, as long as the manifestation of such opinions does not interfere with the established Law and Order.’

(12) See the law entitled Civil Constitution of the Clergy (Constitution civile du clergé) passed on July 12, 1790 during the French Revolution.

(13) To grant rights to religious minority groups was not completely alien to the political organization of the Islamic state, which traditionally recognized a level of autonomy to non-Muslim religious communities in the form of the millet system.

(14) Émile Durkheim, The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life (Joseph Ward Swain trans, 1915), 47: ‘they mutually show one another that they are all members of the same moral community and they become conscious of the kinship uniting them’: ibid 358.

(18) For primarily political reasons, he did not extend toleration to Papists, as their religion prescribed allegiance to a foreign power. Faulty religions are tolerated, political betrayal is not.

(19) Memorial and Remonstrance Against Religious Assessments, 1785.

(22) Ch J Barak in CA 105/92, Re’em Eng’g Contractors Ltd v Municipality of Upper Nazareth 47(5) PD 189, 211. See Aharon Barak, The Judge in a Democracy (2006), 64.

(25) eg religious statements are protected as (‘offensive’) speech, without the need for a special right to proselytize.

(26) For the contrary position that religious freedom is a collective right which is meant to secure the liberty of a community of believers see eg Julian Rivers, ‘Religious Liberty as a Collective Right’ in Richard O’Dair and Andrew Lewis (eds), Law and Religion (2001), 227.

(27) While noting the importance of the constitutional protection to non-religious convictions, this chapter will concentrate on protection afforded to religious beliefs.

(29) See ECtHR, Masaev v Moldova, App no 6303/05; Judgment of 12 May 2009, para 26:

    The State may set requirements for ... but cannot sanction through such requirements the individual members of an unregistered religious denomination for praying or otherwise manifesting their religious beliefs.

(30) eg Germany: Blood transfusion case, 32 BVerfGE 98, 106 (1971) and the Decision on halal slaughter, 1 BvR 1783/99 (January 15, 2002); Canada: Syndicat Northcrest v Amselem [2004] 2 SCR 551; also note ECtHR: Cha’are Chalom ve Tsedek v France, App no 27417/95, Judgment of 30 March 1999.

(31) See eg Syndicat Northcrest v Anselem, para 46.

    See further the ECtHR requiring that protected convictions ‘attain a certain level of cogency, seriousness, cohesion and importance’ (Campbell and Cosans v United Kingdom, App nos 7511/76 and 7743/76, Judgment of 25 February 1982, para 36).

(34) Despite similarities in constitutional language, which use the non-specific term ‘religion’, national legal systems differ greatly as far as on what ground, how, and for what purposes (eg tax exemption) they provide legal recognition to religious practices and beliefs, and even more so when it comes to the recognition of religious groups as organizations (churches).

(36) The Pakistani Supreme Court denied the Ahmedi being Muslims, notwithstanding the fact that they do follow practices mandated by Islam. Such qualification resulted in their persecution as apostates. Zaheerudin v State 26 SCMR 1718 (SCT 1993) (Pakistan).

(37) The example of Scientology (which is accepted as a religious organization in the United States, but not in Germany) stands as an illustration.

(38) See the ECtHR in Förderkreis v Germany, App no 58911/00, Judgment of 6 November 2008.

(40) Article 18(2) of the ICCPR: ‘No one shall be subject to coercion which would impair his freedom to have or to adopt a religion or belief of his choice’.

(42) ECtHR, Refah Partisi (The Welfare Party) and Others v Turkey, App nos 41340/98, 41342/98, 41343/98 and 41344/98, Judgment of 13 February 2003, para 92.

(43) The right of parents to have their children educated in line with the dictates of their conscience or religious belief is usually formulated as a separate right. See Art 13(3) of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR) on religious education complementing Art 18 of the ICCPR, also Art 2 of Protocol No 1 to the European Convention complementing Art 9 on freedom of religion.

(44) R (Ghai) v Newcastle upon Tyne City Council (Ramgharia Gurdwara, Hitchin and others intervening) [2010] EWCA Civ 59; [2010] WLR (D) 36.

(46) Ibid 539.

(47) For the drafting history see Bahiyyah Tahzib, Freedom of Religion of Belief, Ensuring Effective International Legal Protection (1995), 84ff.

(48) A prohibition on proselytism was inserted into several constitutions, among which the Greek Constitution (Art 13(2)), dating back to 1844, is probably the best known in Europe. Free speech clauses prohibiting compulsion to express or denounce a conviction (eg Russian Constitution, Art 29(3); Romanian Constitution, Art 29(1)) may also be seen as indirect prohibitions on proselytism.

(52) Ibid para 31.

(53) Where the lack of accommodation amounts to a ‘substantive burden’ on the religious liberty to follow one’s religion, the matter is generally framed as one of free exercise. Sherbert v Verner 374 US 98 (1963).

(54) Should a secular practice that is offensive to a religion in a community (outside the living quarters of believers) be permitted or banned? Should the same offensive practice be permitted in the neighborhood of the believers? See MK Marina Solodkin v Beit Shemesh Municipality Supreme Court of Israel HCJ 953/01 (2003).

(57) Ibid 885.

(58) In City of Boerne v Flores 521 US 507 (1997), the Supreme Court held that the powers of Congress to ‘promote’ freedom of religion by demanding a compelling state interest test is limited to federal legislation.

As the Human Rights Committee stressed recently ‘It is in principle possible, and in practice common, to conceive alternatives to compulsory military service that do not erode the basis of the principle of universal conscription but render equivalent social good and make equivalent demands on the individual, eliminating unfair disparities between those engaged in compulsory military service and those in alternative service.

See also ECtHR, Bayatyan v Armenia, App no 23459/03, Judgment of 7 July 2011 (Grand Chamber), para 109, finding that conscientious objection to military service comes solely within the protection of freedom of religion under Art 9.

(62) For decisions involving the display of the crucifix in the classroom, see eg Germany, Classroom Crucifix case BVerfGE 93, 1, see also ECtHR, Lautsi v Italy, App no 30814/06, Judgment of 18 March 2011 (Grand Chamber). See also Chapter 62 on Islam and the constitutional order.

(64) Ibid para 1.
(65) ECtHR, Leyla Sahin v Turkey, App no 44774/98, Judgment of 10 November 2005, para 106.

(66) In the Eweida case a stewardess was not allowed to wear a cross. The High Court found it important that, contrary to other situations (eg Sikhs in armed forces), the religion did not require the wearing of the symbol. (After Ms Eweida left British Airways, the airline changed its policy.) Eweida v British Airways plc [2010] EWCA Civ 80; [2010] WLR (D) 37 currently pending before the ECtHR as Eweida and Chaplin, App nos 48420/10 and 59842/10.

(67) A similar approach is traceable in the headscarf decision of the German Federal Constitutional Court (the Ludin case, BVerfGE 108, 282 (2003)).

(69) Ibid para 79.

(70) Ibid para 40.

(71) ECtHR, Ahmet Arslan and others v Turkey, App no 41135/98, Judgment of 23 February 2010.

(72) Decision no 2010-613 DC of October 7, 2010.

(73) Although the concept of blasphemy is elusive, prohibitions of blasphemy are meant to foreclose any expression of disrespect, hostility, or irreverence towards God or sacred, religious organizations, ceremonies, or personnel. Such prohibitions were originally meant to protect not only God but also the established religion; today these laws protect religious sensitivities (see Robert Post, ‘Cultural Heterogeneity and the Law: Pornography, Blasphemy and the First Amendment’ (1988) 76 California Law Review 297).

(74) In the United Kingdom, the prohibition of Salman Rushdie's novel, The Satanic Verses, for blasphemous libel was sought unsuccessfully because the book affected the Prophet who is not covered by the blasphemous libel rule. R v Chief Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate, ex p Chaudhry [1991] 1 All ER 306. The blasphemy law was repealed in 2008 by the Criminal Justice and Immigration Act.

(75) For one of the successes see the non-binding Resolution 7/19 of the UN Human Rights Council on combating defamation of religions, passed on the proposal of Pakistan, on March 27, 2008.

(76) See Multani v Commission scolaire Marguerite-Bourgeoys (n 68).

(78) Ibid para 62.

(79) In terms of ideological power, secularization implies disenchantedment of the world (die Entzauberung der Welt) and the diminishing intensity of religious beliefs. Max Weber, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (Talcott Parsons trans, 1958), 104. The above also entails lesser participation in religious services and the growing number of non-believers, where people increasingly follow their own choices in everyday life, including in matters of morals.

(81) The Greek Constitution allows for the exercise of ‘all known religions’ in Art 13(2) which shall be read in light of its Art 3(1) providing that the ‘prevailing religion in Greece is that of the Eastern Orthodox Church of Christ’. The Italian Constitution also singled out the Catholic faith, but gradually the Constitutional Court and legislation extended the treatment granted to the Catholic Church to other religious communities.

eg in addition to safeguarding individual religious freedom in its Art 28, the Russian Constitution proclaims in its Art 14(1) that ‘The Russian Federation is a secular state. No religion may be established as a state or obligatory one’. The Constitution is silent about the Russian Orthodox Church, which however retains special relations with the government that have an impact on other religious communities.

(82) eg in Germany the collection of church taxes is enforced through state tax agencies.
(83) With the emergence of the modern state, even where Catholicism remained the state religion the state claimed sovereign power and legitimacy for itself irrespective of the power of Rome (see Gallicism in France.)

(84) Sunday observance laws are perhaps the best known example, causing difficulties and a sense of inequality for Jews, Muslims, and other Sabbatarians, in countries where they are in the minority.

(86) Loi du 9 décembre 1905 concernant la séparation des Églises et de l’État.

(87) The separationist doctrine that prevailed in nineteenth-century America served as the basis for anti-Catholic (and anti-immigrant and anti-minority) bias; it served state interference in denominational education.

(88) Refah Partisi (The Welfare Party) and Others v Turkey (n 42), para 40.

(89) See the Virginia Statute for Religious Freedom, 1786, drafted by Jefferson in 1777, which prohibited governmental compulsion to religious worship.

(90) Article 137 (3) of the 1919 Weimar Constitution (in force) provides that ‘every religious community independently regulates and administers its own affairs’.

    Member States may maintain national legislation in force ... in the case of occupational activities within churches and other public or private organisations the ethos of which is based on religion or belief, a difference of treatment based on a person's religion or belief shall not constitute discrimination where, by reason of the nature of these activities or of the context in which they are carried out, a person's religion or belief constitute a genuine, legitimate and justified occupational requirement. ...

(92) See eg ECtHR, Moscow Branch of the Salvation Army v Russia, App no 72881/01, Judgment of 5 October 2006, paras 58–61; Religionsgemeinschaft der Zeugen Jehovas and others v Austria, App no 40825/98, Judgment of 31 July 2008.

(93) On the ban on the Welfare Party that advocated the introduction of sharia law, quoted in Refah Partisi (The Welfare Party) and Others v Turkey (n 42), para 25.

(95) From a historical perspective it is ironic that many claims are made in family law, as in Europe it was a major achievement of the Reformation successfully to challenge Church authority over marriage and replace it with the jurisdiction of the secular sovereign (state). John Witte, Law and Protestantism (2002), 199–232.

(96) Refah Partisi (The Welfare Party) and Others v Turkey (n 42), para 119.

(97) Ibid.

The apparent simplicity of the idea of due process, with its ‘precise technical import’, conceals a much-contested reality. Although the phrase conveys a powerful ideological message of commitment to the rule of law, its exact meaning tends to disintegrate under cross-examination. For example, can a mere procedure—any procedure—be protective of human rights in all contexts? And where is the unexplained theory of procedure which lies behind the assertion that certain forms may be considered ‘due’ and others not? To many, the phrase ‘due process’ carries with it coded suggestions about the superiority of Western or specifically Anglo-American jurisprudence, and indeed the North American reading of due process is very different and very much more complex, than that which it is given in the rest of the world.

A major part of the difficulty of assessing due process is the chameleon-like nature of the concept; its so-called ‘blessed versatility’. Williams suggests no less than eight completely different understandings of due process in the US context alone. Perhaps the best way of considering this diversity is to imagine the idea as multi-layered, not only in philosophical and jurisprudential terms but also in its historical and geographical dimensions. A detailed exposition of the highly nuanced range of meanings within US jurisprudence is clearly beyond the scope of this review. However, it will be helpful to begin this account with a brief examination of the constitutional origins of due process and some of the ways in which it has been understood, interpreted, and mobilized as a concept in its common law homelands. This is particularly important given the Anglo-American role in shaping contemporary understandings of the concept around the world and, above all, in developing its association with adversarial justice. The main discussion will address the issue of procedural due process as it is understood globally in light of instruments such as the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR). Finally, the contribution of the international courts and agencies in promoting adversarial due process around the world will be evaluated. The focus throughout will be on due process in criminal proceedings.

I. The Troubled History of the Constitutional Due Process Clause

The constitutional history of due process is one of successive reinventions. The main point of departure, for common lawyers at least, is the celebrated Clause 39 of Magna Carta of 1215, to the effect that

No Freeman shall be arrested or imprisoned or disseised or outlawed or exiled or in any other way harmed. Nor will we [the king] proceed against him, or send others to do so, except according to the lawful sentence of his peers and according to the Common Law [per legem terrae].

The specific early medieval reading of this text, which actually concerned immunities for feudal magnates, fails signally as McIlwain put it, to ‘guarantee anything to all Englishmen’. It bears almost no relation to the first incarnation of the wording ‘due process of law’ in a 1354 Statute of Edward III, which was nevertheless creatively bracketed with Magna Carta in paragraphs (iii) and (iv) of the Petition of Right in 1628. Sir Edward Coke perpetuated this reading by claiming that the concept of due process was the ‘true sense and exposition’ of the original 1215 wording ‘per legem terrae’. The reinvention of Magna Carta in the seventeenth century and its use in the revolutionary struggles of the English Civil War is well known. However, ‘due process of law’ appears in no English statute other than the above and only incidentally in the work of Hawkins and Blackstone. Its historical importance is largely retrospective and an invention of nineteenth- and twentieth-century myth-makers such as the distinguished American jurists Kent, Story, and Cooley and the legal historian Mott, who claimed that ‘In the great constitutional crises involving life, liberty, and property, it was the concept of “due process of law” which took hold of men’s minds most mightily.’ On the contrary, its might is predominantly modern and predominantly North American.

None of the pre-revolutionary American states enacted ‘due process’ clauses in their charters, preferring the ‘law of the land’ formulation derived directly from Magna Carta. The decisive change came with the decision by James Madison to import the terminology of due process into the Fifth Amendment to the US Constitution, which was adopted in 1791. Although the implications of the wording were not debated at the time—it being assumed that the right which was enacted related uncontroversially to criminal process—nevertheless the consequences for US, and subsequently global, jurisprudence are hard to overestimate. One of the major complications with the interpretation of due process in the US context is that, by the second half of the nineteenth century, the doctrine seems to have been broadened, for purely domestic reasons, to include what is referred to as ‘substantive due process’. In other words, a clause which was intended to require a legitimate procedural basis for actions involving the deprivation of life, liberty, and property, could be construed as a wider statement of substantive right against government. Successive waves of reformers, particularly Temperance and Abolitionist activists, therefore saw the ‘due process’ clause in the Bill of Rights, interpreted in this light, as a convenient weapon. At the time of the American Civil War, slave-owners argued that the ‘substantive’ interpretation of the due process clause protected their ownership of slaves, whereas abolitionists responded with the Lockeian argument that slaves should not be deprived of the fruits of their labour without ‘due process of law’. These arguments were resolved to some extent by the outcome of the Civil War and the enactment of the Fourteenth Amendment, containing a due process clause identical to that of the Fifth Amendment. Since then, argument has continued, both in academic writing and in the courts, as to whether the two clauses represented two different concepts of due process, one procedural and one substantive.

Not surprisingly, in view of these complications, the constitutional career of the ‘due process clause’ appears to have begun and ended with the United States. It does not, for example, appear—possibly because it is untranslatable into French—in the 1789 Declaration of the Rights of Man, which requires merely that arrest and imprisonment should be ‘according to the forms prescribed by law’. Only countries which expressly modelled their constitutions on US precedents, such as Liberia or Puerto Rico, were prepared to insert the words ‘due process of law’. Even Japan, which developed its constitutional provisions in 1946 under the direct tutelage of the US occupying forces, deliberately diluted the wording and omitted the word ‘property’ in Article 31, leaving only a requirement that ‘No person shall be deprived of life or liberty ... except according to procedure established by law’. Scepticism towards due process clauses was also demonstrated by constitutional drafting bodies throughout the common law area. Attempts in the UK Parliament to insert such a clause within the Government of Ireland Bill in 1893 soon founded on the grounds that ‘Nobody seemed to understand what ... [the words “due process of law”] really meant’ and the view that the provision operated badly in the United States.17 Similar proposals for the Australian Federal Constitution of (p. 932) 1898,18 the Government of India Act 1935,19 and the Indian Constitution of 1946,20 were rejected for the same reasons. Canada and Israel dispensed with the idea entirely whereas Pakistan, in common with many Commonwealth countries, merely referred to ‘in accordance with law’.21

Due Process

Difficulties with due process clauses were also encountered during the drafting of international human rights conventions. Article 3 of the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR), for example, enacts only the right to ‘life liberty and security of Person’. The original draft of this extraordinarily influential document, known familiarly as the ‘global Magna Carta’, had contained the reservation ‘except in cases prescribed by law and after due process’. However, Dr F.R. Bienenfeld, speaking for the World Jewish Congress, objected that many of the Nazi crimes against the Jewish people had been carried out in accordance with the so-called ‘law’ of the Third Reich and after a process which was apparently lawful at the time within that jurisdiction. The due process clause was consequently deleted from the final text.22 The clauses which deal with the practicalities of due process in criminal procedure are also somewhat limited and are confined to the freedom from ‘arbitrary arrest, detention or exile’ (Art 9), the entitlement ‘in full equality to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal’ (Art 10), the presumption of innocence and rights of defence (Art 11(1)).

In just the same way, the ECHR, enacted two years later and drafted largely by English common lawyers, has no due process clause but nevertheless set out for the first time some extensive procedural due process provisions in relation to arrest and detention (Art 5) and criminal procedure (Art 6). Article 5(1) of the ECHR repeats verbatim the UDHR right to liberty and security of the person and sets out six circumstances, including ‘the lawful arrest or detention of a person ... on reasonable suspicion of having committed an offence’ in which the right may be defeated in accordance with ‘a procedure prescribed by law’. The process provisions here include notification of rights and the reason for arrest (Art 5(2)), prompt production before a judge (Art 5(3)), the right to test the lawfulness of the detention in court (Art 5(4)), and the right to compensation for wrongful arrest or detention (Art 5(5)). Fair trial provisions under Article 6 are even more extensive and add to the UDHR provisions the right to full notification of the accusation (Art 6(3)(1)), time and opportunity for the preparation of defence (Art 6(3)(2)), defence in person or through counsel (Art 6(3)(3)), to examine witnesses (Art 6(3)(4)), and interpretation rights (Art 6(3)(5)).

The ICCPR, which finally entered into force in March 1976, was even more explicit regarding due process rights. However, it similarly omits any specific reference to ‘due process’ itself, preferring to prohibit ‘arbitrary arrest and detention’ in Article 9(1) and insisting that ‘No one shall be deprived of his liberty except on such grounds and in accordance with such procedure as are established by law’. As before, ‘due process’ wording was rejected in the drafting process, this time on the basis of a proposal by the United States.23 The ICCPR reproduces in its Article 9, almost verbatim, the arrest and detention provisions which are set out at Article 5 of the ECHR, without specifying the exceptions. Article 14 of the ICCPR, which deals with due process in criminal procedure, again uses substantially the same wording as the ECHR but adds rights to a speedy trial (Art 14(3)(c)) and presence at trial and free legal assistance (Art 14(3)(d)), the right not to self-incriminate (Art 14(3)(g)), special provisions for juveniles (Art 14(4)), appeal (Art 14(5)), compensation for wrongful conviction (Art 14(6), and a restriction on double jeopardy (Art 14(7)).

(p. 933) There are no due process clauses in the American Convention on Human Rights which was adopted in 1969 and which repeats, largely verbatim, the procedural provisions outlined above24 nor in the Banjul African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights which was approved in 1981, with rather more concise procedural requirements in Articles 6 and 7. The 1998 Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court makes no mention of due process nor does the 2000 Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union which sets out a range of criminal justice due process provisions in Articles 47 to 51. In continental Europe the wording ‘due process of law’ simply does not bear the same cultural significance which it does in the common law world. The terminology is only rarely used by the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR), except in reference to discussions of US case law,25 and the leading account of human rights in criminal proceedings by Stefan Trechsel26 does not refer at any length to the idea of due process.

However, constitutional abstention with regard to the terminology of ‘due process of law’ does not mean that the concept itself has not been influential in many regions, particularly in the post-war period and particularly under the influence of US-led ‘rule of law’ initiatives such as the Western-hemisphere focused, ‘Due Process of Law Foundation’. For example, the availability of a workable Spanish translation (debidó proceso) and US influence in Latin America has helped to ensure that the due process is widely debated and endorsed in Hispanic literature. Before looking at this wider international approach however, it may be helpful to consider the way in which the concept has been interpreted as a mode of analysis in the Anglo-American tradition.
Due Process

II. Concepts of Due Process

Debates over procedural methodology have used a wide variety of terminologies, many of which overlap with due process. The literature in this area is immense and ranges from socio-legal concepts such as Weber’s ‘formal legal rationality’, to positivist accounts of law’s ‘rules of adjudication’, which in Hart’s view, enable authoritative determinations to be made as to whether a primary rule has been broken. However, a number of authors, particularly those writing in the United States have developed due process itself as a theoretical construct.

The most well-known understanding of the concept of due process is that it represents a sense of ‘justice’ in its broadest terms. According to Justice Frankfurter, speaking at the height of the Cold War:

‘due process,’ unlike some legal rules, is not a technical conception with a fixed content unrelated to time, place and circumstances. Expressing as it does in its ultimate analysis respect enforced by law for that feeling of just treatment which has been evolved through centuries of Anglo-American constitutional history and civilization, ‘due process’ cannot be imprisoned within the treacherous limits of any formula. Representing a profound attitude of fairness (p. 934) between man and man, and more particularly between the individual and government; ‘due process’ is compounded of history, reason, the past course of decisions, and stout confidence in the strength of the democratic faith which we profess.

This approach elides some of the most intractable contradictions within the concept, as if notions of formal legal rationality and popular ‘fairness’ could be compounded together by the alchemy of due process.

Other authors have been more circumspect. John Rawls characterized due process as an essential element in his theory of Justice. If the rule of law is necessary for liberty, then a legal system must contain rules of evidence that guarantee rational procedures of inquiry. Therefore ‘the rule of law requires some form of due process: that is, a process reasonably designed to ascertain the truth, in ways consistent with the other ends of the legal system, as to whether a violation has taken place and under what circumstances.’ Rawls distinguishes between perfect procedural justice, which always produces the right factual outcome (eg guilt or innocence) and imperfect procedural justice, which does not. As he points out: ‘Even though the law is carefully followed, and the proceedings fairly and properly conducted, it may reach the wrong outcome’. This represents one of the most perplexing aspects of due process theory and one which has been long debated by Legal Realists such as Frank, who was troubled by the ‘constitutionally correct’ procedure but ‘egregiously unfair’ outcome of the Sacco-Vanzetti trial. It has also caused great difficulties for tribunals, such as the ECtHR which have tried to enforce Convention due process standards without acting as a ‘court of fourth instance’. In a bold dissenting judgment in the case of Göktan v France, Judge Loucaides dared to challenge the long-standing principle that the ECtHR was concerned only with process rights and not outcomes:

I believe that the right to a fair hearing/trial is not confined to procedural safeguards but extends also to the judicial determination itself of the case. Indeed, it would have been absurd for the Convention to secure proper procedures for the determination of a right or a criminal charge and at the same time leave the litigant or the accused unprotected as far as the result of such a determination is concerned. Such approach would allow a fair procedure to end up in an arbitrary or evidently unjustified result.

In short, as with all methodologies concerned with due process alone, a legitimate procedure may nevertheless produce an illegitimate outcome.

By far the most influential account of due process in criminal procedure over the past few decades has been that provided by Herbert Packer in his 1968 Limits of the Penal Sanction. More cited than actually read, Packer’s work appears as an orthodoxy in most Anglo-American criminal justice textbooks and even the most radical and progressive of commentators seem to have found his approach indispensible. His influence pervades, for example, the 1999 United Nations Global Report on Crime and Justice and a succession of influential government reports in both the United States and England. Contemporary analyses of international criminal law and mutual legal assistance treaties, as well as sentencing practices, government attempts to inspire confidence in criminal justice, and ‘populist leniency’ have all been based upon Packer’s theoretical approach to due process.
Due Process

Briefly, Packer presents two ideal types of criminal justice process; two normative models which he hopes will help to explain the choices which underlie the details of criminal justice practice. The two alternative models are the ‘crime control model’ (CCM) and the ‘due process model’ (DPM). According to Packer, the CCM ‘requires that primary attention be paid to the managerial efficiency with which the criminal process operates to screen suspects, determine guilt and secure appropriate dispositions of persons convicted of crimes.’ The complete freedom of action of the investigators, enabling them to establish an accurate prediction of guilt or innocence, is essential. Indeed, the model requires a rigorous initial screening process so that subsequent stages can be significantly abbreviated. Above all, the process must not be ‘cluttered up with ceremonial rituals which do not advance the progress of a case’. Although he does not mention it—and indeed has been repeatedly criticized for his failure to look beyond US procedure—the model which he describes is remarkably close to Napoleonic criminal procedure.

If the crime control model resembles an ‘assembly line’, of course Packer, ‘the due process model looks very much like an obstacle course’. This model erects procedural barriers and is based upon a presumption of fallibility and error and a distrust of informal fact-finding methods. It is a system of quality control in which the reliability of the product takes precedence over the efficiency with which it is produced.

Although Packer does not say as much, these models have generally been interpreted as constituent elements of a zero-sum game in which advances in due process will entail retreats in crime control and vice versa in ‘almost infinite modulation and compromise’. As Dubber puts it:

In 1968, when Packer set up the contrast between these two models—ostensibly for analytic purposes—the Crime Control Model was seen as gaining ground on the Due Process Model. Packer’s book reads like a last stand against a creeping erosion of the time-honored principles of the Due Process Model, which he apparently regarded as preceding the Crime Control Model, though he never set out a detailed historical sequence of principles gained and lost.

Dubber may be wrong in suggesting that Packer’s intentions were purely analytical since he suggests firmly that his aim was normative. Indeed, the enduring appeal of his formulation indicates how successfully he has been able to give expression to the aspirations of those involved in criminal justice and to the fundamental conflicts between the professional interests of the police and the prosecution and those of the lawyers and judges.

There are three well-known problems with Packer’s formulation. The first is that, put simply, crime control is patently an objective whereas due process is a method. In no sense can they be considered as polar opposites or ‘antinomies’ and to do so is to give unwarranted priority to the model which promises results over the model which merely describes a procedure. So, far from being value-neutral, the terms of the argument are loaded from the outset. There is also an unexplored assumption in Packer’s terminology that ‘efficiency’ in apprehension and conviction will necessarily result in crime control. It may well be, on the contrary, that the ruthless efficiency of the CCM may alienate sufficient sections of the population to make crime control more difficult. A consensual DPM approach to justice might actually be more effective in reducing levels of offending and, as Roach has pointed out, ‘due process is for crime control’. Roach, further attacks Packer for his failure to perceive the ‘empirical irrelevance’ of his models, to the extent that ‘the due process model begins to look like a thin, shiny veneer that dresses up the ugly reality of crime control’. Finally, the whole idea that due process rights can be sacrificed in the interests of ‘balance’ with another objective, has long been regarded with scepticism.

Subsequent scholarship has sought to address the somewhat restricted scope of Packer’s vision by adding further models. Griffith was the first and most notable ‘remodeller’, objecting that ‘the essential nature of [the] problem is such as to permit only two polar responses’. Rehabilitation and, more importantly for Griffith, conciliation, are left entirely out of account in this conflict model of criminal justice. Griffith is therefore moved to offer a third model which he describes as a non-conflictual ‘family model’. Griffith’s intervention opened the floodgates to a succession of remodellers amongst whom the prize for sustained invention must be given to Davis, Croall, and Taylor who consider a grand total of seven models to be absolutely indispensable to a full understanding of criminal justice process.\textsuperscript{59}

Strangely enough, considering the pervasive international extent of his influence over many years, his work is determinedly ahistorical, strictly confined to the United States and is unsupported by much in the way of empirical evidence. Nevertheless, as I have indicated above, determined attempts have been made by scholars to analyse international and comparative criminal justice through the lens of Packer's formulation and these accounts to some extent reveal its limitations. Using data from the United Nations Surveys on Crime Trends and the Operations of Criminal Justice Systems, Sung attempted in 2006 to identify the eight dependent variables (incarceration rate, police contact rate etc.) which in his view define the difference between due process and crime control approaches. 'Authoritarianism' in criminal justice (p. 937) could thus be compared with levels of democracy as defined by the Freedom House register.\textsuperscript{60} Due process, on the other hand, is strongly associated with liberal democracy and is characterized by a personnel structure involving a small police force, prosecutorial staff, and prison service combined with low arrest rates, prosecution rates, conviction rates, and incarceration rates.\textsuperscript{61} Despite the rather questionable nature of these attributions, the methodology, and the very short time frame (a maximum of six years for some countries), Sung purports to find that an 'evolution from an authoritarian criminal justice system to a democratic [eg due process] one is cumulative but not inevitable'.\textsuperscript{62}

Packer's main achievement was to popularize the view that due process cannot be seen in isolation from other factors in criminal justice. His due process model is based upon the supposition that efficiency is dispensable when it conflicts with reliability or, as he puts it: 'If efficiency demands short cuts around reliability, then absolute efficiency must be rejected'.\textsuperscript{63} But can such a process be considered 'fair' or 'due' where the protection of the accused's interests take such a clear priority over those of the state in a rapid, accurate, and efficient factual determination? Surely a more comprehensive idea of due process, while rejecting the zero-sum game approach referred to above, demands an equitable balance between these interests and those of the community as a whole? This is not at all apparent from the various constitutional 'due process' provisions described above, which are concerned exclusively with the rights of accused persons. The rights of the viclims of crime,\textsuperscript{64} the rights of the community, and the rights of the state are conspicuous by their absence from such legislation. A broader concept of due process would extend well beyond this narrow assertion of defence rights and instead encapsulate a procedure which sought a fair balance between legitimate conflicting interests in criminal justice. Of course it can be objected that the defendant alone faces threats to life and liberty in criminal procedure and the systematic abuse of the rights of accused individuals is so much more extensive and dangerous than threats to the community and state, that the lopsided character of due process provisions is entirely justified. Nevertheless, as a means of analysis and as a basis for progressive reform, this exclusive focus on due process as understood in the Packer sense, has its limitations.

I have suggested elsewhere that, based on the three Weberian paradigms of \textit{Gemeinschaft} (or the organic-familial), \textit{Gesellschaft} (or the contractual commercial-individualistic), and the bureaucratic-administrative responsibilities of the state, criminal process can be best understood as a forum in which inevitable conflicts between these fundamental interests may be debated and resolved.\textsuperscript{65} In practice, these three social interests (community, individual, and state) are represented by the three great historical methodologies of, respectively, popular, adversarial, and inquisitorial justice, all of which have left significant residues in every contemporary system of criminal justice. In describing the long historical evolution of each of these methodologies and their complex interaction, I have argued that each has a crucial role to play in a legitimate system of criminal justice. Indeed, in principle, 'due process' might just as well refer to popular, jury-determined justice and inquisitorial, judge-determined justice as to party-driven adversarially. However, the global dominance of totalitarian and colonial (p. 938) forms of government for much of the twentieth century has bequeathed to us a considerable 'adversarial deficit', which I have suggested has distorted criminal justice in most regions. The traditional Anglo-American association of due process with adversarial process has coincided with this deficit to ensure that most contemporary debates are centred on the restoration of due process adversarially rather than otherwise. Demands for more 'inquisitorial' efficiency and rationality in criminal justice, for example, are not currently conducted using the terminology of due process. For this reason it is necessary to consider recent global developments in due process, not in its broader sense outlined above but, as conceived by Packer and others, in association with adversarial justice.

\textbf{III. The Rise and Fall of Adversarial Due Process in England and the United States}
Due Process

The connection between the concepts of due process and adversariality has always been close. Both were eighteenth-century reinventions of ancient doctrines—in the case of due process, the feudal obligations of Magna Carta and in the case of adversariality, the medieval notion of trial by accusatorial contest. Both were founded in Enlightenment ideas of individual autonomy, described by John Locke as:

...a state of perfect freedom to order their actions, and dispose of their possessions and persons as they think fit, within the bounds of the law of nature, without asking leave, or depending upon the will of any other man.

Disposition by the ‘arbitrary will of another’ was therefore unacceptable. Two fundamental aspects of adversarial due process emerged from this approach. The first was the publicity of the criminal trial. Beccaria had attacked secrecy in Book XV of his 1764 Dei Delitti et della Pene as an ‘impenetrable shield of tyranny’ and demanded that ‘All trials should be public’. At a more profound level, theorists of the English Enlightenment contributed to the disconnection of the criminal trial from its existing dependence upon the rational investigation of a single, testable reality. Both Newton and Locke were deeply hostile to the Cartesian emphasis on the search for absolute truth through logic and mathematics, which had proved so influential in the development of continental Inquisitionsprozess. Instead of proceeding on the basis of a priori reasoning, they insisted on the use of empirical methods for establishing various degrees of probability. Shapiro and others have shown how John Locke's concept of proof ‘to the highest degree of probability’ became imbedded in notions of ‘beyond reasonable doubt’ and the deeply contingent epistemology of adversariality. Galileoan and Cartesian postulates were also specifically rejected by Hale and Gilbert, the authors of the new English concept of evidence law, which has been described as a common law ‘science of probabilities’.

This probabilistic world of empirical proof provided the intellectual environment in which adversarial due process, based on competing empirical projects and the protection of individual rights, could flourish. But it was not the great juridical authors of the period who first created the adversarial due process revolution. It was the Lockean common lawyers, working in the Old Bailey and the Courts of Assize in England during a relatively short period between 1730 and 1770. On the basis of the painstaking research carried out by (amongst others) Cockburn, Langbein, Landsman, Beattie, May, and Hostettler, it is possible to observe with some focus, the arrival of lawyers for the first time in these criminal courts and the impact which they had upon practice. I have pointed out elsewhere that it is no coincidence that the first sightings of due process adversariality and a rights-based trial process occurred in England at this period. The doctrine, in many ways, was inspired by the market, was pioneered by the men who represented the new capitalists, and was imbued with the ideologies of the Industrial Revolution.

Earlier developments, such as Habeas Corpus, the Bill of Rights of 1688, or the Treason Trials Act 1696, although prefiguring the birth of criminal process rights, were largely concerned with the interests of the Whig elites. The new adversarial criminal trial, by contrast, extended such rights to all. Indeed, the proposition that the Crown in a criminal prosecution was an adversary on equal terms with the humblest subject was startling and far-reaching in its application. What is more, the same common lawyers who achieved this practical transformation from deference to active debate, went on to elevate the doctrine to a full-blown political ideology in the revolutionary creeds of the late eighteenth century. It was to provide the empirical basis for the great universal codes of the US Constitution and Bill of Rights and the French Declaration of the Rights of Man referred to above and to transform the relations between the individual and the state in a way which would lead eventually to a political and legal culture based primarily on rights.

What was created in this period, by the patient and repeated arguments of the trial lawyers, was the concept of a criminal defendant who was not the passive object of an official inquiry but an active subject and participant in the process. The criminal trial was for the first time divided into two phases, the first dominated by the prosecution, the second by the defence. Moreover, the whole procedure was now ordered by an array of process rights and presumptions which were all aimed at protecting the defendant from the disproportionate power of the state. The rights, developed at this period, included the right to a fair trial in public, the presumption of innocence, the right of silence, the evidential protections against hearsay and bad character testimony, and the burden of proof on the prosecution. All such protections were guaranteed by the presence of a highly partisan defence counsel.

This empowerment of the defence had two closely linked aspects. The first was the protection of the defendant from torture or physical abuse practised by an aggressive, fact-finding state authority and the second was the provision of procedural weapons which could be used for an active defence. All these advances were obtained through the medium of law and it is this notion of legality, protecting the active, rights-bearing defendant, which is at the heart of the adversarial concept. However, the darker side of adversarial due process, its amorality and its rejection of the Cartesian commitment to scientific truth, has soured its legacy. As an ideology it is confined to the interests of the individual, and suffers from all the vices of the market economy which gave it birth. The outcomes of criminal justice are determined largely by the ability of an individual defendant to afford counsel and to construct an energetic defence. A trial therefore becomes a beauty contest between lawyers and the plea bargain, a morally neutral accommodation in which there is little difference between buyer and seller. Unchecked (p. 940) adversariality provides the spectacle of the well-resourced defendant, such as O.J. Simpson or Slobodan Milošević, manipulating their due process rights protections to drive the criminal process into the sand.
Due Process

Adversariality, like all forms of justice, is historically conditioned and since its first appearance in the Georgian courtroom, it has passed through at least three stages of development. The first, described above, was the early period in which the English model of the trial spread rapidly throughout Europe, the British Empire, and beyond. Its adoption was amongst the first priorities of the French Revolutionary Constituent Assembly in 1789–91, largely because it was the abuses perpetrated by ancien régime inquisitorial justice which had provided the most potent motivation for the uprising. As Nicolas Bergasse, one of the architects of the revolutionary reform of justice put it:

It is easy to see that no methods are talked about here except those furnished by the system of jurisprudence adopted in England and free America for the prosecution and punishment of offences ... we cannot do better than adopt it without delay, ameliorating it, however, in certain details.74

Some years later, Napoleon’s well-known antipathy towards due process protections led him to embark on a radical revision of the English model, effectively resurrecting the ancien régime pre-trial procedures of the 1670 Code Louis, stripped of their recourse to torture but preserving their secrecy, scientificity, and absolute denial of rights to the accused. The outcome was the 1808 Code d’Instruction Criminelle, which retained just enough due process adversariality (notably the trial in open court with the participation of counsel) to satisfy the liberal elites of post-revolutionary France, while ensuring absolute state control of the investigation process, unhindered by any exercise of adversarial rights. As Esmein eloquently puts it, as the procedure progressed:

We pass from obscurity into the full light of day. There the procedure was secret, written and always favourable to the prosecution, not leaving to the defense even the right of confrontation; here everything is publicity, oral trial, free defense, and full discussion. In the one case, there are the traditions of the Ordinance of 1670, in the other, the principles announced by the Constituant Assembly and put into operation in the Laws of the Intermediate Period.75

The Napoleonic compromise remains the most enduring and popular form of criminal process in the world, not only as a result of its imposition in countries of the French Empire but also since it provided a model for newly emerging regimes in Europe, Africa, Asia, and Latin America. The code satisfied the need to demonstrate a nominal liberal commitment to rights-driven due process without abandoning authoritarian control of the pre-trial.

The progressive destruction of the adversarial model entered a yet more dark and dangerous phase following its encounter with European Positivism in the late nineteenth century when even those remnants of adversarial due process which had been preserved by Napoleon, were subjected to vigorous attack. By this period, the probabilistic Lockean justifications for adversariality were looking increasingly shaky, ensuring that it became one of the main targets for the Positivist movement, championed by the leaders of the Italian School, Enrico Ferri and Raffaele Garofalo. According to the latter in 1885, adversarial conflict reduced the position of the judge to ‘the state of a dancing puppet with the two adversaries alternately pulling the strings’. Short-sighted progressives, he argued, had undermined the great scientific inquisitor (p. 941) iatral tradition established by Louis XII which was based on the ‘critical and impartial search for truth’.76 This criminological orthodoxy, proclaimed by the leading international conferences of the period, led directly to the stripping away of the remaining elements of adversarial due process and the descent of criminal justice into the tyranny of the Soviet show trials or the Nazi Volksgerichtshof.77

The impact of Positivist critiques of due process adversariality were also felt in the Western democracies. Up to the late nineteenth century, the main protection in England for an unrepresented defendant (as most were) was his or her incapacity as a witness. There was little point in torturing or abusing a defendant whose testimony was worthless as evidence. As the French observer Cottu so scornfully noted,78 a hat on a pole would serve for the defendant in an English trial process. Police codes down to 1912 prohibited officers from questioning the defendant...
at all—a highly effective defence against abuse and, as Fisher points out, ‘Not until the second half of the nineteenth century could accused criminals anywhere in the common law world testify under oath at their own trials.’

Nevertheless, this protective rule appeared a monstrous absurdity to the Positivist School, committed to the idea of the criminal process as a scientific method for the establishment of absolute truth. Despite a spirited defence of the incapacity provision, it was finally abolished by the Criminal Evidence Act 1898, England being one of the last common law nations to abandon the rule.

The abolition of the protective incapacity rule for defendants ushered in a second stage of adversariality. Eliminated from almost all criminal justice systems outside the countries of the former or contemporary British Empire, adversariality survived in its heartland only in an attenuated form. Miscarriages of justice against unrepresented and unprotected defendants became frequent in both the United Kingdom and the United States whilst European and Soviet criminal justice stripped out the remaining elements of adversarial due process. Such provisions were seen as unscientific or, in the Soviet case, ‘bourgeois’ residues. The way was now clear for the descent into the nightmare of rights-free, mass-processing of defendants by totalitarian states in the interests of ‘social-defence’.

This was to change with end of the Second World War, when many countries outside the Soviet bloc, reverted to their former practices by reintroducing due process protections. In the United States and the United Kingdom a new form of adversariality was adopted through the mass ‘lawyerization’ of the pre-trial in both countries from the 1960s. The credit for this ‘due process revolution’ must be attributed first to the liberal activism of the US Supreme Court of the period. Although the legacy of the Warren Court is contested nevertheless, a series of landmark decisions establishing basic process rights in the pre-trial, reinvigorated adversariality in the United States. These reforms were echoed in England by the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 which set out a robust network of pre-trial adversarial rights (p. 942) enforced by detailed codes of practice. Both of these new regimes were underpinned by the creation of a new market for legal services in each country which attracted large numbers of lawyers into criminal practice. The new found sense of confidence in adversarial due process encouraged the United States to embark on an international programme of promoting reform in criminal justice practices which has prompted the extraordinary international shift towards adversarial due process procedures discussed below. However, just as the pace of adversarial reform has gathered momentum around the world, there have been distinct signs in the adversarial heartlands that all is not well.

Deep cuts in the funding of counsel for the indigent in both the United Kingdom and the United States have combined with an expansion of plea bargaining, managerial case management, and an increasingly punitive turn in charging and sentencing, to inflict serious damage on the adversarial methodology. In England, recent legislation attacking defence rights, particularly for terrorist defendants looked at in conjunction with the increasing empowerment of prosecutors, has been seen as a move:

away from adversarialism because it is costly in terms of time and of money, at a time when government wants to be tough on crime and when the trend is towards greater criminalization as a response to social problems.

Following a high-profile campaign of criticism against the supposed irrationality of the adversarial method in the United States, waged by scholars such as Langbein and Pizz and Thomas, amongst others, there has been a perceptible loss of confidence in traditional safeguards. Reduced funding for public defender offices has encouraged plea bargaining from a position of weakness and, in the views of some participants, a progressive ‘dismantling’ of adversariality. Others have argued that the decline in the participation of defence counsel can be compensated for by a more professional and scientifically rigorous investigation by police and prosecution, capitalizing on the supposed benefits of new technologies. Findlay describes this as the ‘reliability model’, a joint enterprise between prosecution and defence involving enhanced technical and professional standards. According to him, adversarial adjudication is imbalanced and adequately funded and simply ‘not up to the task’, whereas his ‘new due process’ shifts the emphasis back to an improved investigation phase. Although Findlay envisages the continuing importance of defence counsel in these new procedures, others are more radical. In Brown’s view:

crime labs can replace part of the function of diminished defense counsel, and can do so in a way likely to garner more sustained political support.
Due Process

In exactly the same way that Jackson has recommended an ‘epistemic shift’ for the International Criminal Court, Brown proposes a refocusing of decision-making away from the public trial to a judicialized pre-trial inquiry, with ‘broad discovery’ for all parties. Like Jackson, he contends that such a move inevitably results from the failures of adversariality ‘to detect factual error’. Neither scholar seems to be aware that these are exactly the same arguments which so fatally damaged adversariality at the beginning of the twentieth century and prepared the way for ‘social defence’ and the horrors of totalitarian justice. We should not make these mistakes twice within a century. To condemn adversarial due process on the basis of its failure to deliver factually accurate outcomes is profoundly to misunderstand its ideology and purpose. Of course it cannot promise the same scientific outcomes as the inquisitorial method but that is not its function, nor does it mean that its place in criminal justice is redundant.

IV. The Global Revolution in Due Process

Ironically, while adversarial due process is coming under increasing attack in the Anglo-American context, it is enjoying a contemporary renaissance elsewhere. As indicated above, attempts to insert due process clauses at a constitutional level have failed comprehensively. However, adversarial due process reforms at the level of criminal procedure codes have achieved spectacular results. Never at any period in the history of the world has the pace of due-process-driven reform across the world been so rapid or so sustained. The global campaign for due process has been waged since the Second World War by an extraordinary variety of international and regional agencies backed by the hegemonic authority of the Western powers and has gathered pace significantly in recent years. First in the field and still exerting considerable influence in the promotion of due process rights, is the United Nations. States parties to the ICCPR who have also opted to ratify the First Optional Protocol voluntarily accept the competence of the Human Rights Council (HRC), which can hear individual petitions from persons who claim to be victims of state violation of Covenant rights. Although lacking an enforcement mechanism, the HRC has developed a considerable body of case law principles, protective of the rights of suspected and accused persons.

Some regional institutions have considerably more teeth. The ECtHR has been aggressive in the development of the fair trial provisions in Article 6 of the ECHR, which represent by far the largest category of cases. After the influx of new accession states which followed the collapse of the Soviet Union, the Court saw its caseload mushroom from under 8,400 cases in 1999 to 61,300 in 2010 and it is no exaggeration to suggest that the activities of the ECtHR have revolutionized European attitudes towards due process in criminal procedure and provided a constant and powerful emphasis on adversariality and rights protection for suspected and accused persons which extends far beyond its regional mandate. The influence of the ECtHR is now truly global, its jurisprudence being cited with approval around the world and even ‘mirrored’ by the practices of the International Criminal Court and other international tribunals.

Since the 1980s, the European Union itself has also played a very significant role in promoting due process protections. The focus was intensified yet further following the Treaty of Lisbon in 2009, after which the Swedish Presidency of the European Union launched its ‘Stockholm Roadmap’, aimed at protecting suspected and accused persons and ensuring them fair trial rights throughout the European Area of Freedom Security and Justice. As a starting point, amendments were introduced to a draft law in the European Parliament establishing a Europe-wide ‘letter of rights’ for suspected persons and in July 2011 a Green Paper on the Application of EU Criminal Justice Legislation in the Field of Detention was published.

Also active in promoting due process reform in the European/Eurasian area is the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe, which works with the Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights (OSCE/ODIHR). These organizations are able to apply considerable pressure on post-Soviet governments in particular, to incorporate due process provisions into their criminal procedure codes, as well as organizing regular summer schools, trial monitoring and regional Criminal Justice Forums for senior officials. National governments have also taken a lead in the international promotion of due process in criminal justice. UK government agencies such as the Department for International Development and the British Council and German agencies such as Deutsche Gesellschaft für Technische Zusammenarbeit (GTZ) GmbH have all played important funding roles although their contributions have been dwarfed by those of the United States.

Since the end of the Cold War, rule of law initiatives undertaken by the United States have promoted a strong due process agenda\textsuperscript{113} a change signalled by the growing ascendancy of new (p. 945) Department of Justice agencies such as the Office of Overseas Prosecutorial Development, Assistance and Training (OPDAT), the International Law Enforcement Academies (ILEAs), and the International Criminal Investigative Training Assistance Program (ICTIAP), over the traditional aid providers such as USAID. Some commentators have seen this shift as a strategic change in US foreign policy goals towards the prosecution of an international ‘war on crime’ aimed in part at the establishment of ‘global governance’ through criminal justice reform.\textsuperscript{114}
Due Process

These agencies deploy staff, usually former US Prosecutors, around the world in support of criminal procedural reform.\textsuperscript{115} Macleod asserts that recipient states are encouraged to devote energies to US-style criminal procedure reforms above other unsubsidized development priorities by the conditionality of wider funding on the achievement of certain benchmarks.\textsuperscript{116} Other critics have suggested that US agencies have favoured plea bargaining and adopted a ‘cookie cutter’ approach to reform where ‘aid providers … treat each nation as unformed dough, onto which the Cookie Cutter of a Western legal system is applied.’\textsuperscript{117} However, there is no doubt that, in collaboration with the American Bar Association (ABA) and US regional organizations such as the Central and Eastern European Law Initiative (ABA/CEELI)\textsuperscript{118} these agencies have made a significant contribution to due process protection around the world.

All these developments have been everywhere promoted and supported by the activism of the international non-governmental organizations (NGO) community whose impact on the due process agenda in criminal justice has been considerable.\textsuperscript{119} Despite questions about their legitimacy,\textsuperscript{120} NGOs such as Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch clearly provide a vital mechanism for providing ‘essential expertise, enhance public support for inter-governmental organizations, assistance in translating norms developed in these organizations into realities on the ground.’\textsuperscript{121}

The outcome of this sustained pressure for due process reform over the past few decades has been dramatic. Adversarial due process reform of criminal justice has swept across Western Europe, enacting profound transformations in Spain in the 1980s, Italy in 1989, France in 2001 and 2004, before moving on to regions as diverse as China,\textsuperscript{122} Japan,\textsuperscript{123} South Korea,\textsuperscript{124} and Taiwan.\textsuperscript{125} In Latin America 80 per cent of all countries, including Guatemala,\textsuperscript{126} Nicaragua,\textsuperscript{127} Mexico,\textsuperscript{128} Chile,\textsuperscript{129} and Argentina\textsuperscript{130} have abandoned inquisitorial for more adversarial procedures within a decade.\textsuperscript{131} Langer has described recent changes in which 14 countries and numerous provinces produced entirely new criminal procedural codes within 15 years as ‘the deepest transformation that Latin American criminal procedure has undergone in two centuries’.\textsuperscript{132}

The fall of the Soviet Union and its East European satellite regimes after 1991 has also had a dramatic impact. In 2001 Russia enacted what has been described as the ‘most progressive Criminal Procedure Code in the Newly Independent States’\textsuperscript{133} which emphasized adversariality as a central guiding principle.\textsuperscript{134} Lithuania in 2003,\textsuperscript{135} Estonia in 2004,\textsuperscript{136} Bulgaria in 2005,\textsuperscript{137} and Georgia in 2009, for example, all attempted similar adversarial due process reform and this pattern has been repeated in most of the states of the former Soviet bloc. The international tribunals which have been developed around the world since 1993 were also deeply influenced by adversarial principles.\textsuperscript{138} In brief, this shift towards adversarial due process in criminal procedure, which has been likened by some scholars to the reception of Roman law in the European \textit{ius commune} period,\textsuperscript{139} has become one of the most important and ubiquitous cultural developments of our generation.

V. Conclusion

These changes are a vivid reminder of the continuing power and importance of the idea of due process. As a constitutional precept, as an analytical concept, and finally as a principle of adversarial rights-based reform, it still exercises a powerful gravitational pull. Perhaps it is the sheer versatility of the due process idea which is an essential element of its enduring appeal. The argument here, however, has been that whilst the concept of due process has not succeeded in lodging itself internationally at the level of constitutional law, it has nevertheless achieved a remarkable global proliferation in procedural law from the late eighteenth century (p. 947) and again, after the collapse of the earlier movement, in the period since the Second World War. Although these events have been to a large extent determined by political change, the inherently unstable history of due process suggests that the doctrine, viewed in isolation, is particularly vulnerable to attack. Analysis of due process as a separate and semi-detachable element of justice—as dictated by the priority given to it as a constitutional principle—has left it very vulnerable to critiques based on rationality and efficiency and has contributed to its catastrophic decline in the early years of the twentieth century. Exactly the same arguments have been levelled against it in recent decades, when due process adversaruality has again been accused of undermining the scientific rationality of the trial process and impeding crime control. It has been proposed here that one solution may lie in a wider approach to the idea of due process. In this view, rights-based (adversarial) procedure could be seen to contribute only one element—albeit an urgent and crucial one—to an acceptable understanding of criminal justice. A broader concept might engage productively with wider debates about the tripartite relationship between adversarial rights, rational efficiency, and democratic participation in criminal justice, thereby suggesting an outline for the missing theory of ‘due’ process referred to above.

Bibliography

Bibliography

Adhémar Esmein, A History of Continental Criminal Procedure with Special Reference to France (1914)

C.H. McIlwain, ‘Due Process of Law in Magna Carta’ (1914) 14 Columbia Law Review 27

Herbert Packer, The Limits of the Criminal Sanction (1968)

Ryan Williams, ‘The (One and Only) Substantive Due Process Clause’ (2010) 120 Yale Law Journal 408

Notes:

(5) 28 Edw III, c 3.

(10) Williams (n 3), 435ff.

(13) Williams (n 3), 500ff.

(14) Article 7.

(15) Article 20.

(16) Section 7.

(18) Ibid 493ff.

(19) Ibid 500.

(20) Ibid 497.

(23) Mendelson (n 17), 499.

(24) Article 7 (right to freedom), Art 8 (right to a fair trial).

(25) See eg ECtHR, Jalloh v Germany, App no 54810/00, 11 July 2006, para 49.

(32) Ibid 75.

(34) ECtHR, App no 33402/96, 2 July 2002.

(45) Packer (n 36), 153.

(46) Ibid 158.

(47) Ibid 159.

(49) Packer (n 36), 163.

(50) Ibid 165.

(51) Ibid 153.

(53) Packer (n 36), 153.

(55) Ibid 688ff.

(57) Griffith (n 48), 369.

(58) Ibid 373.

(61) Ibid 316.

(62) Ibid 329.

(63) Packer (n 36), 165.

(67) See Vogler (n 65), 45ff.

(70) Vogler (n 65), 131ff.

(71) The reasons for the transition have been widely debated. See Vogler (n 65), 140ff.

(73) Of course, such protection can never in practice be absolute as some commentators have endeavoured to suggest. See Paul Roberts, ‘Comparative Criminal Justice Goes Global’ (2008) 28 Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 369, 380.

(74) Adhémar Esmein, A History of Continental Criminal Procedure with Special Reference to France (1914), 408.

(75) Ibid 510.

(76) Raffaele Garofalo, Criminology (1968), 344ff.

(77) Vogler (n 65), 61ff.

(79) Vogler (n 65), 147ff.

(82) Vogler (n 65), 61ff.

(84) Vogler (n 65), 152ff.

(93) Ibid 174.

(96) Brown (n 94), 1644.

(102) Trechsel (n 26), 89ff.

(110) See (http://www.osce.org/odihr/69446).

Due Process

(114) Ibid 102ff.

(115) Ibid 124.

(121) Oberleitner (n 119), 169.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Richard Vogler</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Richard Vogler is Senior Lecturer in Law, Sussex Law School</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Associative Rights (The Rights to the Freedoms of Petition, Assembly, and Association)

Oxford Handbooks Online

Associative Rights (The Rights to the Freedoms of Petition, Assembly, and Association)
Ulrich K. Preuß
The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Constitutional Law
Edited by Michel Rosenfeld and András Sajó

Print Publication Date: May 2012
Online Publication Date: Nov 2012
DOI: 10.1093/oxfordhb/9780199578610.013.0047

Abstract and Keywords
Associative rights cover those constitutional guarantees which deal with the joint actions of individuals. The promise of associative rights to individuals is the most effective means of their empowerment in the polity. At the same time, this guarantee gives rise to a decentralized power structure in society which has a major bearing on the modes of how collective decisions are made in the polity. Three constitutional rights are pertinent in this respect, ranging in the order of increasing empowerment and, consequently, structural effects on the polity: the right to petition for the redress of grievances, the right to the freedom of assembly, and the right to the freedom of association. This article presents a comparative overview of associative rights and considers only those constitutions which effectively shape the character of the polity, where, in other words, collective actions of citizens are an inherent element of an entrenched sphere of socio-political autonomy.

Keywords: associative right, joint action, constitutional right, collection action, constitution, polity, redress of grievances, freedom of assembly, freedom of association

I. Introduction: Historical and Socio-Political Context 949
II. The Right to Petition for the Redress of Grievances 949
III. The Right to the Freedom of Assembly 951
   1. Historical Background and Present-Day Constitutional Foundations 951
   2. The Physical Dimension of Assemblies and its Constitutional Implications 951
IV. The Right to the Freedom of Association 953
   1. Historical Conditions 953
      (a) Constitutional Origins 953
      (b) The Twentieth Century: Modern Mass Democracy: the ‘Society of Organizations’ 955
   2. Constitutional Guarantees on National Levels 956
   3. International Guarantees of the Freedom of Association 957
   4. The Scope of the Freedom of Association 959
   5. Legal Design, Legal and Factual Restrictions of the Freedom of Association 961
      (a) Legally Imposed Membership 961
      (b) Restrictions for the Public Service 962
      (c) The Faint Borderline Between Freedom of Association and Conspiracy 963
      (d) Factual State Interferences 964

Page 1 of 17
Associative Rights (The Rights to the Freedoms of Petition, Assembly, and Association)

I. Introduction: Historical and Socio-Political Context

‘The most natural privilege of man, next to the right of acting for himself, is that of combining his exertions with those of his fellow creatures and of acting in common with them. The right of association therefore appears to me almost as inalienable in its nature as the right of personal liberty’—arguably this statement by Alexis de Tocqueville in ‘Democracy in America’ is the most concise depiction of the subject of this chapter. Associative rights cover those constitutional guarantees which deal with joint actions of individuals. The focus is on the constitutional implications of the fact that the coordinated action of individuals entails a new type of social activity which is qualitatively different from individual actions, even individual mass action. It is the source of power which inheres in the association of individuals as such. As Hannah Arendt observed, ‘power is never the property of an individual; it belongs to a group and remains in existence only so long as the group keeps together.’ Hence the promise of associative rights to individuals is the most effective means of their empowerment in the polity. At the same time, this guarantee gives rise to a decentralized power structure in society which has a major bearing on the modes of how collective decisions are made in the polity.

Three constitutional rights are pertinent in this respect, ranging here in the order of increasing empowerment and, consequently, structural effects on the polity: the right to petition for the redress of grievances, the right to the freedom of assembly, and the right to the freedom of association. Needless to say, in the subsequent comparative overview only those constitutions are considered which effectively shape the character of the polity, where, in other words, collective actions of citizens are an inherent element of an entrenched sphere of socio-political autonomy.

II. The Right to Petition for the Redress of Grievances

Among the fundamental rights codified in national constitutions and international covenants the right to petition generally receives minor attention. Although it has been codified in most EU member state constitutions and in the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights as a distinct right, its political and associative dimension has been marginal so far. It is lacking in virtually all international human rights covenants. In the United States it has been absorbed by the freedom of expression, although it is expressly mentioned in the First Amendment alongside the freedoms of speech, the press, and assembly. The obviously inferior significance of the right to petition is understandable in the light of the manifold judicial and political vehicles of which citizens dispose who live in constitutional states and want to voice individual and collective concerns, ranging from recourse to the courts through their right to democratic representation to the guarantees of free speech and of free media.

Yet there are tendencies towards a renaissance of the political and associative character of the right to petition which has a venerable history as a vehicle of political demands before the rise of the constitutional state. In its pre-modern version, it can be traced back to the Roman Empire and, in the Anglo-Saxon constitutional history, to the eleventh century from where it advanced into a human right codified in the first modern bills of rights. Originally, the right to petition served as an individual legal redress which in England since the fourteenth century evolved into a common law right of appeal. Its political dimension as a right to legislative hearing unfolded in the seventeenth century in the struggles between the Parliament and the Stuarts and became part of the Bill of Rights of 1689. In the United States, the First Amendment clause stemmed from the right to petition local assemblies in colonial America, and thus had, next to a judicial function, a political dimension from the outset. In both dimensions, the right to petition implied the right to a fair hearing and consideration. This revealed that ‘the interests served by petitioning go to the very heart of the principle of popular sovereignty’. The lack of procedural statutory rules about the enforcement of the right entailed its institutional fragility, which turned into outright collapse when petitions became an instrument of the expression of collective dissent, especially in the political struggles about the abolition of slavery in the first half of the nineteenth century. The right to petition gradually developed into a version of the freedom of expression, shaking off the right to fair hearing, consideration and response.

In the European context, the right to petition has preserved its original content, namely the right of a petitioner not only to voice requests, but to obtain a fair hearing and handling of her concern and an official notice. The memory of its historical relationship to the principle of popular sovereignty may be indicated in those constitutions which stipulate the right not only as an individual, but expressly as a collective right as well, or which designate the parliament as the main addressee of petitions. Still, there are few signs, if any, that petitions to parliaments have affected their agenda in any considerable manner.15
Associative Rights (The Rights to the Freedoms of Petition, Assembly, and Association)

On the other hand, in countries where practices of direct democracy are constitutionally prevented (like in the United States or in Germany, on the federal level respectively) the use of mass petitions may evolve as a surrogate for deficient plebiscites. Such a tendency is now facilitated by the internet which allows the collection of huge numbers of supporters for a petition within extremely short periods of time.16 Thus, in 2005 the German Bundestag established an e-petition platform on which public petitions are published and can be co-signed by supporters.17 Submitters of such petitions which reach more than 50,000 signatures within the first three weeks of publication on the e-petition platform are heard in person by the Committee on Petitions. The most successful e-petition in Germany reached a total of 134,015 co-signatures within four days. The parliaments in Great Britain, Scotland, South Korea, and of Queensland Australia use this instrument as well.18

III. The Right to the Freedom of Assembly

1. Historical Background and Present-Day Constitutional Foundations

The historical origins of the freedom of assembly date back to eighteenth-century England and North America where the first meetings were held for the public deliberation and debate of petitions to the parliaments. Article XVI of the Constitution of Pennsylvania of 1776, the first constitutional codification of the freedom of assembly, exhibits this inherently political character of this right and its relationship to the principle of popular sovereignty: ‘That the people have a right to assemble together, to consult for their common good, to instruct their representatives, and to apply to the legislature for redress of grievances, by address, petition, or remonstrance.’ The wording of the First Amendment of the US Constitution resonates this context by connecting the freedoms of expression, of assembly, and of petition.19 However, in the current legal and political discourse of the United States the freedom of assembly has experienced the same fate as the right to petition, namely to be ignored as a distinct right and to be absorbed by the freedom of expression.20

The first constitutional codification of the freedom of peaceful assembly on the European continent occurred in the French Constitution of 1791. It was subject to extensive police regulations, a condition which moulded the restrictive French tradition of the freedom of assembly throughout the nineteenth century. The other constitutional states of the European continent largely followed the model of the Belgian Constitution of 1831, which in its Article 19 introduced the distinction between outdoor and other assemblies, whereby only the former were subject to restrictions in cases of endangerment of the public order.

Today, the freedom of association is codified as a fundamental right in the constitutions of all EU member states, in the United Kingdom in the Human Rights Act.23

2. The Physical Dimension of Assemblies and its Constitutional Implications

The freedom of assembly is an expressive right in a particular sense. An assembly is characterized by the physical presence of a multitude of individuals who are aligned by the common purpose to collectively communicate a cause to the general public. While the expression of their views is protected by the freedom of speech and can be performed more and more through the immaterial medium of the internet, it is the mere bodily togetherness of a group of people in a particular place at a particular time which creates a public sphere and political debate. This suggests a plebiscitarian, perhaps even plebeian, overtone to this right. Thus, due to its inherently physically expressive character, an assembly may degenerate into collective violence and actuate dangers to public security or public order.27 Borderline cases are sit-down blockades (eg in front of military installations) as means of public protest. The German Federal Constitutional Court has recognized them as constitutionally protected assemblies as long as they are peaceful.28

The freedom of assembly means first and foremost the right to assemble without prior notification, requirement of permission, or any other condition which hampers the peaceful gathering of individuals. However, the authorities need prior knowledge of place, time, and expected number of participants in a demonstration in order to protect the rights and interests of uninvolved persons and of the public in general. Hence content-neutral regulations including the obligation of prior notification of an assembly are consistent with the constitutional right to the freedom of assembly as long as they do not impede the communicative dimension of an assembly.\textsuperscript{30} Nor must they inhibit spontaneous demonstrations. The European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) seems to represent the prevailing opinion of constitutional courts in its statement ‘that the right to hold spontaneous demonstrations may override the obligation to give prior notification to public assemblies only in special circumstances, namely if an immediate response to a current event is warranted in the form of a demonstration.’\textsuperscript{31}
Associative Rights (The Rights to the Freedoms of Petition, Assembly, and Association)

Freedom of association involves the freedom from fear of actual or potential participants to be sanctioned or to suffer other disadvantages for making use of that fundamental right. One new instrument to create diffuse anxiety in this respect (and thus to restrict the freedom of assembly) is the taking of overall images (camera-monitor transmission) of the participants of assemblies and the non-incident-related recording and stockpiling of these data. In a recent case concerning the police law of a German state, the Federal Constitutional Court issued a temporary injunction which limited the relevant powers of the police.\textsuperscript{32} The final decision in this case is still pending.

A further issue which is closely related to the physical dimension of the freedom of assembly is the question of the right place for an assembly. Public streets, places, and parks are the private property of the municipalities or the state; however, their property rights are restricted by their function as a public forum. In the public forum in which communicative activities (p. 953) typically unfold, restrictions on their use for assemblies are only constitutional if they are ‘are narrowly drawn to achieve a compelling state interest’\textsuperscript{33} and content-neutral (eg noise near a school, near a clinic, and the like). Less obvious is the degree of constitutional protection with respect to privately owned spaces which are open to the public for functional use (eg shopping malls) or which have a formally private status but are owned by the state or other public authorities (eg airports, railway stations). As to the first constellation, in 1976 the US Supreme Court denied that the prohibition of a picketing line in a shopping centre by the owner implicated the First Amendment.\textsuperscript{34} It overruled a decision of 1968 which had argued the reverse.\textsuperscript{35} In a similar constellation relating to a dispute in the United Kingdom, the ECtHR did not rule out the possibility that the government had a positive obligation to protect European Convention rights by restricting property rights, but found no violation of Article 11 of the Convention in the concrete case.\textsuperscript{36} As to the second constellation, the US Supreme Court denied that airports owned and regulated by a public authority are a public forum and accepted the prohibition of the sale or distribution of merchandise including the sale of literature within those locations.\textsuperscript{37} In a similar case, the German Federal Constitutional Court determined that a protest rally in the terminal of Frankfurt Airport was protected by the constitutional freedom of assembly because corporations in which public authorities hold a majority stake are directly bound by the fundamental rights of the Constitution.\textsuperscript{38}

iv. The Right to the Freedom of Association

1. Historical Conditions

(a) Constitutional Origins

Among the fundamental rights guaranteed by the constitutions of modern states, the freedom of association is a laggard. It is an offspring of the nineteenth century. Neither the Bill of Rights of the US Constitution nor the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen—two pioneering documents of eighteenth-century constitutionalism—mention the freedom of association.

Obviously, the French revolutionaries were deeply inspired by Rousseau’s individualistic construction of democracy and its incompatibility with any kind of intermediate groups which were suspected to endanger the purity of the general will.\textsuperscript{39} This ideological thrust amalgamated into two aligned tendencies: the revolution’s irreconcilable opposition to the ancien régime in which intermediary forces had been the pillars of its feudo-absolutist rule,\textsuperscript{40} and the rise of economic individualism which recognized only contracts as the appropriate social form of liberty dictated by reason itself.\textsuperscript{41} Unsurprisingly, particular groups, especially collective actions of workers for the improvement of their working conditions, were regarded as a threat to the new individualistic order; the Loi le Chapelier of 14 June 1791 unequivocally attests to that apprehension. Throughout the whole nineteenth century the creation of voluntary associations was subject to severe restrictions which were not abolished until 1901.\textsuperscript{42} It took another 70 years before the French Constitutional Council recognized the freedom of association as one of the ‘fundamental principles acknowledged in the laws of the Republic’.\textsuperscript{43}
Hence it comes as no surprise that most constitutions of the twentieth century focus on these mass organizations dependent workers, the latter are institutions of civic integration. Political parties. The former are means of functional, that is, collective representation of the economic interests of stakeholders who pooled their interests in order to increase their political influence through collective action. The ‘pseudo-constitutional system’ (Holborn) of Bismarck's authoritarian Reich fostered the development of power-related interest aggregation while it was suspicious of all kinds of civic activism. Associations were perceived as potential threats to the stability of the social and political order, and ‘political associations’ were subject to constant police control. The Germans had to wait until 1919 when for the first time the Weimar Constitution guaranteed the freedom of association without the requirement of prior state permission, complemented by the separately codified right of every individual and every occupation or profession to form associations to safeguard and improve working and economic conditions.

(b) The Twentieth Century: Modern Mass Democracy: the ‘Society of Organizations’

In fact, it was no earlier than in the twentieth century when the liberal ‘society of individuals’ turned into a society of organizations that the freedom of association became a pivotal issue in almost all constitutional states. As an effect of the accomplishment of universal male and female suffrage which was largely concluded after the First World War in Europe and the United States ‘the entry of the lower classes into the arena of national politics’ required new institutional patterns of social and political organization. Moreover, after a war the popular masses typically demand major improvements both of their socio-economic situation and of their status in the polity as a compensation for their war-time sufferings and sacrifices; this is what happened in Europe after the two world wars in 1919 and 1945. Two kinds of organization became the cornerstones of mass democracy: labour unions and political parties. The former are means of functional, that is, collective representation of the economic interests of dependent workers, the latter are institutions of civic integration. In the twentieth century both types of organization were crucial for the status of citizenship in modern mass democracy.

Hence it comes as no surprise that most constitutions of the twentieth century focus on these mass organizations...
when they stipulate the freedom of association, albeit with different intensity. Germany's Weimar Constitution of 1919, the first attempt to reconcile the principles (p. 956) of liberal constitutionalism with the requirements of class-divided mass democracy,\textsuperscript{60} guaranteed the freedom of association of German citizens in its Article 124 and added in Article 159 the specific ‘right to form associations to safeguard and improve working and economic conditions guaranteed to every individual and to every occupation or profession’—largely viewed as the fundamental right of trade unions. Although the political system of the Weimar Republic was based upon the principle of party competition, an analogous special guarantee for political parties was missing. After the Second World War, a general tendency towards the constitutionalization of unions (and like professional interest groups) and political parties took hold. The French Constitution of 1946 incorporated in its Preamble the rights and freedoms of man and the citizen of the anti-associational Declaration of Rights of 1789, but added a list of political, economic, and social principles ‘as being especially necessary to our times’. Whereas political parties were ignored, everyone’s rights to form unions, to belong to the union of one’s choice, to defend one’s rights and interests through union action, and the right to strike was guaranteed. Obviously this constitutional pledge foreshadowed the right of everyone ‘to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests’, stipulated in Article 23(4) of the UN Universal Declaration of Human Rights which was mainly drafted by the French jurist, diplomat, and politician René Cassin and proclaimed by General Assembly on 10 December 1948.

2. Constitutional Guarantees on National Levels

The first document which in Europe after the Second World War guaranteed the freedom of association and, separately, the rights to form unions and to strike plus to ‘freely associate in political parties in order to contribute by democratic methods to determine national policy’ was the constitution of Italy of 27 December 1947.\textsuperscript{61} West Germany’s Basic Law of 23 May 1949 followed suit.\textsuperscript{62} The French Constitution of the Fifth Republic of 1958 incorporated the above Preamble to the Constitution of 1946 and added in its Article 4 the guarantee of the freedom to form political parties. Remarkably, this guarantee is codified in its section ‘On Sovereignty’, while an individual right to the freedom of association is still absent.

The constitutions drafted after the ‘third wave of democratization’ in the twentieth century\textsuperscript{63} in the now post-communist countries of Eastern and Central Europe are particularly focused on protection against any kind of compulsory association in state-controlled monopolistic mass organizations. Thus, the very first sentence of the Constitution of Hungary\textsuperscript{64}—a series of patchwork amendments of the Constitution of 1949 that added up to a new document\textsuperscript{65}—begins with the words: ‘In order to facilitate a peaceful political transition to a constitutional state, establish a multi-party system …’\textsuperscript{66} and envisages a pluralistic system of interest (p. 957) representation (Art 4). The Polish Constitution of 1997 guarantees the freedom for the creation and functioning of political parties, trade unions, socio-occupational organizations of farmers, societies, citizens’ movements, and foundations (Art 12), laying emphasis on their strictly voluntary character and banning ‘political parties and other organizations whose programmes are based upon totalitarian methods’ (Art 13). Similarly, the Bulgarian Constitution of 1991 proclaims in its very first article that ‘No part of the people, no political party nor any other organization, state institution or individual shall usurp the expression of the popular sovereignty.’ This is corroborated by the stipulation in Article 11 which establishes the ‘fundamental’ principle that political activity in the Republic of Bulgaria shall be founded on the principle of political pluralism and that ‘No political party or ideology shall be proclaimed or affirmed as a party or ideology of the State’. Within this framework, the bill of rights guarantees the citizens’ freedom to associate (Art 44). Articles 49 and 50 take a corporatist view in that they, conscious of the different socio-economic statuses of employees and employers, distinguish between the freedom of the former ‘to form trade union organizations and alliances in defence of their interests related to work and social security’ including the right to strike and the freedom of the latter ‘to associate in defence of their economic interests’. Incidentally, the same distinction is made by the Constitution of South Africa, another country of transition from authoritarian to democratic governance: in its bill of rights it distinguishes the freedom of association (Art 18)—set in close neighbourhood to the freedoms of expression, petition, and assembly—from rights concerning trade, occupation, profession, and labour relations. It guarantees separately the corporatist freedoms of workers to form and join labour unions, to participate in their activities, and to strike, and of employers to form interest organizations and to participate in their activities. Moreover, those organizations enjoy a high degree of autonomy due to the constitutional right to determine their administration, programmes, and activities (Art 23).

In the United Kingdom, the freedom of association is guaranteed in the Civil Rights Act of 1998\textsuperscript{67} which was enacted in order to give effect to rights and freedoms guaranteed under the European Convention on Human Rights; it merely repeats the Convention’s guarantee of the freedom of association (Art 11). Much more detailed regulations of the corporatist dimension of associative freedom, namely the industrial relations between employers and trade unions, are stipulated in the Employment Relations Act 1999. By contrast, political parties are largely regarded as factual phenomena of political life as there is no legal regime except the mere obligation to register according to the Registration of Political Parties Act of 1998.
Associative Rights (The Rights to the Freedoms of Petition, Assembly, and Association)

Most international human rights documents include the guarantee of the freedom of association, if with different emphasis. The UN Declaration of 10 December 1948 proclaims the freedom of association in close relationship to the liberal freedoms of expression and assembly and includes the negative right not to be compelled to belong to an association (Art 20). Separately, in Article 23 which deals with individual rights in the area of labour relations everyone’s ‘right to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests’ is codified in paragraph 4.

In the two UN Human Rights Covenants of 16 December 1966—the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR)—the individualistic-associative and the collective-corporatist dimensions of the freedom of association are carefully differentiated. While the former codifies comprehensively everyone’s ‘right to freedom of association with others, including the right to form and join trade unions for the protection of his interests’ (Art 22(1)), the latter specifies, unsurprisingly, the socio-economic and collective significance of this right. Thus, in Article 8, everyone’s right to form and to join unions, the unions’ rights to ‘function freely’ and to organize nationally and internationally, and the right (of unionized workers) to strike is codified in Article 8(1). These rights have been concretized by the institutions and procedures of the International Labour Organization (ILO) which have been established for the purpose of promoting respect for trade union rights in law and in fact. Among its numerous rules and principles, the Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organise Convention of 17 June 1948(72) (No 87), ratified by 145 states, and the Right to Organise and Collective Bargaining Convention of 8 June 1949(72) (No 98), ratified by 154 states (both as of 1 January 2006) are the most relevant ones.

Among the regional International Human Rights charters, the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (ECHR) of 4 November 1950(73) is the only one which is enforced by an international court, the ECtHR. Individuals, non-governmental organizations, or groups of individuals can sue any contracting party for having violated one of their rights stipulated in the Convention (Art 34). As a counterweight to this rather bold move, the Convention includes only a relatively small number of the well-established fundamental rights of liberal constitutionalism. Thus, Article 11(1) of the Convention pools the ‘rights to freedom of peaceful assembly and to freedom of association with others, including the right to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.’ In its jurisprudence, the ECtHR had to deal quite frequently with the ban on political parties in member states, the judgments about the prohibitions of the Turkish Communist Party (1998) and of the Turkish Welfare Party (2003) arguably being the major cases in this field which, however, is not the subject of this chapter. Among the cases not related to political parties, the scope of the rights of trade unions play a prominent role. In a recent landmark decision the Court has revised its former stance ‘that the right to bargain collectively and to enter into collective agreements does not constitute an inherent element of Article 11’ and, having regard to the developments in labour law, both international and national, and to the practice of Contracting States in such matters’, recognized that ‘the right to bargain collectively with the employer has, in principle, become one of the essential elements of the ‘right to form and to join trade unions for the protection of [one’s] interests’ set forth in Article 11 of the Convention ... ’.

4. The Scope of the Freedom of Association

The concept of association encompasses an extremely broad spectrum of social relationships in which individuals act in concert on the basis of some at least minimal institutional consolidation. The social areas and the social functions of associations diverge considerably. In a rough classification, one can distinguish (1) associations in the field of economic and labour relations (associations of employers, employees, professions, producers, consumers, economic lobbying groups); (2) associations in the field of charities and analogous non-profit welfare institutions; (3) associations in the field of sports, leisure, and entertainment; (4) associations in the field of religion, culture, art, and science; (5) non-partisan political associations and advocacy groups; and (6) private social clubs.
This functional variety translates into a differentiation of structural features which affect both the character of conflicts concerning associative activities and the need for constitutional protection. For purely self-sufficient social associations with a small and select membership, the freedom of association has another meaning than for anonymous mass organizations which mainly provide services to their membership, and it is once more different for mass organizations which strive for a public cause or for political power. A rough distinction may be drawn between ‘expressive’ and ‘instrumental’ associations which Stuart White has suggested. Expressive associations are communities ‘whose members are united by sharing a distinctive set of religious or ideological beliefs’. In contrast, instrumental associations are organizations ‘whose primary purpose is to secure for its members improved access to strategic goods, such as income and wealth.’ Economic and professional interest groups and trade unions are the obvious examples. A similar, but somewhat narrower distinction was introduced by Justice Brennan in Roberts v United States Jaycees. He distinguished between the intrinsic and the instrumental element of the freedom of association, the former (intimate relationships like marriage, family, and friendship) having intrinsic value for personal liberty, the latter being instrumental for the promotion or defence of First Amendment rights.

Whether purely economic aggregates like joint-stock companies qualify for the freedom of association is debatable. In a landmark case concerning the German Co-Determination Act of 1976, the Federal Constitutional Court expressed doubts in this respect arguing that fundamental freedoms including the freedom of association protect primarily the freedom of persons, not economic functions like the collection and use of capital.

The right to the freedom of association protects the positive freedom of association, that is, the individuals’ right to create, to enter, and to remain in an association. Moreover, it contains the association’s right to exist and its right to self-determination (autonomy), that is, the right to decide about the admission and exclusion of members, to establish rules about its internal order including the rights and obligations of its members, and to decide autonomously about the change of its purpose, its dissolution, or its integration into a federation of like associations. The external activity of an association—for example the operation of a publishing house or of sporting activities—is not protected by the freedom of association but by the pertinent guarantee (eg right to freedom of the press, or to the free development of the personality, respectively). Consequently, the limits of those freedoms, not of the freedom of association apply. Only where the external activity of an association is part of the (p. 960) constitutional guarantee—for example in the Article 11 ECHR guarantee of everyone’s ‘right to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests’—these activities, arguably including strikes, lie within the scope of the freedom of association.

The constitutional guarantee includes the negative freedom of association, that is, the individual’s freedom to abstain from and to leave an association and not to be deprived of opportunities and benefits by reason of non-membership in a particular association (eg political party, trade union, scientific society). One issue which plays a major role in countries with a strong corporatist tradition (like Germany or Austria) is the question of whether the freedom of association protects against compulsory membership in legally established public corporations such as chambers of commerce, crafts, lawyers, or medical doctors. The German Federal Constitutional Court has consistently, although not unchallenged, held that the freedom of association protects only against compulsory membership in associations of private law; protection against compulsory membership in public corporations is guaranteed by the (much weaker) right to free development of one’s personality.

Also so-called ‘closed shop’ or ‘union shop’ regimes raise the question of their compatibility with the negative freedom of association. Under such regimes, employment in a particular firm is conditional upon union membership. As the preparatory notes on Article 11 of the ECHR attest, in 1950 there were several founding European countries in which this system existed, whilst at the beginning of the twenty-first century, according to the account of the ECHR, it subsists only in Denmark and Iceland.

Judging the compatibility of the closed shop system with the Convention’s guarantee of the freedom of association (Art 11), the ECtHR has taken a somewhat ambiguous stance. In a judgment of 1981 it evaded an answer to that question and satisfied itself with the assumption that Article 11 does not guarantee the negative aspect of that freedom on the same footing as the positive aspect, and that therefore ‘compulsion to join a particular trade union may not always be contrary to the Convention’. In a more recent case, it slightly changed the said assumption and stated that it ‘does not in principle exclude that the negative and the positive aspects of the Article 11 right should be afforded the same level of protection in the area under consideration.’ While according to the Court this assessment does not exclude closed-shop agreements between unions and employers ‘which run counter to the freedom of choice of the individual inherent in Article 11’, the Contracting State's margin of appreciation ‘must be considered reduced. In the Danish cases at hand, the Court considered it to be a violation of a person's freedom of association to be compelled to become a member of a specific trade union in order to be employed. Note that in these cases the Court did not assert a horizontal effect of Article 11 of the Convention; rather, it judged whether the Contracting State had violated its obligation under the Convention to secure to the applicants under domestic law their right to freedom of association.

In the United States, the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947 bans closed shops but does not outlaw union shops, although states can prohibit them through so-called right-to-work laws. It seems that the free-rider problem is now largely solved by diverse union security agreements according to which employers collect dues from the employees for the union without committing them to union membership. Obviously this kind of burden-sharing of non-members is not a matter of freedom of association and hence irrelevant for this chapter.

Both the positive and the negative freedoms of association are directed against encroachment by public authorities; they have no horizontal effect. Although especially mass organizations with a monopoly over resources (eg trade unions or professional associations) are in a position to neglect the interests of outsiders and of internal minorities, the freedom of association does not confer protection against the power of an association; notably it does not require that their internal organization must conform to democratic principles. However, this does not mean that the freedom of association grants associations unlimited powers over their members or outsiders. The now widely recognized protective dimension of fundamental rights and the general duty of the state to pursue the public interest includes its obligation to regulate the conduct of private power-holders, especially of monopolistic associations (eg imposing rules against arbitrary exclusion of members, or against discrimination).

5. Legal Design, Legal and Factual Restrictions of the Freedom of Association

The freedom of association is neither self-executive nor unlimited. Just as most other freedom rights it requires legal design and limits which compatibilize it with conflicting freedoms of others and with the public interest. Statutes which establish rules about the formation of associations, their internal organization, and their financial affairs are enabling, not restricting, devices. However, the borderline between enabling and constraining devices is equivocal. It is a matter of debate whether, for instance, section 46 of the British Trade Union Act 1992 which establishes the duty of the union to hold elections for certain positions is enabling or restricting the members’ freedom of association by restricting the association's autonomy. Legal restrictions of the freedom of association have to conform to the principle of proportionality, that is, they have to be appropriate and necessary and must not encroach excessively upon the protected freedom.

(a) Legally Imposed Membership

As mentioned in the previous section, the freedom of association includes the association's right to decide autonomously about the admission and exclusion of its members; the legal duty to accept the membership of an unwanted person interferes with this right. The US Supreme Court dealt with different variants of this question. Based upon the above-mentioned distinction between intimate and expressive associations, the Court stated that the degree of constitutional protection varies for these two types of association. For the former, the Bill of Rights must 'afford a substantial measure of sanctuary from unjustified interference by the State'; the freedom of the latter can be restricted by state regulations for the sake of compelling state interests. In the Roberts case, the Court held that the state's interest in eradicating discrimination against its female citizens was compelling and justified the restriction of the association's autonomy. Four years later, the Court qualified this regulation-friendly stance with respect to expressive associations and admitted that the freedom of expressive associations may also require the confinement of its membership to those 'who share the same sex, for example, or the same religion'. Finally, in Boy Scouts of America v Jones in 2000, the Court, upholding the distinction between intimate and expressive associations, specified the scope of the latter's protection in situations where the forced inclusion of an unwanted person—in this case, an openly self-declared homosexual—affected the expression of the association's values and mission. This line of argument was extended to political parties in California Democratic Party v Jones in which the Court denied the constitutionality of so-called 'blanket' primaries in which each voter's ballot lists every candidate regardless of party affiliation and allows the voter to choose freely among them. Blanket primaries violate the parties' freedom of association in its expressive dimension because they force them 'to associate with—to have their nominees, and hence their positions, determined by—those who, at best, have refused to affiliate with the party, and, at worst, have expressly affiliated with a rival.'
The issue of legally imposed unwanted companionship also came up in the above-mentioned case of the German Co-Determination Act of 1976, according to which the board of governors of companies above a certain size must consist of employee and shareholder representatives in equal measure, whereby about one-third of the employee representatives may include union representatives not affiliated to the company. The Federal Constitutional Court reasoned that the personal element in the constitution of joint-stock companies had only marginal significance. Hence, recognizing the legislator’s broad discretion to find a proper balance between the affected companies’ freedom and the public interest, it held that the Co-Determination Act did not violate the companies’ freedom of association.98

(b) Restrictions for the Public Service

An issue which pertains to the right to form and to join trade unions is the question of whether certain groups of the population may be excluded from the enjoyment of this right due to their special responsibilities and the functional necessities of their work: the military and police personnel, and possibly all employees of the civil service. This question not only includes the permissibility of strikes and similar collective action in a labour dispute, but the (p. 963) appropriate methods of regulating labour relations in those spheres. Constitutions are largely equivocal because the relevant stipulations, if there are any at all, embody compromises which leave much room for interpretation. Ultimately it is the business of the courts to find an answer which is acceptable for the involved collective actors, the affected outsiders, and society at large.

The South African Defence Act, 44 of 1957 had denied the permanent members of the military force to join trade unions and to participate in their activities. The Constitutional Court of South Africa declared these restrictions unconstitutional and invalid, with the exception of the prohibition of their participation in strikes.99 This jurisprudence is largely in accordance with the guidelines of the ILO which establish that the right to strike may be restricted or prohibited: (1) in the public service only for public servants exercising authority in the name of the State; or (2) in essential services in the strict sense of the term (that is, services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population).100

Similarly, in a recent decision the ECtHR accepted that certain categories of civil servants could be prohibited from taking strike action, but stated that the ban did not extend to all public servants or to employees of state-run commercial or industrial companies.101

(c) The Faint Borderline Between Freedom of Association and Conspiracy

Generally, solitary conduct which is not prohibited by law may not be defined as unlawful if it is performed in an associative mode.102 But exceptions may exist. An individual’s intention to commit a crime, even the mere preparation of a criminal act which has not yet reached the stage of an attempt, is usually exempt from punishment, but it may become a punishable act if performed in association—here the associative mode of an otherwise harmless conduct generates a threat to society and turns into punishable conspiracy.103

Sometimes the law which imposes limits on the freedom of association is so vaguely worded that the boundary between conduct within the scope of associational freedom and illicit conspiracy is not easily drawn. Thus, in the heyday of the Cold War, the US Supreme Court affirmed the conviction of leading members of the US Communist Party based on the Smith Act of 1940 which, among other things, made unlawful and punishable any attempt ‘to organize or help to organize any society, group, or assembly of persons who teach, advocate, or encourage the overthrow or destruction of any government in the United States by force or violence’.104 In Dennis v United States, the Court, despite recognizing that the Communist Party’s attempt to overthrow the government of the United States was ‘doomed from the outset because of inadequate numbers or power of the revolutionists’, held that the law met the ‘clear-and-present-danger’ test because (p. 964)

the damage which such attempts create both physically and politically to a nation makes it impossible to measure the validity in terms of the probability of success, or the immediacy of a successful attempt. ... It is the existence of the conspiracy which creates the danger.105
Associative Rights (The Rights to the Freedoms of Petition, Assembly, and Association)

(d) Factual State Interferences

Apart from restrictions of the freedom of association through legal and administrative acts, factual restrictions caused by public authorities also occur. The German Federal Constitutional Court has judged that the undercover observation and infiltration of a political party through state agents is a serious mode of state interference which requires not only a distinct authorization by law but, in addition, a special justification which meets the standards of the principle of proportionality. Other cases involve the denial of governmental benefits, be it employment in the civil service, the allotment of contracts, or other opportunities. Although these factual restrictions are rarely overt, they are often an indirect, albeit effective, instrument of government to dissuade people from joining associations suspected by the government. As long as such associations are not legally prohibited, these factual restrictions violate the freedom of association. A different view was taken by the German Federal Constitutional Court and other German courts which argued that the loyalty of public employees had to be assured beyond any reasonable doubt and justified the ban of the access to the civil service of applicants who were or had been members or sympathizers of radical, if not prohibited, associations.

Bibliography

Bibliography

Thomas I. Emerson, ‘Freedom of Association and Freedom of Expression’ (1964) 74(1) Yale Law Journal 1
P. Hirst, ‘Renewing Democracy through Associations’ (2002) 73(4) Political Quarterly 409
Lorenzo Mosca and Daria Santucci, ‘Petitioning Online. The Role of E-Petitions in Web Campaigning’ in Sigrid Baringhorst, Veronika Kneip, and Johanna Nieszte (eds), Political Campaigning on the Web (2009)
F. Müller, Korporation und Assoziation. Eine Problemgeschichte der Vereinigungsfreiheit im deutschen Vormärz (1965)
Associative Rights (The Rights to the Freedoms of Petition, Assembly, and Association)

Martin Quilisch, Die demokratische Versammlung (1970)

Alfred Rinken, ‘Artikel 9 Absatz 1 (Vereinigungsfreiheit)’ in Erhard Denninger et al (eds), Kommentar zum Grundgesetz für die Bundesrepublik Deutschland (Reihe Alternativkommentare) Band I (Art 1-17a) (3rd edn, 2001)

Mark E. Warren, Democracy and Association (2001)

Erik Olin Wright (ed), Associations and Democracy (1995)

Notes:

(1) Alexis de Tocqueville, Democracy in America ((1840] 1990), vol 1, ch XII, 196.

(2) Hannah Arendt, ‘On Violence’ in Hannah Arendt, Crises of the Republic (1972), 143.

(3) Mark E. Warren, Democracy and Association (2001), 82ff.

(4) Articles 43, 44, distinguishing between petitions to the Ombudsman and to the European Parliament.

(6) See the English Bill of Rights, 1689; First Amendment of the US Constitution, 1789; French Constitution, 1791, Title I No 3 (no mention, however, in the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, 1789, nor in the Constitution of 1793).

(8) Higginson (n 5), 155.

(9) Smith (n 7), 196.

(10) Higginson (n 5), 158ff; Smith (n 7), 1175ff, esp 1179 n 164.

Associative Rights (The Rights to the Freedoms of Petition, Assembly, and Association)

(13) Germany, Art 17; Spain, Art 29.

(14) European Charter of Fundamental Rights, Art 44; Germany, Art 17; Italy, Art 50; Spain, Art 77.

(21) Title I, para 6 (author's numbering).

(23) 1998, c 42.

(24) Wolfgang Hoffmann-Riem, art 8 (commentary), margin no 7, in Denninger et al (eds), Alternativkommentar zum Grundgesetz für die Bundesrepublik Deutschland (2001), band I (art 1-17a), 3.

(25) 1998, c 42.

(29) Of course, the meaning of ‘content-neutral’ is ambiguous. For clarification see Geoffrey R. Stone et al, Constitutional Law (5th edn, 2005), 1300–3.

(32) 122 BVerfGE 342 (2009), 368ff. Reference No 1 Brv 2492/08 (for the English version see n 33).

(33) Cf International Society for Krishna Consciousness v Lee 505 US at 678 and the cases in Stone (n 29), 1307ff.

(35) Food Employees Local 590 v Logan Valley Plaza 391 US 308, 313ff (1968).

Associative Rights (The Rights to the Freedoms of Petition, Assembly, and Association)

(42) Cf Loi du 1er juillet 1901 relative au contrat d’association.

(44) Arthur Meier Schlesinger, Paths to the Present (1949), 23.

(45) Tocqueville (n 1), vol 2, ch V, 107, 110.

(46) Ibid vol 1, ch XII, 196.

(53) Cf Alfred Rinken, ‘Artikel 9 Absatz 1 (Vereinigungsfreiheit)’ in Erhard Denninger et al (eds), Kommentar zum Grundgesetz für die Bundesrepublik Deutschland (Reihe Alternativkommentare) Bd I (Art 1-17a) (3rd edn, 2001), 1, 1–52, margin nos 3ff; excellent analysis of the structural differences between these two kinds of association in Gunther Teubner, Organisationsdemokratie und Verbandsverfassung: Rechtsmodelle für politisch relevante Verbände (1978), 21ff, 30ff.

(55) Article 124.

(56) Article 159.

(59) Ibid 104, 121.

(60) See the overview of the jurisprudential doctrines which mirrored the novelty of this constitution in Arthur J. Jacobson and Bernhard Schlink (eds), Weimar. A Jurisprudence of Crisis: Philosophy, Social Theory, and the Rule of Law (2000); see also Ulrich K. Preuß, ‘Die Weimarer Republik—ein Laboratorium für neues verfassungsrechtliches Denken’ in Andreas Göbel, Dirk van Laak, and Ingeborg Villinger (eds), Metamorphosen
Associative Rights (The Rights to the Freedoms of Petition, Assembly, and Association)

(61) Articles 18, 39, 40, 49; see Fulco Lanchester, ‘Die Institution der politischen Partei in Italien’ in Dimitris Th. Tsatsos, Dian Schefold, and Hans-Peter Schneider (eds), Parteienrecht im europäischen Vergleich (1990), 367, 381.

(62) Article 9(1): freedom of association, like in Weimar, restricted to Germans; Art 9(3): the right guaranteed to every individual and to every occupation or profession ‘to form associations to safeguard and improve working and economic conditions’; Art 21: the freedom to associate in political parties.

(64) Expiring 31 December 2011.

(66) Emphasis added.

(67) 1998, c 42.

(71) See (http://www.ilo.org/ilolex/english/convdisp1.htm).

(72) See ibid.

(74) ECtHR, United Communist Party of Turkey and others v Republic of Turkey, App no 19392/92, 30 January 1998, 1998-I; Refah Partisi (the Welfare Party) and Others v Turkey, App nos 41340/98, 41342/98, 41343/98, and 41344/98, 13 February 2003 (Grand Chamber), 2003-II.

(75) ECtHR, Demir and Baykara v Turkey, App no 34503/97, 12 November 2008, paras 153–4; the significance of this judgment is discussed by K.D. Ewing and John Hendy, ‘The Dramatic Implications of Demir and Baykara’ (2010) 39(1) Industrial Law Journal 1.

(77) Stuart White, ‘Trade Unionism in a Liberal State’ in Gutmann (n 76), 334–5.

(78) 50 BVerfGE 290 (1979).

(80) Ibid 355ff.

(81) See end of Section I(3)(c) above.

(82) Cf 38 BVerfGE 281, 297ff with further references.

(83) Closed shop means that the employer hires only union members and has to fire those who quit the union; union shop means that also non-members can be hired, but must join the union within a certain period of time.
Associative Rights (The Rights to the Freedoms of Petition, Assembly, and Association)

(84) Cf ECtHR cases of Sørensen and Rasmussen v Denmark, App nos 52562/99 and 52620/99, 11 January 2006, paras 33, 34; see also case of Sigurdur A. Sigurjónsson v Iceland, App no 16130/90, 30 June 1993.

(85) ECtHR, Young, James and Webster v United Kingdom, App nos 7601/76 and 7806/77, 13 August 1981, para 55.

(86) Sørensen and Rasmussen v Denmark (n 84), para 56.

(87) Ibid para 58.

(89) Ibid para 57; see also Stuart White, ‘Trade Unionism in a Liberal State’ in Gutmann (n 76), 344ff; Stone (n 29), s VII E 5, 1437ff.

(90) 1992, c 52.

(91) Cf Tribe (n 51), ss 15–17, 1400ff.

(95) This argument was prefigured in Hurley et al v Irish-American Gay, Lesbian, and Bisexual Group of Boston 515 US 557, 574ff (1995), concerning the admission of an unwanted group to a parade.

(96) 530 US 567 (2000).

(97) Ibid 577.

(98) 50 BVerfGE 290 (1979).

(99) South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence, CCT 27/98 (1999); see also CCT 65/06 (2007).

(100) ILO (n 70), para 576.

(101) ECtHR, Enerji Yapi-Yol Sen v Turkey, App no. 68959/01, 21 April 2009.

(102) Cf Tribe (n 51), 1014, ss 12–26.

(103) Cf German Criminal Code, s 129a.

(104) Smith Act of 1940 18 USC §2385, ss 2 and 3.

(105) Dennis v United States 341 US 494, 511 (1951); the question whether the US Communist Party was a legitimate party or a conspiracy is extensively discussed by Bresler (n 49), 38ff; see also Inazu (n 19), 606ff.
Associative Rights (The Rights to the Freedoms of Petition, Assembly, and Association)

(http://www.bundesverfassungsgericht.de/entscheidungen/bs20030318_2bvb000101.html).

(107) Cf Tribe (n 51), 1016ff, ss 12–26.

Ulrich K. Preuß
Ulrich K. Preuß is Professor Emeritus of Law and Politics, Freie Universität Berlin, and Hertie School of Governance, Berlin
Abstract and Keywords

Privacy in comparative constitutional law is associated in some countries with specific legal ideas, such as inviolability of domicile and the secrecy of correspondence, whereas in others it is related to broad concepts such as freedom, dignity, and autonomy. Some jurisdictions provide an all-encompassing idea of ‘privacy’, whereas others provide different sets of compartmentalized rights. However, most jurisdictions share several key trends. The basic one is accelerated expansion, not only in terms of protected interests but most significantly in terms of the transformation of the very core of the right, which goes beyond the idea of privacy as seclusion and as a shield from intrusion and unwanted gaze. It protects a decisional aspect of the individual, seeking to safeguard a realm of autonomous development of the person situated in social life and in relation to others. Thus, privacy is rarely defined in fixed terms; rather, it is seen as a fluid concept constantly extending its frontiers to face new demands and the challenges of changing contexts. This article addresses key issues concerning the basic elements of privacy, its protection, and its limits.

Keywords: right to privacy, constitutional rights, constitutional law, security of correspondence, inviolability of domicile

I. Introduction 966
II. Basic Issues 969
   1. What Is It? 969
      (a) Space 971
      (b) Relations 972
      (c) Subject Matter 973
   2. What Does it Cover? 974
      (a) The Sources of the Right 974
      (b) The Scope of the Right 975
      (c) Negative and Positive Obligations 976

III. The Protection of the Right to Privacy 977
   1. How is it Protected? 977
   2. What Limits Can it Have? 978

IV. Conclusion 979

I. Introduction

Is there indeed a ‘right to privacy’ in comparative constitutional law? The question has been asked in constitutional legal scholarship whether the bundle of interests protected by ‘privacy’ are manifestations of the same underlying notion, or whether they are, rather, a set of disparate and unrelated rights.\(^1\) Thus, it has been described as a polymorph, protean, and heteroclite right whose content is unpredictable\(^2\) and ‘not susceptible of exhaustive definition’.\(^3\)
Privacy

\((p. 967)\) Privacy is not mentioned in the constitutions of countries such as the United States and Germany, where high courts have rendered landmark decisions on privacy. Most post-1990 constitutions refer to it, as do international\(^4\) and regional\(^5\) human rights treaties.

Indeed, the protection of private spheres was a matter foreign to constitutional law until the second half of the twentieth century. Different instruments helped to impede or repair intrusions into the realm of the individual, such as trespass in property law, civil torts,\(^6\) criminal procedure with respect to search and seizure,\(^7\) and the so-called ‘rights of personality’ in some countries of the civil law tradition.\(^8\) These instruments protected the private sphere of an individual not only against police authorities but also against actions of private individuals. It can be argued that the conception and the scope of the right to privacy in each country depend on the pre-constitutional legal protections granted, but with the passage of time this umbilical cord has been cut. Thus, in the United States there are intense debates about the physical spaces protected by the constitutional right to privacy (not a telephone line, in Olmstead, then corrected in Katz),\(^9\) whilst in Europe the expansion of the right beyond the individual home has been relatively less controversial.\(^10\) Thus, even within Western culture, there are differences in approaches to basic elements of privacy. Beyond, the differences are greater since the idea of privacy is context-bound and linked to culture.\(^11\)

The rise of privacy as a constitutional right means that the legislature, not only the police or administrative authorities, is bound to respect and protect it. The judiciary must also ensure that in the course of ordinary procedures—civil, criminal, administrative etc.—privacy is not violated. This has led to an infusion of constitutional law into other branches of law. In regions where an international human rights convention is judicially enforced, privacy transforms classic legal rules under a human rights flag, as was noticed in Europe after Marckx v Belgium, a 1979 European Court of Human Rights (ECTHR) decision holding that a legal rule that did not recognize a maternal bond for ‘illegitimate’ children breached the obligation to respect family life.\(^12\)

Privacy as an autonomous constitutional right was first judicially protected in the 1960s. In 1965, in the leading case Griswold v Connecticut, the US Supreme Court derived a right to (p. 968) privacy from the various ‘zones of privacy’ emanating from several constitutional guarantees, and prohibiting governmental intrusion into the intimate matters of married couples.\(^13\) In 1968, the ECTHR in the Belgian Linguistic Case held that Article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights regarding private and family life had the object ‘of protecting the individual against arbitrary interference by the public authorities in his private family life’.\(^14\) In 1969, the German Federal Constitutional Court in the Microcensus Case held that

The State has no right to pierce the [protected] sphere of privacy by thoroughly checking into the personal matters of its citizens. [It] must leave the individual with an inner space for the purpose of the free and responsible development of his personality. Within this space the individual is his own master.\(^15\)

Nonetheless, the vision of privacy in each landmark decision is different. Griswold saw privacy as an absolute bar against governmental intrusion into the intimate aspects of a couple's life. The Belgian Linguistic Case dealt with decisions made by families on the education of their children, and privacy was used as a check against arbitrary governmental decisions bearing on family life. The Microcensus Case, in turn, was about safeguarding an absolute realm of dignity for the individual, by protecting her personal life from scrutiny. Informational privacy was directly linked to an autonomy right, since a person would not be able to develop her personality freely under constant public gaze.

Other jurisdictions protected the right to privacy much later. For example, in France, the first step was given by the legislature, amending the Civil Code in 1970 in broad terms, but only in 1995 did the Constitutional Council recognize such a constitutional right in its Videosurveillance Case.\(^16\)

Privacy in comparative constitutional law is associated in some countries with specific legal ideas, such as inviolability of domicile and the secrecy of correspondence,\(^17\) whereas in others it is related to broad concepts such as freedom, dignity, and autonomy. Some jurisdictions provide an all-encompassing idea of ‘privacy’, whereas others provide different sets of compartmentalized rights. The US conception sees privacy as a ‘right of the individual to decide for himself, found in the ‘penumbras’ of several provisions of the Bill of Rights. In contrast, the French Constitutional Council sees it as a form of ‘liberty’, as does the Indian Supreme Court. Other jurisdictions, such as Germany, Colombia, and South Africa, in turn, derive the right to privacy from a basic conception of human dignity, notwithstanding the fact that their constitutions already provide specific protections for informational privacy.

However, most jurisdictions share several key trends. The basic one is accelerated expansion, not only in terms of protected interests but most significantly in terms of the transference of the very core of the right, which goes beyond the idea of privacy as seclusion and as a shield from intrusion and unwanted gaze. It protects a decisional aspect of the individual, seeking to safeguard a realm of autonomous development of the person situated in social life and in relation to others. Thus, privacy is rarely defined in fixed terms; rather, it is seen as a fluid concept constantly extending its frontiers to face new demands and the challenges of changing contexts. This fluidity has even led privacy into the realms of environmental law, since a strident sound or a hideous smell can affect the life of individuals within their homes.

Albeit difficult to define, there are unavoidable issues concerning the basic elements of privacy (Section II), its protection and its limits (Section III).

II. Basic Issues

1. What Is It?

Privacy was initially seen as the ‘right to be let alone’, a simple yet powerful concept. This negative view of privacy, however, has been surpassed by several developments in comparative constitutional law. Privacy is nowadays understood not only as a right to be free from outside interference or observation in one’s own private sphere, but also as a right to define and construct one’s own identity, not only in isolation but in social relations.

A conceptual dichotomy derived by the ECtHR illustrates these two dimensions of privacy: individual privacy and social privacy. Privacy is a flexible idea whose uses have shifted over time and its frontiers moved in reaction to the challenges of social life in post-war societies, from the emergence of mass tabloid media to the rise of computer processing power capable of cross-referencing data on a massive scale and carrying out complete profiles. The gaze of the media in the private life of certain individuals has motivated protest against their ‘effrontery’, and some of the seminal cases regarding privacy in a range of jurisdictions have been concerned with this ‘informational’ aspect of privacy. At its core is the idea of preserving a reserved sphere from the view or knowledge of others and the restriction of access to and circulation of personal information pertaining to an individual, even though there are diverse approaches towards what types of information are covered by privacy. But other jurisdictions have built extensively upon another facet of privacy, which we may denominate the ‘decisional’ aspect. The German Federal Constitutional Court recognizes a ‘right to self-determination’, and the ECtHR already expressly recognized a ‘right to personal development’. The right to privacy also protects the autonomy of individuals to make choices with regard to the construction of their own identities and ways of life, such as decisions on sexual orientation, sexual identity, and pregnancy. Thus, as shown by the US Supreme Court,

The cases sometimes characterized as protecting ‘privacy’ have in fact involved at least two different kinds of interests. One is the individual interest in avoiding disclosure of personal matters, and another is the interest in independence in making certain kinds of important decisions.

This decisional aspect of privacy has also been protected by the ECtHR, for example not only against the criminalization of certain sexual relations but moreover to further the right of a transsexual to marry.

These two aspects are not wholly unrelated. The first is a mostly negative right, which treads upon protection of a person’s information about features which define their identity from external intrusion or unwanted observation, both by the state and private powers. The second aspect is a mostly positive right that espouses an individual’s continuous construction of their own identity and way of life which obliges the state to create proper conditions and remove obstacles for this autonomous shaping of individual identity even against unjustified interferences by private powers.
Privacy

The definition of the ‘private realm’ which is to be free from outside interference is not exempt from difficulties. Sir Edward Coke held that ‘The house of everyone is to him as his castle and fortress’.41 It would thus seem that most of what goes on inside a person’s home would be a private matter, free from public interference.42 But this is not necessarily true in all cases. There is a trend among liberal democracies to allow the state to interfere in homes where physical abuse may be taking place, such as marital rape in the United Kingdom.43 On the other hand, until fairly recently, several jurisdictions criminalized sodomy even in private spaces.44 Sodomy has now been decriminalized in many jurisdictions on the basis of privacy, (p. 971) not merely because it occurs behind closed doors, but because sexual choice is an area of life where the state should not, at least in principle, interfere.45 The line establishing a public/private divide thus moves according to subject matter in some contexts, regardless of the variable of physical space.

Similarly, privacy may protect individuals even outside their own homes. The Von Hannover case before the ECtHR serves to illustrate that even the outdoor leisure activities of a public figure may be protected by the right to privacy.46 This trend echoes the famous dictum by the US Supreme Court that ‘the Fourth Amendment protects people, not places’.47 The reach of the protective aegis of the right to privacy depends not simply on specific locations but on what some courts have termed a ‘reasonable expectation of privacy’.48

Who should reasonably expect privacy? The definition of privacy depends on several factors—ranging from cultural beliefs to technological instruments—but they usually revolve around three basic variables: space, relations, and subject matter.

(a) Space

The first variable is physical space. The right to be let alone operates principally in the secluded physical area in which the individual expects not to be observed. This is the notion underlying the prohibitions of unreasonable searches and seizures which exist in most constitutions. Whereas a person may be physically observed by a policeman whilst strolling down the street, this is not so for activity inside their home unless, usually before a judge, certain argumentative and evidentiary burdens are met.49

Nevertheless, space continues to be a significant variable to define the scope of privacy. The viewing of obscene material by a person in his home is different from showing it to the public.50 Seizing an item inside a person’s house is different from seizing an item in plain view.51 New developments pose new difficulties, some of which have been resolved through an expansive interpretation of ‘space’. In US constitutional law, the front lawn is an extension of a person’s home,52 but a person’s trash in the street is not.53

On the other hand, privacy does not disappear in public places and, hence, the growing controversy over the proliferation of street cameras.55 Debates continue on how to draw the line between private and non-private affairs in the workplace56 and privacy in public places.

However, the prohibition of intrusion into a certain physical space does not fully explain the complex structure of the right to privacy, since privacy is not only about physical activity (p. 972) or information held within the confines of a living area. The issue of data retention illustrates this point. The right to privacy may comprise a right to ‘informational self-determination’ or habeas data.58 This right does not turn on the location where the data originated, or the location where it is held,59 but on the content of the data and the purpose for which it is registered in a database or handed by one holder to another.60

(b) Relations

The second relevant variable is the subject to whom the decisional conduct and/or communication is directed. Unless covered by a form of secrecy,61 communication directed towards the state or the public would usually not be protected by the right to privacy. Conversely, conduct and communication towards a life-partner would enjoy such protection.62 This protection may exist regardless of the physical space where it occurs.63 The fact that a famous public figure was photographed in the company of her family, spending leisure time with her children, instead of, say, addressing a conference, seems to have been a dispositive fact in the Von Hannover case which overturned the holding of the German Federal Constitutional Court.64 The importance of maintaining an inner sanctum within the family is stressed by the phrasing of provisions which protect both ‘private life’ and ‘family life’.
Privacy

But the relational variable goes beyond close members of the already existing family. In the decisional aspect it covers the way an individual chooses to establish and sustain social relations that define her way of life and are essential to the construction of personal identity. This is why privacy in the United States has been held to protect decisions on sexuality of both married and unmarried couples. The main thrust of this concept of privacy is, according to the South African Constitutional Court, ‘a sphere of private intimacy and autonomy which allows us to establish and nurture human relationships without interference from the outside community.’ Thus, it struck down the criminal law ban on sodomy. Other courts have protected the formalization of same-sex couples. Decisional privacy covers both existing relations and relations in the making.

On the other hand, certain relations with close family members in domestic physical spaces are not inevitably excluded from external intervention. Incest, irrespective of age, is the obvious example in most cultures. Moreover, if vulnerable human beings are exposed to harm, neither the space variable nor the relational variable is sufficient to justify excluding the intervention of the state. Thus, the state can impede the battering of a woman by her husband in the home and the mistreatment of children by their parents. The state also has a duty to create effective criminal protection against rape and threats and harassment by family members. These conducts at home are arbitrary abuses of physical force not protected by decisional or informational privacy.

(c) Subject Matter

Finally, the third variable concerns the subject matter of the conduct or communication being protected. Privacy comprises, first and foremost, information, conduct, and situations which are typically classified as intimate, such as entries in a private diary, confidential communication between spouses, sexuality, abnormal social behavior, and illnesses. The US Supreme Court has allowed the government to regulate cannabis in order to make it more difficult to acquire, but has struck down as a breach of privacy a provision doing so for the acquisition of contraceptives by unmarried couples. The underlying notion is that certain acts, such as consensual sex, are so personal and so fundamental for the construction of identity that they cannot in principle be interfered with by the state. Controversial areas exist in other subject matter. In Colombia, Congress cannot criminalize the personal consumption of narcotics or punish pietistic homicide if the will of a terminally ill patient is clear. Other jurisdictions regard euthanasia as not protected by the realm of intimate decision-making.

The same is true for data protection. Medical records and personal health information, even of public figures, enjoy a higher degree of protection than data on commercial activity, even of ordinary citizens. The German Federal Constitutional Court devised a three-tier constitutional protection of privacy (the so-called ‘theory of spheres’), depending on the subject matter of the information at issue. At the core of privacy are the intimate details of a person’s life which enjoy absolute protection, not subject to public interest limitations or balancing considerations (the ‘intimate sphere’). In the outer circle are conduct and behavior that should not be disclosed if occurring in a secluded space (the ‘private sphere’). Information such as recorded conversations, not necessarily including personal data, but carried out on a confidential basis, would be prima facie protected by the right to privacy but subject to disclosure in accordance with public interest concerns. Finally, there is information which is not of a personal nature, and has not been generated on a confidential basis. This includes information regarding ‘the relation of the person to the world around him’, which would not be protected by the right to privacy at all (the ‘public sphere’).

The Colombian Constitutional Court has extended habeas data as an autonomous right to the protection of non-private information, but it fixed more strict conditions on the gathering and processing of private data. ‘Sensitive data’ dealing with aspects such as sexual orientation or religious or political affiliation may not be gathered in some jurisdictions without appropriate safeguards, and in others may not be gathered if its recollection could lead directly or indirectly to a discriminatory policy.

The Australian, British, and French debates about the risk to privacy of citizen ID cards illustrate that subject matter can be very specific, as are concerns with customer loyalty cards, sensitive consumer data, and security in business databases.

The nature of the information or decision cannot be established without considering the will of the individual concerned. When the informational and decisional aspects of privacy concur, the decisional aspect has more importance. The obvious case is intimate information that the individual chooses to make public. Thus, subject matter can move from the intimate sphere to the public sphere by the autonomous decision of the interested individual. On the other side, the question arises whether information which was once public may become private because the interested individual so decides at a later point in time. This issue can be narrowly tailored to the idea of an individual's control over her past personal information or broadly framed, in the case of sanctions, as a right to be forgotten.

Privacy thus projects itself at different levels and in diverse forms. The three variables of space, relations, and subject matter are useful to define and distinguish these different levels and forms. A private act, in a secluded space, in the context of an intimate relationship, will most likely be at the core of the protection of the right to privacy. A change in one of these variables may weaken this protection; but the presence of one of these variables may extend the reach of privacy to unsuspected domains.

The ‘right to be let alone’ seems nowadays under-inclusive. Privacy is a right which protects an inner sphere of the individual from outside interference from the state and private powers, both on informational and decisional aspects, and allows the individual to make autonomous life choices regarding the construction of her identity, not only secluded from others but also situated in personal, family, and social contexts. Privacy expands or contracts depending on the way the three basic variables of subject matter, relations, and space are present in a concrete case. As the external frontiers of privacy expand, internal frontiers are established to protect other important constitutional rights and interests.

2. What Does it Cover?

(a) The Sources of the Right

The matters, relations, and spaces covered by privacy are dependent on the text from which the right to privacy has sprung in different jurisdictions. Most judges protect privacy based on general or specific clauses provided in the constitution, but treaties may impact the protection of privacy in certain jurisdictions. In France, important privacy judgments are rendered by courts other than the Constitutional Council. The ordinary and administrative jurisdictions control whether French law is in conformity to Article 8 of the European Convention—it is a review of conventionality, not of constitutionality. In the United Kingdom, since the incorporation of the Convention through the Human Rights Act 1998, judges protect privacy not only as a common law matter but also as a human rights issue. In other countries, as in Colombia, even if there is a constitutional source, the right to privacy like any other constitutional right must be interpreted in harmony with the relevant treaty source. The impact of the treaty source on the domestic protection of privacy is part of the broader subject of the interrelation between legal orders and the so-called internationalization of constitutional law.

(b) The Scope of the Right

The scope of the right of privacy varies according to the corresponding textual source, but depends even more on the conceptions prevailing in each country. The distinction between procedural and substantive guarantees is useful in this respect.

The basic protection of privacy in most constitutional texts is the protection against search and seizure without a judicial warrant, a procedural guarantee. The corresponding provisions do not establish an all-encompassing right to privacy, but only a protection against unjustified police interference in a private realm, usually physically defined as the home (domicile) and the body (person). This, however, is a starting point for the right to privacy. In times when the most immediately perceived threat against liberty and dignity was government intrusion, constitutions established specific procedures against such interference; mainly the previous authorization by a judge based on grounds previously determined by the legislature and after the burden of proof was met.

But the greatest safeguard is the establishment of a substantive, not only procedural, guarantee of privacy. This means that even with judicial authorization based on a previous statute, the state cannot interfere with the inner sphere of the individual. The cases concerning former criminal offenses, such as abortion or sodomy, illustrate this transformation across countries and continents. In each country nuances apply once privacy became a substantial limit to the state. For example, in the United States where the Lochner era still lingers and the right to abortion grounded on decisional privacy is still extremely controversial, in 2003 the protection of sexual relations between same-sex couples was grounded on liberty and freedom, not privacy. In countries such as South Africa... and India, whose constitutions also do not contain express autonomy clauses, privacy played an important role in such cases. Thus, the cases striking down prohibitions on sodomy which affirmed broad autonomy rights were based on the right to privacy in both instances.\textsuperscript{94} notwithstanding the fact that in the South African case, the right to privacy is classed as a protection of data and information and protection against search and seizure, not protection of personal choice.\textsuperscript{95}

\textsuperscript{96} Another useful distinction is between a unified and a compartmentalized view of privacy. Even where the right of privacy has been conceptualized in an all-encompassing way, the detailed rules for its protection vary widely depending on the zone in which it is threatened. For example, there are very detailed rules concerning search and seizure of domiciles that cannot be transposed to personal data protection, and vice versa. Thus, within a country there is a coexistence of diverse regimes for the protection of privacy, separate from each other and with their own specificities. Some are judicially created; others are established by the legislature.

Some countries contemplate distinct rights for inviolability of domicile, secrecy of correspondence, image,\textsuperscript{96} intimacy, habeas data, and free development of personality. Thus, habeas data is a distinct right to privacy and both may concur, or not, depending on the content of the data.\textsuperscript{97} In Europe, personal data are covered by the right to privacy, and ‘The mere storing of data relating to the private life of an individual amounts to an interference’ with the right to private and family life.\textsuperscript{98}

A surprising example of compartmentalization is the protection against search and seizure, which in several countries is not treated under the general heading of a violation of the right to privacy, but under the violation of more specific procedure-oriented rules, such as the requirement to show ‘probable cause’ before a search.\textsuperscript{99} Hence, the rules for excluding evidence may be conceived as an expression of due process.\textsuperscript{100}

\textbf{(c) Negative and Positive Obligations}

The right to privacy generally implies negative obligations on behalf of the state, which is therefore bound not to interfere in the personal realm of the individual. Such is the case with the prohibition of retrieving personal data on sensitive matters.\textsuperscript{101} Private parties are also bound by this negative dimension of privacy, notably the media. As noted, this is not a recent phenomenon but an originating factor in the emergence of a right to privacy.

There are some situations, however, in which privacy does imply positive obligations. Privacy entails not only a right to exclude others, but also a right to be protected from others by the positive actions of the state. The German Federal Constitutional Court underscored the positive aspect of privacy in the Sex Change Case, in which authorities were obliged to register a change of sex in the identity documents of the petitioner, pursuant to the right to free development of personality.\textsuperscript{102} The UK Supreme Court also recognized an obligation on the state ‘to protect one individual from an unjustified invasion of private life by another individual and ... to interpret legislation in a way which will achieve that result.’\textsuperscript{103}

Positive obligations derived from the right to privacy have prompted interesting innovations by the ECtHR, thus redefining the obligations of state parties. The positive obligations are very diverse: states must enact comprehensive criminal legislation against rape in order to safeguard the right to private life even where the victim has not opposed physical violence;\textsuperscript{104} (p. 977) the state must allow a child to discover her biological origins by an expedient procedure;\textsuperscript{105} the state must provide prison inmates with the materials needed to establish correspondence;\textsuperscript{106} a judicial decision of eviction must be executed to allow an owner to regain possession of his apartment.\textsuperscript{107} There are even positive obligations to provide information in order for families to take decisions concerning their health\textsuperscript{108} and to enact measures allowing effective and timely access to legal therapeutic abortion.\textsuperscript{109} The Strasbourg Court has refused, however, to recognize a positive obligation of the state to extend to the father the right of financed maternal leave granted by the state to the mother.\textsuperscript{110} More surprisingly, since it had previously recognized the positive obligation of the state to facilitate the identification of the natural father,\textsuperscript{111} it has refused to recognize this same obligation concerning the mother, when she expressly wished to give birth anonymously.\textsuperscript{112}

\textbf{III. The Protection of the Right to Privacy}

\textbf{1. How is it Protected?}
Privacy

The right to privacy is protected by the legislature, the administration, and the executive. But the institutional arrangements vary. A comparison of the procedural protections in place may be drawn from four different areas.

First, most jurisdictions generally establish ex post remedies, but some also include ex ante protections. This explains the proliferation of independent administrative agencies in the field. Also, the French referée, is a fast and urgent judicial procedure that prevents violation of certain rights by non-constitutional judges. Since the 1950s civil judges have developed this preventive writ and applied it in newsworthy cases—such as the diaries of a famous actress—and some publications were halted or even seized by this method. It became regulated by legislation in 1970.

Secondly, most jurisdictions generally provide both constitutional and civil remedies for breaches of privacy. In the United States, tort law provides four specific civil torts for private breaches of privacy: intrusion upon seclusion or solitude; public disclosure of embarrassing private facts; publicity which places the plaintiff in a false light; and appropriation of name or likeness. German law provides a general civil tort action to protect privacy as part of a ‘general right of personality’.

Thirdly, some constitutional remedies provide an action for concrete breaches of privacy, but some jurisdictions also include the possibility of abstract constitutional review. Thus, jurisdictions such as Austria, France, Germany, Spain, Colombia, and Hungary, where abstract review is generally exercised by the constitutional courts, provide an all-embracing remedy against possible legislative breaches of privacy, mainly the invalidation of the legislative act.

Fourthly, while most concrete constitutional remedies require state action, other remedies encompass possible breaches of privacy by private action. The state action requirement has been somewhat circumvented in some cases—as in the United States and Germany—through the review of lower court judgments on private litigation under the lens of constitutional principles. In Colombia, the writ of protection of fundamental rights (acción de tutela) may be brought against private powers with whom the petitioner is in a relation of subordination or defenselessness.

2. What Limits Can it Have?

The possible limits to the right to privacy may be grouped in three basic categories. In the first, privacy is restricted when a decision implicates the rights of others. Tension commonly occurs between privacy and freedom of the press. The relative weight of each right varies according to the character of the information at issue and the person involved. In the case of public figures the right to privacy is diluted to a varying extent since persons who have voluntarily ‘assumed roles of especial prominence in the affairs of society’ put their personal privacy at risk by choice. However, this is only true of ‘newsworthy’ events, which the public has an interest in knowing. In the United States, freedom of the press has greater weight and thus even the name of a rape victim can be published.

Secondly, there are public interest justifications. This is generally the underlying notion behind limitations in the context of criminal procedures, espionage, or prevention of terrorism. Virtually all jurisdictions accept state intervention in private spheres when a certain evidentiary threshold is met and certain procedural safeguards are followed. These safeguards have undergone serious restrictions with antiterrorist legislation passed in several countries in recent years. The reason behind this is that states want to enjoy some power to obtain evidence not only for criminal investigations but for the prevention of crime.

Thirdly, self-regarding duties have given a basis for upholding prohibitions on drugs and assisted suicide in Germany and the United States. The Colombian Constitutional Court has adopted a restrictive reading of self-regarding duties by distinguishing between ‘perfectionist’ and ‘self-protecting’ measures. The latter seek to protect an individual from imminent harm, the former seek to unacceptably impose a model of morality and virtue on the individual.

The limits themselves are generally limited by judges through several devices. First, a legal ground is generally demanded (principle of legality). The limitation must somehow be established by law, and not be the result of a particular decision made on a discretionary basis. Moreover, the legal basis must be clear and detailed. Secondly, there must be a legitimate interest in restricting privacy, and some relation between the means used and the ends sought (principle of rationality). Thirdly, some courts have engaged in a balancing of rights, to determine whether a limitation is excessive (principle of proportionality). Fourthly, the burden of argumentation and proof is distributed in some way, according to the relative weight accorded to privacy with respect to other rights. But some specific forms of restriction on privacy are bound by specific rules, not open balancing, as is the case with search and seizure and the exclusionary rule.

IV. Conclusion

Some new challenges to privacy have prompted deep concern, such as the ever-gazing eye of permanent surveillance. The issues are almost infinite: Can there be DNA databases, retention, and profiling? How should personal information sent and deactivated on the internet be regulated? Can telecommunications data be retrieved, for how long, and for what purposes? Are Google street-view cars violating privacy standards? Is airport whole-body scanning an arbitrary strip search?

Some wonder if the increasing power to see what any individual is or does, will lead to the end of privacy. Others argue that the expansion of the decisional aspect of privacy will lead to the end of basic social arrangements and institutions. Both apocalyptic concerns are (p. 980) exaggerated. The evolution of privacy indicates that each new challenge prompts an expansion of the right, and that as the right expands new internal frontiers are established to protect the rights of others. But as fluidity and complexity increase, the protection of privacy depends increasingly on safeguards derived from privacy-enhancing techniques, independent agencies, and specific legislative remedies and designs. The enduring challenge is for the capacity of courts to preserve the right to privacy.

Bibliography

Bibliography

Francois Rigaux, La protection de la vie privée et des autres biens de la personnalité (1990)
Frédéric Sudre, Le droit au respect de la vie privée au sens de la convention européenne des droits de l’homme (2005)

Web Resources

Independent Agencies for Data Protection
Australia, Office of the Privacy Commissioner (http://www.privacy.gov.au/)

Canada, Office of the Privacy Commissioner (http://www.priv.gc.ca/index_e.cfm)

France, CNIL (http://www.cnil.fr/english/)

Germany, Federal Commissioner for Data Protection (http://www.bfdi.bund.de/cln_134/EN/Home/homepage_node.html)

Spain, Spanish Agency for Data Protection (http://www.agpd.es/portalwebAGPD/index-ides-idphp.php)

United Kingdom, Information Commissioner’s Office (http://www.ico.gov.uk/)

United States, Federal Communications Commission (http://www.fcc.gov/)

United States, Federal Trade Commission (http://www.ftc.gov/)

Privacy Statutes and Guidelines

OECD Guidelines on the Protection of Privacy and Transborder Flows of Personal Data (http://www.oecd.org/document/18/0,3343,en_2649_34255_1815186_1_1_1_1,00.html)

(p. 981) Other Web Resources

Electronic Privacy Information Center (http://epic.org/)

Privacy International (http://www.privacyinternational.org/)

Notes:

(1) Laurence Tribe, American Constitutional Law (2nd edn, 1988), 1303 (‘a name for a grab-bag of unrelated goodies’).

(3) ECtHR, Pretty v United Kingdom, App no 2346/02, 2002-III.

(4) International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966), Art 17(1).

(9) In Olmstead v United States 277 US 438 (1928), the Court said that a telephone line could be subject to surveillance since there was no physical intrusion in the home, but in Katz v United States 389 US 347 (1967), concerning a telephone cabin, it corrected this approach. Other cases related to places protected by the Fourth Amendment are the bag of a taxi client (Arkansas v Sanders 442 US 753 (1979)) and the office of the chief executive of a corporation investigated for fiscal fraud (GM Leasing Corp v United States 429 US 338 (1977)). But the trunk of a car belonging to another person (United States v Ross 456 US 798 (1982)) and trash-cans left to be picked up on a public road (California v Greenwood 486 US 35 (1988)) are not protected.

(10) Places not owned but clearly destined for private activities, even temporary ones, are protected. Thus a temporary hotel room is protected in Spain (STC, 17 January 2002, no 10-2002), and occasional offices for business activities are protected in France (CCD, 29 December 1983, no 83-164 DC). In Germany the protection includes tents and hotel rooms as well as bureaux see Constance Grewe, Allemagne (2000) Annuaire International de Justice Constitutionnelle (AIJC) 139.

(11) In Japan, where web personal open diaries are popular, what is regarded as ‘most intimate’ in Western culture is often made public.

(17) France is a case in point. The Videosurveillance decision (ibid) links privacy to ‘anonymity’, ‘secret’, and ‘inviolability of domicile’. Another example is the Constitution of the Republic of Hungary (1995), Art 59(1): ‘everyone shall have the right to a good reputation, to inviolability of one’s home as well as to the protection of private secrets and personal data.’

(19) Griswold (n 13).

(20) Kharak Singh v State of UP (1964) 1 SCR 332; Naz Foundation v Government of NCT of Delhi and Others, WP(C)7455/2001, High Court of Delhi.

(23) Lopez Ostra v Spain, 9 December 1994, Ser A no 303-C.

(25) The German Federal Constitutional Court very early said that ‘the image of man behind the Basic Law is not one of an individual isolated and sovereign’ (BVerfG, 20 July 1954, 4, 7, 15-16). It is not ‘Robinsonian liberty’ according to the classic commentary to the Basic Law. Maunz et al, Grundgesetz Kommentar (1991), under Art 2.

(26) Niemietz v Germany, 16 December 1992, Ser A no 251-B.

(27) Census Act Case 65 BVerfGE 1 (1983). Moreover, ‘anonymization’ of personal information is insufficient, since it can be re-identified and profiles may be built by cross-referencing common information contained in different databases.

(28) Warren and Brandeis (n 24).

(29) Campbell v MGN Ltd [2004] UKHL 22; Hungarian Constitutional Court, Decision 60/1994 (XXII.22), AB; Indian Supreme Court, Kharak Singh v State of UP (n 20); Olmstead (n 9) Brandeis J dissenting.

(30) Thus, in general, in the United States financial information is not considered private while in Europe it is protected by the right to privacy, Whitman (n 8), 1191. In Colombia, financial information was considered by the Constitutional Court as semi-private data, which means that it receives a lesser degree of protection. Colombian Constitutional Court, Decision SU-082/1995.

(31) Census Act Case (n 27).

(32) This right was evoked in ECtHR, Botta v Italy, App no 21439/93, 1998-I, and fully recognized in Bensaid v United Kingdom, App no 44599/98, 2001-I.

(34) Indian Supreme Court, Gobind v State of MP (1975) 2 SCC 148; South African Constitutional Court, National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC); Colombian Constitutional Court, Decision C-481/1998.

(35) Colombian Constitutional Court, Decision SU-337/1999. This case dealt with a hermaphrodite child whose decision on which sexual identity to adopt was protected by the Court.

(38) Dudgeon v United Kingdom, 22 October 1981, Ser A no 45.

(39) ECtHR, Christine Goodwin v United Kingdom App no 28957/95 (Grand Chamber), 2002-VI.

(41) Semayne's Case, 77 Eng Rep 194, 195; 5 Co Rep 91, 195 (KB, 1604).

(42) South African Constitutional Court, Case v Minister of Safety and Security, 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), para 91.

(43) This goes beyond constitutional law. Eg since 1990, British courts have started to convict husbands of rape, overturning the centuries-old proposition to the effect that marital rape was not a criminal offence, SW v United Kingdom, 22 November 1995, Ser A no 335-B.

(45) Naz Foundation (n 20); Lawrence v Texas 539 US 558 (2003); Dudgeon (n 38); National Coalition (n 34).

(46) ECtHR, Von Hannover v Germany, App no 59320/00, 2004-VI.

(47) Katz (n 9).

(48) HRH Prince of Wales v Associated Newspapers Ltd [2006] EWHC Civ 1776; ECtHR, Halford v United Kingdom, App no 20605/92, 1997-III.

(54) Greenwood (n 9).

(55) See Chapter 45.

(56) City of Ontario v Quon 560 US ___ (2010) (a police department can inspect personal text messages sent and received on a government pager but obtained from a private provider to check excessive use); Colombian Constitutional Court, Decision T-768/2008 (a bank can place hidden security cameras in its offices and employees cannot obstruct them to kiss unseen).

(57) Census Act Case (n 27).

(59) But in the United States the financial information held by a bank was considered as not protected: United States v Miller 425 US 435 (1976). Congress then adopted the Right to Financial Privacy Act, 12 USC §§3401–22.

(60) In District Registrar and Collector, Hyderabad and another v Canara Bank and another (2005) 1 SCC 496, the Indian Supreme Court struck down a provision allowing authorities to inspect banking records that could lead to proof of an offense, holding that the right to privacy protected documents handed over by customers on a confidential basis.

(61) Most jurisdictions provide that criminal evidence is secret until a certain stage of the trial.

(62) 27 BVerfGE 344 (1970); Jordan (n 22), para 80.

(63) Thus, Katz (n 9).

(64) Von Hannover (n 46).

(65) Griswold (n 13).

(67) National Coalition (n 34).

(68) Statutes have been upheld 105 BVerfGE 313, Constitutional Council Decision n 94-352 DC, 18 January 1995; or judicially extended from heterosexual to homosexual couples, Colombian Constitutional Court, Decision C-075/2007.

(69) Loving v Virginia 388 US 1 (1967).

(70) X and Y v The Netherlands, 26 March 1985, Ser A no 91.

(71) ECHR, Osman v United Kingdom, App no 23452/94, 1998-VIII.

(72) BVerfGE 80, 367; 27, 344; 47, 46; 49, 286; 44, 353; 32, 373.

(73) Gonzales v Raich 545 US 1 (2005).

(74) Griswold (n 13).

(75) National Coalition (n 34); Naz Foundation (n 20).

(76) Colombian Constitutional Court, Decision C-221/1994.

(77) Colombian Constitutional Court, Decision C-239/1997.

(79) ECHR, Editions Plon v France, App no 58148/00, 2004-IV (case related to the revelation of the secret cancer of President Mitterrand).

(80) Microcensus Case (n 15). See also 34 BVerfGE 238 (1973) and 1 BvR 2378/98 (2004).

(81) Secret Recordings Case (n 80).

(82) Microcensus Case (n 15).

(83) Colombian Constitutional Court, Decision T-729/2002.
(84) Convention for the Protection of Individuals with regard to Automatic Processing of Personal Data (1981); Directive 95/46/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 24 October 1995 on the protection of individuals with regard to the processing of personal data and on the free movement of such data (1995), Art B(1) of which prohibits ‘the processing of personal data revealing racial or ethnic origin, political opinions, religious or philosophical beliefs, trade-union membership, and the processing of data concerning health or sex life.’

(86) ECtHR, Rotaru v Romania, App no 28341/95, 2000-V.

(89) Campbell (n 29).

(91) See Chapter 56.

(92) Substantive due process is linked to the Lochner case which delayed President Roosevelt’s New Deal, Lochner v New York 198 US 45 (1905).

(93) Lawrence (n 45).

(94) Naz Foundation (n 45); National Coalition (n 34).

(96) In Spain, this right is violated by the commercialization of a video of a dying torero (TC 231/1988, 2 December). For Canada see AIJC, 181.

(98) ECtHR, S and Marper v United Kingdom, App no 30562/04, 4 December 2008 (Grand Chamber).

(100) ECtHR, Khan v United Kingdom, App no 35394/97, 2000-V; Mapp v Ohio 367 US 643 (1961); but Colombian Constitutional Court, Decision SU-159/2002.

(101) 34 BVerfGE 238 (1973); 1 BvR 2378/98 (2004); Colombian Constitutional Court, Decision T-307/1999.

(102) 49 BVerfGE 286 (1979). The Colombian Constitutional Court also recognized a right to sexual self-determination for a hermaphrodite child to decide on his/her sex (n 35).

(104) ECtHR, MC v Bulgaria, App no 39272/98, 2003-XII.

(105) Mikulic v Croatia, App no 53176/99, 2002-I.

(106) Cotlet v Romania, App no 38565/97, 3 June 2003.

(108) MacGinley and Egan v United Kingdom, App no 21825/93, 1998-III.

(109) Tysiąc v Poland, App no 5410/03, 2007-IV.

(110) Petrovic v Austria, App no 20458/92, 1998-II.
Privacy

(111) Mikulic (n 105).

(112) Odièvre v France, App no 42326/98 (Grand Chamber), 2003-III.

(113) The Case of the Diaries of Marlene Dietrich, Cour d'appel de Paris, 16 March 1955. The first case is one century older. A tribunal ordered the destruction of any publication with photographs of an actress lying dead on her bed; Tribunal Civil de la Seine, 16 June 1858.

(114) The first case of seizure of a magazine was in 1965 concerning photographs of a minor receiving medical attention in hospital. The highest civil court, the Cour de Cassation, upheld the seizure (France Editions et Publications v Veuve Gerard Philippe, 12 July 1965).

(115) Prosser (n 6), 389.

(116) Section 823(1) of the BGB; Federal Court of Justice, NJW 1954, 1404 (Leserbrief).

(118) 7 BVerfGE 198 (1958).

(120) Political Constitution of Colombia (1991), Art 86.

(121) Rosenbloom v Metromedia, Inc 403 US 29 (1971). A more restrictive standard is taken by the ECtHR in Von Hannover (n 46). Also, in the Soraya case, where the German Federal Constitutional Court held: ‘An imaginary interview adds nothing to the formation of real public opinion. As against press utterances of this sort, the protection of privacy takes unconditional priority’, 34 BVerfGE 269 (1973). British courts take a similar stance: Campbell (n 29).

(125) eg the USA PATRIOT Act (2001) relaxed some of the rules which constrained US federal authorities in conducting surveillance through wiretaps. The UK Terrorism Act 2000, ss 41–3, allows police officials to search a person reasonably suspected of being a terrorist without a warrant.

(126) 90 BVerfGE 145 (1994); Glucksberg (n 78).

(127) Colombian Constitutional Court, Decision C-309/1997.

(128) Elisabeth Zoller, ‘Le droit au respect de la vie privée aux Etats Unis’ in Sudre (n 2), 67. See also BVerfGE 33, 1.

(129) Kruslin v France, 24 April 1990, Ser A no 176-A.

(131) ECtHR, Chapman v United Kingdom, App no 27238/95 (Grand Chamber), 2001-I.

(132) eg the German Federal Constitutional Court has gone through at least three fluctuating stages in the protection of privacy against the protection of other constitutional rights: David P. Currie, The Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany (1994), 181.

(133) See Chapter 45.

(134) No, according to S and Marper (n 98); yes, according to R v Rodgers [2006] 1 SCR 554.
(135) ‘Report of Findings’ into Facebook Inc under the Personal Information Protection and Electronic Documents Act, Assistant Privacy Commissioner of Canada.

(136) Yes, according to Directive 2006/24/EC of the European Parliament and of the Council of 15 March 2006 on the retention of data generated or processed in connection with the provision of publicly available electronic communications services or of public communications networks and amending Directive 2002/58/EC (2006); no, according to a recent decision by the German Federal Constitutional Court, 1 BvR 256/08 (2010).

(137) No, according to the US Federal Trade Commission, in 2010; yes, according to the Privacy Commissioner of Canada, in 2010, but due to a ‘careless error’.

(138) Legislatures are calling hearings and lawsuits are beginning on this issue.

Manuel José Cepeda Espinosa

Manuel José Cepeda Espinosa is Former President of the Colombian Constitutional Court and Director, Program on Public Policies, Constitutional Rights and Regulations, Universidad de los Andes, Law School, Bogotá Equality

Susanne Baer

The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Constitutional Law
Edited by Michel Rosenfeld and András Sajó

Print Publication Date: May 2012
Online Publication Date: Nov 2012
DOI: 10.1093/oxfordhb/9780199578610.013.0049

Abstract and Keywords

This article first discusses key equality guarantees in law today. It then focuses on different understandings of the right to equality: as either a principle or an individually enforceable claim (the status); as an ‘empty idea’, a rationality test, or a ‘substantive’ right (the content); as a right of individuals or for groups (who bears the right?). It next examines equality as categorically distinctly structured as opposed to or as similar to other liberty interests (the test); as a general entitlement or as a specific guarantee to address particular inequalities, either separate or intersecting (the inequalities); and as general or specific regarding the application in distinct areas of life (the reach). Finally, the article addresses the often crucial question of whether equality as a fundamental right is directed exclusively against the state, or whether it may also have binding effects on other actors.

Keywords: right to equality, constitutional rights, fundamental rights, inequalities

I. Key Equality Guarantees 983
II. The Status of a Right to Equality 985
III. The Content of a Right to Equality 986
IV. The Scope: Who Bears the Right to Equality? 993
V. The Test 994
VI. The Inequalities 996
VII. The Reach 999
VIII. The Binding Force of a Right to Equality 1000

In law, equality is everywhere. But equality (Greek, isotes; Latin, aequitas, aequalitas; French, égalité; German, Gleichheit) is not just a legal issue, as an idea of justice, a principle, or a right. Not least since the French Revolution, equality has also been a political claim, and one of the most controversial ones, oscillating between egalitarianism (associated with Marxism or socialism, but also with the welfare state) and anti-egalitarianism (associated with capitalism, (neo)liberalism, but also with a liberal state). In philosophy, equality is a canonical topic with controversies around the meaning of equality, the relation between justice and equality, the material requirements and measure of the ideal of equality (equality of what?), the scope of equality (equality among whom?), and its status within a theory of justice (the value of equality).1

In law, several notions of equality inform constitutionalism around the globe. Equality is foundational to the idea of justice, to law as a form or a mode of regulation, in that the very idea of legal norms implies that they apply to all legal subjects alike. In a sense, equality forms the bedrock of the rule of law and a key component of constitutionalism. This is based on a notion of substantive universal moral equality of all human beings, an embrace of individuality. It was not endorsed by Aristotle or Plato, but has been widely held since the Stoics who emphasized the natural equality of all rational beings. Similar positions can be found in early New Testament Christianity, in the Talmud, and in Islam, as well as in Hobbes,2 Locke,3 and (p. 983) Rousseau,4 culminating in Kant's moral philosophy. In Kant's categorical imperative, a recognition of equal freedom for all rational human beings forms the sole principle of fundamental human rights. This is the idea that many a constitutional preamble alludes to (examples include the United States, India, Egypt, Kenya, etc ‘We the people’). It is also the idea of fundamental equality which informs most liberty rights (‘everyone has the right’).
Equality

More recent constitutions not only emphasize individual, but also address collective notions of belonging which undergird diversity. This is often the case in postcolonial settings, as well as in transnational constitutionalism, as in the EU which rests upon non-discrimination among member state nationals.

In addition, notions of equality also oscillate between recognition and redistribution, a right to be among equals and a right to an equal share. Constitutional law in fact merges both. Political rights are not only about recognition, but in fact distribute political power, or agency. Similarly, economic rights may appear to redistribute resources, but also regulate recognition in that they not only prevent poverty, but also marginalization (thus, precarization) and social exclusion.

Finally, a constitutional right to equality may address specific inequalities, such as privilege or disadvantage, in clauses that prohibit discrimination regarding race, sex, disability, age, etc. It may also target different spheres of application, as political equality, equal taxation, equality in education, equal access to employment etc.

To grasp the multiplicity of relevant rules and meanings, I first discuss key equality guarantees in law today. I then focus on different understandings of the right to equality: as either a principle or an individually enforceable claim (the status); as an ‘empty idea’, a rationality test, or a ‘substantive’ right (the content); as a right of individuals or for groups (who bears the right?). I next examine equality as categorically distinctly structured as opposed to or as similar to other liberty interests (the test); as a general entitlement or as a specific guarantee to address particular inequalities, either separate or intersecting (the inequalities); and as general or specific regarding the application in distinct areas of life (the reach). Finally, I address the often crucial question of whether equality as a fundamental right is directed exclusively against the state, or whether it may also have binding effects on other actors.

I. Key Equality Guarantees

Equality clauses are found at all levels of law, ranging from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (which promises equality in Articles 1, 2, 7, 10, 16, 21, 23, and 26), numerous provisions in the human rights treaties of the United Nations and of regional systems, to national, subnational, or local and communal constitutions. Equality provisions are also found in statutes and in by-laws of non-state entities, like a private club, a university, or a corporation. As in all multilevel law, equality law does not always amount to a coherent body of norms, but as an instance of legal pluralism, equality law is more or less consistent, sometimes inherently ambivalent and even at times contradictory.

In global human rights law, equality features prominently in all key documents, from the non-binding Universal Declaration to the binding International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR), as well as several treaties that address specific inequalities (discussed below). In international customary law, equality is not explicitly guaranteed, although the prohibitions against genocide and against slavery can be understood as targeting the most murderous aspects of a systematic inequality that fly in the face of equal dignity for all human beings. Regional human rights systems guarantee the right to equality. The EU Treaty references international human rights law and emphasizes sex equality, while the Charter of Fundamental Rights also addresses distributive aspects of equality. Also, under the ICCPR, even measures taken in states of emergency may not discriminate, since ‘there are elements or dimensions of the right to non-discrimination that cannot be derogated from in any circumstances’. Moreover, seemingly all national constitutions feature an equality clause.

While equality is ubiquitous in treaties and constitutions, language differs significantly, as do levels of specificity in defining the meaning and scope of equality. Often, constitutions and treaties guarantee a general right to equality. This is phrased as a right to equal treatment, equality before the law or of the law, a principle of non-distinction, and, in more recent texts, non-discrimination, or a combination of these terms and concepts. As an example, in the 2010 Constitution of Kenya, Article 27 (‘equality and freedom from discrimination’) guarantees equality before the law, equal protection and equal benefit of the law, the equal enjoyment of all rights and fundamental freedoms, equal treatment of and equal opportunities for women and men, and prohibits direct and indirect discrimination. Much more succinctly, the Fourteenth Amendment to the US Constitution, adopted in 1868, proclaims that no state shall ‘deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws’.\textsuperscript{15}

However, even such general clauses\textit{ often also institute inequalities}. In section 2, the Fourteenth Amendment to the US Constitution specifies that ‘Indians not taxed’ will not be represented, and that the right to vote is limited to ‘any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age and citizens of the United States’ who has not participated ‘in rebellion, or other crime’. Similarly, the French Declaration of the Rights of Man in 1789 did not extend its equality guarantee\textsuperscript{16} to women, inspiring an alternative draft by Olympe de Gouges in 1791; also, in spite of lobbying efforts, it did not prohibit slavery. At present, the ICCPR guarantees equality (Art 26), but only prohibits the death penalty regarding persons below age 18 and pregnant women (Art 6(5)) and reserves the right to vote for nationals (Art 25). Also, the non-binding Cairo Declaration on Human Rights in Islam (1990) proclaims a right to equality but, based on a notion of essential difference, also endorses several (p. 985) inequalities otherwise not accepted in human rights law, particularly regarding religion and gender.\textsuperscript{17} Similar inequalities are enshrined in the Arab Charter of Human Rights, revised in 2005.\textsuperscript{18} Thus, equality may be simultaneously guaranteed and limited in constitutional and human rights law; the supreme law of the land may thus promise equality but also entrench inequality and institutionalize discrimination. Some constitutions expressly address this internal tension, as Malaysia in Article 2(2).\textsuperscript{19} While equality as a fundamental right is thus ubiquitous, it differs enormously in status, binding force, content, rigor of enforcement or structure, inequalities targeted, and reach.

\section*{II. The Status of a Right to Equality}

Equality may be guaranteed and interpreted in both constitutional law and human rights law, as either a principle or as a right. This may be explicit in the legal text, but it may also be implied by reference to different procedural options. Whether or not one is able to lodge an individual complaint before a constitutional court or human rights body and to present claims subject to enforcement, can distinguish a right from a principle.

As a\textit{ principle}, equality informs the very idea of law as a general norm. Some constitutions command the state to pursue equality, as in the German Basic Law.\textsuperscript{20} And often, equality informs all other human rights as is expressly stated in clauses that read ‘Everyone has the right to …’. Equality is, then, the ‘starting point of all liberties’;\textsuperscript{21} it informs all human rights.\textsuperscript{22} As an example, under Article 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), discrimination is expressly prohibited in relation to one of the substantive rights set forth in the Convention.\textsuperscript{23}

More specifically, some constitutions feature\textit{ distributive notions} of equality. As such, equality is closely linked to social rights (see Chapters 49 and 50), but it is technically guaranteed as a principle that informs the interpretation of liberties. Then, a liberty may turn into a right to participate, or a right of equal access, which in fact amounts to a specific equality test (below).

Much more often, equality is guaranteed as a\textit{ free-standing human right against discrimination}. In the European human rights system, this move to an independent right was achieved by way of an amendment\textsuperscript{4} and in court decisions.\textsuperscript{25} In many constitutions, equality is expressly (p. 986) guaranteed as such. It is an individual right directed against unequal treatment, and more specifically recently, against discrimination. Some constitutions refer to historical disadvantage, like section 15 of the Canadian Charter. Article 1 of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) lists any distinction, exclusion or restriction ... which has the effect or purpose of impairing or nullifying the recognition, enjoyment or exercise ... of human rights and fundamental freedoms in the political, economic, social, cultural, civil or any other field.

Legal language thus already points to a variety of concepts that inform the content of a right to equality.

\section*{III. The Content of a Right to Equality}

Equality has been described as many things, among them an empty idea, a guarantee of rationality, a formal right, a substantive right, and there are discussions contrasting equality of opportunity and equality of results. There is thus no single concept that defines equality as a right, but rather several controversial interpretations of it.
Equality

The starting point of all understandings of equality is that equality is not identity or sameness, but that equality implies, based on the moral equality of all human beings, being different but fundamentally similar. However, the focuses of equality theories do shift. Some focus on the claim that all individuals are equal, others on the claim that all should be treated alike, some ground their arguments in metaphysics, some in politics. In the present context, equality means to not differentiate between individuals in irrational ways, because we are essentially equal. This is a right to equal treatment, derived from a concept of humanity, featured most prominently in Kantian rationality. This symmetrical and formal approach goes back to Aristotle and has been discussed in law as a similarly situated test.26

As such, equality amounts to the prohibition against arbitrariness, and thus to an obligation to act rationally. Some philosophers conceptualize equality in that tradition, that is, as a right to rationality,27 a right to justification,28 a right to treatment of persons as equals, with equal concern and respect,29 an ‘egalitarian plateau’,30 a promise of a deliberative reasoning before something is done. The more we consider a social distinction irrational, the more a right to equality prohibits making that distinction. In the history of equality jurisprudence, the focus on rationality has however served to weaken claims for equal treatment. The weakness of this equality concept derives from the similarity test: the more we understand people or situations to be different, the less we demand equality for them. To name an infamous example, German Nazis relied on this concept to argue that since Jews are not similar to ‘Aryans’, they could be progressively excluded from the community of Germans, up to the point of mass murder. The US Supreme Court based its endorsement of segregation between ‘Blacks’ and ‘Whites’ on a ‘separate but equal’ doctrine in Plessy v Ferguson,31 claiming that a separation was not unequal treatment. In the 1954 decision of Brown v Board of Education,32 the Supreme Court eventually found that such a differentiation bears the seed of discrimination, such that ‘separate educational facilities are inherently unequal’.33

Even if we would argue that segregation violates human dignity and the right to life, a similarity test generally allows for the exclusion and marginalization of some for being ‘different’, rather than strive for equality for all. Today, widespread examples are law on pregnancy, and law on abortion. The more one defines these to be unique, dissimilar, or ‘different’, the more one can justify ‘different’ treatment, which, in contexts of gender inequality, has the effect of discriminating against women.

At the other end of the interpretive spectrum, a right to equality may be understood as a prohibition of any distinction, because to distinguish between humans who are essentially the same is irrational. Constitutions may therefore feature a general equal treatment clause, directed against arbitrariness, and specific equality clauses, as rights against discrimination. Examples are Article 3 of the German Basic Law, section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Article 32 of the Polish Constitution, or Articles 14 to 18 of the Constitution of India. Such specific clauses may then be understood to strictly prohibit any distinction which takes into account a difference that ‘doesn’t make a difference’. For example, a right to sex equality may then be understood as a right against ever using sex to make a difference (which is discussed as ‘degendering’ in gender studies). Such an approach would indeed solve many problems of people who do not conform to a rigid sex-gender system, that is, intersexuels or people with a transgender identity. If we do not allow for sex to ever justify a difference, to make a distinction, it would not matter who we are sexually. On the other hand, an overly radical degendering may hinder an adequate understanding of diversity and pluralism, and of sex based inequality as well, that is, if one renders sex-differentiated data on inequality to be problematic. As another example, a concept of equality as a right against distinctions may inform radical secularism or laicity, which prohibits any reference to religion or belief as discriminatory. This may indeed solve problems of marginalized beliefs and non-believers, but it would also produce complicated clashes between a desire to pursue one’s spiritual life and a state that does not allow for that to matter (see Chapter 43). Thus, a rule that will not allow for any religiously inspired clothing will affect mainstream Christians much differently than devout Muslim women or orthodox Jewish men. As another example, an understanding of citizenship as radically ‘national’ and not diverse or pluralistic regarding ethnicity may inform consistent politics of equal treatment, but it may, as in France, also serve to refuse any collection of data that would bring to light discriminatory social structures. Therefore, a symmetrical or a radically ‘blind’ approach with a focus on distinctions does not allow us to address the complicated cases relating to equality in a pluralist world. Rather, an asymmetrical approach to equality seems fit to address the power relations involved, which lead to injustice in the form of discrimination.

A starting point of constitutionalism is that people are fundamentally equal in that they are human beings (based on metaphysics, or on politics), but the whole point about being human is the ability to differ, by choosing to lead one’s own life, in situations that differ tremendously, around the globe, but also within a region, a city, a social entity. This is why a constitutional right to equality is often interpreted as a right to recognition of such diversity. Historically, the focus has shifted from an emphasis on similarity to a recognition of difference, and eventually, dominance.

Then, equality is a claim to diversity and a call for equal treatment. This tension has been called by authors like Minow ‘a dilemma of difference’ in equality law; it is a central challenge to politics of multiculturalism and pluralism, to minority rights and other group based privileges (see Chapter 53). Philosophers such as Gosepath have argued that in light of this, equality is not one concept, but a bundle of principles to ensure social justice. In defining the content of a right to equality, we need to grapple with the fact that a right against a distinction does indeed target something a person may want to be positively identified with (e.g., a right to sex equality for people who identify as male or female, a right against disability discrimination for people who want to be recognized as facing specific barriers, a right against ageism for people who identify as old or young). Formal equality may not help us in certain situations where we may need an accommodation of difference.

Equality law may therefore be seen as directed against a difference we care for. Again, this is why it is so important to distinguish between an understanding of equality as a right of or to differences and equality as a right against discrimination. The challenge is particularly evident in the case of rights against discrimination relating to a disability. Disability is, in a world shaped according to specific standards, a status of non-conformity with that standard, a way of being different. Equality law cannot fight that difference, but needs to accommodate that feature of human diversity, in light of the power relations in play. Thus, human rights law like the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities from 2006 obligates states to respect and accommodate disabled people as equals (Arts 3 and 4). It calls upon us, indeed an obligation, to change the world into a barrier-free environment for all (Arts 5(3), (4) and 9). Equality then means to modify the standards we live with, rather than modify a person who does not ‘fit’. Here, equality law becomes a right to transformation, to change the structures and to redistribute power, rather than a right to change oneself to fit in.

In other instances, equality law may have to accept a difference we care for but may be directed at those aspects of that difference which amount to dominance, resulting in disadvantage. Feminist lawyer and theorist MacKinnon has famously rejected the difference approach, and conceptualized the dominance approach to equality. As a substantive right, in this view, equality is a claim to equal treatment in recognition of one’s differences: it is the prohibition of a difference amounting to an inequality. Thus, it is not difference but dominance that matters. It is called asymmetrical, substantive, or material accommodation of those who are disadvantaged, with a focus on dominance, subordination, discrimination. Here, equality is a right against being hurt, against violating the harm principle of liberal constitutionalism according to which your liberty ends when others suffer.

The substantive approach is dominant in much human rights law. Several constitutions explicitly prohibit ‘discrimination’, and courts are very clear that authorities that engage in or tolerate violence against historically disadvantaged groups or minorities violate a right to equality. The European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR), in Alekseyev v Russia, stated that lack of police protection for gay rights activists in Russia is a violation of human rights. It is, according to the Court, discrimination prohibited by equality law.

In addition, constitutional law may explicitly name the harm it is meant to stop. For example, the South African Constitution names racism and sexism as inequalities a constitution shall not tolerate. Also, the Canadian Charter of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms, states that

1. Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

2. Subsection (1) does not preclude any law, program or activity that has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups including those that are disadvantaged because of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

In jurisprudence, it is the Canadian Court which articulated this approach in Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia. Justice McIntyre explained that the similarly situated test as stated ... is seriously deficient in that it excludes any consideration of the nature of the law. If it were to be applied literally, it could be used to justify the Nuremberg laws of Adolf Hitler. Similar treatment was contemplated for all Jews. ... Thus, mere equality of application to similarly situated groups or individuals does not afford a realistic test for a violation of equality rights.

Equality

Rather, ‘consideration must be given to the content of the law, to its purpose, and its impact upon those to whom it applies, and also upon those whom it excludes from its application.’ Finally, the justice added, the rights to equality ‘are granted with the direction contained in s. 15 itself that they be without discrimination. Discrimination is unacceptable in a democratic society because it epitomizes the worst effects of the denial of equality, and discrimination reinforced by law is particularly repugnant.’ The Justice went on to define discrimination:

[it] may be described as a distinction, whether intentional or not but based on grounds relating to personal characteristics of the individual or group, which has the effect of imposing burdens, obligations, or disadvantages on such individual or group not imposed upon others, or which withholds or limits access to opportunities, benefits, and advantages available to other members of society. Distinctions based on personal characteristics attributed to an individual solely on the basis of association with a group will rarely escape the charge of discrimination, while those based on an individual's merits and capacities will rarely be so classed.

(p. 990) If equality means more than rationality, but rather addresses substantive issues, there are additional questions to answer. A famous controversy addresses the tension between equality of opportunity and equality of results. In what is closely related to this tension, the Preamble to the Constitution of India promises equality of status and of opportunity. In liberal constitutionalism, it is rather obvious that a right to equality cannot mean a right to resources others may aspir to as well, since their liberty interests would be violated, in a discriminatory fashion, if the state were to define who gets what or belongs where. Rather, liberal constitutionalism ensures that opportunities are equal, fairly distributed to all. Based on this, it all depends upon one's understanding of social reality: When do opportunities end and results begin?

Affirmative action or positive measures or quota are a case in point. Do laws that promote certain individuals who have been discriminated against in the past or who are underrepresented in a particular context violate or implement the right to equality? Does it violate the right to equality if women or members of linguistic minorities or African-Americans or disabled people are given a job instead of an equally qualified man, member of an ethnically defined majority, or a person not physically challenged? Most cases arise in the area of employment, but affirmative measures are also controversial in politics as I discuss below.

Generally, many courts have stated that affirmative action promotes equality, rather than violating it. More specifically, the German Federal Constitutional Court stated in 1992 that ‘the provision that men and women shall have equal rights is designed not only to do away with legal norms that base advantages or disadvantages on sex but also to bring about equal opportunity for men and women in the future. Its aim is the equalization of living conditions.’ Also, the South African Constitutional Court stated in Hugo, a complex case brought by fathers that were excluded from being pardoned from a prison term like mothers:

The prohibition on unfair discrimination in the interim Constitution seeks not only to avoid discrimination against people who are members of disadvantaged groups. It seeks more than that. At the heart of the prohibition of unfair discrimination lies a recognition that the purpose of our new constitutional and democratic order is the establishment of a society in which all human beings will be accorded equal dignity and respect regardless of their membership of particular groups. The achievement of such a society in the context of our deeply inequalitarian past will not be easy, but that that is the goal of the Constitution should not be forgotten or overlooked.

However, it all depends on the legal scheme chosen in a given context. The European Court of Justice has developed a sophisticated jurisprudence in the area of employment. The Court stated in Kalanke that laws designed to promote women over equally qualified men in male-dominated employment sectors are meant to ‘counteract the prejudicial effects on women in employment which arise from social attitudes, behaviour and structures’. But not every law will do. The Court stated that a national rule which provides that, where equally qualified men and women are candidates for the same promotion in fields where there are fewer women than men at the level of the relevant post, women are automatically to be given priority, involves discrimination on grounds of sex.

(p. 991) In fact, there may be good reasons to prefer an individual man. Affirmative action then needs to guarantee an opportunity, but not an ‘automatic’ result. Similarly, the Supreme Court of India, in Uttar Pradesh v Pradip Tandon, struck down a rule which reserved places in medical school for candidates from rural areas because it was overbroad. It emphasized, however, that the government may very well design better schemes to promote ‘socially and educationally backward classes of citizens’.

In Marshall, the European Court of Justice explained that it appears that even where male and female candidates are equally qualified, male candidates tend to be promoted in preference to female candidates particularly because of prejudices and stereotypes concerning the role and capacities of women in working life and the fear, for example, that women will interrupt their careers more frequently, that owing to household and family duties they will be less flexible in their working hours, or that they will be absent from work more frequently because of pregnancy, childbirth and breastfeeding. For these reasons, the mere fact that a male candidate and a female candidate are equally qualified does not mean that they have the same chances. It follows that a national rule in terms of which, subject to the application of the saving clause, female candidates for promotion who are equally as qualified as the male candidates are to be treated preferentially in sectors where they are under-represented may [be consistent with the right to equality] if such a rule may counteract the prejudicial effects on female candidates of the attitudes and behaviour described above and thus reduce actual instances of inequality which may exist in the real world. However, ... such a national measure specifically favouring female candidates cannot guarantee absolute and unconditional priority for women ... [But if the rule] contains a saving clause does not exceed those limits if, in each individual case, it provides for male candidates who are equally as qualified as the female candidates a guarantee that the candidatures will be the subject of an objective assessment which will take account of all criteria specific to the individual candidates and will override the priority accorded to female candidates where one or more of those criteria tilts the balance in favour of the male candidate. In this respect, however, it should be remembered that those criteria must not be such as to discriminate against female candidates.

Put differently, affirmative action rules promote equality if they themselves do not reinforce stereotypes and perpetuate discrimination, not even through the back door of a savings clause.

This is also a key issue in US jurisprudence on affirmative action in education. The end of formal segregation, Brown v Board of Education, did not end substantive inequality. In particular, US universities have sought to promote minorities and diversify student bodies with a variety of rules which have repeatedly been attacked in the courts. There is a long line of cases decided by the US Supreme Court, the last to date being Grutter v Bollinger, where the Court stated that:

We have held that all racial classifications imposed by government must be analyzed by a reviewing court under strict scrutiny. ... This means that such classifications are constitutional only if they are narrowly tailored to further compelling governmental interests. ... When race-based action is necessary to further a compelling governmental interest, such action does not violate the constitutional guarantee of equal protection so long as the narrow-tailoring requirement is also satisfied.

(p. 992) And then, the Court says: ‘context matters’. In the case, Michigan Law School, as part of its goal of ‘assembling a class that is both exceptionally academically qualified and broadly diverse’, seeks to ‘enrol a “critical mass” of minority students’. The Law School's interest, the Court stated, is not simply to assure within its student body some specified percentage of a particular group merely because of its race or ethnic origin. That would amount to outright racial balancing, which is patently unconstitutional. ... Rather, the Law School's concept of critical mass is defined by reference to the educational benefits that diversity is designed to produce.

And, the Court continued, ‘These benefits are substantial’. In addition, the Court noted, the Law School did not perpetuate stereotyping:
Equality

The Law School does not premise its need for critical mass on ‘any belief that minority students always (or even consistently) express some characteristic minority viewpoint on any issue.’ ... To the contrary, diminishing the force of such stereotypes is both a crucial part of the Law School’s mission, and one that it cannot accomplish with only token numbers of minority students.

To achieve this, a system must be narrowly tailored, it cannot use a quota system—it cannot ‘insulat[e] each category of applicants with certain desired qualifications from competition with all other applicants’. Instead, a university may consider race or ethnicity only as a “plus” in a particular applicant’s file, without ‘insulating the individual from comparison with all other candidates for the available seats’. In other words, an admissions program must be ‘flexible enough to consider all pertinent elements of diversity in light of the particular qualifications of each applicant, and to place them on the same footing for consideration, although not necessarily according them the same weight.’

More generally, equality also touches on the limits of democracy. Who shall be allowed to be treated like a citizen? Who loses the right to be treated as a citizen? Not only postnational and multilevel democracies have to grapple with political equality, global migration has resulted in multinational populations, which also form transnational networks. The German Federal Constitutional Court decided that ‘there can be no democratic state without a body politic, ... the people, from whom all state authority emanates’, but held that this body must that be a ‘cohesive, unified group’. Later, the German Basic Law, as many other EU member state laws, was amended to extend local voting rights to EU citizens. However, ‘third country nationals’ have no vote. In addition, many states do deny voting rights to citizens living permanently abroad, such as Korea. Today, in light of a post-Westphalian global order, discussions of cosmopolitanism revive calls for a right to political equality. Basically, equality then means to have a resident voice in local matters, independent of nationality. This is not a new notion, since it has been known to the Stoics as well as Erasmus von Rotterdam, to Grotius as well as Kant, and more recently, to philosophers like Rawls, Tilly, Benhabib, Pogge, or Held. But it is, generally, not the law.

Finally, many conflicts arise when states strive to ensure representation of all factions of society in politics, including minorities. In France, the Constitutional Council rejected (p. 993) minority rules in Elections in New Caledonia. India is known to employ several mechanisms in that realm. In Murthy et al v India, the Supreme Court upheld reserved seats for members of backward classes in local self-government, the panchayats. It used a strict proportionality test, which results in ordering a maximum level of reserved seats, but also leaves room for minority quotas. The Court made a distinction between election and selection:

The nature and purpose of reservations in the context of local self-government is considerably different from that of higher education and public employment. ... [T]he principles that have been evolved in relation to the reservation policies [there] cannot be readily applied in the context of local self-government. Even when made, they ... can be much shorter.

Socio-economic deprivation, it stated, may result in disadvantages when people are selected for a job, but may not necessarily have such effects when people are elected for a seat. According to this jurisprudence, the right to equality is not a formal claim, but needs to be applied in context. Similarly, the Hong Kong court struck a balance between a strict right to equality in elections, and an equally valid claim to ensure participation of minorities, by referring to international law, the ICCPR. In Tse Kwan Sang v Pat Heung Rural Cttee it stated that even rules that ensure representation of indigenous people need to be non-discriminatory in nature, that is, may not exclude women. In the US case Santa Clara Pueblo v Martinez, that balance however tilted against a woman who sought equal rights in a minority context in the United States and inspired a lasting controversy on the tension between group equality rights and individual ones. Overall, equality law confronts complicated questions which arise from our multiplicity of belongings today.

IV. The Scope: Who Bears the Right to Equality?

Equality is a right to address the fundamental similarity of human beings as well as the differences among them, to eventually target discrimination. As a fundamental human right, it is a claim for individuals, but equality also invites collective claims, as in the case of Martinez against her Pueblo kinship. As another example, equality may motivate a state to impose an official language on its territory, but equality will also invite claims by people who identify with another language, as a right to differ. Often, courts then seek a rather pragmatic compromise among competing goals. In Latvia, the Constitutional Court upheld a law which empowered the state to transcribe German last names into Latvian spelling, yet required the state to add a ‘special note’ with the original name in documents.\textsuperscript{60} But does this solve the tension between a collective entity and the individual?

Famously, Article 27 of the ICCPR addresses rights of minorities, yet is interpreted as an individual right.\textsuperscript{61} Also, some national constitutions protect minorities, and constitutional law (p. 994) may also grant rights of recognition and redistribution to corporations or other legal entities. Most prominently, much constitutional law grants rights of self-determination to churches and religious communities, often based on the notion of equal treatment of all religious beliefs. However, such rights, similar to rights of linguistic or cultural minorities, not only serve to protect their existence, but can also be used to curtail the rights of their members in relation to such organizations or groups. A tension arises around ‘Minorities within Minorities’\textsuperscript{62} or more precisely: of diverse individuals in seemingly homogenous groups. Such a concept of equal rights for groups assumes that such collectives may be clearly distinguished from one another, and that people always belong to any one group, rather than many. Empirically, this is highly problematic because most groups have boundaries which are both blurred and shifting, and because individuals live different group identities or share multiple group characteristics. Thus, the construction of groups in law, as ‘legal groupism’,\textsuperscript{63} collides with a notion of individual rights. In light of this, some argue that there are two aspects of the right to equality: to prevent discrimination and to support minorities.\textsuperscript{64} Others conceptualize equality as an individual right for respect of a socially situated identity, which eventually protects a group as well. In Santa Clara Pueblo v Martinez, Justice White argued in his dissent that equality strives to protect individuals from arbitrary and unjust actions, including those of their tribal governments.

V. The Test

We have seen that a concept of equality as a guarantee of rationality and a right to justification informs a similarly situated test, most famously known as the test applied by the US Supreme Court, but explicitly rejected by Canadian jurisprudence and not applied by the European Court of Justice and others. The more equality is understood as a right against discrimination, the more a test moves away from a comparative exercise and resembles a liberty test, directed against a violation of a fundamental interest or need. In addition, equality allows for an interpretation of liberties as social rights. Thus, there are, in the world of constitutional law, three different tests for equality: a similarity assessment, a discrimination test (a negative ‘freedom from’ state intervention), or an egalitarian test (a positive ‘claim to’ access, distribution, resources).

Regarding the egalitarian test of equality as a positive claim to something, there are two versions of equality guarantees: as a minimum guarantee of basic resources or as access to resources without discrimination. Many European constitutions contain social or welfare state clauses.\textsuperscript{65} The Hungarian Constitutional Court has interpreted the right to social security—that is, basic economic equality—as a principle only (in Article 70E). Conversely, the German Federal Constitutional Court has famously interpreted the principle of the welfare state in Article 20 of the Basic Law, in conjunction with the right to dignity, Article 1, as an individual right to a minimum guarantee of existence,\textsuperscript{66} an obligation to care for ‘those in (p. 995) need’, like people with physical or mental handicaps, to secure ‘the basic conditions for a dignified existence’.\textsuperscript{67} This may also be understood as a right to basic economic equality: the state must ‘provide[s] the basic conditions for a humane existence of its citizens. ... As long as these basic conditions are not at stake, it lies in the discretion of the legislator to what extent social assistance can and is to be granted.’\textsuperscript{68} In contrast, the discrimination test serves to protect individuals from the state discriminating against them either explicitly (direct discrimination) or by way of seemingly neutral measures (indirect or disparate impact discrimination). Here, the decisive step is not to compare someone to others, but to understand whether someone has been harmed.

However, equality as a right to equal access to liberties may also amount to a constitutional obligation of state action. This is explicit in derivative equality clauses that guarantee equal enjoyment of liberties.\textsuperscript{69} The ECHR as well as the UN Human Rights Committee have used what could be called the equal access test in cases on sex, sexual orientation, or marital status discrimination in social security.\textsuperscript{70} Another example is the EU law on equal pay for equal work with an elaborate jurisprudence on sex equality regarding renumeration. If the state offers or enforces or protects something, it has to do this for all citizens or even residents alike. Courts do not determine what is distributed, but courts ensure that there must be no discrimination in distribution. This has been stated by the ECHR. In a case of a woman who sought divorce from an abusive husband, but had no money to pay for legal advice, the ECtHR argued:

fulfilment of a duty under the Convention on occasion necessitates some positive action on the part of the State; in such circumstances, the State cannot simply remain passive and there is ... no room to distinguish between acts and omissions. The obligation to secure an effective right of access to the courts falls into this category of duty.71

However, comparative studies indicate that such positive rights claims are less successful than negative ones.72 It should be noted however, that several fundamental rights catalogues of the late twentieth and twenty-first centuries do explicitly set forth rights to social security, to work and to protection against unemployment, to rest and leisure, including periodic holidays with pay, to an adequate standard of living, to education, and to the protection of one’s scientific, literary, and artistic production.73 This is often labeled as the rise of a new ‘generation’ of human rights.

However, the jurisprudence of rights to equal access may be understood as an application of the right to equality to liberties, which eventually informs enforceable social rights. This shatters the categorization of human rights as ‘generations’, a conceptual frame that follows the history of dominant ideas.74 Rather, one may understand both as components of constitutionalism.75 (p. 996) The first generation, according to the common narrative, consists of civil and political rights, while the second generation features economic, social, and cultural rights, with a third generation for collective rights to development, sustainability, etc. Yet as a cross-cutting right, equality is a principle that informs the liberties of the first generation, and the defining feature of the second generation, originating in notions of distributive justice, the socialist traditions of the Saint-Simonians of early nineteenth-century France and various emancipatory movements in different regions, at different times, and with different inequalities to struggle against. These movements in fact, just like the current efforts to fight poverty, sought to break free of the chains of inequality, and thus demanded liberties to further that claim. In some ways, a call for equal rights is thus a reaction to a limited concept of liberty, which tolerates or even legitimizes the exploitation of people for profit, be it in colonies or factories. Different from that, one may also understand equality to inform all rights to liberty. Some courts do thus employ equality to safeguard fair contracts, or emphasize that no person can have his or her dignity or enjoy a liberty if economically or socially backward, for example the Indian Supreme Court in Kesavananda v Kerala.76 The same court stated that ‘socio-economic democracy’ is built into the Indian constitution, in Ahmedabad Municipal Co v Nawab Khan et al.77

Overall, equality and the notion of social rights are thus closely related, exemplified in Article 2 of the ICESCR, in Article 26 of the American Convention on Human Rights, and in the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights 1981, while granted separately in the European Social Charter (revised in 1996). The close relation is evident in cases on equal access to water, which are currently rather prominent. The South African Court held that not every citizen has a right to the same type of access, but that it must nonetheless install a proportionate scheme which delivers water, in light of limited resources, to all.78 Also, equality informs much jurisprudence on health care, since unequal access to medical treatment may easily be read to constitute discrimination rather than just a decision on how to distribute social goods. Examples include the DiBella Treatment case in India,79 in which the International Criminal Court held that there must be equal access to treatment. In Latvia, the Constitutional Court held in 2005 that childcare cannot be limited to parents not working. In Egypt, an Administrative Court stopped a new drug-pricing system, because it would violate the right to equal access to drugs of all Egyptians if prices were not kept low.80

VI. The Inequalities

Philosophers tend to ask: Equality ‘in what respect’? This is also a key question in law. Constitutions and human rights treaties mostly contain a general equality clause, but very often also name specific inequalities, either separate from each other or intersecting, and either in exhaustive lists or in non-exhaustive lists. Such lists may be seen as naming paradigmatic examples of structural or systemic discrimination, which, if non-exhaustive, do promise equal rights in analogous cases as well.

Historically, the call for equality was a rejection of specific inequalities, and at least a call for justification, and as such a truly modern right. Neither nobility nor place of birth nor religion nor sex nor certain physical features (still termed ‘race’) shall make a difference, which is what (p. 997) older equality clauses promise. Gradually, sexual orientation, disability and age and genetic features are added to such lists. Furthermore, some constitutions feature the prohibition of discrimination of people from particular regions, like the mountains, which indicates that social deprivation and exclusion may be related to geographic location. However, equality law does usually not prohibit economic inequalities. The US Supreme Court, in San Antonio Independent School District v Rodriguez,\textsuperscript{91} expressly declined to recognize the poor as a suspect class for equal protection analysis. Also, DeShaney v Winnebago County Department of Social Services,\textsuperscript{92} may be understood to hand distributive questions regarding state protection via welfare programs over to ‘democratic political processes’.\textsuperscript{93} However, even in the United States, some state constitutions oblige the legislature to care for the poor.\textsuperscript{84} And again, much law addresses economic discrimination in combining liberty claims with equality to inform rights of access, as social rights (discussed above).

As one prominent example, the South African Constitution from 1996 names racism and sexism as key targets,\textsuperscript{85} and also lists ‘race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth’ as specific inequalities the Constitution shall strive to erase. The constitution of Kenya, in 2010, prohibits discrimination ‘on any ground, including race, sex, pregnancy, marital status, health status, ethnic or social origin, colour, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, dress, language or birth.’\textsuperscript{86} The European Charter of Fundamental Rights, drafted in 2000, prohibits discrimination on ‘any ground such as sex, race, colour, ethnic or social origin, genetic features, language, religion or belief, political or any other opinion, membership of a national minority, property, birth, disability, age or sexual orientation.’ The African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights names ‘race, ethnic group, color, sex, language, religion, political or any other opinion, national and social origin, fortune, birth or other status’,\textsuperscript{87} and protects women and children in additional charters.\textsuperscript{88} In the global human rights system, general equality clauses with basic lists have been supplemented with specific conventions that target one inequality at a time, namely racism,\textsuperscript{89} sexism discriminating against women,\textsuperscript{90} ageism regarding children,\textsuperscript{91} racism and xenophobia regarding migrant laborers,\textsuperscript{92} and ableism\textsuperscript{93}

Although such lists—either exhaustive or not—seem similar, and imply an analogy of inequalities, there is a tendency to treat inequalities unequally. The German Basic Law emphasizes sex equality in Article 3(2), lists specific aspects which should not amount to privilege or disadvantage in Article 3(3)(1), and provides an affirmative guarantee regarding disability in Article 3(3)(2). Similarly, the UN human rights treaties differ in scope and structure, and often do address sex inequality separately (ie Article 3 of the ICESCR and the ICCPR), but also (p. 998) emphasize that several inequalities often intersect. Discrimination does not focus on one characteristic or ground only, but subordinates individuals in a multidimensional way, where the specific interdependency of sexual orientation, ethnicity, ability, age etc matter.\textsuperscript{94}

In addition, even ‘classic’ items on the list are controversial. The paradigmatic example is ‘race’, prominent in many constitutions to target racism, yet in itself an expression of a racist theory, a theory which claims that people belong to different races. This has been addressed by the UN World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance in Durban in 2001, which strongly rejected ‘any doctrine of racial superiority, along with theories which attempt to determine the existence of so-called distinct human races.’

As another example, the meaning of dis/ability is often unclear. Also, the meaning of sex became controversial. While some constitutional jurisprudence treats a right to sex equality to also protect people who love people of the same sex against discrimination,\textsuperscript{95} others treat this as a different topic, either analogous to other listed grounds,\textsuperscript{96} or accepted as a ‘rational’ distinction. The controversy is displayed in a US decision, Romer v Evans,\textsuperscript{97} where the majority struck down a state referendum that banned laws that prohibit discrimination against homosexual or bisexual practices or relationships, thus limiting the reach of equal rights, while the dissenters would have upheld such laws which they interpreted as only prohibiting ‘special treatment’ of sexual minorities. Based on a constitution that names sexual orientation as a ground in need of equal rights protection, the South African Court has consistently held that there is no reason whatsoever to disadvantage people because of the sex of the person they love.\textsuperscript{98} But even when such express protection is absent, fundamental rights jurisprudence around the globe gradually extends equality protection to sexual minorities. In Salgueiro da Silva Mouta v Portugal,\textsuperscript{99} a gay father was protected against the denial of parenthood because of his sexual orientation. The argument that a child should grow up in a ‘traditional Portuguese family’ was rejected as discriminatory. In 2011, the Brazilian Supreme Court held that all rights granted to ‘stable unions’ must be granted to homosexual and heterosexual relationships alike.\textsuperscript{100}
Also, some see ‘sex’ as relating to men and women only, while others have used sex equality guarantees to protect transsexuals as well as transgender and intersexuals against discrimination. However, cross-dressing or transvestism has not been accepted as such an inequality. This is based on an understanding of listed inequalities as characteristics which people cannot choose to live or not live, but that form a component of one’s identity. Therefore, many legislators state very clearly that equality regarding sex or sexual orientation does not protect sexual practices that harm others, like sexual abuse of children or pedophilia. Rather, non-harmful sexual practices are protected as part of private life. In light of this, same-sex couples may enjoy family life, Schalk and Kopf v Austria, yet were not granted a human right to be treated like heterosexuals regarding marriage.

VII. The Reach

Similar to the differences it underscores in listing specific inequalities, constitutional law like human rights law targets inequalities in different areas of life, thus varying in its reach.

As a starting point of constitutionalism, the basic notion of universal moral equality informs political equality, thus democracy, by requiring that a political system equally recognize all those who are governed by it. Here, equality guarantees voice in categorical contrast to regimes which formally distinguish classes of citizens, as in apartheid, colonialism, or caste systems. This is why courts have generally subjected elections to a strict equality standard. Some states strip citizens of voting rights for being imprisoned, while the South African Court extended the right to vote to prisoners, in August v Electoral Commission, similar to the Canadian Federal Court of Appeal, in Sauvé v Canada. The Canadian Supreme Court, however, also upheld an exclusion from membership in parliament for people convicted of an illegal practice related to voting. The South African Court, although strict regarding prisoners, however upheld an ID requirement to ensure equality in that one person has not more than one vote, even if such requirement imposes an additional burden on people. Although ‘the importance of the right to vote is self-evident and can never be overstated’, the South African Constitutional Court stated that the mere existence of the right to vote without proper arrangements for its effective exercise does nothing for a democracy; it is both empty and useless, which is why the state may require special IDs because and when the old IDs were issued by the apartheid government on a racial basis and thus ‘constitute a powerful symbol and reminder of a shameful past.

However, Justice O’Regan dissented: since a large number of voters carried the older ID, one should not disenfranchise them by asking for another form, ‘in a country where such a right is only in its infancy’. Formal requirements are different form economic expectations. The US Supreme Court stated that the right to equality in elections is violated by a state ‘whenever it makes the affluence of the voter or payment of any fee an electoral standard’. Nor may local voting rights be tied to property. But it remains highly controversial whether less direct property-related opportunities to influence elections, like party or campaign funding by corporations, violate the right to political equality. The US Supreme Court upheld such financial power, while many constitutional systems at least require full transparency and often mandate absolute caps or tax deduction caps on such donations.

Closely related to political equality is equality before the law, as equal access to law enforcement and equal treatment in the legal system. This is why many constitutions feature rights to fair trial, rights to public hearings in court, and rights to access to justice. Again, some courts interpret equality as a right to equal access in fact, that is, a mandate to support poor people who want to bring a case, a public defender system, and similar safeguarding measures.

Another constitutional dimension of equality focuses on distribution, as a right to socio-economic equality. As discussed above, this is often constructed as equal access to a liberty, a social dimension of fundamental rights. More specifically, tax law is also very often subjected to rigid yet formal equality standards, in that everyone shall be taxed based on individual economic status. In fact, however, many constitutional courts are regularly confronted with tax measures that disparately burden people in a given society. In addition, several constitutions and all social rights catalogues expressly address equality in employment. As one example, EU law prohibits sex discrimination in pay.
Finally, equality rights may also extend to cultural recognition, a right to cultural equality. More recent constitutional and human rights law addresses equal respect in the sense of pluralism in that they guarantee both for equal treatment and non-discrimination but simultaneously affirm diversity, heritage, tradition, and culture. Examples include the Constitutive Act of the African Union, Article 2, as well as Articles 8 and 10 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU). Often, such equality law is guaranteed in the context of education and rights to schools, where constitutional courts may protect minority curricula or institutions. More specifically, many constitutions and human rights treaties take particular care regarding equality of families, in that they guarantee equal rights for children born in or outside marriage, or guarantee a right to equal access to marriage and against forced marriage, often using age as a proxy to indicate that children shall not marry since one cannot know whether it is based on free will, absent coercion. Again, the meaning of fundamental rights has changed significantly. Historically, this has been understood as a right against sex discrimination consisting in not to have daughters married off. While today this remains a key issue, it also needs to be regarded as a right to protect men from forcibly being married to women they do not know.

VIII. The Binding Force of a Right to Equality

Generally, constitutions limit state power, as do human rights. However, inequalities are often deeply embedded in our societies, which is why a right against discrimination may be rendered ineffective if it is limited to address state action only. Regarding political equality, it may suffice to have a constitutional right to vote and to stand for elections, as in Article 39 of the European Charter of Fundamental Rights, as the relevant domain is exclusively within the purview of the state. But regarding economic, social, and cultural equality, private actors also engage in discrimination, whether intentionally or not. Therefore, although the binding force of fundamental rights to equality is particularly controversial, it is more likely than liberty interests to be expanded to cover private actors. According to the German doctrine of third party effect, constitutional law does at least address public enforcement of private acts. According to EU equality law, private actors, both in employment as in markets of goods and services, are bound by strong equality directives. Also, UN human rights law expressly addresses some inequalities in private spheres, as does CEDAW to protect women in all walks of life. Thus, equality may be more than a negative right against the state, and it may inform a positive obligation of states to act against discrimination.

(p. 1001) In the area of human rights, committees have argued for a state obligation to prevent discrimination by public and by private actors. Similarly, some constitutions explicitly extend the binding force of a right to equality to all actors. But in most constitutions, equality is simply stated as a right, with no further specification. Then, general standards of constitutional law apply: courts that enforce private law are bound by the constitution, and may thus interpret private action, protected as liberty—that is, of contracting—to be limited when it amounts to discrimination. As an example, the German Federal Constitutional Court has developed a doctrine of ‘disturbed contractual parity’, to stop banks from exploiting naïve customers based on rigid credit contracts, or to stop companies from harming former employees in contracts which oblige those to not take up employment close to their former job. Here, the general right to equality, in the sense of equal standing and recognition based on equal knowledge and competence is applied to limit an overly libertarian understanding of liberty. Rather, a fundamental right to equality seems to inform a notion of individual rights of socially situated individuals.

Bibliography

Notes:

(7) See Constitution of the Republic of South Africa: ‘united in our diversity’ as well as ‘every citizen is equally protected by law’.

(8) See Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, Preamble: ‘The Union contributes to the preservation and to the development of these common values while respecting the diversity of the cultures and traditions of the peoples of Europe as well as the national identities of the Member States.’

(9) See Ch 2 of the Lisbon Treaty on European Citizenship.

(12) See Arts 2, 3, 15, and 157.

(13) See Ch III on equality, Ch IV on solidarity.

(14) Gen Comment No 29, CCPR/C/21/Rev.1/Add.11.

(15) Section 1.

(16) See Art 1: ‘Men are born and remain free and equal in rights. Social distinctions can be founded only on the common utility.’

(17) See Art 7, which states that

(a) Woman is equal to man in human dignity, and has her own rights to enjoy as well as duties to perform, and has her own civil entity and financial independence, and the right to retain her name and lineage. (b) The husband is responsible for the maintenance and welfare of the family.

(18) See Art 3(3):

Men and women are equal in respect of human dignity, rights and obligations within the framework of the positive discrimination established in favor of women by the Islamic Shariah, other divine laws and by applicable laws and legal instruments. Accordingly, each State party pledges to take all the requisite measures to guarantee equal opportunities and effective equality between men and women in the enjoyment of all the rights set out in this Charter.

(19) ‘Except as expressly authorized by this Constitution, there shall be no discrimination. ...’

(20) See Art 3(2)(2): ‘The state shall promote the actual implementation of equal rights for women and men and take steps to eliminate disadvantages that now exist.’

(22) UN Charter (1945), Art 1(3).

(23) But note Burden v United Kingdom, App no 13378/05, 29 April 2008 (Grand Chamber), para 58.

(24) Protocol 12 (n 11).

Equality

(31) 163 US 537 (1896).

(33) Ibid 495.

(35) Gosepath (n 1).

(38) ECtHR Appl nos 4916/07, 25924/08 and 14599/09, 23 October 2010.

(39) Ibid:

77. . . . The Court concludes that the Government failed to carry out an adequate assessment of the risk to the safety of the participants in the events and to public order ...

81. The Court further reiterates that it would be incompatible with the underlying values of the Convention if the exercise of Convention rights by a minority group were made conditional on its being accepted by the majority. Were this so, a minority group’s rights to freedom of religion, expression and assembly would become merely theoretical rather than practical and effective as required by the Convention.

(41) South African Constitution, s 1(b).

(42) Secion 15, ‘Equality Rights’.

(43) [1989] 1 SCR 143.

(45) 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC).

(47) Ibid para 20.

(48) (1975) 1 SCC 267.

(49) Case C-409/95 [1997].

(52) Korean Constitutional Court, Overseas Citizens Voting Rights Ban, 11-1 KCCR 54, 97Hun-Ma253.

(53) See Gillian Brock and Harry Brighouse (eds), The Political Philosophy of Cosmopolitanism (2005).

(54) 85-196 DC, 8 August 1985.

(56) [1999] 3 HKLRD 267.

(57) 436 US 49 (1978).

(59) See n 57.

(60) Mentzen Case no 2001-04-0103.

(61) General Comment No 23.

(62) This is the title of a book edited by Avigail Eisenberg and Jeff Spinner-Halev, Equality, Rights and Diversity (2005).

(63) On social groupism, see Rogers Brubaker, Ethnicity without Groups (2004).

(64) Francesco Capotorti, Study on the rights of persons belonging to ethnic, religious and linguistic minorities (1978), reprinted in 1991, UN Centre for HR E.91.XIV.2, 26 para 585.

(65) See Finnish Constitution, s 15: ‘Public authorities shall ... secure for everyone adequate social welfare and health services. ... ’

(66) BVerfGE 1, 97 (104f) 1951.

(67) BVerfGE 40, 121 (133) 1975.

(68) BVerfGE 82, 60 (1990); also in BVerfG, 1 BvL 1/09 (2010) Hartz IV.

(69) As in ECHR, Art 14, now expanded in Protocol 12 (n 11).

(70) See ECtHR, Carson and Others, App no 42184/05, 2010 (Grand Chamber), para 63; General Comment No 18 (37th session, 1989, UN Doc HRI/GEN/1 Rev.3).

(71) Airey v Ireland, 32 ECHR (Ser A), para 25 (1979).

(73) Universal Declaration of Human Rights, Arts 22–27; European Charter of Fundamental Rights; Banjul Charter.

(74) See Henry J. Steiner, Philip Alston, and Ryan Goodman (eds), International Human Rights in Context: Law, Politics, Morals (3rd edn, 2008), Pt A.

(76) (1973) Supp SCR 1, 280.

(79) 1998.

(80) Case No 2457/64 (2010).

(83) Ibid 195.
(84) eg Alabama, Kansas, New York, and Oklahoma.

(85) Section 1(b).

(86) Article 27(4).

(87) Article 2.

(90) CEDAW (1976).

(96) See the Canadian Supreme Court, Egan v Canada [1995] 2 SCR 513: ‘The historic disadvantage suffered by homosexuals has been widely recognized and documented’.

(98) See Minister of Home Affairs v Fourie, 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC).

(99) ECtHR, App no 33290/96, 1999.

(100) ADI 4277 and ADPF 132.

(102) Under the ECHR, see ECtHR, Smith and Grady v United Kingdom, App nos 33985/96 and 33986/96, 1999-VI; L and V v Austria, App nos 39392/98 and 39829/98, 9 January 2003.

(104) Ibid 62: ‘In that connection the Court observes that marriage has deep-rooted social and cultural connotations which may differ largely from one society to another’.

(107) 1999 (3) SALR 1 (CC).

(110) New National Party v RSA, 1999 (3) SALR 191 (CC).

(114) ICCPR, ie Nahlik v Austria (608/95).

(115) Kenya, Art 27(5): ‘A person shall not discriminate directly or indirectly against another person …’.

(116) Another example is BVerfG, 1 BvR 12/92 (2001) marriage contract.

Susanne Baer

Susanne Baer is Justice of the Federal Constitutional Court (Germany), Professor of Public Law and Gender Studies, Humboldt University Berlin and James W. Cook Global Law Professor, University of Michigan Law School
This article highlights the trials and tribulations of citizenship in a world of increasing mobility and diversity. The discussion is divided into three parts. Section I provides a concise overview of citizenship's multiple meanings and interpretations. Section II constitutes the bulk of the discussion. It begins by exploring questions of membership acquisition and transfer, which legally determine 'who belongs' within the boundaries of a given political community, either by birth or naturalization. It then assesses three recent developments: the growing recognition of dual nationality; the revival of debates about involuntary citizenship revocation; and the 'cultural turn' in citizenship discourse, which often makes inclusion in the body politic more difficult for those deemed 'too different' from the majority community. Section III charts the major challenges and opportunities facing citizenship in the twenty-first century.

Keywords: citizenship, birth, naturalization, dual nationality, citizenship revocation

I. Citizenship Matters 1003
II. On Becoming a Citizen: The Legal Dimension 1005
   1. Jus Solum: The Territoriality Principle 1005
   2. Jus Sanguinis: The Parentage Principle 1008
   3. Emergent Trends: Borrowing, Dual Nationality, and the Loss of Citizenship 1010
   4. Naturalization: The Return of Culture 1012

III. Piercing into the Future: Citizenship's New Frontiers 1016

Despite all the fashionable predictions regarding the demise of citizenship, it is back with a vengeance. Politicians worldwide stress its importance; public policymakers debate how best to make citizenship meaningful in an age of globalization and communication flows, as well as growing migration pressures. Legislatures have also taken an interest, introducing new citizenship tests and crafting more restrictive admission criteria for various migrant categories. Constitutional and high courts around the globe have become embroiled in citizenship matters, too. They have found themselves called upon to address not only perennial dilemmas (such as defining the boundaries of membership as they intersect, for example, with changing definitions of marriage and the family), but also foundational questions concerning the constitutional limits of state power in determining whether to give legal sanction to indefinite detention of non-citizens, or the rationality of using immigration law as anti-terrorism law.

Scholars, too, have turned their gaze to citizenship once again after many years of neglect. This renaissance of sorts has given birth to the multidisciplinary field of citizenship studies which has drawn insightful contributions from law to cultural studies, philosophy to international relations. This new scholarship frequently gives ample attention to emerging postnational, supranational, or transnational conceptions of membership more than to the core legal and constitutional aspects of citizenship. This chapter aims to address this imbalance by bringing back into the heart of our discussion the role of law, institutions, and the state, highlighting from a comparative perspective the trials and tribulations of citizenship in a world of increased mobility and diversity.

The discussion is divided into three parts. Section I provides a concise overview of citizenship's multiple meanings and interpretations. Section II constitutes the bulk of the discussion. It begins by exploring questions of membership acquisition and transfer, which legally determine 'who belongs' within the boundaries of a given political community, either by birth or naturalization. It then assesses three recent developments: the growing recognition of dual nationality; the revival of debates about involuntary citizenship revocation; and the ‘cultural turn’ in citizenship discourse, which often makes inclusion in the body politic more difficult for those deemed ‘too different’ from the majority community. Section III charts the major challenges and opportunities facing citizenship in the twenty-first century.

I. Citizenship Matters

While citizenship has been variously defined and gone through many transformations, the basic facts are simple enough. As Rogers Smith observes, the ‘oldest, most basic, and most prevalent meaning [of citizenship] is a certain sort of membership in a political community’. Although the scale and scope of the political community has ranged from city-state to empire, citizenship has always been associated (at least since Aristotle) with political relations. From the Athenians we draw the tradition of associating citizenship with collective self-governance. From the Roman tradition we carry forward the idea of citizen as possessing a formal legal status with certain associated privileges and responsibilities.

Today, citizenship laws also serve to determine who is entitled, as a recent Canadian federal court put it, to ‘full, legally sanctioned membership in a state ... All free and democratic states at all times have established a unique status of this kind and all such states have always accorded some special rights and privileges to their citizens.’ This definition represents what we might call the static view of the relationship between the individual and the state, emphasizing the rights and obligations that accompany membership. Several aspects of this static view are being challenged today by a more dynamic reality of cross-border mobility, recognition of dual nationality and multiple affiliations, as well as the growing role played by regional and international human rights mechanisms and adjudicatory bodies that may grant protection to persons rather than just citizens. But before discussing these new frontiers, it is imperative that we step back and take into view the broader picture.

Most courts and commentators agree that ‘Citizenship has entailed membership, membership of the community in which one lives one’s life.’ Already under Roman jurisprudence (p. 1004) ‘citizen’ came to mean someone free to act by law, free to ask and expect the law’s protection. This status entitled the citizen to whatever prerogatives and ... whatever responsibilities are attached to membership. From the French Revolution onward, the modern state began to administer and assign citizenship, which has since come to signify equality of rights and duties among members of the same political community. This government-designated entitlement also tells us ‘who the state considers a full member, how that membership is transmitted inter-generationally, and how it can be lost, gained, and reclaimed.’

Even in today’s age of increased globalization and privatization, the power to provide access to, and formal membership in, the political community remains the prerogative of sovereign states. Securing full membership in the political community remains one of the few goods that even the mightiest economic conglomerate cannot offer to an international migrant; only governments can bestow the legal status of citizen upon the individual. International law still provides significant room for autonomy and discretion by states in defining their membership boundaries: that ‘it is for each state to determine under its own law who are its nationals’.

By labeling certain individuals as members, citizenship offers, however, more than just a juridical, legal status and the promise of equality before the law. It also opens up a host of rights, opportunities, and privileges for those who count as full members. Citizenship also has the potential to play a significant role in societal struggles for recognition and inclusion by those once excluded because it bears the moral and legal force to make ‘a claim to be accepted as full members of the society’ hold firm. As a multidimensional concept and institution, citizenship's varied interpretations and dimensions are neither fixed nor closed, and potentially cut across each other. The most familiar elements in the citizenship bundle include: equal legal status, rights and obligations, political voice and participation, the freedom to enter and exit one’s home country, and the less tangible notions of identity, belonging, and a (p. 1005) sense of home. This multiplicity of meanings gives rise to the ever-possible reinterpretation and renegotiation of the content of citizenship, its boundaries, and its values. In order to set the stage for these current debates, it is important to elaborate how, as a legal matter, we are assigned membership in ‘this or that political community’. This is often referred to by legal experts as the variety of ways, or the modes of acquisition, in which people can obtain the legal status of citizenship in a given country.

Reading the great books of liberal and democratic theory one might expect choice and consent of the governed to play a decisive role in the core legal principles defining who is assigned citizenship in the state and according to what criteria. Many are surprised to learn that the reality is quite different from the theory. The vast majority of the world’s population acquires citizenship not on the basis of individual volition, choice, and consent (as the theory predicts) but according to fortuitous circumstances that none of us control: where and to whom we are born. Although birthright entitlement has been discredited in virtually all other fields of public life, it remains the primary legal route through which citizenship is assigned in today’s world. This is a striking exception to the modern trend away from ascribed status. The latest global statistics show that only a miniscule percentage (approximately 3 percent) of the world’s population have managed to gain a new membership affiliation post-birth, that is, through international migration and naturalization. Everyone else is largely ‘trapped’ by the lottery of their birth, at least in terms of the formal membership status they hold, typically, from cradle to grave. A recent report solemnly captures this last point: ‘Even in today’s mobile and globalized world, most people die in the same country in which not only they are born, but their parents as well.’

II. On Becoming a Citizen: The Legal Dimension

As the US Supreme Court memorably pronounced in Wong Kim Ark (1898), there are ‘two sources of citizenship, and only two: birth and naturalization’. I will elaborate the former before exploring the latter. The attribution of membership at birth is governed in virtually all countries by two dominant legal principles: jus soli (the territoriality principle) and jus sanguinis (the descent principle). I discuss each in turn.

1. Jus Soli: The Territoriality Principle

The most crucial factor here is whether the child was born within the territory over which the state maintains (or in certain cases has maintained or wishes to extend) its sovereignty. The (p. 1006) jus soli principle, which is part of the common law tradition, implies a territorial understanding of citizenship. It recognizes the right of each person born within the physical jurisdiction of a given state to acquire full and equal membership of that polity. The jus soli principle finds its historical roots in the feudal system of medieval England, in which ‘ligeance’ and ‘true and faithful obedience’ to the sovereign were owed by a subject from birth: ‘for as soon as he is born he oweth by birth-right liengeance and obedience to his Sovereign’. In the landmark Calvin’s Case, decided in 1608, Lord Coke employed the concept of liengeance to explain the unmediated relationship that is created for life between the monarch and all subjects born within the monarch’s dominion. In its modern guise, jus soli no longer refers to the connection between a monarch and his or her subjects. Instead, it refers to the political relationship between elected governments and their citizens, offering full membership in the political community to each new generation born on the territory—notwithstanding the legal status of the parents.

A main advantage of the jus soli principle in a world of growing international mobility is that it provides an attributable mechanism that prospectively incorporates the children of newly arrived immigrants who were born in the territory into full legal membership of the respective political community, thus avoiding the familiar second-generation phenomenon of inherited non-citizenship status that has long plagued European countries that relied primarily on the jus sanguinis principle. In its modern variant, jus soli is therefore seen as democratic and inclusive: children born to non-citizen parents (even if the latter are themselves barred from legalization and naturalization) are given a fresh start, with all the rights, protections, and opportunities that attach to full and equal membership.

Brazil, Canada, and the United States exemplify this generous model of conferral of automatic citizenship to everyone born within their borders. Brazil’s Constitution grants citizenship to ‘those born in the Federative Republic of Brazil, even if of foreign parents’. In Canada, a statutory provision of the Citizenship Act establishes that a person ‘born in Canada’ is a citizen.\(^{25}\) Perhaps the most famous articulation of the jus soli principle is found in the opening sentence of the Fourteenth Amendment of the US Constitution (the Citizenship Clause): ‘All persons born ... in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside.’\(^{26}\)

In other parts of the common law world the unqualified application of the territoriality principle has witnessed a retreat, however. In 1981, the British Nationality Act, section 1, changed the previous common law rule (where the place of birth was the sole determination \(\text{p. 1007}\)) in citizenship) to a modified birthplace principle that now takes into account the parents’ status and residence considerations. Children born on the territory to unauthorized migrants can still acquire full citizenship status, if they fulfill the habitual residency requirement. Related changes have taken root elsewhere, including Australia (1986), Ireland (2004); through a constitutional referendum that is widely interpreted as an attempt to curtail the legal implications of the European Court of Justice’s Chen decision\(^{27}\), and New Zealand (2006), to mention but a few prime examples.\(^{28}\) Importantly, these legal changes do not amount to a retreat from the principle. Instead, they reveal a modification: the introduction of a jus-sanguinis-like component of descent into otherwise territorially centered membership rules.\(^{29}\)

Another element to consider is the residual effect of gender and marital status on citizenship attribution, raising constitutional equality concerns when the legal capacity to transmit membership depends on the gender of the parent. While most countries have now repealed gender-discriminatory laws that only permitted fathers (and not mothers) to transmit citizenship to their children, some constitutions still do not regard mothers and fathers as holding equal standing in their ability to transmit citizenship to their offspring born outside the country.\(^{30}\) For instance, the Malaysian Constitution defines who qualifies as a citizen, following the principle of gender equality in the transmission of citizenship when a child in born within the borders of that country. Alas, only a Malaysian father can transmit citizenship to a child born abroad. A similar provision, which held that a child born outside Kenya could only become a citizen at birth if the father was a Kenyan citizen, was recently overturned by the new Kenyan Constitution adopted in 2010. The new Constitution reinstates status to children born outside Kenya before its effective date, if either the mother or the father were Kenyan citizens.

The Canadian Supreme Court, too, had to weigh in on the intersection of citizenship and gender in the Benner (1997) case.\(^{31}\) In that decision, a provision of the Canadian Citizenship Act, according to which a child born abroad to a Canadian father was automatically entitled to Canadian citizenship upon registration of his or her birth whereas a child born under similar circumstances to a Canadian mother was not automatically entitled to citizenship (such a child had to prove the absence of a criminal record and his or her willingness to swear an oath of allegiance), was challenged as violating the equality principle enshrined in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The Court struck down the provision, holding that it violated the Charter’s equality guarantees (s 15) and was unjustifiable in a free and democratic \(\text{p. 1008}\) society (s 1) because it restricted access to citizenship ‘on the basis of something so intimately connected to and so completely beyond the control of the [child] as the gender or his or her Canadian parent.’\(^{32}\)

The United States has recently seen a string of constitutional challenges to the provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act that distinguish between unwed mothers and fathers in their legal capacity to transmit citizenship abroad. In a trilogy of cases, Miller (1988), Nguyen (2001), and Flores-Villar (2011), the US Supreme Court had to decide whether mothers and fathers may be treated differently in determining whether their children may claim American citizenship, and whether such sex-based classifications violated equal protection principles.\(^{33}\) The Supreme Court affirmed the statutory provisions, holding that they did not amount to constitutionally impermissible unequal treatment given the important governmental interests at stake. In Nguyen, the key issue was whether the provisions of the statute holding that a child born outside the country to an unmarried mother will automatically receive citizenship whereas a child born outside the United States to an unmarried father will receive citizenship only if ‘a blood relationship between the person and the father is established by clear and convincing evidence’ violated the Equal Protection Clause. In a slim majority, the Court upheld the law, despite a sharply diverged minority opinion stating that the legislation at issue upheld a historic regime that left women with responsibility, and freed men from responsibility, for nonmarital children. ... [R]ather than confronting the stereotypical notion that mothers must care for these children and fathers may ignore them, [the majority] quietly condones the very stereotype the law condemns.

Citizenship

In addition to the argument that such regulation of the transmission of citizenship reinforces the gender-norm that fathers bear little responsibility to their non-marital children, the more general point at issue (resembling the approach of the Canadian Supreme Court) is this: in a society committed to equality between the sexes, the gender of the parent bears no relationship on the individual's ability to transmit citizenship. The most recent equality challenge in this trilogy, Flores-Villar, focused on the constitutionality of imposing longer residency periods on unwed fathers than on unwed mothers whose children were born abroad, a provision that, unlike the Nguyen case, does not turn on biological factors concerning the establishment of paternity. This challenge ultimately proved futile, ending with a Supreme Court deadlock (4:4 split, with the recusal of one judge). This leaves in place, for now, an affirmation by an equally divided court of the gendered differential imposed by the statute.

2. Jus Sanguinis: The Parentage Principle

Whereas jus soli elevates the fact of birthplace into a guiding constitutional principle, the jus sanguinis principle confers political membership on the basis of parentage and descent. The children of present members of the polity, irrespective of place of birth, are automatically defined as citizens of their parents' political community. Whereas jus soli is traditionally followed in common law countries, jus sanguinis is the main principle associated with civil law jurisdictions in Europe and well beyond the continent, making it the leading membership transmission principle globally in terms of the sheer number of countries that follow it and of the individuals and families that are affected by its parameters.

The modern inception of jus sanguinis came with the post-French Revolution Civil Code of 1804, which broke away from the territoriality principle. The French Civil Code held that as citizens, parents (specifically, fathers) had the right to transfer their status of political membership to their offspring at birth, regardless of whether the child was born in France or abroad. During the Napoleonic period, the concept of attributing membership on the basis of descent was considered fresh and radically egalitarian. As Patrick Weil explains, the jus sanguinis principle broke away from the feudal tradition of jus soli, which linked subjects to a particular land (and to the lord who held the land). In contrast, jus sanguinis linked citizens to each other (and to their joined political enterprise) through membership in the state. Together, they constituted 'a class of persons enjoying common rights, bounded by common obligations, formally equal before the law'. Through codification and imitation, the nineteenth century saw the adoption of the jus sanguinis principle by many other European countries, including Austria, Belgium, Spain, Prussia, Italy, Russia, the Netherlands, Norway, and Sweden. European colonial expansion, as well as legal 'transplanting', further spread the jus sanguinis principle to the four corners of the world.

For countries facing the combined pressures of immigration and emigration, jus sanguinis has the benefit of sustaining ties with citizens living abroad and their progeny. Several constitutions explicitly provide easier access to citizenship to descendants, up to the third generation, of those who left the home country. This approach can be found in the Polish, Hungarian, and other Central and East European citizenship regimes. Armenia provides a simplified procedure for citizenship to individual of 'Armenian origin', whereas the Irish Constitution highlights the significance of a cultural identity and heritage, declaring that the 'Irish nation cherishes its special affinity with people of Irish ancestry living abroad who share its cultural identity and heritage'. Israel establishes an entitlement to citizenship to those with a Jewish ancestry (as defined by the Law of Return), treating them as in potentia members of the state, thus creating a legal and symbolic link between existing members of the polity and a large diaspora community. This 'right to return' is extended to family members, up to a third generation, regardless of their own religious affiliation or place of birth, as long as they can claim a lineage to a person who would have been entitled to make aliyah (Hebrew: 'to ascend') to Israel, even if that person is already deceased or never actually settled there. These variations on a theme of heritage, lineage, and ancestry illustrate the family affinity of the jus sanguinis principle with what has been termed the cultural or ethno-national conception of citizenship. The main concern with this conception of identity and belonging is that it bears exclusionary tendencies, turning members of the political community—who, despite holding the status of formal, legal citizenship, are not part of the dominant 'we' majority—into potential outsiders. I return to address this metamorphosis of protected and often vulnerable minorities into feared 'outsiders' from within, in discussing citizenship's 'cultural turn', which is raising its head again across Europe.

Importantly, there is nothing intrinsic or inevitable in this cultural turn. It certainly is not a built-in feature of the parentage-based membership principle. Under any version of the jus sanguinis principle, the crucial question to determine is who gains the right to transmit membership to the as-yet-unborn generations. Most countries have resolved this constitutive dilemma by adopting what has been termed the ‘zero option’, whereby all persons residing in the territory of the newly established country on a particular day (usually declared soon after independence) are automatically granted citizenship. In theory, this permits the creation of a heterogeneous and inclusive community to be ‘reproduced’: when citizens procreate, this diversity of composition is transmitted to future generations through the parentage-based birthright principle, especially if coupled with naturalization provisions that make it relatively easy for immigrants from different parts of the world to acquire full membership status within the adoptive country.\textsuperscript{42}

In practice, however, the reliance on descent in the transmission of citizenship may lead to exclusionary overtones associated with privileging the majority community, especially where there are few (if any) mechanisms for newcomers who do not already ‘belong to the fold’ on the basis of national, linguistic, religious, or cultural heritage, to gain access to citizenship. Reliance on ‘bloodline’ as the sole connecting factor for allotting automatic citizenship may, under such conditions, prohibit children of immigrants from becoming full members of the country in which they were born and raised due to a criterion that is firmly beyond their control—their ancestry.

Perhaps the most familiar, and now discredited, example of perpetual intergenerational exclusion (through \textit{jus sanguinis}) of long-term permanent residents from full membership in the polity can be seen in German citizenship law, prior to its reform in 2000. In the past, German citizenship law attributed membership based exclusively on descent. Naturalization was exceptional. Thus, even lawful permanent residents born and bred on German soil had no legal right to become full members of the body politic. This non-citizen status would be propagated from generation to generation: once the parents were excluded from membership, neither they nor their children could alter this designation through residency, consent, or voluntary action. This policy created a class of second- and third-generation children of immigrants whose ancestry prevented them from obtaining citizenship—and the added layer of protection and opportunity that it grants—no matter their level of self-identification with the country, or the fact that they had resided there for their entire lives.

When this hard-won change in German citizenship law finally took effect, children born to \textit{Gastarbeiter} and other settled immigrants gained the right to acquire German citizenship based on their birth in the territory, rather than on their ancestry. As with recent changes in \textit{jus soli} countries that have added a component of \textit{jus sanguinis} into their citizenship attribution regimes, there is no prohibition against modifying the \textit{jus sanguinis} model, as in this example, by the addition of a \textit{jus soli} component.

3. Emergent Trends: Borrowing, Dual Nationality, and the Loss of Citizenship

In the maze of constitutional provisions and citizenship laws defining formal access to membership we clearly need to keep track of each country’s distinct rules and procedures. But it is (p. 1011) also possible to identify emergent common themes. Most notable is the pattern of mutual ‘borrowing’ from one system to another, which is of course familiar to us from the broader field of comparative constitutional law. In the study of citizenship this is referred to as the convergence thesis.\textsuperscript{43} Another significant trend is the growing recognition of dual nationality.\textsuperscript{44} Whereas the Preamble to the 1930 Hague Convention on Conflict of Nationality Laws declared that ‘it is in the general interest of the international community to secure that all its members should recognize that every person should have a nationality and should have one nationality only’, today, approximately half the world’s countries permit their citizens to hold dual nationality, either by birth or naturalization.\textsuperscript{45} This transformation has led some commentators to claim that we are witnessing the ‘inevitable lightening of citizenship’.\textsuperscript{46} There is some truth to this description, especially for those residing in well-off countries in Europe and North America. But even in these regions of the world, the picture is more complex. Arguably, it simultaneously reveals both the relaxation (‘lightening’) and the tightening (or ‘re-bordering’) of citizenship.

To provide one illustration of the latter pattern, consider the rekindling of the old debate about the revocation of citizenship: the involuntary stripping of an individual’s legal status as a member of the political community. The United Kingdom offers a telling example. The British Nationality Act was amended in 2002 and then again in 2006 with the adoption of the Immigration, Asylum and Nationality Act that broadened the power of the Home Secretary to revoke British citizenship in circumstances where ‘that deprivation is conducive to the public good’.\textsuperscript{47} Heated debates surrounding categories such as ‘breach of allegiance’ or ‘disloyalty toward the state’ are of course anything but new.\textsuperscript{48} The distinctiveness of this new provision, however, lies in the criteria for revoking citizenship that ‘is content with a vague determination (by the state) that the very holding of citizenship [rather than specific conduct] has become harmful to the public interest’.49

This broad authorization for the British government to deprive an individual from citizenship, what Hannah Arendt famously called, ‘the basic right to have rights’, stretches beyond what is currently permitted in other major countries that follow the common law tradition. Canada, for example, only permits the revocation of citizenship for reasons of fraud, false representation, or concealment of material circumstances.50 In the United States, birthright citizens cannot have their citizenship involuntarily stripped, whereas naturalized citizens can have their citizenship revoked at any time, if that naturalization was illegally procured or procured by concealment of a material fact or by willful misrepresentation.51 As a result of several constitutional challenges, including the landmark decision in Afroyim v Rusk (1967), the US Supreme Court ruled that Congress cannot revoke citizenship involuntarily, concluding that: (p. 1012)

We hold that the Fourteenth Amendment was designed to, and does, protect every citizen of this Nation against a congressional forcible destruction of his [or her] citizenship, whatever his [or her] creed, color, or race. Our holding does no more than to give to this citizen that which is his [or her] own, a constitutional right to remain a citizen in a free country unless he [or she] voluntarily relinquishes that citizenship.52

This core notion of giving to a member of the political community that which is already hers—a constitutional right to remain a citizen—is at risk with the revival of the practice of the involuntary revocation of citizenship. One of history’s little ironies is that the formal or legalistic aspect of citizenship, which postnational and other scholars have come to treat as irrelevant and anachronistic at best, may in fact prove of tremendous importance to protecting the individual in today’s more turbulent world. It is this ‘bare legal status’ which grants, as it were, a basic shield or security of membership, operating like ‘a thin but unbreakable guard rail’.53

4. Naturalization: The Return of Culture

The only legal method for acquiring citizenship other than through birthright is by naturalization. When we speak of naturalization, we refer to the final step in the process of acquiring citizenship after birth. The word derives from nasci (Latin), which means ‘to be born’; the term naturalization therefore suggests that the post-birth admission to citizenship is a symbolic and political ‘re-birth’ into the new membership community. This usually requires agency, action, and expressed consent by the individual, as well as acceptance by the political community into which she emigrates.

To gain a shot at acquiring post-birth membership in a desired destination country, one must first reach its territory and establish lawful permanent residence. In a world of regulated borders, this may prove harder than is commonly thought: each polity is obliged to allow entrance to its territory only to its own citizens. A non-citizen has no similar right.54 Global inequality patterns also make their mark here: citizens of countries perceived to be poorer or less stable are often subjected to more stringent requirements when they seek admission to more affluent countries. These inequalities are felt even when applicants are seeking short-term entrance visas only, let alone permits for permanent residence.55

While the precise requirements of naturalization may vary from one country to another, the basic premise is that ‘the power to admit or exclude aliens is a sovereign prerogative’.56 (p. 1013) Here, too, we can identify a double transition: certain naturalization requirements have been procedurally ‘lightened’, as exemplified by the reduction of the number of years of residence that a state can require of the individual before he becomes eligible to apply for citizenship.57 At the same time, the substantive requirements have been tightened up and revamped, exemplified by the rise of citizenship tests from The Hague at the heart of Europe to Canberra in the far edges of the New World, contributing to the ‘wider agenda of reinforcing shared values’ (as a British government document recently put it). Another example of the renewed emphasis on integration as a condition for inclusion in the body politic hails from France, where immigrants are now required to sign the Contract d’accueil et d’intégration, which articulates the centrality of the principle of laïcité to the Republic. These developments, which I now turn to explore, can be labeled as the ‘cultural turn’ in citizenship discourse and practice, and they reflect a majoritarian tilt.

Typically, the most basic requirement for naturalization is that the applicant must have resided continuously in the admitting country for several consecutive years as defined in statutory or regulatory legal residency requirements. The applicant must demonstrate basic knowledge of their new home country’s language, political system, and forms of government. Another key requirement present across the spectrum of admitting countries is that the would-be citizen must not have a criminal record; an applicant who is deemed to pose a security risk to the state will also be disqualified. In the United States, even minor brushes with the criminal code are likely to bar a person from gaining citizenship, often leading to the deportation of the immigrant back to the country of origin. For those permitted to complete the transition process towards post-birth citizenship, the naturalization process culminates in a symbolic public ceremony, in which applicants pledge allegiance to their new home country (or its constitution), sing the national anthem, and salute its flag. Taken together, these acts represent symbolically the culmination of a unidirectional and graduated transformation, or ‘re-birth’: from alien to citizen.

The description of the path to naturalization that I have just recounted is the classic narrative that is told from the viewpoint of the admitting society. Yet in a more dynamic global reality, the script may have to undergo a modification. Note the almost complete absence of the sending country from the narrative, or what Rainer Baubock calls the ‘external citizenship’ dimension of transnational migration, whereby certain individuals continue to hold and nourish meaningful ties to the new home country and the old. The growing recognition of dual nationality begins to capture this changed reality on the ground, but there are many challenges ahead. Indeed, some are suggesting that the pressures of globalization and the perception of a ‘loss of control’ over borders and membership boundaries are in part motivating a new zealous turn toward regulating who gets in and who of those not born as citizens can be defined as eligible for inclusion in the innermost circle of members through naturalization. The introduction of civic integration exams abroad—with the Netherlands taking the lead—and citizenship tests and ceremonies at home provide insights into the present ‘cultural turn’. These new developments have come to the forefront of the debate in Germany, Denmark, Australia, and the United Kingdom, to mention a few key examples. These citizen tests feature civics questions about the adoptive country’s system of government, the political process, and the values of a constitutional state. The more controversial aspects relate to matters of culture, identity, and ethics. As Liav Orgad observes, some of these new tests are designed to examine the applicant’s personal beliefs and moral judgments, and are ‘unusual in the intrusiveness of [the] questions … about gender equality, religion, conversion, politics, marital relations, promiscuity, and culture.’ In the German Land of Baden-Wurttemberg, a questionnaire that was later retracted and replaced by a federal citizenship test, originally included questions such as the following: “Your adult daughter or your spouse would like to dress like other German girls and women. Would you try to prevent it? If yes, by which means?” The Dutch, unlike the Americans, do not provide applicants with copies of prospective questions that may appear on their actual citizenship tests on the theory that ‘the proper attitude … cannot be learnt by heart’. As part of the effort to make citizenship meaningful, the centrality of the concept of integration has risen, and multiculturalism (a term that has come to serve as a scapegoat for any public policy that has granted some degree of recognition to cultural and religious diversity or explored whether legal accommodation is merited and justified) explicitly disavowed. Germany’s Chancellor, Angela Merkel, perhaps best expressed this sentiment in stating that ‘multikulti’ had ‘failed, and failed utterly’.

In the United Kingdom, this new commitment to integration has translated into heightened language requirements and the introduction of citizenship tests and ceremonies. This was soon followed by Australia, the only new-world society that did not previously adopt a formal citizenship test. These fast-paced changes reflect a commitment to actively promoting and ‘strengthen[ing] the things—the values, the habits, the qualities—that we have in common’, as The Path to Citizenship government document puts it. Christian Joppke has caught the spirit of the moment in describing such tests as instances of ‘repressive liberalism’. Others have used related labels, such as illiberal liberalism, cautioning that such measures ‘violate the same values they seek to promote’.

In addition to citizenship tests that apply to immigrants who already reside in the destination country, naturalization processes have also become more closely intertwined with immigration control. This is evident, for example, in the Dutch policy of demanding visa applicants abroad to demonstrate knowledge and linguistic abilities before the person reached Dutch soil, effectively turning linguistic and cultural knowledge into a precondition for gaining an entry visa to the country, rather than the more traditional view of seeing it as a result of a process of integration that occurs only after settlement in the new home country.

Another manifestation of the cultural turn in citizenship discourse and practice can be found in the fierce controversies surrounding the legislation to ban head-to-toe veiling in public, especially the more extensive forms of face covering (the niqab and burqa). France was the first country in Europe to implement such a ban through legislation that prohibits (p. 1015) clothing concealing the face in public places. A woman wearing a face veil in defiance of the law risks a fine that can be accompanied or replaced by compulsory citizenship classes. Such state action purports to advance the goals of gender equality, secularism, and public order, but it may stand in tension with constitutionally protected principles of religious freedom, as well as the values of individual choice and autonomy. Such generalized bans and their compatibility with constitutional principles and human rights protections will surely occupy domestic and regional courts in years to come. At present, it remains undisputed that the relentless attention paid to veiling by Muslim women has only further politicized the matter. In this charged environment, every act of veiling (or its rejection) is interpreted by multiple actors as a statement about one's 'loyalty' and 'belonging'. What is often lost in the discussion is the recognition that immigrant women who belong to minority or marginalized religious communities are constantly negotiating their multiple affiliations (to their gender, their faith, their families, their new and old home countries, and so on) while operating within a tight space for action. Nevertheless, they—and their (covered) bodies—have become the visual markers of far broader struggles over power and identity, secularism and expression of 'difference', the blurring of once fixed lines distinguishing the metropolitan from the rest of the (once-colonized) world, the struggle to 'speak' for oneself as opposed to artificially being placed in predefined boxes and categories, in addition to reinforcing the majority culture as the norm and by default delineating certain communities as implicitly 'foreign'.

Many of these themes came to a head in the Faiza M ruling, in which the Conseil d'État upheld a decision to decline a naturalization request submitted by a Muslim female immigrant who was legally admitted to France, spoke fluent French, was married to a citizen, and had three French children, because 'she had adopted a radical practice of her religion, incompatible with the essential values of the French communauté, especially the principle of equality between the sexes.' This decision was based on Article 21–4 of the Civil Code as it applied in 2005, stating that, ‘By decree in the Conseil d’État, the Government may, on grounds of indiginity or lack of assimilation other than linguistic, oppose the acquisition of French nationality by the foreign spouse.’ The formal legal basis for the denial was not the religious attire per se as much as the governmental assessment of Silmi's ‘insufficient assimilation’ into the French Republic. In practice, however, as one astute legal observer noted, ‘it remains uncertain whether Silmi was denied citizenship due to her beliefs, or her conduct, or both’.66 The practical result of the denial of Silmi's request for securing citizenship, the direct bond between the individual and the state—a status that is independent of her husband (once bestowed upon her), is that in the name of gender equality she was left in a dependent position vis-à-vis both her partner, who already had a secure legal status, and the political community at large. The turn to collective identity claims by the majority, then, has a sharp edge, making it potentially harder for non-dominant members of minority religions to gain full inclusion or even mere legal admission (if they are not yet citizens).

Beyond the growing significance of the claims of culture in determining who shall gain (or be denied) the ‘final prize’ of full, legal membership in the state, another kind of re-bordering of citizenship is occurring on a different plane; namely, the rising impact of economic and human-capital accretion considerations to shaping targeted immigration policies in countries that seek to gain or sustain a relative advantage. In this vein, governments are now willing to proactively use their control over allocating membership resources as part of their economic (p. 1016) or global competitive strategy to attract highly skilled migrants and wealthy individuals whose admission is seen as a net gain for the polity. At the same time, these very same destination countries are trying to do whatever they can within the bounds of legality to fend off ‘unwanted’ immigrants that they see as falling into the net-burden category. This selective migration policy is reflected, for example, in the tailoring of ‘incentive packages’ that contain the promise of putting certain migrants on the fast track toward acquisition of full membership.67 This pattern of change touches upon the most delicate and contentious issues of citizenship: defining who may gain access to membership in the political community, and on what basis.

Just as admission is becoming harder and harder to secure for those trying to gain entry visas based on family ties or arriving from destinations that are perceived as culturally ‘too different’ from the majority society, the golden gates of immigration are being opened ever more widely to those regarded as the world’s ‘brightest minds’ based on an assessment of their skills, innovation, and adaptability.68 Related reconfigurations of citizenship are simultaneously occurring in emigrant-sending countries. Whereas in the past skilled migrants were regarded as lost causes who had ‘betrayed’ the home national community, these individuals are now courted as long-lost sons and...
III. Piercing into the Future: Citizenship’s New Frontiers

The discussion thus far has proceeded on the assumption that citizenship is distinguished by the ‘rules of access to citizenship status and the scope and quality of the rights this status entails within a given territory’. This captures well the standard or static vision of citizenship, according to which ‘all the members of the political community [are] bounded by the borders of the state—and only they—were to have equal rights and duties and an equal stake in decisions regarding matters of the state.’ This unified and state-centered understanding of citizenship has always been more of a myth than a reality, but it is arguably harder to sustain in an increasingly interconnected world that has given rise to new and more dynamic forms of multilevel governance and attachment that are proliferating, both above and below the nation state level. The classic example here is the creation of European citizenship at the supranational level. Although the grant of Union citizenship is still derivative on acquiring citizenship in the member states, according to their own nationality laws, the European Court of Justice (p. 1017) has famously and repeatedly declared that each individual EU citizen enjoys rights and owes duties that together make up this new status—EU citizenship—which is ‘destined to become the fundamental status of nationals of the Member States’. Over time, the European Court of Justice has begun giving this declaration some teeth. Most recently, in the much anticipated Zambrano (2011) decision, the Court ruled that the non-EU parents of an EU citizen child must be allowed to live and work in the state in which their children were born, even if the parent(s) otherwise had no right to remain in that country. This is the reversal of the classic jus sanguinis narrative: instead of parents passing down citizenship to their offspring, here, the EU-born children, as citizens of the Union—acquired by virtue of the jus soli principle or specialized provisions to avert statelessness—secure the residency status of their parents within the territory of the Union. As several commentators have noted, the unintended consequences of this expansive judgment might well be to create further incentives for member states, the gatekeepers of Union citizenship, to make it ‘all the more difficult for individuals to gain access to European citizenship in the first place’. Such restrictions, motivated by ‘loss of control’ fears, would only further accentuate the re-bordering trends identified earlier in our discussion of the cultural turn. At the subnational level, greater attention is paid to the core role played by cities and localities in shaping the integration experience of immigrants. New York, London, and Amsterdam come to mind as prime examples. Regional and provincial distinctions also play a role in shaping the experience of citizenship. For instance, the cultural turn just discussed has been more pronounced in Quebec (which, like France, introduced legislation to prohibit face-covering in public spaces) than the rest of Canada; its effects more strongly manifested in the Flemish regions of Belgium than its Walloon parts.

Another important development on the ground is found in the pattern of circular migration and the emergent transnational understandings of membership. Here, the focus is less on legal status and more on the lived experience of individuals and families who have successfully managed to maintain active and meaningful connections, ventures, and opportunities in both their new home countries and the old. Of particular interest are attempts to extend and facilitate the rights of political participation (including voting rights) to emigrant citizens living abroad, allowing individuals to enjoy a wide range of associative and political relations across borders. A mirror-image development is found in campaigns to extend the franchise to noncitizens who are long-term residents of a given polity by granting them the right to vote in local, and possibly national, elections as well.

Philosophers, ancient and contemporary, have idealistically envisioned cosmopolitan conceptions of citizenship, while others now speak of a borderless world, although this often takes the form of an ethical or aspirational plea to recognize and respect each person’s equal worth and dignity, irrespective of formal membership status, rather than an attempt to provide a legal and institutional blueprint for a new world order. Activists have called attention to ‘citizenship on the ground’ or ‘globalization from below’, whereby individuals assert rights and demand recognition through democratic politics, sometimes in total disregard of the fact that formally they lack legal status in the eyes of the respective community or its established law and jurisprudence.

Being political does not by itself suffice to shield one from the full force of existing categories, including those of removal and expulsion from the country in which one lives and ‘acts’ as a citizen, but it may help transform these very categories. A telling example of the deployment of citizenship as democratic action and participation is found... in the recent campaign for the legalization of undocumented students in the United States, which saw these students mobilize politically by telling their own compelling life stories, including self-identification as lacking legal status, under the slogan of ‘unlawful and unafraid’. Like so many other once-excluded groups and constituencies who were barred from formal citizenship (on the basis of race, gender, sexual orientation, and so on), the appeal here is to change the law so that the promise of equal membership is extended to new subjects and new domains.
For these young men and women, many of whom were brought into the United States as babies or toddlers, the United States has become the center of their life. Yet under traditional principles of citizenship acquisition they are deprived of membership. Instead, they face the hanging sword of deportation from the only country they know as home. The urgency of reform is undisputed. It may include regularization programs or the addition of a new root of title to citizenship for those who already ‘practice’ it. This I have elsewhere labelled the jus nexi principle, which can operate alongside the jus soli and jus sanguinis principles, offering a more fitting interpretation of membership for a world of increasing mobility and interdependence.78

The constitutive elements of citizenship’s simultaneous ‘lightening’ and ‘re-bordering’ are now fully in view. This paradoxically fits in line with the historical record of citizenship, which rather than offering a linear story of progression is full of competing narratives.79 Because it is an emancipatory promise, it is too early to bid citizenship farewell; it may be changing its scale and scope, but it still offers a baseline of security and protection to the individual that no other human rights instruments have to date achieved. Being relevant, and back with a vengeance, it turns out, is a measure of the great gaps that we still need to fill before we can give up on the ideal of equal membership in the political community, which, despite its many shortfalls, changing scales and ever-evolving interpretations, remains one of the finest institutions, to date, that we have created to justly govern our collective affairs and individual freedoms.

Bibliography

Bibliography

Joseph H. Carens, Culture, Citizenship, and Community: A Contextual Exploration of Justice as Evenhandedness
(2000)

Thomas Faist and Peter Kivisto (eds), Dual Citizenship in Global Perspective: From Unitary to Multiple Citizenship
(2007)

Randall Hansen, ‘The Free Economy and the Jacobin State, or How Europe Can Cope with the Coming Immigration

Engin F. Isin, Peter Nyers and Bryan S. Turner (eds), Citizenship between Past and Future (2008)

Notes:

(2) The growing recognition of same-sex marriage, eg, has led to expanded access to membership for gay and lesbian partners and spouses in many jurisdictions, removing inequalities that were based on sexual orientation. These changes have occurred through legislation, court decree, or executive order. The latter route was followed in the United States whereas Canada embarked on the legislative path. In South Africa, the Constitutional Court played a key role. See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC).

(3) See also Chapter 21 on states of emergency and Chapter 22 on war powers in this volume.

(5) The emphasis on citizenship as political relations is perhaps best captured by Aristotle’s famous phrase that in democracies the citizen is both ruler and ruled in turn. For a now-classic account of the ancient Athenian and Roman conceptions of citizenship, and their impact on contemporary understandings of citizenship, see J.G.A. Pocock, ‘The Ideal of Citizenship since Classical Times’ in Ronald Beiner (ed), Theorizing Citizenship (1995), 29, 35–6.

(6) Lavoie v Canada [1995] 2 FC 623 (Federal Court, Trial Division); [2000] 1 FC 3 (Federal Court of Appeals); [2002] 1 SCR 769 (Supreme Court of Canada).

(8) Pocock (n 5).

(9) Michael Walzer, ‘Citizenship’ in Terence Ball, James Farr, and Russell L. Hanson (eds), Political Innovation and Conceptual Change (1989), 211.

(12) Even in the European Union, which has developed the most advanced form of regional citizenship in today’s world, the grant of Union citizenship remains derivative. One must first acquire the nationality of a member state:

Citizenship of the Union is hereby established. Every person holding the nationality of a Member State shall be a citizen of the Union. Citizenship of the Union shall be additional to and not replace national citizenship.

(14) The terms nationality and citizenship are here used interchangeably. See Art 1 of the 1930 Hague Convention (Convention on Certain Questions Relating to the Conflict of Nationality Laws), April 12, 1930, 179 LNTS 89. The same principle is reasserted in Art 3(1) of the 1997 European Convention on Nationality, although Art 3(2) sets certain limitations for the acceptance of a given country’s nationality law by other states. The case law of the European Court of Justice has also clarified that whenever a Member State, having due regard to Community law, has granted its nationality to a person, another Member State may not, by imposing an additional condition for its recognition, restrict the effects of the grant of that nationality.

(17) Recent years have also seen the proliferation of arguments in favor of defining citizenship beyond the state. I describe these developments below.

(19) I discuss this birthright-citizenship puzzle in detail in Shachar (n 13).

(20) See Maarten P. Vink and Gerard-Rent de Groot, EUDO Citizenship Observatory—Birthright Citizenship: Trends and Regulations in Europe (2010), 3.

(21) United States v Wong Kim Ark 169 US 649 (1898).

(23) Calvin’s Case, 77 Eng Rep 377 (KB, 1608), 382.

(24) Constitution of Brazil, Ch 3, Art 12.1.

(25) Citizenship Act, RSC, 1985, c C-29, para 3(1) (Canada).

(26) The Fourteenth Amendment’s Citizenship Clause overturned the infamous US Supreme Court Dred Scott (1857) decision. The Citizenship Clause has long been interpreted as providing a constitutional guarantee of birthright citizenship to all persons born within the territorial limits of the United States (with the very limited exception of children born in the United States of foreign diplomats). However, acrimonious debates in recent years have given rise to legislative attempts to restrict and narrow the application of the jus soli principle by defining the phrase ‘subject to the jurisdiction thereof’ to include only children born to US citizens or permanent resident aliens. To date, all such attempts have failed. Legal opinion strongly advises against such a change, which would break away with over a century of consistent application of the Wong Kim Ark decision that applies to all persons born in the United States. As the Office of Legal Council noted in a 1995 statement submitted to the Congressional Subcommittee on Immigration:

> In 1862 President Lincoln’s Attorney General wrote an opinion for the Secretary of the Treasury asserting ‘[a]s far as I know ... you and I have no better title to citizenship which we enjoy than the “accident of birth”—the fact that we happened to be born in the United States.’

(28) There are additional variations. Eg the Constitution of Costa Rica recognizes the citizenship of a child born on Costa Rican soil to non-citizen parents, but requires that the parent register the minor child or that the child herself register by the age of 21. See Constitution of Costa Rica, Title 2, Art 13(3). Or consider another tactic for narrowing the application of the territorial-centered membership rules. The Dominican Republic follows the jus soli principle, providing automatic citizenship to children born on its territory, expect for those born to persons in transit or to persons residing illegally in the Dominican Republic. This ‘in transit’ provision has been interpreted to mean that ‘parents of Haitian heritage are perpetually in transit’, thus barring automatic citizenship to their children born in the Dominican Republic part of the Hispaniola island.

(30) Historically, under the common law doctrine of coverture a woman lost her citizenship when she married and acquired the citizenship of her husband, based on the theory that the husband and wife were one and the ‘one’ this union created was male—‘subsuming’ or covering the female. This also meant that the transmission of citizenship to children occurred through the father. An unmarried woman could, however, pass citizenship to her child born out of wedlock. These distinctions and categories have now by and large been erased from the law books of most countries, but their lingering effect is still found in the margins.

(31) Benner v Canada (Secretary of State) [1997] 1 SCR 358 (Canada).

(32) Ibid 401.

(34) Weil (n 22), 19.

(35) Ibid 19.

(36) Brubaker (n 10), 39.

(37) Weil (n 22), 21.

(39) Constitution of Armenia, Ch 1, Art 11.3.

(40) Constitution of Ireland, Art 2.

This trend was identified by Hansen and Weil in their trailblazing work in the field. See Hansen and Weil (n 29).

In the common law tradition, they have deep feudal roots. But civil law countries have also struggled with such categories. Eg French law permits the revocation of citizenship if one commits certain crimes, such as terrorism, that are held to be incompatible with the status of being French.

(49) Lavi (n 47), 410.

(50) Citizenship Act, §10 (Canada).

(51) Immigration and Nationality Act, §340, codified as 8 USC §1451. For further discussion, see Leti Volpp in ‘Citizenship Undone’ (2007) 77 Fordham Law Review 2579.

(54) The major exception here is the obligation that nations that signed the 1951 Refugee Convention have taken upon themselves to provide a safe haven to persons who qualify as refugees. Even then, the receiving country is obliged to provide temporary shelter only, not necessarily long-term residency.

(55) Most countries are committed to granting access on the basis of marriage or family ties to a person who is already a citizen or permanent resident of the destination country, where individuals have a right to bring certain categories of family members. In Europe, this commitment is enshrined in Art 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights. Here, too, there has been a good amount of legal gymnastics, as in the distinction between family reunification (permitted) and establishment of marriage life where one partner is not settled in the admitting country (limited). The new pre-entry integration tests that take place abroad apply to spouses in such applications.

(56) Landon v Plascencia 459 US 21, 32 (1982) is a classic example of the static view of citizenship.

(57) Joppke (n 46).

(58) The symbolic meaning of such acts is discussed by Sanford Levinson, ‘Constituting Communities through Words that Bind: Reflections on Loyalty Oath’ 84 Michigan Law Review 1440 (1986).

(60) Orgad (n 59), 67.

(61) Ibid.

(65) In addition to this cultural turn, we are also witnessing the invention and implementation of what I have elsewhere called the ‘shifting [territorial] border of immigration regulation’. See Ayelet Shachar, ‘The Shifting Border of Immigration Regulation’ (2007) 3 Stanford Journal of Civil Rights-Civil Liberties 165.

(66) Orgad (n 59), 64.

(69) Barry (n 11), 124.

(72) Ibid 72–3.

(74) C-34/09 Zambrano [2011]; the Court removed the requirement of sufficient funds that was present in Chen, invoking Art 20 TFEU rather than the Citizen Directive 2004/38/EC.

---

Ayelet Shachar

Ayelet Shachar is Canada Research Chair in Citizenship and Multiculturalism, Professor of Law, Political Science, and Global Affairs, University of Toronto Faculty of Law
Abstract and Keywords

This article has two primary objectives: to interrogate objections to social and economic rights and, secondly, to examine the extent to which these objections have given rise to different forms of judicial and constitutional responses to social and economic rights in comparative national jurisdictions. It suggests that when courts have compelled the legislature or the executive to justify a policy choice in terms of an articulated conception the meaning of a social and economic right, a process of deliberation flows therefrom which cannot be discounted. It leads to more accountable government; it provides a voice for litigants who would otherwise be silenced, and, in a number of cases, results in the provision of a basic minimum of goods and services to those who otherwise would have been left out in the proverbial cold.

Keywords: social rights, economic rights, constitutional rights, judicial response, courts

I. Introduction

Social and economic rights cannot be examined in isolation from other forms of rights claims. They form an integral part of the vocabulary of rights. The fact that they are sometimes termed ‘second generation’ rights affords luminous support for this argument and, at the same time, it points to differences to first-generation rights. While these differences will be canvassed, it will be argued that their existence and justification are inextricably linked to the first generation of human rights, being civil and political rights.

Briefly stated, the nature of first-generation rights was heavily influenced by the French and the American Revolutions which left an indelible imprint upon their nature and scope. Revolutionaries in both countries proclaimed that human rights, which they proclaimed, were sourced in the values of civilization. These rights were claimed in the name of all free men (and later women) and were not to be limited by geographical considerations. The first generation of rights were conceived negatively, being ‘freedoms from’ as opposed to imposing positive ‘entitlements upon’.¹ This generation of rights included freedom of opinion, conscience and religion, freedom of expression, of the press, of movement, the right to due process of law and hence protection against arbitrary detention or arrest, and the right to property.
It is apparent from a careful examination of this generation of rights that not all of these rights can be simply reduced to the exercise of state power and so fall neatly into the category (p. 1021) of negative rights. As an illustration, the right of every citizen to participate in a free election or the right to a fair trial imposes positive obligations upon the state to devote sufficient resources to guarantee a free election or to ensure the establishment of independent courts in which the free trial can be conducted. The attempt to divide the negative from the positive must wait until later in the chapter.

Let us turn to the second generation of rights. Briefly stated, the conventional wisdom is that they were sourced in the development of twentieth-century struggles and institutions. Their historical pedigree goes back much further. In the eighteenth century in Bavaria and Prussia, the state was viewed as an ‘agent of social happiness’ responsible for caring for the needy and for the provision of work for those who lacked the means and opportunities to support themselves. Similarly, the French Constitution of 1793 included the obligation on the state to provide public assistance for the needy.2

In the nineteenth century, Bismarck introduced social legislation which covered income-related insurance in cases of unemployment, accident, and illness, as well as pension and compensation schemes and a residual category of welfare. Not surprisingly, the Weimar Constitution of 1919 recognized the importance of these rights, including labour rights. In 1919, the establishment of the International Labour Organization triggered an attempt to establish certain international labour standards, and a second generation of human rights was introduced into the legal discourse, characterized by an express obligation upon a state to intervene rather than merely abstain from encroaching onto the private domain of the citizen. Rights to decent working conditions, to social security could not be attained without positive obligations being imposed upon the state. These second-generation rights constituted claims upon the state to fulfill obligations rather than to refrain from acting which lay at the heart of the prevailing wisdom about negative freedoms. Apart from Germany, the Mexican Constitution of 1917 included social rights in the text as did the Soviet Constitution of 1936, Part 7 of which contained a comprehensive list of socio-economic rights including the right to work, the right to health care, education, and housing. The Irish Constitution of 1937 also recognized these rights but in a far weaker form, being contained in directive principles of state policy designed to guide the government in its choice of policy and the judiciary in its interpretation of all rights.

But it was after the Second World War that a number of countries adopted or amended their constitutions to include social and economic rights.3 The development of a human rights jurisprudence which was initially powered by the United Nations gave great impetus to the expansion of these rights in national and international texts.4 The wider recognition of social and economic rights was coupled to the idea that these rights were part of the concept of citizenship. T.H. Marshall in an influential book suggested that social rights included:

the whole range from the right to a modicum of economic welfare and security to the right to share to the full in the social heritage and to live the life of a civilized being according to the standards prevailing in the society. The institutions most closely connected with it are the educational system and the social services.5

(p. 1022) As much writers such as Marshall saw these rights as critical in tempering the social consequences of unbridled capitalism and further that these rights had appeared in pre-war constitutions, a conceptual divide between these rights and traditional civil and political rights appeared always to be present.

Quincy Wright sought already in 1947 to distinguish between the two generations of rights when he wrote:

Individual rights are in the main correlative to negative duties of the State and social rights are in the main correlative to positive duties of the State. Individual rights require that the State abstain from interference with the free exercise of the individual of his capacities, while social rights require that the State interfere with many things the individual would like to do. ... 6

In summary, the initial drive for negative human rights can be sourced in the revolutions of France and America, whereas the initial drive for social and economic rights in the socialist struggles of the first two decades of the twentieth century, and later the period after the Second World War which saw a further development of second-generation and the emergence of third-generation rights. In 1948, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights recognized both civil and political rights as well as economic and social rights.7
Socio-Economic Rights

By 1966, the Commission on Human Rights, itself spawned from the 1948 Universal Declaration of Human Rights, had developed two covenants, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant on Economic Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR), the latter of which came into force on 3 January 1976. Initially, the ICESCR lacked a complaints mechanism but by 1987 the UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights had begun to develop a jurisprudence through its general comments and state specific reports.

Further, important developments took place within national constitutional law. In 1954 in Brown v Board of Education, the US Supreme Court, in one of its most publicized and controversial decisions when delivered struck down the concept of separate but equal and thus paved the way for non-discriminatory access to education. In 1972, the German Federal Constitutional Court held that the right to a free choice of occupation obliged universities to demonstrate that they had effectively deployed all available resources to maximize the number of university places available to students. During the 1970s, the Indian Supreme Court began to develop a range of social rights, from the right to life read together with a directive principles of state policy which were contained in the Indian Constitution, its judgment in Sunil Batra v Delhi Administration.

A third generation of human rights emerged during this period. Karel Vasak stated in his inaugural lecture to the tenth study session of the International Institute of Human Rights in July 1979 that this third generation of human rights:

are new in the aspirations they express, are new from the point of view of human rights in that they seek to infuse the human dimension into areas where it is all too often being missing, having been left to the State or States ... [t]hey are new in that they may both be invoked against the State and demanded of it; but above all (herein lies their essential characteristic) they can be realised only through the concerted efforts of all the actors on the social scene; the individual, the State, public and private bodies and the international community.

For Vasak, the first generation of human rights corresponded to the principle of ‘liberty’, the second generation to equality and the third to some form of humanity or fraternity.

In summary, most national constitutions, which were drafted after the Second World War, guaranteed a range of social rights, the key provisions being a right to housing, medical care, education, employment, and nutrition, all of which were in addition to the protection of first-generation rights, traditionally considered to be negative rights.

Unlike first-generation rights, social rights were considered to be controversial and, even more so when courts were granted the power to render them enforceable. It is here that the key argument against the legal nature and hence the recognition of social rights are to be found. Two key arguments are raised against the enforceability of second generation rights: it is argued that courts lack the capacity to translate a general claim to social welfare rights into the equivalent of an enforceable first-generation right. Secondly, judicial enforcement of social rights is considered to constitute a major intrusion into the function and scope of a democratically elected legislature. In particular, the enforcement of social and economic rights holds significant implications for the government budget. Therefore, in adjudicating upon disputes based on these rights, the judiciary plays an extensive and indeed undemocratic role in major distributional questions which on should be left to democratically elected arms of state. To express it differently, because independent courts are not required to respond to transient democratic pressures, their judgments can interfere with the citizens’ ability to employ a democratic election to achieve particular goals.

This chapter has two primary objectives: to interrogate these objections to social and economic rights and, secondly, to examine the extent to which these objections have given rise to different forms of judicial and constitutional responses to social and economic rights in comparative national jurisdictions.

II. The Essential Objections to Socio and Economic Rights

The essence of the main objection is that a reliance on positive constitutional rights is ultimately misguided. Social rights cannot be adequately enforced by the judiciary because of the indeterminacy of their guarantees. Take, for example, a litigant who claims that she has not received adequate government support. It is contended that a court would not be able to determine a sufficiently clear standard in order to decide whether the individual was sufficiently impoverished to qualify to invoke this right. But, even if the litigant was considered to qualify under a judicially conceived standard, the court would confront a further difficulty of crafting an order, namely whether to direct that the litigant be paid a certain sum of money or that specific services should be provided, and further, whether the remedy should be enforced nationally or be restricted geographically. Cross continues his critique thus: (p. 1024)

What if the federal budgets were strapped and a court order would necessitate higher taxes or that money be taken from other programmes such as defence and environmental protection? Would alternative uses of the money be relevant? Could the court consider the possibility that the plaintiff bore some responsibility for his impoverished status? What if he had gambled away a considerable sum of money? What if he had lost his job due to misfeasance?17

Once a court has determined that the government's priorities are unconstitutional, for example because it should implement a social welfare right before embarking upon further additions to national defence or national infrastructure, such as roads or telecommunications, a court would have displaced the legislature's judgment about how social policy should be ranked and accordingly would supplant the role of this democratically elected arm of the state.

In a more pragmatically based attack on social rights, Cass Sunstein contends that in transitional countries, which have moved from a planned to a market economy, social and economic rights would conflict with the objective of creating a relatively unregulated free market in which the market produces the key distributional outcomes rather than state regulation or indeed court adjudication.18 In other words, the inclusion of social and economic rights in the constitution would interfere with a flexibility which the transitional country would require to develop an economy which best meets the expectations of that country's citizens.

Expressed differently, these criticisms constitute what Amartya Sen has described as comprising both an institutionalization and feasibility critique.19 The institutionalization critique suggests that if social and economic rights are to be considered rights they must be institutionalized; if not they cannot be described as rights. If they are institutionalized, then courts are given powers which they are not capable of implementing, given the nature of the competing distributional demands posed by such claims. The feasibility critique suggests it may not be feasible to arrange for the realization of economic and social rights, whereas traditional, political, and civil rights are not difficult to implement, in that, at core, they require governments essentially to leave citizens alone. Social and economic rights impose significant economic burdens on countries, many of which cannot be reasonably called upon to fund a meaningful application of these rights.

A variation of the criticism of the inclusion of socio and economic rights in any constitutional instrument turns on an argument of under-enforcement. The core of the argument can be described as follows: if X has a right to A, then a court must be able to enforce the right, upon the demand of X to her entitlement to A. If a court is unable to enforce this right on demand, as it would a right to assembly or freedom of speech, then a social or economic right cannot be considered to be a legal right. In other words, a court may not be able to act as a primary enforcer of such a right but, at best, may engage in secondary enforcement, by insisting that a rational procedure be adopted in the allocation of material benefits to prevent an arbitrary denial thereof. On its own, therefore, it is argued that this cannot be considered to be an enforcement of a right on demand from the claimant. Accordingly, so the argument runs, social and economic rights should not be considered to fall within the scope of legal rights.20

(p. 1025) III. A Response to the Critics

Critical to the distinction between civil and political rights which are described as negative rights and social and economic rights which are said to be positive rights, is the argument that a positive right is a claim to something such as a share of material goods or for as positive programmes as encapsulated in the right to a clean environment. A negative right is a right for something not to be done to a person or some particular form of conduct to be withheld.21 But as has been observed already, it is not that easy to distinguish between negative and positive rights on this basis alone. Some negative rights involve material consequences. The right to be tried in an independent court, with the assistance of legal counsel, may not be considered to be a positive right but it imposes clear material obligations upon the state to set up a judicial system whereby judges are paid and courts are adequately equipped with juries and court officials and in significant cases, defence counsel are paid by the state.
A similar argument could be made with regard to political rights such as the right to vote and the right to participate in elections which have to be organized and consequently paid for by the state.

The argument that A only has a right if she can enforce it on demand and, if not, that the under-enforcement of the right must lead to the conclusion that there is no legal right, cannot simply be confined to so-called positive rights. If A has a right to free speech and B has an obligation to respect that right, it may well lead to the conclusion that B has to limit her exercise of the same right. Alternatively, the right to free speech may well conflict with another’s right to privacy. Take the concept of the public disclosure tort which applies where a disclosure would be highly offensive to a reasonable person and could not be considered to be of legitimate public concern. The Secondary Statement of Torts suggests the following:

In determining what is a matter of a legitimate public interest, account must be taken of the customs and conventions of the community. ... The line is to be drawn when the publicity ceases to be the giving of information to which the public is entitled, and becomes a morbid and sensational prying into private lives for its own sake.\(^{22}\)

It appears that, even with a negative right, it may be that an inquiry has to engage in the importance of the interest from which the right is sourced.\(^ {23} \) This discovery of the interest becomes the basis of the test in order to decide whether A possesses a right. It assumes that if A’s right was recognized, as a result of which some interest of B could be seriously harmed, it may then be that we can conclude that A’s right is insufficiently important to justify an erosion of B’s interest or cannot justify holding a third party under a duty to perform in order for A’s right to be recognized.

But that still leaves alive the most popular objection, that social and economic rights give rise to claims to scarce goods which can never be respected in every case on the grounds of the scarcity of public resources which are required to recognize these rights in substance. The question which arises is whether in order to be classified as a legal right, a social or economic right invariably will require a defined amount of money to be provided by the state in order for the right to be vindicated. The response to this difficulty is that social and economic rights do not invariably impose so stringent a demand on the state to fulfill the obligation to fund each socio and economic right in an unqualified fashion.\(^ {24} \)

\(^ {26} \) Lawrence Sager provides a good example of the more limited scope of a socio and economic right which still stands to be classified as a right. Take the right to adequate medical care as being a constitutional entrenched right. The court in dealing with the implementation of this right would have to engage in serious questions regarding strategy, responsibility, social coordination, and prioritization.\(^ {25} \) A court would have to answer a strategic question namely; should it ensure that the medicine be given to any person who is in need thereof or should it ensure that certain of the scarce resources go to prevention of disease. How should the government ensure the implementation of the right? Should it ensure that every claimant is provided with money or should it implement a national health scheme? The court would have to consider who would be responsible for the implementation of the right. Would it impose the obligation on national or local government? What role would have to be played by employers and by insurance whether public or private? An even more difficult question would turn on the prioritization to be given to the right to health care as opposed, for example, to other constitutionally entrenched rights, such as those to housing or to education. How would a court, without a full grasp of the budgetary implications, engage in trade-offs between these various rights?

In seeking to answer these difficult questions without jettisoning the promise of the implementation of social and economic rights as envisaged in a constitutional text, a judiciary may eschew the role of a primary enforcer of these rights and develop a role as the secondary enforcer by ensuring that fair procedures are adapted both in the allocation and the withholding of any benefits envisaged as a result of the inclusion of these rights in a constitutional text. It accomplishes this role by ensuring that a plausible justification is provided in the event that the state allocates or withholds benefits selectively.\(^ {26} \)

In this way the judiciary enforces social and economic rights in a manner which is compatible with the choices made by a democratically elected legislature and executive. It can ensure that government is not only reminded of its duties, pursuant to express constitutional guarantees, but that it implements policies which give as much respect as possible to those social and economic rights which are constitutionality enshrined. The court’s role, instead of directly implementing the rights, is rather to inform the government on how the latter must fulfill its duty by assuming the role of a partner in a dialogic relationship with the legislature and the executive.

To the argument that judges do not have the necessary skills to examine the national budget or the distributional implications of social and welfare policies, the answer is that judges can examine the evidence placed before their court by independent experts and then, on the basis of a forensic evaluation thereof, develop a jurisprudence of justification as opposed to policy conceptualization. There is now a growing body of national and international jurisprudence which is illustrative of legal choices that courts have made in order to give content to social and economic rights, thereby supporting a rebuttal of the critics. It is to these various approaches to social and economic rights that I now turn.

IV. Enforcement: The Scope for Relief

Throughout the previous examination of the justification for social and economic rights, there is either an express or implied view that social and economic rights are not susceptible to a strong form of review. A traditional conception of a strong form of review is exemplified in the approach of the US Supreme Court in Cooper v Erin that the federal courts are ‘supreme in the exposition of the law of the Constitution’ and that accordingly the duties imposed by the legislature and indeed the executive must be followed in the interpretation to the provision as given by the court. With strong forms review, the decision of a court is final. Accordingly, the tension between this form of judicial review of a constitutional text and the decisions of a democratically elected government are exacerbated. As Tushnet has written:

> The people have little recourse when the courts interpret the Constitution reasonably but, in the reasonable alternative view of the majority mistakenly. We can amend the Constitution or wait for judges to retire or die and replace them with judges who hold the better view of what the Constitution means.

By contrast, weak forms of judicial review seek to engage constructively with the tension between rights and democracy or, expressed differently, with the counter-majoritarian dilemma. Underpinning the concept of weak review is the idea that rights, which are contained in a constitution, are best conceived as a means to facilitate dialogue between the three arms of the state. Within the context of socio-economic rights, this model envisages a constitutional dialogue between the judiciary, legislature, and executive as well, arguably, as powerful private actors, which requires all of the latter to give serious and reasoned consideration to the claims of those litigants who lack access to basic economic and social resources. In addition, engagement should ensure a transparent justification for the implementation of a particular right or the failure to achieve its realization.

V. Weak Rights/Weak Review

In turn, there are different forms of weak review which can give rise to different and not always predictable results. The experiences of South Africa and Germany are illustrative. The inclusion of socio-economic rights into the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa 1996 represented one of the boldest moves taken by a young democracy towards the transformation of its legal system. As President Mandela said, in reflecting upon the societal structure inherited by his government:

> A simple vote without food, shelter and health care is to use first generation rights as a smoke screen to obscure the deep underlying forces which deem human rights people. It has created an appearance of equality and justice, while by implication socio-economic inequality is entrenched. We do not want freedom without bread, nor do we want bread without freedom.

Early in the development of its socio-economic rights jurisprudence, the Constitutional Court in Government of the Republic to South Africa v Grootboom and others developed a reasonableness model of review which was sourced in administrative law. The Court refused to define social and economic rights in terms of its content and scope. Instead, it insisted that any programme developed by government to implement a constitutional obligation imposed upon the state in respect of a particular socio-economic right was required to commence with addressing the conditions of the poorest of the poor. A programme that did not so commence was unconstitutional. In this way, the Court looked at the reasonableness of the programme but eschewed the development of a substantive interpretation of the right in question. In other words, the rights was not to be given a minimum core, by which standard each rights claim would be assessed.

This approach has recently been developed by the Constitutional Court in Mazibuko and others v City of Johannesburg.\(^3\) In this case the Court was required to examine the constitutionality of the City of Johannesburg’s free basic water policy of 25 litres per person per day and to determine whether this was sufficient to meet the basic needs of the residents who had brought the application.

In refusing to make a determination as to the amount of water which would meet the right enshrined in the Constitution, that everyone has the right to have access to sufficient food and water, the Court set out its approach thus:

> it is institutionally inappropriate for a court to determine precisely what the achievement of any particular socio and economic right entails and what steps government should take to ensure the progressive realisation of the right. This is a matter, in the first place, for the legislature and the executive, the institutions of government best place to investigate social conditions in the light of available budgets and to determine what targets are achievable in relation to socio-economic rights. Indeed, it is desirable as a matter of democratic accountability that they should do so for it is their programmes and promises that are subjected to democratic and popular choice.\(^3\)

The Court noted that national government had introduced regulations which stipulated that the basic water supply constituted 25 litres per person per day or six kilolitres per household monthly. The City’s free basic water policy was based on this regulation and it could not be said that it was unreasonable for the City not to have supplied more water to the applicants. The Court also noted that the free water policy which had been attacked by the applicants’ expert witnesses, as being insufficient to sustain a dignified existence, had continually been reconsidered by the City which investigated ways to ensure that the poorest inhabitants gained access not only to more water but to other services such as electricity, sanitation, and refuse removal. The Court noted that the City:

> has continued to review its policy regularly and undertaken sophisticated research to seek to ensure that it meets the needs of the poor within the City. It cannot therefore be said that the policy adopted by the City where inflexible. ... \(^3\)

In this case, a weak version of constitutional review failed the applicants who left the courtroom empty handed. Contrast this judgment to a decision of the German Federal Constitutional Court. This case was concerned with social assistance benefits and particularly unemployment benefits. The question which vexed the Court was whether the amount of a standard unemployment benefit in securing the livelihood of adults and children under the age of 14 in the period between 21 January 2005 and 30 June 2005 was compatible with the provisions of the German Basic Law. The Federal Constitutional Court did not have the benefit of an express socio-economic right which covered the question, such was the case with the South African Constitution. Instead, it worked with the fundamental right to human dignity as set (p. 1029) out in Article 1 of the Basic Law, read together with the principle of a social state as enshrined in Article 20 thereof.

The Court found that these two provisions, read together, ensured that every needy person was entitled to the material conditions which were indispensable for his or her physical existence and for a minimum participation in social and cultural political life. The Court engaged in a careful analysis of the statistical model which the legislature had applied and found that the computational benefits which were produced by the model were incompatible with the right to dignity which the Basic Law enjoined was the right to be enjoyed by each citizen. Accordingly, the Court ordered that the legislature was required to initiate a fresh procedure to ascertain the benefits necessary for securing a subsistence minimum that was congruent with the enshrined right to dignity and which was realistic and took account of actual need.\(^\)\(^3\)

In the South African case, an expressly formulated socio-economic right was subjected to a weak form of review which meant that the Court was not prepared to determine the exact amount of water which was required to be provided by the state in order that the applicants constitutional right could be vindicated. In the German case, the Court worked with implied rights and like its South African counterpart did not determine the exact amount of social assistance benefits which flowed from such implied rights but insisted that the mechanism employed by the legislature did not pass constitutional muster. Accordingly a fresh procedure was needed to ascertain the constitutional benefits which were to be enjoined by the citizens.
In Mazibuko, the Court adopted an approach which can be classified as an interpretation of a socio-economic right which results in the creation of a weak right and, in this case, coupled it to a weak remedy. By contrast, the German Federal Constitutional Court may not have introduced a strong right by way of its working with the fundamental right to human dignity, which it read together with a principle of a social state. However, it granted the applicants a strong remedy, in that the legislature was required to initiate new procedures which in turn would give rise to the benefits fresh computation of; the clear implication being that an improved system of benefits had to be produced by government.

But courts, even within the national state, are not always consistent. A further example of a weak right/strong remedy approach is to be found in the judgment of the same South African Constitutional Court in Occupiers of 51 Olivia Road v City of Johannesburg. In this case, the City of Johannesburg sought to evict some 300 people from six properties which were located in the inner city. The City justified these evictions in terms of a so-called ‘regeneration strategy’ for the inner city of Johannesburg, one important characteristic of which was the identification, clearance, and redevelopment of ‘bad buildings’ which had been occupied by approximately 70,000 people within the inner city.

The question for decision turned on whether the City by evicting the residents, had violated their right to access to adequate housing in terms of section 26 of the South African Constitution in that it had sought these evictions without any programme which was designed to rehouse those who had been evicted. When the matter reached the Constitutional Court, it noted that the City would have been aware not only of the possibility but the probability that those evicted would have become homeless as a result of the decision of the City to so evict them. Accordingly, those involved in the management of the City ought, at the very least, to have engaged meaningfully with the residents before a process of eviction was implemented. The Court developed a concept of engagement; that is ‘a two-way process’ in which the City (p. 1030) and those who were about to become homeless would talk to each other meaningfully in order to achieve certain objectives. These objectives included a determination of the consequences of the eviction, whether the City could assist in alleviating these consequences, whether it was possible to render the buildings concerned relatively safe and conducive to the health of the residents for an interim period, and ultimately whether the City had any obligation to the occupants within the context of the facts of the case. Although the Court agreed that the right to housing, in terms of section 26, did not constitute a complete obstacle to the removal of residents from unhealthy and unsafe buildings, it found that there was, within the scope of the provision, an obligation placed upon the City to engage with the affected people, who would be rendered homeless after the eviction.

The order of the Court was designed not only to ensure engagement between the City and the applicants but also to retain jurisdiction over the dispute, in that both the City and the applicants were ordered to file further affidavits reporting on the result of their engagement. In this case, the engagement appeared to have been successful because the Court was later informed that an agreement of settlement had been entered into between the City and the applicant occupiers. In this case, while the Court worked with a weak right given its interpretation of section 26, it provided a relatively strong remedy which contained significant opportunity for legal relief between impoverished applicants.

VI. Stronger Forms of Right and Relief

Columbia provides a rich source of research for the implications of a stronger form of review. For example, in 2008, the Constitutional Court of Columbia handed down a decision that ordered the state to dramatically restructure the countries health system.

37 The background to this case is illustrative of the Court’s jurisprudence. In 1993 the Columbia health-care system was reformed. Law 100 altered the government subsidies from a supply to demand system and used public and private insurers as surrogates to purchase health care for insured patients, the object being directed toward the improvement of efficiency. A two-tier system of medical benefits was established: one for those formally employed or earning more than twice the minimum wage and a second being a subsidized regime which included approximately one half of the benefits which were available in the contributory regime. Literally tens of thousands of petitions (tutelas) were presented to the courts relating to the constitutional right to health and the concomitant breach of that right by Law 100.
In its 2008 decision, the Court collected 22 tutelas which were selected to illustrate the problems endemic to the health system. The Court reiterated that the constitutional right to health is enforceable in favour of plaintiffs who are unable to afford health care when the right to health, if not protected immediately, would result in the violation of fundamental rights, being the right to life. Further, in a case which involves people in particularly vulnerable circumstances, such as children, pregnant women, or the elderly, and where the provision of the particular health service in question fell within, what the court considered to be, the minimum core content of the right to health, the right would be enforced in favour of the plaintiffs.

In terms of this interpretation of the right to health, the Court has ordered the provision of a wide range of goods and services, including antiretrovirals, cancer medication, and even the (p. 1031) financing of treatment of patients abroad, when the appropriate medical treatment was unavailable in Colombia.

In 2008, the Constitutional Court was confronted with a number of cases where there were restrictions on access to medical care that flowed from an inappropriate transfer of administrative costs on to patients and a failure to provide effective access to medical care, for example, not catering for the transportation needs of patients.

The Court went even further and examined the nature of the benefit plans which were inherent in the applicable legislation. The Court directed the National Commission for Health Regulation immediately and, thereafter on an annual basis, to update the benefits which were to be provided, pursuant to a subsidized scheme. It also ordered the appropriate executive agencies to unify the multiplicity of plans which had been introduced throughout the country, pursuant to the adoption of the relevant legislation, initially for children, later for adults and in a latter case, taking into account of financial sustainability as well as the epidemiological profile of the population.

In a further development, the Court ordered the government to adopt deliberate measures progressively to realize universal medical coverage by 2010, together with various compliance deadlines which have taken place between 2008 and 2009.

As Yamin and Parra-Vera note, the approach of the Colombian Court has been to implement the right to health within a framework set out by the United Nations Committee on Economic Social and Cultural Rights. However, the Court has gone on to specify the multiple obligations which have to be carried by the state, pursuant to the constitutional right to health, further declaring that the state was responsible for adopting the deliberate measures to achieve the progressive realization of the right to health and further that the state is required to adopt a transparent approach and provide access to information in respect of its health coverage.

The Court heard another case in October 2009 in which it set out definitive guidelines for the provision of an abortion service. In this case, the Court held that a women, who sought a legal therapeutic abortion from a health-care provider as a result of serious fetal malformation that made it unviable, had a right to choose freely whether she would have an abortion or continue the pregnancy without coercion, duress, or any type of manipulation. It confirmed that abortion services should be available throughout the country and called upon the Ministries of Education and Social Protection to implement a plan within three months of the decision, to promote the sexual and reproductive rights of women, which must include information about the grounds of which abortion was legal in the country. The Court also listed the services that are prohibited with regard to provision of abortion.

The effect of a strong remedy is illustrated by the far-reaching nature of this decision. For this reason, it is useful to look at the detail of the order which included the following obligations imposed by the court upon a range of state authorities.

- To hold medical meetings, or auditors’ meetings to review or approve the request, which result in unjustified waiting periods to perform the abortion.
- To establish additional requirements, such as demanding forensic medical reports, judicial orders, health examination not practised timely, authorization by family members, legal consultants, auditors, or a multiple number of doctors.
- To submit collective conscientious objections, which result in institutional and unfounded claims of conscientious objection.
- To subscribe to agreements—individuals or collective—to deny abortion services.
- To use forms or template disclaimers which results in hospitals not having among their personnel, doctors willing to perform abortions.

- To discredit patient evaluations drafted by psychologists, whose status as health professionals has been recognized by legislation.
- To be reluctant in complying with all the rules in the cases in which abortion services are not available at the health centre where the patient requested the abortion.
- Not to have any available abortion services within the network of public health-care providers at the departmental, district, and municipal level.

The relatively strong right/strong remedy approach adopted by the Columbian Constitutional Court may arguably be explained in terms of a more interventionist civil law culture. But while legal culture manifestly influences jurisprudence, it is an argument that need not detain us because there are illustrations of a similar approach adopted by courts which function in common law jurisdictions.

Take, for example, the Indian Supreme Court, whose jurisprudence has briefly been mentioned and which court system was inherited from the British colonial power. India has a written constitution which provides for fundamental rights for its citizens. However, it did not include, as justiciable rights, any of the social and economic rights with which we have been engaged in this chapter. In Part IV of the Indian Constitution there is provision for directive principles of state policy which are required to be followed by the state when it develops its social and economic policies. Thus, Article 38 requires the state to secure a social order for the promotion of the welfare of the people, in which justice—social, economic, and political—shall inform all institutions of national life. Similarly, Article 39 provides that the state shall direct its policy towards securing that ‘the citizens—men and women equally—have the right to adequate means of livelihood’.

These provisions are not couched as rights but rather as principles which should guide the state in the formulation and implementation of its policy but without giving a litigant the ability to demand that any of these principles be enforced as of right by way of a judicial order. The courts, however, have made creative use of these directive principles of state policy, reading them together with some fundamental rights. Thus, in Olga Tellis and others v Bombay Municipal Corporation and other,40 the applicants were living on Bombay pavements or slums in the vicinity of their workplace. They were then forcibly evicted and their dwellings demolished by the municipality. They challenged their eviction on the basis that it violated their constitutional rights; in particular the right to life which was enshrined in Article 21. The Court held that the right to livelihood was to treated as being part of the constitutional right to life and hence, by depriving a person of his or her means of livelihood, this action would effectively deprive the person of his right to life. On this basis, therefore, the Court thus placed an obligation upon the Bombay Municipality to provide shelter for the applicants.

More recently, in Peoples Union for Civil Liberties v Union of India and others41 the Supreme Court was faced with various interim orders which had been passed, from time to time, directing governmental authorities to see that food was provided to aged, infirm, disabled, (p. 1033) destitute men who were in danger of starvation, pregnant and lactating women, and destitute children. This class had insufficient funds to live free of malnutrition.

The Court framed the dispute by way of the following question:

Article 21 of the Constitution of India protects for every citizen a right to live with human dignity. Would the very existence of life of those families which are below poverty line not come under danger for want of appropriate schemes and implementation thereof, to provide requisite aid to such families?

The Court then ordered that nutritious food had to be provided for those undernourished or malnourished applicants and further directed that an integrated child development scheme be implemented through various government centres, first to supply nutritious food and supplements to children, adolescent girls, and pregnant and lactating women under a scheme which so provided for 300 days in a year.

In this case the Court, operating broadly within a common law tradition inherited from the United Kingdom, and adjudicating within the context of a Constitution which had no express judiciable social and economic rights, interpreted various provisions of its Constitution to create amongst other rights, a basic right to housing and the right to food. A strong right/strong remedy was developed from reading the implications of the constitutional text.
VII. Conclusion

Conceptually, it is possible that social and economic rights can be considered to be strong rights whenever a court enforces these rights without deferring to a legislative process and whenever there is a conclusion that government has failed its constitutional obligations imposed by the specific social or economic right. Colombia and India, on occasion, have performed in this manner. But as the South African experience illustrates, courts may be reluctant to interpret social and economic right in order to bring about the result in which no substantial deference to a legislative judgment can be offered by the court; hence the reasonableness test adopted by the South African Constitution Court. But even in this kind of case, the court may offer a plausible reason for developing a weak right:

Moreover, what the right requires will vary over time and context. Fixing a quantified content might, in a rigid and counter-productive manner, prevent an analysis of context. The concept of reasonableness places context at the centre of the enquiry and permits an assessment of context to determine whether a government programme is indeed reasonable.42

The Court suggests in this dictum that adherence to a weak right may afford greater possibility for progressive development in the longer term than might be the case with a strong right that is interpreted, for example, so as to impose a fixed obligation upon the state to provide 50 litres of water a day to each applicant. In all of these cases, courts have recognized that, while civil and political rights are valuable in that they are predicated on the premise that individual citizens should have control over their lives as autonomous, sentient beings possessed of a protected sphere of dignity, the absence of substantive conditions to permit the vindication of these rights, renders these rights somewhat illusory. Where social and economic right are included in a constitution, either by way of express rights or by way of directive principles of state policy, courts have sought, by means of differing approaches, to recognize that these rights are morally valuable in providing a basis (p. 1034) for individuals to have some form of acceptable control over their lives, as Mr Mandela understood, when he reflected upon the social and economic structure inherited from apartheid. If the residents of a country are hungry, ill, thirsty, or cold and living under a constant threat of poverty, it is extremely difficult to see how they could decide on any meaningful conception of a good life for themselves and further, to what extent the first generation of rights would have significant meaning for them, living as they do in parlous conditions. Arguably, the existence of these rights justifies a move away from a narrow conception of individual right-holders so central to first-generation rights. Ultimately socio-economic rights promote a sense of community, and thus are claimed by groups of impoverished and marginalized people who seek to preserve a sense of dignified community. In turn, this compels a different vision of rights, one which is not based exclusively upon an individual rights bearer.

It does, however, appear that the conceptual obstacles posed in the way of social and economic rights have far less intellectual traction than does the enforceability question, which it cannot be denied means that, generally speaking, adjudicating upon a dispute based on a negative right involves a process of adjudication which is different from that involving a dispute predicated on a social and economic right. But, this must be qualified. Decisions based on negative rights are not necessarily immunized from considerations relating to the public allocation of resources. Further, judges may not be able—given their technical competence, the limitations created by a lack of evidence, and their inability to deal with the polycentric implications of a decision based upon the interpretation of social or economic rights—to enforce the latter as they may the right to fair trial or the right to assembly.

However, when courts have compelled the legislature or the executive to justify a policy choice in terms of an articulated conception the meaning of a social and economic right, a process of deliberation flows therefrom which cannot be discounted. It leads to more accountable government, it provides a voice for litigants who would otherwise be silenced, and, in a number of cases, as described in this chapter, this results in the provision of a basic minimum of goods and services to those who otherwise would have been left out in the proverbial cold.

Bibliography

American Law Institute (2nd), Torts (1977)
Socio-Economic Rights

Alexander Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch: Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics (1962)

Sandra Liebenberg, Socio-economic Rights: Adjudication under a Transformative Constitution (2010)

T.H. Marshall, Citizenship and Social Class (1964)

Notes:

(7) GA Res 217A (III) UN DOC A/810 at 71 (1948).

(9) Numerus Clausus I case (1972) 33 BVerfGE 303.

(10) See eg Sunil Batra v Delhi Administration 1978 SC 1675.

(11) 1978 SC 1675.
(12) Marks (n 6), 441.

(14) Alexander Bickel, The Least Dangerous Branch: Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics (1962).

(16) Ibid.

(17) Ibid 913.

(21) Charles Fried, Right and Wrong (1978).

(22) American Law Institute (2nd), Torts (1977), para 6520.

(25) Sager (n 20), 583.

(26) Ibid 580.

(28) 358 US 1, 18 (1958).

(29) Tushnet (n 27), 22.

(31) 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC).

(33) Ibid para 61.

(34) Ibid para 97.

(35) German Federal Constitutional Court, 9 February 2010: 1 BvL 1/09.

(36) 2008 (5) BCLR 475 (CC).

(40) 1985 (3) SCC 545.
(41) 2004 (12) SCC 108.

(42) Mazibuko (n 32), para 60.

D. M. Davis

D.M. Davis is Judge President, Competition Appeal Court of South Africa and Honorary Professor of Law, University of Cape Town.
This article begins with a brief description of the social democratic tradition which prevails in mainly European jurisdictions, a tradition characterized by a desire to regulate the imbalance of power in private law relationships, notably the relationship between property and labour. To this end, social democratic constitutions may seek to underpin what has been referred to as the ‘economic constitution’, said to be ‘the very key to the achievement of social democracy’ itself. Constitutions in this latter tradition will typically include two species of economic rights, the first being the rights of property traditionally to be found in liberal constitutions, and the second being the rights of labour which traditionally are not to be found in liberal constitutions. The discussion then turns to economic liberalism; the Weimar legacy; social democracy renewed; workers’ rights; trade union rights; economic rights and the ‘new democracies’; and economic rights and liberal democracies.

Keywords: economic rights, social democracy, liberal democracy, economic liberalism, economic constitution, labour rights, trade union rights, workers' rights

I. Introduction 1036
II. Economic Liberalism 1037
III. The Weimar Legacy 1039
IV. Social Democracy Renewed 1041
V. Workers’ Rights 1043
VI. Trade Union Rights 1045
VII. Economic Rights and the ‘New Democracies’ 1047
VIII. Economic Rights and Liberal Democracies 1049
IX. Back to Lochner? 1050
X. Conclusion 1052

I. Introduction

Constitutions are ideological texts.¹ Like any other document, they reflect the moment when they were drafted, the values of their authors, and the purposes they are to serve. To this last end, they thus reflect the type of society for which they are designed, and the anticipated role of the state in that society. Liberal democracies of various stripes require different kinds of constitutional texts than do social democracies of various stripes, though clearly there will be many common features in constitutional texts of whatever stripe. Liberal constitutions such as those of the United States, however, are designed principally to limit the power of government, and to regulate public rather than private power. In doing so, they elevate principles (p. 1037) developed initially by the common law, principles said by the historian Christopher Hill as having been designed to ‘meet the needs of commercial society’, so that ‘men of property could do what they would with their own’.²
Economic Rights

There is, however, a very different constitutional tradition often overlooked by common lawyers. This is the social democratic tradition, which prevails in mainly European jurisdictions, a tradition characterized by a more active state with duties underpinned by the constitution. It is also a tradition characterized by a desire to regulate the imbalance of power in private law relationships, notably the relationship between property and labour. To this end, social democratic constitutions may seek to underpin what has been referred to as the ‘economic constitution’, said to be ‘the very key to the achievement of social democracy’ itself. Constitutions in this latter tradition will typically include two species of economic rights, the first being the rights of property traditionally to be found in liberal constitutions, and the second being the rights of labour which traditionally are not to be found in liberal constitutions.

In addressing these matters in this chapter, the main concern is with rights of labour rather than with rights of property. It is the idea of labour rights as constitutionally protected economic rights that gives rise to most difficulty and incredulity in the common law world, a response which is surprising in view of the widespread embrace of such rights outside English-speaking jurisdictions, of which many common lawyers appear to be profoundly ignorant. It is also the case that at the present time in our global economic development, it is the rights of labour rather than the rights of property that are especially vulnerable, and especially in need of constitutional and any other form of protection that may be available. Moreover, it is the economic rights of labour rather than the economic rights of property that are currently flying on the magic carpet of the international human rights movement, following important decisions of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) in particular.

In a neoliberal global economy, however, there may be an air of unreality about any suggestion that labour rights can be fully and effectively protected by national constitutions. Apart from the legacy of ideology and the growing influence of human rights, the third voice in this conversation is the voice of economic orthodoxy in an open and competitive global economy where social, economic, and political power is moving in the direction of transnational corporations and global financial institutions, beyond the capacity of national governments to confront. Constitutional commitments to labour rights were a reflection of a public policy and an economic orthodoxy that emphasized the need for secure employment rights, high labour standards, and a powerful voice for organized workers. Then, economics, politics, and law ran with the same grain. Now, employment rights, labour standards, and organized workers are not so much an instrument of economic policy, as its victim.

II. Economic Liberalism

Principles of economic liberalism are embedded in the US Constitution, which protects economic freedom and private property in a number of ways. In the first place, Article 10(1) prohibits the states from making any law ‘impairing the obligation of contracts’, though it has been said that in practice this so-called ‘contracts clause’ is a ‘specialised and limited restriction on state government regulation’, violated only when the state acts unilaterally to avoid its own contractual obligations, or to retroactively modify the contractual arrangements between particular private entities, and there is not a sufficient public interest justification for the state's doing so.

More significant then is the Fifth Amendment which provides that no one is to be ‘deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.’ This is an altogether more important provision, though it does not appear to impose a serious brake on government power.

The Fifth Amendment has been said to preserve the right of eminent domain, the courts accepting that property may be taken in the public interest provided that compensation is paid. In some cases, government regulation that affects the use of private property may also constitute a taking for these purposes, with compensation to be paid as a result. In addition, the Fifth Amendment's limits on the federal government are to be found in the Fourteenth Amendment's limits on the states. This latter prohibition on depriving 'any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law' has been said to have come into being 'primarily' to protect African-Americans from 'discrimination'. Mr Justice Black continued by saying that 'while some of its language can and does protect others, all know that the chief purpose behind it was to protect ex-slaves.'

But despite its origins, judicial developments have taken the due process clause well beyond what could conceivably have been contemplated when it was drafted. Perhaps the most famous indication of this is Goldberg v Kelly\(^9\) where the Supreme Court held that welfare benefits could be withdrawn from recipients by state authorities only if the latter first gave a full hearing to the individuals in question. It was not enough that there was an informal pre-termination review or a right of appeal after the event. This, however, was not a view universally supported, with Mr Justice Black writing for the minority that it ‘somewhat strains credulity to say that the government’s promise of charity to an individual is property belonging to that individual when the government denies that the individual is honestly entitled to receive such a payment.’\(^{10}\)

But notwithstanding developments such as Goldberg v Kelly, the US Constitution is a one-sided bargain. There is no provision for the economic rights of workers or labour unions,\(^11\) for whom constitutional law is as much a threat as a protection. It will be recalled that in the Lochner line of cases the starting point for the Court was that ‘the general right to make a contract in relation to his business’ was ‘part of the liberty of the individual protected by the Fourteenth Amendment’.\(^12\) Problems of inequality of bargaining power were later brushed aside on the ground that it is from the nature of things impossible to uphold freedom of contract and the right of private property without at the same time recognizing as legitimate those inequalities of fortune that are the necessary result of the exercise of those rights.\(^13\)

\(^{(p. 1039)}\) So in the interests of freedom of contract and infused with principles of economic liberalism, the Court struck down a New York statute setting maximum hours for bakery and other workers.\(^14\)

The Court also struck down a Kansas statute prohibiting employers from offering employment on the condition that the applicant agreed not to join a trade union, the Supreme Court citing with approval a passage from the Supreme Court of Kansas:

> In this respect the rights of the employer and employee are equal. Any act of the legislature that would undertake to impose on the employer the obligation of keeping in his service one whom, for any reason, he should not desire, would be a denial of his constitutional right to make and terminate contracts and to acquire and hold property. Equally so would an act the provisions of which should be intended to require one to remain in service of one whom he should desire not to serve.\(^15\)

True, the progeny of Lochner was eventually overturned by the Supreme Court just in time to protect a number of New Deal initiatives—including the National Labor Relations Act—from suffering a similar fate.\(^16\) Nevertheless, the threat of constitutional law to workers’ economic rights did not disappear completely, with the statutory rights of workers now having to coexist alongside—and be applied consistently with—other constitutional norms.

In the hands of powerful and determined employers, the latter could be used gravely to weaken the economic rights of workers in individual cases. So although the National Labor Relations Act survived constitutional challenge, it must nevertheless yield to unspecified property rights of the employer. In NLRB v Babcock & Wilcox Co.,\(^17\) it was held by the US Supreme Court that > an employer may validly post his property against non-employee distribution of union literature if reasonable efforts by the union through other available channels of communication will enable it to reach the employees with its message ...\(^18\)

According to the Supreme Court, ‘Organization rights are granted to workers by the same authority, the National Government, that preserves property rights’, and ‘Accommodation between the two must be obtained with as little destruction of one as is consistent with the maintenance of the other.’\(^19\)

III. The Weimar Legacy

As already suggested, there is another legacy. Constitutions may exist not only to restrain the state, but also to require the state to extend defined values or principles into what in some systems might be regarded as the private realm. Such measures serve two related ends. The first is to enrich political democracy in the belief that there can be no democracy without equality; and the second is to extend democratic principles from the political to the social and economic spheres. In the second generation of modern constitutions, a socialist or social democratic or social market function often informs and is sometimes clearly expressed in the text of (p. 1040) the document itself.
Historically, the best known example of such an arrangement is the Weimar Constitution, with its constitutionalization of social and economic rights; its constitutional ambition to create an ‘economic constitution’, and its formal engagement of economic actors in the political process.

In making detailed provision for economic rights, the Weimar Constitution provided that ‘the economy has to be organized based on the principles of justice, with the goal of achieving life in dignity for everyone’, and that ‘within these limits the economic liberty of the individual is to be secured’ (Art 151). The same article recognized the freedom of trade and industry. Like the US Constitution, the Weimar Constitution also made provision for economic rights, relating to both contract and property. Freedom of contract was said to be the foundation of economic transactions (Art 152), while property was said to be ‘guaranteed by the constitution’ (Art 153). A takings clause allowed for expropriation, but only in accordance with law, in the public interest, and on the payment of compensation (Art 153), though alternative provision could be made by law. Guarantees were also made for the right of inheritance, with the state’s right to any property of the deceased to be determined by law (Art 154).

As might be expected, the Weimar Constitution expressly anticipated the possibility of expropriation of private property. This was first to ensure adequate housing and, secondly, for reasons of economic management. Thus, real estate was to be supervised to prevent abuse and to secure housing for German families (especially for those with large numbers of children), while land could be expropriated for this and other purposes (including food production) (Art 155). Similarly, provision was made for the nationalization of enterprises, though the power could be used only ‘if the rules relating to expropriation were followed, and the principles relating to compensation were not violated’. The Constitution also provided that the Reich could ‘join in the administration of economic enterprises or syndicates or may order the states or communities to do so’. The Reich could otherwise assume a decisive influence in the running of such enterprises (Art 156).

But as well as contract, property, and inheritance, the Weimar Constitution also famously recognized the rights of labour. Article 157 provided that ‘Labour enjoys the special protection of the Reich’, which would ‘provide uniform labour legislation’. Specific provision was made for ‘the right to form unions and to improve conditions at work as well as in the economy’, rights ‘guaranteed to every individual and to all occupations’ (Art 159). All agreements and measures limiting or obstructing this right were declared ‘illegal’ (Art 159). Provision was made in the Constitution for a comprehensive system of social insurance ‘in order to protect motherhood and to prevent economic consequences of age, weakness and to protect against the vicissitudes of life’ (Art 161), and support was declared for ‘an international regulation of the rights of the workers, which strives to safeguard a minimum of social rights for humanity’s working class’ (Art 162).

So far as the ‘economic constitution’ is concerned, Article 165 provided that ‘Workers and employees are called upon to participate, on an equal footing and in cooperation with the employers, in the regulation of wages and working conditions as well as in the economic development of productive forces.’ There then followed a great deal of detail about enterprise works councils, district work councils, and the Reich works council, ‘in order to fulfill the economic tasks and to execute the socialization laws in cooperation with the employers’. This is in addition to District economic councils and a Reich Economic Council, ‘to be organized in such a way, that all important professions are represented according to their economic (p. 1041) and social importance.’ The Reich Economic Council would have the right to consider all proposed legislation before being presented to the Reichstag, and a right to initiate legislation even against the wishes of the government. Article 165 was intended to create ‘a pyramid structure’ of economic councils and works councils, which would serve in their operation to democratize the economic sphere. With its authority to consider and propose legislation, the Reich Economic Council would straddle both the economic and the political spheres. That said, Kahn Freund records that bodies such as the Reich Economic Council were never intended to be ‘ultimate decision-making bodies’. He continued:

They were to be subordinate to the political sphere, only consultative and therefore innocuous. They would be consulted on all matters concerning the economy, but not on questions of foreign policy and other non-economic matters. There, the state would be autonomous.

For Kahn Freund and others, it was thus essential that there was an autonomous political sphere in which decisions would have to be made by political organs, that is to say, by a democratically elected parliament, and by a government, supposed to depend on Parliament and giving orders to a civil service.

But although famous for its attempt by constitutional law to cover the economic sphere, the Weimar Constitution was just as famously the subject of excoriating criticism, not least by those who had been most disappointed by its failure to resist capture by the national socialists. Notable among the critics was Kahn Freund who argued that many of these ‘beautifully-worded Articles were nothing but sententious platitudes, binding no one, least of all the legislator, and soon to be characterized by the courts as “merely programmatic announcements” without any legal value.’

Some of the provisions relating to the ‘economic life’ were said to ‘bear the imprint of unreality’, while such ‘real’ achievements of the Weimar Republic as there were ‘might have been attained without such deceptive pronouncements’. Kahn Freund made an exception for the provisions relating to the rights to organize and collective bargaining as set out in Article 165(1). As for the rest, it remained a ‘dead letter’.

IV. Social Democracy Renewed

According to Kahn Freund, the Weimar Constitution was ‘inspired by an almost fetishistic belief in the efficacy of constitutional arrangements’, reflecting ‘a pathetic faith in the effectiveness of institutions and formulated codes’. But whatever the limitations of the Weimar system, the end of the Second World War was a period in which intellectual opinion and political orthodoxy was strongly in favour of (social and) economic rights. This is seen in the powerful restatement of principle in the International Labour Organization’s (ILO) Declaration of Philadelphia of 1944, in the proposal from Roosevelt for a ‘second bill of rights’ for the United States, and in the work of intellectuals like Georges Gurvitch in France (advocating a Bill of Social Rights to secure the ‘jural negation of all exploitation and domination, of all arbitrary power, of all inequality, of all unjustified limitation of liberty of groups, collectivities, and individuals’), and T.H. Marshall in England (charting a great historical progression from civil to political to social rights).

These forces helped to shape national constitutions, many of which in the post-war era were to bear the heavy imprint of ideology, and in some cases heavily pregnant with social democratic or socialist rhetoric. Italy, for example, is a ‘democratic republic based on labor’ (Art 1) (sic). Not only that, but it is ‘the duty of the republic to remove all economic and social obstacles that, by limiting the freedom and equality of citizens, prevent full individual development and the participation of all workers in the political, economic, and social organization of the country’ (Art 3), while according to ‘capability and choice’, every citizen has the duty to undertake an activity or a function that will contribute to the material and moral progress of society’ (Art 4). This in turn led to a full chapter of economic rights in the constitution, which at the time was probably the most comprehensive in West European states.

But if these social democratic constitutions were to bear the heavy imprint of ideology, they were also to bear the imprint of liberal pragmatism that informs at least one strand of social democratic thinking. And like the Weimar Constitution, they too reflect the fact that in a democracy, constitutions must be an instrument of government for all the people, and instruments for progressive rather than revolutionary change. So in Italy the right to free enterprise is recognized, provided that it is not conducted contrary to the public interest, or in a way that ‘harms public security, liberty, or human dignity’. It is also recognized, however, that Italy may be a mixed economy in the sense that ‘economic goods may belong to the state, to public bodies, or to private persons’. So while private ownership is recognized and guaranteed by law, private property may be expropriated in accordance with law provided that compensation is paid (Art 42).

It has been emphasized by Cartabia in a valuable exposition of the Italian ‘economic constitution’ that the property rights protected therein are ‘conditioned by social rights and interests’, which it is said helped to establish what were ‘precise and peculiar features’ in relation to other mixed economies. Thus, Art 41 also provides that ‘public and private economic activities may be directed and coordinated towards social ends’, while Article 42 also provides that private property may be regulated by law ‘to ensure its social function and to make it accessible to all’. Cartabia further points out, however, that these arrangements have not prevented the adaptation of ‘economic and social relations to political transformation’, including most recently an ‘extensive programme of privatisation’. The main instrument of state intervention appears to have been through the medium of state-owned private companies, a form of intervention being said to have reached ‘extremely high levels’.

What emerges here is the presence of some fairly liberal principles in a social democratic wrapping: the right to private property, and the right to compensation if the property is appropriated. Although there is a formal recognition of free enterprise, there is also a notable formal (p. 1043) recognition of the social function of private property. Similar themes emerge in the three European constitutions that were created in the 1970s, with even the most conspicuously ideologically committed text nevertheless making what is by now the standard commitment to ‘the right to private property and to its transfer during lifetime or by death’. The Portuguese Constitution also swims with the conventional tide by providing that while private property may be expropriated, this may only be done in accordance with law and on the payment of fair compensation (Art 62). Indeed, Portugal also now provides for the privatization of property that had been taken into public ownership under earlier regimes.35
Economic Rights

If we turn finally to the Nordic countries, here too there is full recognition of property rights, in some cases going beyond the corresponding recognition of labour rights. Although property may not be forfeited in Norway (Art 104), this is subject to an exception where expropriation (of movable or immovable property) is necessary in the interests of the state, in which case compensation is payable. In Finland, the constitutional protection of property has been widely interpreted to cover intellectual property as well as unemployment and welfare benefits (s 15).36 Apart from the wide scope of the property protected, the constitutional guarantee is violated by regulation that makes private property useless or valueless to the owner. In terms of special protections of private property, the Danish Constitution makes the usual provision about expropriation, but provides remarkably that

Where a Bill relating to the expropriation of property has been passed, one-third of the Members of the Parliament may within three week-days from the final passing of such Bill demand that it shall not be presented for the Royal Assent until new elections to the Parliament have been held and the Bill has again been passed by the Parliament assembling thereupon.

V. Workers’ Rights

So far as economic rights are concerned, it is in relation to the economic rights of labour that social democratic constitutions make what is their most distinctive contribution. Two types of labour rights are to be found in constitutional texts, notably individual and collective rights (or in the latter case individual rights that in practice may only be exercised collectively). The former deal with the rights of workers, the latter with the rights of trade unions. So far as workers’ rights are concerned, these have a number of distinguishing features, one of which is that they are contingent and promotional, and now probably beyond the capacity of any single state to deliver. They are contingent in the sense that the French Constitution proclaims that ‘every individual has the duty to work and the right to employment’, while the Portuguese Constitution recognizes that ‘all have the right to work’ and imposes a duty on the state to implement policies of full employment (Art 58).37

An alternative way of expressing the responsibility of the state for securing work for all is to be found in the promotional provisions in countries like Spain where ‘special emphasis will be placed on the realization of a policy aimed at full employment’ (Art 40), or in Denmark where ‘efforts should be made to afford work to every able-bodied citizen on terms that will secure (p. 1044) his existence’ (s 75). Similarly in Italy, where the Republic ‘recognizes the right of all citizens to work’, and ‘promotes such conditions as will make this right effective’ (Art 4); and Greece, where the Constitution recognizes that ‘work is a right’, but then provides that the state must seek ‘to create conditions of employment for all citizens’ (Art 22). Less urgent is Finland where public authorities are required to ‘promote employment’ and ‘strive to secure the right to work for everyone’ (s 15), and the Netherlands where it is the ‘concern’ of the authorities to ‘promote the provision of sufficient employment’ (Art 19).38

Apart from being contingent on factors beyond the control of any nation state, economic rights of workers are characterized also by being inevitably opaque and open-textured. This is true of those provisions that deal with wages. In Norway, for example, ‘it is the responsibility of the authorities of the State to create conditions enabling every person capable of work to earn a living by his work’ (Art 110). In Italy in contrast, ‘workers are entitled to remuneration commensurate with the quantity and quality of their work, and in any case sufficient to ensure to them and their families a free and honorable existence’ (Art 36). All Spaniards have a right ‘to a sufficient remuneration to satisfy their needs and those of their family’ (Art 35). In Belgium, there is another variation on the theme, with the right to dignity embracing ‘the right to just working conditions and equitable remuneration’ (Art 23), while in Portugal, there is a guarantee of remuneration that will ensure a ‘respectable livelihood’ (Art 59(1)(a)).

What is striking about these provisions is that constitutions typically prescribe a right not to a minimum wage, but to a living wage (Norway), a sufficient wage (Italy and Spain), or a fair wage (Belgium). But in doing so they do not determine the principles by which wage levels are to be set, and generally leave the matter to be fixed by Parliament or others. It is also striking that not all the foregoing countries have a statutory minimum wage. Indeed this is true not only of Norway and Italy of the countries mentioned, but of other countries in the social democratic tradition, including Sweden and Denmark. In the case of Italy, however, the constitutional obligation is met in part by a requirement that workers should be paid in accordance with the most relevant collective agreement.\textsuperscript{39} while in Sweden there is a very strongly established principle that wages should be determined by autonomous collective bargaining between employers and trade unions.
Economic Rights

The fact that not all social democracies make constitutional provision for wages highlights a third aspect of economic rights of workers. This is the rather incomplete treatment of these rights in the constitutions of social democratic regimes, the treatment thus sometimes appearing rather random. A full catalogue of such rights is to be found in international treaties, notably the European Social Charter of 1961 which addresses the right to work, the right to just conditions of work, the right to safe and healthy working conditions, the right to a fair remuneration, the right to organize, and the right to bargain collectively (including the right to strike). But no social democracy covers anything like the same ground, with the possible exception of Portugal where the constitution covered the right to work, the rights of workers (covering pay, working conditions, rest, and recreation), and job security (Arts 53, 58, and 59).

\textit{(p. 1045)} Indeed, Germany makes little provision for the employment relationship,\textsuperscript{40} while Denmark, Norway, and Sweden make no contribution to substantive rights beyond that already referred to.\textsuperscript{41} The Netherlands provides that rules for the protection of workers and co-determination ‘shall be laid down in an Act of Parliament’ (Art 19), while Greece similarly provides that ‘general working conditions are determined by law and are supplemented by collective agreements’ (Art 22). Although France recognizes a right to work, the bulk of the Constitution’s economic rights relate to freedom of association. Otherwise, a full catalogue of social rights can be constructed, but only by asking for contributions from each jurisdiction, including a right to paid holidays (with working time to be regulated by law) (Italy); a right to ‘just working conditions’ (Belgium); the promotion of workplace safety (Spain); and a right not to be unfairly dismissed (Finland).

VI. Trade Union Rights

In contrast to the individual rights discussed above, collective rights are those rights which relate to the arrangements for participating in economic decisions, that is to say in the enterprise, or in the branch or sector of the economy in which the individual is engaged, or otherwise in relation to workplace issues. Institutional arrangements of this kind are normally built around the practice of collective bargaining whereby trade unions acting on behalf of workers negotiate terms and conditions of employment. In social democracies this does not mean enterprise-based bargaining that affects only the workers in the enterprise in question, the trade union acting as an agent or as a representative of the workers concerned. Rather, as already suggested it means branch or sector-wide bargaining in which the trade union acts in a regulatory or de facto legislative capacity, negotiating terms and conditions of employment for workers across an entire sector.

In some countries, these agreements may be extended by legislation—or by other means—to employers who are not members of the associations which conclude the agreements. Where regulatory collective bargaining of this kind takes place, collective bargaining density may be as high as 98 per cent (as in Austria), compared to liberal democracies such as Canada (33 per cent) and the United States (11 per cent) where a different form of collective bargaining takes place.\textsuperscript{42} Although social democratic constitutions do not typically set out in great detail the machinery of the ‘economic constitution’, they do nevertheless underpin it with strong trade union rights of a kind unfamiliar in the liberal democracies of the common law world. These include the right to organize in a trade union (there can be no bargaining unless there is organization on both sides), a right to bargain collectively, and a right to strike (there can be no bargaining without a sanction in the event of impasse).

This role of \textit{collective bargaining} is recognized in a number of constitutions, notably in France where the preamble to the 1946 text not only provides that individuals have the right to defend their interests by trade union action, but that ‘every worker shall participate through his delegates in the collective arrangement of work conditions, as well as in the running of the firm.’ Drafted at about the same time, the Italian Constitution recognizes not only that trade unions have a legal status, but that they may ‘negotiate collective agreements having compulsory...
Economic Rights

value for all persons belonging to the categories to which said agreements refer’ (Art 39). There is no comparable provision in the German Basic Law drafted also at that time, but such arrangements are embedded in the foundations of the state in the post-war era, and there is a suggestion that the right to bargain collectively is implied by the constitutional guarantee of freedom of association.\(^43\)

The pivotal role of collective bargaining in social democratic constitutions is reflected by its recognition in more recent texts, including those of Greece, Spain, and Portugal. The first provides that the ‘general conditions of work shall be determined by law and supplemented by collective agreements arrived at by free collective bargaining’ (Art 22), the second that the ‘law shall guarantee the right to collective labor negotiations between the representatives of workers and employers, as well as the binding force of agreements’ (Art 37), and the third that ‘trade unions have the power to conclude collective agreements, though it is also provided that the rules governing the power to make collective agreements as well as the scope of these agreements is to be determined by law’ (Art 56).\(^44\) The right to bargain collectively is recognized in Belgium (Art 23) (along with the right to information and consultation), though not in the revised Swedish Instrument of Government.\(^45\)

Perhaps curiously, the right to strike appears to be more widely recognized in European social democracies than the process of collective bargaining of which it is an essential feature. In many cases it is expressly recognized (France, Italy, Sweden, Portugal, Spain, Greece), but in others it has been created by the courts as being a consequence of the right to freedom of association (Germany and Finland).\(^46\) Beyond that, there are differences in terms of ‘ownership’ of the right: in some cases (Germany, Greece) it is expressed as the right of the union, whereas in other cases (Portugal, Spain) it is expressed as the right of the individual worker. There are also differences as to the substance of the right, though most of the constitutional texts (Italy, Spain, Greece, Sweden) allow limits to be imposed by law.\(^47\) In the case of France, the courts have imposed limits on an otherwise unqualified right,\(^48\) while in Portugal the right is stated to be unlimited.

The right to strike is thus widely but not universally recognized by the constitutions of social democratic societies, the Netherlands being a notable exception. In an important decision of the Hoge Raad,\(^49\) however, domestic effect was given to the right to strike as expressed in the European Social Charter of 1961. By Article 6(4) this provides that the High Contracting Parties undertake to recognize ‘the right of workers and employers to collective action in cases of conflicts of interest, including the right to strike ...’. The Dutch Constitution recognizes the binding effect of treaties that have been approved by Parliament (Art 93), with the result that domestic law is not applicable if it conflicts with such a treaty (Art 94). In giving domestic effect to Article 6(4) of the Social Charter, the Court was incorporating into domestic law the provisions of a treaty that was a highpoint of the social democratic consensus in post-war Western Europe.

VII. Economic Rights and the ‘New Democracies’

Although the economic rights provisions of the Weimar Constitution were not adopted by the German Federal Republic, it is said that the Weimar legacy continued more clearly in the Constitution of the former DDR in 1949. The latter, however, was revised in 1968 and again in 1974, the 1974 Constitution proclaiming a ‘socialist state of workers and farmers’, ‘under the leadership of the working class and its Marxist-Leninist party’. Revised in the same era, the Constitution of the USSR (1977) marked the ‘epoch-making turn from capitalist to socialism’. It was based on the principle of ‘democratic centralism’ (Art 3), in which the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU) operated as the ‘leading and guiding force of the Soviet society and the nucleus of its political system, of all state organisations and public organisations’ (Art 6). Special provision was made for trade unions and others to participate ‘in managing state and public affairs, and in deciding political, economic, and social and cultural matters’ (Art 7).

This is not the place to engage with arguments that the Soviet Constitutions ‘have existed to maximize the legal authority of a revolutionary government and the unbounded exercise thereof’, or with claims that the constitution was otherwise ‘machinery or decoration’.\(^50\) For present purposes, it is enough to note that when these constitutional arrangements were transformed in the USSR and a number of other countries after 1989, there was little evident desire in most of these countries to adopt an unequivocal liberal constitutionalism of the kind encountered in the United States or elsewhere, however much free enterprise and liberal democracy may have been admired. Not only is Russia said to be ‘a social state’ (Art 7), but the same is true of Bulgaria (Preamble) and Romania (Preamble), while Hungary (Preamble), Poland (Art 20), and Slovakia (Art 55) are declared to be social market economies, and yet other ‘new democracies’ demonstrate some commitment to social justice.

Given their recent history, it is unsurprising that these counter-revolutionary states should embrace economic rights of various kinds, including rights of entrepreneurship and rights relating to private property. As to the former, the Republic of Bulgaria is based on ‘free economic initiative’, in which the state ‘shall establish and guarantee equal legal conditions for economic activity to all citizens and corporate entities by preventing any abuse of a monopoly status and unfair competition and by protecting the consumer’ (Art 19). Similarly, ‘Hungary recognizes and supports the right to enterprise and the freedom of competition in the economy’ (Art 9), while in Slovakia everyone has ‘the right to engage in entrepreneurial or other gainful activity’ (Art 35). While the foregoing are hymns to the virtues of free enterprise, Poland at least has a the measure of its vices: ‘Public authorities shall protect consumers, customers, hirers or lessees against activities threatening their health, privacy and safety, as well as against dishonest market practices’ (Art 76).

So far as property rights are concerned, the new constitutions typically seek to offer what is by now the conventional guarantee: recognition of the right to private property, with compensation to be paid in the event of expropriation in the public interest. There is a sense in which these guarantees are drafted with a greater sense of purpose than in earlier constitutions and with a stronger sense of protection. In the case of Poland, forfeiture may take place only with judicial approval (Art 46), while in Hungary the Constitution emphasizes that ‘expropriation shall only be permitted in exceptional cases, when such action is in the public interest, and only in such cases and in the manner stipulated by law, with provision of full, unconditional and immediate compensation’ (Art 13). There continues to be recognition that some property may be owned by the state, as in Slovakia, ‘to meet the needs of society, the development of the national economy, and public interest’ (Art 20).

In all of these cases detailed provision is made for labour rights, in some cases in much greater detail than in any of the social democracies already referred to. The most ambitious is perhaps Slovakia, which provides that ‘employees have the right to equitable and adequate working conditions’, and that the law guarantees, ‘the right to remuneration for work done, sufficient to ensure the employee’s dignified standard of living’, ‘protection against arbitrary dismissal and discrimination at the place of work’, the protection of health and safety at work, the longest admissible working time, the regulation of working time (including rest periods and holidays), and the right to collective bargaining (Art 36). But with few exceptions, all of these countries make express provision for trade union freedom (including the right to strike), albeit that it is the freedom of a different kind of trade unionism than the one previously encountered.

But although mimicking social democratic constitutionalism, it is to be noted that in most of the so-called ‘new democracies’, the institutional infrastructure of social democracy is not as fully developed as in the countries of Western Europe. Trade union membership tends to be lower (and in some case much lower), while collective bargaining is more likely to take place at enterprise rather than sectoral level. Collective bargaining density thus tends to be low, especially when compared to most of the EU15 (with the exception of the United Kingdom). It is also the case that constitutional guarantees of trade union rights (including the right to strike) have not prevented successful complaints being made from some of the ‘new democracies’ to the ECtHR (Russia), the Social Rights Committee of the Council of Europe (Bulgaria), and the ILO (Bulgaria, Hungary, Poland, Romania, Russia, Slovenia, in 2011 alone).

(p. 1049) VIII. Economic Rights and Liberal Democracies

These difficulties in reaching and maintaining international minimum standards on economic rights is by no means a problem unique to the constitutional law of ‘new democracies’. Nevertheless, we can only marvel at the optimism of at least some in the ‘new democracies’ to establish countervailing sources of power to the power of the state, and the awareness of the need to establish balanced sources of private power, features also on display in the new South African Constitution (though here too with a contestable impact). So what about the long-established liberal democracies in the predominantly English-speaking world? These are the constitutions built expressly (or impliedly in the case of Canada) on property rights. Could they be persuaded to embrace the economic rights of labour? If so how could this be done? And why?

It is true of course that at subnational level in some of these countries we encounter some commitment to economic rights. A good example of this in the United States is the state constitution of New York, with its glorious embrace of the principle that ‘labor is not a commodity’ (s 17), while Canada offers a good example in the form of the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, with its right of every worker to ‘fair and reasonable conditions of employment’ (s 46). There have also been political moves in some liberal democracies to expand human rights protection to include economic rights, most notably in Canada where the ill-fated federal and provincial intergovernmental Charlottetown Accord in 1992 proposed amending the constitution to include provisions for a social and economic union. These—non-justiciable policy objectives—would include protection for the right of workers to organize and bargain collectively.57

Attention in Canada has long since switched from the political arena to the courts, though at first blush the courts seem to be mining a shallow seam. As we have seen, liberal constitutions in the common law tradition were initially hostile to the economic rights of workers and their organizations, though some (but not all) have since been persuaded to occupy a position of tolerance. But it is a long way from tolerance to protection, especially when that protection would require a creative and expansive interpretation of civil and political rights relating to freedom of association. Could such a right be strong enough to include the freedom not only to be in association with others, but also the freedom to act in association with others? And if so, could such a guarantee be read to include the right to organize in a trade union, the right to bargain collectively, and the right to strike? And by what standard would the substance of any such right be determined?

In an appeal from Trinidad and Tobago in 1970, the Privy Council famously provided one answer: the right to freedom of association for a trade union member means no more than the right to be a member of a trade union.58 Although taking an approach not quite this narrow, in its equally famous ‘labour trilogy’ in the 1980s, the Supreme Court of Canada likewise held that the right to freedom of association did not include a right to bargain collectively or a right to strike; but that even if it did, the restrictions in these cases would be permitted by section 1 of the Charter, which allows reasonable restrictions to be imposed on Charter rights.59 In a (p. 1050) more recent ‘labour trilogy’, however, the Supreme Court of Canada has changed its mind, and held in the first of these cases that the denial of collective bargaining rights to agricultural workers was a violation of the Charter right to freedom of association, emphasizing the potentially collective dimension to the Charter.60

This is a development that requires some explanation, and cannot be understood as a sudden embrace of strong social democratic values. What does stand out, however, is an example of the growing influence of international human treaties in the work of regional and national courts. In a decision reflecting closely the approach of the ECtHR a year later,61 the Canadian Supreme Court said in the second decision of the recent trilogy that ‘the Charter should be presumed to provide at least as great a level of protection as is found in the international human rights documents that Canada has ratified.’62 For this purpose, the Court referred specifically to three treaties, namely the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, and ILO Convention 87, the last dealing with freedom of association and protection of the right to organize. To say the least, these were controversial benchmarks, none of which referred expressly to the right to bargain collectively, a matter dealt with separately by ILO Convention 98, which Canada has not ratified.

But although significant, this development should not be exaggerated. It is one thing to acknowledge international human rights treaties, but another matter to give effect to international human rights principles and norms, leading to doubts about whether the sow’s ear of liberal constitutional liberty can ever produce the means necessary to produce the silk purse of social democratic equality. So although re-affirming its commitment to ILO principles in the third decision in the recent trilogy, the Canadian Supreme Court has settled on a definition of collective bargaining for the purposes of the principle of freedom of association that is unique to the SCC, and which falls some way short of the ILO principles to which it referred. According to the Court, ‘the bottom line’ is simply that workers ‘are entitled to meaningful processes by which they can pursue workplace goals’.63 As a result, the Court upheld legislation authorizing a diluted form of workplace representation that had already been condemned by the ILO supervisory bodies.64

IX. Back to Lochner?

The narrative so far leads tentatively in two directions. The first is the ‘normality’ of including both species of economic rights in national constitutions, despite the apparent retreat of social democracy in the global economy.
Economic Rights

Apart from the countries already discussed, this a feature of the major constitutional texts of South America (notably Brazil) and Asia (notably India). Moreover, new constitutions are more likely to embrace than reject economic rights of both species. The second (and more tentative) is that economic rights are beginning to be sustained (p. 1051) by civil and political rights in systems where they are not otherwise fully included. Apart from the evolving developments to this effect in Canada, there are signs that even the British courts may be stirring. To some extent this latter development can also be attributed to the enduring impact of social democratic values, to the extent that the developments in question are inspired by international treaties themselves monuments to the legacy of social democracy.

The traffic is not, however, all one way, with the spirit of Lochner worryingly surviving in a number of jurisdictions. By some way the most serious of these threats is that presented by the European Court of Justice/Court of Justice of the European Union, particularly in relation to the social democracies of Western Europe. In the first of several recent cases, a Finnish shipping company (Viking Line) proposed to re-flag a vessel in Estonia, where it could take advantage of lower wages. Concerned about the impact that this might have on jobs and terms and conditions of employment, the Finnish Seamen’s Union (FSU) objected and enlisted the support of the International Transport Workers’ Federation (ITF), which in turn gave instructions to national affiliated trade unions not to deal with the Viking Line. The company brought proceedings in the English courts (London being the base of the ITF), alleging that the conduct of the ITF violated the EC Treaty, on the ground that it interfered with the company’s right to freedom of establishment (Art 43).

On a reference by the English Court of Appeal seeking guidance on a number of questions, the European Court of Justice (ECJ) responded in a quite unpredictable way, elevating the rights of business over the rights of trade unions. Although accepting that the right to strike was a fundamental principle of EU law, the ECJ imposed a number of qualifications on the exercise of the right, which were consistent with neither the Finnish constitution, nor the principles of the ILO. A week later, the same court held in the parallel Laval case that a trade union could not take collective action against a Latvian building firm in order to compel it to observe Swedish collective agreements for workers it had posted to Sweden from Latvia. Again, the right of businesses to freedom to provide services (EC Treaty, Article 49) took priority over the right to strike accepted as a fundamental principle of EU law and protected by the Swedish Constitution.

It is important to emphasize that because of the principle of the overriding supremacy of EU law, these decisions have direct effect in national legal systems, and take priority over even national constitutional arrangements. Indeed, it is already the case that both the FSU and the ITF settled an undisclosed sum in favour of the Viking Line, and that the Swedish unions were held liable by the Swedish Labour Court to pay damages to Laval, in both cases for taking action that was apparently constitutionally protected and permissible under national law. It is true that the decisions impose qualifications (Viking) and restrictions (Laval) on constitutional (and other) rights only where the rights in question are being exercised in a transnational EU context, such as the relocation of a business or the posting of workers from one member state to another. But as the ILO Committee of Experts has pointed out: in the current context of globalization, such cases are likely to be ever more common, particularly with respect to certain sectors of employment, like the airline sector, and thus the impact upon the possibility of the workers in these sectors of being able to meaningfully negotiate with their employers on matters affecting the terms and conditions of employment may indeed be devastating.

Well might Danny Nicol refer to Viking and Laval as the EU’s ‘Lochner moment’, the ECJ having elevated an old ideology from the trenches of the common law, to the high plains of treaty interpretation, trampling on constitutional achievements along the way. For although the EU proclaims to be a ‘social market economy’ which ‘confirms its attachment to the fundamental social rights of workers’, and although it has impressively embedded a process of social dialogue in its lawmaking machinery, social democratic ambitions nevertheless appear to have been contained. It is true that the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights recognizes the right to collective bargaining and action (Art 28). But it is also true that this is subject to the qualification that the right may be exercised ‘in accordance with Union law and national laws and practices’, a provision which post-Lisbon effectively entrenches the Viking and Laval doctrines in the constitutional DNA of the EU.

Quite apart from the fact that the ECJ/CJEU has so conspicuously used a ‘constitutional’ text (the EU Treaty) to subordinate the rights of labour to the needs of property, Viking and Laval are all the more striking for the fact that they are so far out of step with the line of travel being pursued by the other European court, namely the ECHR. In a number of cases decided after Viking and Laval, the ECHR has held that the right to freedom of association in the European Convention on Human Rights (Art 11) includes the right to bargain collectively and the right to take collective action, in the former case at the standard set by ILO Convention 98. In taking these steps, the ECHR did so by having regard to developments both international and national, ‘and to the practice of Contracting States in such matters’. The developments in question included not only ILO Convention 98, but also the Council of Europe’s Social Charter, and (ironically) the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights.

X. Conclusion

Historically, there has been a constitutional evolution in the treatment of economic rights in national constitutions, and from a comparative point of view the emergence of two different political traditions. The recognition of property rights transcends both liberal and social democratic constitutions, but in both property rights tend to be read widely. The inclusion of welfare benefits as a form of property, however, appears to vary in its implications, giving rise to procedural obligations in the United States, but in some cases to substantive expectations in the Council of Europe, even though in the latter case the jurisprudence may flatter to deceive.

The economic rights of labour in contrast to the economic rights of property are associated with social democratic principles and the socialization of the private sphere. They represent a statement about how a society is to be governed in all of its aspects, rather than a statement about what a government may or may not do. Crucially, the constitutional rights of labour suited the prevailing economic orthodoxy at the time they were developed, one which emphasized the need to increase the spending power of workers, to stimulate demand for goods, to reduce unemployment and welfare dependency, and to alleviate distress and reduce the risk of social unrest.

These economic rights of labour sit uncomfortably in a new economic orthodoxy of open markets, transnational corporations, and free trade in an intensely competitive global economy. Now, wages and other terms and conditions are being squeezed to reduce prices, and jobs are being moved to reduce costs for the behemoths that now dominate economic and political life. In that context the constitutional protection of labour rights takes on a new role and a new responsibility, these entrenched rights running against the grain of an orthodoxy they seem so spectacularly ill-equipped to confront.

Recent developments suggest that one challenge for the evolving purpose of labour rights as constitutional rights will be to ensure that such rights in national constitutions both meet and are permitted to operate at the minimum level set by international human rights instruments, and in particular at the level set by the ILO. Developments in places as diverse as the Canadian Supreme Court and the ECJ suggest that that while judges are willing to acknowledge these principles, there is not the same willingness on the part of all judges to engage with their substance. In the current climate, lip-service is hardly good enough.

Bibliography

Georges Gurvitch, A Bill of Social Rights (1945)
Otto Kahn-Freund, ‘The Weimar Constitution’ (1944) 15 Political Quarterly 229
Danny Nicol, ‘Europe’s Lochner Moment’ [2011] Public Law 308

Notes:

(1) For a nice—if now implausible—expression of this, see Gujarat Steel Tubes v Its Mazdoor Sabha 1980 AIR 1980 SC 1896:

The Constitution of India is not a non—saligned parochial parchment but a partisan of social justice with a direction and destination which it set out in the Preamble and Art 38 ... ours is a mixed economy with capitalist mores, only slowly mobilizing towards a socialist mores. (Krishna Iyer J at 1908–9)

(5) Ibid para 396.

(8) Ibid.

(10) Ibid 276.

(13) Coppage v Kansas 236 US 1, 22 (1914).

(15) Coppage (n 13), 23.

(16) See West Coast Hotel Co v Parrish 300 US 379 (1937) (reversing Adkins (n 14), to uphold Washington State minimum wage law), and NLRB v Jones and Laughlin Steel Corp 301 US 1 (1937) (upholding National Labor Relations Act).

(17) 351 US 105 (1956).

(19) Ibid 113.

(21) See Dukes (n 3).

(22) I am grateful to Dr Ruth Dukes for this point, and for additional points in the text.

(23) Dukes (n 3), 202.

(24) Ibid.

(26) Ibid, referring here specifically to Art 151.

(27) Ibid 231.

(28) Ibid. These were destined ‘to play a decisive role in the history of the German republic, and to form the basis of its noteworthy system of labour law.’ He was later to refer to the ‘Alice in Wonderland’ nature of Art 165(2)–(5): Otto Kahn-Freund, Labour Law and Politics in the Weimar Republic (Roy Lewis and Jon Clark eds, 1981), 201.

(29) Ibid.

(30) Ibid 230.

(33) See Eduard Bernstein, Preconditions of Socialism (Henry Tudor ed and trans, 1993): social democracy the ‘legitimate heir’ to liberalism (147).

(37) According to the US Department of Labor, in June 2011 unemployment in France stood at 9.3 per cent, and in Portugal at 12.2 per cent: see (http://www.bls.gov/ilc/intl_unemployment_rates_monthly.htm#Rchart2).

(38) In none of these countries has the state been able to secure full employment on a consistent basis, with the US Department of Labor reporting unemployment levels in June 2011 running at 21 per cent (Spain), and 7.2 per cent (Denmark): ibid. The country with the least urgent duty coincidentally has the lowest level of unemployment, with the Netherlands being said to have unemployment levels of 4.2 per cent: ibid.

(41) Sweden does deal with the right to strike, dealt with below, and Norway makes provision for co-determination.

(44) The Portuguese Constitution also guarantees trade unions the right to participate in the preparation of labour legislation, the management of social security institutions, the monitoring of the implementation of economic and social plans, and to be represented on bodies engaged in the harmonization of social questions (Art 56).

(45) Despite the great importance of collective bargaining as a regulatory procedure in the Nordic social democracies, there is no recognition of it in any of the national constitutions.

(46) In the case of Germany, by a decision of the Federal Labour Court in 1955 (on which see Manfred Weiss and Marlene Schmidt in Roger Blanpain (ed), International Encyclopaedia of Labour Law and Industrial Relations, vol 7 (2010), 203); in the case of Finland also by judicial decision (see Viking Line v ITF [2005] EWCA Civ 1299, [2006] IRLR 58, at para 26).

(47) In the case of Italy, there is no ‘law’, the scope of the right being left to the courts to determine: see Michele Ainis and Temistocle Martines, Codice Costituzionale (2001), 295–304. In the case of Spain, there is no law made since the Constitution took effect, the position being governed in part by a royal decree made shortly after the end of the Franco era, much of which was ruled unconstitutional by the Constitutional Court on 8 April 1981.

(49) NV Dutch Railways v Transport Unions FNV, FSV and CNV [1988] 6 Int Lab Reps 57.

(51) For a critical account of some of the problems this has created in adapting to a new political order, see András Sajó, ‘How the Rule of Law Killed Welfare Reform’ (1996) 5 East European Constitutional Review 31.

(53) ETUI, ‘Collective Bargaining’ (n 42).

(54) Danilenkov v Russia, ECHR App no 67336/01, 30 July 2009.

(57) Consensus Report on the Constitution, Final Text, 28 August 1992. We can only speculate on whether the Canadian courts would have developed such non-justiciable principles as courageously as their Indian counterparts, on which see this volume, Chapter 49.

(58) Collymore v Attorney General of Trinidad and Tobago [1970] AC 538.

(63) Ontario (AG) v Fraser 2011 SCC 20, para 117.

(64) For the CFA, see Complaint against the Government of Canada presented by the United Food and Commercial Workers Union Canada (UFCW Canada), supported by the Canadian Labour Congress and UNI Global Union, Report...
No 358, Case No 2704, para 355.

(66) The best example of this recently in national law is Ryanair v Labour Court [2007] IESC 6, where the Irish Supreme Court held that legislation was to be ‘given a proportionate and constitutional interpretation so as not unreasonably to encroach on Ryanair’s right to operate a non-unionised company’. This is widely thought to have given corporations a constitutional right not to deal with trade unions, Ireland thereby elevating by means of constitutional law the rights of businesses above the rights of its citizens.

(68) Case C-438/05 Viking Line v ITF, 11 December 2007.

(69) Case C-341/05 Laval v Svenska Byggnadsarbetareförbundet, 18 December 2007.

(73) It is notable also that although the ECJ in both Viking and Laval took into account ILO Conventions, it did do in a way that distorted their meaning.

(74) TEU, Art 3(3) and Preamble respectively.

(75) TFEU, Arts 154, 155.

(76) The TEU, Art 6 now provides that the Charter ‘shall have the same legal value as the treaties’.

(77) See esp Demir and Baykara v Turkey [2008] ECHR 1345. An account of the other cases is to be found in Ewing and Hendy (n 61).

(78) Demir and Baycara (n 61), para 154.

K. D. Ewing
K.D. Ewing is Professor of Public Law, King's College, London
The Constitutionalization of Abortion

Reva B. Siegel

The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Constitutional Law
Edited by Michel Rosenfeld and András Sajó

Print Publication Date: May 2012
Online Publication Date: Nov 2012
DOI: 10.1093/oxfordhb/9780199578610.013.0053

Abstract and Keywords

This article analyzes constitutional decisions concerning abortion in the United States and Germany, their evolution over time, and their influence across jurisdictions. But rather than assume the existence of constitutional law on abortion, it asks how abortion was constitutionalized. The article proceeds in three sections. Section I briefly considers developments in the 1960s and 1970s, a time when reformers of many kinds persuaded legislatures around the world to liberalize access to abortion; when a mobilizing feminist movement first claimed that repeal of abortion restrictions was required as a matter of justice for women; when those who sought to preserve abortion’s criminalization began to mobilize against change in the name of a ‘right to life’; and when courts in five nations first issued judgments explaining what forms of abortion regulation their respective constitutions required or allowed. Section II examines key constitutional decisions in the United States and Germany which together illustrate differences and similarities in the logic of constitutionalization. Section III looks to the logic of constitutional law today, considering how several dominant frameworks address the woman question.

Keywords: abortion law, United States, Germany, constitutional law, constitutionalization

I. From Constitutional Politics to Constitutional Law 1060

II. Foundational Frameworks and their Evolution: United States and Germany 1064
   1. The 1970s 1066
   2. The 1990s 1068

III. Contemporary Constitutional Frameworks 1071
   1. Respecting Women’s Dignity: Periodic Legislation 1072
   2. Protecting Life/Protecting Women: Indications Legislation 1073
   3. Protecting Life/Respecting Women: Result-Open Counseling 1075

Comparative constitutional study of abortion has generally focused on the decisions of a few influential jurisdictions, particularly Germany and the United States, where constitutional frameworks begin from dramatically divergent premises—protecting, respectively, unborn life and decisional autonomy. Some comparative studies are dynamic, observing that constitutional doctrine in Germany and the United States has evolved to allow forms of abortion regulation that share more in common than the divergent constitutional frameworks authorizing them would suggest.

This chapter analyzes constitutional decisions concerning abortion in the United States and Germany, their evolution over time, and their influence across jurisdictions. But rather than assume the existence of constitutional law on abortion—as so much of the literature does—the chapter asks how abortion was constitutionalized.
Examining the conflicts, within and across borders, that led to the first judicial decisions addressing the constitutionality of abortion laws in the 1970s sheds light on questions that prompted the birth of this body of law, and continue to shape its growth. The first constitutional decisions on abortion grew out of debates over women's citizenship, engendering doctrine that to this day is haunted by 'the woman question', conflicted about whether government may or must control women's decisions about motherhood. Attention to this question in turn sheds light on the relationship of constitutional politics and constitutional law: it demonstrates how political conflict shapes constitutional law and constitutional law endeavors to shape political conflict.4

Constitutional decisions on abortion began in an era when a transnational women's movement was beginning to contest the terms of women's citizenship, eliciting diverse forms of reaction, both supportive and resisting. As I show, the woman question haunts the abortion decisions, where it is initially addressed by indirectness, and over time comes to occupy a more visible role, whether as an express concern of doctrine, or as a problematic nested inside of the growing body of law articulating a constitutional obligation to protect unborn life.

The body of constitutional law on abortion that has grown up since the 1970s is concerned with the propriety, necessity, and feasibility of controlling women's agency in decisions concerning motherhood. Some courts have insisted that government should respect women's decisions about motherhood, while many others have insisted that protecting unborn life requires government to control women's decisions about motherhood. Over the decades a growing number of courts have allowed government to protect life by persuading (rather than coercing) women to assume the role of motherhood. Across Europe, a growing number of jurisdictions are now giving women the final word in decisions about abortion—on the constitutional ground that it is the best way to protect unborn life. These remarkable developments suggest deep conflict about whether law should and can control women's agency in decisions about motherhood. Reading the cases with attention to this conflict identifies questions that courts are grappling with in the latest generation of abortion decisions, illuminating ambiguities in the normative basis of constitutional frameworks and in their practical architecture.

At the same time, this approach to the abortion cases offers a fascinating vantage point on constitutional decision-making in the face of persistent social conflict. On one familiar view, constitutional adjudication raises the stakes of the abortion debate because it requires courts to choose between competing principles, and so inhibits compromise and incites polarization. But this chapter offers a more complicated story in which escalating political conflict precipitates constitutional adjudication, and, over time, constitutional adjudication endeavors to mediate political conflict. Recent judicial decisions on abortion seem to appreciate the tenacity of the abortion conflict, and in varying ways have come to internalize its implications for constitutional adjudication. Judgments frequently integrate opposing normative perspectives into one constitutional framework, in order to channel conflict that courts lack power to settle. Rather than endeavoring to impose values, courts often employ techniques that inform politics with constitutional value, just as recent abortion legislation aspires to shape judicial reasoning about constitutional matters. These judicial and legislative frameworks endeavor to vindicate contested constitutional values by means that preserve social cohesion.

This chapter's interest in the conflicts that engendered the constitutionalization of abortion shapes its focus. The chapter does not systematically compare abortion legislation worldwide or investigate social practices concerning its enforcement. The chapter considers legislation for the purpose of exploring the roots and dynamic logic of constitutional law. These same interests shape its coverage of constitutional doctrine. The chapter's focus is on the development in national constitutions of broad normative frameworks concerning abortion.

The chapter proceeds in three sections. Section I briefly considers developments in the 1960s and 1970s, a time when reformers of many kinds persuaded legislatures around the world to liberalize access to abortion; when a mobilizing feminist movement first claimed that repeal of abortion restrictions was required as a matter of justice for women; when those who sought to preserve abortion's criminalization began to mobilize against change in the name of a ‘right to life’; and when courts in five nations first issued judgments explaining what forms of abortion regulation their respective constitutions required or allowed.

Section II examines key constitutional decisions in the United States and Germany which together illustrate differences and similarities in the logic of constitutionalization. In the 1970s, courts in both jurisdictions struck down abortion laws and provided guidelines for future legislation, reasoning from very different constitutional norms. In 1973, the US Supreme Court interpreted its Constitution to require legislatures to respect the decision of a woman and her physician whether to terminate a pregnancy, as long as the fetus was not viable; in 1975, the West German Federal Constitutional Court interpreted its Basic Law to require legislatures to protect unborn life, by prohibiting abortion in all cases except those that would impose extraordinary burdens on the pregnant woman. In the 1990s, commentators observe, in the midst of domestic political conflict, each court significantly modified its judgment, to allow access to abortion after abortion-dissuasive counseling. Less remarked upon is the way that the reasoning of the courts in the 1990s was shaped by constitutional struggles of the preceding decades. I consider in particular how the view of women as citizens expressed in the us and German abortion opinions of the 1970s and 1990s evolved.

Section III looks to the logic of constitutional law today, considering how several dominant frameworks address the woman question. Some jurisdictions now require constitutional protections for women's dignity and welfare in government regulation of abortion of a kind unheard of before the modern women's movement. Many jurisdictions require constitutional protection for unborn life, providing for these purposes detailed judgments about what legislatures may or must do in regulating women's conduct. Perhaps the most remarkable aspect of this story is how understanding of this recently articulated duty to protect unborn life has evolved: over time and across jurisdictions, the constitutional duty to protect unborn life has been articulated in terms that increasingly acknowledge, accommodate, and even respect women citizens as autonomous agents—even in matters concerning motherhood. A growing number of jurisdictions now invoke the constitutional duty to protect unborn life as reason for giving women the final word in decisions concerning abortion.

I. From Constitutional Politics to Constitutional Law

In the mid-twentieth century, abortion laws around the world varied greatly. Some countries allowed abortion on request; others criminalized abortion except to save the life of the pregnant woman. Between these extremes, countries permitted abortion on various 'indications' (therapeutic, eugenic, juridical (rape), and socio-economic), subject to different procedures and requirements. From 1967 to 1977, at least 42 jurisdictions changed their abortion laws, with the vast majority expanding the legal indications for abortion. It was during this same period that courts in the United States, Canada, and Europe began to review laws regulating abortion for conformity with their constitutions.

Comparativists who have addressed the constitutionalization of the abortion debate as an historically specific development have tended to equate constitutionalization with adjudication or judicialization. Some commentary in this vein views judicialization of abortion as accelerating polarization or backlash. But at least one constitutional comparativist has located the dynamics of polarization and constitutionalization of the abortion debate in politics—an approach that my own work on the history of abortion conflict in the United States (p. 1061) inclines me to adopt. Although the matter plainly deserves further investigation, the record suggests that shifts in the form of political debate about abortion prompted and shaped subsequent constitutional litigation over the practice.

In the 1960s, abortion was not generally understood as presenting constitutional questions. Arguments for liberalizing access to abortion were couched in practical and policy-based terms. In Western Europe and North America, where abortion was criminally banned but available when authorized by doctors for particular indications, poor women often relied on illegal and unsafe providers; critics argued that criminalization imposed health harms on women that were unequally distributed by class. A different kind of public health concern arose in the 1960s as pregnant women who sought to become mothers discovered that they had been exposed to drugs or illness known to cause developmental harms to the unborn (eg thalidomide, measles). Doctors endeavoring to care for their women patients worried about erratically enforced criminal abortion laws, and sought freedom in which to practice their profession. In some jurisdictions, advocates for liberalization raised concerns about overpopulation—a concern that could take eugenic or environmental forms.

These arguments for liberalizing abortion laws on public health, professional, and populationist grounds were not initially expressed or understood in constitutional terms. But youth movements challenging traditional sexual mores and a newly mobilizing women's movement advanced very different kinds of arguments for liberalizing access to abortion.

By 1971, feminists on both sides of the Atlantic were calling for complete repeal of laws criminalizing abortion. They used ‘speak-out’ strategies to publicize their claims, conducting ‘self-incrimination’ campaigns in which women ‘outed’ themselves as having had abortions, and so exposed themselves to criminal prosecution—asserting, through these acts of civil disobedience, a claim to dignity, in defiance of custom and criminal law. In France, 343 women drew international attention by declaring that they had had abortions in a public manifesto that appeared in Le Nouvel Observateur in April 1971. The text of the manifesto, written by Simone de Beauvoir and signed by many prominent French women, called for an end to secrecy and silence and demanded access to free birth control and to abortion services. Two months after the release of the French manifesto, Aktion 218, a women's organization in West Germany named after the Penal Code Section criminalizing abortion, followed the French example, publishing abortion stories and the names of 374 German women in Der Stern in a statement asserting that the law criminalizing abortion subjected women to ‘degrading and life-threatening circumstances’, coerced women, and ‘branded them as criminals’. Within months, women in Italy undertook their own self-incrimination campaign, releasing on August 4, 1971 a statement that women signed, acknowledging that they had had an abortion, and calling for abolition of the crime, on the ground that abortion should be ‘available for each class’ and that motherhood should be a ‘free, conscious choice’. Women in the United States also joined in, with a petition, on the model of the French campaign, published in the spring 1972 edition of Ms Magazine.

Feminists changed the shape of the debate about abortion. Public health advocates and others who sought to liberalize access to abortion in the 1960s argued for incremental reform on the indications model, which they defended by appeal to shared values (health, class equity). By contrast, feminists sought categorical change—repeal of laws criminalizing abortion—which they justified on symbolic as well as practical grounds.

Feminists protested the criminalization of abortion as a symptom of a social order that devalued and disempowered women, and asserted that repeal of laws criminalizing abortion was a necessary first step in women's emancipation. In 1969, Betty Friedan, president of the National Organization for Women, mobilized these arguments in a call for the repeal of laws criminalizing abortion:

> Women are denigrated in this country, because women are not deciding the conditions of their own society and their own lives. Women are not taken seriously as people. Women are not seen seriously as people. So this is the new name of the game on the question of abortion: that women's voices are heard.

> … [W]omen are the ones who therefore must decide, and what we are in the process of doing, it seems to me, is realizing that there are certain rights that have never been defined as rights, that are essential to equality for women, and they were not defined in the Constitution of this, or any country, when that Constitution was written only by men. The right of woman to control her reproductive process must be established as a basic and valuable human civil right not to be denied or abridged by the state.

Friedan insisted:

> there is no freedom, no equality, no full human dignity and personhood possible for women until we assert and demand the control over our own bodies, over our own reproductive process. … The real sexual revolution is the emergence of women from passivity, from thing-ness, to full self-determination, to full dignity …

(p. 1063) Long shrouded in silence, the practice of abortion was now the object of political struggle, and increasingly a site of fundamental rights claims premised on the understanding that the regulation of abortion defined the standing of citizens and the nature and values of the polity. French feminists challenging the criminalization of abortion appealed to the ideals and traditions of the French revolutionary founding. A leaflet spread in Vienna, Austria announced: ‘The fight against the law prohibiting abortions is part of the fight for the women’s right of self-determination, for their equal rights, in the law, in the public, at the places of work and within the families!’

Growing calls for liberalization of abortion law provoked countermobilization in defense of the status quo. Opponents of abortion reform, often led by lay and clerical leaders of the Catholic Church who mobilized before feminists even entered the debate, tended also to employ a categorical and symbolic style of politics. In the United States, for example, the Catholic Church created a national organization in 1967 designed to block any relaxation of criminal restrictions on abortion; that same year, Church leaders mobilized parishioners against passage of an indications law in New York by invoking a God-given ‘right of innocent human beings to life’ and equating incremental reform of the law criminalizing abortion with murder and genocide.\textsuperscript{32}

In West Germany, conservative Catholic opponents of abortion reform invoked Nazism.\textsuperscript{33} As in the United States, conservative Catholics argued that incremental reform of abortion law would put in jeopardy the moral fabric of the nation. In 1970, the Central Committee of German Catholics, an association of Catholic lay persons, objected that ‘the respect of human life is not subject to compromise’, and warned that ‘A state that denies to becoming life the protection of law puts life in general in danger. It thereby puts its own inner legitimacy at stake ...’\textsuperscript{34} Catholic opponents of decriminalization, like feminist proponents, tied abortion to fundamental questions of human dignity.\textsuperscript{35} The Central Committee of German Catholics argued that decriminalizing abortion would violate West German constitutional guarantees of dignity: ‘If becoming life is not protected, including with the means of the criminal law, unconditional fundamental principles of a society founded on human dignity are not assured for long.’\textsuperscript{36} As the West German Parliament considered liberalizing access, the conference of German Catholic Bishops called for a suit challenging the constitutionality of the abortion reform legislation if enacted,\textsuperscript{37} and Robert Spaemann, a Catholic philosopher and public intellectual, observed in 1974 that the proposed abortion liberalization ‘would, in the eyes of many (p. 1064) citizens of our country, violate the legitimacy of the State at its very foundations for the first time since 1949. ... With the periodic model our State would, to them, cease to be a Rechtsstaat.’\textsuperscript{38}

During the 1970s, these national and transnational debates led to the enactment of legislation in a number of countries that liberalized access to abortion, either on the indications model (doctors given authority to perform abortion upon verification of conditions satisfying a therapeutic, juridical, or social indication) or periodic model (women allowed to obtain abortion during a specified period, often in the first 10 to 12 weeks of pregnancy). But conflict over the new laws spilled out of the legislative arena, and those frustrated in politics increasingly brought their claims to court,\textsuperscript{39} where conflict was readily intelligible as a constitutional conflict because it had already been expressed as an argument about justice and the fundamental character of the polity.

In the 1970s, courts in the United States, France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Austria, and Italy reviewed for the first time the constitutionality of abortion laws.\textsuperscript{40} As Machteid Nijsten has observed, ‘The European courts had no discretionary power in deciding the issue: In Germany, France and Austria, the courts were seized under the power of abstract review, and as such they served as a political instrument for the defeated opposition in Parliament.’\textsuperscript{41} In the United States and Italy courts struck down laws criminalizing abortion, in France and Austria courts upheld laws liberalizing access to abortion, while in the Federal Republic of Germany, the Federal Constitutional Court declared unconstitutional legislation allowing abortion in the early weeks of pregnancy.

II. Foundational Frameworks and their Evolution: United States and Germany

Much attention has been devoted to the 1970s decisions of the US and West German courts because there is such a dramatic difference in their normative frameworks: the US case struck down legislation criminalizing abortion in order to protect decisional autonomy, while the West German case struck down legislation legalizing access to abortion in order to protect (p. 1065) unborn life.\textsuperscript{42} Each judgment provided a framework to ensure that future abortion legislation would respect constitutional values. Decisions in the 1990s reaffirmed these constitutional frameworks, in the course of moderating them.

Commentators have attributed the difference in constitutional concern animating the 1970s judgments to differences in constitutional or political culture.\textsuperscript{43} For example, Gerald Neuman contrasts the US and German legal systems in their willingness to recognize a constitutional duty of protection and to impose affirmative obligations on the state.\textsuperscript{44} Donald Kommers points to differences in political culture, asserting that US constitutional law expresses a vision of personhood [that] is partial to the city perceived as private realm in which the individual is alone, isolated, and in competition with his fellows, while the [German] vision is partial to the city perceived as a public realm where individual and community are bound together in reciprocity.

\begin{quote}
\end{quote}

Given these differences in political culture, Kommers reasons, the ‘authority of the community, as represented by the state, to define the liberty interest of mothers and unborn life finds a more congenial abode in the German than in American constitutional law.’\textsuperscript{45}
Practices of comparison may exaggerate intergroup differences and occlude intragroup conflicts. Differences in political culture could well have made the West German judgment more acceptable in West Germany than it would have been in the United States; but polls showed widespread disagreement with the West German Court's decision to strike down the new abortion legislation. Comparative constitutional inquiry can consider how judicial decisions respond to political conflict, and not simply to political culture. In the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany, courts issued constitutional judgments on abortion after protracted debate over whether to liberalize access to abortion—a debate joined in the years immediately preceding the judgments by a mobilizing feminist movement calling for repeal of the criminal law. Close comparative analysis of how this conflict shaped the judgments, and how the judgments aspired to shape this conflict is beyond the scope of this chapter. But a few observations about the relation of the judgments and the conflict suggest that further comparative inquiry of this kind would be fruitful.

In what follows, I show that in the first round of decisions constitutionalizing abortion, each court responded to feminist claims. And the response of each court changed over time. By the 1990s, the autonomy claims of women came to play a more significant role in the abortion cases of each nation. The inquiry illustrates how constitutional judgments about the agency of women citizens are nested within constitutional protections for life, and how these judgments evolved in the late twentieth century.

1. The 1970s

In 1973, the US Supreme Court struck down a nineteenth-century criminal law that banned abortion except to save a woman's life, as well as a twentieth-century law that permitted abortion on the basis of more expansive indications. Roe v Wade held that the constitutional right to privacy (a liberty right protected by the Fourteenth Amendment) encompassed a woman's decision in consultation with her physician whether to terminate a pregnancy. At the same time, the Court recognized that the privacy right 'is not absolute ... at some point the state interests as to protection of health, medical standards, and prenatal life, become dominant.' To coordinate the right and its regulation, the Court set forth a 'trimester framework' that allowed increasing regulation of women's abortion decision over the course of a pregnancy, permitting restrictions on abortion to protect unborn life only at the point of viability (when a fetus is deemed capable of surviving outside a woman's womb).

Roe responded both to public health and feminist claims. The decision offered an account, unprecedented in constitutional law, of the physical and emotional harms to women that criminal abortion laws inflict, and declared that the law's imposition of these harms on women a matter of constitutional concern: 'The detriment that the State would impose upon the pregnant woman by denying this choice altogether is apparent.' The Court declared these harms constitutionally significant after years of public health reporting and feminist testimony, on the street and in court, about the ways that criminalization of abortion harms women.

Even so, the Court's opinion in Roe seems mainly responsive to public health arguments, and at best only indirectly responsive to feminist claims. While the appellant's brief in Roe argued that the Texas law banning abortion 'severely impinges [a woman's] dignity, her life plan and often her marital relationship', the Roe decision focused much more clearly on the doctor's autonomy than on his patients', repeating statements of this kind:

> The decision vindicates the right of the physician to administer medical treatment according to his professional judgment up to the points where important state interests provide compelling justifications for intervention. Up to those points, the abortion decision in all its aspects is inherently, and primarily, a medical decision, and basic responsibility for it must rest with the physician.

As importantly, the Court's account of the harms to women that criminal abortion laws inflict on the physical and psychological difficulties of pregnancy that 'a woman and her responsible physician necessarily will consider in consultation'. The Court's account of harms did not speak in the register of citizenship or status about the injury to a woman's dignity in being coerced by government to bear a child and to become a mother. The opinion's discussion of the state's interest in restricting abortion to protect potential life makes no mention of these concerns.

By contrast, the 1975 decision of the German Federal Constitutional Court was much more explicit in its engagement with feminist claims. The West German Court held that a 1974 law, which decriminalized abortion... during the first 12 weeks of pregnancy for women provided abortion-dissuasive counseling, violated the Basic Law: ‘The life which is developing in the womb of the mother is an independent legal value which enjoys the protection of the Constitution.’ The Court reasoned that the duty of the state to protect unborn life was derived from the Basic Law’s protection for life and for dignity: ‘Where human life exists, human dignity is present to it.’

The Federal Constitutional Court warned the legislature not to ‘acquiesce’ in popular beliefs about abortion that might have developed in response to ‘passionate discussion of the abortion problematic’. The Court expressly and rather brusquely dismissed the Parliament’s efforts to devise a framework that respected the dignity of women and of the unborn:

The opinion expressed in the Federal Parliament during the third deliberation on the Statute to Reform the Penal Law, the effect of which is to propose the precedence for a particular time ‘of the right to self-determination of the woman which flows from human dignity vis-à-vis all others, including the child’s right to life’ ... is not reconcilable with the value ordering of the Basic Law.

Given the overriding importance of the dignity of human life, the Court concluded, ‘the legal order may not make the woman’s right to self-determination the sole guideline of its rule-making. The state must proceed, as a matter of principle, from a duty to carry the pregnancy to term.

Thus, the Federal Constitutional Court engaged with feminist dignity and autonomy arguments for decriminalizing abortion by striking down legislation enacted in response to them as unconstitutional in principle, and, further, by recognizing a constitutional duty to protect life that requires law to enforce the maternal role and responsibilities of women.

Judgments about the maternal role and responsibilities of women are nested throughout the opinion’s account of the constitutional duty to protect life. The duty to protect life was ‘entrusted by nature in the first place to the protection of the mother. To reawaken and, if required to strengthen the maternal duty to protect, where it is lost, should be the principal goal of the endeavors of the state by the protection of life’; the duty to protect life obliged government to ‘strengthen the readiness of the expectant mother to accept the pregnancy as her own responsibility’. Having established that government had a duty to protect life enforceable against pregnant women, the Court distinguished between the ‘normal’ burdens of motherhood, which the duty to protect life obliged government to exact by law, and extraordinary burdens of motherhood, such as those posing a threat to a woman’s life or health, which are non-exactable by law. The Court reasoned that when a pregnant woman faced difficulties other than the ‘normal’ burdens of motherhood, her ‘decision for an interruption of pregnancy can attain the rank of a decision of conscience worthy of consideration’, and in these circumstances it would be inappropriate to use criminal law or ‘external compulsion where respect for the sphere of personality of the human being demands fuller inner freedom of decision’. By contrast, women who ‘decline pregnancy because they are not willing to take on the renunciation and the natural motherly duties bound up with it’ may decide ‘upon an interruption of pregnancy without having a reason which is worthy of esteem within the value order of the constitution.’ The Court recognized a woman’s concern about continuing a pregnancy that posed a threat to her life or grave risk to her health as respect-worthy, hence warranting an exemption from legal compulsion. The Court authorized the legislature to permit abortion on the basis of other analogously non-exactable indications.

Even in these cases the state may not be content merely to examine, and if the occasion arises, to certify that the statutory prerequisites for an abortion free of punishment are present. Rather, the state will also be expected to offer counseling and assistance with the goal of reminding pregnant women of the fundamental duty to respect the right to life of the unborn, to encourage her to continue the pregnancy. ...

2. The 1990s

In the 1990s, acting under different forms of political pressure, the US and German courts each revisited their judgments of the 1970s, reaffirming and modifying them. Each court continued to reason from its original premises, yet did so in ways that gave far greater recognition to women’s autonomy in making decisions about motherhood.
The Constitutionalization of Abortion

The Supreme Court's 1992 decision in Planned Parenthood ofSoutheastern Pennsylvania v. Casey\(^71\) analyzed the constitutionality of a Pennsylvania statute that imposed a 24-hour waiting period before abortions could be performed, required a woman seeking an abortion to receive certain information designed to persuade her to choose childbirth over abortion, required a minor to obtain parental consent, and required a woman seeking an abortion to provide notice to her spouse.\(^72\) The Court reaffirmed what it termed the central principle of Roe: ‘the woman's right to terminate her pregnancy before viability’.\(^73\) But the Casey Court rejected Roe's trimester framework and announced that it would allow government regulation for the purpose of protecting potential life throughout the term of a pregnancy, as long as the \((p. 1069)\) law did not impose an ‘undue burden’ on the pregnant woman's decision whether to bear a child. To determine whether regulation imposed an undue burden the Court announced it would ask whether the statute has ‘the purpose or effect of placing a substantial obstacle in the path of a woman seeking an abortion of a nonviable fetus’.\(^74\)

Even as the Court revised the Roe trimester framework to allow restrictions on abortion throughout pregnancy, it restated the constitutional basis of the abortion right in terms that gave far more recognition to women's decisional autonomy. Casey’s ‘undue burden’ framework allowed government to deter abortion, but only by means that inform, rather than block, a woman's choice about whether to end a pregnancy: ‘What is at stake is the woman's right to make the ultimate decision’.\(^75\)

At the same time, Casey emphasized, in ways Roe did not, that constitutional protections for decisions about abortion vindicate women's dignity, their liberty, and their equality as citizens.\(^76\) The portion of the plurality opinion attributed to Justice Kennedy invoked dignity to explain why the Constitution protects decisions regarding family life: ‘These matters, involving the most intimate and personal choices a person may make in a lifetime, choices central to personal dignity and autonomy, are central to the liberty protected by the Fourteenth Amendment.’\(^77\) Protecting women's authority to make their own decisions about motherhood simultaneously vindicates constitutional values of equality as well as liberty. Reaffirming the abortion right, Casey locates its constitutional basis in evolving views of women's citizenship that give to women, rather than the state, primary authority in making decisions about their roles:

> Her suffering is too intimate and personal for the State to insist, without more, upon its own vision of the woman's role, however dominant that vision has been in the course of our history and our culture. The destiny of the woman must be shaped to a large extent on her own conception of her spiritual imperatives and her place in society.\(^78\)

In Casey, the Court applied the undue burden standard and upheld all of Pennsylvania's regulations, except for the provision requiring a woman to inform her spouse before she could end a pregnancy—which the Court characterized as inconsistent with modern understandings of women as equal citizens.\(^79\)

In striking down the spousal notice provision, the Court again invoked liberty and equality values, explaining how women's standing as citizens had evolved with changing understandings of women's roles: \((p. 1070)\)

> Only one generation has passed since this Court observed that 'woman is still regarded as the center of home and family life', with attendant 'special responsibilities' that precluded full and independent legal status under the Constitution. These views, of course, are no longer consistent with our understanding of the family, the individual, or the Constitution. ... A State may not give to a man the kind of dominion over his wife that parents exercise over their children.\(^80\)

Casey protected women's dignity in making the very decisions about motherhood that the Federal Constitutional Court held were governed by natural duty—as, for example when the German Court reasoned that women who ‘decline pregnancy because they are not willing to take on the renunciation and the natural motherly duties bound up with it’ may decide ‘upon an interruption of pregnancy without having a reason which is worthy of esteem within the value order of the constitution.’\(^81\)

In 1990s, the Federal Constitutional Court would reaffirm this understanding, but in a framework that indirectly afforded far greater recognition to women's autonomy in making decisions about motherhood. The reunification of Germany required reconciling the law of East Germany, which allowed women to make their own decisions about abortion in early pregnancy with the law of West Germany, which did not.\(^82\) The German Parliament enacted legislation that allowed women to make their own decisions about abortion in the first 12 weeks of pregnancy after participating in a counseling process designed to persuade them to carry the pregnancy to term—a form of regulation presented as more effective in deterring abortion than a criminal ban and respecting both ‘the high value of unborn life and the self-determination of the woman’. The Federal Constitutional Court invalidated the legislation, but shifted ground as it did so.

The Court reaffirmed that protection for the unborn vis-à-vis its mother is only possible if the legislature forbids a woman to terminate her pregnancy. The legislature was obliged to use the criminal law to demarcate obligations exactable of the woman, in order clearly to communicate the scope of the duty to protect—an obligation bearing not only on the pregnant woman herself, but also on others in a position to support her in carrying the pregnancy to term. But the legislature was not obliged to protect unborn life through the threat of criminal sanction itself. The legislature could devise a scheme of counseling to persuade pregnant women to carry to term, and as long as the counseling was effective to that end, could even decide to dispense with the threat of criminal punishment ‘in view of the openness necessary for counseling to be effective’. The legislature could base its protection concept on the assumption—at least in the early phase of pregnancy—that effective protection of unborn human life is only possible with the support of the mother. ... The secrecy pertaining to the unborn, its helplessness and dependence and its unique link to its mother would appear to justify the view that the state’s chances of protecting it are better if it works together with the mother.

The Court presented this new account of the state’s duty of protection as in ‘conformity with the respect owed to a woman and future mother’, observing that the counseling concept endeavors to exact what the pregnant woman owes ‘without degrading her to a mere object of protection’ and ‘respects her as an autonomous person by trying to win her over as an ally in the protection of the unborn’. While the Court presented the decision as requiring legislative adherence to its 1975 judgment, the Court’s willingness to accept the substitution of counseling for threat of criminal prosecution augured a new view of the citizen-subject that abortion regulation addresses, and a transformed understanding of the constitutional duty to protect unborn life. In this emergent view, women citizens are persons who exercise autonomy even as to the ways they inhabit family roles; that exercise of autonomy is sufficiently respect-worthy that women would be degraded were abortion law to treat them as a mere object or instrument for protecting unborn life.

In the wake of the 1993 decision, abortion remains criminally prohibited except under restricted indications, but a woman who completes counseling can receive a certificate granting her immunity from prosecution for an abortion during the first 12 weeks of pregnancy. In this new framework, Catholic lay groups are involved in counseling, and where necessary, issuing abortion certificates and providing the sex education required by law, although this has been the subject of much and extended controversy.

III. Contemporary Constitutional Frameworks

As we have seen, courts in the United States and Germany imposed different frameworks on the regulation of abortion designed to vindicate competing constitutional values; but within two decades, courts in each nation had reaffirmed and modified those frameworks to give greater recognition to women’s agency in the abortion decision, while simultaneously emphasizing the importance of protecting unborn life. The 1990s cases reject the view that constitutionalization of abortion is a ‘zero-sum game’, and present frameworks that vindicate competing constitutional values, endeavoring to mediate conflicts among them.

Today, we can see constitutionalization of abortion taking several forms. Some jurisdictions require government to respect women’s dignity in making decisions about abortion, and consequently require legislators to provide women control, for all or some period of pregnancy, over the decision whether to become a mother. Many jurisdictions require constitutional protection for unborn life, criminalizing abortion while permitting exceptions on an indications basis to protect women’s physical or emotional welfare, but not their autonomy. Yet other jurisdictions protect unborn life through counseling regimes that are result-open; these jurisdictions begin by recognizing women’s autonomy for the putatively instrumental reason that it is the best method of managing the modern female citizen, and then come to embrace protecting women’s dignity as a concurrent constitutional aim of depenalizing abortion.

In what follows, I explore these three forms of constitutionalization, in order of their historical emergence, and briefly illustrate with contemporary examples. The forms are distinguishable along several dimensions. As will become apparent, the frameworks of review that jurisdictions have adopted vary in the constitutional values that courts expect abortion legislation to vindicate (eg respecting women's dignity, protecting unborn life, protecting women's welfare), and the legislative regimes associated historically and symbolically with the vindication of these constitutional values (eg 'periodic' regimes which allow abortion at a woman's request for a period of pregnancy; ‘indications’ regimes which prohibit abortion except on indications determined by a third party; and 'result-open' dissuasive counseling regimes which allow a woman to make the ultimate decision after she is counseled against abortion). Historical and symbolic ties between constitutional values and particular legislative abortion regimes have endowed those regimes with powerful social meaning, even as enforcement of abortion legislation may provide women access in striking variance. Finally, there is variance within these forms in the judicial constraints courts impose on representative government (do courts allow, require, or prohibit legislation vindicating particular constitutional values?). In some cases, these differences in judicial constraint seem connected to the values the case law vindicates; but in others they suggest an interesting story about the interaction of courts and representative government in the articulation of constitutional law.

There are other expressions of this evolving relationship between courts and legislatures. Over the decades, constitutions have been amended to address abortion more or less directly, and statutes have been enacted that include constitutionalized preambles, either in response to antecedent constitutional law or in an effort to call into being new bodies of constitutional law. With the growth of legislative constitutionalism in abortion regulation, the boundaries between constitutional law and politics grow ever blurrier.

1. Respecting Women's Dignity: Periodic Legislation

This approach, originating in the United States, constitutionalizes the regulation of abortion with attention to women's autonomy and welfare. It is associated with periodic legislation which coordinates values of decisional autonomy and protecting life by giving women control over the abortion decision, often for an initial period of the pregnancy, thereafter allowing restrictions on abortion except on limited indications (eg for life or health).

This approach begins in court decisions but now also finds expression in constitutionalized preambles. In South Africa, for example, the preamble to a statute allowing abortion on request in the first 12 weeks of pregnancy announces that it vindicates “the values of human dignity, the achievement of equality, security of the person, non-racialism and non-sexism, and the advancement of human rights and freedoms which underlie a democratic South Africa.” The High Court upheld the legislation's constitutionality in a 2004 decision: ‘the Constitution not only permits the Choice on Termination of Pregnancy Act to make a pregnant woman's informed consent the cornerstone of its regulation of the termination of her pregnancy, but indeed requires the Choice Act to do so.'

Legislation recently enacted in Mexico City providing for abortion on request during the first 12 weeks of pregnancy appears to a constitutional provision that guarantees Mexican citizens the freedom to decide the number and spacing of children; the preamble to the Mexico City statute provides: “Sexual and reproductive health care is a priority. Services provided in this matter constitute a means for the exercise of the right of all persons to decide freely, responsibly and in an informed manner on the number and spacing of children.” The Supreme Court of Mexico recently confirmed the constitutionality of the legislation. The state was constitutionally permitted to decriminalize abortion.

2. Protecting Life/Protecting Women: Indications Legislation

Other jurisdictions follow the German tradition in constitutionalizing a duty to protect life; these jurisdictions require action in furtherance of the duty to protect, and typically require or authorize legislatures to criminalize abortion with certain exceptions or indications determined by a committee of doctors or some decision-maker other than the pregnant woman. As we have seen, constitutional judgments about women are inevitably nested within the constitutional duty to protect life, and emerge in any effort to specify the terms on which abortion is to be banned (and thus also permitted). Constitutionalization in this form has tended to incorporate gender-conventional, role-based views of women's citizenship—for example that the burdens of pregnancy are naturally assumed by women, or by women who have consented to sex, except when such burdens exceed what is normally to be expected of women, at which point women may be exempt from penal sanction for aborting a pregnancy.
Constitutionalization in this form is paternalist, in its conception of women as well as the unborn, reasoning about women as dependants who may deserve protection, and protecting them against injuries to their physical and emotional welfare, rather than to their autonomy. (Jurisdictions that protect unborn life by banning abortion except on third party indication typically excuse women from the duty to bear a child to protect women's physical survival and to protect women's physical and emotional welfare; only recently have some considered protecting women's dignity.) Courts' reasoning in this tradition typically permit, but do not require, abortion legislation to protect the welfare and autonomy of women citizens who are pregnant; courts may, however, hold that a constitution requires the state to allow abortion to save a woman's life.

The Republic of Ireland, which first amended its Constitution to address abortion, expressly relates the protections it accords the life of the unborn and the life of the mother: 'The State acknowledges the right to life of the unborn and, with due regard to the equal right to life of the mother, guarantees in its laws to respect, and, as far as practicable, by its laws to defend and vindicate that right.' Ireland seems to construe a woman's 'equal right to life' as including protection for a woman's physical survival but not her dignity. When an adolescent woman who was pregnant by rape was enjoined from traveling abroad for an abortion, the Irish Supreme Court overturned the injunction, reasoning that the young woman's risk of suicide satisfied the standard of a 'real and substantial risk' to the pregnant woman's life. In other words, in order to fit the case within the right to life that Ireland guarantees equally to women and the unborn, the Court had to efface the young woman's agency—her refusal to have sex with her rapist and the consequent risk she might harm herself if compelled to bear her rapist's child; instead the Court approached the young woman's case as if it concerned a physiological risk from pregnancy. The Court explained that its Constitution's abortion clause should be interpreted in terms informed by the virtue of charity: 'not the charity which consists of giving to the deserving, for that is justice, but the charity which is also called mercy.'

In 1985 the Spanish Constitutional Court declared that its Constitution protected the life of the unborn, in the tradition of the first West German judgment, yet declared that it was constitutional for the legislature to allow abortion on several indications, including rape. In discussing the justification for the indication for rape, the Spanish Court emphasized that in such a case 'gestation was caused by an act ... harming to a maximum degree her [a woman's] personal dignity and the free development of her personality', emphasizing that 'the woman's dignity requires that she cannot be considered as a mere instrument'. Even so, the Court reasoned that the exceptions to Spain's abortion law were constitutionally permitted, not required, and emphasized that the legislation was enacted for the purpose of protecting unborn life.

A more recent decision of the Colombian Supreme Court interpreting a constitution understood to protect unborn life offers a striking contrast. The Colombian Court held that a statute banning abortion was constitutionally required to contain exceptions for certain indications in light of 'the constitutional importance of the bearer of the rights ... the pregnant woman'. '[W]hen the legislature enacts criminal laws, it cannot ignore that a woman is a human being entitled to dignity and that she must be treated as such, as opposed to being treated as a reproductive instrument for the human race.' A criminal law that prohibits abortion in all circumstances extinguishes the woman's fundamental rights, and thereby violates her dignity by reducing her to a mere receptacle for the fetus, without rights or interests of constitutional relevance worthy of protection.

Thus, the Colombian Court held that the legislature was constitutionally obliged, and not merely permitted, to include indications in its abortion law. The Court explained that failure to allow for abortion in cases of rape would be in 'complete disregard for human dignity and the right to the free development of the pregnant woman whose pregnancy is not the result of a free and conscious decision', but the result of arbitrary, criminal acts against her in violation of her autonomy. 'A woman's right to dignity prohibits her treatment as a mere instrument for reproduction, and her consent is therefore essential to the fundamental, life-changing decision to give birth to another person.' By this same reasoning, however, the legislature was allowed to criminalize abortion in cases of consensual sex, as long as the legislature provided exceptions for women's life, health, and cases of fetal anomaly. This approach presumes that, for women, consent to sex is consent to procreation.

3. Protecting Life/Respecting Women: Result-Open Counseling

Yet other jurisdictions begin from a constitutional duty to protect life, and, like Germany, have begun to explore approaches for vindicating the duty to protect life that do not involve the threat of criminal prosecution. These jurisdictions constitutionally justify depenalization of abortion, coupled with abortion-dissuasive, result-open counseling, as more effective in protecting the unborn than the threat of criminal punishment. The justifications for life-protective counseling, as well as its form, are evolving over time, in ways that progressively incorporate values of women's autonomy. At a minimum, these jurisdictions recognize women as the type of modern citizens who possess autonomy of a kind that law must take into consideration if it hopes to affect their conduct; some go further and are beginning to embrace protecting women's dignity as a concurrent constitutional aim.\textsuperscript{109}

Constitutional review of counseling regimes originates in the German cases. In 1975, the German Court endorsed abortion-dissuasive counseling as a mode of protecting life in cases where the legislature deemed abortion non-exactable;\textsuperscript{110} in 1993, the German Court expanded that approach, reasoning that a legislature might find counseling coupled with depenalization of abortion generally more effective than the threat of criminal punishment in meeting its duty to protect life, observing that depenalization was also consistent with women's autonomy.\textsuperscript{111}

The Hungarian Court has amplified the woman-respecting aspects of this approach. In 1998, the Hungarian Court held that it was unconstitutional for the state to make verification of a 'situation of serious crisis' indication depend solely on woman's signature: 'Such provisions themselves cannot secure for the foetus the level of minimum protection required by the [Constitution] ... and in fact, they do not secure any protection, as the regulation is concerned with the mother's right to self-determination, only.'\textsuperscript{112} The Court explicitly rejected this legislative scheme as a concealed version of periodic regulation,\textsuperscript{113} while holding that the state could remedy the legislation through directed counseling measures or third party verification. The Court then discussed abortion-dissuasive counseling as a method of protecting unborn life that was also respectful of women's rights. 'In principle, such a consulting service would not … violate her freedom of conscience.'\textsuperscript{114} While 'The state may not compel anyone to accept a situation which sows discord within, or is irreconcilable with the fundamental convictions which mould that person's identity' obligatory participation in counseling violates neither principle 'having particular regard to the fact that she [the pregnant woman] is only obligated (p. 1076) to participate without any [further] obligation ... [A]s far as its outcome is concerned, the consultation—while clearly focusing on the protection of the fetus—must be open.'\textsuperscript{115}

Portugal has taken further steps in this direction.\textsuperscript{116} In upholding legislation that allowed abortion during the first ten weeks of pregnancy after a waiting period and result-open counseling, the Portuguese Constitutional Court emphasized that the new law was an effective means of protecting life. However, a counseling regime the Court upheld was not expressly dissuasive.\textsuperscript{117} Strikingly, the recent Portuguese decision employed the reasoning of the 1993 German decision to dispense with the need for expressly dissuasive counseling of the kind mandated by the 1993 German decision. As it did so, the Portuguese decision invoked women's dignity as a justification for result-open counseling.\textsuperscript{118} The Portuguese case thus features emergent elements of women's rights, both as to justification and as to legislative form. But the constitutional framework yet remains at some distance from the women's dignity-periodic access cases of jurisdictions such as the United States and South Africa. The Portuguese Court ruled that a result-open counseling framework in the early period of pregnancy is constitutionally permitted, not required, as it would be in a traditional woman's rights framework.

The abortion legislation Spain enacted in 2010 presses result-open counseling in ways that even more robustly associate it with protecting women's rights. The legislation allows abortion on request in the first 14 weeks, subject to counseling. Its preamble reasons in constitutional (p. 1077) ized terms about the values the legislation is designed to vindicate, including both 'the rights and interests of women and prenatal life'. The preamble asserts that 'protecting prenatal life is more effective through active policies to support pregnant women and maternity', and therefore that 'protection of the legal right at the very beginning of pregnancy is articulated through the will of the woman, and not against it', and directing public officials to 'establish the conditions for adopting a free and responsible decision'.\textsuperscript{119}

In the decades since the German Court's 1993 decision, this hybrid framework has spread, legitimating result-open counseling early in pregnancy as a method of protecting unborn life,\textsuperscript{120} while increasingly acknowledging, accommodating, and sometimes even explicitly respecting women's autonomy in making decisions about motherhood.\textsuperscript{121} Whether or not the fetal-protective justification for results-open counseling is accompanied by a women's dignity-respecting justification, women are accorded the final word in decisions about whether they become mothers. Drawing elements from two disparate forms of constitutionalization, this hybrid form has transformative potential: one day it might combine community obligation to support those who nurture life with... community obligation to respect their judgments. Realization of this potential depends on both expressive and practical aspects of implementation.

The emergence in the last two decades of fetal-protective justifications for providing women control over decisions concerning abortion is especially striking in light of the concurrent spread of woman-protective justifications for denying women access to abortion (eg banning or restricting abortion for the asserted purpose of protecting women from harm or coercion). In both cases, a particular legislative regime is justified by appeal to constitutional values historically associated with an opposing form of abortion regulation: legislation that allows abortion is associated with the constitutional protection of unborn life, and legislation that restricts abortion is associated with the constitutional protection of women. Rhetorical inversions of this kind may be produced through social movement struggle, or they may emerge as movements employ the discourse of a reigning constitutional order in order to challenge it.

After decades of conflict, a constitutional framework is emerging in Europe that allows legislators to vindicate the duty to protect unborn life by providing women dissuasive counseling and the ability to make their own decisions about abortion. Constitutionalization in this form values women as mothers first, yet addresses women as the kind of citizens who are autonomous in making decisions about motherhood, and may even warrant respect as such. The spread of constitutionalization in this form attests to passionate conflict over abortion and women's family roles; it also suggests increasing acceptance of claims the women's movement has advanced in the last 40 years, however controverted they remain. Jurisdictions that permit result-open counseling in satisfaction of the duty to protect unborn life express evolving understandings of women as citizens, in terms that reflect community ambivalence and assuage community division, while continuing to engender change.

Bibliography

Linda Greenhouse and Reva B. Siegel (eds), Before Roe v Wade: Voices that Shaped the Abortion Debate Before the Supreme Court's Ruling (2010)

Kim Lane Scheppele, ‘Constitutionalizing Abortion’ in Marianne Githens and Dorothy McBride Stetson (eds), Abortion Politics: Public Policy in Cross-Cultural Perspective (1996)

Notes:

(*) For comments on the manuscript, I am grateful to Rebecca Cook, Tom Ginsburg, Vicki Jackson, Julieta LeMaitre, Miguel Maduro, Susanna Mancini, Robert Post, Judith Resnik, Ruth Rubio-Marin, and Hunter Smith. I was fortunate to explore the cases in this chapter with the research assistance of Joanna Erdman and in conversation with her. I look forward to continuing to learn together. Thanks also to Alyssa King, Jena McGill, and Danieli Evans.

(3) One comparative study that begins by investigating the political origins of the first constitutional decisions on abortion is Machtedl Nijsten, Abortion and Constitutional Law: A Comparative European-American Study (1990).

(5) For comparative literature on abortion legislation, see n 1.

(10) Nijsten (n 3).

(12) This theme recurs but it is not clearly developed in the literature, see Glendon (n 1), 45; Schepple (n 11), 29–30; Donald P. Kommers, ‘The Constitutional Law of Abortion in Germany: Should Americans Pay Attention?’ (1994) 10 Contemporary Journal of Health Law and Policy 1, 31 (limiting claim to US judicialization).

(13) Nijsten (n 3), 1, 228, 232.

(14) On the relationship of constitutional politics and constitutional law, see n 4.

(15) See Dagmar Herzog, Sexuality in Europe: A Twentieth-Century History (2011), 156, 159; Greenhouse and Siegel (n 4), 2036.

(17) Nijsten (n 3), 29–33.

(18) Greenhouse and Siegel (n 4), 2038–9; Nijsten (n 3), 33.

(20) ‘La liste des 343 françaises qui ont le courage de signer le manifest “je me suis fait avorter” ‘ [‘The list of 343 French women who have the courage to sign the manifesto “I have had an abortion” ’] Le Nouvel Observateur, April 5, 1971, at 5 (author's translation).

(21) See Herzog (n 15), 156.

(24) Barbaralee D. Diamonstein, ‘We Have Had Abortions’, Ms Magazine, Spring 1972, 34; cf Siegel, ‘Roe's Roots’ (n 19), 1880, 1885. For the language of some of the manifestos, see Siegel, ‘Dignity and Sexuality’ (n 4), ms at 7 (on file with author).

(26) Greenhouse and Siegel (n 25), 39.

(30) Greenhouse and Siegel (n 4), 2048–52 (United States); Anne Egger and Bill Rolston (eds), Abortion in the New Europe: A Comparative Handbook (1994), 33, 40 (Britain and Austria).

(33) Dagmar Herzog, Sex After Fascism: Memory and Morality in Twentieth Century Germany (2005), 225; Lewis Joachim Edinger, West German Politics (1986), 281.

(35) Siegel, ‘Dignity and Sexuality’ (n 4), ms at 9, 16, 19–20; Spieker (n 34), 23.

(36) Spieker (n 34), 22–3.

(37) Edinger (n 33), 282.

(38) Robert Spaemann, Kein Recht Auf Leben?: Argumente zur Grundsatzdiskussion um die Reform des §218 (1974), 10 (author's translation). For a history of Catholic Church opposition to reform in the years leading up to the Court's ruling, see Hermann Tallen, Die Auseinandersetzung über §218 StGB (1977).

(39) Nijsten (n 3), 232.

(41) Nijsten (n 3), 232. See also n 34 and accompanying text.

(43) Commentators do not generally look to constitutional text to explain the divergent approaches of the US and German courts; constitutions do not begin expressly to address abortion until after the decisions of the 1970s. See eg Republic of Ireland, Eighth Amendment of the Constitution Act, 1983, 1983 Acts of the Oireachtas, October 7, 1983 (amending Irish Constitution, Art 40.3.3:

The State acknowledges the right to life of the unborn and, with due regard to the equal right to life of the mother, guarantees in its laws to respect, and, as far as practicable, by its laws to defend and vindicate that right.

(45) Kommers (n 1), 452—3 (describing the United States as a liberal democracy and Germany as a social democracy).
The Constitutionalization of Abortion

(47) See eg Levy and Somek (n 2); Nijsten (n 3); Siegel, ‘Dignity and Sexuality’ (n 4); see also Ferree, Gamson, Gerhards, and Rucht (n 19).

(48) See sources in n 19 (feminist advocates of liberalization); nn 30–38 (opponents of liberalization).

(49) Greenhouse and Siegel (n 25), 256–8.

(50) Ibid 155.

(51) Ibid 164–5.

(52) See Roe (n 6), 153.

(53) See Section I; Siegel (n 19), 1885–94.

(55) Roe (n 6), 153. Siegel (n 19), 1897.

(56) Roe (n 6), 153.

(57) See Siegel (n 19), 1899.

(59) Abortion I (n 7), 605.

(60) Ibid 641 (citing Arts 2(2)(1) and 1(1)(2)).

(61) Ibid 661. See also ibid 662.

(63) Ibid 644.

(64) Ibid 644.

(65) Ibid 647.

(66) Ibid.

(67) Ibid 653.

(68) Ibid 624, 647–8. The Court gave the legislature discretion whether to allow abortion on eugenic, rape, and social emergency indications. Ibid.

(69) Ibid 649.

(70) East Germany allowed abortion during the first 12 weeks of pregnancy as West Germany did not, and so, in the 1990s, the abortion issue became entangled in negotiations over reunification, leading to the enactment of more liberal abortion legislation. See Peter H. Merkl, German Unification in the European Context (1993), 176–80.

In the United States, abortion became entangled in the competition of the national political parties for voters. Even before Roe, leaders of the Republican Party changed position on abortion to attract Catholics who had historically voted with the Democratic Party, as well as Americans opposed to feminist understandings of the family. By the late 1980s, a majority of Republican voters opposed abortion, and the party had reshaped the composition of the Supreme Court in ways that threatened Roe. Greenhouse and Siegel (n 4); Post and Siegel (n 4).

For an account of the changing political context of the 1990s and renewed feminist and Catholic mobilization in Germany and the United States, see Ferree, Gamson, Gerhards, and Rucht (n 19), 39–43.

(72) Ibid 844.

(73) Ibid 871.

(74) Ibid 877.

(75) Ibid 877.

(76) See Siegel, ‘Dignity and the Politics of Protection’ (n 4), 1735–66, 1773–80. For an account tracing these arguments from the 1970s to the US Supreme Court's most recent abortion decision, see Siegel (n 19). See also Siegel, ‘Dignity and Sexuality’ (n 4) (analyzing competing claims about dignity and abortion historically and transnationally). Since Casey, scholars in the United States have increasingly discussed the abortion right as grounded in equality as well as liberty. See Reva B. Siegel, ‘Sex Equality Arguments for Reproductive Rights: Their Critical Basis and Evolving Constitutional Expression’ (2007) 56 Emory Law Journal 815.

(78) Ibid 852 (O'Connor, Kennedy, Souter JJ, Joint Opinion); ibid 856 (O'Connor, Kennedy, Souter JJ, Joint Opinion):

for two decades of economic and social developments, people have organized intimate relationships and made choices that define their views of themselves and their places in society, in reliance on the availability of abortion in the event that contraception should fail. The ability of women to participate equally in the economic and social life of the Nation has been facilitated by their ability to control their reproductive lives.

The opinion ties constitutional protection for women's abortion decision to the understanding, forged in the Court's sex discrimination cases, that government cannot use law to enforce traditional sex roles on women.

(79) Casey (n 71), 893–8.

(80) Ibid 896–8 (citation omitted).

(81) Abortion I (n 7) at 653; see nn 63–8.

(82) See n 70.

(84) Ibid [149].

(85) Ibid [173]–[174]; see also ibid [170]–[172].

(86) Ibid [178].

(87) Ibid [183].

(88) Ibid [185].

(89) Ibid [214].

(90) See German Penal Code (StGB), para 218a; in English available at (http://www.gesetze-im-internet.de/englisch_stgb/englisch_stgb.html#StGB_000P218).

(93) Christian Lawyers Association v Minister of Health [2004] 4 All SA 31 (T), 39. See also ibid 39:

The South African Constitution recognises and protects the right to termination of pregnancy or abortion in two ways, firstly under section 12(2)(a), that is, the right to bodily and psychological integrity which includes the right to make decisions concerning reproduction, and secondly, under section 12(2)(b), that is, the right to control over one's body.

In an earlier judgment, the law was upheld as constitutional against claims of violation of the right to life on the view that legal personhood commences only at live birth. Christian Lawyers Association of South Africa & others v Minister of Health & others 1998 (4) SA 113 (T).

(94) Constitución Política de los Estados Unidos Mexicanos, as amended, Art 4, Diario Oficial de la Federación, February 5, 1917 (Mexico) (Right to Choose Clause) (author's translation).

(95) Mexico, Federal District, Decree Reforming the Federal District Penal Code and Amending the Federal District Health Law, Official Gazette of the Federal District No 70, April 26, 2007 (author's translation) (emphasis added).

(97) On gender, see further Chapter 19.

(98) Republic of Ireland, Eighth Amendment of the Constitution Act, 1983 (n 43) (emphasis added).

(99) Attorney General v X and others [1992] 1 IR 1, para [44].

(102) See eg ibid, Pt 9: ‘We are required to consider whether legislation [sic] is constitutionally permitted to use a different technique [to protect unborn life], by means of which punishability is specifically excluded for certain offences.’ A dissenting judgment objects that the majority employs rights rhetoric without conferring rights ‘despite the rhetorical claims to the contrary, it totally ignores the fundamental rights of physical and moral integrity and that of privacy enshrined in the Constitution, and to which pregnant women are indeed entitled.’ Ibid, dissenting opinion of Senior Judge Francisco Rubio Llorente (no paragraph numbering in the judgment).

(104) Ibid 36.

(105) Ibid 50 (emphasis added).

(106) Ibid 51 (emphasis added).

(107) Ibid 53.

(109) For discussion of counseling and its normative bases as a ‘third model’ in abortion regulation (supplemental to periodic/indication models), see Eser and Koch (n 1); for analysis of the counseling framework attentive to its gendered premises, see Ruth Rubio-Marin, ‘Constitutional Framing: Abortion and Symbolism in Constitutional Law’ (2009 draft). For discussion of counseling in the United States see Siegel, ‘Dignity and the Politics of Protection’ (n 4).

(110) See text accompanying n 69.

(111) See text accompanying nn 83, 89.

(113) Ibid Section III, Pt (3)(c) (p 24).

(114) Ibid Section IV, Pt (2)(a) (p 34).

(115) Ibid Section IV, Pt 2(a) (p 35) (emphasis added).

(116) For rich discussion, see Rubio-Marin (n 109).

The Court observed at 11.4.15:

Our legislature has made clear the goal of the counseling by stating that such counseling is aimed at providing the pregnant woman access to all relevant information necessary to make a free, genuine (‘consciente’), and responsible decision.

The Court further observed that the legislation directed that the pregnant woman would receive information concerning government assistance should she carry the pregnancy to term, and stated at 11.4.15 that:

the body of information to be provided to the pregnant woman in a mandatory counseling process ... has the objective effect of promoting in her the consciousness of the value of the life that she carries in her (or, at least, it will clearly be perceived by her as an attempt to do so) ... The fact that the counseling process is not, expressly and ostensively, orientational does not impose, ipso facto, its qualification as merely informative and deprived of any intention to favor a decision to carry on with the pregnancy.

(118) See ibid 11.4.16:

By abstaining, even at a communicational level, from any indication that might be felt by the woman as an external judgment imposing a particular decision, the legislator acted in line with the underlying reasoning supporting the decision not to punish abortion.

This is based on the belief that only the free adhesion of the woman to carry on with the pregnancy guarantees, at this stage, the protection of the unborn life.

... It is objectively founded for a legislator that has decided, also for reasons of efficiency, to trust in the sense of responsibility of the pregnant woman by calling her to cooperate in the duty of protection that belongs to the State, not to create a context of decision that may run counter that purpose.

The trust in the sense of responsibility of the woman and in her predisposition to be open to the reasons contrary to abortion would not be compatible with a tutelage and paternalistic approach. The protection of the woman's dignity is also affirmed by the way in which the counseling process imposed on her takes place.
(119) Ley Orgánica 2/2010, de 3 de marzo, de salud sexual y reproductiva y de la interrupción voluntaria del embarazo (Spain) (author's translation).

(120) See Eser and Koch (n 1); Gevers (n 2).

(121) See Rubio-Marin (n 109).

(122) See Siegel, ‘Dignity and the Politics of Protection’ (n 4).

(123) See eg Myra Max Ferree, ‘Resonance and Radicalism: Feminist Framing in the Abortion Debates of the United States and Germany’ (2003) 109 American Journal of Sociology 304; Siegel, ‘Dignity and the Politics of Protection’ (n 4). For similar reasons, appeals to dignity now play a significant role on both sides of the abortion debate, transnationally. See Siegel, ‘Dignity and Sexuality’ (n 4).

Reva B. Siegel
Reva B. Siegel is Nicholas deB. Katzenbach Professor of Law, Yale University
Kenji Yoshino and Michael Kavey
The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Constitutional Law
Edited by Michel Rosenfeld and András Sajó

I. Introduction 1079
II. Military Service: Functionalism Ascendant 1080
III. Sodomy Cases: Expressivism Ascendant 1086
IV. Marriage and Relationship Recognition: Functionalism and Expressivism 1089
   1. Functionalism 1092
   2. Expressivism 1094
V. Conclusion 1097

I. Introduction

In a foundational 1999 essay, Professor Mark Tushnet outlined three frameworks through which to consider the contributions of comparative constitutional law: functionalism, expressivism, and bricolage. According to Tushnet, ‘Functionalism claims that particular constitutional provisions create arrangements that serve particular functions in a system of governance.’ Expressivism, in contrast, looks more to the symbolic, rather than to the instrumental, aspects of constitutions: ‘According to the expressivist view, constitutions help constitute the nation, to varying degrees in different nations, offering to each nation’s people a way of understanding themselves as political beings.’ Finally, bricolage, a term borrowed from Claude Lévi-Strauss, takes up constitutional analogs from other nations without much concern about justifying their selection or deployment. Tushnet does not claim that these perspectives are exhaustive. His taxonomy nonetheless provides a useful starting point to consider how comparative constitutionalism might illuminate rights relating to sexual orientation.

Tushnet does not indulge in hyperbole about the contributions of comparative constitutional law. As he acknowledges, his ‘claim is, in the end, rather modest: U.S. courts can sometimes gain insights into the appropriate interpretation of the U.S. Constitution by a cautious and careful analysis of constitutional experience elsewhere.’ We share this assessment. Nevertheless, we contend that the modest contributions of comparative law acquire enhanced force when the claims made by constitutional interpreters are themselves immodest. In the context of sexual orientation, constitutional arguments often assume a categorical, ‘always/everywhere’ tenor that exposes them to contestation on comparative grounds. We develop this claim by focusing on three issues: bans on lesbian, gay, and bisexual (LGB) individuals from military service, the criminalization of same-sex sexual conduct, and relationship recognition for same-sex couples. We follow Tushnet in using US constitutional law as our primary point of departure, solely because we are most familiar with it.

We diverge from Tushnet’s taxonomy in some respects. Tushnet describes functionalism as a means to examine how different constitutional provisions and arrangements serve similar functions in different legal systems. Through this inquiry, he suggests, it may be ‘possible to consider whether the U.S. constitutional system could use a mechanism developed elsewhere to perform a specific function, to improve the way in which that function is performed here.’\cite{tushnet} Expanding the perspective slightly, we examine here how particular rules within legal and constitutional institutions (such as bans on open service by LGB people in the military or bans on same-sex marriage) have been justified in constitutional law by reference to the functions that those norms purportedly serve (such as national security or procreation). Put differently, we examine not only constitutional institutions, but also constitutional justifications.

We also depart from Tushnet’s taxonomy in taking bricolage out of the conversation. Bricolage accurately describes how comparative constitutional law often works. However, we are not persuaded, as yet, that this framework has an independent normative justification. As Tushnet acknowledges, it has a random, ad hoc quality. We therefore focus on the functionalist and expressivist modalities of comparative constitutional interpretation. We believe that bans on gays from military service provide a particularly sharp instance of the functionalist modality, while bans on sodomy provide an equally sharp instance of the expressivist modality. In contrast, we believe that the relationship recognition cases demonstrate a confluence of functionalism and expressivism.

II. Military Service: Functionalism Ascendant

In the military context, a common legal problem across jurisdictions is how to balance the rights of gay servicemembers against the governmental interest in national security. Several courts have filtered this perceived conflict through constitutional or quasi-constitutional frameworks; in doing so, they have made or met two interlocking ‘immodest’ claims. The first insists that courts should grant so much deference to decisions by the political branches regarding military affairs as to render those decisions effectively non-justiciable. The second asserts that courts should defer to the specific legislative or executive assessment that openly gay servicemembers significantly disrupt unit cohesion. Comparative analysis suggests both claims are unjustified.

The United States only recently lifted its so-called ‘don’t ask, don’t tell’ policy, which had barred openly LGB individuals from service in the US military.\cite{don't} In late 2010, Congress enacted a bill permitting the executive branch to end the policy; in July 2011, the executive branch completed a Congressionally mandated certification process, which triggered the policy’s repeal on September 20, 2011.\cite{US} While the US policy’s demise thus came about principally through legislative and executive action,\cite{US} we feel our (admittedly juriscentric) intervention on comparative constitutional law should focus on how courts responded to the multiple lawsuits challenging the policy’s constitutionality during the nearly two decades in which it was enforced.\cite{US} We contrast how federal appellate courts in the United States rejected constitutional challenges to ‘don’t, ask, don’t tell’ with how the European Court of Human Rights ruled in favor of military personnel challenging a similar ban in the United Kingdom.

Federal appellate courts in the United States that directly addressed the constitutionality of ‘don’t ask, don’t tell’ all upheld the policy.\cite{US} In doing so, they adhered to both extreme claims described above. First, they relied heavily on the Supreme Court’s statement in the 1981 Rostker v Goldberg case that ‘judicial deference … is at its apogee when legislative action under the Congressional authority to raise and support armies and make rules and regulations for their governance is challenged.’\cite{US} Courts also urged deference to the specific Congressional finding embodied in the legislation:

\begin{quote}
The presence in the armed forces of persons who demonstrate a propensity or intent to engage in homosexual acts would create an unacceptable risk to the high standards of morale, good order and discipline, and unit cohesion that are the essence of military capability.\cite{US}
\end{quote}

The first claim is ‘immodest’ because it effectively forecloses judicial review over core military functions. While the
Immodest Claims and Modest Contributions: Sexual Orientation in Comparative Constitutional Law

Rostker Court stated that ‘deference’ did not mean ‘abdication’, courts’ extreme degree of deference makes the distinction elusive. Civil rights claims that would almost certainly have succeeded outside the military context have received comparatively short shrift within it, as Rostker, which upheld a facial sex-based distinction, itself demonstrates.

One danger of such extreme deference is that it leads courts to credit immodest claims made by the government to defend the policy. The Second Circuit Court of Appeals, for instance, relied heavily on a deference rationale in refusing even to consider a trial court's conclusion that the government's defense of 'don't ask, don't tell'—and the Congressional findings supporting that defense—were irrationally and impermissibly rooted in anti-gay animus. The trial court had found ‘overwhelming evidence’ in the record that the government's 'unit cohesion' argument, for example, was merely a 'euphemism for catering to the prejudices of heterosexuals'. The trial court had also observed that even assuming this prejudice could form a legitimate basis for public policy, no concrete or credible evidence supported the government's assertion that ‘don’t ask, don’t tell’ would protect or enhance the government's asserted interests.

Reversing the trial court's judgment, the Second Circuit declined to engage in these inquiries. After expounding at length on the need for judicial deference to military-related Congressional findings, the court credited the government's defense of ‘don't ask, don't tell’ (p. 1083) without addressing the merits of the lower court's analysis. While the appellate court repeatedly noted the existence of Congressional testimony in support of the military's policy—and briefly quoted the statements of two witnesses—it failed to evaluate the testimony's content or quality.

A closer look would have revealed that the testimony in support of the policy was vague and unsupported. For instance, the court cited General H. Norman Schwarzkopf, who testified: 'I have experienced the fact that the introduction of an open homosexual into a small unit immediately polarizes that unit and destroys the very bonding that is so important for the unit's survival in time of war.' He further asserted that 'in every case I am familiar with, and there are many, whenever it became known in a unit that someone was openly homosexual, polarization occurred, violence sometimes followed, morale broke down, and unit effectiveness suffered.' General Schwarzkopf provided no specifics that would have permitted verification of his claims that immediate polarization occurred upon the introduction of an open homosexual or that effectiveness suffered in 'every case with which [he was] familiar'—sometimes with 'violence'. Given that he emphasized the existence of 'many' such cases, it should not have been difficult to name at least one. Despite these shortcomings, the Second Circuit and two other federal courts quoted and relied on his statements in upholding the ban on openly gay servicemembers.

To see how a comparative perspective might chasten extreme claims regarding military deference and the purported harms of allowing openly LGB people to serve, consider the 1999 case of Lustig-Prean and Beckett v United Kingdom. In this case, the European Court of Human Rights held that the United Kingdom had violated servicemembers' ‘right to respect for ... private ... life’ under the European Convention on Human Rights by discharging them pursuant to a blanket ban on gays in the military. Several servicemembers with exemplary records brought suit. The government responded with versions of the two ‘immodest’ claims. According to the Court, the government first contended that ‘given the national security dimension to the present case a wide margin of appreciation was properly open to the State’. The government's proposed standard diverged substantially from the Court's normal practice in cases involving significant intrusions into private life, where states were typically afforded only a ‘narrow margin of appreciation’. The government then claimed that the presence of known or strongly suspected homosexuals in the armed forces would produce certain behavioural and emotional responses and problems which would affect morale and, in turn, significantly and negatively affect the fighting power of the armed forces.

The Court rejected both claims. Regarding military deference, the Court acknowledged that 'When the core of the national security aim pursued is the operational effectiveness of the armed forces, it is accepted that each State is competent to organise its own system of military discipline and enjoys a certain margin of appreciation in this respect.’ However, it did not translate this deference into the extreme claim that the military was effectively immune from judicial review. To the contrary, the Court observed that ‘the national authorities cannot rely on such rules to frustrate the exercise by individual members of the armed forces of their right to respect for their private lives, which right applies to service personnel as it does to others within the jurisdiction of the State.’ For the European Court of Human Rights, deference required actual rather than theoretical review.
Moreover, the Court rejected the claim that allowing openly gay servicemembers would lead to the decline of unit cohesion. At first glance, the government’s position appeared to be well supported. The UK Ministry of Defence had established a Homosexuality Policy Assessment Team (HPAT), which published a report in 1996 that ran to approximately 240 pages. The report focused ‘upon the anticipated effects [open service by gays would have] on fighting power’. However, despite its length, the report provided no concrete evidence that open service by gay servicemembers would cause disruption. To the contrary, the HPAT report seemed to locate the problem not in the openly gay servicemembers but in their anti-gay colleagues. As the Court observed, the attitudes of servicemembers documented by the HPAT report ‘ranged from stereotypical expressions of hostility ... to vague expressions of unease about the presence of homosexual colleagues’. The Court held that such ‘negative attitudes, cannot, of themselves, be considered by the Court to [justify] interferences with the applicants’ rights ... any more than similar negative attitudes towards those of a different race, origin or colour’. So while the government claimed its policy rested on evidence rather than animus, its evidence was an anthology of animus. The Court noted that the HPAT report ‘did not, whatever its value, provide evidence of such damage in the event of the policy changing’. After this ruling, the UK military permitted gay individuals to serve openly. By the government’s own account, the changes were implemented without disruption. By 2004, the Royal Air Force was actively recruiting gays and lesbians.

Functionalism invites comparisons that undermine extreme instrumental claims, which tend to be empirical. Broadly, the US appellate cases on ‘military deference’ suggested that the sky would fall if courts meddled with decisions by the political branches pertaining to the military. This was, and remains, a testable claim—either military deference will undermine military readiness or it will not. The European Court of Human Rights decision in Lustig-Prean, and the United Kingdom’s compliance with it, have shown that at least the British portion of the sky has not fallen. The decision and its aftermath have demonstrated that individual (p. 1085) rights relating to sexual orientation can be protected in the military in a manner that differs only in degree from how such rights are protected in civilian life. More specifically, the US appellate court cases on ‘don’t ask, don’t tell’ rested on the predicate that openly gay servicemembers would lead to the destruction of unit cohesion. Again, Lustig-Prean and the United Kingdom’s resulting policy change have suggested that this position lacks support. While it is still too early to draw definitive conclusions on the effect of allowing openly LGB people to serve in the US military, preliminary reports indicate that unit cohesion has not suffered, much less been ‘destroyed’, in the months since the repeal of ‘don’t ask, don’t tell’; on the contrary, senior military officers have increasingly expressed confidence that the repeal has not and will not cause any meaningful disruption.

Some supporters of ‘don’t ask, don’t tell’ have insisted, both before and after the policy’s repeal, that the US experience is somehow so exceptional that the experience of other jurisdictions is irrelevant. Yet this, too, is an extreme claim. Many other military forces had already integrated on the basis of sexual orientation by the time the US repealed its ban. More to the point, US forces had already worked alongside those other integrated forces—including British forces—in joint missions. The British government in Lustig-Prean strove mightily to contend that the smooth integration that had occurred in other military forces was irrelevant, in part because that integration had been ‘relatively recent’. The Court rejected that claim, observing that ‘European countries operating a blanket legal ban on homosexuals in their armed forces are now in small minority’, and further noting that ‘even if relatively recent, the Court cannot overlook the widespread and consistently developing views and associated legal (p. 1086) changes to the domestic laws of Contracting States’. Now that more than a decade has passed, the ‘relatively recent’ defense has become even less tenable. It also bears note that the British government observed that countries which had ‘no legal ban on homosexuals were more tolerant, had written constitutions and therefore a greater tradition of respect for civil rights’. From a US perspective, this is a rather ironic distinction, as it suggests that countries like the United States with written constitutions should be more, not less, likely to integrate successfully.

III. Sodomy Cases: Expressivism Ascendant

The sodomy context appears more conducive to analysis through an expressivist lens rather than through a functionalist one. In the cases we examined, the governmental rationale for criminalizing consensual sodomy tended not to rest on some instrumental purpose, such as encouraging procreative sexual conduct. Rather, the state’s justification was some version of ‘morality’. These constitutional claims about morality can be viewed as ‘expressivist’ because, in Tushnet’s term, they ‘offer to each nation’s people a way of understanding themselves
The expressivist claims can be immodest in two different directions, which we call universal-expressivist and parochial-expressivist. Universal-expressivist claims contend that the polity’s constitutional norms conform to values which, if not ubiquitous, are at least transnational. Parochial-expressivist claims, in contrast, contend that only a nation’s own mores should count in its constitutional jurisprudence.

Prominent examples of universal-expressivist claims in US constitutional law can be seen in Justice White’s majority opinion and Chief Justice Warren Burger’s concurring opinion in Bowers v Hardwick. Bowers was the 1986 Supreme Court case that rejected a constitutional privacy challenge to a sodomy statute.44 Elaborating on historical claims made by Justice White’s majority opinion, Chief Justice Burger claimed that private homosexual conduct had been subjected to state intervention ‘throughout the history of Western civilization’, and that the ‘condemnation of those practices is firmly rooted in Judeo-Christian moral and ethical standards’.45 His opinion quoted, with apparent approval, Blackstone’s characterization of homosexual sex as an offense of ‘deeper malignity’ than rape.46 To protect this conduct within the ambit of fundamental rights jurisprudence, he argued, ‘would be to cast aside millennia of moral teaching’.47

In overruling Bowers 17 years later, the landmark case of Lawrence v Texas challenged many of Justice White’s and Chief Justice Burger’s unqualified claims.48 Writing for the Court, Justice Kennedy observed that ‘The sweeping references by Chief Justice Burger to the history of Western civilization and to Judeo-Christian moral and ethical standards did not take account of other authorities pointing in an opposite direction.’49 The Lawrence Court made special note of the ruling by the European Court of Human Rights in Dudgeon v United Kingdom,50 which held that a Northern Ireland law criminalizing homosexual sodomy violated the European Convention’s ‘private … life’ provision. Justice Kennedy noted that this ruling, rendered ‘almost five years before Bowers was decided’, contradicted ‘the premise in Bowers that the claim put forward was insubstantial in our Western civilization’.51

Justice Kennedy’s use of comparative law drew intense criticism. Yet Kennedy’s opinion was simply responding to a comparative claim made in the opposite direction. Justice White’s majority opinion and Chief Justice Burger’s concurrence in Bowers ‘opened the door’ to such analysis by making reckless claims about the uniformity with which homosexuality had been condemned in the Western tradition.

Justice Scalia’s impassioned dissent in Lawrence avoided the force of this argument by maintaining that the use of comparative law by either side was illegitimate. He claimed that the Bowers majority did not in fact rely on international and comparative sources. To the contrary, Justice Scalia stated that Bowers had ‘rejected the claimed right to sodomy on the ground that such a right was not “deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition”.’52

Justice Scalia characterized the Lawrence majority’s ‘discussion of these foreign views’ as ‘meaningless dicta’.53 At the same time, he found it to be ‘Dangerous dicta … since “this Court … should not impose foreign moods, fads or fashions on Americans”.’54

Justice Scalia misapprehended the Bowers majority. Justice White’s opinion clearly included foreign and international sources in his allusion to ‘this Nation’s history and tradition’. White’s historical discussion began with the claim that prohibitions on homosexual sodomy ‘have ancient roots’, citing a law review article.55 The cited page of the law review article reads as follows:

> Current state laws prohibiting homosexual intercourse are ancient in origin. The earliest legal argument for outlawing homosexuality can be found in Plato’s Laws. Plato believed that homosexuality had to be forbidden because it undermined the important Greek values of masculinity and procreation. While accepting Plato’s reasoning, Judeo-Christian opposition to homosexuality derives from the legendary account in Genesis of the fire and brimstone destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah. The word sodomy is derived from Sodom. The Mosaic Law sets forth an absolute prohibition against homosexuality: ‘Thou shalt not lie with mankind as with woman kind; it is abomination.’56

Thus while Justice White’s reliance on the ‘Judeo-Christian tradition’ and ‘millennia of moral teaching’ was less obvious than Chief Justice Burger’s, it was nonetheless present in his conception of ‘this Nation’s history and traditions’.

However utopian it may be, it is worth exploring Justice Scalia’s parochial-expressivist claim, which rests not on a universal conception of morality, but on an isolationist one. It describes a fantasy in which the US Constitution both can and should be entirely divorced (p. 1088) from the rest of the world. It is important to take this view seriously, as other jurisdictions have embraced the parochial-expressivist view.

The Indian government put forward such a claim in the 2009 Naz Foundation v Union of India case. In Naz Foundation, the High Court of New Delhi in India struck down the nation’s sodomy statute. It quickly dispensed with any ‘functionalist’ rationale for the statute, observing that although the government had ‘referred to the issue of public health and healthy environment, the affidavit has not set out elaborately the said defence.’ The Court concluded that ‘resistance to the claim in the petition is founded on the argument of public morality’. In expounding on that ‘public morality’, the government did not rely on universal or Western moral values. To the contrary, the government lawyer asserted that ‘Social and sexual mores in foreign countries cannot justify de-criminalisation of homosexuality in India’. Indeed, the lawyer maintained ‘in the western societies the morality standards are not as high as in India’.

As Professor Sujit Choudhry has pointed out, this nationalistic argument was rejected by using both a universalist and culturally specific conception of Indian law. Choudhry observes that comparative constitutional law was used to show that India would suffer if it clung to such a parochial conception of its position in the global order. At the same time, Choudhry observes that the arguments about Indian culture were also met with counter-arguments that relied solely on Indian constitutional culture, specifically the contention that one of the underlying themes in the Indian Constitution is ‘inclusiveness’. Choudhry long ago identified this dynamic as ‘dialogic constitutionalism’.

We see the same rejection of the parochialism of Bowers in Lawrence. On the one hand, Justice Kennedy repudiated the parochialism of the Bowers formulation by noting that we shared values with ‘a wider civilization’. On the other hand, he also observed that developments within US constitutional law itself had undermined Bowers’s holding. In a pincers movement, Justice Kennedy precluded the United States from either isolating itself from a broader global community or asserting that, even if it could, it possessed a uniform national heritage.

(p. 1089) IV. Marriage and Relationship Recognition: Functionalism and Expressivism

With its 1989 Lov om registreret partnerskab (Registered Partnership Act), Denmark became the first country in the world to grant nationwide legal recognition to same-sex couples with nearly all of the benefits of marriage. Several of its northern European neighbors and other scattered jurisdictions followed suit in the 1990s, though the scope of these laws varied. In 2001, the Netherlands broke new ground, becoming the first country to legalize same-sex marriage. The global movement toward recognition of same-sex unions has since accelerated: At the time of writing, ten countries on four continents have enacted national legislation authorizing civil marriage for same-sex couples, with approximately 20 other countries granting nationwide legal recognition to same-sex couples in other forms.

(p. 1090) In other countries, advances have occurred primarily at the regional and local level. Mexico City, for example, legalized marriage and adoption by same-sex couples in 2009, and in the United States, over one-third of the population now lives in a state or district that recognizes either same-sex marriages or a close equivalent, such as civil unions—though the federal government continues not to recognize these relationships.

While the increasing number of jurisdictions recognizing same-sex relationships invites comparative legal analysis, the diversity of legal processes, decisions, and provisions (p. 1091) surrounding same-sex relationship rights—not to mention underlying cultural and political differences—mandates caution. Many readers—particularly in North America—may be quick to associate controversies over same-sex relationships with high-stakes court battles and bold judicial opinions on constitutional rights. Yet much of the worldwide progress for same-sex relationship recognition has occurred at the legislative level, often without overt prompting from courts. Moreover, in the numerous countries where constitutional litigation has helped to shape the development of same-sex relationship-recognition laws, the litigation and its political repercussions have not fit a uniform mold. Only in South Africa has a national court expressly ruled that the exclusion of same-sex couples from marriage violated the national constitution. In Canada, and to some extent Argentina, court rulings involving same-sex couples helped to produce momentum for national legislative action to legalize same-sex marriage, but no national court ruling ever held that the country's constitution mandated marriage equality. In Belgium and Mexico, national courts considered (and rejected) constitutional challenges to legislatively enacted laws that opened the door to same-sex marriage; a similar challenge to Spain's 2005 law permitting same-sex marriages has been pending for over six years in the country's Constitutional Court.\textsuperscript{79} Numerous other courts at the regional, national, and international level have mandated recognition of same-sex relationships for some purposes but have stopped short of requiring same-sex marriage. These include national constitutional courts of Brazil, Colombia, Hungary, Germany, and Slovenia, the European Court of Human Rights, , and the states of Vermont and New Jersey in the United States.\textsuperscript{80} In several countries, such as Italy, Venezuela, and Costa Rica, efforts to secure recognition of same-sex relationships have so far failed in both the national legislatures and the national courts.\textsuperscript{81}

There is also broad variation among constitutional texts with respect to, among other things, equality, dignity, family, and marriage. In some countries, including Bolivia, Ecuador, Portugal, South Africa, and Sweden, national constitutions expressly prohibit discrimination based on ‘sexual orientation’\textsuperscript{82}—though this is not necessarily a guarantee of equality for same-sex couples. In Ecuador, for example, the Constitution proscribes sexual-orientation discrimination and guarantees rights for ‘stable, monogamous’ domestic partnerships, whether same-sex or heterosexual, while other provisions in the Constitution define ‘marriage’ as a heterosexual union and prohibit adoption by same-sex couples.\textsuperscript{83} Constitutions also differ in their definition and protection of the terms ‘marriage’ and ‘family’. Some texts, for instance, expressly ban recognition of same-sex marriage, while others guarantee marriage for heterosexual couples without an express ban on same-sex marriage; still others protect ‘marriage’ or the ‘family’ without defining the terms.\textsuperscript{84}

Although the diversity among constitutional texts, courts, and cultures limits the possibilities of comparative constitutionalism, it does not foreclose meaningful comparative analysis. As in the military and sodomy contexts, the context of partnership rights is rife with incautiously broad arguments.\textsuperscript{85} However modest the contributions of comparative analysis may be, they can at least check such immodest claims. These immodest arguments are both functionalist and expressive.

1. Functionalism

The primary functionalist argument against same-sex marriage is that the purpose of marriage is procreation. Though the argument takes many guises, one of its most ‘immodest’ iterations rests on the notion that denying legal protections to same-sex couples (and their children) will somehow encourage procreative sex among heterosexuals, prevent a decline in a jurisdiction’s birth rate, and help to ‘perpetuate the species’.\textsuperscript{86} We find these arguments implausible. In the words of former New York Chief Judge Judith Kaye, ‘no one rationally decides to have children because gays and lesbians are excluded from marriage’.\textsuperscript{87}

Yet the arguments show no sign of disappearing. In upholding Washington State's ban on same-sex marriage, a plurality of the state Supreme Court concluded in 2006 that ‘the legislature was entitled to believe that limiting marriage to opposite-sex couples furthers procreation, essential to survival of the human race’.\textsuperscript{88} A Justice on the Connecticut Supreme Court argued in a 2008 dissenting opinion that the state legislature—which had already legalized civil unions for same-sex couples—could rationally conclude that opening marriage to gay couples ‘could have a significant effect on the number of opposite sex couples who choose to (p. 1093) procreate and raise children together’.\textsuperscript{89} In state and federal constitutional litigation in other states, including California, Maryland, and New York, opponents of same-sex marriage have filed briefs stressing that ‘society needs babies’.\textsuperscript{90} Two of these briefs—filed by a group of prominent family and legal scholars—point to low birth rates in Europe, warning that the ‘decline in the extent to which marriage is seen as a childbearing institution[] play[s] a clear role’ in the low fertility.\textsuperscript{91}

When opponents of same-sex marriage make such specific causal claims about the experience of other countries, courts should examine that experience. Consider the frequent suggestion that same-sex relationship recognition has caused a crisis in European countries (particularly in the Netherlands and Scandinavia) by contributing to lower marriage rates and lower birthrates.\textsuperscript{92} We know of no reliable study demonstrating such a causal link. To the contrary, scholars have systematically debunked such claims.\textsuperscript{93} Perhaps more to the point, while US opponents of LGB rights point to a supposed depopulation crisis fueled by same-sex (p. 1094) marriage and partnership recognition in Western Europe, the countries themselves do not seem to share their alarm. In 2009 and 2010, Iceland, Norway, and Sweden expanded their protection of same-sex couples by replacing partnership laws with full marriage equality.\textsuperscript{94}

With the passage of time and the growth in the number of jurisdictions recognizing same-sex couples, the field from which to gather evidence grows larger and more diverse. Courts and other decision-makers, moreover, should more carefully scrutinize the evidence on which opponents of same-sex relationship recognition tend to rely for their claims, particularly claims that on their face appear counterintuitive or far-fetched. The family and legal scholars noted above supported their claim that same-sex marriage would lead to a decline in heterosexual procreation with scholarly articles that did not actually discuss—or even mention—the legal recognition of same-sex relationships.\textsuperscript{95} Unfortunately, they are not the only litigants to misread, misinterpret, or misrepresent their sources in debates over same-sex relationship rights.

2. Expressivism

Defenders of bans on same-sex marriage or other forms of relationship recognition for same-sex couples also often rely on extreme expressivist claims. Those who defend differential treatment of same-sex unions, for example, frequently claim that the law’s heterosexual definition of marriage simply reflects and expresses marriage’s ‘biological’ foundation, or its otherwise ‘inherent’, ‘pre-legal’ nature. Insofar as these arguments rest on a conception of marriage as antecedent to law, comparative constitutional law may not appear capable, in the abstract, of offering much of a response. In practice, however, opponents of same-sex marriage typically defend characterizations of marriage’s ‘inherently’ heterosexual nature by pointing to a ‘universal’ consensus among the world’s legal traditions; to refuse to recognize same-sex marriage, they argue, is merely to adhere to globally shared values. Comparative constitutional analysis may play a modest but meaningful role in responding to these universal-expressivist justifications by unsettling the supposed empirical foundations for the anti-same-sex-marriage view.

Litigants and judges invoking theories of marriage’s true ‘essence’ could more comfortably rely on empirical arguments in the years before any jurisdiction had authorized same-sex marriages. When the Attorney General of Canada argued in the early 1990s, for example, that the heterosexual definition of marriage was ‘fundamental to the very nature of the social institution’, she could bolster that claim with the observation that ‘no jurisdiction in the world’ had recognized same-sex marriage, and that ‘Even societies in which homosexuality has been accepted make a clear distinction between heterosexual marriage and the society’s recognition and acceptance of homosexual relationships.’\textsuperscript{96} Likewise, when New Zealand defended its refusal to recognize same-sex marriage in proceedings before the United Nations Human Rights Committee several years later, it could support its position that marriage was ‘inherently’ heterosexual by noting that ‘all other States parties’ to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights had defined the institution as ‘open only to individuals of opposite sexes.’\textsuperscript{97}

With the advent of legal same-sex marriage and the spread of partnership laws, such categorical claims must be retired. Nonetheless, those who oppose legal recognition of same-sex unions have not significantly adjusted their sweeping rhetoric. In the ongoing federal constitutional challenge to California’s prohibition of same-sex marriages, for example, the defendants have argued that the heterosexual definition of marriage reflects not prejudice, but an ‘undeniable biological reality’, and that ‘the existential purpose of marriage in every society is, and has always been, to regulate sexual relationships between men and women.’\textsuperscript{98} At a January 2011 hearing before a federal appeals court, the attorney defending the same-sex marriage ban repeatedly claimed that marriage was universally understood to include only cross-sex couples; for example, he argued (in a universal-expressivist register that also sounded in a functionalist one) that ‘The key reason that marriage has existed at all in any society and at any time is that sexual relationships between men and women naturally produce children.’\textsuperscript{99}

In Mexico, where the National Supreme Court of Justice recently upheld Mexico City’s 2009 marriage equality law, one of two dissenting Justices insisted that ‘the concept and structural elements’ of marriage ‘respond to a defined reality with concrete biological and above all anthropological foundations’.\textsuperscript{100} There is an ‘international consensus’, the Justice argued, ‘that only a man and a woman can form a marriage’; to hold otherwise, he insisted, would be ‘to alter the essence of things’ and ‘to distort marriage’s ‘nature.’\textsuperscript{101} Similarly categorical claims appeared in a decision from the Supreme Court of Costa Rica in 2006. Rejecting a constitutional challenge to the country’s ban on same-sex marriage, the Court’s majority emphasized the ‘biological’ roots of the family, and claimed that an ‘anthropological’ analysis of marriage as it had existed ‘throughout human history’ and ‘through the present’ reveals that ‘marriage and the family have always had a heterosexual composition in all human civilizations’.\textsuperscript{102}

As in the context of sodomy laws, comparative constitutional analysis can discipline carelessly broad statements about ostensibly universal values that societies express through bans on same-sex relationship recognition. This is not merely a question of counting up the jurisdictions that have opened the door to same-sex relationship recognition (though that sort of ‘nose counting’ may also serve a useful, albeit limited, purpose), but also of engaging with the reasoning of foreign constitutional courts. Courts across the globe, including in Argentina, Belgium, Colombia, Costa Rica, Germany, Hungary, Italy, Mexico, New Zealand, Portugal, Slovenia, South Africa, and the United Kingdom, and over a dozen jurisdictions within the United States and Canada, have grappled with the definition and meaning of marriage and the possibility of legal recognition for same-sex couples. A growing number of these courts have offered compelling reasons to reject the claim that marriage or other legal protections can or must be limited to heterosexual couples.\textsuperscript{103}

Courts and advocates cannot be faulted for turning to these decisions for information and guidance when confronted with claims that marriage must, always and everywhere, mean one thing. Nor is this a question of cherry-picking: we do not dispute that decisions hostile to same-sex relationship rights may also form part of the global conversation. Indeed, what we urge in response to many of the ‘immodest’ claims of same-sex marriage opponents is a greater recognition that the meaning, definition, and scope of relationship rights and marriage are contestable and increasingly contested.

As in the sodomy context, objections to legal recognition of same-sex couples have relied not only on purportedly ‘universal’ values, but also national and local values. And like universal-expressivist arguments, parochial-expressivist arguments are often couched in inflexibly categorical terms.

In one variation of the parochial-expressivist opposition to same-sex marriage, litigants and judges have appealed to national religious culture, arguing that legal recognition of same-sex couples would necessarily infringe on the religious convictions held by the majority of a country's people. In a 2008 Spanish case, a local judge who objected to a same-sex couple's marriage application brought an unsuccessful challenge before the country's Constitutional Court. The judge argued that the 2005 legalization of same-sex marriage ‘contravened not only the Catholic Church's heterosexual conceptualization of marriage and the definition of marriage provided in the Dictionary of the Royal Academy of the Spanish Language’, but also various provisions of the Spanish Constitution. More specifically, the judge claimed that the law unconstitutionally disregarded the religious beliefs of the Spanish people in violation of constitutional guarantees of equality and religious freedom.\textsuperscript{104} Opponents of Belgium's same-sex marriage law made similar claims in court, unsuccessfully.\textsuperscript{105}

We see nothing extreme in asking a court to take account of a national or state culture; in fact, such an accounting is often a proper component of constitutional analysis. To argue, however, that affording legal recognition to same-sex couples will necessarily infringe on the religious freedom of those who oppose such recognition—such that the rights of same-sex couples must categorically be denied—does strike us as overbroad. It is also a testable claim, given the increasing number of jurisdictions that recognize both religious freedom and same-sex partnerships or marriage. It therefore invites a careful comparative analysis.

\textsuperscript{(p. 1097)} Indeed, the invitation to engage in comparative inquiries is often explicit, as those who appeal to national or local value (religious or otherwise) to oppose the rights of same-sex couples do not necessarily refrain from their own reliance on foreign experience and judgment. In Mexico, where the Supreme Court recently upheld a Mexico City law allowing same-sex couples to marry and adopt children, dissenting Justice Aguirre Anguiano struggled to find a balance between a limited comparative inquiry and a proper respect for national values. Although he cited a Danish study of adopted children to support his position that the Mexican Constitution prohibited adoption by same-sex couples, he also commented that ‘obviously the Danish do not resemble us Mexicans much’; adding that ‘they are a peculiar people’ and that ‘those Scandinavian countries are markedly different from us’.\textsuperscript{106} Justice Aguirre Anguiano's trouble in articulating a coherent position with respect to Denmark is telling. The widespread nature of the developments and controversies surrounding the rights of same-sex couples makes it increasingly difficult—if not impossible—for constitutional interpreters to pretend that they can close their eyes completely to foreign law and experience.

V. Conclusion

Interpreters who use comparative law are sometimes criticized for permitting judges too much discretion. Chief Justice Roberts framed the critique well in his confirmation hearings:

In foreign law you can find anything you want. If you don't find it in the decisions of France or Italy, it's in the decisions of Somalia or Japan or Indonesia or wherever. As somebody said in another context, looking at foreign law for support is like looking out over a crowd and picking out your friends. You can find them, they're there. And that actually expands the discretion of the judge. It allows the judge to incorporate his or her own personal preferences, cloak them with the authority of precedent because they're finding precedent in foreign law, and use that to determine the meaning of the Constitution. I think that's a misuse of precedent, not a correct use of precedent.\textsuperscript{107}

The 'other context' Justice Roberts was speaking of was that of legislative history, in which it is often said that jurists can 'look out over a crowd and pick out their friends'.\textsuperscript{108} Yet the analogy breaks down here, as it is seldom stated (to our knowledge) that 'no legislative history supports the position' when a great deal of legislative history does. In the comparative context, however, there is a tendency to make 'always/everywhere' claims that implicitly contend that no other jurisdiction has gone the other way. Put differently, to 'look out over a crowd and pick out your friends' is a perfectly legitimate exercise when raised to counter the immodest argument that one has no friends at all.

Bibliography

Sunil Khilnani, Vikram Raghavan, and Arun Thiruvengadam (eds), Comparative Constitutionalism in South Asia (2010)

Esteban Restrepo-Saldarriaga, ‘Advancing Sexual Health through Human Rights in Latin America and the Caribbean’, Draft manuscript, 2011 (on file with authors)

Macarena Sáez, ‘Same-sex Marriage, Same-sex Cohabitation, and Same-sex Families Around the World: Why “Same” is so Different’ (2011) 19 Journal of Gender, Social Policy and the Law 1

Notes:

(2) Ibid 1228.

(3) Ibid.

(5) Ibid 1228.

(6) We confine our analysis to lesbians, gay men, and bisexuals, rather than extending it to include transgender individuals. The challenges facing transgender individuals, while crucial, are too complex and distinct to be covered in an intervention of this length. For the sake of simplicity, moreover, we use the word ‘gay’, in addition to the term LGB, to refer to lesbians, gay men, and bisexuals. On gender in the Constitution, see Chapter 19.

(7) Tushnet (n 1), 1228.

(10) This is not to say that litigation was irrelevant to the repeal process. While the impact of judicial rulings is difficult to assess, recent rulings may have increased pressure on the political branches to jettison the ban. In early October 2010, for instance—less than three months before Congress enacted the repeal bill—a federal district court held that ‘don’t ask, don’t tell’ was unconstitutional. See Log Cabin Republicans v United States 716 F Supp 2d 884, 888 (CD Cal 2010). The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals issued a stay of the lower court's ruling on October 20, 2010. See Log Cabin Republicans v United States 2010 WL 4136210 (9th Cir October 20, 2010) (No 10-56634). Much of the debate over repeal took place in the shadow of this litigation; indeed, the Secretary of Defense alluded to the litigation in late November when he urged Congress to move forward with its repeal legislation. See Liz Halloran, ‘Gates To Senate: End “Don’t Ask” Before Courts Do’, NPR, November 30, 2010, available at (www.npr.org/2010/11/30/131697322/pentagon-study-dismisses-risk-of-openly-gay-troops). In July 2011, many months after Congress approved the repeal bill—but before the executive's certification process was complete—the Ninth Circuit lifted its earlier stay, and then, a week later, re-issued the stay in part. See Log Cabin Republicans v United States 2011 WL 2982102 (9th Cir July 15, 2011) (No 10-56634). One week after this confusing set of orders,

(11) Prior to Congress’s 1993 enactment of the ‘don’t ask, don’t tell’ statute, openly LGB individuals were barred from military service under a Department of Defense directive declaring homosexuality to be ‘incompatible with military service’. See US Department of Defense, ‘Report of the Comprehensive Review’ (n 10), 20–1 (summarizing legal prohibitions on military service by openly LGB individuals prior to the enactment of ‘don’t ask, don’t tell’). Courts rejected challenges to these earlier prohibitions as well. See eg Steffan v Perry 41 F3d 677 (DC Cir 1994).

(12) See eg Able v United States 155 F3d 628 (2d Cir 1998); Thomasson v Perry 80 F3d 915 (4th Cir 1996). Servicemembers challenging anti-gay discrimination in the military won at least two victories before the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, but those decisions did not invalidate the military’s anti-gay policies as a general matter. See eg Witt v Dep’t of Air Force 527 F3d 806 (9th Cir 2008); Watkins v United States Army 875 F2d 699 (9th Cir 1989).

(14) 10 USC §654.

(15) Rostker 453 US at 70.

(16) See eg Cook v Gates 528 F3d 42, 60 (1st Cir 2008) (rejecting a constitutional challenge to ‘don’t ask, don’t tell’, and explaining that ‘where Congress has articulated a substantial government interest for a law, and where the challenges in question implicate that interest, judicial intrusion is simply not warranted’).

(17) See 453 US at 83; see also Goldman v Weinberger 475 US 503 (1986) (upholding Air Force regulation that prohibited a rabbi from wearing his yarmulke). The Supreme Court’s deference to the military is not categorical. See Frontiero v Richardson 411 US 677 (1973) (striking down a facial sex-based distinction in a military benefits scheme). However, the Court did not raise the issue of ‘military deference’ in Frontiero, perhaps because the benefits scheme at issue did not relate to a core military function.

(18) See Able 155 F3d 628.

(20) See eg ibid 859.

(21) See Able 155 F3d at 635–6.

(22) S Rep No 103-112, at 280.

(23) Ibid.

(24) See eg Able 155 F3d at 635; Thomasson 80 F3d at 929; Cook v Rumsfeld 429 F Supp 2d 385, 402 n 25 (D Mass 2006), affirmed sub nom Cook v Gates 528 F3d 42 (1st Cir 2008).

(27) See also Smith and Grady v United Kingdom (1999) 29 EHRR 548. The Smith judgment, which similarly addressed the United Kingdom’s ban on gays in the military, was issued on the same day as Lustig-Prean. The Court reached the same conclusion in both Lustig-Prean and Smith regarding gay servicemembers’ right to respect for their private lives.

(28) Lustig-Prean, para 70.

(29) Ibid.

(30) Ibid para 47.

(31) Ibid para 82.

(32) Ibid.

(33) Ibid para 47.

(34) Ibid para 90.

(35) Ibid.

(36) Ibid para 92.

(39) Recent statements from the top officer of the US Marine Corps, Commandant General James Amos, provide a striking example of how views on this issue are changing now that the repeal has taken place. General Amos, previously a staunch supporter of ‘don’t, ask, don’t tell’, made headlines in December 2010 when he suggested that the presence of openly gay troops on the battlefield would create a ‘distraction’ that could ‘cost Marines lives’. Gordon Lubold, ‘Marine chief: Repeal could cost lives’, Politico, December 14, 2010, available at (http://www.politico.com/news/stories/1210/46390.html). By late November 2011, two months after the repeal took effect, Amos was offering a different assessment: in an interview with the Associated Press, he called the repeal ‘a non-event’, stated that he was ‘very pleased with how it has gone’, and noted that he had seen no signs of disruption. Robert Burns, ‘Gay ban’s repeal was a “a non-event,” Amos says’, Associated Press, November 28, 2011; see also ibid (describing a statement by a Defense Department spokeswoman that ‘implementation of the repeal of the gay ban is proceeding smoothly across the military’); Carol Ross Joynt, ‘Looking Back: The Anniversary of the Repeal of “Don’t Ask, Don’t Tell”’, December 21, 2011, available at (http://www.washingtonian.com/blogarticles/22002.html) (quoting a statement from the chairman of the Senate’s Armed Services Committee that ‘We routinely ask military leaders whether they are experiencing any problems with the repeal, and so far they have not identified any incidents related to the repeal’).

(40) The US Department of Defense reported in 2010 that its Working Group found that 35 of the United States’ partner nations in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) allow gays and lesbians to serve openly in the military. US Department of Defense, ‘Report of the Comprehensive Review’ (n 10), 89. At the time of the Report, only six nations in NATO and ISAF prohibited gays from serving openly (Bulgaria, Jordan, Poland, Turkey, United Arab Emirates, and the United States); the policies of two other nations (Republic of Macedonia, Singapore) were undetermined. Ibid. The Report accepted that a comparison between the US and foreign militaries, while ‘far from perfect’, was nevertheless ‘relevant to [the] assessment’ of how openly LGB servicemembers would affect the US military. Ibid. The research supporting the Report had focused in particular on Canada, the United Kingdom, and Australia, because those three countries, the Report explained, ‘are in many ways culturally similar to the United States, and their militaries are, like the U.S. military, all-volunteer forces and of similar size proportionate to their national populations. These nations also work closely with U.S. forces in international operations’. Ibid 90.

(41) Lustig-Prean (n 25), para 97.

(42) Ibid para 51.
(43) Tushnet (n 1), 1228.

(45) Bowers 478 US at 196 (Burger CJ concurring).

(47) Ibid.

(49) Ibid 572.

(50) ECtHR, Ser A no 45, 1981.

(51) Lawrence 539 US at 573.

(52) Ibid 598 (quoting Bowers 478 US at 193–4). Justice Scalia supplied the emphasis in this passage.

(53) Ibid.

(54) Ibid (quoting Foster v Florida 537 US 990 (2002) (Thomas J concurring in denial of certiorari)).

(56) Ibid ‘Survey’, 525.

(59) Ibid.

(60) Ibid para 24.

(61) Ibid.

(62) Sujit Choudhry, ‘How To Do Comparative Constitutional Law in India: Naz Foundation, Same Sex Rights, and Dialogical Interpretation’ in Sunil Khilnani, Vikram Raghavan, and Arun Thiruvengadam (eds), Comparative Constitutionalism in South Asia (2010).

(63) Ibid 29.

(65) Ibid 560.

(66) Our examples from the United States, Europe, and India are not meant to suggest that the invalidation of sodomy laws is a universal phenomenon. While such laws have been repealed or declared invalid throughout Europe and in most countries in the Americas, 76 nations around the world still criminalize private, consensual same-sex sexual conduct. See UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, ‘Discriminatory laws and practices and acts of violence against individuals based on their sexual orientation and gender identity’, UN Doc A/HRC/19/41, November 17, 2011, paras 40–4.

Immodest Claims and Modest Contributions: Sexual Orientation in Comparative Constitutional Law

(68) See Eskridge and Spedale (n 67), 43–89; Wintemute (n 67), 761–2; Boele-Woelki and Fuchs (n 67), (Appendix) 215–310.

(69) Wintemute (n 67), 761; Boele-Woelki and Fuchs (n 67), (Appendix) 231.

(70) These countries are Argentina, Belgium, Canada, Iceland, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, South Africa, Spain, and Sweden. See Law no 26.618 (July 21, 2010) (Argentina); Loi ouvrant le mariage à des personnes de même sexe et modifiant certaines dispositions du Code civil (February 13, 2003) (Belgium); Civil Marriage Act (July 20, 2005) (Canada); Law no 65 (June 22, 2010) (Iceland); Law of 21 December 2000 amending Book 1 of the Civil Code in connection with the opening of marriage for same-sex couples (Netherlands); Law no 53 (June 27, 2008) (Norway); Law no 9/2010 (May 31, 2010) (Portugal); Law 13/2005 (July 1, 2005) (Spain); Act No 17 (November 29, 2006) (South Africa); Law 2009:260 (April 1, 2009) (Sweden); see also Macarena Sáez, ‘Same-sex Marriage, Same-sex Cohabitation, and Same-sex Families Around the World: Why “Same” is so Different’ (2011) 19 Journal of Gender, Social Policy and the Law 1 ff; Paul Axel-Lute, ‘Same-Sex Marriage: A Selective Bibliography of the Legal Literature’, February 17, 2011, available at (http://law-library.rutgers.edu/SSM.html); Esteban Restrepo-Saldarriaga, ‘Advancing Sexual Health through Human Rights in Latin America and the Caribbean’, Draft manuscript, 2011 (on file with authors); ‘El décimo país del mundo, el primero de Latinoamérica’, El País, July 15, 2010 (Spain).

(71) These countries now include Andorra, Australia, Austria, Brazil, Colombia, Croatia, the Czech Republic, Denmark and Greenland, Ecuador, Finland, France, Germany, Hungary, Ireland, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, New Zealand, Slovenia, Switzerland, the United Kingdom, and Uruguay. See National Supreme Court of Justice, Decision AI 2/2010 (2010) (Mexico) (Ministro Valls Hernández concurring), 3–51 (summarizing and analyzing foreign laws and judicial decisions on same-sex marriage and partnership recognition); Schalk v Austria, ECHR App no 30141/04, 2010, paras 27–34 (summarizing national laws regarding same-sex marriage and partnership recognition within the 47 member states of the Council of Europe); Sáez (n 70), 15–31; International Commission of Jurists (n 10), 309–80; American Bar Association Section of Family Law, ‘A White Paper: An Analysis of the Law Regarding Same-sex Marriage, Civil Unions and Domestic Partnerships’ (2004) 38 Family Law Quarterly 339; Boele-Woelki and Fuchs (n 67) (Appendix), 213–31; Maureen Cosgrove, ‘Liechtenstein voters approve civil partnership law’, Jurist, June 20, 2011, available at (http://jurist.org/paperchase/2011/06/liechtenstein-voters-approve-civil-partnership-law.php); see also Restrepo-Saldarriaga (n 70), 57–8, 74–88 (discussing legislative and judicial developments regarding same-sex marriage and partnership recognition, as well as sexual-orientation discrimination, in Latin America).

(72) Código Civil para el Distrito Federal, Arts 146, 391 (Mexico); see also National Supreme Court of Justice, Decision AI 2/2010 (2010) (Mexico), paras 205–7.

(73) At the time of writing, Connecticut, the District of Columbia, Iowa, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New York, and Vermont authorize same-sex marriage. See Gill v Office of Pers Mgmt 699 F Supp 2d 374, 377 n 9 (D Mass 2010) (listing state-level marriage developments); see also NH Rev Stat §476:1-a; NY Dom Rel Law §10-a; 15 Vt Stat Ann §8; Jackson v Dist of Columbia Bd of Elections & Ethics 999 A2d 89 (DC 2010); Kerrigan v Comm'r of Pub Health 957 A2d 407 (Conn 2008); Varnum v Brien 763 NW 2d 862 (Iowa 2009); Goodridge v Dep't of Pub Health 798 NE 2d 941 (Mass 2003). California recognizes same-sex marriages if they were performed in that state between June 16, 2008 and November 5, 2008, or if they were validly performed in a different jurisdiction at any time before November 5, 2008. For any same-sex marriage performed on or after November 5, 2008, the state recognizes the unions for all purposes except the designation ‘marriage’. See California Family Code §§297, 297.5, 308. Maryland recognizes same-sex marriages lawfully performed in other jurisdictions, see ‘Marriage—Whether Out-of-State Same-Sex Marriage That is Valid in the State of Celebration May be Recognized in Maryland’, 95 Op Att’y Gen Md 3 (February 23, 2010) (Maryland), and may soon also authorize recognition of same-sex marriages performed within the state, see John Wagner, ‘Same-sex marriage bill passes house of delegates’, Washington Post, February 17, 2012, available at (http://www.washingtonpost.com/local/dc-politics/same-sex-marriage-bill-passes-maryland-house-of-delegates/2012/02/17/gIQARK7XKR_story.html). Delaware, Illinois, Hawaii, Nevada, New Jersey, Oregon, Rhode Island, and Washington State have enacted legislation authorizing same-sex partnerships without the designation ‘marriage’. Other states, including Colorado, Maine, and Wisconsin, afford more limited recognition to same-sex couples. See generally Human Rights Campaign, ‘Marriage Equality & Other Relationship Recognition Laws’, July 6, 2011, available at (http://www.hrc.org/files/assets/resources/Relationship_Recognition_Laws_Map%281%29.pdf); Axel-Lute (n 70); International Commission of Jurists (n 10), 312–13, 322–6. Population statistics for each state are available through the US Census Bureau, ‘State & County QuickFacts’, at (http://quickfacts.census.gov/qfd/index.html).

State laws affecting same-sex relationships have changed rapidly over the last decade. No state, for example, recognized same-sex marriage or any equivalent status prior to 2000. This rapid progress, however, has triggered fierce backlash: a majority of states have enacted state constitutional amendments restricting marriage to one man and one woman; many of these provisions also bar recognition of civil unions or domestic partnerships. See Human Rights Campaign, ‘Statewide Marriage Prohibitions’, January 13, 2010, available at (http://www.hrc.org/about_us/state_laws.asp). Change is likely to remain fast-paced. At the time of writing, for example, same-sex marriage advocates in Maine are working to gather enough signatures to place a marriage equality proposal on the 2012 ballot, while in neighboring New Hampshire, the legislature is widely expected to approve a bill repealing a marriage equality law that took effect only in 2010. See Rebekah Metzler, ‘Gathering of signatures can begin in effort to legalize gay marriage’, Portland Press Herald, August 18, 2011, available at (http://www.pressherald.com/news/gathering-of-signatures-can-begin-in-effort-to-legalize-gay-marriage-2011-08-18.html); Norma Love, ‘Gay marriage repeal a top issue in New Hampshire’, Associated Press, December 25, 2011, available at (http://articles.boston.com/2011-12-25/news/30557074_1_marriage-law-gay-marriage-civil-unions). The New Hampshire proposal would replace same-sex marriage with civil unions.

(74) The current Administration has taken some minor steps toward very limited recognition of same-sex partners, and while it continues to enforce the federal statute defining marriage as exclusively heterosexual, it has taken the position that the statute is unconstitutional. See Charlie Savage and Sheryl Gay Stolberg, ‘In Shift, US Says Marriage Act Blocks Gay Rights’, NY Times, February 23, 2011, available at (http://www.nytimes.com/2011/02/24/us/24marriage.html); see also Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA) §3, 1 USC §7. Various pending lawsuits are challenging DOMA’s constitutionality. See eg Massachusetts v US Dep’t of Health & Human Servs 698 F Supp 2d 234, 235–6 (D Mass 2010), notice of appeal filed October 12, 2010.

(76) See eg Boele-Woelki and Fuchs (n 67), (Appendix) 215–310.

(77) See Minister of Home Affairs v Fourie, 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 587.

(78) See eg Re Same Sex Marriage [2004] 3 SCR 698 (Canada); Halpern v Canada (Attorney General) [2003] 65 OR3d 161 (Ont CA), EGALE Canada Inc v Canada (Attorney General) [2003] 225 DLR (4th) 472 (BCCA); see also Sentencia Freyre Alejandro v GCBA Sobre Amparo (Art 14 CCABA), Juzgado 1ra Inst en lo Contencioso Adm y Trib No 15, Expediente 34292/0 (October 11, 2009) (Argentina); International Commission of Jurists (n 10), 344, 365–9.

(80) See sources cited at nn 70–71.

(81) See generally Sáez (n 70), 4–6, 12–13; Axel-Lute (n 70); see also National Supreme Court of Justice, Decision Al 2/2010 (2010) (Mexico) (Ministro Valls Hernández concurring), 3–51 (summarizing and analyzing foreign laws and judicial decisions on same-sex marriage and partnership recognition); Schalk v Austria, ECtHR App no 30141/04, 2010, paras 27–34 (summarizing national laws regarding same-sex marriage and partnership recognition within the 47 member states of the Council of Europe).

(82) UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (n 66), para 49.

(83) Constitución de Ecuador, Arts 11(2), 66(9), 67, 68, 83(14).

(84) See ibid; Axel-Lute (n 70); Restrepo-Saldarriaga (n 70).
(85) For purposes of this chapter, we use the terms ‘partnership rights’ and ‘partnership laws’ to refer to a variety of forms of legal recognition for same-sex couples that stop short of full marriage equality, such as civil unions and civil partnerships.

(86) An increasingly common variation of the procreation argument posits that marriage exists primarily or solely to mitigate the effects of ‘accidental’ or ‘reckless’ procreation among heterosexuals. See Edward Stein, ‘The “Accidental Procreation” Argument for Withholding Legal Recognition for Same-Sex Relationships’ (2009) 84 Chicago-Kent Law Review 403. Even assuming that encouraging marriage among heterosexuals helps to mitigate the effects of accidental procreation, however, it is fanciful to suggest that withholding marriage licenses from same-sex couples serves any similar purpose.

Comparative analysis becomes relevant to ‘reckless procreation’ claims when opponents of LGB rights argue that legal recognition of same-sex relationships has contributed to an increase in non-marital birth rates in European countries. Various scholars have discredited these claims. See eg Eskridge and Spedale (n 67), M.V. Lee Badgett, When Gay People Get Married: What Happens When Societies Legalize Same-Sex Marriage (2009), 64–85.

(87) Hernandez v Robles 855 NE2d 1, 31 (NY 2006) (Kaye C dissenting).

(88) Andersen v King County 138 P3d 963, 969 (Wa 2006).

(89) Kerrigan v Comm’r of Pub Health 957 A2d 407, 531 (Conn 2008) (Zarella J dissenting). The same year, the state of Iowa cited its ‘declining birth rate’ and asserted an interest in ‘encouraging procreative marriage’ in its unsuccessful attempt to defend its ban on same-sex marriage before the state’s Supreme Court. Final Brief of Defendant-Appellant at 43, 53, Varnum v Brien 763 NW2d 862 (Iowa 2009) (No 07-1499); see also Smelt v County of Orange 374 F Supp 2d 861, 880 (CD Cal 2005):

Because procreation is necessary to perpetuate humankind, encouraging the optimal union for procreation is a legitimate government interest. ... By excluding same-sex couples from... marriage, ... the government is communicating to citizens that opposite-sex relationships have special significance. Congress could plausibly have believed sending this message makes it more likely people will enter into opposite-sex unions, and encourages those relationships.

Vacated in part on other grounds, 447 F3d 673 (9th Cir 2006). For a recent example of a similar argument, see Reply Brief for Intervenor-Appellant the Bipartisan Legal Advisory Group of the United States House of Representatives, Commonwealth of Massachusetts v US Dept of Health and Human Servs, No 10-2204 (1st Cir December 1, 2011), 2011 WL 6147004, at *23 (arguing that ‘Congress reasonably could have concluded’ that ‘changing the definition of marriage’ to allow same-sex marriage ‘might affect [heterosexuals’] decisions whether to marry or have children in marriage’).

(92) See eg Brief Amici Curiae of James Q. Wilson et al, Legal and Family Scholars, in Support of Defendants-Appellants at 15–17, Conaway v Deane (n 90) (arguing against same-sex marriage by warning that ‘A growing number of countries view their low birth rates with the resulting population decline and ageing to be a serious crisis, jeopardizing the basic foundations of the nation and threatening its survival’, and pointing specifically to Western Europe); see also Brief of Amici Curiae National Organization for Marriage, National Organization for Marriage Rhode Island, and Family Leader in Support of the Intervening Defendants-Appellants 28–29, Perry v Schwarzenegger, No 10-16696 (9th Cir September 24, 2010); Brief Amicus Curiae of The American Center for Law & Justice in Support of Respondent Proposition 22 Legal Defense And Education Fund at 4–6, In re Marriage Cases 183 P3d 384 (Ca 2008) (No S147999).
(93) See Badgett (n 86), 64–85; Eskridge and Spedale (n 67), 131–202, 271–9; Brief of Amici Curiae Legislators from United States Jurisdictions that Have Legalized Same-Sex Marriage in Support of Plaintiffs-Appellees and Affirmance at 19–27, Perry v Schwarzenegger, No 10-16696 (9th Cir October 5, 2010) (reviewing, and providing citations and weblinks to, evidence that debunks myths about the supposed negative effects of same-sex marriage and relationship recognition in foreign jurisdictions); see also Ohlsson-Wijka, ‘Sweden’s Marriage Revival: An Analysis of the New-millennium Switch from Long-term Decline to Increasing Popularity’ (2011) Population Studies 1–18.

(94) See sources cited at n 70.

(96) Factum of the Attorney General of Canada, paras 17, 37, 38, Layland v Ontario (Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations), 14 OR (3d) 658, 104 DLR (4th) 214 (Div Ct) (1993).

(98) Defendant-Intervenors-Appellants' Opening Brief, Perry v Schwarzenegger, No 10-16696 (9th Cir September 17, 2010), 2010 WL 3762119, at *54.

(99) Oral argument, Perry v Schwarzenegger, No 10-16696 (9th Cir December 6, 2010), available at (http://www.c-spanvideo.org/program/296911-1).

(101) Ibid 37.

(102) See Exp: 03-008127-0007-CO, Res No 2006007262 (2006) (Sala Constitucional de la Corte Suprema de Justicia) (Costa Rica). In Spain, members of a center-right party have argued before the country's Constitutional Court that the government's 2005 legalization of same-sex marriage ‘distorts the very nature and essence’ of the institution as it has been understood under the legal tradition of both Spain and the ‘Western world’. Recurso de inconstitucionalidad contra la Ley 13/2005 de 1 de julio, at 17 (September 28, 2005) (Spain).

(103) See Axel-Lute (n 70); see also National Supreme Court of Justice, Decision Al 2/2010 (2010) (Mexico) (Ministro Valls Hernández concurring), 3–51 (summarizing and analyzing foreign laws and judicial decisions on same-sex marriage and partnership recognition).

(108) See eg Patricia Wald, ‘Some Observations on the Use of Legislative History in the 1981 Supreme Court Term’ (1983) 68 Iowa Law Review 195, 215:

consistent and uniform rules for statutory construction and use of legislative materials are not being followed today. It sometimes seems that citing legislative history is still, as my late colleague Harold Leventhal once observed, akin to ‘looking over a crowd and picking out your friends’.

Kenji Yoshino
Kenji Yoshino is Chief Justice Earl Warren Professor of Constitutional Law, New York University School of Law

Michael Kavey
Michael Kavey is Associate-in-Law, Columbia Law School
Abstract and Keywords

This article sketches an alternative picture of group rights and the political sociology that underlies them. It yields not only a different picture of group rights, but reframes the precise character of the conflict between individual and group rights, which is the precursor to normative analysis. A careful examination of constitutional practice reveals that: group rights are a response to political mobilization not only on issues of cultural survival, but around the unequal distribution of economic resources and opportunities, the unequal enjoyment of public services, and unequal access to political power; group rights are claimed by a broad variety of groups, including territorially dispersed minorities and groups that may constitute a majority in the state; in addition to rights to self-government or autonomy, group rights relate to political power, and are designed to ensure representation and participation in common institutions, take a broad variety of forms, arise in a variety of institutional contexts (electoral system design, political party regulation, legislative voting rules, the structure of political executive, courts), are usually not held and exercised by groups acting as a corporate entity, and are best understood as mechanisms to incorporating a group perspective into collective decision-making; and these group rights produce a variety of conflicts with the individual rights of group members and non-members that are materially different from the kinds of rights violations that the political theorists' constitutional image of group rights would suggest.

Keywords: group rights, political theory, comparative constitutional law, self-government, autonomy

I. Introduction 1100

II. Group Rights in Political Theory 1101
   1. Group Rights Protect Culture 1101
   2. Group Rights are Held by Specific Groups 1102
   3. Group Rights as Collective Rights 1103
   4. Group Rights and Internal Minorities 1106
      (a) National Minorities 1106
      (b) Indigenous Peoples 1106
      (c) Religious Minorities 1106

III. Group Rights in Comparative Constitutional Law 1108
   1. Demands for Group Rights are Rooted Not Just in Claims to Protect Culture 1109
   2. Group Rights are Demanded by a Diverse Set of Groups 1112
   3. Group Rights and Representation 1113
   4. Group Rights versus Individual Rights 1119
      (a) Group Rights Discriminate Against Non-Members 1120
Group Rights in Comparative Constitutional Law: Culture, Economics, or Political Power?

I. Introduction

Group rights are part of the grammar of contemporary constitutional politics. In divided societies, in which ethnicity serves as the principal basis of political mobilization, ethnic groups—especially ethnic minorities—assert a range of group rights directly, or as the underlying root of a range of public policies. It is claimed that there are group rights to separate educational and social institutions, to federal subunits in which ethnic groups exclusively wield or dominate the exercise of political power, and to land and resources. Group rights are the basis for rules on internal migration and land ownership, for distinct systems of religious personal law, for official multilingualism, for executive power-sharing, and for a share of natural resource revenues. Moreover, the assertion of group rights is not just a political claim; it is also a legal claim directed at the very design of the constitutional order and its subsequent interpretation. Group rights serve two constitutional functions. They are shields and swords against majority rule, which protect ethnic minorities from being outvoted on policies that affect the interests that those rights protect. But equally importantly, the entrenchment of group rights reflects and projects a conception of the very nature of the constitutional order itself, in which the group which holds rights is constitutionally identified as a constituent element. Citizenship in the broader political community is mediated through membership in the group. Thus, group rights have both regulative and constitutive functions.

In contemporary constitutional practice, group rights exist alongside the standard schedule of individual rights that are found in constitutional bills of rights—the liberal freedoms (expression, assembly, association, and religion), and the rights to bodily integrity and due process, to participation in the democratic process, and to equality. However, these two varieties of rights embody competing constitutional logics. Group rights institutionalize ethnic identity in the very design of the constitutional order, whereas individual rights are guaranteed irrespective of ethnic identity and are hostile to the institutionalization of ethnic difference. Rights to equality and non-discrimination presumptively prohibit the distribution of rights and opportunities on the basis of ethnic identity—for example, through rules governing preferential treatment in public sector employment, the receipt of public services, or in land ownership. The guarantee of rights on equal terms—for example, the right to vote and hold public office, the right to property—presumptively forbids the unequal enjoyment of the interests protected by those rights, including on the basis of ethnicity. More fundamentally, individual rights call upon citizens to abstract away from race, religion, ethnicity, and language, which have previously served as the grounds of political identity and political division. They encode a vision of political community built around citizens who are equal bearers of constitutional rights—a constitutional patriotism or civic nationalism—a transcendent form of political membership unmediated by group identity.¹

Individual rights clearly have regulative and constitutive functions as well, and these functions not only differ, but also conflict with the parallel functions served by group rights. So one of the most pressing issues of contemporary constitutional law is to understand the precise interrelationship between group and individual rights. Yet the most serious work on this question (p. 1101) is found not in the literature on comparative constitutional law, but in the cognate discipline of political theory, which often presupposes the constitutional practice of group rights, in order to better understand the political sociology of claims for those rights, and to assess them normatively. Constitutional scholarship, in turn, is parasitic on political theory. Indeed, because of its orientation around real-world examples, the political theory literature informs contemporary debates over group rights in constitutional politics, especially during moments of constitutional transition.

Political theorists presuppose that group rights entail the right to self-government over matters integral to cultural identity. But on careful examination, there is a gap between the constitutional image of group rights relied on by many political theorists and the actual constitutional provisions that can lay claim to constituting group rights. Group rights often arise out of conflicts over economic and political power that may bear little connection to questions of cultural difference, or whose relationship to culture is more complex than political theorists would suggest. Normative theorizing and constitutional analyses about group rights are therefore premised on inaccurate foundations. Moreover, the inaccurate image of extant constitutional orders may distort practical debates over constitutional design and interpretation. The goal of this contribution is to sketch an alternative picture of group rights and the political sociology that underlies them. This kind of descriptive and analytical work yields not only a different picture of group rights, but reframes the precise character of the conflict between individual and group rights, which is the precursor to normative analysis.

II. Group Rights in Political Theory

An analytic and descriptive account of constitutionally entrenched group rights should have the following components: (1) the interests the group right seeks to protect; (2) which groups claim and hold such rights; (3) the juridical structure of these rights, including what is the subject matter and scope of such rights, who are the rights-holders, who owes corresponding duties, how those rights are exercised, and the relationship of group rights to territory; and (4) the nature of the relationship between group rights and individual rights.

The political theory literature on group rights is vast, is riven by internal debates, and resists easy generalization. However, we can distill a shared set of answers to these questions from political theorists: (1) group rights protect the interest of members of ethnic groups in cultural survival or integrity; (2) group rights are primarily held by three kinds of minorities—national minorities, indigenous minorities, and religious minorities; (3) group rights consist of rights to decision-making authority over matters integral to cultural survival, are held by groups collectively, are exercised by the group through its governing institutions or on the group's behalf by an unelected leadership, often but do not necessarily entail territorial jurisdiction, and can bind both members and non-members of the group; and (4) group rights come into conflict with the individual rights of group members, but do not raise serious issues regarding the rights of non-members. I address each point in turn.

1. Group Rights Protect Culture

For political theorists, what defines ethnic groups, and distinguishes them from each other, is a distinct cultural identity. As we shall see, different kinds of groups vary in terms of what defines their cultural distinctiveness (eg national minorities versus religious minorities), (p. 1102) which in turn shapes the subject matter of their group rights (eg official language policy versus family law). But notwithstanding these differences, group rights have the common goal of protecting the integrity and survival of distinct cultures. As Jürgen Habermas writes, group rights are aimed at ‘protection of cultural lifeforms’. The leading normative justification for group rights is the liberal culturalist account, offered by Joseph Raz, Will Kymlicka, David Miller, and Yael Tamir. From within the liberal tradition, liberal defenders of groups conceptualize culture as a primary social good in the Rawlsian sense. A stable culture provides a context of choice for individuals within which they formulate their life-plans. Cultures furnish individuals with options for how to pursue their lives, and assign values to those options. The future viability of a culture is determined by myriad public decisions (eg regarding official language policy across the public and private sectors, religious establishment or disestablishment, land ownership, internal migration etc) and private decisions within that publicly enacted legal framework. Minority cultures are vulnerable to the economic and political decisions of the majority. In some cases, this will be a product of deliberate hostility, with the goal of eradicating or denigrating the minority culture because it is inferior or primitive (eg traditional religions), fueling demands for recognition or respect. But in other cases, it will be considered to be the unavoidable by-product of policies designed to promote a common national identity necessary to underwrite liberal democratic policies or distributive justice (eg official language policies). In yet other cases, minority cultures may be vulnerable to indifference or inadvertence by political decision-makers who lack first-hand experience or knowledge of the minority culture. By contrast, majority cultures do not face these dangers. It is the unequal risks faced by minority and majority cultures that give rise to claims for group rights.

2. Group Rights are Held by Specific Groups

The definition of culture is broad enough to encompass a broad range of social groups and, indeed, political theorists often tie treatments of group rights to the larger phenomenon of identity politics, which encompasses claims to recognition by racial minorities, gays and lesbians, and women. However, when political theorists discuss group rights, they have narrowly focused on three sets of ethnic groups: national minorities, indigenous peoples, and religious minorities.
National minorities constitute a majority in a traditional homeland over which they previously exercised self-government, but were incorporated into a larger state involuntarily, for example through conquest (Quebec, Catalonia, Russia) or royal marriage (Scotland). Even apparently voluntary unions may have been entered into under the direction or pressure of large international powers (eg Belgium, Czechoslovakia). In many cases, they possessed a complete set of economic and political institutions prior to their incorporation into the larger state, which may have survived and are regarded as the institutionalization of group identity. A further distinction can be drawn between national minorities who constitute a majority in a neighboring or kin state (eg the Hungarian and Russian minorities in many Central and East (p. 1103) European states) and those that do not (the Quebecois, Catalans, Kurds). The latter subset of national minorities are sometimes referred to as losers in the process of state formation and consolidation, who could easily have ended up with a state of their own, whereas the former subset appear to have ended up on the wrong side of an international border.

Indigenous peoples are difficult to define, and indeed, which groups can lay claim to indigenous status is a matter of considerable controversy under international law. But the paradigmatic examples are the original inhabitants of the settler societies of North and South America and Australasia. Because of their status as prior occupants and sovereigns, they are similar to national minorities. But there are many important differences: indigenous peoples are usually far less numerous, occupy relatively smaller territories, are not integrated into modern economic and political life, and suffer from extreme socio-economic deprivation. Moreover, their pre-colonial institutions are rarely intact, and even if restored, could not operate across the whole range of spheres of modern life. As we shall see, although the political language surrounding the justification for indigenous rights and the rights of national minorities is often the same (ie, the right to self-determination), these differences shape the scope of their respective rights.

Finally, political theorists often analyze the group rights of religious minorities, and have almost exclusively focused on the insular minorities who lead traditional lifestyles, and severely limit their participation in shared economic and political institutions by choice (eg Amish, Mennonites, Hutterites, and Orthodox Jews). In principle, religious identities are not necessarily ethnic (because of the possibility of conversion) or territorial (because the claims of religious groups often concern in-group relations without a territorial component, for example marriage and divorce). But in practice membership in these religious communities is inherited, and members often live in self-contained rural communities or segregated neighborhoods. This renders religious minorities analogous to national and indigenous minorities, and connotes parallel constitutional strategies for group rights.

3. Group Rights as Collective Rights

Avishai Margalit and Moshe Halbertal describe a group right in terms of the right to culture:

Human beings have a right to culture—not just any culture, but their own. ... A culture essentially requires a group and the right to culture may involve giving groups a status that contradicts the status of the individual in the liberal state. The right to culture may involve a group whose norms cannot be reconciled with the conception of the individual in a liberal society. For example, the group may recognize only arranged marriages and not those resulting from the free choice of the partners.

Margalit and Halbertal’s description sets out the essential, juridical features of a constitutional group right, as conceptualized by political theorists.

First, group rights are held collectively—that is, they are held by the group as a whole. Yael Tamir likewise holds that group rights ‘are bestowed on a collective as a whole rather (p. 1104) than on individual members of the collective’. Even Will Kymlicka, who distinguishes between ‘the rights of communities (as opposed to individuals)’ and ‘community-specific rights’ supposes that both rights are held collectively, and differ only in their scope, with the former encompassing the power to violate individual rights, while the latter not. Moreover, as Allen Buchanan explains, group rights are still held collectively even when individuals have standing to enforce them. For example, the right of individuals to minority language education is legally enforceable by individuals, but (1) only operates when there is a critical mass of minority students to make such institutions viable (and so cannot be enforced by an individual without the existence of a minority community), and (2) also entails a collective right by a minority linguistic community to manage and control those facilities. The bare legal form of a group right may conceal its collective character.
Group Rights in Comparative Constitutional Law: Culture, Economics, or Political Power?

This leads to the second point—that group rights necessitate a procedure for the collective exercise of a right. As James Nickel has argued, inherent in the very idea of group rights is the problem of agency. Broadly speaking, procedures for group agency can be categorized along two dimensions: (1) the degree of institutionalization, and (2) the extent of democracy. Political theorists do not set out a specific concept of agency that applies across all group rights. But they appear to assume that decision-making within indigenous peoples and religious minorities is undemocratic (eg led by unelected religious and/or traditional leaders), although it can vary in its degree of institutionalization. By contrast, there is a tendency to assume that decision-making among minority nations is democratic and highly institutionalized, often in the form of federal subunits or, in the event of secession, an independent state. As we see below, there is a link between the agency issue and the precise character of the internal minority problem.

The third point is the nature of the right. For political theorists, the core group right is decision-making power or jurisdiction over matters that are integral to cultural survival. This translates into a different set of competences by group, depending on the scope of its culture. For minority nations, a culture is built around a common national identity, a shared set of economic and political institutions, and a common language. Accordingly, the group right is a right to autonomy or self-government over policy areas necessary to engage in nation-building, and is very broad, encompassing education at all levels (including the language of instruction), the official language of the public and private sector, and both international and internal immigration. The vehicle for self-government is either a federal subunit with extensive jurisdiction in which the minority nation constitutes a significant majority, or an independent state. Accordingly, some scholars link group rights for minority nations with the right to secession. The link is clearest in national self-determination theories of secession, such as the one set out by Joseph Raz and Avishai Margalit, who argue for the right of a group to statehood in (p. 1105) cases where it is necessary for the viability of that group’s culture. But remedial theories of secession (eg Allen Buchanan’s) in which the right to secede flows from the serious violation of basic human rights (eg genocide) or systematic and enduring discrimination in the distribution of economic and political power can also support a group right for minority nations to statehood, because minority nations are disproportionately likely to be the victims of those wrongs.

In contrast to minority nations, indigenous peoples lack the institutional capacity to exercise extensive rights of self-government over issues integral to cultural survival. As Jacob Levy points out: ‘Their languages have frequently fallen into near or total disuse; the land they occupy is often not their traditional homeland (because of forced population transfers); and sometimes they do not have any discrete territory or homeland at all.’ Accordingly, while indigenous peoples might possess the same interest in cultural integrity as minority nations, political theorists argue for a group right that is far more limited in scope than for minority nations. The territorial base is smaller, and may be too small to constitute a federal subunit. But the substantive focus is the same—cultural integrity—and therefore would encompass the right to live under institutions operating according to traditional modes of governance and decision-making, and with a particular focus on membership, land use, and family law, in order to preserve traditional indigenous lifestyles and communities.

Political theorists also argue that religious communities have constitutional rights to self-government. Unlike for national minorities and indigenous peoples, there is no assumption of territorial jurisdiction (eg religious federalism). The focus has been on non-territorial modes of self-governance over matters that are integral to the survival of distinct religious identities. Principal among these has been personal law, a broad category that encompasses marriage, divorce, child custody and support, and inheritance. Another important area of jurisdiction is education. In addition, since insular religious communities are territorially concentrated, political theorists have sometimes posited that their group rights include control over the character of social and economic rules in their communities—for example, days of rest, public dress codes, and commercial life (eg liquor licensing etc).

Finally, group rights carry with them the power to impose legal duties in exercise of the jurisdiction over cultural autonomy, although they vary with respect to who is subject to the legal duties imposed by groups. On the political theorists’ account of group rights, this varies on the basis of whether jurisdiction is territorial or non-territorial. Territorial jurisdiction—possessed by national minorities and indigenous peoples—extends to anyone within the group’s territory, which in principle includes both members of the group as well as non-members. By contrast, non-territorial jurisdiction—held by religious minorities—extends only to members of the religious community. As I explain below, this difference creates an ambiguity over who constitutes an internal minority that has standing to challenge exercises of group rights for violating individual rights.
4. Group Rights and Internal Minorities

It is often argued that there is an irreconcilable tension at a conceptual level between group and individual rights, because of their conflicting logics. The political theorists’ constitutional model of group rights supplements this abstract claim with an account of how these rights generate legal conflicts in practice. If a constitutional order grants an ethnic group the legal power to preserve its cultural integrity, that group may impose legally binding obligations that may conflict with individual rights protected by a bill of rights. It is this problem which lies at the heart of the political theory literature, which relies on a stock set of recurrent examples to illustrate this point:

(a) National Minorities

Nation-building policies designed to promote the language and cultural identity of a national minority that constitutes a majority, either in a federal subunit or a newly independent state, may conflict with individual rights to freedom of expression and assembly, the right to non-discrimination, and/or rights to participate in the democratic process. Quebec’s language legislation, which seeks to establish French as the common medium of social, political, and economic life, and attempted to do so by establishing French as the sole language of the legislature, the executive, and the courts, by restricting the use of English in advertising and private sector employment, and restricting access to English language education, was attacked on these grounds.

(b) Indigenous Peoples

For indigenous peoples, the two leading examples come from the Pueblo Indians. One concerned the impact of marriage outside the indigenous community on membership. Women who married non-Pueblo lost their membership, whereas men who married non-Pueblo did not, a practice that constitutes discrimination on the basis of sex. The Pueblo also presented an instance of theocracy, with indigenous beliefs constituting an established faith. Pueblo who converted to Christianity and refused to participate in communal activities centered on the celebration of indigenous spiritual traditions were deemed by the group’s leadership to be apostates, and were denied access to public resources, challenged these policies on the grounds of freedom of religion and the right to non-discrimination.

(c) Religious Minorities

The most frequently discussed issue concerns religious personal law, especially the rules governing divorce, property division, and spousal support. Under most systems of religious personal law, women face discrimination on some or all of these issues. The most celebrated example is the Shah Bano case, concerning the inadequate levels of maintenance upon divorce under India’s Muslim personal law, which was attacked for constituting discrimination on the basis of sex. Another issue that has attracted attention is the problem of religious education, in which religious groups assert the right to withdraw their children from state schools and/or to exempt them from a secular curriculum, and instead provide them with a curriculum that reflects religious beliefs in schools under the control of the religious community. The question is whether this infringes the right of children to develop the capacity to exercise free religious choice as adults.

On the political theorists’ account of constitutional order, the conflict between group and individual rights raises two issues. The first issue is whether exercises of group rights are even subject to individual rights entrenched in bills of rights. Some theorists (eg Will Kymlicka) argue that if group rights allow the creation of binding legal obligations irrespective of individual consent, groups wield a power analogous to that wielded by the state. Since the corollary of coercive state power is the obligation to comply with individual rights, exercises of group rights must also comply with bills of rights. This is a point of dispute among political theorists. Chandran Kukathas, for example, argues that groups should be free to violate individual rights, and that the appropriate remedy for individuals to protect their rights is the right to exit from the group, which falls within the scope of the right to liberty. The argument from exit has been attacked along two lines. One response has been to suggest the implausibility of exit, either for children (who lack legal capacity), or for community members for whom the economic, social, and cultural costs of exit from a religious community that is core to their identity are too high. But the main difficulty with this argument is that exit is a corollary of a model of group rights built around private associations, with groups acting in their private capacity and creating binding obligations among individuals who voluntarily associate with a group. While private associations must operate within the general law (eg the criminal law), they are not subject to... bills of rights, which bind coercive public power. The question of whether the application of bills of rights should be extended to private associations is a genuinely hard question, because it pits those rights against the right of freedom of association. But if groups wield coercive public power, the idea that they must presumptively comply with the constraints on public power, including bills of rights, is not a difficult one. The more challenging issue is how to structure the relevant constitutional inquiry, a point that political theorists are silent on, and to which I return toward the end of this chapter.

The second issue is who constitutes an internal minority whose individual rights are at risk through exercises of group rights. This label implies that: (1) groups exercise their rights to create legal obligations that reflect the preferences (as expressed through a democratic process) and/or the norms of the majority of a group (either through a democratic process, or through unelected traditional or religious leaders), and (2) a minority of group members is bound by these obligations and opposes them. However, upon closer examination, who is an internal minority varies depending on whether the group right is non-territorial or territorial. For religious minorities, jurisdiction is structured on a non-territorial basis, and is only applicable to members of the religious group, but not to non-believers. Internal minorities are group members (e.g., women, apostates, religious reformers). By contrast, since national minorities possess territorial jurisdiction, there are two kinds of internal minorities—members of the group and non-members who live within the territory. Indeed, the leading examples of internal minorities opposed to nation-building policies are non-members (e.g., English speakers in Quebec). A parallel situation holds for indigenous peoples, who also possess territorial jurisdiction. While the leading examples of rights-based objections to policies to promote (p. 1108) indigenous identity come from within indigenous communities (e.g., within the Pueblo), this simply reflects the fact that indigenous communities tend to be ethnically homogeneous. But in principle, internal minorities vulnerable to exercises of indigenous rights can consist of both group and non-group members.

The impact on the nature of a group’s jurisdiction on the definition of an internal minority has important implications for how to understand the clash between group and individual rights. Political theorists disagree over whether and the extent to which internal minorities can constrain exercises of group rights that violate individual rights, and have devoted considerable attention to this issue. By contrast, they are in apparent agreement that group rights do not pose any such threat to the rights of individuals in the majority, an issue on which there is surprisingly little commentary. Kymlicka, for example, sets out the distinction between ‘external protections’ and ‘internal restrictions’ as a principle of constitutional design.26 External protections are group rights that protect a minority group from the economic and political decisions of ‘the larger society’ or ‘other groups’, supplement but do not restrict individual rights, and are accordingly permitted. Internal restrictions are directed at ‘a group against its own members’, entail ‘restricting individual rights’, and are prohibited. These definitions bundle together (1) the target of the exercise of a group right (external restrictions apply to non-members, internal restrictions apply to members) and (2) the effect of that exercise on individual rights (external restrictions do not infringe individual rights, whereas internal restrictions do). But the relationship between the targets of the exercise of a group right and its effect on individual rights will depend on the nature of a group’s jurisdiction. If a group’s jurisdiction is non-territorial, and hence limited to its own members, the exercise of a group right cannot violate the rights of non-members. But if its jurisdiction is territorial, it clearly can. Language laws (e.g., those in Quebec and Catalonia) are a well-known example. Another example would be rules governing land alienation in areas governed by indigenous peoples. Under the Malaysian and Indian Constitutions, federal subunits or areas within subunits dominated by indigenous peoples have the constitutional power to restrict the alienation of land, in order to stem in-migration by non-indigenous persons and to preserve the indigenous character of the region.27 These restrictions on land ownership collide with the right to mobility and right to non-discrimination of members of the majority. So as a descriptive matter, political theorists cannot argue that non-members do not face the risk of having their individual rights violated by the exercise of group rights. Moreover, as we shall see, expanding the range of persons whose rights are at stake to encompass non-members is part of a broader strategy to pierce behind the veil of the claim that exercises of group rights are always genuinely rooted in the protection of cultural difference.

III. Group Rights in Comparative Constitutional Law

So this is the constitutional image of group rights that is presupposed by political theorists, and which shapes contemporary constitutional debates over group rights. But if we turn to the actual comparative constitutional law of group rights, a picture emerges which is at odds with this picture along every dimension. According to this counter-narrative: (1) group rights are a response to political mobilization not only on issues of cultural survival, but around the unequal distribution of economic resources and opportunities, the unequal enjoyment of public services, and unequal access to political power; (2) group rights are claimed by a broad variety of groups, including territorially dispersed minorities and groups that may constitute a majority in the state; (3) in addition to rights to self-government or autonomy, group rights relate to political power, and are designed to ensure representation and participation in common institutions, take a broad variety of forms (exemptions, accommodations, guaranteed representation, difference-conscious but facially neutral rules), arise in a variety of institutional contexts (electoral system design, political party regulation, legislative voting rules, the structure of political executive, courts), are usually not held and exercised by groups acting as a corporate entity, and are sometimes best understood as mechanisms to incorporate a group perspective into collective decision-making; and (4) these group rights produce a variety of conflicts with the individual rights of group members and non-members that are materially different from the kinds of rights violations that the political theorists’ constitutional image of group rights would suggest.

1. Demands for Group Rights are Rooted Not Just in Claims to Protect Culture

Political theorists assume that demands for group rights flow from political mobilization to protect and promote distinct cultural identities, which in turns shapes the content of those rights. However, in contemporary constitutional politics, conflict among ethnic groups, even where culture is both a subjective and objective marker of group difference, is not necessarily about culture. Indeed, the comparative politics literature on politics in deeply divided societies has long understood ethnic conflict to arise out of: (1) competition over economic opportunities, (2) the equal enjoyment of public services, and (3) the distribution of political power, which underpins points (1) and (2). The relationship of these conflicts to cultural conflict is complex and highly variable.

First, consider the material roots of group conflict, which have suffered from comparative neglect in normative political theory. To be sure, nation-building by national minorities concerns questions of identity, and involves the promotion of an official history and culture to create a subnational identity. But the centerpiece of minority nationalism is official language policy. The designation of a language as official certainly has an important bearing on cultural survival. If a language is the official language of the state and therefore attracts the state’s support for its use as the medium of cultural life, it thereby privileges the cultural identities that are associated with that language, and disadvantages those that are not. But official language status also operates to distribute economic opportunities. The designation of a language as the official internal working language of the public sector distributes employment opportunities in favor of those fluent in the language, and disadvantages native speakers of other languages. Moreover, the internal working language of government has a network externality effect on the language of the private sector. The same holds true for the language of higher education. And so political competition among language groups over official language policy, framed in the language of group rights, is often fuelled by economic competition, not claims for cultural respect and recognition. In comparative constitutional law, perhaps the leading example of economically-driven constitutional change rooted in group conflict is the redrawing of state boundaries on a linguistic basis in post-independence India. This was largely driven by disputes over official language policy and its impact over public sector employment within multilingual states among speakers of different languages.\(^\text{(p. 1110)}\)

Cultural difference may also serve to demarcate economic hierarchies and divisions of labor, apart from and outside the public sector. In many countries, national governments have undertaken projects of internal settlement, to encourage the migration of members of the ethnic majority into less populated areas occupied by minority groups. Contemporary China furnishes many examples of this kind of policy, with the vast internal migration of Han Chinese into Xinjiang and Tibet.\(^\text{(p. 1109)}\) On a culturalist interpretation, the primary motivation behind internal settlement is cultural nationalism, and its objective cultural assimilation. But the goal underlying the promotion of Han migration is economic modernization through the integration of the periphery into the national economy through the development of natural resources and/or industrialization in urban areas. What Han migrants encounter is not just a different culture, but also different, traditional modes of economic production. The conflicts that have arisen from this mass migration are not just about cultural difference, but also competing economic models which distribute opportunities unequally. An urban, market, industrial economy values literacy and formal education much more than an agricultural or pastoral economy, and these employment attributes are distributed unequally across different ethnic groups. There may be cultural consequences to economic competition. Cultural practices which may be centered in rural communities and underpinned by agricultural and pastoral lifestyles may be threatened by economic modernization. But the ethnic conflict given rise to by economic transitions is primarily about distribution, not about culture. While the case of contemporary China presents a situation where Han migrants may eventually outnumber the local majority, the same dynamic may come into play with the migration of small, literate elite minorities. A leading example would be the migration of Bengalis into Assam in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.30

Ethnic conflict is often rooted in controversies over unequal access to public services. A core complaint of minority groups is that the state discriminates in the distribution of primary social goods in the Rawlsian sense, particularly liberty, opportunity, income, and wealth. The focus is not educational policy or family law—the principal arenas of group conflict identified by political theorists—but public programs that are far removed from questions of cultural identity and survival, such as the criminal justice system, the provision of infrastructure, and the welfare state. There are two kinds of situations here. First, public services or expenditure may be administered in a discriminatory fashion. While cultural antipathy may fuel discrimination, the dispute between minority and majority groups over public services is not an instance of cultural conflict. The claim is not that cultural difference must be taken into account in the delivery of these programs, but rather that those programs be administered without distinction on the basis of cultural difference—a traditional but powerful claim of formal equality. A leading example of this kind of political dynamic is Northern Ireland, where the Roman Catholic (Nationalist) minority long suffered systemic discrimination in public housing and employment at the hand of institutions dominated by the Protestant (Unionist) majority.31 The demand was for not cultural rights (eg on questions of religion), but in the first instance, for non-discriminatory treatment. Secondly, cultural difference may serve as a barrier to the equal enjoyment of public services, which leads to demands for modifications in the design of public services. The main cultural difference that impedes equal enjoyment of public services is language. An example of this is in Belgium where in 2007, the Flemish Minister of the Interior Government refused to appoint three French-speaking mayors in Flemish municipalities, despite their being democratically elected. The municipalities in which they were elected had a large number of French-speaking inhabitants as well as special language arrangements (‘linguistic facilities’) entitling those inhabitants to request that French be used in their dealings with public authorities (even though the official language of these municipalities is Dutch). The Minister refused to appoint the three mayors on the basis that they had communicated with French-speaking electors in French and had allowed members of their municipal council to use French during their meetings.32 The goods whose unequal distribution fuels conflict in this case is not primarily respect or recognition, but the ability to enjoy equal and effective access to public services, such as health care.

Finally, ethnic conflict among culturally distinct groups may concern the distribution of political power. As a large body of research in comparative politics has demonstrated, in a divided society, where ethnic identity is the principal basis of political mobilization, ethnic diversity translates into political division, and fosters the rise of ethnic political parties. Whereas in a polity in which cultural differences have not become the principal axis of political cleavage, minorities form part of shifting majority coalitions who compete for their support, in a divided polity, political competition occurs across, not within groups. The result is a process of ethnic outbidding that produces a flight to the political extremes, and dampens the incentives for moderation and cross-ethnic political cooperation. Ethnic groups may be systematically excluded from public power in one of two kinds of situations. The clearest case is where there is a dominant majority group, and an ethnic minority that is frozen out of power in perpetuity—for example, as is the case in most of the countries of Eastern and Central Europe. This problem also arises in an ethnically fractured polity with no clear majority, which may offer greater opportunities for groups to wield power as members of a governing coalition, but which nonetheless face the prospect of exclusion for a lengthy period. Groups that are perpetual losers in the political process may demand group rights that guarantee them access to political power.

There is a fundamental link between the systematic exclusion of groups from political power and the various non-cultural roots of group conflict. Ultimately, conflicts arising from economic competition and unequal access to public services are rooted in public policy decisions. And so not surprisingly, alongside questions of cultural integrity and survival, it is these issues that are at the heart of the platforms of ethnic political parties, which compete on the basis of their ability to ensure that their members secure public sector employment, profit from the economic opportunities made possible by decisions regarding economic development, and have their needs met in the design and delivery of public services. The ability of a political party to protect its group’s interests in these spheres will be a direct function of its political power. So political power in institutions that make these decisions is perhaps the most basic constitutional demand of ethnic groups.
2. Group Rights are Demanded by a Diverse Set of Groups

In addition to broadening our understanding of the sources of ethnic conflict, we also need to broaden the range of groups who claim constitutional rights as groups. The political theorists’ constitutional model of group rights focuses on the claims of two kinds of territorially concentrated groups, national minorities and indigenous groups, as well as insular religious groups that are not territorially dispersed. However, contemporary constitutional politics reveals a broader range of cultural groups that voice constitutional claims for group rights.

First, there are ethnic minorities that are territorially dispersed, who live among members of the ethnic majority or other groups from which they are culturally distinct, but where the principal point of cleavage is not religion.33 Consider a few examples. In some cases, the point of cleavage is on the question of national identity, and the ethnic minority makes claims to self-determination, but it is not territorially concentrated and is therefore incapable of asserting claims to federalism and self-government. Northern Ireland again provides an example.34 Although the communities use the labels Protestant and Roman Catholic to name themselves, the principal point of dispute is over national identification, not religion. In another set of cases, the members of a territorially concentrated ethnic minority do not dispute a shared national identity with their fellow citizens, but nonetheless frame their political claims in the language of group rights. For example, Croatia contains a dizzying area of ethnic minorities which have all demanded and been accorded group rights (see below): Serbs, Hungarians, Italians, Czechs, Slovaks, Austrians, Bulgarians, Germans, Poles, Roma, Romanians, Ruthenians, Russian Turks, Ukrainians, Vlachs, Jews, Albanians, Bosniaks, Montenegrins, Macedonians, and Slovenes. While it is true that many of these minorities belong to groups with states of their own, their demands are not for secession or federalism. In contemporary constitutional practice, there is a distinction between ‘minorities’—communities with a long-standing presence in the state that often predates the state’s creation—and more recently arrived immigrants.35 In yet other cases, the group is a subgroup within a larger community, such as the Scheduled Castes (also known as ‘untouchables’) in India, who occupy a subordinate position both outside and below the Hindu caste system that reinforces their social and economic deprivation, but who claim equal status within Hinduism.

Secondly, group rights are asserted not only by national minorities, but also by national majorities, even though they are not vulnerable to being outvoted on decisions as a minority would be. The majority may have lacked political power historically because power lay in the hands of an ethnic minority within the same state. Consider Belgium, where for most of the nineteenth century, a French-speaking minority that established French as the common language of economic and political life dominated Belgium. The story of twentieth century Belgium has been the demand by the Flemish majority for the reconfiguration of the Belgian state, which is now a highly decentralized and layered federation of three linguistic regions and three linguistic communities, each of which privileges a sole official language in political institutions and public administration. While the Flemish constitute a majority, they nonetheless view these policies as exercises of a group right to create economic and political (p. 1113) institutions that operate in Flemish. They invoke the language of group rights to justify a range of nation-building policies regarding the privileging of the group’s identity in national symbols, place names, official history, and the choice of official language in a manner identical to how a minority group would—that is, as a defensive response to majority nation-building, even though the creation of statehood has eliminated that risk. They are sometimes described as ‘minoritized majorities’. Indeed, in Brussels and the French-speaking parts of Belgium, they do constitute a minority, and assert rights that flow from that status.36

3. Group Rights and Representation

At their core, many if not most group rights in contemporary constitutional law are designed to redress inequalities in those groups’ access to political power. Group rights can be further divided into arrangements for self-rule and shared rule. The political theorists’ image of constitutional law has been doubly narrow—in emphasizing shared rule over self-rule, and in emphasizing the protection of cultural integrity as the principal driver for self-rule arrangements. Constitutional practice illustrates how it needs to be expanded along both dimensions.

Arrangements for both territorial and non-territorial forms of self-rule protect members of a group from being outvoted on questions on important public policy, or from the discriminatory application and enforcement of government policies. Of these two, federal arrangements have commanded the greatest attention, because they have been offered as a mechanism for dampening or diffusing secessionist conflict, where the very existence of the state is at issue. Many states in the developing world have adopted federal arrangements to manage group conflict, such as India, Ethiopia, Iraq, and Nigeria. Moreover, the advocacy of federalism as a tool for managing group conflict continues to gather momentum around the globe. In South Asia, federalism has been advocated as a solution for group conflict in Nepal, Pakistan, and Sri Lanka. Federalism has also been proposed as a remedy to the frozen conflicts of the former Soviet Union: Armenia, Azerbaijan, Georgia, Abkhazia, South Ossetia, and Nagorno Karabach. In these cases, countries where federalism has been used to manage group conflict, such as Canada, Belgium, and Spain, are used as positive models of comparative constitutional experience, whereas the failed federations of Eastern and Central Europe—the Soviet Union, the Czech Republic, and Yugoslavia—have been held up as examples of how federalism can fuel, not dampen secession. As I have argued elsewhere, ultimately federalism dampens the secession in democratic states whereas it seems to not have done so in non-democratic states.\textsuperscript{37}

Halberstam, in Chapter 27 of this volume, addresses the full geographic range and diversity of existing federal arrangements, including in countries where federalism has been used to manage group conflict, so I will not dwell on those institutional details in this chapter. For present purposes, what bears emphasis is that the root of demands for federal arrangements are often not cultural, but material, and turn on disputes over public sector employment, the uneven impact of economic modernization, and discrimination in public expenditure and public services. For example, in India, three new states were created in 2000—Uttarakhand, Jharkhand, and Chhattisgarh—out of the existing states of Uttar Pradesh, Bihar, and Madhya Pradesh, respectively.\textsuperscript{38} An official ideology has built up around each state which emphasizes its distinct history and cultural identity, which supports an argument that the political movements for these states were framed around demands for respect and recognition. But at the root of the demands was not cultural difference or threats to cultural integrity, but rather, the allegation that these regions suffered from neglect in public expenditure and in public sector employment at the hands of a state government controlled by political elites whose electoral base and clientilistic networks were based in another part of the state. In parallel fashion, once new federal subunits have been created, we should be skeptical about the invocation of culture as the justification for particular exercises of a group right to self-government.

While self-rule in general, and federalism in particular, has dominated the constitutional image of group rights, there is a dense constitutional practice on the question of redressing inequalities in access to shared rule. These inequalities arise from the unequal impact of facially neutral rules that either (1) do not evince an intention to disadvantage political participation by a group, or (2) may be designed with this intent in mind. These concerns arise in a variety of institutional contexts, including electoral system design, political party regulation, legislative voting rules, the structure of political executive, and the courts. Although the institutional settings in which this concern arises vary, group rights for political power tend to take one of a standard set of forms: exemptions, accommodations, or new facially neutral rules that are group-conscious—that is, that are chosen because their effect is to promote the interests of minority groups.\textsuperscript{39}

Consider electoral systems, which translate votes into the allocation of legislative seats. Many features of electoral system design can operate to the political disadvantage of minority groups. For example, under systems of proportional representation, high thresholds disadvantage parties that appeal to a relatively narrow electoral base. In Turkey, for example, the 10 percent threshold has operated to the disadvantage of political parties that represent the Kurdish minority, which cannot meet that threshold because of their size.\textsuperscript{40} Comparative constitutional law provides a variety of models of ‘group right’ that could promote legislative representation by Kurdish parties. It could be a group-specific exemption, such as those that exist in Germany for elections to the Bundestag, and the legislatures of Brandenburg and Schleswig-Holstein, which waive the 5 percent threshold for parties representing national minorities.\textsuperscript{41} It may consist of an accommodation, such as the creation of reserved seats for the Kurdish minority, modeled along the lines for reserved seats for the Italian and Hungarian minorities in Slovenia.\textsuperscript{42} Alternatively, the legislative representation of Kurdish parties could be promoted through a facially neutral rule that does not distinguish on the basis of group identity. For example, the numerical threshold could be lowered to 5 percent, or it could even be eliminated entirely (as was done in South Africa in order to promote the inclusion of minority parties).\textsuperscript{43}

Constituency systems subject to plurality voting can be analyzed in a parallel manner, and are amenable to a parallel set of responses. Constituency systems produce disproportionality\textsuperscript{44} between votes cast and seat count, which in a divided polity can disadvantage parties representing minority groups in securing legislative seats. In part, this may be a function of the delineation of electoral boundaries, which can impede the election of representatives from minority parties if they do not constitute a sufficiently large group in an electoral district.
Group Rights in Comparative Constitutional Law: Culture, Economics, or Political Power?

There are a number of constitutional strategies available to remedy this disadvantage. Within the constituency system, an accommodation would entail the redrawing of constituency boundaries in order to enhance the minority group’s voting power, as has been done in favor of African Americans in the United States. Alternatively, legislative districts could be reserved for candidates from a minority group, as has been done in India, where 120 of the 543 seats in Parliament can only be contested by members of the Scheduled Castes or Scheduled Tribes, although elections are held on the basis of a universal voters’ roll. A facially neutral mechanism to enhance the representation of minority groups that attacks the issue of disproportionality directly would be to move away from a pure constituency system, to a mixed electoral system (eg mixed-member proportional or MMP) or a system of proportional representation, as occurred in Northern Ireland in order to overcome the persistent election of Protestant majorities.

These examples raise a number of important points. In contemporary constitutional politics, groups may refer to the whole range of these policies as ‘group rights’. However, they vary greatly in their juridical structure. Thus, an exemption leaves a facially neutral rule in place, but holds it inapplicable to groups. Accommodations, by contrast, require positive measures that exist alongside a facially neutral rule. Both exemptions and accommodations, however, incorporate group identity into their very structure, because only group members and the parties that represent them, not voters or political parties at large, can invoke them. By contrast, a group right may entail the adoption of new facially neutral rules that are group-conscious—that is, that are chosen because their effect is to promote the interests of minority groups. To be sure, changes such as lowering thresholds, or moving to a proportional representation system, would benefit all small political parties, not merely those that represent groups. However, these constitutional practices may be primarily identified as measures to enhance group representation, and may give rise to a defensive constitutional politics that resists amendments to those practices because of their deleterious effects on groups. This is even true for electoral rules not initially adopted to protect groups, but which come to take on this function. For example, the tendency of constituency-based electoral systems toward disproportionality hurts parties representing minority groups except for regional minorities. In Canada, this has benefited the Quebec nationalist party, the Bloc Quebecois, and has fuelled resistance to proposals toward MMP.

Political party regulations provide another illustration of how facially neutral rules may be nonetheless viewed as a form of group right, against the backdrop of a divided political community and in comparison to another facially neutral rule that disadvantages political parties that represent minority groups. There are three kinds of regulations that are relevant: substantive policy bans, national scope requirements, and ethnic party bans. Substantive policy bans flow from the idea of militant democracy, which prohibits anti-democratic parties (eg in Germany, Poland, and Spain). In divided societies, constitutions may prohibit political parties from advocating issues that may lie at the very heart of a group’s political agenda. In Turkey, for example, the Constitution bans political parties that challenge the state’s territorial integrity, the idea of a single nation, equality, and national sovereignty. This has been a barrier to the formation of political parties that seek to represent the interests of the Kurdish minority by campaigning on a platform that promotes the idea of Turkey as a partnership between two nations, Turkish and Kurdish, that Turkey should be restructured as a federation and be officially bilingual, and that the Kurdish-majority portions of the country should have the right to secede. A national scope requirement is designed to encourage the formation of state-wide parties, and has a comparable effect on parties that represent small territorially dispersed groups or large groups that are territorially dispersed. For example, Russia requires political parties to have regional offices in at least 50 percent of Russia’s regions, and that each regional chapter have 500 members. Finally, many jurisdictions ban ethnic parties—indeed, on paper, at least 40 of 48 countries in Sub-Saharan Africa do so. Given that minority groups create political parties when they feel they cannot advance their interests through existing parties, this is the most direct form of regulatory constraint.

These policies can be attacked on two grounds. The first sounds in liberty, and argues that these restraints interfere with the liberal freedoms of speech and association. The second sounds in equality, and highlights that these restrictions are unequal in their impact on majority and minority groups. In divided polities, substantive policy bans protect constitutional provisions that entrench the policy positions of the majority from democratic contestation, national scope requirements do not affect majorities who are able to politically organize across the state, and ethnic party bans do not prevent majority groups from dominating parties that are formally not ethnic in character. The constitutional claim for a ‘group right’ is for a facially neutral rule that provides the space for minority groups to form their own parties, to advance positions on any issue, and to be able to operate in only part of the state. Indeed, this claim combines the arguments from equality and liberty, and can be understood as the demand for a rule that allows for the equal enjoyment of basic liberal freedoms across groups. The model would be the constitutional practice in Spain, Belgium, and Canada, where such legal restrictions on political parties do not exist. As for the case of electoral rules, these rules do not take the legal form of a group right, and the potential beneficiaries of these changes would not be limited to minority groups. Nonetheless, in constitutional politics these permissions are perceived as rights in those polities where they exist, and are framed in such terms in response to proposals to eliminate them.

Claims of group rights for minorities are often made with respect to legislatures and political executives. Indeed, for Arend Lijphart and those writing in the consociational tradition, this is the primary locus of power-sharing among ethnic groups. The goal is to ensure that electoral success and legislative representation translates into genuine political power. It is often assumed that the only constitutional mechanisms are accommodations that expressly empower groups through the design of: (1) legislative voting rules and (2) the constitution and decision-making of political executives. An example of the former is found in Belgium, where legislators must self-identify as French or Flemish, and many laws related to Belgium's linguistic divide can only be passed when half of each linguistic group is present, by a double major. Belgium's double-majority rules have inspired similar provisions in the Constitutions of Bosnia-Herzegovina, Kosovo, and Macedonia. There are many examples of the latter. Belgium's Constitution mandates equal representation of French and Flemish speakers, although the French are a demographic minority. In Switzerland, the federal executive is headed by a seven-member Federal Council, which is selected on the basis of a simple majority vote of the two federal legislative chambers. On its own, this would ensure the dominance of the German majority, but according to the ‘magic formula’—a long-standing political tradition, now underpinned by a constitutional provision—non-Germans receive two seats on the Federal Council. In Bosnia-Herzegovina and Northern Ireland, by contrast, the mandated group representation is limited to the head of the executive branch. In the former, there is a three-person collective presidency consisting of a Serb, a Croat, and a Bosniak, each directly elected. In the latter, the First Minister and Deputy First Minister are elected as a pair by an overall majority of the legislative assembly, and a double majority of Roman Catholic and Protestant members, which in effect requires a Protestant First Minister and a Roman Catholic Deputy First Minister.

But with respect to legislatures and executives, there is a role for facially neutral rules that are adopted with the express intent of protecting group interests, which are understood in constitutional politics to be a form of group right. Thus, in the place of the family of double-majority rules that proceeds from the labeling of legislators as belonging to different ethnic groups, one can substitute super-majority requirements to achieve the same end. In a parallel fashion, party standing in the legislature, as opposed to ethnic representation, can determine cabinet membership. For example, in Northern Ireland, cabinet seats are allocated through the d'Hondt formula, which was expressly adopted with the purpose of ensuring minority group representation. The possibility of facially neutral, yet difference-conscious alternatives to accommodations that incorporate group identity into their very structure raises questions about the trade-offs between these options. Arend Lijphart usefully contrasted these two families of constitutional strategies as pre-determination versus self-determination, which has been helpfully recast by McGarry, O'Leary, and Simeon as a difference between liberal and corporate approaches to protecting group rights. On the corporate conception, constitutional rules predetermine which groups are to be the beneficiaries of group rights, and carry with them assumptions about the political sociology of group membership—that is, assuming that the boundaries between groups are clear, that groups are internally homogeneous, and that group membership is immutable. Moreover, privileging ascriptive identities may not simply reflect preexisting patterns of political mobilization, but will create political incentives to mobilize on that basis, and disincentives to mobilize on other grounds, such as class. For the same reason, these rules will empower existing group leaders. By contrast, the liberal conception permits, but does not require, group identity to serve as the basis of political identity. It allows for a different understanding of group identity, where boundaries between groups are not clear, where groups are internally diverse, and membership is mutable or even unimportant. Moreover, it allows for shifting patterns of political mobilization over time, and creates the institutional space for non-group-based modes of politics to arise.

As we shall see, the distinction between liberal and corporate forms of group rights is at the heart of the various objections leveled at group rights to political participation in the name of individual rights, and holds open the door to resolving or diffusing them. But if we put that distinction to one side for the moment, on either the liberal or corporate account, the structure of these rights does not square with the claim that group rights are usually not... held and exercised by groups acting as a collective entity. The key point is the role of political parties as the mediating institution between groups and legislatures. Within each group, parties compete for electoral support, which tends to produce intra-group cleavages. There is no singular entity that speaks for the group as a whole, but rather, a set of parties who vie for that role. A useful contrast can be drawn between the recognition of a single, official group institution, such as its religious leadership. Moreover, these questions of group agency become even more complex when one factors in how political executives are composed. McGarry, O’Leary, and Simeon contrast complete consociations consisting of a grand coalition representing all major groups, a concurrent consociation with representatives of the majority of each group, and plurality consociations in which at least a plurality of each group is represented in the political executive.63 Whereas the leaders of different groups could lay claim to speaking on behalf of the group as a whole in complete consociations, they cannot do so in either concurent or pluralist consociations.

In sum, the premise behind group rights regarding political participation is that it enables minority groups to shape decisions that affect a variety of interests, takes a variety of forms, and applies across a broad variety of institutional contexts. However, it does not necessarily entail in every situation that group representatives who hold public office will necessarily partake in the direct exercise of political power. This will often be the case for minority legislators from smaller communities, whose numbers are too small to give them sufficient leverage to wield decisive legislative power or secure representation in the political executive. The interesting question is whether there is nonetheless a way of understanding minority representation to be of value. We can come at this from another direction—the notion of a group right to minority representation on a constitutional court.64 Minority groups may demand this right because the various forms of group right to political participation may require judicial enforcement, and/or are open to competing interpretations. However, there are two kinds of group right at play.
The first is to reserve to groups the power of appointment. For example, in Kosovo, the appointment of two of the nine members of the Constitutional Court requires the approval of a double majority of all members and those holding seats guaranteed to minority groups.65 In Bosnia-Herzegovina, the power of appointment rests with ethnically controlled constituent units, so that the Serb Republic appoints two judges, the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina (which is dominated by Croats and Bosniaks) appoints four, with the remaining three appointed by the President of the European Court of Human Rights.66 This is an indirect method of ensuring a court that includes judges from minority groups. The second is to mandate group composition directly. In Belgium, for example, it is required that the 12-person Constitutional Court consist of an equal number of French and Flemishspeaking judges.67 In Canada, there is a requirement that three of the nine judges be from Quebec, which has been understood to require at least two of those judges to be from the French-speaking minority.68

What is interesting is that in all of these cases, courts make their judgments through simple majority vote—as opposed to a decision-rule that empowers judges from minority groups, such as a super-majority or double-majority requirement. But this type of representation is valuable, for reasons offered by Anne Phillips.69 Anne Phillips has argued in favor of these policies under the rubric of a politics of presence. For Phillips, the value of guaranteeing representation of historically excluded groups is the increased likelihood that they will be particularly alert to the interests of their communities, and how they are affected by public policies, and will advance arguments and adduce evidence that the majority is less likely to do. The claim is that in the process of legislative deliberation, these arguments may resonate with members of the majority, who will be persuaded by the strength of the reasons and evidence offered. Phillips’s institutional focus is the legislature, but can be extended to the judiciary. On constitutional questions which go to the very nature of citizenship and identity in a multi-ethnic state, judges from excluded groups bring to bear arguments and evidence that draw upon their experience, in order to persuade their fellow judges from outside the community.

4. Group Rights versus Individual Rights

Recasting the nature of group rights forces us to reframe the conflict between individual and group rights. Although these conflicts still exist, their character is different. I approach this issue by setting out the standard method for rights-based adjudication that has taken root in most constitutional systems. Most individual rights are not absolute, and can give way to competing considerations, and most constitutional systems use the doctrine of proportionality as the juridical framework for the limitation of individual rights. Exercises of group rights count as a form of public power, and are assessed in the same way. The conflict between individual and exercises of group rights can play out at two different stages of a proportionality analysis: (1) the permissibility of limiting an individual right through the exercise of a group right in order to protect or promote a distinct cultural identity, and (2) the proportionality of the means for doing so.

If we examine contemporary constitutional politics, we can set a preliminary (and no doubt incomplete) taxonomy of the kinds of conflicts that arise between particular exercises of group rights and individual rights. As we shall see, these conflicts are quite different from the kinds of examples that preoccupy political theorists. For each, I will identify the stage of the proportionality analysis at which they would appear to play out (ie, legitimate purposes and/or proportionate means).

(a) Group Rights Discriminate Against Non-Members

As we saw earlier, for political theorists, group rights are external protections that do not violate the rights of non-members. But the notion of an internal minority is misleading in cases where groups possess territorial jurisdiction, because there are non-members who are subject to particular exercises of group rights. Consider the following examples. In Nigeria, states have come to be identified with specific ethnic groups, and many states only hire individuals of that state who are ‘indigenes’ of that state for the civil service. Individuals are considered indigenes if they are members of an ethnic group indigenous to the state, and have an official certificate that authenticates their status. The effect is that long-term residents, whose families may have lived in the state for many generations, may not qualify as indigenes, and are effectively barred from public sector employment. These hiring policies violate the right to equality. The main question under proportionality is what the actual motive underlying these policies is. They are defended as instruments to protect the distinct cultural character of states, often coupled with a claim of redressing historic disadvantage. However, the material motivations underlying demands for group rights in general, counsels a degree of skepticism about this stated objective. This skepticism is reinforced by the broad nature of these preferences, which are not targeted at disadvantaged individuals. Taken together, they suggest that the policy may be a form of economic self-dealing by political insiders. A second example concerns restrictions on land alienation. The Malaysian Constitution has exempted the states of Sabah and Sarawak from the right to equality, to allow them to restrict sales of private and public lands to native inhabitants, and to reserve lands to native inhabitants. The exercise of this group right would be a form of internal restriction, because it fetters the right of members to alienate property to outsiders. But (contra political theorists) it also limits the rights of non-members to equality and mobility, because they are barred from entering into transactions with insiders and taking up residence in that territory. Non-members lack the political power to check those rules because of their non-resident status, which those very rules perpetuate. The question is what the objective of this policy is. The economic roots of many conflicts over migration, settlement, and economic development argue for circumspection regarding the claim that these policies are strictly designed to preserve the cultural character of a district.

(b) Under-Inclusiveness of Group Rights

Another set of conflicts between group rights to political representation and individual representation arises if those policies are under-inclusive. For example, Poland's electoral law exempts parties representing ‘national minorities’ from its 5 percent threshold. This exemption from a facially neutral rule is a group right, and is understood in constitutional politics in these terms. Under Polish law, there are nine officially recognized national minorities who can legally claim the benefit of this exemption: Belorussians, Czechs, Lithuanians, Germans, Armenians, Russians, Slovaks, Ukrainians, and Jews. Omitted from this list are Silesians, who assert their status as a national minority. Arguably, the exclusion of Silesians is a violation of the right to equality. The question is what the rationale is for denying official recognition to the Silesian minority. Polish authorities accept the existence of a Silesian ethnic minority, but argue that it lacks national consciousness. Indeed, to grant it national minority status when it does not warrant it would constitute discrimination against other groups, and create the perverse incentive for them to claim national minority status, which could fragment Polish democratic politics. However, there is another possible explanation—the existence of a Silesian autonomy movement, which seeks an autonomous or independent Silesia. The unstated, yet barely, reasons for the government's stance is that Silesians do in fact possess national consciousness, and the fear that permitting a Silesian party to contest elections would facilitate political mobilization toward federalism and eventually secession, a threat not posed by any officially recognized minority. Let us consider both objectives under a proportionality analysis. For the first objective, there is a mismatch between the system of granting exemptions for national minorities, and the fear that such a system might encourage the proliferation of ethnic political parties. A mismatch between means and ends is indicative of a colorable motive. But taking the motive at face value, a proportionate alternative to this corporate consociational arrangement would be a facially neutral regime with a lower threshold or none at all. If the purpose is to stem secessionist mobilization per se, that is an impermissible purpose. A legitimate objective would be to prevent violent secessionist mobilization, which can be targeted directly by prohibiting political parties that advocate violence (as in Spain).

Another form of under-inclusion is to create distinctions among groups that hold group rights. Consider the long-standing constitutional dispute in Belgium over the BHV electoral district. Belgium’s House of Representatives is elected on the basis of regional proportional representation, with separate lists for each constituency. There are 11 constituencies in total—five in (French-speaking) Wallonia, five in (Flemish-speaking) Flanders, and Brussels (which is in Flanders, but is a separate electoral district because of its large French-speaking population). The political party system is fractured along linguistic lines, with parties only fielding lists in their linguistic region. Moreover, parties do not attempt to collect votes outside of their linguistic zones, because the numbers of voters (e.g. French in Flanders, Flemish in Wallonia) would be too small to elect a representative. So linguistic minorities in practice must vote for a party operating in the majority language of the region. The one exception is BHV, an electoral district that combines Brussels with surrounding areas (HV) with a significant French-speaking population that are in Flanders and which would otherwise be in a Flemish constituency. Since French parties field candidates in Brussels, this allows French-speakers to cast votes for French parties, and for French parties to collect votes in Flanders. However, the converse is not true. Flemish nationalists object to this arrangement as discriminatory. Under a proportionality analysis, the questions would be the purpose served by the BHV constituency, and the proportionate alternatives to meeting this objective. If the objective is a legitimate one—to enable linguistic minorities to cast votes for parties from their language group—the question would be whether comparable arrangements can be made for the Flemish minority in the border regions of Wallonia. This would be a corporate consociational alternative; a liberal one would be to have a single, Belgium-wide electoral district in which all parties could compete.\textsuperscript{73}

\textbf{(c) Compelled Identification and Association}

Under some systems of group rights to political participation, the right of individuals to participate in elections requires that they self-identify as members of an ethnic group. Consider two examples.

Under the Cypriot electoral system, there are separate communal electoral rolls for the Greek and Turkish communities. This creates two parallel elections, each contested by two sets of parties which do not attempt to collect votes across the ethnic divide. In addition, there are three smaller Christian communities in Cyprus, the Armenians, the Maronites, and the Latins, who are not members of either community, and which are constitutionally recognized as religious groups. Article 2(3) of the Cyprus Constitution required those groups, within three months of Cypriot independence in 1960 to collectively join either the Greek or Turkish communities, the consequence of which is inclusion in its electoral roll.\textsuperscript{74} Individuals have a right of opt-out, but are then deemed to belong to the other community in its electoral roll. Turks and Greeks do not have any choice of the electoral roll to which they belong. The province of Bolzano in Italy has a similar electoral system. Bolzano is home to three linguistic communities—Italian, German, and Ladin-speakers. Political offices are allocated across the three linguistic communities. In order to hold elected office, individuals must self-identify with a linguistic community and stand for election as a member of that group. Unlike in Cyprus, individuals can choose to be unaffiliated. But if they do so, they are ineligible to stand for office (although they may still vote).\textsuperscript{75}

Both electoral systems require individuals to declare an ethnic identity, and condition their political rights (the right to vote, and/or the right to run for office) on that basis. Individuals who wish to exercise these rights unmediated by group membership have no ability to do so. Through the lens of individual rights, these arrangements can be objected to on three grounds—compelled identification, freedom of association, and discrimination. In Cyprus, individuals must identify themselves as members of a political community in order to exercise their rights to vote and stand for office; in Italy, group identification is a precondition to running for election. Compelled identification can be understood as a form of compelled expression, or as a violation of the right to privacy. The argument from freedom of association for members for the Greek and Turkish communities in Cyprus, and for all linguistic communities in Bolzano, would be this: the structure of the electoral systems compels political associations (i.e., political parties) among co-ethnics and, conversely, prohibits or erects severe barriers to inter-ethnic or non-ethnic political parties. In addition, for the religious minorities in Cyprus, the argument would be the opposite—that it... prohibits political associations among co-ethnics, and compels them to associate across inter-ethnic lines. The argument from discrimination builds on both of these lines of analysis: persons who do not wish to identify with an ethnic group enjoy unequal political rights relative to those that do (and for religious minorities in Cyprus, those who wish to identify with group members for political purposes cannot). These systems of group rights are designed to protect the political representation of minorities—Turks in Cyprus, and German and Ladin-speakers in Bolzano—a legitimate objective. The question is whether the means are proportional. Again, the possibility of achieving the same ends through liberal consociational means that permit political mobilization on the basis of ethnicity, but do not require it, is the issue.

IV. Conclusion

Political theorists rely on an image of group rights in which: (1) group rights protect the interest of members of ethnic groups in cultural survival or integrity; (2) group rights are primarily held by three kinds of minorities—national minorities, indigenous minorities, and religious minorities; (3) group rights consist of rights to decision-making authority over matters integral to cultural survival, are held by groups collectively, are exercised by the group through its governing institutions or on the group's behalf by an unelected leadership, often but do not necessarily entail territorial jurisdiction, and can bind both members and non-members of the group; and (4) group rights come into conflict with the individual rights of group members, but do not raise serious issues regarding the rights of non-members.

A careful examination of constitutional practice reveals that: (1) group rights are a response to political mobilization not only on issues of cultural survival, but around the unequal distribution of economic resources and opportunities, the unequal enjoyment of public services, and unequal access to political power; (2) group rights are claimed by a broad variety of groups, including territorially dispersed minorities and groups that may constitute a majority in the state; (3) in addition to rights to self-government or autonomy, group rights relate to political power, and are designed to ensure representation and participation in common institutions, take a broad variety of forms (exemptions, accommodations, guaranteed representation, difference-conscious but facially neutral rules), arise in a variety of institutional contexts (electoral system design, political party regulation, legislative voting rules, the structure of political executive, courts), are usually not held and exercised by groups acting as a corporate entity, and are best understood as mechanisms to incorporating a group perspective into collective decision-making; and (4) these group rights produce a variety of conflicts with the individual rights of group members and non-members that are materially different from the kinds of rights violations that the political theorists’ constitutional image of group rights would suggest.

The principal goal of this contribution has been analytical—to lay the groundwork for future normative analysis by ensuring it proceeds on an accurate foundation. I defer that normative analysis to another occasion.

Bibliography

Bibliography

Group Rights in Comparative Constitutional Law: Culture, Economics, or Political Power?

Notes:

(*) I would like to thank Michael Sabet and David Vitale, for excellent research assistance.

(6) Yael Tamir, Liberal Nationalism (1993).

(15) See Margaret Moore, The Ethics of Nationalism (2001); Levy (n 9).

(17) Margalit and Raz (n 3).

(18) Buchanan (n 16).

Group Rights in Comparative Constitutional Law: Culture, Economics, or Political Power?

(24) Kymlicka, Multicultural Citizenship: A Liberal Theory of Minority Rights (n 4).

(27) Fifth Schedule to the Constitution of India, ss 5–6; Federal Constitution of Malaysia, Art 161A.

(34) O’Leary and McGarry (n 31).

(35) See Tove H. Malloy, National Minority Rights in Europe (2005), 21; Weller (n 33), 532.

(39) See Weller (n 33).

(40) Law no 2839 (Turkey), s 33.

(41) Federal Electoral Law (Germany), art 6(6).

(42) National Assembly Elections Act (Slovenia), art 2.

(44) Constitution of India, Art 330.

(48) Ley Orgánica 6/2002, de 27 de junio, de Partidos Políticos (Spain), Art 9.

(49) Constitution of the Republic of Turkey, Art 68.

(54) Constitution of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Part IV, Section a, 5–6, Arts 17a–18a.

(56) Constitution of the Republic of Macedonia, Amendment X (replacing Art 69).

(58) Federal Constitution of the Swiss Federation, Art 175.

(59) Constitution of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Part IV, Section b, 1, Arts 1–2.

(60) Northern Ireland Act 1998, s 16A.

(61) Ibid s 18.

(63) McGarry, O’Leary, and Simeon (n 62).

(64) Sujit Choudhry and Richard Stacey, ‘Independent or Dependent? Constitutional Courts in Divided Societies’ in Colin Harvey and Alex Schwartz (eds), Bills of Rights in Divided Societies (2012).

(66) Constitution of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Part IV, Section c, 3, Art 9.

(67) Special Act of 6 January 1989 On the Constitutional Court (Belgium), art 31.

(68) Supreme Court Act, RSCH 1985, ch S-26 (Canada), s 6.

(71) Federal Constitution of Malaysia, Arts 153 and 161A.

(72) Case of Gorzelik and Others v Poland, ECtHR App no 44158/98, Judgment of 17 February 2004.
Group Rights in Comparative Constitutional Law: Culture, Economics, or Political Power?

(74) Constitution of the Republic of Cyprus, Art 2(3).

(75) Special Statute for Trentino Alto-Adige.

Sujit Choudhry
Sujit Choudhry is Cecelia Goetz Professor of Law, New York University School of Law
This article begins with a discussion of the constitutionalization of affirmative action and its side effects. It examines the legal underpinnings of affirmative action in two relatively well-endowed developing countries and former British colonies — Malaysia and South Africa — where the disadvantaged groups that receive the benefits of affirmative action are numerical majorities from the start. It also considers the case of India, where the disadvantaged groups targeted for affirmative action initially are numerical minorities. The discussion then turns to the non-constitutionalization of affirmative action and its side effects. In countries where affirmative action has not been constitutionalized and where the beneficiaries (women excepted) are minority groups, the legal validity of a program of this kind will depend upon whether it meets a set of formal requirements. The most important of those is arguably that the outcome of the decisional process by which scarce goods are being allocated should not be exclusively determined by group membership. The soft, gender-focused, ‘discrimination-blocking’ EU affirmative action model and the (exceptional) US affirmative action regime are examined.

Keywords: constitutionalization, disadvantaged groups, Malaysia, South Africa, India, United States, EU, affirmative action model

I. The Constitutionalization of Affirmative Action and its Side Effects 1129
   1. Affirmative Action for Politically Dominant Yet Economically Disadvantaged Groups: Malaysia and South Africa 1129
   2. Identifying the Disadvantaged: The Indian Dilemma 1131

II. The Non-Constitutionalization of Affirmative Action and its Side Effects 1135
   1. The Soft, Gender-Focused, ‘Discrimination-Blocking’ EU Affirmative Action Model 1136
   2. A Pattern of Diversion: The (Exceptional) US Affirmative Action Regime 1137

III. Conclusion 1140

Broadly defined, ‘affirmative action’ encompasses any measure that allocates goods—such as admission into selective universities or professional schools, jobs, promotions, public contracts, business loans, and rights to buy, sell, or use land and other natural resources—through a process that takes into account individual membership in designated groups, for the purpose of increasing the proportion of members of those groups in the relevant labor force, entrepreneurial class, or student population, where they are currently underrepresented as a result of past oppression by state authorities and/or present societal discrimination. ‘Unlike traditional welfare policies grounded in distributional equity, affirmative action takes its moral force from a corrective justice ideal’:12 it targets a specific type of disadvantage arising from the illegitimate use of a morally irrelevant characteristic of individuals in the allocation of scarce resources. However, these measures, which may result from constitutional mandates, statutes, administrative regulations, court orders, or voluntary initiatives, go beyond antidiscrimination policy strictly conceived, insofar as they do not require evidence of discrimination on an individual basis. Their ultimate goal is to counter deeply entrenched social practices that (p. 1125) reproduce group inequality even in the absence of intentional discrimination, by producing positive externalities beyond their individual recipients. As a general matter, they benefit groups ‘with whose position and esteem in society the affiliated individual may be inextricably involved’.³

Beyond this most general definition, affirmative action policies vary substantially across (and within) jurisdictions, regarding their intended beneficiaries (ethnic, racial, or religious groups (or castes) held to be economically and/or socially disadvantaged, aboriginal peoples, women, and the disabled), the form of the programs involved, the legal norms from which they derive, the measures’ domain of implementation,⁴ and the justification(s) adduced to support them. They also vary in the explicitness with which and the extent to which group membership operates in the decision-making process. In this respect, at least three different types of affirmative action may be identified:

Indirect affirmative action refers to measures that are apparently neutral yet actually designed to benefit disadvantaged groups and might be construed as indirect discrimination (in European terms) or discrimination of the ‘disparate impact’ variety (in US terms) if the distribution of their costs among groups affected by them were just the opposite. In the case of race and ethnicity, an example is the 1997 Texas law⁵ instructing state universities to admit the top 10 percent of every high school’s graduates (regardless of test scores) in order to increase the proportion of black and Hispanic students, given the large number of high schools in that state from which virtually all graduates belong to either one of these two minority groups.⁶ Another (p. 1126) illustration is the French set of formally color-blind yet arguably ‘race-oriented’ policies under which residents of educationally and/or economically disadvantaged areas benefit from the additional input of state resources targeting those areas, since some of the criteria used for delineating the latter (the rate of failure in high school, the unemployment rate, and the percentage of residents under 25 years old) are correlated with ethnic (African) origin.⁷ Those are (more or less conspicuous) instances of a ‘substitution strategy’ under which what looks like the secondary effect of a formally neutral principle of allocation is at least in part the reason why that principle has been adopted in the first place, given the perceived illegitimacy and/or unlawfulness of pursuing the decision-maker’s true objective in a more straightforward manner.⁸

Outreach encompasses measures designed only to bring a more diverse range of candidates into a recruitment (or promotion) pool. In this case, group membership is explicitly taken into account, but in a limited way: it is allowed to enter the picture only within the preliminary process of enlarging the set from which individuals will be selected eventually, not at the selection level itself. An example in British law would be the provisions of the Race Relations Act 1976 allowing employers to ‘specially encourage racial minorities to apply when they are underrepresented in the workforce’ and to grant ‘persons of a particular racial group access to facilities or services to meet the special needs of persons of that group in regard to their … training …’.⁹

Often conceived as a last-resort conflict management device designed to deal with or prevent the occurrence of mass violence potentially disruptive of the existing political order in ‘deeply divided societ[ies],’ positive discrimination—or preferential treatment—consists in measures that grant an advantage to the members of designated groups in the final decision over the allocation of scarce goods, through more or less flexible policy instruments (compulsory quotas, tie-break rules, aspirational ‘goals’ or ‘targets’). In this case, an applicant from one of the designated groups (DGA1) will be selected for a position (for which he or she is minimally qualified)¹¹ in spite of there being at least one applicant from a non-designated group whose qualifications were deemed to be higher. This means that if another applicant from a designated group (DGA2) had come up with exactly the same qualifications as the applicant who was not selected, the person in charge of making the selection would have selected him or her instead of DGA1.¹² In other words, group membership is the key factor triggering the outcome: DGA1 succeeds in obtaining the position that he or she applied for and would have (p. 1127) failed but for his or her being identified as a member of a designated group. As a general matter, positive discrimination can thus be criticized for conflicting with two distinct principles more or less widely embraced in the different societies under consideration: the meritocratic principle, according to which the most qualified applicant for a position should always be selected; and the principle of ‘color (gender/caste …)-blindness’, under which it would always be intrinsically wrong to draw distinctions on the basis of such characteristics—for state authorities at least. Because, as a matter of fact, this third type of affirmative action is the main subject of current legal controversies, most of the following developments will focus on it specifically.
Setting aside the case of indirect affirmative action programs—the legal status of which is arguably distinctive and less clearly defined—both outreach and positive discrimination policies display at least two generally observable traits whose coexistence seems paradoxical: on the one hand, since in theory the goal of special treatment for members of disadvantaged groups is to make the need for it disappear as quickly as possible, the temporary nature of such policies is often described as being both one of their defining features and a key condition of their legal validity; on the other hand, in democratic societies where benefits, once given, cannot easily be withdrawn, as a practical matter affirmative action tends to become permanent, irrespective of the changing circumstances that may seem to warrant the termination of the policy. Still, beyond those two common features—and regardless of whether some collective entities are also legally acknowledged as the bearers of cultural rights—a preliminary distinction may be drawn among affirmative action regimes according to the permissibility of focusing on the relative status of groups as a matter of constitutional law. This criterion arguably leads to a representation of the existing variety of empirical cases as a series of ‘concentric circles,’ the largest of which would include—as we shall see—the most transparently group-oriented legal orders of Malaysia, South Africa, and India, but also Canada and the Fiji Islands, while the United States would stand as the most restrictive inner circle, given its strictly individual-centered conception of equality, and the European Union, in view of its apparent endorsement of group-regarding equality for groups defined on the basis of gender, would fall somewhere in between (although much closer to the US side). Moreover, aside from this last, somewhat ambiguous case, the above-mentioned distinction overlaps another one based on the existence (Section I) or absence (Section II) of a ‘constitutional precommitment’ in favor of affirmative action that leads to two sharply distinct patterns: on the one hand, in the context of a regime change materialized by the creation of a new constitutional order, the expansion in scope—in terms of the number of groups targeted for benefits and/or policy areas covered—of affirmative action programs of the positive discrimination variety explicitly acknowledged as such and designed to reach a prevalent, relatively stable and generally agreed-upon goal (Section I); on the other hand, the predominance in the case law of a highly formalist approach committed to ‘a ... largely fictional system of “individualized consideration”’ of each applicant’s merits in the decision-making process paving the way for either the rejection of preferential treatment or an implicit—and paradoxical—injunction to conceal or at least euphemize it in a way that obscures the policy’s actual purpose (Section II). We shall consider these two patterns in turn.

I. The Constitutionalization of Affirmative Action and its Side Effects

As far as it seems, when the disadvantaged groups that receive the benefits of affirmative action are numerical majorities from the start, because there is no seriously threatening challenge to the legitimacy of positive discrimination as a matter of principle, programs that qualify as such are comparatively extensive, subject to few formal constraints, and overtly designed to help bring about a structural transformation of society in a more egalitarian direction, within the frame of a large-scale social engineering project explicitly embraced by state authorities. At least as much can be gathered from a condensed examination of the legal underpinnings of affirmative action in two relatively well-endowed developing countries and former British colonies—Malaysia and South Africa.

1. Affirmative Action for Politically Dominant Yet Economically Disadvantaged Groups: Malaysia and South Africa

In Malaysia, because the marginalization of the bumiputeras through their relegation in the rural component of the economy was then widely understood as resulting from the large-scale immigration of the Chinese and Indians encouraged by the British as part of their standard ‘divide and rule’ policy, special rights for Malays were entrenched in the 1957 Federal Constitution as a necessary step toward the eradication of the old colonial order. (p. 1129) Under this new social compact, the non-Malay minorities, in return for being granted citizenship based on the principle of jus soli, agreed to having privileges conferred on the Malays in order to uplift their economic position. As a result, while Article 8(2) of the Constitution prohibits ‘discrimination against citizens on the ground ... of religion, race, descent, gender, or place of birth in any law or in the appointment to any office or employment under a public authority’, Article 8(5) makes clear that this general non-discrimination principle does not ban provisions for the advancement of Malays, and Article 153(2) specifies that those provisions will consist in ‘reservation[s] for Malays ... of such proportion as ... may [be] deem[ed] reasonable of positions in the public service ..., scholarships ... and other similar educational or training privileges or special facilities given ... by the Federal Government', but also ‘of such permits and licences ... required by federal law ... for the operation of any trade or business.’ Moreover, in yet another unusual extension of the reach of affirmative action, Article 89 empowers state authorities to reserve areas of land for exclusive bumiputera ownership. Last but not least, in the aftermath of the May 1969 riots between Chinese and Malay residents of Kuala Lumpur which resulted in a death toll of several hundred persons, additional steps were taken to help to prevent further unrest. First, the 1948 Sedition Act was revised so as to make it illegal to question, inter alia, ‘any matter, right, status, position, privilege, sovereignty or prerogative established or protected by the provisions of ... Article ... 153 ... of the Federal Constitution.’ In Malaysia, criticizing affirmative action thus constitutes a criminal offence punishable by up to three years in jail, a provision with no equivalent in any other country. Secondly, in 1971 the government launched the New Economic Policy (NEP), which basically extended the principle of reservations for bumiputeras from the public to the private sector, as part of a ‘restructuring of society’ designed to ‘eliminate the identification of race with economic function’ and make the distribution of the workforce in each segment of the economy reflect the racial composition of the population by 1990. The project of achieving a radical social transformation was thus made strikingly explicit.

In South Africa the 1996 Constitution was also intended to forestall any argument as to the permissibility of positive discrimination for members of disadvantaged groups, with a view to avoiding legal controversies of the kind that were then unfolding in the United States. To begin with, instead of framing affirmative action and other remedial initiatives as an exception or a limitation to equality, section 9(2) states that ‘to promote the achievement of equality, legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination may be taken.’ More unusually, while section 9(3) indicates that ‘the state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language (p. 1131) and birth’, section 9(5) makes clear that, in some cases, ‘discrimination’ may be considered ‘fair’, and the 1998 Employment Equity Act confirms both that affirmative action measures designed ‘to ensure the[ir] equitable representation [of members of designated groups] in all occupational categories and levels of the workforce’ fall under this rubric and that those measures ‘include preferential treatment’. Finally—and most distinctively—under section 20(5) of the Act a designated group member’s lack of the necessary qualifications is not a sufficient reason for hiring a non-designated group member instead: the employer ‘may not unfairly discriminate against a person solely on the grounds of that person’s lack of relevant experience’, the only legitimate matter of concern being the applicant’s ‘capacity to acquire, within a reasonable time, the ability to do the job’. By squarely rejecting the very criterion of merit as conventionally defined by the current level of qualification, the South African legislation thus embraces an expansive conception of affirmative action that responds most directly to historical circumstances in which the majority of the population, defined by race, was systematically deprived of opportunities to earn the qualifications needed for managerial positions. Furthermore, the obviousness of the causal link between current group inequality and the recently dismantled and morally discredited apartheid regime is such that this reconceptualization of merit is not broadly challenged. In this case, like in Malaysia, the legitimacy of the general concept of affirmative action is relatively well established, and the policy most visibly partakes of a simultaneously corrective and prospective strategy geared towards the dismantlement of historically embedded structures of subordination through the state-led deracialization of economic power, in line with the reference in the Preamble to the 1993 Interim Constitution to the ‘creation of a new order’ and the Postamble’s definition of this document’s ultimate purpose as being no less than the ‘reconstruction of society’.

2. Identifying the Disadvantaged: The Indian Dilemma

When the disadvantaged groups targeted for affirmative action initially are numerical minorities, the constitutionalization of the policy may have the effect of restricting the ambit of political and legal controversies to the issue of who else might have a valid claim to be included among the beneficiaries. In India, this led both to an increase in the number of targeted groups over time and to the emergence of an unusually complex, internally differentiated affirmative action regime.

When push comes to shove, Indian authorities do acknowledge the conflict between the local instantiation of affirmative action and the meritocratic principle. They also do not object to the use of quotas as a policy instrument: the Supreme Court only limited their extent by capping at 50 percent the proportion of positions to be allocated in this way by any single decisional unit.\textsuperscript{40} Much more divisive has been the extension of ‘reservations’ in government employment and university admissions from the Scheduled Castes (SCs)\textsuperscript{41} and Scheduled Tribes (STs)\textsuperscript{42} to a set of more numerous and somewhat better-off lower castes now estimated to be about 41 percent of the Indian population.\textsuperscript{43} As a matter of fact, while the introduction of reservations for the SCs and STs had been nearly consensual, this transformation of the national affirmative action regime into one benefiting a majoritarian conglomerate of ascriptive (non-gender-based) groups eventually came about after some protracted, large-scale resistance from different quarters over a period of several decades.

After independence, the 1950 Indian Constitution retained the principle of affirmative action for the most disadvantaged groups (the SCs and STs) that the British had set up originally by mandating the reservation of a proportional number of seats for them in the federal\textsuperscript{44} and state\textsuperscript{45} legislative assemblies and enabling states to set aside a population-linked share of government jobs for their benefit. As a result of the 1951 First Amendment designed to override a Supreme Court decision striking down a quota system for lower-caste applicants at a state-run medical school as invalid under the equality clause in Article 15(1) of the Constitution,\textsuperscript{46} Parliament also decided to permit the extension of reservations to groups other than the SCs and STs and to goods other than government jobs and legislative seats by inserting Article 15(4).\textsuperscript{47} Yet, while the principle of affirmative action was constitutionally sanctioned, the ratios to be used, and even the delineation of the relevant groups—in the case of these ‘Other Backward Classes’ (OBCs), as they came to be called—were left for the executive to determine, and by no means was it pre-ordained that ritual status in the caste system should be their main defining feature. Aside from the case of the SCs and STs, both (p. 1133) the Constituent Assembly and successive parliaments after independence expected criteria of ‘backwardness’ to be defined in economic terms and dismissed the recommendations of the first ‘Backward Classes Commission’—appointed in 1953 under Article 340 of the Constitution—that caste be relied on for that purpose for about 40 years. Only in 1990 did the executive accept the proposal included in the 1980 Report of the second Backward Classes Commission—chaired by B.P. Mandal—to add a national 27 percent quota in government jobs for the OBCs to the existing 22.5 percent quota for the SCs (15 percent) and STs (7.5 percent).\textsuperscript{48} The Central Educational Institutions (Reservation in Admission) Act of 2006 then extended the 27 percent reservation for the OBCs to all government-funded institutions of higher education, a law whose constitutionality the Indian Supreme Court indirectly upheld in April 2008.\textsuperscript{49} Finally, most Supreme Court decisions limiting the reach of affirmative action spawned constitutional amendments with cross-party support designed to nullify or circumvent them.\textsuperscript{50} Judicial review thus proved unable to counter the political dynamic triggered by reservations and allowing for the policy’s self-sustaining expansion.

As noted by several American scholars, all in all, one of the most remarkable features of the Indian case is the extent to which it illustrates the ‘path not taken’ in the United States, partly as a result of distinct patterns of institutional decision-making.\textsuperscript{51}

First, it is generally agreed upon that the key rationale for affirmative action is to remedy the effects of past and present societal discrimination on the basis of caste, and this agreement on the main purpose of the policy has obvious implications for the identification of its beneficiaries. In contrast with the US relative neglect of this question and casual reliance on ‘a mixture of … interest group politics … and … inadequately examined [racial] folk categories’\textsuperscript{52} presumed to be socially and economically disadvantaged, Indian authorities have developed a sophisticated methodology to systematically measure the disadvantage ascribed to the systemic discrimination faced by various caste-defined groups in order to select the beneficiaries of reservations on that empirical basis. As a general matter, ‘backwardness’ is thus determined by considering a broad range of standardized criteria such as literacy rates, land-ownership, income and education level, occupation, housing quality, and access to the civil service and elective offices. It is in reference to this variety of mostly socio-economic indicators that the Mandal commission, after conducting a national survey, ended up listing no less than 3,743 castes as forming the ‘Other Backward Classes’ eligible for affirmative action (irrespective of whether the disadvantage that they faced could be (p. 1134) traced to some judicially identifiable discrimination for which the institution seeking to grant the remedy would have been responsible). In short, India has attempted to identify the legitimate beneficiaries of reservations using precisely the ‘sociological and political analysis’ dismissed by the US Supreme Court as ‘not ly[ing] within judicial competence’.\textsuperscript{53} This was made possible by the reliance on an ‘administrative process model’\textsuperscript{54} under which the judiciary both articulates the principles constraining the exercise of discretion so as to ensure that the selection proceeds in a transparent way, according to objective criteria, and prescribes that this task be delegated to an institution endowed with greater fact-finding abilities.\textsuperscript{55}

Secondly, in the 1992 decision \textit{Indra Sawhney v Union of India}, not only did the Supreme Court support the recommendations of the Mandal commission and confirm that low-caste status was a constitutive, \textit{necessary} component of ‘backwardness’, thus striking down the 10 percent quota for ‘other economically backward sections of people’ not covered by existing schemes of reservations that the government had introduced as an attempt to accommodate the underprivileged amongst the upper castes;\textsuperscript{56} it also made a decisive contribution to the legal construction of an heterogeneous affirmative action regime predicated upon the acknowledgment of the existence of different degrees of disadvantage among the policy’s beneficiaries and of the irreducibly distinctive nature of the SCs and STs’ condition. In fact, this heterogeneity was already apparent in that even after the turning point of the early 1990s only those two groups—and not the OBCs—were granted reservations of legislative spots. Still, in \textit{Sawhney} two momentous decisions were made. On the one hand, the Court upheld a quota for the OBCs (27 percent) almost twice as small as their proportion in the Indian population (52 percent according to the Mandal Report), even though the SCs and STs—who then represented 15 percent and 7.5 percent of the population respectively—had been granted a proportional quota of 22.5 percent of government jobs and university places. That 27 percent figure was almost exactly what was left of the 50 percent available for reservation after the SC and ST quotas had been taken into account.\textsuperscript{57} The SCs and STs had their own separate reservations; they did not need to compete for reserved seats against the more numerous and frequently more affluent and influential OBCs. On the other hand, in order to address the concern that the benefits of reservations were not distributed evenly throughout each ‘backward’ group but instead were monopolized by persons at the socio-economic top of the group, the Supreme Court made it compulsory to \textit{combine} caste and class for ascertaining whether a given individual ought to be eligible for such benefits (in contrast with the predominant mention of class as a potential \textit{substitute} for race in the US affirmative action debate).\textsuperscript{58} It held that OBC membership only created a rebuttable presumption that a member needed affirmative action and so directed the government to adopt (p. 1135) an \textit{economic} means test in order to screen out those privileged members of a ‘backward class’—the so-called ‘creamy layer’—who should not receive government assistance.\textsuperscript{59} Yet this disaggregation of the collection of potential recipients according to a class criterion and the individualized determination of economic disadvantage as a condition for affirmative action eligibility apply only to the OBCs—not to the SCs and STs. In this respect, too, members of the groups generally considered as the most disadvantaged are treated differently than the other beneficiaries of the programs involved. At the end of the day, quite unlike in the United States, the broadening of the set of targeted groups did prove compatible with a quasi-official and deeply consequential acknowledgment of the qualitative differences between its various components.

\textbf{II. The Non-Constitutionalization of Affirmative Action and its Side Effects}

In countries where affirmative action has not been constitutionalized and where the beneficiaries (women excepted) are minority groups, the legal validity of a program of this kind will depend upon whether it meets a set of formal requirements. The most important of those is arguably that the outcome of the decisional process by which scarce goods are being allocated should not be exclusively determined by group membership. Thus, the European Court of Justice has rebuked schemes under which equally qualified women were to be automatically preferred to men in employment sectors where women were underrepresented\textsuperscript{60} yet approved of a tie-break rule giving priority to women in civil service promotions as long as an equally qualified individual male candidate had the opportunity to establish that ‘reasons specific to [his situation]’ should ‘tilt the balance in his favour’.\textsuperscript{61} While arguably more restrictive than the US case law in that they rule out positive discrimination altogether, these holdings are broadly similar to Justice Powell’s controlling opinion in the \textit{Bakke} decision striking down inflexible racial quotas in university admissions as unconstitutional\textsuperscript{62} yet allowing race to be considered as a functionally equivalent ‘plus’ factor, as long as it stands as just one among many potentially ‘diversity’-enhancing features, to be weighed competitively against others within an individualized assessment of each applicant’s distinct contribution.\textsuperscript{63} Still, a brief examination of some of the most salient EU and US developments uncovers distinctive features definitely worth highlighting. We shall consider them in turn.

\textbf{1. The Soft, Gender-Focused, ‘Discrimination-Blocking’\textsuperscript{64} EU Affirmative Action Model}

Aside from a general resistance to the use of any kind of \textit{positive} discrimination as defined above—and to quotas and set-asides in particular\textsuperscript{65}—at least two broad cross-European trends stand out.
First, there are considerable differences in the development of positive action across the different equality grounds. Because gender equality in the employment field has been within the competence of the European Community from the start, in contrast with all the other major affirmative action regimes, gender-based schemes are the most widespread by far and therefore have always been at the center of legal debates. While Article 5 of the Racial Equality Directive provides that ‘the principle of equal treatment shall not prevent any Member State from maintaining or adopting specific measures to prevent or compensate for disadvantages linked to racial or ethnic origin’ in that case leaving it to the states to decide whether or not to adopt such measures—a choice applying to all kinds of affirmative action—almost always resulted in their abstaining to do so.

Secondly, like in India, the European Court of Justice mainly conceives affirmative action as a mechanism for counterbalancing—and remedying the effects of—societal (direct and indirect) discrimination—in that case, discrimination on the basis of sex. As explained in the Marschall decision, ‘even where male and female candidates are equally qualified, male candidates tend to be promoted in preference to female candidates.’ This is so either ‘because … [employers] apply traditional promotion criteria which in practice put women at a disadvantage, such as … seniority’; or because of prejudices and stereotypes concerning the role and capacities of women in working life and the fear, for example, that women will interrupt their careers more frequently, that owing to household and family duties they will be less flexible in their working hours, or that they will be absent from work more frequently because of pregnancy.

This judicially approved justification for affirmative action offers a stark contrast with the currently prevailing ‘diversity’ rationale peculiar to the US case law.

2. A Pattern of Diversion: The (Exceptional) US Affirmative Action Regime

Because the Equal Protection Clause of the Constitution’s Fourteenth Amendment (1868), according to which ‘no state shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws’, was deliberately drafted so as to let courts rule on the constitutionality of racial classifications by state authorities on a case-by-case basis, the legal status of affirmative action has been an uncertain, shifting, and paradoxical judicial construct. From a comparative perspective, at least three distinctive features bear special emphasis.

One is the increasingly restrictive nature of the policy’s conditions of validity as defined in the Supreme Court’s case law, at least as far as race-based affirmative action is concerned. Thus, while in Fullilove v Klutznick the Court had confirmed the constitutionality of minority set-asides in public contracting introduced by Congress, in City of Richmond v JA Croson Co it struck down a similar program set up in Richmond, Virginia, arguing that this program failed the ‘strict scrutiny’ test that any race-based classification by state or local—as opposed to federal—authorities had to pass, because it was not ‘narrowly tailored’ to the ‘compelling governmental interest’ of remedying the effects of some specific, judicially established instance of intentional past discrimination. Finally, in Adarand Constructors, Inc v Pena the Court discarded the federal versus non-federal-level-of-authority distinction and held that all race-based classifications had to meet the requirements of strict scrutiny, regardless both of which racial group was to benefit and of which government unit the program was an emanation. In contrast, presumably less ‘suspect’ gender-based classifications—including affirmative action programs—are subject to the less exacting standard of ‘intermediate scrutiny’, under which they must only be ‘substantially related’ to the achievement of an ‘important governmental objective[s]’. Moreover, the Supreme Court has found that some of those gender-based classifications designed ‘to remedy discrimination against women in the job market’ understood as a diffuse phenomenon did meet that test in contradistinction to its rejection of the ‘societal discrimination’ rationale as ‘too amorphous a basis for imposing a racially classified remedy’ while properly constraining its scope.

This rejection and its most momentous side effect—the emergence in the case law of an alternative, ultimately dominant, justification for broad affirmative action programs focused on their alleged contribution to viewpoint diversity, a retrospective rationalization with little or no relationship to the policy’s original raison d’être—is another distinctively American development, arising in part from implications of the separation of powers as understood by some members of the Supreme Court. The main reason why Justice Powell in Bakke ended up recasting race-based affirmative action as an instrument for bringing into selective universities and professional schools students with different ‘experiences, outlooks, and ideas’ whose interactions would give rise to an ‘atmosphere [of] speculation, experiment and creation’, in accordance with the traditional, knowledge-oriented mission of academic institutions, is that this did not require the Court itself to draw lines between competing claimants. In contrast, the societal discrimination argument inevitably relies on a comparative assessment of the unequal victimization experienced by all groups likely to think of themselves as deserving of compensation, an assessment in need of judicial oversight yet involving a ‘kind of variable sociological and political analysis ... [that] does not lie within judicial competence’. While the legislative authority is ‘free to recognize degrees of harm ... and ... may confine its restrictions to those classes of cases where the need is deemed to be clearest’, the courts cannot legitimately ‘evaluate the extent of the prejudice ... suffered by various minority groups’—and decide that those whose ... injury is thought to exceed some arbitrary level of tolerability then would be entitled to preferential classifications. From this boundary-policing, integrity-preserving perspective, deferring to the value of ‘academic freedom’ and pretending not to interfere in the selection of the means best suited to achieve an end presumably internal to the academic sphere apparently seemed like the safer course. To a certain extent, ‘substantive constitutional doctrine’ may thus be understood as a by-product of ‘institutional arrangements’, namely of the incomplete and largely unavowed ‘juridicalization’ of political decision-making characteristic of the American public culture.

Aside from the many theoretical shortcomings of the diversity rationale—including its unacknowledged lack of fit with the maintained requirement that affirmative action programs should be temporary—one of the most striking legal developments since Bakke, however, has been the semantic extension of ‘diversity’ far beyond Powell’s original emphasis on its heuristic dimension as an educational tool. As reconceptualized—and validated anew—in the 2003 Grutter v Bollinger decision, this construct is now held to be a ‘compelling state interest’ both on epistemic and on political grounds, as it is expected to promote ‘cross-racial understanding’, ‘break down racial stereotypes’, and legitimate elite institutions. In short, as argued by philosopher and legal scholar Elizabeth Anderson, the umbrella term that ‘diversity’ has become is just ‘another way of talking about integration’ and the eradication of the remnants of racial hierarchy. That such a circuitous—and ideologically consequential—path has been taken before coming full circle—without this detour being explicitly acknowledged for what it is by the Supreme Court—nonetheless remains a distinctive trait of the US legal affirmative action regime.

Finally—and most paradoxically—the pattern of obfuscation perceptible in US case law concerns both the actual end purpose of affirmative action and the race-conscious dimension of the policy itself; as a general matter, in order for an affirmative action plan to be deemed constitutionally permissible, the extent to which—or even the fact that—group membership has been taken into account should simply be left in the background. As much was suggested initially by Justice Powell in Bakke, in that nothing prevented the bonus informally given to minority applicants that he endorsed from being implicitly calibrated so as to ensure the attainment of a previously defined minimal level of (racial) ‘diversity’. At the end of the day, the difference between quotas and supposedly flexible affirmative action programs was thus ‘administrative and symbolic’; it lay not in the size of the advantage granted to blacks and Hispanics but in the fact that flexible programs do not ‘make public the extent of the preference and the precise workings of the system’. Similarly, in Croson Justice O’Connor argued that Richmond should have attempted to ‘use alternative, race-neutral means’ such as ‘simplification of bidding procedures, relaxation of bonding requirements, and training or financial aid for [all] disadvantaged entrepreneurs’ in order ‘to increase minority participation in city contracting’. The same point was made in the concurring opinion of Justice Scalia: because blacks have been disproportionately disadvantaged by racial discrimination, any race-neutral remedial program aimed at the disadvantaged as such will have a disproportionately beneficial impact on [them]. Only such a program, and not one that operates on the basis of race, is in accord with ... our Constitution.

It follows that as long as the decision-making authority proceeds discreetly enough, it will be left free to enact measures that are superficially color-blind yet deliberately favorable to minority members. Affirmative action for racial groups previously discriminated against is authorized, provided it remains indirect. Lastly, that a measure of opacity regarding its modus operandi is the key condition an affirmative action plan must meet in order to be considered legal has been confirmed by the Supreme Court in 2003, as it validated the program of the University of Michigan Law School that sought to enroll an unspecified ‘critical mass’ of underrepresented minority students in Grutter v Bollinger while striking down the more detailed plan of the University of Michigan’s undergraduate school in the companion case of Gratz v. Bollinger. Only in the dissents did some of the Justices voice their misgivings as to the Court's approbation of precisely those schemes that 'get their racially diverse results without saying directly what they are doing or why they are doing it'; through winks, nods and disguises. It would seem, then, that the constitutional validity of US affirmative action policies depends in practical terms upon whether the degree to which they take race into account remains properly concealed.

III. Conclusion

In all the countries included in this brief comparative overview, affirmative action is an instrument designed to achieve a more or less explicitly acknowledged goal of structural transformation. In all—with the possible exception of Malaysia—that transformation is geared towards an ideal of societal integration, to be realized by equalizing the distribution of a set of status-conferring goods among ascriptive groups so as to reduce the salience of the boundaries between them. As a practical matter, the constitutionalization of the policy makes it possible to pursue this quintessentially political objective in a relatively transparent way. In the absence of such a constitutional precommitment, however, the awareness of the divisive power of visible race-conscious interventions—that is, the fear of perpetuating stigmatizing stereotypes and of fostering perceptions of unfairness and resentment among the non-beneficiaries—may well lead the courts toward prescribing that affirmative action become (or remain) implicit, indirect—or both. Given the strong likelihood of triggering such perceptions, if 'Justice must satisfy the appearance of justice' and if the 'double-consciousness' involved in 'mak[ing] the public's view a factor within [the judge's] own' is 'a necessary aspect of constitutional adjudication', a doctrinal requirement of obscurity is the unsettling yet nearly inevitable result.

Bibliography

Elizabeth Anderson, The Imperative of Integration (2010)
Gbenaële Calvès, La Discrimination positive ([2004] 2010)
Marshall Cohen, Nagel Thomas, and Scanlon Thomas (eds), Equality and Preferential Treatment (1977)
Marc Galanter, Competing Equalities: Law and the Backward Classes in India (1984)
Michel Rosenfeld, Affirmative Action and Justice: A Philosophical and Constitutional Inquiry (1991)

Notes:

(*) Previous versions of this chapter were presented at the meeting of the American Political Science Association, Seattle, September 1–4, 2011, and at the ‘Protective Discrimination: Comparative Inquiries’ conference, University of Delhi, October 14–15, 2011. For helpful comments and suggestions on these earlier drafts, I thank Gwénaëlle Calvès, Ashok Acharya, Sofia A. Perez, Graziella Moaes Dias Da Silva, and Sarah Wallace Goodman.

(3) US Supreme Court decision Beauharnais v Illinois 343 US 250, 263 (1952) (a free speech case preceding and not directly related to the affirmative action debate). See also Owen Fiss, ‘Groups and the Equal Protection Clause’ (1976) 5 Philosophy and Public Affairs 148 (making the point that blacks—the group for which US affirmative action programs were originally designed—are viewed as a group; they view themselves as a group; their identity is in large part determined by membership in the group; their social status is linked to the status of the group; and much of our action, institutional and personal, is based on these perspectives’); Melissa Williams, ‘In Defence of Affirmative Action: North American Discourses for the European Context?’ in Erna Appelt and Monika Jarosch (eds), Combating Racial Discrimination: Affirmative Action as a Model for Europe (2000), 67 (suggesting that affirmative action targets ‘marginalizedascriptive groups’ that have four characteristic features:

(1) patterns of social and political inequality are structured along the lines of group membership; (2) generally, membership in them is not experienced as voluntary; (3) generally, membership in them is not experienced as mutable; and (4) generally, there are negative meanings assigned to group identity by the broader society or the dominant culture.)

(4) While in most cases—including those of the United States, Canada, South Africa, and Malaysia—affirmative action programs cover both the public and the private sectors, in India ‘reservations’ do not apply to private institutions. Yet even in countries where no such restriction is to be found affirmative action regimes are often more exacting in the public sector. Eg in the United Kingdom—except for Northern Ireland—the obligation imposed on public employers to monitor the ethnic distribution of their workforce (Race Relations Act 1976 (Statutory Duties) Order 2001 (SI 2001/3458), Art 5) and to revise their hiring procedures and set up a Race Equality Scheme in case of unexplainable discrepancies (Race Relations Act 1976 (Statutory Duties) Order 2001 (SI 2001/3458), Art 2) contrasts with the theoretically non-compulsory nature of positive action measures for private employers (see generally Christopher McCrudden, ‘Equality and Non-Discrimination’ in David Feldman (ed), English Public Law (2004) 581ff). Only in the United States does affirmative action stand on more shaky ground in the public than in the private sector, as the popular initiative referenda leading to the elimination of the policy in states such as California and Michigan since the mid-1990s have only targeted the former.

(5) Texas House Bill 588, an Act relating to uniform admission and reporting procedures for institutions of higher education.

(6) On the broadly similar district quota system set up in Sri Lanka in 1974 with a view to increasing the proportion of Singhalese university students at the expense of the better-performing Tamils, see Michael M. Burns, ‘Lessons of the Third World: Spirituality as the Source of Commitment to Affirmative Action’ (1990) 14 Vermont Law Review 401ff.

(7) In this case indirect affirmative action is the only option available, since Art 1 of the 1958 Constitution provides that ‘France … ensures the equality of all citizens before the law, without any distinction of origin, race, or

(9) Race Relations Act 1976, Part VI, ss 38 and 35. This is about the only kind of affirmative action allowed under British law (again, with the exception of Northern Ireland). While the Race Relations Act 1976—in contrast to the US Civil Rights Act of 1964—exceptionally permits the use of race when it can be shown to be a genuine occupational qualification (eg ‘when the holder of the job provides persons of that racial group with personal services promoting their welfare, and those services can most effectively be provided by a person of that racial group’ (s 5)), the courts have interpreted this provision narrowly, and it did not pave the way for the introduction of preferential treatment policies.

(11) Of course, this ‘minimal’ degree of qualification needed to be considered eligible may well be set at a very high level, depending on the nature of the position.

(13) Illustrations include Art 1(4) of the UN International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination adopted in 1966, allowing for special measures taken for the sole purpose of securing adequate advancement of certain racial or ethnic groups … requiring such protection as may be necessary in order to ensure such groups … equal enjoyment or exercise of human rights and fundamental freedoms … , provided … that such measures do not, as a consequence, lead to the maintenance of separate rights for different racial groups and that they shall not be continued after the objectives for which they were taken have been achieved.

The US Supreme Court decision Grutter v Bollinger (539 US 306, 342–3 (2003)):

race-conscious admissions policies must be limited in time … all governmental use of race must have a logical end point … We expect that 25 years from now, the use of racial preferences will no longer be necessary to further the interest approved today.

And section 44(7) of the Constitution of the Republic of the Fiji Islands (1997):

an Act establishing a program under this section [entitled ‘Social Justice and Affirmative Action’] expires on the tenth anniversary of its commencement, but the program may be re-established, unless the benefited … groups have demonstrably ceased to be in need of it.

(14) In India, while the original reservations specified in the Constitution of 1950 were set to expire ten years later, they have since been extended by amendment several times for additional ten-year periods (see Marianne Bertrand, Rema Hanna, and Sendhil Mullainathan, ‘Affirmative Action in Education: Evidence from Engineering College Admissions in India’ (2010) 94 Journal of Public Economics 18). In Malaysia, preferences for Malays enshrined in the 1957 Constitution were supposed to remain in place for a period of 15 years only and be repealed in 1972; as a matter of fact, they were not (see Christopher McCrudden, Buying Social Justice: Equality, Government Procurement, and Legal Change (2007), 74). An exception is the case of the Netherlands, where the 1998 ‘SAMEN’ law requiring all firms with over 35 employees to monitor the ethnic distribution of their workforce and enact positive action measures in order to reach predefined ‘targets’ if need be was discontinued in 2004: see Virginie Guiraudon, Karen Phalet, and Jessica ter Wal, ‘Monitoring Ethnic Minorities in the Netherlands’ (2005) 57 International Social Science Journal 75ff.

(15) Pakistan is a case in point: while originally the main rationale for affirmative action there was to mitigate socioeconomic inequalities between its eastern and western regions and reduce the underrepresentation of East Pakistan’s Bengalis in the civil service, the military, business, and the professions, the policy has persisted and

(18) As noted by Priya Sridharan, even the individualization involved in the exclusion of the better-off members of the ‘Other Backward Classes’—defined on the basis of caste membership—from the benefits of reservations (see Section I.2 below) is meant to preserve the adequacy of the group status as a proxy for disadvantage: individual characteristics are used in order to ‘maintain the salience of the group as the primary organizing variable’ (Priya Sridharan, ‘Comment: Representations of Disadvantage: Evolving Definitions of Disadvantage in India’s Reservation Policy and the United States’ Affirmative Action Policy’ (1999) 6 Asian Law Journal 146).

(19) Section 15(2) of the 1982 Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms states that the antidiscrimination principle incorporated in s 15(1) does not preclude any law, program or activity that has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups including those that are disadvantaged because of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

(20) According to s 44(1) of the Constitution of the Fiji Islands, ‘the Parliament must make provision for programs designed to achieve for all groups or categories of persons who are disadvantaged effective equality of access’ to a range of enumerated goods, while the ‘effective equality of access to a level or branch of service of the State’ for an ethnic community is defined in s 44(9) as being ‘represented there in a number broadly proportionate to its number in the adult population as a whole, unless its under-representation is due solely to its particular occupational preferences.’

(21) ‘The rights created by the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment are, by its terms, guaranteed to the individual. The rights established are personal rights’ (Shelley v Kraemer 334 US 1, 22 (1948)); ‘the … Fourteenth Amendment[s] to the Constitution protect[s] persons, not groups’ (Adarand v Pena 515 US 200, 227 (1995)).

(22) Article 157(4) of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (2010):

    With a view to ensuring full equality in practice between men and women in working life, the principle of equal treatment shall not prevent any Member State from maintaining or adopting measures providing for specific advantages in order to make it easier for the under-represented sex to pursue a vocational activity or to prevent or compensate for disadvantages in professional careers.

On gender, see Chapter 19.

(25) As a result of the shift that saw the Malay population expanding and Chinese numbers contracting following the expulsion of Singapore from the Federation of Malaya in 1965, in Malaysia those who benefit from affirmative action —the ethnic Malays, also called bumiputeras (‘sons of the soil’), and other indigenous groups—now comprise about 65 percent of the estimated 28.3 million population, while the Chinese are 26 percent and the Indians 7.7 percent. See ‘Background Note: Malaysia’, available at (http://www.state.gov/r/pa/ei/bgn/2777.htm). Similarly, in post-apartheid South Africa, in 2011 ‘blacks’ (including ‘Africans’, ‘Coloureds’, and ‘Indians’) made up 91 percent of the estimated 47.9 million population, and whites 9 percent. See (http://www.southafrica.info/about/people/population.htm). Other countries in which affirmative action benefits...

(26) On the dynamic between constitutionalism and impoverishment, see Chapter 6.

(28) Section 4(1)(d).

(30) Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, Act No 108 of 1996, Ch 2, s 9(2) (emphasis added). See also Harmse v City of Cape Town (2003) 24 ILJ 1130, 1145 (LAC) (Waglay J), holding that ‘The protection and advancement of persons or categories of persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination ... is part of the fabric and woven into the texture of the fundamental right to equality.’

(31) Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, Ch 2, s 9(3) (emphasis added).

(32) Employment Equity Act, No 55 of 1998, ss 1 and 6(2).

(33) Section 15(3). Under this same section, ‘quotas’ are excluded, however. In this respect, the South African case stands as an exception to the otherwise observable pattern connecting the constitutionally sanctioned nature of affirmative action with the use of this most rigid instrument (as in India and Malaysia) and the absence of an explicit constitutional authorization for the policy with the prevalence of supposedly more flexible procedures (as in the EU and the United States).

(34) Section 20(5).

(35) Section 20(3)(d).

(36) In the same vein, see also the unadorned acknowledgment of the double standard entailed by the positive discrimination variety of affirmative action in Motala and Another v University of Natal Supreme Court (Durban and Coast Local Division 1995 (3) BCLR 374 (D), 1995 SACLR LEXIS 256, February 24, 1995): ‘the procedure adopted by the respondent in order to compensate for the defect in the education available to African matriculants ... involves assessing African applicants on a different basis’; ‘matriculation results of accepted African applicants will in almost all cases be lower ... than those of other applicants who are not accepted’ (9, 17).

(38) ‘National Unity and Reconciliation’ (emphasis added).

(39) ‘It cannot ... be ignored that the very idea of reservation implies selection of a less meritorious person ... we recognise that this much cost has to be paid, if the constitutional promise of social justice is to be redeemed ... the small difference, that may be allowed at the stage of initial recruitment is bound to disappear in course of time’ (Indian Supreme Court, Indra Sawhney v Union of India (1992) Supp (3) SCC 217, 1992 SCC (L&S) Supp 1, JT (1992) 6SC 273, SCC 751, para 836).

(41) Since 1935 ‘Scheduled Castes’ has been the official, euphemized phrase for referring to the Untouchables—the group standing at the very bottom of the Indian status hierarchy. According to the 2001 Census, SCs now comprise 16.2 percent of the Indian population (Economic Survey of Delhi, 2007–2008, ‘Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes Population 2001 Census India’, available at (http://delhiplanning.nic.in/Economic%20percent20Survey/ES2007-08/T18.pdf)).

(42) The ‘Scheduled Tribes’ are other groups defined by their supposedly aboriginal status, religious, linguistic, and cultural specificities, and geographic isolation. They now comprise 8.1 percent of the Indian population (ibid).

(44) 1950 Constitution, Art 330.

(45) Ibid Art 332.

(46) ‘The State shall not discriminate against any citizen on grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex, place of birth or any of them’. The Supreme Court decision is State of Madras v Champakam Dorairajan, AIR 1951 SC 226.

(47) ‘Nothing in this article … shall prevent the State from making any special provision for the advancement of any socially and educationally backward classes of citizens or for the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes’ (emphasis added).

(49) Ashoka Kumar Thakur v Union of India and Others, 6 SCC 1 (April 10, 2008).

(50) The 76th Amendment (1994) eliminated the 50 percent limit on reservations (see n 40) in the state of Tamil Nadu. The 77th Amendment (1995) and 85th Amendment (2001) essentially undid the Court’s decision in Indra Sawhney v Union of India (1992) to confine reservations for the SCs and STs to initial appointment and forbid them in promotions. The 93rd Amendment (2005) enabled the state to introduce reservations for the SCs, STs, and OBCs in private as well as public educational institutions, thus overruling the Court’s decision in PA Inamdar and Others v State of Maharashtra and others, AIR 2005 SC 3226.

(51) The following paragraph mostly synthetizes elements derived from the following sources Pager (n 1-2); Clark D. Cunningham and N.R. Madhava Menon, ‘Race, Class, Caste ...? Rethinking Affirmative Action’ (1999) 97 Michigan Law Review 1297ff; and Laura Dudley Jenkins, Identity and Identification: Defining the Disadvantaged (2003).

(53) Regents of the University of California v Bakke 438 US 265, 297 (1978). See also the short development in Section II below.

(54) Pager (n 1-2), 298.

(55) See Indra Sawhney v Union of India, 81, directing the central government to set up at the state and national levels ‘a permanent body, in the nature of a Commission ... , to which complaints of wrong inclusion or non-inclusion of groups ... in the lists of OBCs can be made.’

(56) Symmetrically, in the 1963 Balaji v State of Mysore decision, the Supreme Court had already held that, just like economic disadvantage after Sawhney, caste could not be the only criterion considered for establishing OBC status.

(57) See n 40.

(59) Indra Sawhney v Union of India, 558–60.

(61) ECJ, Case C-409/95 Marschall v Land Nordrhein-Westfalen [1997] ECR I-6363, 566.

(62) Those were later upheld under strict scrutiny, but only as a court-ordered remedy for an egregious pattern of persistent discrimination by a state actor (conditions unmet in the Bakke case); see United States v Paradise 480 US 149 (1987).

(63) Regents of the University of California v Bakke, 315–18. Since then the Supreme Court has also prescribed that the extent of the boost provided by affirmative action should not be fixed ex ante, quantified, and substantial enough to be decisive (without specifying whether a judgment of unconstitutionality would be triggered by any of these factors considered in isolation); see Gratz v Bollinger 539 US 244 (2003) striking down the affirmative action program of the University of Michigan's undergraduate school, which automatically distributed 20 points out of the 100 needed to guarantee admission to all members of underrepresented racial or ethnic minorities.

(64) See Elizabeth Anderson, The Imperative of Integration (2010), 144–8.

(65) There are a small number of narrowly circumscribed exceptions. One is when the program applies in areas ancillary to the hiring decision itself, such as the allocation of training positions (see EC, Case C-158/97 George Badeck and others [2000] ECR I-1875). Another is when the measure benefits disabled persons (see Lisa Waddington and Anna Lawson, Disability and Non-Discrimination Law in the European Union: Thematic Report of the European Network of Legal Experts in the Non-Discrimination Field (2009)). A third one is the requirement in s 46 of the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000 that equal numbers of Catholics and non-Catholics be appointed to the Police Service from a pool of qualified applicants, a provision upheld by the Northern Irish High Court in In the Matter of an Application by Mark Parsons for Judicial Review [2002] NIQB 46.

(69) Marchall v Land Nordrhein-Westfalen, para 29.

(70) Ibid paras 4 and 29.

(72) Fullilove v Klutznick 448 US 448 (1980).

(76) Craig v Boren 429 US 190, 197 (1976).

(78) Wygant v Jackson Board of Education, 276.

(79) Regents of the University of California v Bakke, 314.

(80) Ibid 312 (quotation omitted).

(81) Ibid 297.

(82) West Coast Hotel Company v Parrish 300 US 379, 400 (1937) (quotation omitted).

(83) Regents of the University of California v Bakke, 296–7.

(84) Ibid 312–14.

(87) See Daniel Sabbagh, *Equality and Transparency: A Strategic Perspective on Affirmative Action in American
As emphasized by the legal scholar Robert Post, ‘the justification of diversity, unlike remedy, has no built-in time horizon’ (Robert Post, ‘The Supreme Court 2002 Term: Fashioning the Legal Constitution: Culture, Courts, and Law’ (2003) 117 Harvard Law Review 67 n 306). See also Tushnet (n 85), 662:

The different experiences members of racial minorities bring to their classes are rooted in culture, and whatever improvements in material conditions there might be seem unlikely to do much—at least within twenty-five years, the Court's purported ‘end point’—to alter culture-based experiences.

Grutter v Bollinger, 330.

Ibid.

In order to cultivate a set of leaders with legitimacy in the eyes of the citizenry, it is necessary that the path to leadership be visibly open to talented and qualified individuals of every race and ethnicity’ (ibid 332).

Regents of the University of California v Bakke, 379 (opinion of Justices Brennan, Marshall, White, and Blackmun).

City of Richmond v Croson, 471, 509–10 (emphasis added).

Ibid 528 (emphasis added).

In the same vein, see also Parents Involved in Community Schools v Seattle School District No 1 551 US 701, 787–9 (2007) (concurring opinion of Justice Kennedy).

See n 63.

Gratz v Bollinger, 298 (dissenting opinion of Justice Souter).

Ibid 305 (dissenting opinion of Justice Ginsburg).

Regents of the University of California v Bakke, 319 (quotation omitted).

Daniel Sabbagh
Daniel Sabbagh is Senior Research Fellow at Sciences Po, Centre d’études et de recherches internationales (CERI)
This article explores the connections between bioethics and basic rights partly by analyzing the basic legal norms of bioethics, and partly by comparing thematic cases from the jurisdictions of the European Court of Human Rights and the US Supreme Court, as well as some cases from other jurisdictions. It focuses on two major lines of thought in contemporary bioethics: the first is concerned with the boundaries of life (e.g., issues of embryo research, assisted reproduction, and end of life decisions) and the second is related to the contemporary exploration of the frontiers of the human body (issues such as the use of human tissues and human DNA for research and other purposes).

Keywords: bioethics, basic rights, human rights, European Court of Human Rights, US Supreme Court, life, human body

I. Bioethics and Human Rights 1143
   1. The Influence of Normative Bioethics 1144
   2. Is There a Common European Approach? 1145
   3. The European Convention of Human Rights and Biomedicine 1145
   5. Bioethical Considerations in National Constitutions 1146

II. The Jurisprudence of Core Bioethical Questions 1148
   1. Beginning of Life and Reproductive Rights in Light of New Technologies 1148
   2. Informed Consent Rules and Reproductive Rights 1150
   3. Concept of Procreative Liberties and Bioethics in US Jurisprudence 1150
   4. Research on Human Embryos and on Embryonic Stem Cells 1151
   5. End of Life Decisions in Europe 1154
   6. End of Life Cases in the United States and Other Jurisdictions 1155
   7. Extending Basic Rights to Human Tissues and Cells 1156

III. Conclusions 1159

The basic concept of human rights is that people have certain moral rights by virtue of being human. But it does not follow from this concept that international instruments of human rights and the national constitutions protect all rights agreed or shared within international or national communities. The recent incorporation of certain bioethical norms into constitutional amendments and, more typically, into new interpretations of general constitutional rights in the domain of health care, therefore, is a result of a long history. Moreover, bioethics and human rights have, for many decades, developed separately. The two disciplines have different historical roots; they each have distinct scopes, perspectives, and methods of interpretation. Except for the right to be informed before a ‘medical experimentation’, which appeared (p. 1143) soon after the Second World War,¹ many of the bioethical norms have been formulated as basic human rights only in the last decades of the twentieth century. Furthermore, it should be emphasized that rights and values within bioethics are not regarded as automatically transferable to constitutional rights, nor even to statutory rights.

The main point of departure from the previous, paternalistic model was the possibility to treat many chronic diseases, and the availability of several non-therapeutic interventions, biomedical research, genetic screening, and reproductive services. These medical interventions presuppose entirely different doctor–patient relationships than, for instance, in emergency care. The patients’ autonomy, their views on life, are material in the decisions on making choices between different alternatives. Furthermore, by the beginning of the twenty-first century, several new technologies, such as genetic testing, assisted reproduction, stem cell research and therapy, nanotechnology, synthetic biology, and neuroscience have provided insights into basic processes of life, human behavior, and human heredity. The splendid isolation of science has been seriously questioned by social scientists, bioethicists, and by the public; science is no longer regarded as a value-free pure domain of research. Its ambition to unlock the basic elements of our human existence required a common thinking on the implications.

In this chapter, the connections between bioethics and basic rights will be explored partly by analyzing the basic legal norms of bioethics, and partly by comparing thematic cases from the jurisdictions of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) and the US Supreme Court, as well as some cases from other jurisdictions. I will primarily focus on two major lines of thought in contemporary bioethics: the first is concerned with the boundaries of life (eg issues of embryo research, assisted reproduction, and end of life decisions) and the second is related to the contemporary exploration of the frontiers of the human body (issues such as the use of human tissues and human DNA for research and other purposes). In what follows, I will examine questions that are eminently bioethical but I will not tackle problems that arise in the context of general moral concerns, such as the permissibility of abortion—which will only be considered when sui generis bioethical issues, such as access to prenatal genetic tests or the institutionalization of informed consent before the termination of pregnancy or sterilization, emerge at the intersection of basic rights and bioethics.

1. Bioethics and Human Rights

Bioethics traditionally focuses on establishing moral limits between different types of acts in the field of life sciences and their medical application. There is no established method to recognize the moment when some universal norms have crystallized from the literature of bioethics and when they become basic rights in fields of bioethics.

Since its first use, the term ‘bioethics’ has had at least two different meanings, one broader than the other. The broader concept was coined by Van Rensselaer Potter in 1970 (p. 1144) and it advocates a comprehensive and global view of bioethics that integrates even environmental ethics. A different type of interpretation was advocated by André E. Hellegers who used the term ‘bioethics’ for the first time in an academic field of learning and in the context of public policy and the human life sciences. Bioethics in this view is a way of approaching and resolving moral conflicts generated by a new concept of medicine. This more restricted view has become dominant in much of the theory and practice of bioethics.

Recently, bioethics has also been regarded as a discipline that provides a critical perspective not only on the practice of medicine and biotechnology, but also on the traditional framework of human rights. Therefore, authors such as Brooke A. Ackerly consider grouping bioethics together with queer theory, cultural studies, critical race theory, and multiculturalism as a critical approach to the universal human rights. Indeed, bioethics shapes the contours of basic rights in two different ways. First, it broadens the catalog of basic rights or at least aims to stretch the interpretation of rights to the domain of bioethics. Secondly, the bioethics movement extends to the subjects of protection, for example to ‘future generations’. In other words, bioethics encompasses not just biological but also legal and philosophical conceptions of the person.

1. The Influence of Normative Bioethics

Human rights instruments after the Second World War paid little attention to issues related today to bioethics except for the problem of ‘medical experimentation without consent’. The turn occurred around 1997 when the Human Genome Project and the possibility of cloning mammals put bioethics at the forefront of human rights debates. And even though all attempts at human cloning have failed thus far, it is still considered to be one of the most controversial problems in bioethics, both from political and legal perspectives. This fear even motivated the United Nations to draft an international declaration specifically on human cloning which prohibits all forms of cloning if they contradict the protection of human dignity.\textsuperscript{7}

The fundamental principles of bioethics are recognized in international declarations developed under the aegis of the UN network. The General Conference of UNESCO has adopted three significant, though not binding, international declarations.\textsuperscript{8} The first, and most important, is the 1997 Universal Declaration on the Human Genome and Human Rights, and the title itself is a telling reference to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR). This declaration has led to the development of universally accepted bioethical principles, such as respect for human dignity, non-commercialization, benefit sharing, and scientific progress, which have attained high recognition in international law, at a level equivalent to that of the UDHR. This Declaration repeatedly evokes the concept of ‘human dignity’: in referring in Article 2 to (p. 1145) the uniqueness of the human genome and in Article 11 as a reason for prohibiting reproductive cloning.\textsuperscript{9}

Additionally, Beauchamp and Childress have developed four major principles of bioethics\textsuperscript{10} which have since been used worldwide in analyzing cases, as well as in ethics education. These four principles are: respect for autonomy, which means respecting the decision-making capacities of autonomous persons that enable individuals to make informed choices; beneficence, which considers the balancing of benefits of treatment against the risks and costs; non-maleficence, which dictates avoiding harm; and finally justice, which is applicable in deciding both the allocation and costs, and the benefits and risks within health-care systems.

2. Is There a Common European Approach?

The recognition of the above principles and the emergence of the constitutional and human rights aspects in bioethics are reflected at the regional supranational level. The Charter of Fundamental Rights of the European Union, now legally binding within the scope of EU law, offers a catalog of common bioethical principles, such as human dignity and integrity and the right to life. Regarding human integrity, the Charter refers to free and informed consent, non-commercialization, and the prohibition of eugenic practices and human reproductive cloning. Human embryonic research and the boundaries of human embryonic stem cell (hESC) research, issues central to the European debate, are not addressed directly.

Bioethics and ethical aspects of new technologies are viewed within the European Union as subjects that fall within the competence of the member states, as part of EU commitments to ethical pluralism and the principle of subsidiarity. Nevertheless, over the years an increasing number of European norms have been adopted that are to be considered with regard to biomedical research. One part of these norms contains safety requirements, but an increasing number of legal requirements that are similar to ethical standards have been formulated.

A further interesting feature of the European approach is that—even though several international ethical norms, such as the Helsinki Declaration, are not legally binding—for international research projects to be financed by the Commission, they must comply with a number of ethical norms that are otherwise not included in legally binding European norms. In general, though, the European framework indicates that diversity among European states is the prevailing characteristic of regulating the ethical boundaries of biomedical research.

3. The European Convention of Human Rights and Biomedicine

Though the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) was adopted in 1950, bioethics was not included in it until the 1997 Oviedo Convention of the Council of Europe. However, the lack of universal endorsement indicates the ongoing constitutional differences and differences in national interests among the European states.\textsuperscript{11} The European nature of the document (p. 1146) is expressed by the emphasis laid on human dignity as the fundamental value in biomedicine. Its scope is both broad and ambiguous: instead of the term ‘everyone’, ‘all human beings’ is used, which indicates a more biologically oriented notion of legal subjects\textsuperscript{12} as well as the ambition to cover a broader field of subject.\textsuperscript{13}

While the legal regulation of bioethics is principally covered by the national systems of the member states, the jurisprudence of the ECtHR reveals the contradictions and dilemmas of the prevailing European constitutional approach. The ECtHR follows the logic and limits of the ECHR, but within the frame of the rights protected under the Convention the ECtHR has had to reflect on bioethical dilemmas. It follows from the ‘living instrument’ approach that the ECHR reflects on moral or/and technical progress in various fields. However, general moral concerns and bioethical concerns should be differentiated. For instance, general religious and other moral concerns often appear in the legal debates on the permissibility of abortion. However, when the content of informed consent before abortion or the accessibility of less invasive methods of abortion, or access to prenatal genetic tests appear before the Court, then rules and principles of bioethics can be taken into consideration, such as the principles of autonomy or non-maleficence.

5. Bioethical Considerations in National Constitutions

Recent advances in biomedicine and biomedical research have raised ethical concerns that have forced international and supranational organizations to take a stand and incorporate bioethical norms into various conventions, declarations, and recommendations. On the national level, however, this process has resulted mainly in specific statutory provisions in health-care law, civil law, family law, and data protection law. In other words, constitutions, with some minor exceptions, have remained untouched by this normative process.

Despite the overall lack of specific constitutional provisions on bioethical issues, the application of the concepts of dignity, liberty, privacy, freedom of expression, and freedom of scientific research can offer some help in interpreting and analyzing the legal contours of contested new technologies. But as Sheila Jasanoff has stated, the ‘Constitution provides no guidance on the questions of how social change in general, and scientific change particular, should bear on the interpretation of constitutional prohibitions or guarantees.’

Human dignity plays a central role in basic rights and values in several constitutions, and also in the basic international norms of bioethics: for instance, in the Oviedo Convention and in the Universal Declaration of Bioethics and Human Rights. Dignity can serve as a basis for several rights such as self-determination, right to refuse medical treatment, and equal respect; all relevant in the field of treating vulnerable patients. (See Chapter 18.)

A further fundamental constitutional pillar is the freedom of science. This is expressed in numerous constitutions (see eg Art 5 of the German Basic Law; Art 33 of the Italian Constitution; Art 59 of the Slovenian Constitution). Protecting the freedom of science has been interpreted as safeguarding scientific research and the dissemination of research results from undue influence, such as censorship or state control for the purposes of using science as a biopolitical goal. However, commercial interests may distort scientific results and their application, and this is also an emerging challenge for constitutionality.

The constitutional principle of scientific freedom, however, does not presuppose that science is a value-free and objective enterprise. Judicial interpretation runs into difficulty when it has to analyze scientific activity in a complex way: to separate scientific advances from commercial interests, to peel off the legacy of an older, paternalistic professional tradition, and to deflect eugenic and reductionist thinking.

In the constitutions that do offer explicit provisions relevant for bioethical questions—similarly to international conventions and declarations—the most recent issues (even theoretical possibilities, such as reproductive human cloning) have attracted more attention than the classical issues (such as informed consent, death, and dying).

Article 24 of the Serbian Constitution declares that ‘Human life is inviolable. There shall be no death penalty in the Republic of Serbia. Cloning of human beings shall be prohibited.’ It is interesting to note that while international bioethical norms prohibit human cloning based on the principle that it violates human dignity, the Serbian approach derives this prohibition from the right to life. One can assume that while the dignity-based approach focuses on the moral aspects of cloning human beings, the right-to-life-based prohibition places the emphasis on safety, as human cloning (in its currently developing state) threatens life.

One of the most detailed constitutional frameworks of bioethics is provided by the Swiss Constitution, which details conditions for research conducted in the fields of assisted reproduction and gene technology. Donation of the human embryo and human ova are prohibited and even the number of harvested human oocytes is maximized in the Constitution. Organ and oocyte trade, as well as surrogacy, are also expressis verbis forbidden in the Swiss
The rich constitutional dimension of bioethics can be further demonstrated by the lively debate on anonymity in assisted reproduction. As a result of public debate initiated by a referendum, the Swiss Constitution has recognized the right to genetic identity.\(^{20}\)

In the US context, a unique example is the California Stem Cell Research and Cures Act that resulted in adding Article XXXV on Medical Research to the California Constitution. Section 5 of this article establishes a constitutional right to conduct stem cell research. Section 3, however, prohibits funding for reproductive cloning.

Peru, Paraguay, and Chile express in their constitutions a strong pro-life position, where a major issue is even whether the use of contraception contradicts the right to life as enshrined in the Peruvian Constitution.

The Inter-American Commission on Human Rights held that the Costa Rican Constitutional Court decision prohibiting \textit{in vitro} fertilization (IVF)\(^{21}\) itself violated the right to be free from arbitrary interference with one's private life, the right to found a family, and women's right to equality.\(^{22}\)

\section*{II. The Jurisprudence of Core Bioethical Questions}

\subsection*{1. Beginning of Life and Reproductive Rights in Light of New Technologies}

The edges of life constitute the fields where most bioethics problems arise. Moral limits and legal frontiers of euthanasia and end of life decisions, as well as termination of pregnancy, have resulted in many constitutional and human rights cases. In cases of assisted reproduction, with the advent of new technology courts have had to face numerous bio-cultural issues and differences that they had never faced in the context of non-medicalized reproduction.\(^{23}\) In the domain of reproductive rights, the right to privacy (in the United States) and the right to private and family life (in Europe) provide the main pillars of the constitutional framework.

One of the most rapidly developing fields is the interpretation of procreative liberties vis-à-vis new reproductive technologies. At the European level, there is no consensus on the nature and status of the embryo and/or fetus, although they are beginning to receive some protection in light of scientific progress and the potential consequences of research into genetic engineering, medically assisted procreation, and embryo experimentation. The ECtHR is convinced that it is neither desirable, nor even possible as matters stand, to answer in the abstract the question whether the unborn child is a person for the purposes of the right to life provision in the Convention \textit{(Vo v France)}\(^{24}\).

Recent cases concern access to IVF, wrongful life and birth, and custodial rights over embryos. In these instances, the potentiality of life has to be assessed but the applicability of abortion case law is disputable. For instance, the very same legal regimes that allow termination of pregnancy during the first trimester based on the request of the pregnant woman may come to an entirely different conclusion when a woman expresses her wish alone to have an \textit{in vitro} embryo implanted in her.

The complexity of the legal questions of assisted procreation has urged many countries to establish a specialized board of ethics with the aim of mapping both the ethical and legal issues before legislation, incorporating ethical concerns into recommendation for legislation.\(^{25}\) Perhaps it is this focus on ethics that has led to the very different legal solutions even within \textit{(p. 1149)} Europe. For example, the United Kingdom and Spain have developed a liberal approach, while Germany, despite its strong embryo protection law, has allowed the import and use of already existing embryonic stem cell lines.

Assisted reproduction was one of the first widespread technologies that raised both ethical and legal questions. The ECtHR was faced with these questions in the \textit{Evans v United Kingdom} case,\(^{26}\) where the applicant claimed that her privacy rights were infringed by granting a legal possibility to destroy her embryos based on her partner's request. While access to many forms of IVF is accepted as a rule,\(^{27}\) the issue here was the conflict between the rights of the prospective mother and the male producer of the embryo. It is the \textit{in vitro} procedure and \textit{ex utero} storage that create disruption between the phases of human reproduction. The legal contradiction here is that while assisted reproduction was developed with the aim of helping to ensure rights of the infertile and to grant them... privacy and a health service that would eliminate the pain of being childless, the disruption of the procedure then created an opportunity to invade the privacy and right to family life in regular cases of reproduction. As the Evans case shows, procreative liberties are often recognized as negative liberties (women should not be prevented from carrying on their pregnancy), but this liberty is not applicable in cases of in vitro treatment when the Court recognized that here the father's right not to become a parent should prevail over the woman's interest in becoming a mother.\textsuperscript{28}

This case may have many different interpretations. The Court took into account the assessment of the new reproductive technologies when it recognized the disruption of procreation and pregnancy in the case of in vitro treatment. However, the ethical theory it used is not clear, thereby showing that the logic of bioethics is not directly transferable into law which relies on traditional forms of rights and interests. If, in this instance, bioethics was of any influence then it was manifested only in reference to the main sources of bioethics.\textsuperscript{29} A competing view, that would follow from bioethics, would take into account and assess the difference in the burden of physical involvement in the procedure. Lengthy hormonal treatment and invasive extraction of the human eggs pose significantly more of a burden on women than is the case with sperm donation.

The main ethical dilemma of the Evans case, therefore, was whether biological differences in gamete donation could be taken into account in assessing the rights of male and female donors. Furthermore, the Court missed the opportunity to recognize the difference between preventing someone from becoming a parent and the denial of the right to change opinion on biological parenthood.\textsuperscript{30}

2. Informed Consent Rules and Reproductive Rights

In the recent ECtHR case of RR v Poland,\textsuperscript{31} the applicant was prevented from undergoing prenatal genetic testing within the statutory time limit within which abortion was still legal, despite her repeated requests to have access to a genetic test that could have confirmed whether her fetus was healthy. After several doctors in Poland refused to offer her the test, and when the genetic test was finally performed after significant delay, she had already missed the deadline for requesting an abortion. Eventually, the baby was born with Turner syndrome. According to the ECtHR, the right to access to this type of genetic information falls within ‘the ambit of the notion of private life’.\textsuperscript{32} In the absence of access to genetic test rights, protection would have remained ‘theoretical or illusory’.\textsuperscript{33}

3. Concept of Procreative Liberties and Bioethics in US Jurisprudence

US jurisprudence on procreative liberties developed parallel to the recognition of rights to privacy.\textsuperscript{34} In addition, freedom of research in the United States in general has led to a favorable environment for various technologies in the field of assisted reproduction and procreative liberties.\textsuperscript{35} It should be noted, however, that judicial views that support the concept of negative liberties in procreation do not automatically generate access rights to services to assisted procreation, at least in the US constitutional tradition. However, cases in the field of eugenic practices do often serve as a basis for critical reflections on genetics. Ever since the early eugenic episodes in science were reaffirmed by judicial acknowledgment, eugenic thinking and eugenic jurisprudence have served as a learning experience for the contemporary conception of how and what to regulate in science.\textsuperscript{36}

Buck v Bell\textsuperscript{37} is the seminal eugenic decision of the US Supreme Court, and is still one of the most frequently cited cases in the fields of disability, gender, and bioethics. The Buck Court upheld the constitutionality of non-voluntary sterilization in cases of preventing inherited ‘degeneration’, with Justice Holmes asserting that the ‘principle that sustains compulsory vaccination is broad enough to cover cutting the Fallopian tubes’.\textsuperscript{38} The Supreme Court has never overruled the decision in the Buck v Bell, although society's perception of disability and on the value of life has entirely changed since the decision. In Skinner v Oklahoma,\textsuperscript{39} the US Supreme Court, however, held unconstitutional an Oklahoma statute that provided for the involuntary sterilization of the poor and of certain categories of recidivists that were characterized by ‘moral turpitude’. The Supreme Court determined that the Equal Protection Clause prohibited the enforcement of the Oklahoma statute which required sterilization of persons who had been convicted of certain specified crimes. The distinction between categories of crimes, nevertheless, indicated a hidden eugenic pattern of thought.

In Griswold v Connecticut,\textsuperscript{40} the Court invalidated a statute that penalized the distribution of contraceptives. A further step was made in constructing reproductive rights in Eisenstadt v Baird,\textsuperscript{41} when Justice Brennan held that ‘if the right to privacy means anything, it is the right of the individual, married or single, to be free of unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decisions whether to bear or beget a child.’

Roe v Wade provided a trimester framework that guided states on whether they may regulate some elements of abortion. Furthermore, the Roe v Wade Court recognized the privacy rights of the pregnant woman and her attending physician in deciding about termination of pregnancy during the first trimester. Later, the Casey case offered new possibilities for regulation provided that they do not pose an undue burden on women. However, although abortion cases are often cited in the context of new reproductive technologies, significant moral and practical differences between in vivo and in vitro embryo question or at least reduce the applicability of these norms. The possibility of extra corporal reproduction has resulted in numerous legal problems, such as postmortem reproduction, custodial rights over the embryo, right to identity, and medical confidentiality. In Hecht v Superior Court, the Court did not find any public policy that would prohibit or deny postmortem insemination and, as a consequence, they granted access as the late partner had clearly expressed his wish before his death.

In the context of new reproductive technologies, access to IVF treatment seems to pose different kinds of legal problems in the United States than in Europe. The validity of surrogacy agreements served as the basis of several Court decisions, such as the Baby M case. In Johnson v Calvert, the California Supreme Court rejected a claim by the gestational (surrogate) mother that she be recognized as the mother of the IVF child. Although birth may establish maternity, the Court developed a different standard by referring to genetic consanguinity and intention expressed by the genetic parents to raise the child. The recognition of family based on genetic ties rather than on marriage has also influenced paternity rights, which is demonstrated in numerous cases, such as the dissent in Michael H v Gerald D, in which Justice Scalia in the majority opinion defended the marital/‘unitary family’ idea.

4. Research on Human Embryos and on Embryonic Stem Cells

One of the most sensitive issues in current bioethics is the research conducted on the (surplus, in vitro) human embryo. The Oviedo Convention leaves the question of the status of the human embryo and research on the human embryo partially open by the provision of Article 18(1) which states that ‘where the law allows research on embryos in vitro, it shall ensure adequate protection of the embryo’. Arguably, this could encompass the destruction of human embryos in an adequately safeguarded process for the purpose of hESC derivation. The more contentious provision in Article 18(2)—which has prevented ratification of the Convention by all Council of Europe states as it has been considered alternately either too liberal or too conservative—prohibits the creation of embryos for research purposes.

The Constitution of Ecuador in Article 49(1) explicitly prohibits research on human embryos. Germany and Switzerland prohibit all forms of human cloning whereas others, among them the United Kingdom, China, and Israel, allow the creation of cloned human embryos for research.

A distinction should be made between cases where research on the human embryo is allowed for the purposes of improving reproductive technologies and cases where the embryo is harvested in order to produce embryonic stem cell lines.

When human biological materials are used as building blocks for stem cells, usually the act of harvesting biological materials poses other types of legal issues as it might involve an instrumentalization of the human body. In these new types of research, bodily substances are used in two different ways: they are used not only as sources and objects of scientific observation but also as materials for creating cell lines.

The influence of bioethics can also be seen in the latest development of the patentability of biotechnological inventions in the field of regenerative medicine. In order to provide the effective and harmonized legal protection of biotechnological inventions, the embryo needs to be given an autonomous definition in EU law.

The WARF decision of the European Patent Office Enlarged Board of Appeal confirmed in 2008 that the ‘industrial or commercial use’ clause, which was introduced to prohibit the commodification of the human embryo, excludes the patentability of hES cells or cell lines due to the fact that the production of hES cells requires the destruction of the human embryos used as their source. The decision did not, however, make a distinction between embryos according to their origin, developmental phase, and acceptable uses, a distinction key to national regulations on embryonic research. A landmark decision was made at the end of 2011 in the Brüstle case when the European Court of Justice ruled that a process which involves the removal of a stem cell from a human embryo at the blastocyst stage, entailing the destruction of that embryo, cannot be patented.

The need of the biotechnology industry for human embryos and their use for embryonic stem cell research and for therapy often results in incoherent legal solutions. In 2008, the Brazilian Supreme Court upheld the Biosecurity Law that allowed the destruction of human embryos for the purposes of creating embryonic stem cell lines, while abortion has remained restricted in the country. A double inconsistency can be observed in the German position on research on the human embryo: research on the human embryo is not authorized, although the German Basic Law guarantees the freedom of research and science in broad terms; however, embryonic stem cell lines can be imported and used for research.

In the United States, political ideological conflicts govern the issues of embryo research. The federal ethics committee created under the Clinton administration, the National Bioethics Advisory Commission (NBAC), in its 1999 report accepted that ethical positions regarding the moral status of the human embryo differ in society and different sources of human embryos may attract different moral positions.

The liberal ethical position on the federal level changed when in 2005 a report from the President's Council on Bioethics, appointed by the Bush administration, suggested that in the United States the protection of human life from the earliest stages of development, including the human embryo, is an ethical norm widely accepted in society. It held that seeking therapies by means of destroying human embryos is ethically unacceptable and in order to reconcile scientific progress with the requirements of bioethics, biomedicine must find ethically acceptable sources for hES cells. However, a state constitutional amendment granted a right to conduct stem cell research in California.

A 2007 Executive Order gave priority to ethically responsible ways of conducting hESC research. It emphasized that ethically acceptable sources of hESC lines exclude cell lines which necessitate the creation of embryos for research purposes or destroying, discarding, or subjecting to harm a human embryo. It also held that the destruction of embryos violates the principle of non-commodification and that human embryos are ‘members of the human species’. The Executive Order envisioned the United States progressing in biomedical research while maintaining the clearly established ethical boundaries and standards of medical research and respecting human life and dignity.

The debate reached another turning point in 2009 when the Obama administration reviewed the federal funding moratorium imposed in 2001. The 2009 Executive Order emphasized the necessity of hESC research for the purposes of enhancing human biomedical knowledge and creating new therapies.

Biotechnological inventions enjoy broad protection in the US Constitution and jurisprudence. The US Constitution in Article I, section 8 authorizes the Congress ‘to promote the Progress of Science and Useful Arts’ by granting authors and inventors the exclusive rights to their works for a limited time. The breakthrough in the history of biotechnological patents occurred in the US case of Diamond v Chakrabarty which has since been labeled as granting patents on life.

In 2010, a preliminary injunction created uncertainty in the field of financing research on embryonic stem cells. Since the Obama administration has developed a more favorable environment for embryonic stem cell research, the issue was whether the increasing number of new projects should consequently receive financial support. The main issue was whether the National Institutes of Health should fund additional research projects on stem cells that involve the destruction of the human embryo. One year later, the District Court ruled in favor of the National Institute of Health and removed this injunction.

5. End of Life Decisions in Europe

As methods of intensive therapies have significantly increased the possibilities for artificial prolongation of human life, several issues have been raised. Who should decide on the health care of the terminally ill? Who can substitute the decision of a patient in a persistent vegetative stage? The principle of autonomy can serve as an ethical basis in cases where the terminally ill are still capable of expressing their wish. However, the principle of non-maleficence would prevent doctors from complying with requests for refusal of medical treatment unless the law recognizes that this refusal is self-determination within the concept of human dignity or/and encompassed by the concept of interests of liberty. As suffering and death take many forms, diverse solutions have emerged to face this medico-legal problem in different cultures and legal systems. In such concrete cases, legal terms, such as ‘euthanasia’, have become confusing, because we tend to define it to include many different types of actions and inactions.

Page 8 of 19

The simultaneous existence of individual autonomous action and the assistance of a physician or a relative usually lead to legal proceedings. As Derrick Beyleveld and Roger Brownsword point out, human dignity ‘can encourage a paternalism that is incompatible with the spirit of self-determination that informs the mainstream of human rights thinking.’

In all euthanasia debates, an accurate legal delineation between different forms of ending life is very difficult to achieve. Voluntary active euthanasia is legalized only in the Benelux countries while assisted suicide is not regarded as a crime in Switzerland. But what constitutes passive euthanasia is still debated in several jurisdictions. The question is still dominated by two independently developed fields of law. While public health law focuses on the duties of physicians and requires professional integrity and the saving of life, the more recent legal developments based on patients’ rights respect the right to self-determination even in cases where the patient refuses medical intervention.

Alternately, these decisions may be treated as outside the realms of the courts and may be left in the hands of physicians. The Dutch position was the first directly to target the issue of this confidentiality in end of life decisions and Dutch statutory law gradually developed based on the analysis of the publication of confidential decisions on ending life based on, and even without, the patient’s request. Less radical steps have been taken in other European countries, and after a long debate the French Parliament recognized the right of the terminally ill to refuse medical treatment although it did not legalize active forms of euthanasia.

The most significant case on the legal dilemmas of assisted suicide appeared in Pretty v United Kingdom. The applicant was suffering from a serious degenerative disease due to which she was paralyzed from the neck downwards. She requested the ECHR to give her authorization for her to end her life in dignity and to guarantee her husband freedom from prosecution if he assisted her in committing suicide, an exemption that was denied in the United Kingdom. She claimed that the right to life also includes the right to self-determination in life-related issues. Consequently, life is a right and not an obligation. She submitted that this included the right to choose when and how to die, and that nothing could be more intimately connected to the manner in which a person conducted her life than the manner and timing of her death. The judges in Strasbourg concluded that the individual had no right to death, or life, in the sense that the legal system should accept the right to assist any suicide as a general principle. However, the Court acknowledged that under Article 8 that notions of the quality of life take on significance. In an era of growing medical sophistication combined with longer life expectancies, many people are concerned that they should not be forced to linger on in old age or in states of advanced physical or mental decrepitude which conflict with strongly held ideas of self and personal identity.

The Pretty case generated significant debate on autonomy and terminal illness. Since then, several European countries, including Austria and Finland, have enacted laws on the recognition of continuing power of attorney which provide stronger guarantees of the self determination of the terminally ill.

6. End of Life Cases in the United States and Other Jurisdictions

One of the main dilemmas in bioethics occurs when the principle of autonomy clashes with the principles of non-maleficence. In the language of constitutional law, similar hard cases appear when individual liberty and state interest in protecting life demand different solutions in cases of end of life decisions.

In the United States, there has been a piecemeal development of the recognition of liberty rights in the field of terminal illness. Thus, the lower court cases of Karen Quinlan, Bouvia, and Re Conroy, and the Supreme Court Cruzan case provided the main pillars of the recognition of some forms of euthanasia in cases of terminal illness or of persistent vegetative state. In Cruzan, although the US Supreme Court affirmed that the legal requirement of Missouri on clear and convincing evidence of the will of the patient who is no longer capable of expressing her wish does not violate the Constitution, it still provided a constitutional basis embedded in the liberty interest to encompass the wish to (p. 1156) terminate life-saving nutrition and hydration. However, this development towards extending liberty interests in end of life decisions was interrupted when the issue of whether medical assistance in suicide can be granted reached the Supreme Court in the Washington v Glucksberg case.76

In Washington v Glucksberg,77 the US Supreme Court failed to recognize a fundamental right to access medically assisted suicide, based on the request of the dying patient. Instead, the Supreme Court held that Washington’s prohibition against ‘causing’ or ‘aiding’ a suicide does not violate the Due Process Clause. The Court's reasoning was based on a historical argument, rather than acknowledgment of the conditions of liberty rights.

Different layers of statutory law may further shrink liberty interests: as exemplified by the issue in Gonzales v Oregon78 in 2006, when the US Supreme Court ruled that State Attorneys General could not enforce the Federal Controlled Substances Act against physicians who prescribed drugs for assisted suicide in compliance with Oregon state law.

Outside the United States and Europe, a law legalizing euthanasia was adopted in the Northern Territory of Australia in 1995,79 but was nullified by the federal parliament two years after it went into effect. In Canada, the Rodriguez80 case tackled the issues of assisted suicide, requested by a patient suffering from a serious illness. The patient based her argument on the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which provides in section 7 that ‘everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the rights not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.’ Justice Sopinka, writing for a narrow majority, rejected the claim of the petitioner that she just wanted to determine the time and manner of her death, and therefore denied her request.

A very different logic was followed in the leading UK case, Airedale NHS Trust v Bland.81 There, the House of Lords ruled in favor of those representing Tony Bland, a patient in a persistent vegetative state with no hope of recovery, allowing his artificial feeding, and therefore his life, to be ended. The court's decision was based on the reasoning that it was in the patient’s ‘best interests’ for treatment to be withdrawn and that its discontinuance was in accordance with good medical practice.

7. Extending Basic Rights to Human Tissues and Cells

The legal concept of the right to privacy provides a theoretical foundation for guaranteeing various forms of self-determination over the human body. However, when the issue of disconnected body parts, human tissue,82 and DNA is raised, the concept of privacy seems to be an insufficient legal category to describe the complex relationship between the donor and the stored human tissue samples that are used for research purposes. On the one hand, the human DNA sample symbolizes and represents the person but, on the other hand, it is also regarded as a gift or personal contribution to research of public interest, as a symbol of public participation. When we deal with the legal implications of genetic data or storing human tissue samples in biobanks, a preliminary legal question has to be addressed, namely whether we are facing a (p. 1157) human rights problem or are we in a field which requires regulation of the safety and logistics of research on human DNA.83

Defining the boundaries of the human body is especially relevant and justifies legal scrutiny when we look at research conducted on human beings, because of the potential abuses and possibilities of psychological or physical harm.84 However, most research carried out today is not conducted on human beings but on human tissue, blood samples, and human DNA. Humans as research subjects are not actually present in the laboratories when research ‘on them’ is carried out. In other words, more and more human research is done not on the human body but on human bodily substances.

Research rules therefore have to be developed in order to respond to these different kinds of uses. For instance, legally, it still matters how human biological materials are being collected, and consent for collection and for specific use should be a precondition for research. Legal policy should then differentiate whether the research material still carries personal information.

In the field of the application of genetic research, legal issues are mostly concentrated around the problem of how new genetic information affects our basic human relations, family ties, decisions over the reproduction, insurance, employment, and intellectual property. To be more precise, how genetic information should be qualified, what kinds of rights can be established based on this knowledge, who should hold this knowledge, and who is to control this intrinsically individual, wide-ranging information that can easily be obtained by others are all major legal issues. Is it the genetic sample itself that should be protected, or rather the data that can be revealed during an examination of the sample? Or is it both of them in an identical manner, the sample as a set of data or separately as human tissue, or that the DNA information should be regarded as a special type of personal data?

These concerns often manifest when considering biobanks,55 where there are two main methods of considering related legal issues. One is the concept of privacy; the other is the question of ownership.66 While privacy aims to restrict access to samples and data, current tendencies in interpreting ownership point towards increased demand for the public use of biobanks. A right to privacy in biobank regulations refers mainly to the protection of personal data in collecting, storing, and processing samples and data, as well as the techniques for (p. 1158) shielding data from the curious eyes of third parties. Most international norms and national laws focus on protecting the data subject while claiming enhanced guarantees for securing privacy and confidentiality in the domain of biobanks. Some authors, such as Graeme Laurie, have already elaborated a notion of genetic privacy. Based on privacy concerns, the Dutch National Steering Committee decided in 2001 that samples in the national repository of dried blood spots of newborns have to be destroyed five years after the blood is taken.88

In the ECHR, the most important ruling so far is Marper v United Kingdom,89 which has had far-reaching repercussions: while it primarily dealt with human rights guarantees in criminal procedures in the context of storing DNA samples taken from criminal suspects, it also touched on the legal classification of genetic samples and data, ruling that ‘the retention at issue constitutes disproportionate interference with the applicants’ right to respect for private life and cannot be regarded as necessary in a democratic society’.90 In the Court’s view, all the unlawfully retained information—the fingerprints, the DNA profiles, and the sample itself—qualify as personal data under the data protection convention, since each one can be directly linked to the individual suspect.91 Obiter dicta the Court also mentioned that both genetic samples and derived genetic data fall under the protection of private life, which supports those who consider genetic material and data a special case because of the possibility of personal identification.

*Moore v Regents of the University of California*93 is a US state case that deals with the use of human cells for research and for commercial purposes. While the Court ruled that individuals do not have an ownership interest in their cells after the cells have been removed from their bodies, it nevertheless recognized an importantbioethical principle based on informed consent and on fiduciary duties by claiming that physicians need to disclose their research interests to their patients. Justice Mosk, in his dissenting opinion, was in favor of considering the patients’ contribution to biological invention more significantly.

Not only individual patients but patients’ groups may also actively participate in biomedical research. In 2003, in Greenberg v Miami Children’s Hospital Research Institute,94 a group of individuals provided samples and medical data for researchers to explore the Canavan disease. However, when a patent was developed, the patients were not notified and could not benefit from the new tests or its profits. The federal district court ruled that individuals do not own their tissue samples.

One of the most well-known debates over the ownership of biological samples was elaborated in Washington University v Catalona.95 In this case, Dr William Catalona set up a biobank at Washington University and, over the course of 25 years, collected 3,500 samples from (p. 1159) patients diagnosed with prostate cancer. In this case, agreements between the researcher and the donors were overridden by the fact that the biobank had been used by the university for public purposes. The Court regarded the biological sample collection differently from a biobank, and considered it as a public entity belonging to the university and not to the scientist. The Court held that individual donors who provide biological specimens for research do not ‘retain an ownership interest allowing [them] to direct or authorize the transfer of such materials to a third party’.

These disputes have also reached the field of intellectual property law. In 2010, a US district court invalidated Myriad Genetics’ BRCA gene patent claims,96 finding that human intervention and isolation did not produce markedly different characteristics than those possessed by genes in the human body. A federal court of appeals further held that isolated DNA may be unpatentable, as in order to state that a product of nature is patentable it must be qualitatively different from the product occurring in nature with markedly different characteristics from characteristics found in nature. In July 2011, the Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit\textsuperscript{97} partially reversed the lower court's decision and held that ‘isolated’ DNA, including genes and sequence-specific probes for detecting breast and ovarian cancer, are patent-eligible subject matter, since these molecules are ‘markedly different’ new chemical entities that do not exist in nature. Even after this judicial compromise that gives some gesture to the biotechnological industry, the debate on the patentability of human genes has not been settled.

Cases on property and privacy rights in relation to human tissues and cells point to a general theoretical problem, namely what are the frontiers of individual self-determination in respect of human tissue samples. Is my DNA and tissue still me? Even if it is not identical with the individual, would it increase or, on contrary, decrease the protection of the individual if the law is becoming more permeable at the frontiers of the self? Here it seems that the ‘bioethical mission’ has influenced the previous legal notions and a more complex bio-social concept of the human being has been extended protection.

III. Conclusions

The perspective of bioethics increasingly serves as a tool for framing and interpreting various emerging biomedical technologies and helps to assess their moral and legal implications. Bioethics as a discipline, however, is relatively new and therefore its theoretical positions, legal interpretations, and policy consequences are not yet well known among the judiciary or at least not sufficiently elaborated to be widely used in court cases. As a result, courts often limit their references to bioethics discourse to a mere listing of various binding and non-binding instruments, even disregarding their scope and context.

However, if one examines closely the discourse on the legal subjects of rights in biomedicine, a significant extension of the field can be observed. Respect for human dignity, and the right to privacy, is used to interpret the decisions on human biological materials, DNA samples, decisions over the custodial rights of the \textit{in vitro} embryo, and is even applicable in shaping the right to decide what types of research are to be conducted on previously collected biological samples.

(p. 1160) Judiciaries worldwide are facing these complex issues of the developing bio-social identities of humans and, in this field, bioethics seems to do significant preparatory work by exploring fundamental ethical issues and implications of new biotechnologies. Not all of these concerns should be recognized as basic rights but bioethics serves as an important laboratory in crystallizing basic norms and methods for interpreting new technologies in the field of life sciences.

Law should avoid two extreme positions in respect of these new technologies. One is to avoid over and premature regulation, which happens when the law jumps too quickly to the latest scientific advances without leaving sufficient time for reflection on the ethical and social implications of a new technology. The other extreme position, which is more common and has its roots in several constitutional traditions, is the clear separation thesis in which judges refrain from touching ‘science’.

Here, the conceptual problem is how to define the core of science and related social professional norms. The delineation between science and its application in the latest fields of biotechnology is often hard to make. Furthermore, interpretation of scientific results in a broader scope of society is often problematic. If law simply codifies or acknowledges the science of today, it often contributes to enlarging the fallacies of current scientific paradigms. As a result, scientific deterministic and inevitable reductionism may end up extending biology and shrinking persons to a simple mass of cells and tissues.

Interpretation of scientific discoveries has many traps. Bioethical analyses are not necessarily based on an accurate assessment of scientific developments, and these interpretations sometimes misread the effects of applying new biotechnologies. Moreover, normative interpretations may also be distorted due to factors that are entirely independent from scientific research. Judicial interpretations, then, must analyze scientific activities in a complex way and separate scientific advances from commercial interests, to peel off the legacy of an older, paternalistic professional tradition, and to deflect eugenic and reductionist thinking. In this complex work, bioethics may offer some help.

As we have seen, reproductive and regenerative medicine is an especially contested field for constitutional interpretation. The vast quantity of data and the ever-growing body of knowledge produced by the Human Genome Project and the various biobank programs provide important resources for scientific analysis and have led to the development of a wide range of therapies. Stem cell research opens up new vistas not only for prolonging the human life-span but also for offering new types of reproductive services to those who need them.

These new biotechnologies represent serious challenges to constitutional concepts and often require new interpretations of human dignity, bodily self-determination, identity and parenthood, notions of person and reproductive rights, principles of data protection and consent, and the boundaries of the body and personhood. Existing constitutional frameworks and accepted bioethical principles seem to provide answers in classical frontiers of life cases but remain insufficient and inconsistent when boundaries of personhood and the human body are concerned.

Bibliography

Bibliography

Margaret P. Battin, Rosamond Rhodes and Anita Silvers (eds), Physician Assisted Suicide (1998)

Tom L. Beauchamp and James F. Childress, Principles Biomedical Ethics (6th edn, 2008)

Christian Lenk, Judit Sándor, and Bert Gordijn (eds), Biobanks and Tissue Research (2011)

Notes:
In 1949, the Nuremberg Code adopted the rules of medical experimentation as a response to the basic violations of human rights during the Second World War; the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966. Art 7 states that ‘No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. In particular, no one shall be subjected without his free consent to medical or scientific experimentation.’

Exceptionally, some early judicial decisions had already recognized the doctrine of consent, such as the famous decision of Cardozo in Schloendord v Society of New York Hospital 211 NY 125, 105 NE (1914).

He first used the term in a 1970 article and then in his book: Van Rensselaer Potter, Bioethics: A Bridge to the Future (1971).

Brooke A. Ackerly, Universal Human Rights in a World of Difference (2008), 57.

In various societies, and also in science, several different kinds of meanings and uses can be attached to human genes. Genes can be conceived as sources and information for research, for forensic identification, tools for therapy, information for actuarial calculus, and for many other uses.

The 59th General Assembly adopted the United Nations Declaration on Human Cloning on March 8, 2005 by a vote of 84:34:37.

The chronologically second to be adopted International Declaration on Human Genetic Data, which will not be discussed here, laid out norms for conducting research on human tissues and DNA and has served as a model for several laws on the protection of human DNA.

The latest of the three, the 2005 Universal Declaration on Bioethics and Human Rights, deals with this subject more generally, as a further indication that bioethical norms have attained high recognition in international law.

Tom L. Beauchamp and James F. Childress, Principles Biomedical Ethics Oxford (6th edn, 2008).

One of the most debated parts of this Convention among the member states is Art 18 on research on embryos in vitro, which will be discussed later.

On the constitutionalization of abortion, see Chapter 51.

Among the exception provisions of recently adopted constitutions or constitutions of new states are, eg, Art 17 of the Constitution of the Slovak Republic which declares ‘the law will specify in which cases a person can be admitted to, or kept in, institutional health care without his or her consent.’

Oviedo Convention (emphasis added):

Article 1—Parties to this Convention shall protect the dignity and identity of all human beings and guarantee everyone, without discrimination, respect for their integrity and other rights and fundamental freedoms with regard to the application of biology and medicine. Each Party shall take in its internal law the necessary measures to give effect to the provisions of this Convention.
(18) Freedom of science, although it may seem to support a liberal position for a new technology, does not however help to predict legal attitude. Eg both Italy and Germany adopted a conservative law on assisted reproduction.

(19) The Serbian Constitution was adopted in 2006.

(21) No 2306 of 2000.

(22) Report No 85/10, Case 12.361.

(23) On the related conceptual uncertainties see Marcia C. Inhorn (ed), Reproductive Disruptions (2007).

(24) Vo v France, App no 53924/00, 8 July 2004. See further Brueggemann and Scheuten v Germany (1981) 3 EHRR 244; Paton v United Kingdom (1981) 3 EHRR 408; Open Door Counselling v Ireland (1993) 15 EHRR 244; Evans v United Kingdom, App no 6339/05, 10 April 2007, nyr; SH and Others v Austria, App no 57813/00, 1 April 2010.

(25) See eg Warnock Committee in the United Kingdom (1982); Benda Commission (1984) in Germany. The report submitted by Noëlle Lenoir, entitled ‘Aux Frontières de la vie: Pour une éthique biomédicale à la française’, provided the foundation and adoption of French bioethics law in 1994. This ‘ethics committee’ method was subsequently followed in the elaboration of several statutory laws, including the German law on stem cells.

(26) Evans v United Kingdom (n 24).

(27) In Dickson v United Kingdom the ECtHR had to examine Art 8 and the refusal of facilities for artificial insemination to the applicants, a prisoner and his wife. The Court found that Art 8 was applicable as the article encompasses respect for the individual’s decision to become genetic parents. In the case of SH and Others v Austria (n 24) on the prohibition of ova donation for in vitro fertilization adopted by the Austrian legislature, the Court took into consideration medical/scientific certainty as a condition for reproductive rights. Since IVF treatment gives rise to sensitive moral issues in the context of a fast-moving medical and scientific field, and since there is no common ground amongst the member states, the Court was of the view that a wide margin of appreciation should be afforded to member states.

(28) Evans v UK (n 24), para 71.

(29) In deciding, the Court provided a detailed comparison of the applicable legal solutions in the member states of the Council of Europe, referring to the Oviedo Convention, and to the principles set by the Steering Committee on Bioethics (CDBI) in 1989, and the 2005 UNESCO Declaration.

(30) On the other hand, Hungarian law permits the continuation of the procedure, by giving preference to the woman’s wish, with information granted to the male. He may exclude the possibility of continuation for such cases, but may not decide so later when the treatment is already being performed.

(31) ECtHR, RR v Poland, App no 27617/04, 26 May 2011.

(32) Ibid para 197.

(33) Ibid para 191.

(36) eg the Human Genome Project has been scrutinized since its inception by introducing Ethical, Legal and Social Implications (ELSI), a parallel project.

(37) Buck v Bell 274 US 200, 207 (1927).
(38) Ibid.
(40) 381 US 479 (1965).
(41) 405 US 438 (1972).
(42) 405 US 438, 453 (1972).
(45) Hecht v Superior Court 20 Cal Rptr 2d 275, 287 (Ct App 1993).
(48) Johnson v Calvert 851 P2d 776 (Cal 1993).
(50) See n 11.
(51) See (http://www.who.int/ethics/topics/cloning/en/).
(52) Wisconsin Alumni Research Foundation is an entity at the University of Wisconsin which owned the rights of the invention.
(54) C-34/10 Oliver Brüstle v. Greenpeace eV.
(56) In the Alyne da Silva Pimentel v Brazil case, access to reproductive health care was confirmed by the UN Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW). Governments have a human rights obligation to guarantee that all women in their countries have access to timely, non-discriminatory, and appropriate maternal health services. Even when governments outsource health services to private institutions, they remain directly responsible for their actions and have a duty to regulate and monitor said institutions.
(59) In the encyclical letter Humanae Vitae (1968), Pope Paul VI condemned any form of direct interruption of pregnancy. Two exceptions were made: ectopic pregnancy and cancerous uterus. In these cases, death of the fetus was considered a secondary effect of removing the uterus in order to save the life of the woman.
(61) This view reflects mainly the official Roman Catholic position in which obtaining stem cells from embryos that remain after in vitro fertilization involves the intentional destruction of a genetically unique living member of the human species that deserves full protection from the beginning of its existence. ... This judgement of the Church, however, is not directed against stem cell research as such, but is concerned only with the use of certain kind of sources for obtaining stem cells, and with the methods of collecting them.

(63) Executive Order (13505 of March 2009).

(64) 447 US 303 (1980).

(65) Sherley v Sebelius 2010 US Dist LEXIS 86441.

(69) ECtHR, Pretty v United Kingdom, App no 2346/02, 29 April 2002.

(70) Ibid para 65.

(73) Bouvia v Superior Court of the State of California 2d 179 Ca App 3d 1127 (1986).

(74) 486 A2d 1209 (Nj 1985).

(81) Airedale NHS Trust v Bland [1993] 1 All ER 821.

coding, processing, preservation, storage and distribution of human tissues and cells.

(85) Human biobanks and genetic research databases (HBGRDs) are structured resources that can be used for the purpose of genetic research, which include: a) human biological materials and/or information generated from the analysis of the same; and b) extensive associated information.

(87) Graeme Laurie, Genetic Privacy (2002). Genetic data is seen as a special case as it is shared by relatives, and requires the re-interpretation of anonymity as even in the lack of personal identifier it may lead to a concrete natural person by a simple match.

(90) Ibid.

(92) S and Marper v United Kingdom (n 89), 68.

(93) Moore v Regents of the University of California 51 Cal 3d 120 (Supreme Court of California 1990).

(94) Greenberg v Miami Children’s Hospital Research Institute 264 F Supp 2d 1064 (SD Fla 2003).

(96) ACLU v Myriad Genetics 09 Civ 4515.

Judit Sándor

Judit Sándor is Professor, Faculty of Political Science, Legal Studies and Gender Studies, Central European University (CEU), Budapest and Founding Director of the Center for Ethics and Law in Biomedicine (CELAB)
Abstract and Keywords

This article focuses on the internationalization of constitutional law. It discusses major trends in the internationalization of constitutional law, including the incorporation of international human rights treaties into constitutions, convergence, and comparativism of national constitutions, and constitutional devolution or treaty-becoming constitutions. Next it makes inquiries into the driving forces that push the development of constitutions across and beyond their borders. It argues that the current internationalization of constitutional law results primarily from the expansion of a global market, the triumph of rights-based discourse, and, most importantly, the emergence of transnational networks by governments, non-governmental organizations, and technocrats or professionals.

Keywords: internationalization, constitutional law, international human rights treaties, constitutions

I. Introduction 1166

II. Trends 1167
   1. Incorporation of International Human Rights into Domestic Constitutions 1167
   2. Convergence and Comparativism of National Constitutions 1168

III. Driving Forces 1170
   1. The Expansion of the Global Market 1170
   2. The Global Triumph of Rights-Based Discourse 1171
   3. The Emergence of Transnational Networks 1172

IV. Divergent Practices 1173
   1. Regionalization Rather Than Internationalization 1173
   2. Partial Internationalization: Power, Politics, or Cherry-Picking 1176
   3. Persistent National Reticence towards Internationalization 1176

V. Debates 1176
   1. Democratic Accountability 1179
   2. Rule of Law 1180
   3. Checks and Balances 1181

VI. Prospects 1182
I. Introduction

When ‘internationalization of constitutional law’ and ‘constitutionalization of international law’ were initially phrased at the beginning of the twenty-first century, most constitutional and international lawyers were not certain about what the two phrases really meant or were intended to mean.\(^1\) In less than a decade, law review articles and edited works addressing these two and related topics have burgeoned at unprecedented speed. Now, comparative constitutional lawyers typically include some international courts and their case laws such as the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) and its jurisprudence as part of their scholarly canons. Likewise, international lawyers began embracing concepts and mechanisms in domestic constitutions such as judicial review, democratic accountability, or federalism into their analytical terrains.\(^2\) Many scholars have treated these two and related developments in both constitutional and international law as the emergence of ‘world constitutionalism’,\(^3\) ‘global constitutionalism’,\(^4\) or ‘transnational constitutionalism’.\(^5\)

Indeed, ‘constitutionalization of international law’ and ‘internationalization of constitutional law’ are inseparable and interrelated. Once international laws are ‘constitutionalized’ in that they enjoy direct and primary effects upon the domestic laws of member states, such as in the case of EU law, domestic laws, and to a certain extent even constitutions, these are then inevitably penetrated by these international laws. In a similar vein, when some domestic constitutions extend their influences to transnational or international levels, they become part of the inspirations, persuasions, or in some cases even binding sources of international law\(^6\) or other national laws. This facilitates a reciprocal relationship between international and domestic laws having the possibility of influencing each other. As a result, our understandings of both international and domestic laws, their natures, and boundaries are fundamentally altered.\(^7\)

This chapter focuses on only one aspect of these interrelated phenomena: internationalization of constitutional law.\(^8\) The introduction is followed by the discussion of major trends in internationalization of constitutional law, including incorporation of international human rights treaties into constitutions, convergence and comparativism of national constitutions, and constitutional devolution or treaty-becoming constitutions. Next we make inquiries into the driving forces that push the development of constitutions across and beyond their borders. We argue that the current internationalization of constitutional law results primarily from the expansion of a global market, the triumph of rights-based discourse, and, most importantly, the emergence of transnational networks by governments, non-governmental organizations (NGOs), and technocrats or professionals.

Despite the trend in internationalization, we nevertheless find that disparity abounds in practice. Instead of internationalization, regionalization is a better catchword for what has been happening regarding the association of domestic constitutions. Moreover, the selection of what becomes international and what does not is partial, contested, and even cherry-picking. Choices are usually made on colonial legacy, affinity in the legal system, language or culture, and most importantly, power politics by competing actors, governments, and courts alike. The fact that the two most popularly referenced courts, the US Supreme Court and the German Federal Constitutional Court seldom engage in comparative analysis speaks to the power disparity of courts in this round of constitutional dialogues. And we should be alert to the resulting bipolar extremes of internationalism versus nationalism that not only calls into question current internationalization but also politicizes and even delegitimizes the recent triumph of liberal constitutionalism over the last quarter of the twentieth century.

The last two sections of this chapter are devoted to the debates on and prospects for internationalization of constitutional law. We address three main concerns typically expressed in the debate: democratic accountability, rule of law, and checks and balances. We argue that along the line of internationalization of constitutional law, multiple actors grounded on multifaceted sources of international and domestic laws will demand with much rigor transparency, information, and free and fair competition and function as checks and balances on one another. We conclude by forecasting that the current internationalization of constitutional law is likely to continue as a rivalry between convergence and divergence. There is no need to contain or suppress either. What is really important is—by exacting scrutiny of comparative and international law and politics—to unveil power politics or even power manipulations behind convergence or divergence in such a way that fairer and healthier engagements, dialogues, or competitions can proceed.

II. Trends
International laws and constitutional laws are usually regarded as different sets of laws that rarely cross paths. It thus becomes quite intriguing to even consider ways that domestic constitutions are becoming international or internationalized. In the following, we discuss three recurring themes in the development of the internationalization of constitutional law.

1. Incorporation of International Human Rights into Domestic Constitutions

The first—and perhaps most important—way that constitutions may become international or internationalized is by the incorporation of international human rights treaties and norms into domestic constitutions. As the rights guaranteed by domestic constitutions are convergent—or even identical—with those enshrined in international documents, constitutions are indeed becoming international.

The most apparent example is the Constitution of Bosnia and Herzegovina that annexes 15 international human rights documents to the Constitution and mandates a state duty for implementation and compliance. The same Constitution also imposes a state duty to ensure ‘the highest level of internationally recognized human rights and fundamental freedoms’ and give rights and freedoms protected in the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) and its Protocols direct applicability and superior status in the domestic legal system. Another noticeable example is the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms that incorporates both the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR).

Many recently enacted or revised constitutions of new democracies such as South Africa or those in Central and Eastern Europe typically include a chapter on rights reflective of international human rights. These new constitutions may also add one or two clauses to give international human rights laws direct applicability and superior normative status in the domestic legal system and instruct governments and courts to take into consideration these international human rights laws. Additionally, domestic incorporation of international human rights can be made through legislation. In states without written constitutions, legislative incorporation indicates no less effect than constitutional incorporation. The Human Rights Act of the United Kingdom that authorizes courts to review whether domestic legislation is compatible with the rights protected in the ECHR evidences this.

Incorporation of international human rights into domestic legal systems may also be carried out effectively through judicial interpretation. Courts may reference international human rights on their own assertion with or without any clear constitutional or legislative mandate. Those referenced rights are not necessarily contained in treaties to which those states have acceded. Judges may ground their incorporation of those rights on legal concepts such as the law of nations, generally accepted norms, or principles recognized by civilized nations. Judicial incorporation becomes particularly justifiable if those international human rights have been developed the status of jus cogens or customary international law. In the process of judicial incorporation, not only international human rights or documents ensuring those rights are discussed or referenced, but also decisions or interpretations by international courts regarding those rights and documents. The process of internationalization hence becomes self-reinforcing and ever expanding.

2. Convergence and Comparativism of National Constitutions

The second trend in internationalization of constitutional law involves convergence and comparativism across constitutional jurisdictions. The last quarter of the twentieth century witnessed the triumph of liberal constitutionalism. A record number of nations now have written or unwritten constitutions which meet modern constitutional standards. As a result, the majority of nations in all parts of the globe share similar constitutions, which typically include a list of fundamental rights and freedoms and institutional mechanisms like constitutional courts or human rights commissions to ensure the realization of those rights.

The convergence or assimilation of constitutions has created an unprecedented opportunity for courts of different states to learn from one another. The domestic lists of fundamental rights and freedoms in national constitutions are reflective of one another as well as of post-war international human rights documents. The similar—if not identical—concept of rights and freedoms has given rise to a common constitutional language across jurisdictions, permitting judges to look elsewhere for consultation or inspiration even in interpreting their own constitutional clauses. After all, free speech, due process, equality, right to life, or principle of proportionality is guaranteed in the majority—if not all—constitutions. Accordingly, an increasing number of courts have cited foreign constitutions or foreign cases in their own decisions.\(^2\) A celebrated trio of decisions referencing foreign law across jurisdictions involved the death penalty in the South African Constitutional Court, the Canadian Supreme Court, and the US Supreme Court.\(^2\) In addition, this common language also fared easier for judges across jurisdictions to gather and converse on the important constitutional questions they face.

In the eyes of many, a new era of judicial dialogue, or engagement, has arrived.\(^2\) This not only subjects comparative constitutionalism to yet another unexplored terrain, but also establishes a closer link between constitutional law and international law as consensus on the latter is more easily reached by convergent practices in the former everywhere around the globe.

3. Constitutional Devolution or Treaty-Becoming Constitutions: Federalism, Autonomous Regions, and Indigenous Rights

The third—and perhaps less studied—trend is that a constitution may become a treaty or provide treaty-like functions between subunits of a state or between different ethnic groups within a state. That a constitution is a treaty or provides treaty-like functions is not new.\(^2\) The Articles of Confederation by 13 states of America upon the Declaration of Independence in 1776 were indisputably seen as a treaty between sovereign states. The 1787 US Constitution maintained this treaty spirit and adopted a federal-state arrangement that recognized the dual sovereignty of the states and the federal union. This practice is far from an exception.

Recent years have witnessed an increasing number of constitutions that began to provide—in varying degrees—treaty or treaty-like functions in dealing with autonomous assertions of sub-regions or ethnic minorities. The much-discussed case of constitutional devolution is the Spanish Constitution of 1978.\(^2\) In order to resolve persistent conflicts between various ethnic and regional groups, the Spanish Constitution grants them the right to autonomy. Specifically, it allows bordering provinces with common ethnic, historical, cultural, and economic characteristics to accede to self-governing autonomous communities. These autonomous communities are provided with a wide array of legislative and executive powers with their own parliaments and governments. Given this high degree of autonomy left to sub-regions and national groups, the Spanish Constitution is widely seen as a pact to keep together a nation of sub-nations.\(^2\) Paradoxically, by making a constitution like a treaty, and granting sovereign-like powers to subunits, a constitution eventually sustains its status as a domestic constitution and prevents the dissolution of the state.

The same paradox occurred in the Peace Accord between the republics of Bosnia and Herzegovina, which subsequently became part of their Constitution.\(^2\) The reason that this Constitution annexes so many international human rights treaties as part of its content is to underscore the sovereign—or sovereign-like—status of each republic and at the same time to keep them together under a single constitutional umbrella. Similar arrangements or claims have been made elsewhere. For example, section 33 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms permits the legislature of a province to declare certain Acts operative notwithstanding any inconsistency with the Charter. Canadian provinces are thus given a constitutional privilege to have provincial laws in defiance of the national constitution. This section was negotiated primarily out of a concern for Quebec separatism.\(^2\) It evidences, again, the strength of a treaty-becoming constitution in being self-sustaining and keeping a state together.

More and more advocates for indigenous rights seek to model this treaty-like constitutional arrangement on the relationship between aboriginal groups and their states. The United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples\(^2\) asserts the right to self-determination by indigenous peoples and, more importantly, their right to greater autonomy within the state: strengthening their distinct political, legal, economic, social, and cultural institutions, while retaining their right fully to participate, if they so choose, in the political, economic, social, and cultural life of the state.\(^2\) To realize the promise made in such a declaration, a domestic constitution can adopt the strategy of either establishing a sovereign-like relation with the indigenous groups or allow them direct applicability of international human rights without any fear of losing its own integrity.

III. Driving Forces

Internationalization of constitutional law is a recent development. The forces behind it are generated by the latest progress in technology and renovations in economic and social cooperation. On top of these forces standsthe global market, rights-based discourse, and transnational networks.

1. The Expansion of the Global Market

It is undeniable that the recent internationalization of constitutional law largely concerns economic globalization.

The attempt of both advanced economies and fast developing economies to expand the scale of the global market at an accelerating speed is the key driving force. To ensure that such a broadened market across all constitutional jurisdictions can function, basic rules such as free exchange, market stability, contractual certainty and enforcement, and even a high degree of respect for private property and other market-oriented rights, must be harmonized if not equated.31

To do so, one strategy is to develop a strong global legal framework that infiltrates all domestic legal regimes, or is at least voluntarily complied with or referenced by domestic courts. The European Union provides the best example in this strategy that leads to internationalization of constitutional law. Beginning merely as a coal and steel free trade area between France and Germany, the EU gradually expanded its mission to free trade across the entire European continent. To ensure legal harmony across jurisdictions, the European Court of Justice (ECJ) had already in 1963 decided that the Community (as it then was) constituted a new legal order for the benefit of all states as well as their nationals, and thus Community law and regulations needed to produce direct effect and create individual rights, which national courts had to protect.32 This led inevitably to internationalization—even if only Europeanization—of domestic constitutions and laws in EU member states. While domestic courts such as the German Federal Constitutional Court may find this process problematic, they eventually surrendered to the need for harmonization for free trade.33 Similar strategies have also been employed in other economic cooperations between states, such as the largest one, the World Trade Organization (WTO).34

The other strategy is similar to the first but not necessarily with a corresponding global or transnational legal framework. To illustrate, a broadened market naturally provides an incentive for states to establish similar—if not identical—domestic legal frameworks that are conducive to trade. These domestic constitutional systems eventually become receptive to market-oriented liberal rights and freedoms. For instance, as China opened up to global trade, it took action to amend its Constitution to show due respect for private property and ensure abidance to the rule of law.35 The constitutional convergence—albeit to a limited degree—by the Chinese is illustrative of the function of a global market to the current convergence of domestic constitutions.

2. The Global Triumph of Rights-Based Discourse

Another primary force driving internationalization of constitutional law is the rights-based discourse that had begun with the United Nations Charter and Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR) and reached its climax in the Velvet Revolution of third-wave democracies.36 Both the UN Charter and UDHR recognize that the existence of fundamental (p. 1172) human rights is independent of states, and that these rights are vested directly in each and every human person.37 This universal nature of human rights accordingly leads to two things. First is an international normative legal order that guarantees these rights and compels states—as well as all other public and private actors—to respect, protect, and fulfill these rights in their respective domestic legal regimes.38 Secondly, is the recognition that all fundamental rights and freedoms guaranteed in domestic constitutions are manifestations of universal human rights, and thus a convergent understanding and realization of these rights is inevitable.39

The political imagination underlying this rights-based discourse is an unmitigated tension between local forces and a global rights-based regime that transcends those forces. The local typically nation-states were perceived as imposing, manipulative, and unjust. The global rights-based discourse led by moral activists was developed to rescue unfair and fractioned domestic constitutional orders that had been hijacked by self-interested nation-states.40 In this view, the internationalization of constitutional law must be seen as a moral and legal development:
one that transcends citizenship to prevent any human person from being exploited by state and non-state actors in any given locality. The convergence of constitutional orders is part of this paramount rights-based moral process.

3. The Emergence of Transnational Networks

Due to technological innovation and global travel, the emergence of transnational networks between governments, NGOs, technocrats, or professionals has significantly facilitated this recent internationalization of domestic constitutions. In the past, sovereign nations dominated the international arena, and local opinions would have to be screened and selected by a series of (mis)representations. Now, with the advance of technology, access to all kinds of international gatherings and networking is made direct and available not only to governments but also to NGOs and professionals such as lawyers and judges. Scholars have demonstrated that international judicial gatherings have contributed to a recent significant increase in foreign law references and comparative analysis by various domestic courts. The networking of domestic and international NGOs has allowed these NGOs to be better informed and capable of participating directly even in the advocacy of international lawmaking.

For domestic NGOs involved in these international activities, their advocacies are dual: one in creating a global legal order of their concerns, and the other is making their domestic legal order convergent with that global legal order. In other words, they are the agency in intermediating international and constitutional regimes where international and domestic human rights laws meet. The best example is provided by the advocacies of NGOs in Taiwan, the most-isolated democracy today due to its complicated relationship with China. Through networking with international human rights NGOs, the Taiwanese NGOs pushed forward domestic incorporation of international human rights treaties—to which the government of Taiwan could not accede—and in some cases even facilitated international lawmaking. Noticeably, in response to the rise of transnational networks, many international regimes have also opened up to participation by those NGOs and professionals. This in turn creates a nuanced opportunity for further reconfiguration of international law and domestic constitutions.

IV. Divergent Practices

Admittedly, the internationalization of constitutional law has divergent practices around the globe. Domestic entrenchment of international human rights and the convergence of constitutional rights and institutions seem stronger and more revealing in some parts of the world than in others. While the EU presents a clear case for internationalization of constitutional law and even for constitutionalization of international law, the United States as well as many Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) countries continue to stress their distinctiveness in the course of constitutional development. Singaporean and Malaysian courts are instructed to interpret the constitution and laws only within ‘their four walls’. East Asian courts are criticized for rarely referring directly to international human rights or engaging explicitly in comparative legal analysis. Dependent upon where and how one looks, one can make a claim for either a strong appearance of internationalization of constitutional law or its nonexistence.

1. Regionalization Rather Than Internationalization

The internationalization of constitutional law tends to concentrate on particular places, and judicial dialogues take place only among certain courts. Instead of internationalization, regionalization may be a better expression for the present constitutional convergence. Most evident is the European Union. Within the EU, the constitutional laws of its member states have a greater degree of resemblance with regard to constitutional rights, principles, and institutions. Outside the EU, however, the picture of internationalization looks very different. It is true that the prevailing majority of states have ratified both the ICCPR and the ICESCR—the two UN human rights covenants—and that the list of constitutional rights in most constitutions presents a strong resemblance with the two covenants. Yet what is written is not always reflective of what is happening in practice. A great many states that ratified both covenants have had a poor human rights record and have shown no sign of significant improvement even after ratification. Ratification of human rights treaties has not yet imposed a direct obligation on states for domestic constitutional or legal incorporation, let alone direct judicial enforcement.

Constitutional entrenchment of international human rights has typically been undertaken in the new democracies of Central and Eastern Europe. The list of constitutional rights was heavily influenced by the ECHR and the constitutions of their Western neighbors. As a result of such constitutional resemblance, it was not unusual for courts in these new European democracies to refer to the precedents of the ECHR even if only for ‘decorative’ or practical purposes. But new democracies outside Europe do not necessarily opt for the constitutional entrenchment of the international bill of rights. New democracies in North and East Asia, for example Mongolia, South Korea, and Taiwan, despite all having a list of constitutional rights more or less liberal in nature, have not directly incorporated any human rights covenants into their domestic constitutions. Nor have they adopted a constitutional provision like South Africa that requires courts to consider international law, or like Argentina that reminds the legislature of issues of international human rights in the course of lawmaking.\textsuperscript{47} The common constitutional provision adopted by these new democracies is one that merely advises their governments to respect treaty obligations and to give duly ratified treaties the status of domestic law.\textsuperscript{48} The constitutional courts of South Korea and Taiwan, along with Supreme Court of Japan, whose decisions are evidence of strong foreign law influences—typically German and American—are nevertheless strongly criticized for seldom applying international human rights treaties including those ratified in their domestic cases.\textsuperscript{49}

Perhaps some may contend that, partly due to the high threshold of constitution-making or amending, domestic constitutional entrenchment of international human rights should be allowed more time, and thus the situation centered in Europe at present should not be deemed as mere regionalization. They may further point to constitutional assimilation or comparativism as a stronger indication of internationalization of domestic constitutions. To their dismay, however, constitutional assimilation or comparativism occurs only in a cluster of states that share particular—including but not limited to regional—affiliations. Take, for example, that much discussed phenomenon in constitutional convergence, establishment of a constitutional court. The majority of states that have created a constitutional court since the late 1980s are the newly democratized states of Central and Eastern Europe primarily based upon the model of the German Federal Constitutional Court.\textsuperscript{50} Constitutional courts created outside Europe have resulted mainly from those countries’ association with the civil law system, which gives these states easy access to the European model of a constitutional court. Constitutional courts recently established in Asia, such as in Indonesia, Mongolia, South Korea, Thailand, and Taiwan, all claimed their inspiration from the German Federal Constitutional Court.\textsuperscript{51} In contrast, most common law countries have not adopted a constitutional court. The Constitutional Court of South Africa, a common law country, is a rare exception. A contrasting civil law exception is Japan. Despite its scholarly culture that tends to closely follow the German legal system, Japan has not adopted a constitutional court due to strong US influence over its post-war constitutional design. By and large, the issue that distinguishes adoption or non-adoptions of a constitutional court is that state’s association with Europe or a shared history with a legal system, civil law or common law. Constitutional assimilation is clearly not an international phenomenon.

(p. 1175) Nor is judicial engagement of comparative constitutional analysis a complete global phenomenon. Despite scholarly excitement in declaring that the days of one-way transmission in legal reception had passed with the arrival of an active dialogue in a wider range of constitutional courts,\textsuperscript{52} the reality proves to be the opposite. Most constitutional courts in Europe have not exhibited a strong tendency to cite foreign laws or engage in constitutional comparison. For example, the German Federal Constitutional Court, whose decisions are often referred to by other courts in Europe or even in Asia, has seldom referred to the decisions of other courts: it has done so in only seven decisions between 1998 and 2009, referring mostly to its European counterparts such as the French, Swiss, and UK courts.\textsuperscript{53} A similar tendency exists in other European courts. The Italian Constitutional Court referred to less than a dozen foreign cases between 1980 and 2009, mostly from other European jurisdictions.\textsuperscript{54} The Austrian Constitutional Court, the oldest of the kind in Europe, has relied on only about 50 judicial precedents since the 1980s, most of which were also in other European jurisdictions.\textsuperscript{55} The new constitutional courts in Europe, such as those in Portugal, Hungry, and Romania, are no exception. Compared to the more established courts in Europe, these new courts make a greater number of references to foreign decisions. The sources of which are mainly the ECHR and other older courts in Europe.\textsuperscript{56} On rare occasions, the decisions of the US Supreme Court might appear in the case law of its European counterparts; but such rarity hardly suffices as meaningful dialog across the Atlantic.

And this does not render any injustice to the other side of the Atlantic. The US Supreme Court, whose decisions are widely referred to in the United States and even in Asia, has seldom referred to foreign cases in its decisions. Even if such a rarity does occur, the references point mostly to English precedent.\textsuperscript{57} The most celebrated court that has shown great willingness in the engagement of comparative analysis is the Canadian Supreme Court. But this Court refers mainly to English and US cases and in a few instances has cited precedents from South Africa or Israel.\textsuperscript{58} Other courts in the Americas, for example the Supreme Court of Argentina, exhibit a similar attitude.\textsuperscript{59}

Evidently, judicial dialogues conducted thus far are confined within regional boundaries. Trans-regional discourse is rare, and even if it does occur, it usually takes place between courts of the same legal family, civil law or common law. The usual example of transnational judicial engagement is the trio of references made between the South African Constitutional Court,\textsuperscript{60} the Canadian Supreme Court, and the US Supreme Court. All three being from the same common law tradition.

Asian courts are no exception. There is little judicial dialogue in the region. Most Asian courts of civil law tradition, such as Japan's Supreme Court, Korea's Constitutional Court, and Taiwan's Constitutional Court, exhibit a similar attitude to their counterparts in Europe: having scarce engagement in explicit comparative analysis. Other common law courts in Asia, such as courts in Hong Kong, the Philippines, India, and to a lesser extent Singapore and Malaysia, have a much more open attitude. Yet they mostly reference old English cases or cases from other common law jurisdictions.

2. Partial Internationalization: Power, Politics, or Cherry-Picking

Disparity in the internationalization of constitutional law is certainly not limited to regionalization or groupings of legal families. What becomes international and what does not is usually the result of competing powers, politics, preferences, or even mere cherry-picking.

As previously discussed, the US Supreme Court and the German Federal Constitutional Court whose decisions are popularly referred to in their respective regions and legal families rarely engaged in any comparative analyses. In some other courts that are more inclined to reference others, the dialogues have huge disparity. For example, while the Canadian Supreme Court and the South African Constitutional Court cross-reference each other, the latter cites the former almost three hundred times more often than vice versa. Between 1995 and 2009, the latter cited the former on a total of 850 occasions, but it happened in reverse only in three cases. In the common law jurisdictions of Asia, courts usually reference English case law as part of their common law heritage, but when they occasionally reference each other, a disparity also exists in some referencing the Supreme Court of India that does not always act reciprocally.

Power undoubtedly speaks for influence. But where does this judicial discursive power come from? Colonial power seems to play a very tiny part as English case law continues to command referencing authority even in decolonized states. Yet, the discursive power of the US Supreme Court bears scant connection to colonialism. The referencing popularity of the German Federal Constitutional Court by other European courts is astounding if the horrors the Nazi regime for its neighbors are taken into consideration. Neither do the age or history of the court bear significant weight. The Austrian Constitutional Court, the oldest of the kind, has received scant, if any, attention in transnational judicial dialogue. The decisions of the High Court of Austria, the second to the US Supreme Court in the history of judicial review, are far less referenced in common law jurisdictions than some younger courts such as the Canadian or Indian Supreme Court. Language and cultural proximity provide no better explanation. While German, Swiss, or Austrian courts tend to reference one another in a very limited number of comparative analyses, they nonetheless extend a great deal of consideration to English or US law. Many judges and lawyers of the civil law tradition both in and outside Europe do not speak German as their native language, but that does not seem to undermine their enthusiasm in overcoming the high linguistic barrier to reference German law. Spanish is spoken throughout most of Latin America, but it is the US Supreme Court rather than the Spanish Constitutional Court that become most often referenced. If not colonial legacy, age, or history of the courts or constitutions, language, or culture proximity, then is it after all mere cherry-picking?

Scholars have contended that judicial networking or conferences were a prime attribute to the recent wave of transnational judicial references and comparative analyses. Notwithstanding the lack in empirical evidence of such a claim, these scholars fail to notice that those meetings and workshops were attended by prominent judges mostly from Europe or North America with very few from Africa, South America, or Asia. And the selective few judges from minority jurisdictions usually have some individual associations with distinguished academic or professional institutions in Europe or North America. Elsewhere we have argued that the background of a judge has a direct impact on his or her preference for comparative analyses. Judges from scholarly backgrounds engage to a far greater degree than those practitioners in foreign law citations. And even more importantly, judicial references tend to be made to the jurisdictions with which judges become acquainted by substantive training for their master or doctoral degree. It is evident that individual affiliations with dominant institutions in Europe or North America do matter and contribute to this partial internationalization of constitutional law.

The choice of institutional affiliation by judges or scholars is anything but mere personal preference. Aside from region, legal tradition, language, or culture, a number of much less noticed but nonetheless important factors also include academic politics at both domestic and international levels and even economic soft powers such as scholarships or grants. Most illustrative is the competition with legal influences between the United States, Germany, and more recently the Council of Europe (the treaty body of the ECHR). The international dominance of the United States has extended its legal influence to civil law countries even on the opposite side of the world. A good many prominent judges and constitutional law scholars in Japan, Korea, and Taiwan—three major civil law jurisdictions of East Asia—obtained a master or doctoral degree in distinguished US law schools. After a rapid economic revival following defeat in (p. 1178) the Second World War, Germany sought to reclaim its lead position in political and legal developments in Europe and beyond. For example, its government-affiliated foundations such as the Deutscher Akademischer Austausch Dienst (DAAD) and the Konrad-Adenauer-Stiftung have since the 1960s provided generous scholarships to foreign scholars for study and research in Germany and hosted many glamorous conferences on the spreading influence of the German legal system—particularly of the German Federal Constitutional Court—over other jurisdictions and courts. Established in 1999, an advisory body to the Council of Europe, the European Commission for Democracy through Law (better known as the Venice Commission) has significantly increased European visibility in constitutional developments in other parts of the world. Thus there should be little wonder about the sharp increase of referencing ECtHR case law in constitutional jurisdictions even beyond Europe.

3. Persistent National Reticence towards Internationalization

The decades-long development of globalization has created bipolar extremes rather than one global village. After the 9/11 attacks and the ensuing war on terror, our world seemed to be divided into one majority camp of liberal constitutional democracies against the other minority camp of illiberal states. A similar—but not necessarily corresponding—division also became existent in the attitude towards the internationalization of constitutional law: a growing majority of constitutional jurisdictions that are open to international and comparative laws versus a persistent minority that remains reticent towards such internationalization.

The United States stands out as a paramount example in such a persistent minority. After the US Supreme Court sent a very small sign of having engaged in international or comparative analyses, Congress wasted no time in introducing bans of such practice to the floor. At the present, the US constitutional law scholarship is divided on this issue: some wholeheartedly advocating constitutional comparativism while others strongly opposing it. Other jurisdictions with a strong reticence towards internationalization include Malaysia and Singapore. An earlier precedent instructing that ‘the Constitution is primarily to be interpreted within its own four walls and not in the light of analogies drawn from other countries’ was followed in both Malaysian and Singaporean courts. In a great many cases, both courts rejected foreign laws on the ground that they were made in other legal systems different from their own or that they were inappropriate in the local context. Most striking was the Singaporean court’s recent rejection of English law—which had been closely followed as part of its colonial legacy—on the ground that English laws have been changed and been greatly influenced by the ECtHR as a result of the domestic incorporation of the ECHR. Interestingly, however, on rare occasions, the Singaporean court still chose to rely on English or US cases that directly support its conservative position.

It should be clear by now that reticence towards internationalization of constitutional law does not necessarily entail wholesale rejection of foreign or international law. What usually matter are conclusions derived from such comparative analyses: compatible/incompatible (p. 1179) with liberal/conservative positions taken by the majority/minority of courts or the general public. Time and again, we have seen many courts directly referencing foreign or international law not to extend but to limit the protection of rights explicitly or impliedly guaranteed in domestic constitutions. As discussed earlier, what gets cited and what does not is primarily the result of politics at both domestic and international levels. Despite their different attitudes towards comparative analysis, one reticent and the other open, the US Supreme Court and the German Federal Constitutional Court, the decisions of which are mostly referenced by others, rarely engage in any foreign law analysis. In contrast, as open as it has been towards foreign or international law, the Supreme Court of India does not always rely on these laws to enlarge domestic constitutional protections. In some cases, while finding that the Indian Constitution incorporated women’s rights contained in the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), the Court nevertheless found that it was not desirable to declare local customs as unconstitutional as such a declaration might result in chaos. And as resistant as it has been to foreign and international law, the Japanese Supreme Court may implicitly rely on foreign law and has at times recognized the value of international human
To the extent that power politics on comparative analysis at both domestic and international levels continues, the bipolar extremes of openness on the one side and reticence on the other is likely to continue. Neither side necessarily represents moral victory. Politics of referencing or not referencing external norms is much more complex than a line drawn to reflect convergence versus resistance.

V. Debates

Given the enormous disparity in practice, it is little wonder that the debate about internationalization of constitutional law has been strong and has shown no sign of compromise. However, both proponents and opponents have focused their debates on three major issues: democratic accountability, rule of law, and checks and balances. In the following we address them directly in the hope of pointing out future directions.

1. Democratic Accountability

To the extent that incorporation of international human rights, constitutional convergence, or devolution is made through domestic constitutional or legislative enactments, they do not necessarily suffer from a democratic deficit. Even if such incorporation, convergence, or devolution cedes considerably government decision-making powers to international authority, such decisions are nonetheless taken through domestic political processes by which decisions are legitimized and under which decision-makers are made accountable.

Opponents may argue that notwithstanding the political process, blank checks like section 39 of the South African Constitution or Article 9(1) of the Hungarian Constitution may be [p. 1180] cashed a great more than expected. And democratic legitimacy and accountability suffer to the greatest extent when affected citizens have no access to influence the norm-generating process and to make norm-generators accountable. In the case of treaty-like constitutions, democratic decision-making mechanisms such as separation of powers or federalism are also likely to be undermined and accountability collapsed. In addition, opponents are mostly concerned with judicial incorporation or of references to international and foreign laws under the banner of universal rights or better answers found in comparative analysis. For opponents, neither judges nor those international or foreign laws relied upon are democratically chosen and made accountable in domestic legal regimes.

For proponents of internationalization, deficit in democratic legitimacy or accountability is not a sound rejection as this problem exists in almost all forms of political organization even including functioning democracies. The deficiency is a matter of degree but not of kind. Proponents argue that international legal regimes can enhance their democratic legitimacy and accountability by making them easily accessible, transparent, and participatory for governments and NGOs. With those improvements, domestic incorporation of international law suffers a much smaller democratic deficit. And this was precisely what happened to the EU which has undergone the process for some time. While judicial reference to foreign law does raise democratic concerns, those who make these references can easily be made accountable in any of the domestic constitutional regimes. And a more rigorous development in comparative constitutional laws can address these concerns and ameliorate—if not correct—judicial mistakes.

2. Rule of Law

The concept of rule of law, while not entirely uncontested, entails at least legal certainty and legal clarity. However, both are inevitably undermined in internationalization of constitutional law. Domestic incorporation of international human rights law—often as a blank check—leads to a certain degree of normative instability, as the contents of domestic laws depend on and change with the international legal regime. Certainty and clarity become seriously obstructed—if not totally collapsed—when courts rely on international and foreign laws at will in the course of their decision-making. It will be difficult, if not impossible, for any affected citizens to know exact rules that may apply to their cases.

Interestingly, however, proponents of internationalization defend the above criticism by arguing that the advancement in internationalization of domestic constitutions may facilitate the establishment of an ‘international rule of law’. As recent cases in international courts demonstrate, a hierarchy of international laws with preemptory human rights norms sitting at the top is emerging. The openness—or so-called blank checks—of domestic constitutions to international human rights accepted in major treaties or regarded as jus cogens or customary international law is merely to recognize the superior status of these human rights that must supersede conflicting domestic norms from the perspective of the international rule of law. Judicial incorporation of or referencing of these rights with or without explicit domestic mandates is not arbitrary action but proper implementation of these rights at the local level. In this view, incomplete incorporation or sporadic references are what should be blamed for the current chaos in the domestic rule of law. But these problems are only temporary in the process of internationalization.

That said, however, the international rule of law is still in its infancy if not entirely illusory. After all, international law has yet to impose a state duty for implementation through constitutional incorporation. For moderates, the rule of law deficiency in the internationalization of domestic constitutions is to be rescued not by illusory concepts like the international rule of law but by strengthening articulations of domestic constitutions. This may be seen in the recent decisions of the US Supreme Court in referencing international norms. Having recognized the weakness in rule of law, the Court gave lengthy and thoughtful opinions articulating comparable constitutional principles with those international norms.

3. Checks and Balances

The last focus of the debate is on checks and balances. Given that decision-making powers are delegated to international authorities in the process of internationalization, many important decisions with grave impacts for domestic constitutional rights and institutions are made outside the domestic arena. The domestic applicability of these decisions becomes a serious concern. One worry among the many is on failing checks and balances in domestic regimes. Opponents of internationalization are very skeptical of the extent to which states may participate in the process of decision-making to provide any effective checks and balances on those international authorities, let alone make them accountable.

Proponents, however, are not pessimistic about this. They remind opponents that accession to international mechanisms always requires state consent, the process of which gives domestic actors opportunities to bargain with international authorities. And as international mechanisms are opened up for various forms of participation and transparency, these international decision-making authorities cannot be said to have no effective checks and balances. More importantly, domestic courts may provide effective judicial checks and balances with transnational decision-making authorities in the course of their adjudication. For example, the German Federal Constitutional Court empowered itself to review whether EU laws were consistent with the purpose and basic principles of the EU, and if such inconsistency were found, whether those laws were binding on German territory.

In addition, checks and balances may be provided at the international level. Recent decisions by international courts are indicative of nuanced ways for international actors including courts to provide checks and balances with one another. The legality of UN policies may be examined at the ECJ, WTO policies may be challenged at the ECHR and vice versa. This is best demonstrated by a very interesting case involving a UN security policy that traveled from the UN Security Council to the EU, then from the Irish Supreme Court to the ECJ, and finally to the ECtHR. All courts involved claimed the power to review relevant laws and regulations made in other international regimes. It is without doubt that cases involving international decision-making may now move from court to court, thereby creating a complex set of checks and balances. This possibility of judicial checks and balances at both international and constitutional levels, and the sophisticated judicial dialogue or engagement that may take place in these processes have made some moderates in this debate lean towards—if not yet fully endorse—the current internationalization trend.

VI. Prospects

Despite a few solutions proposed, reasoned debates or power politics on internationalization of constitutional law at both domestic and international levels is likely to continue.

On the one hand, international human rights treaties are likely to expand their membership, and an ever increasing number of constitutions may give privileged normative status of some sort to international human rights laws. Engagement in comparative analysis or referencing foreign or international law in the course of constitutional adjudication is likely to grow. Empowering local or ethnic authorities by granting them a certain degree of autonomy under a domestic constitution or allowing the operation of a separate legal system is likely to continue. And these local or ethnic groups—along with other less privileged groups in a domestic polity—are likely to be aided by the mounting body of international or comparative law in their respective power struggles against the central authority. Although not always effective, the emergent use of international or comparative law as legal or political strategy taken in domestic or international sites is irreversible. The demand for internationalization of constitutional law remains strong, and the resulting impact of such a demand is as controversial as it has always been.

On the other hand, the dissenters are likely to rise in significant strength. The growing number of ratifications of international human rights treaties does not yield any corresponding degree of compliance, let alone domestic constitutional incorporation. Judicial referencing of foreign or international law continues to be partial, selective, and cherry-picking. Those few powerful courts like the German Federal Constitutional Court, the US Supreme Court, and the French Constitutional Counsel which rarely engage in comparative analysis but are constantly referenced by other courts are likely to sustain their dominance in this global game of judicial ‘dialogue’. Occasionally their dominance may be challenged by other equally powerful judicial organs at the transnational level like the International Court of Justice, ECtHR, or even WTO Appellate Body. or at least put into doubt in comparative analyses by other less privileged courts. There will also be a few courts that continue to be reticent towards foreign or international law, and in being so they might even attempt to gain the upper hand in this ensuing judicial discursive war.

These seemingly conflicting trends should not be seen as a surprise to constitutional lawyers. They are inevitable given the contested nature of convergence vis-à-vis divergence and the power struggles in them. What constitutional lawyers should be really concerned with in the present internationalization of constitutional law are free and transparent competition, open and sincere dialogue, and thorough and exacting scrutiny of what becomes international and what does not. Comparative constitutional lawyers must work hard to lift the veil of ignorance on politics behind the internationalization of constitutional law. No state or court may hide behind convergence or divergence. Instead, motives and power struggles must be fully exposed. It is important to know who are like others and why. And it is equally important to know who are unlike others and why. That is a really daunting task for comparative law and politics.

Bibliography

W.T. Eijsbouts, ‘Wir Sind Das Volk: Notes about the Notion of “The People” as Occasioned by the Lissabon-Urteil’ (2010) 6 European Constitutional Law Review 199

Akiko Ejima, ‘The Enigmatic Attitude of the Supreme Court of Japan towards Foreign Precedents—Refusal at the Front Door and Admissions at the Back Door’ (2009) 16 Meiji Law Journal 19

Vicki C. Jackson, Constitutional Engagement in a Transnational Era (2010)

Anne-Marie Slaughter, A New World Order (2004)

Notes:

(1) The two phrases were first discussed together in Herman Schwartz, ‘The Internationalization of Constitutional Law’ (2003) 10 Human Rights Brief 10, 10ff.

(6) Statute of the International Court of Justice, Art 38(b), (c).

(7) Yeh and Chang (n 5), 98ff.

(8) ‘The Constitutionalization of Public International Law’ (Chapter 58) and other related issues such as constitutional comparisons are addressed in other chapters of this volume.

(10) See Constitution of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Annex I: Additional Human Rights Agreements to be Applied in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

(11) See Constitution of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Art II, paras 4, 7, 8.

(12) See ibid Art II, para 1.

(14) See Constitution of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Art II, para 2.

(16) eg, Constitution of South Africa, s 39(1), Constitution of Republic of Hungary, Art 9(1), and also the Constitution of South Korea, Art 6(1).

(18) Yeh and Chang (n 5), 96ff.

(19) eg The Paquete Habana 175 US 677 (1900); Knight v Florida 528 US 990 (1999); Atkins v Virginia 536 US 304 (2002). See also the Alien Torts Claims Act, 28 USC §1350.

(22) They include the South African Constitutional Court's decision in State v Makwanyane; the Canadian Supreme Court's decision in United States v Burns, [2001] 1 SCR 283; and the US Supreme Court's decision in Roper v Simmons 543 US 551 (2005).

(23) Anne-Marie Slaughter, A New World Order (2004); Vicki C. Jackson, Constitutional Engagement in a Transnational Era (2010), 71ff.

(27) Section II.1 above.

Internationalization of Constitutional Law

(30) UN Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, Arts 4 and 5.

(33) The German Federal Constitutional Court had challenged the direct applicability of EU rules if they are in conflict with the German Basic Law. For a brief introduction of the struggle between the two courts and efforts towards harmonization, see Andreas Voßkuhle, ‘Multilevel Cooperation of the European Constitutional Courts’ (2010) 6 European Constitutional Law Review 175; W.T. Eijsbouts, ‘Wir Sind Das Volk: Notes about the Notion of “The People” as Occasioned by the Lissabon-Urteil’ (2010) 6 European Constitutional Law Review 199.

(34) See Cass (n 2), 49ff.

(36) Jackson (n 23), 45ff.

(39) Jackson (n 23), 46.

(41) Chang (n 9), 203ff, 228ff.

(42) Such as participating in the drafting and passage of the WHO Framework Convention on Tobacco Control (FCTC).

(43) See eg Sei Fuji v California 38 Cal 2d 718, 242 P 2d 617 (1952).

(51) JY Interpretation No 371, 7 Shizi 26 (Const Ct, January 20, 1995); Ginsburg (n 50), 165ff, 217ff.

(57) It did occasionally refer to case law of the ECtHR and extremely rarely it referred to cases decided by Supreme Court of Canada and other courts in the Americas such as the Colombian Constitutional Court and the Brazilian Court. See Angioletta Sperti, ‘The Use of Foreign Law by the Supreme Court of the United States’, Interest Group on the Use of Foreign Precedents by Constitutional Judges, unpublished manuscript, 2010.

(58) L’Heureux-Dubé (n 52), 15, 22.

(64) A search of the CANSCC-CS database on Westlaw conducted on February 4, 2011 for any and all appearances of the words ‘South Africa’ between 1995 and 2009 yielded a total of 15 results; of these, only three involved actual citations of a decision of the South African Constitutional Court. See Marcovitz v Bruker [2007] 3 SCR 607; R v Hall [2002] 3 SCR 309; United States v Burns, [2001] 1 SCR 283.

(66) Perhaps the most interesting appearance is in the decision of Taiwan’s Constitutional Court as a result of one Taiwanese Justice having a PhD in law in Austria. Law and Chang (n 62), 567.

(67) The High Court of Australia was established in 1901 and has exercised judicial powers of review since 1903.

(68) Fedtke (n 53); Sergio Gerotto, ‘The Use of Foreign Precedent by the Swiss Federal Tribunal’, Interest Group on the Use of Foreign Precedents by Constitutional Judges, unpublished manuscript, 2010; Gamper (n 55).

(69) Slaughter (n 23), 70.

(70) Chang and Yeh (n 60).
(71) Law and Chang (n 62), 544f.

(72) eg Roper v Simmons 543 US 551 (2005); Hamdan v Rumsfeld (n 20).

(79) Ejima (n 60), 19ff.

(80) See Young (n 4), 533ff.

(81) Yeh and Chang (n 5), 115ff.

(84) See Young (n 4), 533ff.

(85) eg a case decided by the ECJ: Joined Cases C-402/05 P and C-415/05 P Yassin Abdullah Kadi and Al Barakaat International Foundation, 3 September 2008.

(87) Yeh and Chang (n 5), 115.

(88) eg Hamdan v Rumsfeld (n 20); Roper v Simmons (n 22); Lawrence v Texas 539 US 558 (2003).

(89) Young (n 4), 533ff. For some opponents such as Justice Scalia of the US Supreme Court, this might even generate legitimacy concerns, which is another issue that is dealt with in elsewhere in this volume.

(90) Yeh and Chang (n 5), 115ff.

(91) See 89 BVerfGE 155 (FRG); see also 33 ILM 388 (1994). Later, they also reviewed decisions of the ECJ and ECtHR, but this remains somewhat contested. The efforts of harmonization between the two have continued. See Voßkuhle (n 33), 175ff.

(92) Yeh and Chang (n 5), 120ff.

(93) See Bosphorus Hava Yollari Turizm ve Ticaret Anonim Sirketi v Ireland, 2005-VI ECtHR 440, paras 1, 14, 40, 43.

(94) See Section V.3 above.

Wen-Chen Chang
Wen-Chen Chang is Associate Professor, College of Law, National Taiwan University
Jiunn-Rong Yeh
Jiunn-Rong Yeh is Distinguished Professor, College of Law, National Taiwan University
Abstract and Keywords

This article shows how widespread and how volatile the language of constitutionalism has become in today’s EU. It poses the baseline question of the very possibility of a constitutional law for the EU — a question that all positions in favour of a constitution, written or unwritten, are bound to answer affirmatively. The article begins by considering the EU against a general background of constitutional imagination and definition. In so doing, it explains why our understanding of the EU is influenced by the historic centrality of the modern state to constitutional theory and practice, but also why, in these inescapable but incomplete terms, the EU is an unresolved constitutional entity. It then considers how the EU’s putatively constitutional features have emerged and unfolded, in so doing focusing on the centrality of law. And as this centrality has come under pressure in the mature EU, the article looks at the changing constitutional challenges and opportunities of this new post-state polity.

Keywords: EU, constitutional law, constitutionalism, modern state, constitutional theory

I. Introduction: Imagining the Non-State Polity in Constitutional Terms 1185

II. The Possibility of European Union Constitutional Law 1188
   1. In the Shadow of the State: The Specific, the Relational, and the General 1188
   2. The Ambivalent Legacy of State Constitutionalism 1189
   3. Framing the Modern Constitutional Polity 1190
   4. Distinguishing EU Constitutionalism: The Unresolved Constitution 1192

III. The Trajectory of EU Constitutionalism 1194
   1. The Elements of ‘Thin’ Constitutionalism 1195
      (a) The Formal Sub-Register 1195
      (b) The Jurisdictional Sub-Register 1197
      (c) The Integrative Sub-Register 1198
      (d) The Institutional Register 1199
   2. The Strengths and Limitation of Thin Constitutionalism 1200
      (a) The Centrality of Law 1200
      (b) The Exhaustion of the Legal Paradigm 1202

IV. The Future of the Unresolved Constitution 1204

I. Introduction: Imagining the Non-State Polity in Constitutional Terms

In the summer of 2007 the European Council announced its decision to ‘abandon’ the ‘constitutional concept’ it had endorsed so optimistically only four years previously on receiving a draft of a first Constitutional Treaty for the European Union from the Convention on the (p. 1186) Future of Europe. After the ‘no’ votes to the 2005 French and Dutch referenda on the (duly promulgated) Constitutional Treaty, and in recognition of the document’s dubious popularity and unratiﬁed status in various other member states, Europe’s leaders eventually opted to jettison the brave new world of a supranational constitution and return to the more familiar international law vehicle of a ‘Reform Treaty’. The move appeared to pay a political dividend. Agreement was reached as early as the Lisbon Summit of December 2007 and, despite further delay occasioned by a fresh referendum defeat in Ireland, the new ‘postconstitutional Treaty’ was successfully implemented before the end of 2009.

It is a striking irony that the ultimately fatal difﬁculties encountered by the Convention coincided with the growing acceptance of some kind of constitutional status for the EU—even if understood in ‘small “c”’ rather than documentary ‘big “C”’ terms. Yet this is more than coincidence. A written constitution would not have appeared on the European political agenda without a growing readiness to think in constitutional terms about a process begun half a century earlier as an interwoven attempt at continental market-building and political rapprochement after the ravages of the Second World War. And the extensive debate over the Constitutional Treaty that ensued reinforced that trend, encouraging many interested in the EU—practitioners and commentators—to cast their appreciation of the EU in constitutional language where previously they would have been indifferent or hostile to such a characterization. The gradual adoption of a common terminology and a shared or overlapping narrative of constitutional origins do not, however, imply an emerging consensus about the contemporary constitutional quality or constitutional potential of the EU. Rather, the constitutional turn encompassed different and frequently opposing perspectives. That opposition was most apparent over the key strategic question itself—for or against an explicit constitutional settlement. But the big ‘C’ constitutional debate engaged a deeper and wider diversity of perspectives between, within, and, indeed, cutting across the immediate strategic alternatives.

For the big ‘C’ constitutional enthusiast, the (re)conceptualization of the new order as already amounting to an unwritten constitution supported a written constitution on quite different grounds and to sharply divergent ends. The emergence of an unwritten constitution could be cited as a threshold of accomplishment deserving formal recognition. On this view, a written constitutional settlement becomes appropriate as a way of charting the progress or even according ‘ﬁnality’ to the distinctive constitutional achievement of the evolved supranational form or, more ambitiously, as a platform from which to build on the undocumented acquis towards fuller constitutional maturity. In marked contrast, the development of a (p. 1187) supranational entity to a point where its powers could be claimed to be of constitutional weight might, from a position wary of expansion and stressing the continuing subordination of the EU to its member states, call for more formal constitutional recognition as a way of reining in and containing these powers.

For the big ‘C’ constitutional sceptic, too, endorsement of the unwritten constitutional credentials of the EU supported various narratives of development. To highlight the peculiar achievement of the informal constitutional acquis might suggest that a self-styled written constitutional text, far from being timely, was actually redundant. More speciﬁcally, to stress the organic development and complex richness of an unprecedented supranational accommodation of legal and political forces might indicate the intrinsic difﬁculty, even inappropriateness, of attempts to reduce that accommodation to a single documentary constitution. Or, in a more uncompromising variation of the sceptical theme, resort to constitutional language might serve to dramatize the gap between those modest aspects of constitutionalism suited to the supranational domain and grander aspirations and accomplishments familiar from the state tradition, so accentuating the deep incongruence—or ‘category error’—of a fully-fledged written constitution in this new domain.

The relationship between endorsement of the unwritten constitutional credentials of the EU and position-taking in the strategic context of the documentary constitutional debate, then, is complex, much dependent on the overall approach to the EU polity espoused or assumed. We may usefully re-plot this complexity, therefore, in terms of a spectrum of ambition encompassing three main polity visions. At the modest end of the spectrum, the EU polity assumes a truncated form, in constitutional terms measurable against but emphatically less than statehood. The EU as polity-lite possessing only the more elementary features of statehood is seen either as attracting a constitutionalism-lite which does not merit the imprimatur of a written expression, or, if a written form is contemplated, as it was by Eurosceptic at the height of debate over the documentary constitution, it is only to curb the state-like tendencies of the supranational polity. In a complex middle ground, the EU is seen as a sui generis work-in-progress or achievement, whose development and constitutional narrative clearly diverges from the state model. Again, this model may or may not be viewed as appropriately served by a written constitution, in this case depending upon whether one stresses its expressive value as a vindication of supranational distinctiveness or the excessive rigidity or irrelevance of its fixed form before the moving picture of European integration. Finally, at the ambitious end of the spectrum, the state again become the direct point of comparison, but no longer viewed as a necessarily higher constitutional form than the EU. Rather, constitutionalization is seen as a point of departure for a fuller realization of the EU polity, if not as a state, at least as a meaningfully state-analogous entity in terms of key indices of polity formation and maturation; an ambition which, at least in the dominant modern constitutional tradition, has been seen to require a documentary expression.
The European Union's Unresolved Constitution

We will return to these different polity visions—truncated and derivative polity, polity sui generis, and mature polity—and how they inform ongoing or renewed debate on Europe's constitutional future in the concluding section. The immediate point of these initial (p. 1188) observations is to show how widespread and, simultaneously, how volatile the language of constitutionalism has become in today's EU. Our main focus in what follows is upon the ‘raw material’ from which the various contemporary readings of Europe's constitutional achievement and potential are drawn. We pose the baseline question of the very possibility of a constitutional law for the EU—a question that all positions in favour of a constitution, written or unwritten, are bound to answer affirmatively. Given the types of things that the idea of constitutional law tends to signify and, given where constitutional law is situated and how distributed across our global maps of legal meaning and authority, to what extent and in what ways can we conceive of the EU as a suitable constitutional site? This inquiry requires us, first, to consider the EU against a general backdrop of constitutional imagination and definition. In so doing, we explain why our understanding of the EU is influenced by the historic centrality of the modern state to constitutional theory and practice, but also why, in these inescapable but incomplete terms, the EU is an unresolved constitutional entity. We then consider how the EU's putatively constitutional features have emerged and unfolded, in so doing focusing on the centrality of law. And as this centrality has come under pressure in the mature EU, we consider, finally, the changing constitutional challenges and opportunities of this new post-state polity.

II. The Possibility of European Union Constitutional Law

1. In the Shadow of the State: The Specific, the Relational, and the General

Within our contemporary conceptual maps of legal authority and meaning there are three different modes in which we recognize and according to which we situate constitutional law. Each mode figures in at least some understandings of the EU's constitutional credentials. First, and still emphatically foremost, as indicated by the tenor of debate over a big ‘C’ Constitution, we typically view constitutional law as polity-specific. We comprehend constitutional law as rooted in, peculiar to, concentrated upon, and, most fundamentally, as in significant ways ‘constitutive’ and configurative of a particular polity or political community—providing a unique regulatory framework that embraces and contains the whole. Today, however, the polity-specific perspective far from exhausts understandings of constitutionalism.13 Where in the high modern age constitutional law was the primary law internal to states and international law the dominant law between such mutually exclusive constitutional polities, that neat demarcation no longer holds. With the rise of non-state polities, including the EU itself, which overlap and intersect other polities, including state polities, as an outgrowth of the first polity-specific mode we increasingly also understand constitutional law in relational terms, as a nexus connecting different polities and their polity-specific systems of constitutional law. This altered landscape is part and parcel of the intensified wave of globalization or transnationalization of the key circuits of social, economic, and political power we have witnessed since the second half of the twentieth century.14 Thirdly, there is a way of viewing constitutional law as polity-indifferent; neither dedicated to a particular polity, nor even located at the interface between particular polities, but mobile between or otherwise recurrent across a wide range of (p. 1189) polities. In this mode, which in a further feature of the globalizing trend has also become more prominent in recent years, constitutional law, most emphatically in the area of individual rights, is perceived as a floating category of discrete or only loosely aggregated legal phenomena possessing a universal or at least more general moral or practical resonance regardless of polity location.15

Common to all three modes of constitutional law is the heavy imprint of the modern state. This is especially so of the first mode. The paradigm case of polity-specific constitutional law is the constitutional law of the state polity.
The very form in which we view constitutional law in this mode, as discrete and delimited, follows the model of the modern state. Equally, how we understand constitutional rules in this polity-specific form as typically co-designed or co-evolved in a holistic fashion—the ‘joined-up’ normative patterning of political life—is exemplified and largely sustained by the modern state tradition. Further, the detailed content of constitutional rules appropriate to the form of the discrete and joined-up polity are also much influenced by the long state tradition of usage and development. Constitutional law in relational mode, too, remains under the influence of the state tradition, since the leading players remain the states themselves, and the constitutional pedigree and character of these state players inevitably affect closely the terms of inter-polity relations. Finally, even where we consider constitutional law as non-polity-specific and non-holistic, but as so many discrete and mobile rules, their meaning and migratory course remains conditioned by the polity setting where they are received and adapted, and the still most prominent such settings remain states.

2. The Ambivalent Legacy of State Constitutionalism

The powerful legacy of state constitutionalism has decidedly mixed implications for the EU. Through the power of example the state tradition has encouraged and shaped the constitutional credentials of the EU more than it has any other non-state polity. The state tradition provides a cue for recognizing and a template for developing the EU as a discrete and joined-up polity. In addition, as we shall see, much of the content of the structures and doctrines of EU constitutional law is adapted from state constitutional law.

Yet the prominent statist heritage also challenges our constitutional understanding of the EU. It does so both conceptually and practically. Conceptually, despite a strong family resemblance in some features, the EU is not a state. Although it may seek to develop functional equivalents, it lacks the crucial aspects of exclusivity of final authority, originality of collective agency and primacy of political identity associated with the mature constitutional state, especially in the high modern phase of the system of states. Exclusivity of authority refers to the classical notion of state sovereignty. It holds that the state exhibits the one supreme ordering authority for a territorial polity—an authority that defers to no other internal or external authority and to which all other authorities must defer. Originality of collective agency refers to the idea of state sovereignty as the product of an irreducible pouvoir constituant or constituent power—a power residing in ‘the people’ conceived of as a non-derivative and unencumbered source. Primacy of political identity refers to a deep aspect of political culture—the idea that the governing political persona of the subject is citizenship of the state polity, and that such citizenship announces the general associative bond through which particular political interests and beliefs are articulated and negotiated and other commitments and loyalties circumscribed.

Practically, the key reason why the EU does not and cannot possess these statist features of authority, agency, and identity, or at least cannot in the fullest sense associated with modern statehood, is precisely because it must exist alongside and in relation to states. While states themselves are undoubtedly challenged, altered, and somewhat diluted in their constitutional character by the rise of non-state polities such as the EU in the late modern phase of globalization, they still in some measure claim these scarce and competitive attributes for themselves.

To appreciate the EU in constitutional terms, therefore, we must look to and beyond the template of the state. We look to the state for what the EU can adopt or adapt. As seen in the big ‘C’ constitutional debate, this is a sharply divisive move. It can be made more or less modestly, depending on the underlying polity vision held, and whether functional equivalents to the state’s mature constitutional aspects are considered feasible or desirable. We must also look beyond the state for those ‘constitutional’ features that are not based upon the state model and cannot be considered their functional equivalent. In so doing, let us concentrate on the first and, by extension, the second mode for thinking about the constitutional credentials of the EU, both premised on the idea of constitutional law as polity-specific, while remaining mindful of the third, polity-indifferent, way of thinking about constitutionalism.

3. Framing the Modern Constitutional Polity

The still dominant idea of constitutional law as polity-specific predates the modern state, although the modern state has provided its (re)defining vehicle in recent centuries. Originating in the Latin verb constitutio (to establish) and its associated noun constitutio, and in a cluster of predecessor notions in Ancient Greece, the constitutional concept was gradually extended from the natural world to the world of the ‘body politic’, first of the classical republics and then through various fuller incarnations of the state. As already intimated, the term constitution implies a discrete and holistic entity as the framed object of ‘constitutional’ reference. There are two distinct steps within this framing logic, and the movement from one to the other describes the emergence of modern constitutionalism. First, the mediaeval and early modern idea of constitution as an embracing descriptor of the inherited polity reflects a deepening assumption and spreading recognition that political society is appropriately concentrated within certain stable and territorially-coded containers of social space. Secondly, and crucially, in the age of the modern state this idea gradually assumes a more constructive and a more progressive hue. The constitution is no longer simply an acknowledgement and expression of the established order of things within the ‘imagined’ setting of the bounded polity. It is now also a constructive achievement, an active project of collective self-organization—pursued in the interests, and eventually the name of that collective—of a polity conceived as a community of free and equal persons. As such, it contains enabling and constraining elements, concerned both with the effective pursuit of the collective interests and with the protection of certain basic rights and freedoms of the free and equal individuals and groups who make up that community.\(^{19}\)

The mechanics are complex. The new constructive constitution, through various interlocking framing registers, establishes the wherewithal to shape and sustain the imagined political community. What does the pattern of interlocking framing registers consist of? Basically, constitutional thought in the modern state develops a set of distinctions but also a dense web of connections between a legal or normative framing register and other registers, which we may categorize as political and socio-cultural. The concentrated treatment of collective action problems and possibilities within any polity requires an appropriate normative blueprint. The normative register, in turn, divides into various sub-registers. There is a formal sub-register, consisting of the building blocks through which an autonomous and integrated legal system forms and equips itself with a normative capacity fit for modern constitutional purpose. There is also a jurisdictional sub-register, referring to the substantive scope of the legal order—the positive and negative means by which it specifies its boundaries of competence. There is, finally, an integrative sub-register, referring to how the formally connected bones of an expansively scoped legal system flesh out and cohere as an organic whole.

The state constitutional order also requires an authoritative assemblage of dedicated political institutions, itself generated or recognized by that normative order, as the complex of public power which acts upon, secures, and further develops that normative order.\(^{20}\) We can again identify sub-registers within the political register. There is an institutional sub-register, referring to the architecture of government itself—the combination and organization of legislative, executive, judicial, and administrative branches through which the normative order is activated and renewed. There is, in addition, an authorizing sub-register, referring to the expression and operationalization of the distinctively modern idea of the normative and institutional constitution as an artefact—shaped through collective human agency. It denotes the constituency by which and the way in which, in that constituency’s own terms, the constitutional order is initiated and constructed, or at least appropriated as an active constitutional order. This authorization may be a process or an event, informal or formal, elite or popular, but in the mature modern model of ‘foundational constitutionalism’\(^{21}\) the constitutional order is typically understood to be instituted through a formal episode of inclusive self-legislation—a popularly authorized project of documentary constitution-making. Finally, there is a socio-cultural register. This requires an associative field—variously called a society, a people, a community, and a demos—as the cultural resource that energizes and sustains and is in turn fertilized by the mutually supportive legal and political orders.\(^{22}\)

Because our sense of a modern constitutional order requires the interlocking of these framing registers, our threshold definition demands a minimum level of ‘activity’ within each field. There must be some evidence of expansive and integrating legal order and of a self-authorized rather than merely inherited or imposed institutional apparatus, and there must be some level of broad cultural recognition and endorsement of the constitutional artefact. Beyond that threshold, we can distinguish between more or less intense achievements of constitutionalism as an active project of collective self-legislation. An autonomous legal order and dedicated architecture of political institutions provide the ‘thin’ essentials of any constitutional construction, including candidates for constitutionalism beyond the state. A fuller set of links, involving a more significant investment in the expansive jurisdictional and integrative dimensions of the normative register, in the authorizing dimension of the political register and in the associative bonds available under the socio-cultural register, becomes necessary for a ‘thicker’ constitutional settlement.\(^{23}\)

It is through this fuller set of links that we comprehend the mature anatomy of state constitutionalism. The combination of fully developed legal, political, and socio-cultural framing registers maps onto the three ‘peaks’ of exclusive final authority, original collective agency, and primary political identity. In constitutional terms, exclusive final authority is a function of the interlocking of a formally autonomous legal order, a jurisdictional range unchallenged and unfettered by other authorities and a dedicated set of authoritative political institutions. Original collective agency is a function of an acknowledged act or process of self-authorization by which the constituent power generates these institutions or assumes ownership of them. Primacy of political identity depends upon a symbiosis of culture and legal and political structure. It requires a sufficient sense of common political bond at the socio-cultural level to provide support for and sustained recognition of these sovereign legal and political institutions as duly self-authorized, including the act or process of self-authorization itself, which institutional accomplishment and event history in turn reinforces the common bond of citizenship.24

4. Distinguishing EU Constitutionalism: The Unresolved Constitution

Much analysis of the constitutional quality of the EU follows this conventional approach. Such is the relative novelty of the subject at supranational level, indeed, that its literature often pays more attention to the rudiments of constitutional framing than is typical of the more taken-for-granted world of state constitutionalism on which that conceptual structure is closely modelled. Before examining the trajectory of EU constitutional development in these terms, however, we should indicate the broad underlying differences between the EU and the state context. As already remarked, for all the discrete and holistic properties of the EU polity, it lacks those traditionally state-defining features of exclusive final authority, original collective agency, and primary political identity that provide the fullest constitutional model of interlocking legal, political, and socio-cultural frames available to us. In terms dictated by the statist template, the EU has operated at the ‘thinner’ end of the spectrum of constitutional development. Yet the absence of certain statist features is also a space of constitutional possibility. The EU increasingly utilizes many tools and much of the vocabulary of constitutionalism in ways that explore new and often contested horizons of political meaning and authority and which employ or imply alternative polity visions. There is, in short, something open-ended and fundamentally unresolved about the EU’s constitutional formation, and this is demonstrated in various more specific elements of absence, openness, or special development.

First, there is the basic matter of the more restricted depth and breadth of the polity horizon. The intensity achievable through the high modern state in terms of its three peaks of sovereignty, constituent power, and citizenship implies a claim to be source and container of (p. 1193) collective action for a political community which is only self-limiting in jurisdictional reach, asserts comprehensive normative capacity to deliver within that range, and provides the primary frame of reference for members. This is reflected in the self-referential character of the state’s constitutional posture—its self-orientation as a comprehensively self-sufficient and culturally prior form of political organization. In comparison, the EU possesses both a narrower competence and a less comprehensive normative capacity within that narrower competence, as well as a supplementary status in terms of political identity. In short, it invokes a jurisdiction only partial in scope and effective capacity and it involves a way of political being that is culturally secondary and accessory to state citizenship.

This more restricted and crowded horizon also has implications for how the EU relates to other polities. Whereas the only self-limiting state polity treats other polities as mere delegates or as its (mutually exclusive) fully sovereign counterparts, the partial EU polity is performe a polity whose jurisdiction and capacity may, from one perspective, overlap the boundaries of other polities, and, from a more fluid perspective, represent the ‘crowded space’ or intersection of various different polities. These two perspectives upon the situation and spatialization of the EU polity—‘inside-out’ boundary overlap and ‘outside-in’ interlocking or commingling—indicate three further features of the EU as an unresolved constitutional polity. The first perspective supplies two contrasting features of the EU’s open and overlapping boundaries. On the one hand, as a limited polity in terms of scope and capacity, the EU’s orientation towards states and other polities is often as a collaborative and complementary polity, seeking through a complex of inter-systemic normative ‘bridging mechanisms’ to coordinate its means and ends with these other polities. On the other hand, the shift from self-reference to external reference also has a negative connotation, and again the contrast with states is marked. The exclusively empowered and self-sufficient state treats its authority, and that of other exclusively empowered and self-sufficient states, in monopolistic terms. For its part, given its extensive overlap with other (primarily state) polities, alongside and in tension with its collaborative approach to these other polities, the EU stands in a competitive relationship with these polities over their respective domains of authority.
The situation is further complicated by the third relational dimension of the EU polity, where the logic of polity interpenetration is extended and the environment of polity diversity is understood not just to affect the EU polity margins but to shape its internal composition. Whereas the comprehensively and exclusively authorized state polity possesses structural integrity or singularity, in which not just all normative elements but also all institutional elements and relations contribute to and are resolved in terms of the one polity whole (even if their initial reference points are different territorial, ethnic, or functional parts), the EU may instead be viewed as a composite entity. It is a hybrid—a ‘mixed’ or ‘compound’ structure—which in its different institutions (Council, European Council, Commission, Parliament, Court) and normative emphases reflects and interlocks its differently polity-sourced parts.

Alongside these spatial features there are two temporal features of the EU’s constitutional particularity. Although their resilience is highly variable and their causal sequence of development can vary dramatically—from the US model where the self-authorizing constitutional instrument predates the cultural construction of ‘national’ community and the political architecture of the state to various European models where either or both ‘state’ and ‘nation’ predate the explicitly constitutional project—we encounter most enduring state constitutions as achieved states of affairs. We typically contemplate them as always/already ‘thickly’ accomplished projects whose dynamic is of consolidation or adaptation. This is not so for the EU. Whether or not its future development is envisaged in state-analogous terms, the EU remains a constitutional work in progress—an incipient structure still self-consciously under construction rather than a fully realized form. Moreover, and closely related, the EU’s unresolved condition is conceptual as well as empirical. Whereas the completeness of the state constitutional model presupposes a recognizable template for its mature form, and so determinacy and finality of conception, the incompleteness of the EU in state-centred terms and its irreducibility to state-centred terms suggests the absence of any model of its mature form—an indeterminacy and open-endedness of conception.

A final distinctive characteristic of EU constitutionalism flows from the previous features. The state constitutional polity is a settled political form. Such is its embeddedness, self-sufficiency, self-containment, and structural unity, its typical manifestation as an already accomplished state and conformity to a familiar template, that neither its basic eligibility as a constitutional polity nor the general terms on which that eligibility depends are the subject of serious contestation. That does not mean that the basic status qua constitutional state claimed for a polity will not be challenged. Either the identity of the state or, more commonly, its satisfaction of basic constitutional standards may be contested, externally or internally. But however sharply engaged, the contest remains one about specific cases rather than the general type. The constitutional polity of the EU, in contrast, is a constitutionally disputed polity. In light of its limited jurisdiction, its secondary form of political identity and agency, its open and unsettled relationship with states and other polities, its hybrid structure, its still emergent status and provisional conception, both its basic eligibility as a constitutional polity and the terms on which that eligibility rest are subject to serious and continuing contestation.

In a nutshell, whereas the state has generally been considered as a culturally prior, comprehensive, exclusive, monopolistic, singular, accomplished, determinate, and settled political form and constitutional polity, the EU remains an accessory, partial, complementary, competitive, composite, incipient, indeterminate, and disputed political form and constitutional polity.

III. The Trajectory of EU Constitutionalism

Let us cash out this preliminary conceptual analysis through an examination of the evolving terms of the EU’s unresolved constitutionalism. In so doing, we focus on these predominantly legal sub-registers within which emerged—largely unheralded in these terms at the time—what was subsequently consecrated as the ‘thin’ version of EU constitutionalism. Having described that achievement, we will consider its strengths and limitation, and why it came under increased pressure in the lead-up to the big ‘C’ project.

1. The Elements of ‘Thin’ Constitutionalism

(a) The Formal Sub-Register

The birth of small ‘c’ constitutionalism in the EU context is closely associated with the elaboration of the formal sub-register of legal order. As noted earlier, this involves a cluster of interconnected features that supply the basic structure of a self-standing legal system. Self-ordering refers to the capacity of a legal system to reach and regulate all matters within its domain, typically through its successful embedding of certain lawmaking ‘secondary’ norms as a means to generate and validate a comprehensive body of ‘primary’ norms of conduct, which norms may be further distinguished as higher or lower, more or less binding and entrenched. Self-interpretation refers to the capacity of some organ(s) internal to the legal order, typically located in the adjudicative branch, to have the final word as regards the meaning of its own norms. Self-extension refers to the capacity of a legal system to determine the extent of its own jurisdiction—sometimes known as Kompetenz-Kompetenz. Self-amendment refers to the existence of a mechanism for changing the content of the legal order provided for in terms of that order and empowering organs internal to that order as the agents of the amendment process. Self-enforcement refers to the capacity of the legal order, through the development of a body of procedural law and associated sanctions, to secure the application and implementation of its own norms.

Finally, the quality of self-discipline depends on the platform established by these features. When the legal order reaches a threshold of coverage and constancy in its production of primary norms (self-ordering), when it attains a level of effectiveness in its rules of standing, justiciability, and liability (self-enforcement), when it acquires some capacity to adjust its own normative structure, and provided it can guard against external influences undermining these system-building endeavours (self-amendment, self-interpretation, and self-extension), it is in a formal position (though far from guaranteed) to satisfy two aspects of self-discipline. First, it can offer a level of generality and predictability of treatment of those subject to its norms, so helping to promote and vindicate a system-constraining cultural presumption against arbitrary rule. Secondly, a legal order with mature claims to autonomy, comprehensive coverage, and effectiveness provides the opportunity and cultivates the expectation that even the institutional or governmental actors internal to the legal order should be subject to restraint in accordance with that mature order. These two core ideas—the ‘rule of law, not man’ and a ‘government limited by law’—provide a key element of all Western legal traditions, whether couched in the language of ‘rule of law’, état de droit, or Rechtsstaat, supplying a cornerstone of constitutionalism understood as a discourse not just of legal authority but also of legal virtue.

From its inception in the three founding Treaties of the 1950s, the EU legal order, through a mix of legislation and judicial assertion, boasted many formal features of a self-standing legal order. Its development, however, has also been conditioned by its ‘spatial’ situation as an overlapping polity in a relationship of mutual dependence and competition with state polities. The EU both invites and depends upon the cooperation and is vulnerable to the self-assertion of other legal orders within a broader ‘pluralist’ configuration, and so its formal autonomy is coloured both by collaborative openness and boundary rivalry.

In terms of self-ordering and self-interpretation the EU legal order comes closest to a fully self-contained system. Its founding Treaties provides the EU’s own internal hierarchy of instruments—Treaty provisions, directives, regulations, and decisions, and this framework has been rationalized over subsequent Treaties. For its part, from its pivotal early assertion of the ‘supremacy’ or ‘primacy’ of its norms over the norms of other legal systems, the European Court of Justice (ECJ) has ensured that, at least from the internal perspective of the EU legal order, that hierarchy prevails over the ordering claims of competing legal systems. This and other early acts of self-assertion in its formative jurisprudence helped the ECJ to consolidate its position, suggested but not determined by the framework provisions of the Treaties, as a ‘Supreme Court’ for the EU, and so its final interpretive authority. But even in these areas of greatest strength, supranational authority is qualified at the margins. Dependence upon national instruments for implementation of EU measures other than regulations curtails the self-ordering chain of validity. Additionally, as the ECJ’s main jurisdiction is one of preliminary reference to obtain authoritative resolution of questions as to the interpretation or validity of EU law, and so within the referring gift and subject to the disposal of the domestic referring court, it is not a final appellate court. It lacks the capacity to have the last word, including the very means to ‘decide what to decide’.

While still well developed compared to other transnational regimes, other aspects of the formal autonomy of the EU are more significantly qualified. As regards self-extension, through the doctrine of implied powers and an expansive reading of its own ‘necessary and proper’ clause, the ECJ lays serious claim to determine the range of its competence. In the final analysis, however, this is limited by the EU’s dependence upon (textually) conferred powers. It is also counterbalanced by the preparedness of the domestic courts of Germany, Spain, Denmark, Poland, and the Czech Republic and elsewhere to (re)assert national constitutional authority from time to time against what they see as the actual or potential overreach of the EU law. This overreach may involve Treaty powers encroaching too far on traditional areas of state sovereignty, or supranational legislative acts or executive powers deemed to interfere with fundamental rights or with other national constitutional protections. In any event, the fact or prospect of such reactions may invite a more prudent approach by the judicial and other branches of the EU when contemplating the range of their jurisdictional ambition.

Outside the generous limits of self-interpretation, the power of constitutional self-amendment, strictly construed, remains lacking. Instead, the EU relies upon a mechanism external to its institutional edifice—namely the Intergovernmental Conference—for formal Treaty amendment. In a significant concession, however, recent Treaties have introduced simplified and less onerous non-Treaty-based procedures for the revision of some of their own terms. In the area of self-enforceability, a key element has been the doctrine of the ‘direct effect’ of EU norms in national legal orders, which developed and operates in close tandem with the primacy doctrine. Yet even within the limited set of those supranational rules considered sufficiently clear, precise and unconditional to be domestically justiciable, the cooperation of national judges is patently necessary for enforcement. And beyond this, the EU legal order depends upon national authorities both for the legislative transposition and for the executive and (again) judicial application of non-directly effective norms, although the gradual expansion by the ECJ of the doctrine of state liability as a way of plugging the gaps has become a selectively effective sanction against non-compliance.

Self-discipline provides a final tableau of significant yet incomplete authority. The idea of the ‘rule of law’ applying comprehensively to the institutions of the EU itself was elevated to the litmus test of constitutionality by the ECJ when it coined the small ‘c’ word in Les Vents to justify the non-Treaty addition of the Parliament to the list of bodies subject to judicial review. However, the ambition of comprehensive internal legal oversight remains vulnerable to the non-justiciability or limited justiciability of certain areas of EU law, notably, despite recent improvements, in the newer, non-core domains of the Area of Freedom, Security and Justice and the Common Foreign and Security Policy.

(b) The Jurisdictional Sub-Register

The other normative sub-registers have gradually built on the platform of formal autonomy. Jurisdiction has assumed a highly distinctive shape in the EU. In the state constitutional context the jurisdictional sub-register closely tracks the defining modern constitutional idea of a broad division between a collectively-enabling public sphere of comprehensive policy capacity and a collectively-constraining protected sphere of private autonomy. Typically, we find a combination of positive and negative norms—of prescription and proscription. On the one hand, there is a functionally unlimited legislative and executive jurisdiction in pursuit of the common good, while on the other, that jurisdiction is circumscribed by a set of individual-centred ‘forbearance’ rights or basic freedoms.

In the EU, both collective competence and individual freedoms have been treated differently, as has the relationship between them. Collective competence is not functionally unlimited. What is more, collective competence is defined not against but in terms of the ‘functional’ pursuit of a particular subset of individual freedoms, namely the so-called ‘four freedoms’ of movement of goods, services, capital, and persons necessary to secure a common transnational market. The common good and individual freedom, therefore, are treated not as distinct, sometimes divergent, and mutually restraining ends, but as indistinct and convergent, if self-limiting objectives. And reflecting the new relational openness of the EU polity context, the constraining edge of this jurisdiction is mostly externally directed, towards the member states through prohibitions upon the maintenance or introduction of national measures constituting barriers to trade, creating other obstacles to free and undistorted competition, or impeding the free movement of persons, services, and capital. Thus the ‘market-making’ pursuit of the four freedoms is largely by the technique of ‘negative integration’, with the ECJ and the Commission enabling constraining—specifying and policing the permissive boundaries of the market against state encroachment.

If this paints a jurisdictional picture sharply at odds with the state constitutional model, other developments suggest a more familiar pattern. First, the functional jurisdiction of the EU has also gradually come to be pursued through ‘positive integration’, namely the elaboration by legislative and other measures of a regulatory system at the level of the larger supranational unit. To some extent, this has remained concerned with market-making—for example, the harmonization of divergent national product standards. Additionally, however, and accelerating from the time of the Single European Act (1987) and the Treaty of Maastricht (1992), the increase in positive integration tracks the expansion of EU jurisdiction beyond the four freedoms into various ‘market-correcting’ provisions of social and environmental regulation as well as other flanking measures, primarily in internal and external security, owing little to the economic rationale of integration and more to other kinds of collective policy capacity associated with the state.\textsuperscript{56} The reasons for this and its implications for the stability of the ‘thin’ constitutional settlement are considered below.\textsuperscript{57}

A second, more recent state-like jurisdictional development addresses the other side of the coin. It concerns the informal adoption in 2000 and eventual Treaty recognition of the wide-ranging Charter of Fundamental Rights.\textsuperscript{58} Applicable against both member states and the EU’s own institutions and other bodies, this initiative, in pursuing the idea of a general constitutional protection of private autonomy, means that, on the prescriptive as well as the descriptive side, EU jurisdiction more closely approximates the domestic model.

(c) The Integrative Sub-Register

The integrative sub-register provides the most explicit example within the supranational constitutional register of direct borrowing from the domestic heritage. At issue here is how the mix of European law gradually thickened to fill the gaps left by the purely mechanical coherence of the formal model. Through the idea of general principles which, initially in the case law, and now the Treaties, are deemed to derive from ‘common constitutional traditions’ of the member states, the ECJ has equipped itself with a number of non-textual lodestars—fundamental rights, equality, proportionality, legal certainty, effectiveness etc.\textsuperscript{59} In a ‘synthetic’\textsuperscript{60} process, these ideas, while their national origins are never disowned, are gradually refined so as to acquire distinct (p. 1199) significance as doctrines of supranational law. In this way, the EU legal order seeks to garner the normative resources necessary to address hard questions raised by its expanding jurisdiction; both the need to construe new areas of law for which there are no existing thick interpretive practices and the imperative to do so in a manner that seeks consistency and coherence across an increasingly wide range of functional objectives and core values.\textsuperscript{61} As with the jurisdictional sub-register, the dynamic of constitutionalism in this sub-register is incremental, mapping a gradual movement away from the ‘thin’ end of the constitutional spectrum.

(d) The Institutional Register

Patently, the EU from the outset has boasted its own specialized and closely defined institutional structure as both product and mobilizing force of its legal order. Through a dedicated court (ECJ), administrative college (Commission), and legislator (Council), the founding scheme supplied a more elaborately differentiated and strongly empowered institutional complex than possessed by other international Treaty organizations.\textsuperscript{62} What is more, in terms of the range and depth of institutions and the density of their relations, today the EU’s political system has evolved far beyond that baseline. Yet we should be wary of overstating similarities between supranational and state architecture. To recall our earlier discussion, it is in this institutional sub-register that the distinctiveness of the EU as a mixed or composite polity becomes evident. Whereas the primary axis of institutional division within the state polity is the governmental branch and function—legislative, executive, or judicial—regarding one and the same polity object, the EU system has no single centre of gravity. Its key axis of institutional division, instead, is the representation, in functionally overlapping form, of separate ‘estates’\textsuperscript{63} and interests, which constituencies refer back to diverse polity sources, or at least, diverse conceptions of the Euro-polity. Traditionally, the European Commission and the ECJ reflect the supranational interest, the ‘intergovernmental’ Council and the European Council (of Heads of States) engage the distinct interests of the states, while the European Parliament refers, ambiguously, to the representation of the European ‘peoples’ (national) or ‘people’ (supranational). Rather than the separation of (types of governmental) powers, therefore, the key structural imperative of the mixed constitutional polity is closer to a dispersed, pre-state conception of institutional balance.\textsuperscript{64}

Just because of the background diversity of interests, however, that balance has tended to contested, and also increasingly complex. The initial technocratic disposition in pursuit of the common market—‘the Commission proposes, the Council disposes’—lasted only until the shift under the transitional provisions of the initial Treaty from unanimity to qualified majority voting in the Council threatened ultimate national control over the legislative process. This generated the so-called ‘empty chair’ crisis in the Council—provoked by French President de Gaulle and only resolved by the 1966 Luxembourg Compromise—which provided that decisional unanimity would continue where important national interests were at stake. A long consolidation of national executive hegemony over new macro-policy initiatives followed, reflected in the increasing prominence of the European Council\textsuperscript{65} and in an extended period (p. 1200) of legislative immobility not overcome until a series of Treaty initiatives beginning with the Single European Act (1987) and continuing with the Treaties of Maastricht (1992) and Amsterdam (1997). These measures relaxed the national veto by introducing qualified majority voting in the Council, first in the area of internal market law and then more broadly. At the same time, direct national executive influence was further diluted by the increasing recognition of the European Parliament as a third proactive player in the legislative process, first through the cooperation procedure and then the stronger co-decision procedure.

The easing of legislative gridlock and the emerging policy-making tripartitism, however, far from resolves all questions of institutional balance. One regular battleground of the last two decades has been the compositional and internal decision-making rules of the key institutional players. Another has been the division of ‘sub-legislative’ executive and regulatory authority between Commission and Council in more detailed policy areas. In both arenas, the tensions of a composite polity remain vivid.66

2. The Strengths and Limitation of Thin Constitutionalism

(a) The Centrality of Law

Understanding vary as to how the ingredients of thin constitutionalism—formal, jurisdictional, integrative, and political-institutional—combine, but all versions of the ‘grand narrative’67 have in common the idea of law performing a vital and well-tailored role in the construction and sustenance of the EU polity. The centrality of law to the emergent constitutional settlement rests on a number of considerations—instrumental, structural, ideological, anthropological, and, most fundamentally, philosophical. Let us look briefly at each.

The instrumental dimension concerns the indispensability of law as the basic motor of supranationalism—the key means to the end of European integration. Writing in the early 1980s, before the development of qualified majority voting and the pronounced expansion of jurisdiction beyond the market-making core, Joseph Weiler noted the ‘the dual character of supranationalism’68 as the defining frame of Europe’s early evolution. At that stage, the developed character of legal or normative supranationalism in the area of the internal market, particularly the ECJ’s assertive development of the EU’s formal properties as an autonomous legal system, stood in stark contrast to a modestly conceived decisional or political supranationalism. Yet the two were strategically related. The early prominence of legal supranationalism occurred not in spite of political underdevelopment but precisely because political supranationalism remained so modest, with the member states retaining a de jure or de facto veto in most areas of European policymaking. The basic key to the attractiveness of law as the vehicle of supranational agency, therefore, lay with its regulatory capacity to steer, to consolidate, and, typically through judicial recognition of the claims of private litigants, to guarantee positive-sum intergovernmental bargains across wide-ranging aspects of economic integration and some more limited aspects of market-correcting regulation, and to do so without threatening key national political prerogatives. The law’s instrumental value was twofold. It provided a legible and stable method of charting and co-coordinating the supranational settlement. Additionally, in a context of market-making where the temptation for each national member of the continental trade-liberalizing cartel to engage in protectionism and other forms of discrimination while exploiting the general opening of the markets of the other national members posed a significant collective action problem, the consistent application and enforcement of the rules of the game by independent legal institutions was crucial in forestalling free-riding and rendering common commitments more credible.69

Structural factors reinforce the instrumental attractiveness of law. The ECJ’s empowerment as the apex court responded to a conception of the constitutional settlement understood, in the language of organizational economics, as an incomplete contract. Framework texts, even the relatively detailed codes of successive European Treaties, always possess open texture. Textual leeway both lowers the bar of prerequisite consensus and allows judicial adaptation to changing conditions without new resort to the legislative drawing board. The resulting margin of judicial manoeuvre is key to reconciling stability and flexibility in any constitutional context; emphatically so in the EU, where the political conditions for regular textual reform, certainly over the first quarter of a century, were highly unfavourable. The ECJ, then, became a vital mechanism to avoid blockages and conflicts associated with the divergence and opposition of national interests. As a ‘trustee court’,70 delegated significant power to bind its national principals and able through development of its formal constitutional attributes to fortify and expand its zone of discretion, it could address ‘completing’ the supranational contract both by advancing the material agenda of integration case by case and by adjusting the balance, so sensitive in the mixed polity, in boundary conflicts over the powers of the diversely-sourced institutions.71
The European Union's Unresolved Constitution

The fiduciary role of a trustee court, however, is not legitimated solely by system functionality. Ideological factors also matter. The tradition of legal formalism, assiduously cultivated in the context of an ECJ composed of senior jurists from all member states and conducting its business in a typically laconic and scrupulously non-partisan ‘legalese’, has lent cumulative authority to the court’s decision-making.\textsuperscript{72} The fact that much of the constitutional jurisdiction of the EU and its judicial organs could be articulated in terms of rights—both its positive jurisdiction, and, with increasing emphasis, its negative jurisdiction—has reinforced this ideological advantage. The ECJ has been able to engage in a constitutional vein in terms closely associated with its own authority as a court—in the language of individual rights and remedies so familiar from the historical lexicon of constitutional law.\textsuperscript{73}

Underpinning these instrumental, structural, and ideological considerations, there is a strong cultural dimension. Recent anthropological research has underlined how important the original network of elite supranational actors in and around the ECJ was in developing the theme of ‘Europeanization through case-law’.\textsuperscript{74} Not only did the key formative decisions on supremacy and direct effect emerge in acknowledgement of and response to the difficulties associated with political integration, but they involved a conscious and self-reinforcing mobilization of the very notion of the supranational community as a community of law. Rather than \textit{comprehending law-centred theories of integration as purely external and retrospective accounts of a secular process}, therefore, we should also understand them as active structuring devices by which judges, civil servants, academics, MEPs, national diplomats, and Commissioners became engaged ‘in real time’ in a ‘circular circulation of ideas’\textsuperscript{75} which contributed cumulatively to the ascent of legal constitutionalism.

If the assertion of such a robust legal persona has been the key to the capacity of the EU operating from its narrow stronghold of institutional power to exercise continental regulatory authority, its success at root depends upon its resonance with the early philopolitical justifications of the EU. In different ways, two of the most influential founding theories, the German ordoliberal tradition\textsuperscript{76} and Hans Ipsen’s idea of the EU as a special purpose association,\textsuperscript{77} encouraged a law-centred perspective. For the ordoliberalists, the Treaty of Rome supplied Europe with its own economic constitution, a supranational market-enhancing system of rights whose legitimacy \textit{required} the absence of democratically responsive will formation and consequential pressure towards market-interfering socio-economic legislation at the supranational level, a matter best left to the member states—and even there only insofar as compatible with the bedrock economic constitution. Ordoliberal theory, then, provides a classic model of how an autonomous legal order, through ring-fencing economic exchange centred on the four freedoms, provides a platform for the efficient operation of a capitalist economic logic. Ipsen’s theory, to which Giandomenico Majone’s contemporary work on the idea of a European ‘regulatory state’\textsuperscript{78} is a notable successor, shares with ordoliberalism the idea that supranationalism should transcend partisan politics. Here, however, the ambit of law is extended so that the invisible hand of the market is supplemented by the expert hand of the technocrat. In Majone’s elaborately developed conception—one that has continued to capture the sensibility of a significant part of the Brussels elite—these additional regulatory measures are concerned not with macro-politically sensitive questions of distribution, but with risk-regulation in matters such as product and environmental standards where expert knowledge is deemed paramount, and where accountability is arguably best served by administrative law measures aimed at transparency and enhanced participation in decision-making by interested and knowledgeable parties rather than the volatile preferences of broad representative institutions.

\textbf{(b) The Exhaustion of the Legal Paradigm}

The delicate balance achieved by locking the EU’s collective agency within a law-centred discourse and a narrow market-based justification could not hold indefinitely. The pursuit and perfection of the narrow economic objectives of the Union has progressively impinged upon a wide range of social issues, making ‘spillover’\textsuperscript{79} into politically contentious areas of traditiona

Such a tension was in truth present from the birth of supranationalism. Economic policies always carried significant implications, whether supportive or restrictive, for wider political projects and ambitions at the national or supranational level. Importantly, indeed, it was a powerfully supportive nexus between the economic and political which from the beginning allowed the common market to be elevated to the defining supranational priority not just on wealth-maximizing grounds. Just as important was the wider political prize of lasting peace for a continent long blighted by war that a culture of economic cooperation and shared affluence could help to secure. Less felicitous connections between the narrow economic and wider political poles of integration, however, became evident as the EU increasingly sought market-making or market-correcting interventions involving politically salient choices, in so doing reducing the capacity of states to act independently in these policy areas. The robust juridical elaboration and protection of the single market at the heart of legal constitutionalism had flourished in a formative context where market-making measures impinged only lightly on other social policy objectives, or at least where states retained the procedural means to veto politically controversial collective commitments in pursuit of these other objectives—and so were slow to make such commitments where there were obvious winners and losers. But the gradual expansion of the scope of negative integration from the narrow market-making sphere and the concomitant growth of positive integration, with its shift towards a qualified majoritarian logic, decisively altered the dynamic of collective action.

The gathering danger was that the very strength of the law in supplying ‘both the object and agent of integration’—in supplying the fruit of the ‘thin’ constitutional settlement as well as the channel for arriving at that settlement—would become a liability. On the one hand, as the agent of integration, the law would become a medium whose prudent husbanding of the integration acquis would instead translate as excessive political unresponsiveness. The threat was that legal proofing of particular agreements against political reappraisal and the prevention of new supranational initiatives except through still highly consensual and only moderately democratically inclusive procedures, or through the recondite increments of the ECJ, would become more a way of avoiding or excluding the legitimate expression of political choice and contestation and less a means of protection against free-riding or ideologically inspired resistance or fickleness towards positive-sum collective commitments. On the other hand, as and when the pressure towards positive integration has led to legal change, and as more controversial value choices have begun to reflect onto the legal domain—this has also affected the ideological potency of law as the object of integration, stripping some of the detached, efficiency-maximizing veneer from legal supranationalism.

(p. 1204) IV. The Future of the Unresolved Constitution

The gradual fraying of the ‘permissive consensus’ around legal supranationalism provides the deep background for the emergence of the big ‘C’ constitutional debate emerged. Other factors contributed, notably the wave of eastward Enlargement after the fall of the Berlin Wall. The increase in the EU from 15 members in 1997 to 27 in 2007 raised acute questions about the adequacy of an institutional structure built for a homogenous West European club of six states to a sprawling pan-European expanse of 500 million persons. Indeed, Enlargement and its unmet institutional needs provided an important rhetorical framework for the EU’s reform decade. It was the thread connecting the busy sequence of Treaty amendments from Maastricht to Nice in 2001, whose unfinished business in turn prompted the historic decision at the Laeken Summit to establish a Convention on the Future of Europe. Yet the focus on Enlargement merely channelled and accelerated a process of reflection and contestation over the kind of polity the EU was and could become that was unavoidable in light of the increasing inadequacy of the received model.

In the introduction it was suggested that three polity visions accompanied the big ‘C’ constitutional debate. Each can be seen as a response to the gradual extension of supranational capacity beyond what could comfortably be accommodated in the earlier model. The truncated vision, first, was one of retrenchment, concerned to draw a line in the sand through mechanisms such as a competence catalogue, the entrenchment of the Charter of Rights, and the empowerment of national Parliaments. Here constitutionalism was invoked, both materially and symbolically, as a barrier against the further evacuation of state power to the supranational level. The sui generis vision, secondly, was concerned with pursuing or consolidating Europe’s Sonderweg. Its defining priority was not the protection of state prerogatives, but ensuring against the political blockage and institutional stasis which would prevent Europe making the regulatory adjustments necessary for its distinctive ‘post-national’ accommodations between market and state, intergovernmental and supranational, legal fixity and political openness, to be maintained and updated. In its pragmatic attention to the demands of a novel problem-solving context and in its non-alignment with ‘old’ state-sovereignist coded oppositions, this view was the quiet motor of much of the pro-Convention movement. Choosing the big ‘C’ option here assumed importance less for any (state-regarding) inferences as to constitutional content and more as way of re-energizing and re-validating a macro-political reform process which, given the progressive disappointments and deferrals of the Amsterdam and Nice Treaties, was...
The European Union's Unresolved Constitution

falling foul of the law of diminishing returns.\textsuperscript{88}

The mature polity vision, thirdly, hoped to bring the benefits of thick constitutionalism to bear on the Europolity. Its ambition was for the EU constitution, through a combination of inclusive process, integrative content, and culturally unifying symbolic product, to deliver (p. 1205) some kind of functional equivalent to the peaks of comprehensive jurisdiction, self-authorization, and deeper political identity. By this route might be overcome the ‘asymmetry’\textsuperscript{89} of a settlement where the EU lacked the political resources to deliver legitimate and effective collective solutions to politically and intergovernmentally contentious issues of economic and social policy increasingly falling beyond the independent capability of national governments. This third vision was not the most commonly endorsed approach feeding the Convention momentum, but it was undoubtedly the most heavily invested in the big ‘C’ solution. For the most part\textsuperscript{90} it did not envisage the EU as a federal state, so acknowledging the concerns of the state-centred constitutionalists. It did not, therefore, seek to replace the states as the single focus of final authority, original collective agency, and deep political identity. Rather, it sought to develop or recognize these state-familiar constitutional assets of political community on an independent footing for the EU, and in a manner envisaging neither superiority nor subordination to the states but engagement in a non-hierarchical relationship with them. So the EU would have an authority that was autonomous without being exclusive or exhaustive. It would have a foundation and reference point of collective agency (ie, the European people) that was distinctive and self-standing without being the only distinctive and self-standing collective reference point for the various constituencies (ie, European states, European ‘peoples’) which made up the new collective agency. Finally, building on the supranational citizenship provisions in place since Maastricht,\textsuperscript{91} it would also possess a form of framing or organizing political identity, complete with rights, obligations, and membership status, which again was distinctive but not unique in function, instead operating in tandem with the other (predominantly state-centred) organizing political identities of its subjects.\textsuperscript{92}

The Constitutional Treaty which eventually emerged from the deliberations of the Convention and the Intergovernmental Conference reflected something of each vision. For the retrenchers there was a skeletal competence catalogue, a Charter of Rights, and a greater involvement of national Parliaments in the legislative process as a way of adding meat to the bare bones of the neglected Maastricht standard of ‘subsidiarity’. For the pragmatic post-Enlargement reformers there was an increase in the areas of competence subject to qualified majority voting and Parliamentary co-decision, and so ripe for positive integration, together with institutional reform to streamline the Commission and increase the power and profile of the European Council. For the proponents of a mature state-like polity there was the fully fledged constitution-making process itself, a first textual affirmation of the primacy of European law and many of the symbolic incidents of constitutionalism, including the constitutional label, a single constituent document, and the introduction of a constitutionally resonant vocabulary of laws, foreign ministers etc.

For all that the text itself showed evidence of hybridity, given the disparity of visions brought to the table it is no surprise that the big ‘C’ constitutional initiative eventually failed. Once the solidarity of the Convention process had faded and the debate was reframed within the national arenas of the ratifying member states, the differences in principle between different polity visions which the posing of the constitutional question exposed served to overshadow the detailed compromises and accommodations that had been worked out. Here, then, we saw the unresolved quality of the EU polity in bold relief. The very conditions of competitiveness, (p. 1206) mixity, and indeterminacy feeding the constitutional initiative also generated the open horizon of alternatives and the intensity of disputation which invited its failure.

Should this, then, lead us to conclude, especially in the light of the successful implementation of the subsequent Reform Treaty which, tellingly, retained nearly all of the substance but little of the symbolism of the Constitutional Treaty, that the idea of big ‘C’ constitutionalism in the EU is a dead letter? Is its resurrection neither feasible nor desirable? Whatever the future trajectory of supranational constitutionalism, ought not it now revert to the informal, small ‘c’ course around whose historical credentials and continuing contribution there has recently emerged such a clamorous overlapping consensus?

We need not draw such a hasty conclusion. The wider constitutional debate may be in abeyance, but it is not resolved and cannot be while its animating polity visions remain so deeply at odds with one another, and where the symptoms of that deep fracture in the dearth of common terms of engagement over key choices and strategic directions in both European domestic and foreign policy in the early decades of the new century remain so pertinent and pressing. In these circumstances, however unlikely its immediate prospects, a revival of the big ‘C’ constitutional project cannot and should not be discounted.

But even if this were to happen, the sceptic might dismiss it as a futile gesture, trapped in a self-defeating logic of contestation. There is no guarantee that the process, whatever its initial momentum, would be any more successful next time round. And even if it were, this would provide no magic solution to the problems of the mutual frustration and overall dilution of collective capability in a multilevel political space which, quite differently conceived and articulated, exercise the exponents of all three visions. In particular, a successful constitutional episode would supply no compelling case in favour of the third and most optimistically positive-sum vision to those who would rather promote supranational capability in other ways (second vision) or concentrate on protecting or resurrecting national capability (first vision). For, as has been forcefully pointed out, a successful constitutional process offers no guarantee of more inclusive ongoing participation, no deliberative panacea, and no promise of increased support by its citizens or effective policymaking and implementation capacity to the extent that such participatory and deliberative dividends are forthcoming.

Yet the specification of a distinctive collective authorship and political identity that the constitutional self-attribution of title announces could serve another more limited, but prior purpose. This concerns the realization of the very sense of collective pre-engagement in whose absence it is difficult to see how any attempt to reconcile polity visions in the European legal and political space, regardless of where and how these attempts strike the balance, can be securely grounded. For the constitutional arena—and perhaps only the constitutional arena, offers this possibility: that, as we close the curtain on an era that allowed first-order economic decision-making to proceed and its benefits to accrue substantially unaffected by second-order considerations of what and who the EU stood for other than a legally demarcated set of interests delegated by the constituent states, we might at least be able to begin the process of overcoming increasingly disabling second-order differences over the basic character of the EU polity in and through the act of recognizing and addressing such differences as our common predicament. More specifically, a documentary constitutional commitment may, in boot-strapping fashion, supply the platform for the generation of a reflexive awareness of a common sense of authorship and for the gradual accumulation of a common constitutional experience and memory to deepen and consolidate that common sense.

While it would be wrong to imagine this as any more than one modest element in the remaking of the European polity along lines which command broader acceptance, we should avoid the opposite error of underestimating its importance. A written constitution is always both trace and catalyst. It is a trace because its very promulgation is already a sign, however modest, of the commitment and common understanding it seeks to encode. And the constitution is a catalyst insofar as it provides a means by which and a context in which to stimulate the deepening of that commitment and common understanding. Indeed, it is precisely this Janus-faced quality—the backward-looking recollection of common resources and gathering of existing potential just in order to solve forward-looking collective action problems amongst those of different interests, preferences, and identities—that has given documentary constitutionalism its uniquely modern hue. For in its assumption that nothing is more basic or more apt than our own joint commitment to shape our common world, constitutionalism invokes a social technology unknown to pre-modern cultures. Perseverance with the techniques of documentary constitutionalism, then, may be unavoidable for all who maintain that the EU is best understood as a continuation by other and as yet ‘unresolved’ means of political modernity’s defining project of the collective reconciliation of freedom and equality, rather than a venture into a wholly uncharted political imaginary.

Bibliography

Paul Craig and Gráinne de Búrca (eds), The Evolution of EU Law (2nd edn, 2011)

Peter L. Lindseth, Power and Legitimacy: Reconciling Europe and the Nation-State (2010)

Neil MacCormick, Questioning Sovereignty (1999)

Miguel Maduro and Loic Azoulai (eds), The Past and Future of EU Law (2010)

Giandomenico Majone, Europe as the Would-be World Power: The EU at Fifty (2009)

Fritz Scharpf, Governing in Europe: Effective and Democratic? (1999)

(8) In the well-known formulation of Joschka Fischer, Foreign Minister of the Federal Republic of Germany, ‘From Confederacy to Federation—Thoughts on the Finality of European Integration’, Speech at the Humboldt University, Berlin, 12 May 2000. This speech is widely credited as a key moment in the mobilization of political opinion behind a big ‘C’ constitutional process.

(10) See eg The Economist, 4 November 2000. The conversion of the notoriously Eurosceptic magazine to the case for a written constitution was contingent upon such a limiting approach.

(13) On constitutionalism, see further Chapter 8.

(14) See eg A. Jones, Globalization: Key Thinkers (2010).

(16) On sovereignty, see Chapter 17.

(33) The European Coal and Steel Community of 1951, the Euratom Treaty of 1957, and most importantly, the European Economic Community Treaty of the same year.

(34) The literature on so-called constitutional pluralism in the EU is now extensive. For an excellent overview, see

(35) Article 189 EEC.

(36) See now, Art 249 Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union (TFEU).

(39) Article 267 TFEU.

(40) Article 352 TFEU.

(41) Article 5 TEU.

(43) Often in the context of Treaty reform, as in the German Federal Constitutional Court’s famous judgments on the legality of the Maastricht and Lisbon Treaties; see eg Brunner v European Union Treaty [1994] 1 CMLR 57; Judgment of 30 June 2009 (2 BvE 2 / 08, 5 / 08; 2 BvR 1010 / 08, 1022 / 08, 1259 / 08, 182 / 09).

(45) See eg the recent cases challenging the constitutionality of the European Arrest Warrant, discussed in Cruz (n 42).

(46) See Weiler (n 6), 320 (discussing the relevance of the logic of Mutually Assured Destruction).

(47) Article 48(6)–(7) TEU.

(49) See eg Case C-224/01 Kobler v Austria [2003] ECR I-10239.

(51) Articles 275–6 TFEU.

(52) Articles 26, 34–7 TFEU.

(53) Articles 45, 49, and 56 TFEU.

(55) Ibid.

(56) See eg Weiler (n 6), ch 2.

(57) See Section III.2.

(58) Article 6(1) TEU, as amended by the Treaty of Lisbon.

(61) See eg Koen Laenerts and Jose Gutierrez-Fonz, ‘The Constitutional Allocation of Powers and General Principles

(63) See Majone (n 26).

(64) See Craig (n 62).

(65) Having been informally established at the Paris Summit of 1974, it was not accorded Treaty recognition until the Single European Act of 1987.

(67) Alec Stone Sweet, ‘The European Court of Justice’ in Craig and de Búrca (n 62), 132.

(69) See eg Martin Shapiro, ‘The European Court of Justice’ in Craig and de Búrca (n 62), 321.

(70) See Stone Sweet (n 38).

(71) See eg Shapiro (n 69), 321–2.

(72) See eg Weiler (n 6), ch 5.

(73) See eg Stone Sweet (n 67); Fritz Scharpf, ‘Legitimacy in the Multilevel European Polity’ in Dobner and Loughlin (n 24).

(75) Ibid 22.

(80) See eg Andreas Follesdal and Simon Hix, ‘Why There is a Democratic Deficit in the EU: A Response to Majone and Moravcsik’ (2006) 44 Journal of Common Market Studies 533; Simon Hix, What’s Wrong with the European Union and How to Fix it (2008).

(81) See eg Weiler (n 6), ch 7.

(82) Renaud Dehousse and Joseph Weiler, ‘The Legal Dimension’ in William Wallace (ed), The Dynamics of European Integration (1990), 243.

(83) See eg Weiler (n 6), ch 2.

(86) Tellingly, each of these measures was central to the original post-Nice ‘leftovers’ agenda which triggered the Laeken Summit and the Convention on the Future of Europe, see Walker (n 7).

(87) Weiler (n 11).

(89) Scharpf (n 73).

(91) See now Arts 20–5 TFEU.

(92) See eg Weiler (n 6), ch 10.

(93) The sovereign debt crisis of 2011, and the failures of supranational policymaking in the context of the economic problems of Greece, Portugal, and Ireland, is but the latest such symptom.

Neil Walker

Neil Walker is Regius Professor of Public Law and the Law of Nature and Nations, University of Edinburgh
The Constitutionalization of Public International Law

Erika De Wet
The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Constitutional Law
Edited by Michel Rosenfeld and András Sajó

Print Publication Date: May 2012
Online Publication Date: Nov 2012
Subject: Law, Comparative Law, Constitutional and Administrative Law, International Law
DOI: 10.1093/oxfordhb/9780199578610.013.0060

Abstract and Keywords

This article discusses the constitutionalization of international law, which can be summarized as an attempt to exercise legal control over politics within the international legal order itself, in order to compensate for the erosion of such control within domestic constitutional orders. In doing so, it attempts to translate to the international plane concepts that were traditionally reserved for domestic constitutions. Critics regard attempts to use concepts of domestic constitutionalism as a mechanism for controlling the international exercise of public power as over-ambitious. This argument is also fuelled by the lack of conceptual clarity in the debate pertaining to international constitutionalism and the controversies pertaining to the legitimacy of the value-laden hierarchy of norms in international law.

Keywords: constitutionalization, international law, international constitutional order, domestic constitution

I. Mapping the Territory 1209

II. The Emergence of a Hierarchy of Norms within International Law 1213
   1. Jus Cogens Obligations 1214
   2. Erga Omnes Obligations 1215
   3. Obligations Under (Article 103 of) the UN Charter 1218

III. Partial Constitutionalization of the International Legal Order 1219
   1. The Constitutionalization of International Organizations 1219
   2. Constitutionalization through Transgovernmental Networks 1222
   3. Constitutionalization of the International Legal Order as a Whole 1224
      (a) The Special Status of the UN Charter 1224
      (b) Decentralized Enforcement of the International Constitutional Order 1227

IV. Conclusion 1229

I. Mapping the Territory

In the well-known Kadi decision of 2008, the European Court of Justice (ECJ) was confronted with the legality of the absence of due process for individuals residing in European Union member states whose assets were frozen, due to their being blacklisted by the UN Security (p. 1210) Council (UNSC) as ‘international terrorists’. The dispute was rooted in UNSC Resolutions 1267 of 15 October 1999, 1333 of 19 December 2000, and the measures subsequently adopted within the EU in order to implement those resolutions uniformly in all member states.
The UNSC adopted these resolutions, which were binding on UN member states under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, following the attacks on the American embassies in Kenya and Tanzania and the suspected involvement of Osama bin Laden with those acts. These resolutions, geared towards pressuring the (then) de facto Taliban regime in Afghanistan into extraditing Osama bin Laden to the United States, authorized the Al-Qaeda and Taliban Sanctions Committee—a sub-organ of the UNSC—to identify and blacklist individuals and entities associated with the Taliban, Osama bin Laden, and Al-Qaeda. The assets of blacklisted individuals and entities were to be frozen by the state of residence of those individuals and entities until such time as the Al-Qaeda and Taliban Sanctions Committee might remove them from the list. This de-listing procedure was political in nature and the UNSC resolutions did not provide for an independent judicial procedure for reviewing the listing of the affected individuals.

The EU implemented Resolution 1267 (1999) and subsequent resolutions through Common Positions and Council Regulations in order to ensure uniform application in all member states. The respective Council Regulations had direct effect in member states and the issue of the right to a fair trial was bound to arise before courts within the EU. After all, it is a right guaranteed by the constitutional orders of EU member states and the EU legal order itself. In addition, this right is guaranteed by international human rights treaties to which all the EU member states are a party, notably Article 6(1) of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms of 1950 (ECHR).

A right guaranteed within the domestic, regional, and international legal orders of the member states was now seemingly suspended in the interest of international peace and security by a UNSC resolution. This development exemplified the intensification of the shift of public decision-making away from the nation-state, towards international actors such as international organizations. It further highlighted the increasing direct relevance of decision-making by such organizations for individuals, as opposed to them merely affecting interstate relations. It illustrated the progression of international law from a law of coordination between states to a law of close cooperation in some areas and which reaches far into the realm of traditionally domestic concerns. This progressive development of international law, both in terms of the subject matters it covers and its increased normative density, has been described as a process of constitutionalization.

For most authors in the field of public international law, however, the notion of constitutionalization entails more than an increased process of legalization of the international legal order. It also concerns the need to place legal restrictions on the exercise of public power on the international level, refers to concrete manifestations of such limitations, or a combination of both. A case such as Kadi is illustrative on this point: it exposes the difficulty experienced by domestic legal orders to provide meaningful legal protection to individuals in situations where international obligations have eroded such protection. The case also serves as a useful illustration of the eroding impact of the continuous shift of public decision-making away from the nation-state to the international plain on the relevance of the two doctrines that traditionally explained the relationship between domestic (constitutional) law and international law: namely dualism and monism.

According to the dualist doctrine, international law and domestic law are viewed as separate, self-contained (autonomous) legal systems that govern different types of subjects and legal relations. Whereas international law regulates the conduct of states and interstate relations, domestic law regulates the relations between state organs and individuals, as well as between individuals themselves. Rules that are not created within the domestic system may nevertheless enter the system through its rules of reference. The rules and references of the domestic system, frequently found in the Constitution, determine the status of international law in the domestic legal order. For example, the Constitution may determine that international law ranks below the Constitution but above ordinary legislation, or that international law is on a par with ordinary legislation. The classic dualist perspective does not accept the argument in public international law according to which international law necessarily takes precedence over all domestic law, including state constitutions. Similarly, that perspective does not accept that international law can reach individuals directly, without having first been incorporated by means of a statute.

Dualism can be contrasted with monism, according to which international law and domestic law are part of a single legal order. Within this unified legal order international law is supreme and can be invoked before domestic courts without prior incorporation through a statutory instrument. The monist perspective is motivated by the desire to ensure the binding character of international law and to prevent norm conflicts between legal systems. However, in reality, the difference between monist and dualist systems has always been one of degree. Countries with a
The Constitutionalization of Public International Law

dualist tradition to treaties such as Germany and South Africa (to name but two examples) have a monist approach to customary international law. In addition, some dualist constitutions allow for the direct invocation of so-called self-executing treaties before domestic courts, acknowledging that these treaties address individuals in a manner that bestow rights upon them.

For their part, monist states such as the Netherlands and Switzerland rarely apply customary international law directly, and frequently incorporate international treaties through statutes in order to give those instruments effect in the domestic legal system. Monist systems withhold direct effect from treaties if the latter are regarded as too vague to be invoked directly by individuals before courts. Alternately, monist systems tend to be restrictive in determining whether the purpose of the treaty is to bestow rights on individuals. Domestic provisions that conflict with international law are not necessarily declared invalid or inapplicable within monist systems. 16

In essence, throughout the twentieth century most domestic constitutional orders (whether dualist or monist) developed legal tools with which to give effect to international obligations applicable in those orders, while simultaneously protecting principles of fundamental domestic importance against excessive international influence.
In practice, therefore, most systems functioned as a hybrid, incorporating both monist and dualist elements.
However, these mechanisms are progressively eroding in an era where both the quantity of international decisions that directly affect individuals and the intensity with which such decisions affect the relationship between individuals vis-à-vis the state (and other individuals) are increasing.

Once again, the Kadi case is illuminating. The Court of First Instance of the European Communities (CFI) initially determined that the UNSC obligations would prevail over all other conflicting obligations including those of a human rights nature. 17 Subsequently on appeal, the ECJ overruled the CFI decision and gave preference to the protection of the right to a fair trial as a fundamental right under EU law. 18 The ECJ decision was based exclusively on EU law and did not address the norm conflict between EU law (and domestic constitutional law) and UNSC resolutions. Although the ECJ decision had the appearance of a dualist approach intended to protect the EU legal order as an autonomous legal order, it remains to be seen whether it will have lasting effect. Some EU member states, for example the United Kingdom, are effectively circumventing the impact of the decision by adopting domestic legislation that gives de facto preference to the UNSC resolutions. 19

Against this background the constitutionalization of international law could be summarized as an attempt to exercise legal control over politics within the international legal order itself, in order to compensate for the erosion of such control within domestic constitutional orders. 20 In doing so, it attempts to translate to the international plane concepts that were traditionally reserved for domestic constitutions. 21 Prominent domestic elements featuring in the debate concerning the constitutionalization of public international law include a hierarchy of norms, enforceable individual rights, and judicial review. The (limited) presence of these concepts in the international legal order plays a central role in the debate as to whether the constitutionalization process in the international legal order has thus far been limited to partial constitutionalization (either within particular international organizations or in the form of transgovernmental networks), or whether one can indeed speak of the constitutionalization of the international order as a whole.

II. The Emergence of a Hierarchy of Norms within International Law

On the domestic plain the term 'constitutionalism' usually implies a hierarchical relationship with the remaining elements of the respective domestic legal order. 22 Although international law was traditionally characterized by the absence of a hierarchy between the different sources or types of international obligations, certain hierarchical elements have been developing within international law itself since the second half of the twentieth century. The most important manifestations thereof are the concepts of jus cogens, the (sometimes overlapping) concept of erga omnes and the supremacy clause contained in Article 103 of the UN Charter. 23

(p. 1214) 1. Jus Cogens Obligations

The concept of jus cogens (peremptory norms of international law) was formally introduced in positive international law through Article 53 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of 1969 (VCLT). 24 This article determines that:
a treaty is void if, at the time of its conclusion, it conflicts with a peremptory norm of general international law. For the purposes of the present Convention, a peremptory norm of general international law is a norm accepted and recognized by the international community of States as a whole as a norm from which no derogation is permitted and which can be modified only by a subsequent norm of general international law having the same character.

The question whether a particular norm has reached peremptory status depends on whether it is accepted as such by a majority of states. States constitute the main subjects of the international legal order and, together with other entities that have international legal personality (notably international organizations), the international community. That a norm has been accepted as peremptory can be reflected inter alia in diplomatic correspondence of states, statements of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, resolutions of international organizations, and judicial decisions of international and domestic courts applying international law.

Within the international legal order, states were traditionally only bound to those obligations to which they had consented, for example by ratifying a treaty or joining an international organization and thereby accepting to be bound by its decisions. Similarly, states can be so-called persistent objectors to customary (general) international law, which is formed when a large number of states engage in a consistent practice (state practice) under the belief that they are legally bound to do so (opinio juris necessitates). In principle, all states are bound by norms that have acquired customary international law status and it is possible that a norm that is codified in a treaty has also acquired customary status under international law. In such an instance, states that have not ratified the treaty will nonetheless be bound by those norms in that treaty that also qualify as customary international law. However, there is a caveat to the extent that those states that persistently object to a particular customary norm will not be bound by that norm.

However, the persistent-objector rule does not apply to jus cogens norms. The latter constitute an exception to the consensual character of international law. The nature (substance) of the norm in question is of such importance that it justifies an exception to the notion that states cannot be bound to obligations under international law to which they have not consented. The VCLT does not give any indication of norms that would qualify as such, and the number of generally accepted jus cogens norms that have developed through state practice remains limited. According to the UN International Law Commission (ILC), an authoritative body created by the UN General Assembly (UNGA) for the promotion of the progressive development of international law and its codification, peremptory norms include the prohibition of aggression, slavery, slave trade, genocide, racial discrimination, apartheid, and torture as well as basic rules of the law of armed conflict and the right to self-determination.

Although the concept of jus cogens was initially designed to invalidate interstate treaties that violated peremptory norms of international law, current legal doctrine tends to accept that the concept also applies to customary international law and decisions of international organizations. As a result, any other international norm conflicting with a jus cogens norm would be ipso facto invalid. For example, in the unlikely event that the UNSC, acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, authorized states to engage in torture practices when interrogating suspected terrorists, such an authorization would be invalid and is not to be enforced or relied on by states. However, as the analysis in subsequent paragraphs illustrates, the main challenge in relation to jus cogens obligations remains their enforcement by states. In a decentralized international legal order, which does not (yet) possess a centralized international judiciary with mandatory jurisdiction over states, this remains an ongoing challenge.

2. Erga Omnes Obligations

The concept of erga omnes obligations gained recognition through the jurisprudence of the International Court of Justice (ICJ), when it distinguished between the obligations of a state towards the international community as a whole, and those borne towards other (individual) states. In the Barcelona Traction case, the ICJ determined that the former obligations are the concern of all states. All states can be held to have a legal interest in the protection of such rights in view of the importance of the rights involved: they are obligations erga omnes. This concept of community-oriented obligations further finds recognition in the law of state responsibility, which has created a system of responsibility for serious violations of international obligations towards the international community as a whole. The principles of the system are contained in the ILC’s Articles on State Responsibility of 2001. Though not formally binding, those Articles constitute the most authoritative source on state responsibility.
at this time.

The Articles on State Responsibility draw a distinction between breaches of bilateral obligations and obligations of a collective interest nature. Breaches of a bilateral nature involve situations where the performance of an obligation involves two individual states, even though the treaty framework or customary rule in question establishes obligations applicable to all states (parties). In such an instance the nature of the obligations stemming from the multilateral treaty or customary rule can be described as ‘bundles of bilateral obligations’. An example in point would be Article 22 of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, where the obligation to protect the premises of a diplomatic mission is owed by the individual receiving state to the individual sending state. The fact that many states are party to this treaty does not alter the fact that in relation to any particular situation resulting from the Convention, the obligations owed only concern two particular states.

Breaches of a collective interest nature concern obligations that have been established for the protection of the collective interest of a group of states (erga omnes partes) by means of a treaty, or indeed of the international community as a whole (erga omnes). Concrete examples of erga omnes (partes) obligations can be found in particular in human rights law and international criminal law treaties. Obligations stemming from regional or universal human rights treaties would first of all have erga omnes partes effect towards other states party to the treaty. In addition, they will have erga omnes proper effect (towards the international community as a whole), to the extent that the obligations in the treaty have been recognized as customary international law and are therefore binding on all states.

The same would apply to those obligations articulated in the Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC) and which grant the ICC jurisdiction over the most serious crimes of concern to the ‘international community as a whole’, namely genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes. Whilst treaty obligations aimed at environmental protection would also be strong contenders for erga omnes (partes) status, it remains controversial whether obligations pertaining to trade liberalization constitute ‘bundles of bilateral obligations’ rather than obligations.

Some authors regard free trade to be a pre-condition for the realization of human rights, and in that sense consider it inherently connected to erga omnes obligations. This point is taken up again below in relation to the constitutionalization of the World Trade Organization (WTO) as a manifestation of a sectoral constitution within international law.

As far as the relationship between the jus cogens and erga omnes obligations is concerned, the Barcelona Traction decision of the ICJ provides authority for the conclusion that jus cogens norms would have erga omnes effect. Without expressly referring to jus cogens, the ICJ implied as much by the types of norms it mentioned as examples of erga omnes norms. These norms included the outlawing of the unilateral use of force, and the prohibition of genocide, slavery, and racial discrimination. Given the fact that these same obligations are widely regarded in doctrine as being of a peremptory nature, one can conclude that fundamental obligations from which no derogation is permitted will normally be applicable to all members of the international community.

However, although it is accurate to assume that all jus cogens norms are simultaneously of an erga omnes character, it would not be accurate to assume that the opposite necessarily applies as well: namely that erga omnes norms would constitute peremptory norms of international law. To begin with, not all norms with a collective interest have acquired customary international law (and thus erga omnes proper) status. In order to acquire peremptory status, an erga omnes norm first has to be accepted by a large number of states as belonging to the body of customary international law. Additionally, the majority of states have to regard that norm as being a customary norm of a very special nature, namely one from which no derogation is possible. This double threshold is both high and difficult to cross, which explains the small number of generally recognized peremptory norms to date.

This in turn raises the question regarding the added value of those erga omnes norms that do not qualify as peremptory norms of international law. First, there is uncertainty surrounding the scope of this layer of obligations. Secondly, the interstate mechanisms designed to enforce erga omnes obligations in the Articles on State Responsibility are modest. According to Article 48, states other than injured states are entitled to invoke responsibility where the obligation breached is owed to the international community as a whole. When invoking responsibility in this fashion, the invoking state may claim cessation of the internationally wrongful act as well as performance of the obligation or reparation in the interest of the beneficiaries from the responsible state.
The Constitutionalization of Public International Law

For the time being, there are no other generally accepted mechanisms for the enforcement of erga omnes obligations. In this context it is worth keeping in mind that the jurisdiction of the ICJ is limited to those states that have voluntarily accepted that jurisdiction. This is either done through compromissory clauses in treaties that recognize the ICJ's jurisdiction for disputes pertaining to the treaty in question, or through a unilateral declaration by a state that recognizes the ICJ's jurisdiction in relation to all disputes arising between itself and other states which similarly accepted the ICJ's jurisdiction. However the ICJ has declined to recognize the existence of an actio popularis that would allow any state(s) as member(s) of the international community to initiate proceedings for vindicating the violation of community interests.

In its controversial South West Africa decision of 1966, the ICJ inter alia motivated its position with the argument that the ICJ statute did not explicitly provide for such an actio popularis. Furthermore, the ICJ gave a very restricted interpretation of the notion of 'legal interest'. Although the inclusion of Article 48 in the Articles on State Responsibility does not provide a solution for the fact that the ICJ statute fails to provide for an actio popularis, it may in future encourage the ICJ to adopt a broader notion of 'legal interest' in instances where the violation of an erga omnes obligation is disputed between two or more states that have accepted the ICJ's jurisdiction in accordance with Article 36(1) or (2) of its statute. All in all, however, the opportunity for the ICJ to enforce erga omnes obligations remains limited and this is unlikely to change in the near future.

3. Obligations Under (Article 103 of) the UN Charter

The third manifestation of hierarchy in international law concerns Article 103 of the UN Charter, which determines that UN Charter obligations prevail over other obligations that member states may have under any other international agreement. This supremacy of obligations not only extends to the articles of the UN Charter itself, it also applies to binding decisions of the UNSC, which this organ can take in the interest of international peace and security under Chapter VII of the UN Charter. It is by now well-established practice that such UN Charter obligations may also prevail over inconsistent customary international law.

It is further generally accepted that the UN, as a subject of international law (and by extension also its organs), is bound by jus cogens norms. Therefore, in the perhaps unlikely event of a conflict occurring between a binding UNSC obligation and a jus cogens norm, the latter would prevail. However, the relationship between UN Charter obligations (in particular UNSC obligations) and those erga omnes obligations that do not constitute peremptory norms of international law are highly controversial. In the Kadi case the CFI took the controversial position that jus cogens obligations would constitute the only constraint to the UNSC. UNSC obligations would prevail over all other conflicting obligations and could limit human rights obligations extensively. While the ECJ avoided dealing with this point on appeal (and decided the matter exclusively on the basis of EU law) this remains hotly disputed in legal doctrine. Those disagreeing with the position of the CFI underscore the fact that, in accordance with Article 24(2) of the UN Charter, the UNSC shall act in accordance with the purposes and principles of the UN Charter; this includes in particular the promotion of human rights in Article 1(3). However, the absence of a detailed ‘Bill of Rights’ in the UN Charter has led others to claim that the reference to human rights in Article 1(3) is too vague to be of any help.

In essence, therefore, the three layers of hierarchy which are currently identifiable within international law raise questions pertaining to the scope and the (lack of) enforcement of such norms, the relationship between the different layers, as well as how such norms relate to other norms of international law. These questions have significantly influenced the debate on the extent of the constitutionalization of public international law.

III. Partial Constitutionalization of the International Legal Order

1. The Constitutionalization of International Organizations

The constitutionalization of international organizations concerns attempts to limit or control the exercise of public power by such organizations. Within this context, such organizations are regarded as autonomous units that function within a particular legal framework on the basis of a particular mandate. A constitutional approach to international organizations thus implies that the constitutive treaties of organizations such as the WTO, the World Health Organization, or the UN are regarded as a veritable Constitution. That Constitution defines the outer limits within which the organization, as a subject of international law, may exercise those powers conferred on it by states. Stated differently, the constitution of an international organization embodies the legal framework within which an autonomous community made up by states realizes the goals as articulated in the constitutive treaty such as trade liberalization or the maintenance of international peace and security.

The rhetoric of constitutionalization in relation to international organizations is particularly strong where the legal norms embodied in the constitutive document can be enforced by judicial review, that is, the reviewing of the legality of actions of the member states or the executive or legislative organs of the organization (or any combination of these) by an independent judicial body. As mentioned, the ICJ has no centralized jurisdiction and only exercises jurisdiction to the extent that states have voluntarily accepted its authority. Yet, some organizations have adopted judicial or quasi-judicial mechanisms that provide for centralized judicial review in relation to the particular area of law that falls within the mandate designed by the organization's constitutive document. The most prominent example in this regard concerns the centralized dispute settlement system within the WTO, which consists of quasi-judicial panels and an Appellate Body.

Although this dispute resolution mechanism plays a significant role in clarifying the boundaries of the economic freedoms provided to member states by the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), the impact of the mechanism within the domestic jurisdictions of member states is reduced by the refusal of most of those member states to grant the GATT rules (or the decisions of the dispute settlement bodies) direct effect within the domestic legal order. Supporters of direct effect point out that by enabling individuals to rely directly on subjective rights that are distilled from the GATT rules before domestic courts, one would further strengthen the judicial control over executive decision-making. This in turn would strengthen the constitutional impact of the WTO's Appellate Body as the apex of a centralized dispute settlement system. It would succeed in safeguarding the autonomy of the individual against the executive—which is one of the core elements of traditional (domestic) constitutionalism. Thus far member states have been reluctant to accept such an extensive ‘constitutionalization through judicialization’ of GATT norms.

This reluctance of states also reveals the sustained influence these entities have on the actions of the organs of an international organization, despite the fact that organizations such as the WTO constitute separate legal entities (subjects) under international law. The objectives of the (powerful) member states cannot be completely separated from the actions of the organization. Organs within the organization, including dispute settlement bodies, would not be allowed to stray too far from the will of the member states. The controlling impact of judicial review exercised within international organizations would therefore only be effective to the extent that this review is accepted by the member states. Stated differently, the efficacy of the constitutionalization of the organization through the introduction of judicial review would, in the final instance, depend on the cooperation of precisely those subjects that the review process is supposed to control.

However, even though judicial review would not be a panacea for ensuring that member states and/or organs of international organizations act within the limits of the respective competencies of such member states and/or organs, the absence of judicial review would significantly reduce such control. The most poignant example remains the UN, where the ability of the ICJ to review the legality of UNSC decisions remains extremely limited and controversial. The limited power of the ICJ in exercising judicial review does not only apply vis-à-vis states, but also towards the actions of the other principal organs of the UN itself (the ICJ being its principal judicial organ).

The only explicit textual link in the UN Charter to judicial review of the other principle organs of the UN is contained in Article 96(1). It provides the UNGA and the UNSC with the power to request an advisory opinion from the ICJ on any legal question. This clause is phrased in wide language and would arguably also permit the UNGA to request the ICJ for an advisory opinion on the legality of binding UNSC resolutions, where the latter is unwilling to submit such a request itself. Even though advisory opinions are not legally binding, the opinions do carry significant weight within the membership of the UN as instruments that clarify the law as presented by the UN Charter. In the wake of such an opinion, the UNSC might therefore be persuaded to withdraw or amend certain binding decisions. In practice, however, the UNGA has not attempted to request an advisory opinion for this purpose thus far. This relates inter alia to the fact that such a request needs to be supported by a two-thirds majority within the UNGA, which is a high threshold. The only advisory opinion to date that resulted in review of the legality of a UNSC resolution resulted from the latter's own (and thus far only) request for an advisory opinion, which concerned South Africa's illegal occupation of (what is now known as) Namibia.
Member states of the UN cannot individually request advisory opinions from the ICJ. Article 96(1) limits this competence to organs of the organization, namely the UNSC and the UNGA. However, the issue of judicial review of UNSC resolutions can become incidentally relevant in contentious proceedings between states before the ICJ. This would be the case where a particular UNSC resolution directly affects a legal dispute between two or more state parties in relation to an issue over which the ICJ indeed does have jurisdiction. Such was the case in the Lockerbie proceedings that concerned the interpretation of the Convention for the Suppression of Unlawful Acts Against the Safety of Civil Aviation of 1971 (the Montreal Convention), which contained a compromissory clause in Article 14. As the UNSC had adopted binding resolutions that went to the heart of the interpretation of this Convention, the ICJ would not have been able to decide the dispute without reviewing these resolutions, including their potential illegality.

It is well known that the UN Charter does not provide the ICJ with any explicit power to exercise judicial review in such an incidental manner. The question that remains unclear is whether such a competence exists implicitly. Since the parties to the Lockerbie proceedings requested the withdrawal of the merits phase of the dispute from the role of the ICJ in September 2003, the matter remains unresolved. Equally disputed is the implicit competence of any other court (whether international, regional, or domestic) to engage in incidental review of the legality of UNSC resolutions. This issue will be taken up again in Section III.3(b) below. Here it suffices to say that the reason why courts such as the ECJ in Kadi were confronted with reviewing the legality of UNSC resolutions—incidental to enforcing the law of the legal system for which they were created—is closely linked to the absence of an extensive judicial review mechanism within the UN itself.

In essence therefore the constitutional features of the UN—insofar as it relates to judicial review—remain very weak. The mechanisms for ensuring that a powerful organ like the UNSC remains within the ‘constitutional boundaries’ provided by the UN Charter are essentially political in nature, and take the form of the (threat of the) veto power that can be exercised by any of the five permanent members during UNSC decision-making. This, in turn, has provoked some authors to question the utility of constitutional language for the purpose of curbing the power of the UN claiming that, in the end, it may prove as powerless as the doctrine of functionality.

2. Constitutionalization through Transgovernmental Networks

A related but nonetheless separate strand of constitutionalization concerns the development of transgovernmental networks. Although the networks also have a functional focus, the structural features of those networks are more fluid than those of international organizations. The networks can consist of various international organizations and disaggregated components of the state, which interact and cooperate in relation to a particular functional (sectoral) area. According to this line of argument, different organizations and state entities concerned with trade liberalization would form a trade network, whereas those involved in human rights protection would constitute a human rights network. Yet others may constitute a security network or an investment network. Such networks generally do not possess international legal personality and therefore cannot incur rights or obligations under international law.

Within a particular network there would be a criss-cross interaction of norms. The interaction would be horizontal in nature (eg between different international organizations with a functional overlap), as well as vertical (eg between international organizations and particular state entities). In addition, there would be a norm hierarchy within the network itself to the extent that a dense layer of international norms relating to the purpose and function of the network would override conflicting domestic regulations. Stated differently, the functional paradigm (or bias) of the network in question would make it increasingly difficult for domestic actors within that network to safeguard domestic legal principles (whether of a domestic constitutional nature or otherwise) from the overriding influence of the international norms.

As transgovernmental networks do not operate in neatly separated areas but often have complementary or competing powers, the question of how to resolve inter-network (one might also say inter-regime) conflicts arise. The Kadi case is a pertinent example of how a regional court was confronted with competing norms originating from different networks or regimes. Whereas the CFI gave preference to the norms resulting from a ‘security network’ with Article 103 of the UN Charter at its apex, the ECJ on appeal gave preference to what could be described as a ‘European human rights network’.
This example already illustrates that, in the absence of a generally accepted hierarchy between the different functional networks, different judicial bodies operating within different functional paradigms may resolve a particular norm conflict in very different ways.\textsuperscript{82} Other examples that illustrate this point would include potential norm conflicts between international trade or investment networks and human rights networks. Thus far there has been a marked reluctance on the part of the Appellate Body as well as WTO officials to assert that the trade obligations of member states had to be interpreted in harmony with the human rights obligations of those member states.\textsuperscript{83} In addition, states have been reluctant to invoke human rights obligations before a WTO body as a justification for not complying with trade obligations. This could be interpreted as acceptance that any human rights obligations of member states have a very limited place in determining the scope of the member states’ trade obligations within the WTO.\textsuperscript{84} Similarly, it remains disputed if and to what extent investment arbitration panels concerned with disputes between an investor and a host state should take into account the human rights of the investors and/or third parties affected by the dispute.\textsuperscript{85} An international human rights body, on the other hand, might be prone to give preference to human rights obligations when faced with similar disputes, given that it is embedded in a different functional paradigm.

Such conflicting results would enhance the fragmentation of international law, as it entrenches the notion of interwoven but yet separate networks of legal regimes.\textsuperscript{86} This seems to run counter to the approach suggested by the Study Group of the ILC on the Fragmentation of International Law, which regarded international law as a unified system within which potentially conflicting norms should be resolved through interpretation and accommodation.\textsuperscript{87} In addition, it would entrench the possibility that individual human rights protection could be abolished within functional transgovernmental networks pertaining to, for example, international security or trade liberalization. This, in turn, would run counter to the aims of those who see the constitutionalization of internal law as a means for limiting the exercise of public power on the international level, notably in order to protect the rights of individuals.

(p. 1224) This type of fragmentation could be countered only if one were to accept that the different functional networks were embedded into a larger constitutional whole, which contains hierarchically superior norms that underpin the international order in its entirety and which serve as guidelines for interpretation in instances of inter-regime conflicts.\textsuperscript{88} Authors who support this line of argument tend to attribute a unifying role to \textit{jus cogens} and \textit{erga omnes} obligations within a constitutional matrix that applies to the international legal order as a whole. It is to these perspectives that the analysis will now turn.

3. Constitutionalization of the International Legal Order as a Whole

(a) The Special Status of the UN Charter

Those authors who describe current developments in international law as a manifestation of the constitutionalization of the international legal order as a whole all in some way or another link their arguments to the UN Charter. Whereas some see the UN Charter as ‘the international constitution’, others regard it more as a building block or connecting factor within an international constitutional order that demarcates the outer limits for the exercise of public power.\textsuperscript{89}

Those who regard the UN Charter as the Constitution of the international legal order, refer to the nature of the UN Charter as a ‘world-order treaty’. The UN has universal membership and promotes the goals of safeguarding international peace and security, as well as human rights in the interest of the international community as a whole. In addition, the UN provides for a binding system for enforcement through Chapter VII of the UN Charter in combination with the supremacy clause contained in Article 103 of the UN Charter.\textsuperscript{90} One very idealistic vision of the UN Charter describes it as a (potential) mechanism through which member states and the citizens thereof can be perceived as the constituent parts of world society.\textsuperscript{91} Skeptics do not hesitate to point out that the lack of a proper separation of powers within the UN, the lack of direct effect of UNSC decisions in the domestic order, as well as the absence of a full-fledged human rights catalog and a centralized judiciary within the UN severely weaken the impact of the UN Charter as a constitutional blueprint for the behavior of member states.\textsuperscript{92}

However, for those who see the UN as a connecting factor within a larger constitutional whole—rather than deeming its Charter as the international Constitution itself—these deficits do not necessarily defy the existence of an international constitutional order. From their perspective the UN serves the dual role of a functional regime (‘network’) for international peace and security and key connecting factor, as its universal membership links the different states into the international community. Although the international community would also (p. 1225) include other subjects of international law such as international organizations with separate legal personality, states still form the primary subjects of international law. Therefore, through its linking function, the UN has an important impact on the composition of the international community.

Moreover, the UN Charter serves as a catalyst for the emerging human rights hierarchy in the form of jus cogens and erga omnes obligations as outlined above in Section II.1(b). It therefore serves as a catalyst for the evolution of an international value system, which is to be understood as those norms of positive law with a strong ethical underpinning and which have acquired a special hierarchical status through state practice. Due to the inspirational role of in particular Article 1(3) of the UN Charter in combination with Articles 55, 56, 62, and 68, human rights norms were promoted in such a fashion as to be elevated to the core elements of the international value system. These articles significantly contributed to a climate in which an elaborate system for human rights protection was created both within the UN Charter system and within regional and/or (other) functional regimes. In turn, these mechanisms of protection coupled with the concretization of the norms derived from such mechanisms significantly contributed to the recognition of the erga omnes (partes) character and in some instances even peremptory status of human rights norms such as the prohibition of torture and genocide.

In this manner the normative framework of the UN Charter has been instrumental in bringing about a verticalization in the relations of member states inter se. It has been the catalyst for the development of an international legal order based on hierarchically superior values, as opposed to one exclusively based on the ‘equilibrium or value of sovereigns’. It inspired the development of a human rights regime that can inform decision-making within functional regimes or networks by serving as guidelines or principles of interpretation.

In accordance with this line of argument, decision-making within a particular network would have to give due consideration to international human rights standards in cases where such standards conflict with other international obligations. Judicial or quasi-judicial bodies such as international arbitration panels, the WTO Appellate Body or executive bodies such as the UNSC should pay deference to international human rights standards relevant to the dispute or situation at hand and motivate explicitly in instances where such standards are limited (p. 1226) or not followed. In this manner the human-rights-based value system common to all regimes connects these different regimes into a larger international community and shapes the outer limits for the exercise of public power.

This vision of a human-rights-based international value system that serves as a connecting factor within the international constitutional order has been criticized (amongst other things) for lack of legitimacy. In the current context, legitimacy should be understood as the extent to which the international value system is accepted as being representative of the values of those who are affected by it. For many authors such legitimacy is closely connected to the process by means of which the respective value system came into being and, in particular, the democratic quality of that process. Critics regard the value system developing under the influence of international institutions including international courts and tribunals as an unrepresentative, superimposed normative system that takes place beyond any form of democratic control or accountability.

These arguments have in turn been criticized for mythologizing national democratic governance as a model for international governance and assuming that there is one specific national model of democratic governance that can set threshold conditions for the legitimacy of international governance. In addition, one can question whether democratic governance is the only form of legitimate decision-making and whether legitimacy could instead also be achieved through the quality (expertise) of the decision-making process, transparency, and accessibility through public participation. These questions become particularly pertinent in a context where the structural differences between the composition of the international community and national communities make it questionable whether democracy could ever have the same meaning internationally as it does domestically.

In this context, it is noteworthy that there is a formal overlap in content between the international and domestic human rights systems. Most modern constitutions in various parts of the world—and notably those drafted by democratically elected constitutional assemblies—contain human rights standards closely resembling those of international and regional human rights instruments. The fact that this overlap exists despite the democratic deficit on the international level may be an indication that the development of a representative value system within the international legal order is not necessarily excluded by the existence of a democratic deficit. Skeptics would nonetheless insist that the existing overlap between domestic and international value systems is shallow and exclusively formal in nature.\textsuperscript{105} In essence therefore, the legitimacy of the international value systems remains controversial and faces constant (p. 1227) challenges from those who regard it as manifestation of Western (notably European) hegemony.\textsuperscript{106}

(b) Decentralized Enforcement of the International Constitutional Order

The enforcement of the fundamental elements (notably the value system) of the international constitutional order, whether through political or judicial means, remains essentially decentralized in nature.\textsuperscript{107} As indicated above in Section II.2, at this stage of the development of international law there are hardly any centralized mechanisms through which ‘the international community’—whether represented by a single state, a group of states, or non-state actors—can enforce violations of obligations \textit{erga omnes}. The efficacy of the most powerful political organ for the enforcement of \textit{erga omnes} obligations, namely the UNSC, would remain notoriously dependent on the unpredictable presence of the political will of its permanent members.

Judicial enforcement will depend on the extent to which regional, functional and even domestic judicial bodies are incidentally confronted with inter-regime norm conflicts as were at issue in the \textit{Kadi} case. In addition, the domestic judicial bodies will have to reflect a willingness to attribute the implicit competence to enforce the international value system on behalf of the international community to themselves. At this point in time the practice of such courts and tribunals is too limited to determine whether they have asserted a secondary role as enforcers of the fundamental values of the international constitutional order in addition to their primary function of enforcing the law of a particular domestic, regional, or functional regime.\textsuperscript{108}

The only functional regime that has, in the course of time, frequently reviewed other treaty obligations against human rights obligations has been the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR).\textsuperscript{109} The range of cases in which the ECtHR has reviewed the application of public international law obligations against the obligations in the ECHR\textsuperscript{110} range from absolute rights that may not be restricted or derogated from, even in times of war or public emergency, for example the prohibitions on torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, and punishment;\textsuperscript{111} to rights that may be restricted for narrow purposes such as in times of emergency, for example the right to a fair trial;\textsuperscript{112} and rights that may be restricted for broad purposes, such as (p. 1228) public safety, the protection of public order, the prevention of crime, and the protection of the rights and freedoms of others, for example the right to privacy and family life: the right to vote, and the right to property.\textsuperscript{113}

Although the ECtHR has on occasion given preference to the obligations under the ECHR above other conflicting treaty obligations, it first attempts to reconcile the different international obligations at stake.\textsuperscript{114} Also, the ECtHR has shown itself reticent to engage in incidental review of UNSC resolutions. This was notably the case in the \textit{Behrami} and \textit{Saramati} decisions, where the ECtHR declared a case that could have resulted in a potential conflict between the right to life in Articles 2(1) and 5(1) of the ECHR and obligations resulting from UNSC Resolution 1244 (1999) inadmissible.\textsuperscript{115} Given the extraterritorial nature of these cases it is uncertain whether they can serve as precedents for conflicts between UNSC obligations and human rights obligations, which concern events that occurred within the territory of a member state.\textsuperscript{116}

A main challenge confronting an international constitutional order that has to rely on decentralized judicial bodies for the enforcement of its core values is that of divergent results. Such divergence is a real risk where the different judicial bodies are confronted with similar norm conflicts involving core values of the international community and other international obligations implies. The different paradigms (institutional biases) between human rights courts on one hand and other functional tribunals or domestic courts on the other may enhance the divergences. Whereas one may expect that a human rights court which was set up to enforce a particular set of human rights obligations would accord a higher status to human rights obligations vis-à-vis other international obligations, the same could not necessarily be expected of (other) functional judicial bodies or national courts that operate within a different paradigm.\textsuperscript{117}

Moreover, even in situations where a regional court (other than a regional human rights court) or domestic court gives preference to human rights norms, this would not necessarily be motivated by respect for or deference to the international value system. This is illustrated by the decision of the ECJ in the \textit{Kadi} case, which focused exclusively on (certain aspects of) the EU value system in coming to its decision to grant extensive judicial protection. By refusing to examine if and to what extent this value system overlapped with an international value system and how the latter relates to UNSC resolutions, the ECJ enhanced the perception that an inter-regime normative conflict between the European legal regime and UN security regime indeed existed; a conflict which could only be resolved by protecting either one of the regimes. Stated differently, the Court seemed to have assumed that an international value system applicable to and connecting both the EU and the UN could not be, as a result of which fragmentation would be an unavoidable reality.118

(p. 1229) However, it is possible to take a more positive outlook on these challenges, by arguing that divergent decisions of this kind may be a mere transient phenomenon. Due to the increased dialogue in recent years between domestic, regional, and international courts, decisions on inter-regime conflicts in one judicial body are likely to inform and sharpen the debate regarding similar conflicts in other judicial and also political bodies.119 The fact that decisions stemming from one regime are not legally binding outside the regime in question (or perhaps even only binding on the parties to the dispute), does not necessarily prevent such decisions from influencing decisions taken within other regimes. Judicial organs are often keen to take note of developments in other jurisdictions, regardless of whether this stems from a concrete legal obligation. As this dialogue is likely to intensify in an era where infringements of human rights increasingly originate from within international organizations, it may in time result in more underlying consensus between the different actors, fewer differences in interpretation, and better acknowledgment of an international value system with human rights protection at its core. Seen from this perspective the current diffuse and potentially fragmentary practice would be of a passing nature and international and domestic courts and tribunals may, in practice, function increasingly as an integrated system.120

IV. Conclusion

In the final analysis it is fair to say that the constitutionalization of international law is an incremental process that is occurring in practice in the absence of a formal act of constitution-making.121 Traditional characteristics of domestic constitutionalism such a normative hierarchy, enforceable individual rights, and judicial review tend to be well developed or developing only within certain functional areas of international law or international organizations, rather than the international legal order as a whole. In particular, the decentralized character of international law poses a challenge for the effective enforcement of even the most fundamental norms of the international constitutional order.122

As a result, critics regard attempts to use concepts of domestic constitutionalism as a mechanism for controlling the international exercise of public power as over-ambitious. This argument is also fuelled by the lack of conceptual clarity in the debate pertaining to international constitutionalism and the controversies pertaining to the legitimacy of the value-laden hierarchy of norms in international law. However, supporters of the constitutional paradigm would point out that an imperfect international constitutional order backed by selective and decentralized judicial review would constitute progress and not a problem.123 It contributes significantly to highlighting the limited ability of the international legal order, at its current stage of development, to control the exercise of public power in a globalized environment. In addition, it encourages and facilitates mechanisms for overcoming such deficits, even if only in an incremental fashion.

Bibliography

Bibliography

Jürgen Habermas, ‘Hat die Konstitutionalisierung des Völkerrechts noch eine Chance?’ in Jürgen Habermas, Der Gespaltene Westen (2004)
Notes:

(*) This chapter forms part of a project financed by the Netherlands Organization for Scientific Research (NWO): ‘The emerging international constitutional order: the implications of hierarchy in international law for the coherence and legitimacy of international decision-making’.

(2) SC Res 1267 (15 October 1999) UN Doc S/RES/1267.

(5) Charter of the United Nations (adopted 26 June 1945, entered into force 24 October 1945) 1 UNTS XVI.

(13) eg Treatment of Polish Nationals and Other Persons of Polish Origin in the Danzig Territory (Advisory Opinion) PCIJ Rep Ser A/B No 44.

(14) Gaja (n 11), 54.

(15) Hans Kelsen, ‘Les rapports de système entre le droit interne et le droit international public’ (1926) 14 Recueil de Cours 227, 273; Gaja (n 11), 53, 62; Andreas L. Paulus, ‘The Emergence of the International Community and the Divide Between International and Domestic Law’ in Nijman and Nollkaemper (n 10), 216, 228.

(16) Paulus (n 15), 228–9; further, see extensively the various country studies in Hellen Keller and Alec Stone Sweet, A Europe of Rights: the Impact of the ECHR on National Legal Systems (2007).

(18) Kadi ECJ case (n 17).

(19) See eg the UK Terrorist Asset-Freezing (Temporary Provisions) Act 2010, ch 2, available at (http://www.opsi.gov.uk/acts/acts2010/ukpga_20100002_en_1); for a discussion, see also de Wet forthcoming (n 7), s C1.

(21) The debate pertaining to European constitutionalization has illustrated the utility of the transposition of abstract notions of constitutionalism, for the purpose of acquiring control over decision-making taking place beyond national borders, see J.H.H. Weiler and Marlene Wind, ‘Introduction: European Constitutionalism Beyond the State’ in J.H.H.
Weiler and Marlene Wind (eds), European Constitutionalism Beyond the State (2003), 1, 3; Miguel Poiares Maduro, ‘Europe and the Constitution: What if this is as Good as it Gets?’ in Weiler and Wind, ibid 74, 82, 85; Neil Walker, ‘Post-national Constitutionalism and the Problem of Translation’ in Weiler and Wind, ibid 27, 34; Hamann and Ruiz Fabri (n 8), 503; Jan Klabbers, ‘Setting the Scene’ in Klabbers, Peters, and Ulfstein (n 20), 1, 21.

(22) Kadelbach and Kleinlein (n 9), 236, 248.

(23) UN Charter (n 5); Kadelbach and Kleinlein (n 9), 238.

(26) As in the case of peremptory norms, the extent to which states accept a norm has having acquired customary status can be reflected by statements in resolutions from international organizations and decisions by courts and tribunals applying international law. An example of a norm that is widely considered to be one of customary international law is the prohibition of the execution of minors/juveniles. For an extensive overview of documents in support of the ‘virtually unanimous international consensus against the execution of persons who were under 18 years of age at the time of their offense’, see the Amicus Curiae brief submitted to the US Supreme Court in light of Roper v Simmons 543 US 551 (2005) by the EU and various other members of the international community, available at (http://www.internationaljusticeproject.org/juvSimmonsEUamicus.pdf). See in particular the UN Human Rights Committee's General Comment No 24, (52) in which it determined that treaty reservations by states to inter alia this norm are contrary to customary international law, UN Doc CCPR/C/21/Rev.1/Add.6 (1994), [8]; See also the affirmation of this norm as customary in Resolution 2000/17 of the UN Sub-Commission on the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights on the Death Penalty in Relation to Juvenile Offenders which was adopted by consensus, UN Doc E/CN.4/Sub.2/RES/2000/17 (2000); the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights upped the ante in 2002 by determining that even the persistent objection to the creation of this customary norm by the US in international fora did not exempt that state from the binding nature of the prohibition as the norm had since become one of jus cogens, see IACHR Domingues v United States (Merits) (Case no 12.285) 22 October 2002, Report no 62/02, [84]–[85].

(27) Tomuschat (n 20), 211; Werner (n 8), 335; Fassbender (n 20), 317.

(35) Crawford (n 34), Arts 42, 48.
(36) Ibid 257.
(37) Ibid 258.
(40) Crawford (n 34), 277.
(45) Barcelona Traction case (n 33).
(47) ILC Report 58th Session (n 29), [421].
(48) Ibid [38]; Dupuy (n 41), 385.
(49) This issue is also linked to the debate on whether state practice and opinio juris are still decisive for determining the formation of customary international law; G. Thalinger, ‘Sense and Sensibility of the Human Rights Obligations of the United Nations Security Council’ (2007) 67 Zeitschrift für Ausländisches Öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht 1015, 1022ff.
(50) See Statute of the International Court of Justice (adopted 26 June 1945, entered into force 24 October 1945) 1 UNTS XVI, Art 36(1).
(51) See ICJ Statute (n 50), Art 36(2).
(52) ICJ Statute (n 50); see Joined Cases Ethiopia v South Africa and Liberia v South Africa (Second Phase, Judgment) [1966] ICJ Rep 6 [88] (South West Africa case); DRC v Rwanda case (n 29), [64], [125]; Sivakumar (n 31), 149.
(53) South West Africa case (n 52), [44]. The ICJ was unwilling to assume that a state may have a legal interest in vindicating a principle of international law, even though it has not suffered material damages—unless this was explicitly provided for in an international text or instrument.

(54) Crawford (n 34), 279; Sivakumaran (n 31), 149.

(55) UN Charter (n 5).

(56) ILC Report 58th Session (n 29), [35].

(57) Ibid [40].

(58) Kadi CFI case (n 17).

(61) Legality of the Threat or Use by a State of Nuclear Weapons (Advisory Opinion) [1996] ICJ Rep 226, [19]; Werner (n 8), 349.

(62) See also Diggelmann and Altwicker (n 8), 627.

(63) Werner (n 8), 349; Klabbers (n 21), 20.

(64) Jan Klabbers, ‘Constitutionalism Lite’ (2004) 1 International Organizations Law Review 31, 33; Kadelbach and Kleinlein (n 9), 240.

(68) A strong proponent of the notion of a right to trade is Petersmann in the contributions cited in n 44; see also Behrens who asserts that international investment law is undergoing a process of constitutionalization as investment treaties increasingly provide private investors with subjective rights that can be enforced before an international arbitration panel, Behrens (n 67), 177.

(69) Behrens (n 67), 153; Peters (n 9), 597; Kadelbach and Kleinlein (n 9), 239; Sol Picciotto ‘Constitutionalizing Multilevel Governance?’ (2008) 6 Journal of International Constitutional Law 457, 458.

(70) Peters (n 9), 594; Klabbers (n 64), 44–5.

(71) See in particular Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory (n 33), [36]ff; for a comprehensive analysis of the powers of the UNGA in terms of Art 96(1) of the UN Charter (n 5) see de Wet (n 59), 42ff.

(72) See de Wet (n 59), 58ff. Similarly, though contentious proceedings are only binding inter partes, such proceedings also have considerable weight with states and the UN itself.

(75) Case Concerning Questions of Interpretation and Application of the 1971 Montreal Convention Arising from the Aerial Incident at Lockerbie (Libyan Arab Jamahiriya v USA) (Preliminary Objections) [1998] ICJ Rep 9, [115]ff (Lockerbie case).

(76) Klabbbers (n 64), 594.

(77) Anne-Marie Slaughter, ‘The Real New World Order’ (1997) 76 Foreign Affairs 183, 186; Picciotto (n 69), 458; Walter (n 10), 173, 194–5, 198.

(78) While public international law is concerned with networks consisting of different components of the state, transnational networks composed of private actors involved in self-regulation also exist. To some extent, this type of regulation and interaction is synonymous with lex mercatoria. See Hamann and Ruiz Fabri (n 8), 486; Knauff (n 65), 472; Andreas Fischer-Lescano and Gunther Teubner, ‘Regime-Collision: The Vain Search for Legal Unity in the Fragmentation of Global Law’ (2004) 25 Michigan Journal of International Law 999, 999ff.

(79) Peters (n 9), 601; Diggelmann and Altwicker (n 8), 635.

(80) Peters (n 9), 591.

(81) For other examples of inter-regime conflict, also in relation to jurisdictional issues, see Ulfstein (n 20), 136ff.

(82) Walter (n 10), 194–5, 198; Fischer-Lescano and Teubner (n 78), 999ff; Anne-Marie Slaughter, A New World Order (2004), 131.

(83) Picciotto (n 69), 473.

(84) Ibid 473.

(86) Peters (n 9), 601; Diggelmann and Altwicker (n 8), 635; Werner (n 8), 350.

(87) ILC Report 58th Session (n 29), [35]ff; Picciotto (n 69), 474.

(89) Tomuschat (n 20), 219.

(91) Jürgen Habermas, ‘Hat die Konstitutionalisierung des Völkerrechts noch eine Chance?’ in Jürgen Habermas, Der Gespaltene Westen (2004), 159.

(92) Kadelbach and Kleinlein suggested that Art 103 of the UN Charter (n 5) would constitute a rule to regulate a conflict of norms, without elevating the UN Charter itself to a constitution, Kadelbach and Kleinlein (n 9), 250.

(93) For a progressive view of the composition of the international community, emphasizing the role of non-governmental organizations and individuals, see Anne Peters, ‘Membership in the Global Constitutional Community’ in Klabbers, Peters, and Ulfstein (n 20), 154ff.

(95) De Wet (n 94), 57; Dupuy (n 32) 133; Bryde (n 9), 97; Sabine von Schorlemer, ‘Konstitutionalisierung der Universellen Völkerrechtsordnung die Menschenrechte’ in Eckart Klein and Christoph Menke (eds), Universalität—Schutzmechanismen—Diskriminierungsverbote: 15 Jahre Wiener Weltmenschrechtskonferenz Berlin (2008), 609ff.

(98) Kadelbach and Kleinlein (n 9), 263ff; Behrens (n 67), 175; Niels Petersen, ‘Der Wandel des Ungeschriebenen Völkerrechts im Zuge der Konstitutionalisierung’ (2008) 46 Archiv des Völkerrechts 502, 507; Diggelmann and Altwicker (n 8), 635; Knauff (n 65), 467, 522.

(99) De Wet (n 94), 53.

(100) Ibid 71.

(103) José E. Alvarez, ‘Multilateralism and Its Discontents’ (2000) 11 European Journal of International Law 393, 399, 410; see extensively de Wet (n 94), 72ff.

(105) See Klabbers (n 21), 26.

(107) De Wet (n 94), 64ff; see also Ulfstein who noted that any redesign of the decentralized international judicial architecture by states is unlikely, Ulfstein (n 20), 141.

(108) This is reflected notably in the Kadi CFI case (n 17) where the CFI was very reluctant to accept such a competence; see also the Nada case (n 17); the ad hoc criminal tribunals for Yugoslavia and Rwanda respectively have claimed such a competence for themselves, see Prosecutor v Tadić (Decision on the Defense Motion for the Interlocutory Appeal on Jurisdiction) IT-94-1-AR72 (2 October 1995), [27]ff (Tadić: Jurisdiction case) and Prosecutor v Kanyabashi (Decision on Jurisdiction) ICTR-96-15-T (18 June 1997).

(109) See Chapter 59 on the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights.

(110) ECHR (n 7).

(117) De Wet (n 114), 629.

(118) On a practical level it is also worth mentioning that decentralized judicial enforcement of the international value system can only provide limited relief. The regional or domestic determination that an international human rights obligation would trump any other treaty obligation could not result in an annulment of the international obligation as such. The obligation remains in force on the international level—even if it is not applied on the domestic or regional level—until such a time as it is revoked or by the procedure provided for in the treaty in question.

(119) Ulfstein (n 20), 141.

(120) Ibid 146.

(121) Peters (n 9), 599; Klabbers (n 21), 23.

(122) Werner (n 8), 341.

(123) Peters (n 93), 350.

Erika De Wet

Erika De Wet is Co-Director, Institute for International and Comparative Law in Africa and Professor of International Law, University of Pretoria and Professor of International Constitutional Law, University of Amsterdam
Constitutional courts have made a fundamental contribution in clarifying the domestic binding force of the European Convention on Human Rights, in spite of the divergences as to its status in domestic law. This article examines the status of the Convention in domestic legal systems, which remains a question of constitutional law; and the status and implementation of the judgments of the European Court of Human Rights. It looks at four domestic systems, selected for their particular relevance. Three of them have a written constitution (Germany, France, and Belgium) and the fourth, the United Kingdom, has a human rights ‘catalogue’ (the Human Rights Act 1998) comparable to a constitution.

Keywords: constitutional courts, constitutional adjudication, European Convention on Human Rights, domestic law, constitutional law, European Court of Human Rights

I. Introduction

II. The Status of the European Convention of Human Rights in Domestic Constitutional Systems

1. Introduction
2. The United Kingdom
3. Germany
4. France
5. Belgium

III. The Status and Implementation of the Judgments of the European Court of Human Rights

1. Introduction
2. The United Kingdom
3. Germany
4. France
5. Belgium

IV. Conclusion

In the landmark case of Loizidou v Turkey, the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) referred to ‘the Convention as a constitutional instrument of European public order (ordre public). Indeed, the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), being a treaty of a specific nature, embodies elements of European public order. Admittedly, the purpose of human rights is the same at domestic and international levels. But the possibilities for individuals to rely on human rights in domestic courts are not identical in all states. As Judge Lech Garlicki has observed,

In all the countries that have adopted the idea of a written constitution, there is a set of constitutional provisions on rights and liberties, and there are mechanisms for the protection and enforcement of those liberties by an independent judiciary [and] the last word in constitutional interpretation is reserved to a separate constitutional court.

But he adds that

What makes a fundamental difference, however, is the phenomenon of the multidimensionality of constitutional protection. Particularly in the area of human rights, there is a constant process of internationalization: more and more rules, principles, and standards are incorporated in international law instruments and become universally binding all over the world.

Domestic treatment of fundamental rights differs. There are a great variety of constitutional provisions regarding the Convention contained in national texts. Referring to major publications, Giuseppe Martinico points out that there are constitutions that acknowledge the special status of the international human rights treaties or some of those treaties, whereas others are characterized by the acknowledgement of a super-legislative or simply a legislative ranking in the domestic legal order. In any event, constitutional courts have undoubtedly made a fundamental contribution in clarifying the domestic binding force of the Convention, in spite of the divergences as to its status in domestic law.

In this chapter, two main aspects of this multidimensionality in connection with the ECHR will be examined. First, the status of the Convention in domestic legal systems, which remains a question of constitutional law, is scrutinized. Secondly, the status and implementation of the judgments of the Court deserve particular attention. We deliberately leave aside the complex dimension of fundamental rights in the European Union. Suffice it to mention that with the entry into force of the Lisbon Treaty, the EU Charter of Fundamental Rights has become a binding instrument, which is to be interpreted, in relation to the corresponding rights of the Convention, in the same way as the Convention rights concerned (Art 52(3)). Moreover, Article 6(2) of the consolidated version of the Treaty on European Union (TEU) now provides that the Union, which succeeded the European Community and has been given legal personality (Arts 1 and 47 TEU), ‘shall accede’ to the Convention and that consequently fundamental rights will be protected, insofar as most EU member states are concerned, through a triangular set of norms, namely, domestic constitutions, the Charter of Fundamental Rights, and the Convention.

To illustrate the argument in this chapter, four domestic systems, selected for their particular relevance, are highlighted. Three of them have a written constitution (Germany, France, and Belgium) and the fourth, the United Kingdom, has a human rights ‘catalogue’ (the Human Rights Act 1998) comparable to a constitution. There are many similarities between adjudication under the Convention and adjudication under domestic constitutions. Constitutional adjudication is normally entrusted to the highest courts, be they named constitutional or supreme. Some courts apply the Convention directly, others only apply domestic legal instruments of a constitutional nature. The issue of the Convention’s status in the domestic forum is therefore one of great importance and is closely linked to the effect of the Strasbourg judgments.

II. The Status of the European Convention of Human Rights in Domestic Constitutional Systems

1. Introduction

The above-mentioned important characterization by the Court of the Convention ‘as a constitutional instrument of European public order’ did not imply a radical change of perspective, replacing domestic constitutions by a European catalogue of fundamental rights. It did not even impose any obligation on member states to consider the Convention as a superior legal instrument taking precedence in cases of conflict with domestic norms. As already indicated, the question of the status of the Convention has always been, and undoubtedly remains, a question of constitutional law, specific to each member state, and the Court has always refrained from establishing any stringent principle in this respect. Quite the contrary: In James and Others v United Kingdom, the Court made it clear that the Convention did not require its domestic incorporation:

84. ... neither Article 13 nor the Convention in general lays down for the Contracting States any given manner for ensuring within their internal law the effective implementation of any of the provisions of the Convention (see the Swedish Engine Drivers’ Union judgment of 6 February 1967, Series A no. 20, p. 18, para. 50). Although there is thus no obligation to incorporate the Convention into domestic law, by virtue of Article 1 of the Convention the substance of the rights and freedoms set forth must be secured under the domestic legal order, in some form or another, to everyone within the jurisdiction of the Contracting States (see the Ireland v. the United Kingdom judgment of 18 January 1978, Series A no. 25, p. 91, para. 239). ...

However, as Rudolf Bernhardt has emphasized, even if the Convention does not lay down any given manner for ensuring its effective implementation, no state can refer to its domestic law in order to escape obligations derived from the Convention. The Convention, like any other rules of international law, requires that the parties guarantee a certain result—the conformity of their domestic law and practice with conventional duties—but leaves the manner in which the result is achieved to the discretion of all states concerned. International law may have the rank of domestic constitutional law (or an even higher rank), it may have an intermediate position between constitutional and statute law, or it may lack legal validity in domestic law. All the different solutions are, according to the still-prevailing opinion, compatible with the principles of the international order, as long as the conformity of the domestic legal order with the international obligations is the result achieved. The examples of the United Kingdom, Germany, France, and Belgium are particularly eloquent as they illustrate the panoply of solutions. It is submitted that whatever solution is chosen, the overall result is a satisfactory one.

2. The United Kingdom

The United Kingdom has no written constitution and the Convention is not formally incorporated as such. A strict dualist approach in connection with international treaties prevails. But since the Human Rights Act 1998, described as the ‘perfect device to allow judicial review of legislation, while retaining the final word for the Parliament itself’, which came into force on 2 October 2000, the rights drawn from the Convention are implemented, by virtue of Schedule 1 to the Act, by domestic courts. Significant case law has been developed under the Act since its enactment. Indeed, its purpose is ‘to give further effect to the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Convention’. The Act does not simply give statutory recognition to an international treaty, it creates positive actionable rights based on human rights grounds.

An interesting procedure entrusted to the courts is the declaration of incompatibility pursuant to section 3 of the Human Rights Act. Connor Gearty eloquently describes the said declarations as ‘courteous requests for a conversation, not pronouncements of truth from on high’. Section 3(1) requires primary and subordinate legislation to be interpreted in a way which is compatible with Convention rights ‘as far as possible’. Indeed, legislation must be read and given effect, insofar as it is possible to do so, in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights. If a higher court at or above the level of the High Court or equivalent, as listed in section 4(5) of the Act, finds itself unable to do so in respect of primary legislation, or secondary legislation in respect of which primary legislation prevents the removal of any incompatibility with the Convention rights other than by revocation, it may make a declaration of incompatibility under section 4 of the Act. Such declarations constitute a notification to Parliament that an Act of Parliament is incompatible with the Convention rights. However, essential to this mechanism is that it is a declaration of a non-legal character: it does not affect the ‘validity, continuing operation, or enforcement’ of the provision in respect of which it is made (s 4(6)(a)). Neither does it bind the parties before the Court (s 4(6)(b)). According to a report of July 2010, since the Human Rights Act came into force, 26 declarations of incompatibility have been made, of which 18 have become final (in whole or in part) and none of which are subject to further appeal. Eight have been overturned on appeal. Of the 18 declarations of incompatibility that have become final, ten have been remedied by later primary legislation, one has been remedied by a remedial order under section 10 of the Human Rights Act, four relate to provisions that had already been remedied by primary legislation at the time of the declaration, and three are under consideration as to how to remedy the incompatibility. As a prominent example, the declaration in A and Others v Secretary of State for the...
3. Germany

Germany, in conformity with its tradition of a moderately dualist understanding of international law, made the Convention applicable in the national legal order in the form of a non-constitutional federal law. The Convention was incorporated into German law in accordance with Article 59(2) of the Basic Law, which provides that 'Treaties which regulate the political relations of the Federation or relate to matters of federal legislation shall require the consent or participation, in the form of a federal law, of the bodies competent in any specific case for such federal legislation.' The Convention has been assigned the status of federal law, thus overriding all laws enacted by the Länder. It has therefore a lower rank than the Constitution, the Basic Law, but has nevertheless binding effect, as applicable statute law, for all organs of the executive and for all courts. As mandatorily applicable statute law, the Convention has a direct effect in this respect. Every German judge and administrative official is bound by it. In the event that national provisions collide with the Convention, they must be interpreted, in accordance with the principle of the German legal system's openness towards international law, in a manner that is compatible with the Convention so that conflicts are avoided. However, the Basic Law's fundamental reservation of sovereignty implies the following principle: that the Convention is a federal law that is subordinate to the Constitution and that the Basic Law, in the unlikely event of its provisions conflicting with the Convention, has the final say.

The Federal Constitutional Court decides as to the interpretation and application of the Basic Law. The review of constitutionality of laws (enacted after the entry into force of the Basic Law in 1949) is entrusted, by virtue of Articles 93 and 100 of the Basic Law, to the sole jurisdiction of the Federal Constitutional Court, which enjoys the monopoly of judicial review in this respect. As Jutta Limbach explains, anyone who feels that their fundamental rights have been infringed by the public authorities may lodge a constitutional complaint. It may be directed against a measure of an administrative body, against a decision of a court, or against a statute. Such a complaint requires acceptance for adjudication, which means that, if the alleged infringement of fundamental rights is of special severity or the applicant would suffer a particularly severe detriment from failure to determine the issue, it must be accepted that the complaint is of fundamental constitutional importance. The Federal Constitutional Court itself decides on the prerequisites for acceptance before examining the constitutional complaint. As a further condition, the applicant must have brought his complaint unsuccessfully before the competent courts, as they are themselves bound to respect the supremacy of the Constitution. But only the Federal Constitutional Court decides on the interpretation and application of the Constitution with final binding force. Although Convention law does not constitute an independent parameter of review for the assessment of constitutionality, it plays an important role for the interpretation of the fundamental rights and intervenes as a tool to support the review in light of the standards guaranteed by the Basic Law. The Federal Constitutional Court has made the Convention a standard of its review where state organs have not taken the Convention into account in a way that is relevant to fundamental rights in spite of their being bound to applicable statute law. Indeed, the Federal Constitutional Court's case law has established a practice according to which the fundamental rights guaranteed by the Basic Law are complemented by an interpretation in conformity with the corresponding (or otherwise relevant) right afforded by the Convention. In its Görgülü decision, the Federal Constitutional Court stated in this respect that 'in this [manner, it] is indirectly [acting] in the service of enforcing international law.'

4. France

The status of the Convention, like any other international treaty, is defined by Article 55 of the Constitution, pursuant to which:
Treaties or agreements duly ratified or approved shall, upon publication, have an authority superior to statutes, provided that the relevant agreement or treaty is applied by the other party.

French courts have, however, been reluctant to apply this principle,\textsuperscript{40} as Catherine Dupré points out, in particular concerning the Convention. A notable example is the famous case of 1975 leading to a decision of the Conseil constitutionnel. The applicants claimed that the new and much debated abortion bill was a breach of Article 2 of the Convention. In that case the constitutional judges referred to the reciprocity requirement of Article 55 of the Constitution and set out a distinction between the contrôlé de constitutionnalité, ‘review of constitutionality’ (compatibility with the Constitution) and the contrôlé de conventionnalité, ‘review of conventionality’ (compatibility with international treaties).\textsuperscript{41}

The Conseil stated that whilst review of constitutionality was clearly its express function, reviews of conventionality went beyond its jurisdiction. Consequently, the constitutional (p. 1238) judges refused to review the ‘conventionality’ of the abortion bill with reference to the Convention, on the basis that this operation was of a different nature from its usual role of providing constitutional adjudication. Treaties, wrote the constitutional judges, are ‘relative and contingent’ because they depend on reciprocal application by the parties: they cannot therefore be used as a comparative standard in the same way as the Constitution. It should be noted, however, that three years later the ECtHR rejected any idea of reciprocity in its landmark judgment of Ireland v United Kingdom.\textsuperscript{42} In this judgment, the ECtHR held for the first time that,

> Unlike international treaties of the classic kind, the Convention comprises more than mere reciprocal engagements between contracting States. It creates, over and above a network of mutual, bilateral undertakings, objective obligations which, in the words of the Preamble, benefit from a ‘collective enforcement’.\textsuperscript{43}

In any event, the Conseil constitutionnel did not even mention the Convention in its ruling and found the bill to be constitutional on the sole basis of the French Déclaration des Droits de l’Homme et du Citoyen of 1789.\textsuperscript{44} Be that as it may, the Convention can nevertheless be considered as a shadow constitution,\textsuperscript{45} the French Constitution being an open document featuring the so-called bloc de constitutionnalité, permitting integration of the Convention's principles. The Conseil takes into account the provisions of the Convention even if it does not refer to the Convention in its judicial review when monitoring the conformity of national laws to the Convention.\textsuperscript{46} As a notable exception, the Conseil's capacity as judge of the procedural propriety of elections should be mentioned. Here the Conseil constitutionnel regularly verifies the compatibility of domestic provisions with the Convention.\textsuperscript{47}

As to the superiority principle enshrined in Article 55, French courts have gradually accepted that international treaties prevail over domestic legislation. Indeed, the national courts supervise the conformity of the national laws to the Convention under the contrôlé de conventionnalité, as opposed to the contrôlé de constitutionnalité.\textsuperscript{48} Comparing the approach of the Conseil constitutionnel to that of the ordinary courts, Noëlle Lenoir explains that, in the very famous judgment Administration des Douanes v Société Jacques Vabre,\textsuperscript{49} the French Cour de cassation held that Article 95 of the EEC Treaty, prohibiting barriers to competition, prevailed over statutory provisions regulating the taxation of imported coffee even though they had been enacted after the Treaty. Since then the ordinary courts have consistently followed the decision and upheld the primacy of international law over statutes, even where they have been enacted subsequently.\textsuperscript{50} The Cour de cassation has regularly mentioned the Convention in its rulings since 1975 and has even examined ex officio the compatibility of French provisions with it. The Conseil d’État, since 1989,\textsuperscript{51} has also accepted the direct effect of many Convention provisions.\textsuperscript{52} Both Courts are less reluctant to disapply national legislation (p. 1239) in order to ensure the primacy and direct effect of European instruments, and in particular, the Convention.

For example, the Cour de cassation, in three judgments delivered on 19 October 2010,\textsuperscript{53} stated that the present system of garde à vue (police custody) did not meet the requirements of Article 6 as interpreted by the ECtHR, and that to conform with those requirements, the following principles had to be respected:

- the right to a lawyer should be restricted only where there are compelling reasons for doing so, based on the circumstances of the case and not merely on the nature of the offence;
- detainees have to be informed of their right to remain silent;
- detainees have to be given the assistance of a lawyer in conditions which enable them to organize their Concerning the applicability of the provisions of the ECHR, the case law of the Conseil d’État is equally relevant. As Maria Fartunova explains, the Conseil d’État takes into account in judicial review proceedings Articles 8 and 6 of the Convention. Any conflict between the Convention and the Constitution is, however, resolved in favour of the latter.

An interesting procedure was introduced in 2008. With the constitutional revision of 23 July 2008, Article 61-1 of the French Constitution now entrusts the Conseil constitutionnel with the competence of delivering preliminary rulings:

If, during proceedings before a court of law, it is claimed that a statutory provision infringes the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution, the matter may be referred by the Conseil d’État or by the Cour de cassation, within a determined period, to the Conseil constitutionnel.

Maria Fartunova explains that this important procedure provides that an application for a priority preliminary ruling on the issue of constitutionality (question prioritaire de constitutionnalité) entails the right of any person who is involved in legal proceedings before a court to argue that a statutory provision infringes rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution. (p. 1240) The Constitutional Act no 2009-1523 of 10 December 2009 concerning the application of Article 61-1 of the Constitution has given priority status to the issue of constitutionality. According to this author, this means first that, when it is raised before a court of first instance or a court of appeal, the issue must be addressed without delay. The time devoted to dealing with the preliminary ruling should not delay the overall proceedings. Secondly, when the Court is asked to rule on arguments challenging both the constitutionality of a statute (preliminary ruling on the issue of constitutionality) and the failure of the said statute to comply with international treaties and agreements (plea of failure to comply with international obligations) the Court is required to address the issue of constitutionality as a priority. The new procedure came into force on 1 March 2010.

Lodging an action before a judicial or an administrative court to assert constitutional rights by means of the priority constitutional reference is not a direct action as only supreme courts like the Cour de cassation or the Conseil d’État may put this type of question to the Conseil constitutionnel. It is nonetheless submitted that this modification reinforces the harmonization between constitutional norms and European conventional norms, as is shown by the recent decision of the Conseil constitutionnel of 30 July 2010 concerning the rules of criminal procedure in the context of garde à vue (police custody). The Conseil constitutionnel held as follows:

25. ... Police custody remains a measure of constraint necessary for certain operations of the criminal investigation police. The above-mentioned evolutions [in the use of police custody] must, however, be accompanied by suitable guarantees as regards recourse to this measure and the manner in which it is conducted, such as to ensure the protection of the rights of the defence.

...

28. ... [the relevant provision of the Code of Criminal Procedure] does not allow the person undergoing questioning, and held against his will, to have the benefit of effective assistance from a lawyer. Such a restriction on the rights of the defence is imposed in a general manner without any consideration of particular circumstances likely to justify the measure, in order to collect or conserve evidence or ensure the protection of persons. The person taken into police custody is, moreover, not informed of his right to remain silent.

29. In such conditions, [the relevant provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure] do not offer suitable guarantees as to the use made of police custody, taking into account the above-mentioned evolutions. The reconciling on the one hand of the need to prevent breaches of the peace and seek out offenders with, on the other hand, the need to ensure the exercise of constitutionally guaranteed freedoms, can no longer be considered to be balanced. Thus these provisions fail to comply with Articles 9 and 16 of the Declaration of 1789 and must therefore be held to be unconstitutional.

The Conseil constitutionnel also held that the finding of unconstitutionality would take effect on 1 July 2011. Even though the implementation of those principles was postponed until 1 July 2011, to give the legislature time to pass a new law, the example of effective assistance by a lawyer during garde à vue—examined by the Conseil constitutionnel under the principles of fundamental constitutional rights and by the Cour de cassation under the principles governed by the ECHR and its interpretation by the ECtHR—shows that provisions of the Convention as well as constitutional principles override domestic legislation, albeit subject to legislative change, and may lead to an identical result.

5. Belgium

Unlike France, the Belgian Constitution does not contain a provision regarding the relationship between international and national law. In Belgium, the status of the Convention as superior law has had a long tradition since the ruling of the Cour de cassation in Fromagerie Franco-Suisse ‘Le Ski’ of 27 May 1971 deciding that international law prevails over domestic law. Indeed, as Andrew Drzemczewski notes, it may be assumed that directly applicable provisions of all international agreements will be given primacy over conflicting national legislation irrespective of the date of enactment of the statute in question. He sums up the principles as follows. The conflict which exists between a rule of law established by an international treaty and a rule of law established by a subsequent statute is not a conflict between two statutes. The rule, according to which a law repeals the earlier law insofar as the two conflict, is not applicable in the case of a treaty conflicting with a law. When the conflict is one between a rule of domestic law and a rule of international law having direct effects within the domestic legal order, the rule established by the treaty must prevail; its pre-eminence follows from the very nature of international treaty law. It follows from the preceding considerations that the Court has the duty to reject the application of the provisions of domestic law that are contrary to this provision of the treaty. The courts are competent to review the compatibility of any statute with those provisions of a treaty considered to have direct effect in Belgian law if the law is compatible with the treaty provisions.

The ordinary courts, including the highest administrative court, the Conseil d’État, have applied those principles in their constant case law. According to recent case law, the Convention even prevails over the Belgian Constitution.

But conflicts between the Constitution and the Convention are very rare. The Belgian legislature even attempts to streamline both sets of guarantees, as shown by the example of privacy, governed by Article 22 of the Belgian Constitution and Article 8 of the Convention. When introducing the right to privacy, the constitutional lawmaker tried to ensure concordance with Article 8 of the Convention in order to avoid disputes regarding the content of the respective provisions.

The Belgian Constitutional Court, formerly the Cour d’Arbitrage, has since its creation in 1984 insisted on strict observance of the provisions of the Convention and of the interpretations given by the ECHR. Basically, the Constitutional Court delivers a posteriori rulings, after having been seized directly by public authorities or individuals, as to the compatibility of legislative acts with the Constitution. If an incompatibility is found the relevant Act is annulled. However, a case may also be referred to the Constitutional Court by ordinary courts which request a preliminary ruling. If the Court finds an incompatibility with the Constitution, the relevant norm is set aside in this particular case, but not annulled. It should be noted that a specific filtering procedure allows the Court to declare inadmissible applications that are manifestly ill-founded or not compatible with other admissibility requirements.

The Constitutional Court has pronounced many judgments concerning the rights guaranteed by the Convention, and its jurisprudence has always been in accordance with that of the ECHR. Through a creative interpretation method, the Court has linked the rights of the Convention to Articles 10 and 11 of the Constitution governing the principles of equality and non-discrimination. Applying the principles of equality and proportionality, the Court has incorporated through its case law the substantive provisions of the Convention in its reasoning. Since 2003, the Court’s competence has been formally extended to include direct review of legislative acts as to their compatibility with the rights laid down in Title II of the Belgian Constitution. A recent amendment to the Special Law on the Constitutional Court introduced (in 2009) the obligation for the courts to lodge a preliminary reference before the Constitutional Court if a party to the proceedings alleges a violation of a fundamental right, protected both under the Constitution and the Convention or any other international or supranational norm (Art 26 of the Special Law of 6 January 1989 on the Constitutional Court amended by the Special Law of 12 July 2009). However, a court is exempted from this if an international court has already decided upon the issue. If the Constitutional Court
III. The Status and Implementation of the Judgments of the European Court of Human Rights

1. Introduction

Pursuant to Article 46(1) of the Convention, 'The High Contracting Parties undertake to abide by the final judgment of the Court in any case to which they are parties'. In the judgment of Verein gegen Tierfabriken Schweiz (VgT) v Switzerland (No 2), the ECtHR held as follows:

85. As regards the requirements of Article 46, it should first be noted that a respondent State found to have breached the Convention or its Protocols is under an obligation to abide by the Court's decisions in any case to which it is a party. In other words, a total or partial failure to execute a judgment of the Court can engage the State Party's international responsibility. The State Party in question will be under an obligation not just to pay those concerned the sums awarded by way of just satisfaction, but also to take individual and/or, if appropriate, general measures in its domestic legal order to put an end to the violation found by the Court and to redress the effects, the aim being to put the applicant, as far as possible, in the position he would have been in had the requirements of the Convention not been disregarded (see, among many other authorities, Scozzari and Giunta v. Italy [GC], nos. 39221/98 and 41963/98, § 249, ECHR 2000-VIII, and Assanidze v. Georgia [GC], no. 71503/01, § 198, ECHR 2004-II).

(p. 1243) 86. These obligations reflect the principles of international law whereby a State responsible for a wrongful act is under an obligation to make restitution, consisting in restoring the situation which existed before the wrongful act was committed, provided that restitution is not 'materially impossible' and 'does not involve a burden out of all proportion to the benefit deriving from restitution instead of compensation' (Article 35 of the Draft Articles of the International Law Commission on Responsibility of States for Internationally Wrongful Acts—see paragraph 36 above). In other words, while restitution is the rule, there may be circumstances in which the State responsible is exempted—fully or in part—from this obligation, provided that it can show that such circumstances obtain.

The Court also observed:

88. ... subject to monitoring by the Committee of Ministers, the respondent State in principle remains free to choose the means by which it will discharge its obligations under Article 46 § 1 of the Convention, provided that such means are compatible with the conclusions set out in the Court's judgment (see Scozzari and Giunta, cited above, § 249, and Lyons and Others, cited above). However, in certain special circumstances the Court has found it useful to indicate to a respondent State the type of measures that might be taken to put an end to the situation—often a systemic one—which has given rise to the finding of a violation (see, for example, Öcalan v. Turkey, no. 46221/99, § 210 in fine, ECHR 2005-IV; Broniowski, cited above, § 194; and Popov v. Russia, no. 26853/04, § 263, 13 July 2006). Sometimes, the nature of the violation does not even leave any choice as to the measures to be taken (see Assanidze, cited above, § 202).

Supervision of judgments is entrusted to the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe, a political body. There are three parts to the implementation of a judgment of the Court, the payment of just satisfaction and other individual measures required to put the applicant as far as possible in the position he would have been in had the breach not occurred, and general measures required to prevent the breach happening again, or to put an end breaches that still continue.

The question as to the effect beyond the particular case raises a different issue. Already in 1993, Georg Ress had insisted on a clear-cut trend—less strictly from the 'legal' than from the practical side—for national courts to adapt their decisions to the interpretations furnished by the Court. Admittedly, even though he acknowledged that a commitment along the lines of a stare decisis principle to the interpretation recommended by the Court cannot be demonstrated, he rightly stressed the importance of complying with the rulings in order to pre-empt any future finding of a violation by the Court. Indeed, a European Court judgment contains clarification of the obligations of the Convention over and above the individual case, and thus also significantly indicates to member states how they can guarantee the effective application of the Convention in their domestic law. President Jean-Paul Costa has referred in this respect to the notion of de facto erga omnes effect of Strasbourg judgments and the Court in Opuz v Turkey clearly stated that, (p. 1244)

In carrying out this scrutiny, and bearing in mind that the Court provides final authoritative interpretation of the rights and freedoms defined in Section I of the Convention, the Court will consider whether the national authorities have sufficiently taken into account the principles flowing from its judgments on similar issues, even when they concern other States.

Moreover, it is submitted that the so-called pilot judgment procedure is a major development as to the broader effect of judgments as it represents a reaction to ‘systemic violations’, that is, situations in which repetitive violations of individual rights result from a general, legislative, and/or administrative environment and affect a significant number of persons. Pilot judgments undoubtedly contain, by definition, a ‘constitutional’ component, addressing a problem and not only a singular violation. That coexistence of individual and systemic components demonstrates the dual nature of pilot judgments and, perhaps, illustrates a more general evolution of the European Court of Human Rights towards a constitutional court.

Indeed, as Judge Lech Garlicki has emphasized, ‘the very idea of the system is that the Convention should be applied by the national authorities (domestic courts) in a way which assures an effective protection of human rights’. In connection with this goal, he identifies three scenarios of interaction between the ECtHR and domestic courts. According to him, two scenarios can be described as scenarios of cooperation, in which the positions of the ECtHR and of the domestic courts become identical or—at least—similar, the ‘first move’ or inspiration originating either in Strasbourg or in a member state. The rule is not without exceptions and consequently a scenario of conflict may surface. Scrutiny of the practice in the four domestic systems identified shows the accuracy of the said scenarios.

2. The United Kingdom

In its 2009–10 report the Joint Committee on Human Rights deplored some very lengthy delays in the implementation of certain judgments. Individual measures, like the payment of just satisfaction, are sometimes delayed, as has been acknowledged in the government’s response to this report. Of greater interest is the attitude of UK judges towards the principles decided in Strasbourg. Section 2(1) of the Human Rights Act 1998 requires courts ‘to take into account’ any judgment of the ECtHR in determining any question to which such judgment is relevant.

In a nutshell, the status of the judgments of the ECtHR can best be described, as Eric Metcalff has eloquently done in a recent article, by the ‘mirror principle’. In Ullah, Lord Bingham expressed the view that, absent good reasons to the contrary, a claimant in a British court can expect to obtain the same result as he or she would in Strasbourg: ‘no more, but certainly no less’. In general, courts follow the Strasbourg rulings, especially Grand Chamber judgments involving the United Kingdom where the ruling is clear on its terms, but in a small number of cases, UK courts have judged Strasbourg rulings too unclear to implement, the most notable example being the case of Horncastle concerning a departure from the ECtHR’s case law as to anonymous witnesses. Yet, as Lord Hope has put it recently, determining in the affirmative the question whether the Supreme Court should follow the ECtHR’s judgment in Salduz.

45. The starting point is section 2(1) of the Human Rights Act 1998, which provides that a court which is determining a question which has arisen in connection with a Convention right must ‘take into account’ any decision of the Strasbourg court. The United Kingdom was not a party to the decision in Salduz nor did it seek to intervene in the proceedings. As the Lord Justice General observed in McLean, para 29, the implications for the Scottish system cannot be said to have been carefully considered. But in R (Alconbury Developments Ltd) v Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions [2001] UKHL 23, [2003] 2 AC 295, para 26, Lord Slynn of Hadley said that the court should follow any clear and constant jurisprudence of the Strasbourg court. And in R (Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Department
Jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights and the Constitutional Systems of Europe

[2002] UKHL 46, [2003] 1 AC 837, para 18, Lord Bingham of Cornhill said the court will not without good reason depart from the principles laid down in a carefully considered judgment of the court sitting as a Grand Chamber. In R v Spear [2002] UKHL 31, [2003] 1 AC 734, on the other hand, the House refused to apply a decision of the Third Section because, as Lord Bingham explained in para 12, they concluded that the Strasbourg court had materially misunderstood the domestic legal context in which courts martial were held under United Kingdom law. And in R v Horncastle [2009] UKSC 14, [2010] 2 WLR 47 this court declined to follow a line of cases in the Strasbourg court culminating in a decision of the Fourth Section because, as Lord Phillips explained in para 107, its case law appeared to have been developed largely in cases relating to the civil law without full consideration of the safeguards against an unfair trial that exist under the common law procedure.92

UK courts are cautious in extending Strasbourg jurisprudence too far in marginal cases, but sometimes they anticipate the developments in circumstances where the ECHR has yet to rule.93 It should be added that section 2 of the Human Rights Act does not displace the normal (p. 1246) operation of stare decisis. Indeed, lower courts remain bound to follow the decisions of higher courts, even where they are inconsistent with subsequent Strasbourg authority.94

3. Germany

It is admitted that, even though the judgments of the ECtHR do not, legally speaking, have erga omnes effect, the interpretation chosen by the ECtHR in a particular case has a de facto relevance for the subsequent application of the domestic law in all similar pending or parallel cases.95 If such an interpretation ‘in conformity’ with the domestic statutes is possible, the ECtHR’s interpretation is considered relevant. The limitation to this principle of openness occurs if the domestic law does not allow an interpretation ‘in conformity’ (i.e., the case has already become final or the wording of the statute is inconsistent with Strasbourg interpretation).96 It should be noted also that, since 1998, reopening of criminal proceedings has been possible after delivery of a judgment of the ECtHR, under Article 359 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Since 2006 a similar provision has been enacted concerning civil proceedings.97

Concerning the status and implementation of the judgments of the ECtHR, the well-known Görgülü saga is of particular interest. The case concerned a denial of custody and access rights for the biological father in respect of a child born out of wedlock. The applicant in this case was a father whose son was living with foster parents and who had been denied the right to see his child on a regular basis by the competent Regional Court of Appeal. The ECtHR decided that the decision of the German court was contrary to the provisions of the Convention. In particular, it held that the denial of custody and access rights infringed the right to respect for family life guaranteed under Article 8 of the Convention.98 However, the Regional Court of Appeal upheld its decision and argued that the judgment of the ECtHR had no effect in the domestic legal order and was thus not binding for the individual courts.99 This refusal to implement the Strasbourg judgment was subsequently challenged before the Federal Constitutional Court which held100 that decisions of the ECtHR were binding on domestic courts, but that this binding effect was not unconditional. The Federal Constitutional Court first ruled that being bound by statute and law (Art 20(3) of the Basic Law; Grundgesetz—GG) includes taking into account the guarantees of the ECHR and the decisions of the ECtHR according to the canons of justifiable interpretation of the law. Both a failure to consider a decision of the ECtHR and the ‘enforcement’ of such a decision in an automatic way, in violation with superior law, may violate fundamental rights in conjunction with the principle of the rule of law. Secondly, the Federal (p. 1247) Constitutional Court held that, in taking into account the decisions of the ECtHR, the state bodies must include the effects on the national legal system in their application of the law. This applies in particular when the relevant national law is a balanced partial system of domestic law that is intended to achieve an equilibrium between competing fundamental rights.101

This decision of the Federal Constitutional Court102 contains an important caveat, the so-called all-effects caveat (Auswirkungsvorbehalt). As Dagmar Richter has rightly explained,

According to this caveat, German courts must consider all effects that a decision of an international court might possibly entail within the German legal order, particularly with respect to those subsystems of the German legal system which are thoughtfully designed to balance conflicting basic rights. German courts and authorities should thus defend German sovereignty ... against international judgments particularly in cases in which not all of the parties to the court procedure have also been parties to the international court
According to Judge Lech Garlicki, the Federal Constitutional Court confirmed, in principle, the authority of the ECtHR’s judgments. But he correctly adds that the position of the Federal Constitutional Court seems to be clear: while the domestic courts are under an obligation to give full effect to the judgments of the ECtHR, they should also avoid situations in which implementation of a Strasbourg judgment would result in violation of constitutionally protected rights of the other parties to the original dispute. A more critical comment has been made by Jens Meyer-Ladewig, for whom the reasoning of the Federal Constitutional Court in this respect is ‘misleading and superfluous’ and difficult to reconcile with Article 46(1) of the Convention.

4. France

In principle, French ordinary courts tend to comply ‘spontaneously’ with the ECtHR by following its case law and generally the judgments of the ECtHR lead to amendment of legislation if need be. As Maria Fartunova explains, since the first judgment of the Court delivered in a case concerning France, French legislation has been amended as a result of the condemnation of France by the ECtHR. Examples include cases concerning the duration of detention on remand, restrictive inheritance rights of adulterine children, length of proceedings before administrative courts, and the structure of administrative jurisdictions. The position of the Conseil constitutionnel is more nuanced. It should first be noted that, as Maria Fartunova observed, the Conseil has never been asked to look into any conflict between the Convention and the Constitution. Its position, adopted in 1975, namely that it has no jurisdiction to ensure the precedence of international norms over national laws on the basis of Article 55, has not changed. The Conseil nevertheless takes European instruments into account in its judicial review when there is a concomitance between the rights guaranteed by the Constitution and the rights guaranteed under the Convention. As examples, the guarantees in the field of criminal procedure, rights of defence, freedom of expression, and the principle of non-discrimination are mentioned. The Conseil has also made a significant contribution in the field of positive obligations and as Maria Fartunova stresses, the Conseil constitutionnel takes into account the provisions of the Convention in its decisions even if it does not refer to the Convention in its judicial review when monitoring the conformity of national laws to the Constitution. As Noëlle Lenoir points out, the Conseil’s case law on the relationship with international law is evolving. The Conseil has gradually clarified the scope and legal force of Article 55 of the Constitution and in terms of substance, it is increasingly inclined to follow the reasoning techniques of international courts such as that of Strasbourg, in particular as regards fundamental rights. The decisions of the ECtHR have had a spectacular impact on the decisions of the Conseil, even though this may sometimes be imperceptible. But, according to Noëlle Lenoir, the originality of the French situation lies in the fact that the Conseil constitutionnel does not indicate where it has been inspired by international law in general and the decisions of the international courts in particular. More and more frequently, it defines and interprets the rights and freedoms secured by the Constitution by implicit—to the ECtHR and the case law of the ECtHR. As already mentioned, the Conseil has accordingly incorporated into the set of constitutional rules it applies (the ‘bloc de constitutionnalité’), principles that are not expressly stated there but which seem to flow from it.

5. Belgium

In general, Belgian authorities tend to follow the Strasbourg case law, even if the famous Marckx judgment concerning discrimination between legitimate and illegitimate children, was only fully implemented in 1987 through amendment of the relevant legislation. It should be mentioned that the openness is followed by all courts, including the Cour de cassation and the Constitutional Court. The Constitutional Court does not hesitate to reverse its case law in order to insert the Strasbourg jurisprudence into the Constitution. It thus uses the Strasbourg case law to modernize the constitutional human rights catalogue without the intervention of the constitutional legislator. Judgments of the ECtHR are faithfully implemented according to the long-standing doctrine of the autorité de la chose interprétée, equivalent to the de facto erga omnes effect, even in relation to the case law concerning other High Contracting Parties. Its case law does not deviate from that of Strasbourg. A very interesting and recent example concerns the effects of the Chamber judgment of the ECtHR delivered on 13 January 2009 in the case of Taxquet. The Court found a violation of Article 6 of the Convention holding that the procedure of trial by jury did not comply with that provision. The Chamber judgment was followed by the Cour de cassation, which felt compelled to reject the relevant provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure:

On account of the binding effect of interpretation now attaching to [the Chamber judgment] and the prevalence over domestic law of the international legal rule deriving from a treaty ratified by Belgium, the court [of cassation] is compelled to reject the application of Articles 342 and 348 of the Code of Criminal Procedure in so far as they lay down the rule, now criticised by the European Court, that the jury’s verdict does not contain reasons.129

(p. 1250) The binding effect of interpretation is thus a robust tool to allow courts to take into account the Strasbourg jurisprudence, which is, in general, faithfully followed and applied.

IV. Conclusion

In this chapter we have focused on four domestic systems with very different constitutional traditions. Notwithstanding the discrepancies as to its application, the ECHR enjoys a special status in the sense that the principles enshrined are of fundamental importance for national authorities. Fundamental rights are protected by constitutional (Germany, France, and Belgium) or quasi-constitutional (like the Human Rights Act 1998) provisions. The rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Convention are either directly applicable (France and Belgium) or introduced into the domestic system by means of a separate legislative Act (United Kingdom and Germany). In any event, the multidimensionality of fundamental rights protection has been increased with the entry into force of the Lisbon Treaty and the European Union Charter of Fundamental Rights.

The case law of the highest constitutional and supreme courts in the four countries examined shows that on the whole the Strasbourg jurisprudence is faithfully implemented and not departed from without good reason. ‘Taking into account’ the Strasbourg case law has proven to be much more than ‘just considering’ it and indicates a clear willingness on the part of the highest domestic judges to protect fundamental rights through a logic of dialogue with the ECtHR.

Bibliography

Francis Delpérée, Le droit constitutionnel de la Belgique (2000)

Olivier de Schutter and Sébastien van Drooghenbroek, Droit international des droits de l’homme devant le juge national (1999)

Andrew Drzemczewski, European Human Rights Convention in Domestic Law (1983)

Ronald St J Macdonald et al (eds), The European System for the Protection of Human Rights (1999)

Eric Metcalff, ‘“Free to Lead as Well as to be Led”: Section 2 of the HRA and Relationship between the UK Courts and Strasbourg’ (2010) 1 Justice Journal 22

Jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights and the Constitutional Systems of Europe

Notes:

(*) I am deeply indebted to Nathalie Vaneenoo, for helpful research accomplished during her study visit at the Court. I extend my thanks also to Gabrielle Guillemin and Catherine Brisson of the Research Division of the Court as well as James Brannan of the English Language Division of the Court. I am also grateful to Dr Patrick Kinsch, Avocat à la Cour (Luxembourg) and Visiting Professor, University of Luxembourg for helpful feedback on an earlier draft. Any views expressed are personal.

(1) Loizidou v Turkey (Preliminary Objections), 23 March 1995, para 75, Ser A no 310.

(5) Ibid 510. On the internationalization of constitutional law, see further Chapter 56.

(10) James and Others v United Kingdom, 21 February 1986, Ser A no 98.

(13) See Francis Geoffrey Jacobs, Robin C.A. White, and Clare Ovey, The European Convention on Human Rights (5th edn, 2010), 102–5, with further references.

(17) ‘So far as it is possible to do so, primary legislation and subordinate legislation must be read and given effect in a way which is compatible with the Convention rights.’

(18) Gearty (n 14), 96.

(19) Murphy (n 14), 488.

(20) Blackburn (n 16), 963.

(22) This information was last updated on 13 July 2010. As notable examples the following declarations, amongst them those ‘that have survived scrutiny in appeal proceedings’, ((sic) Gearty (n 14), 96) should be mentioned in this non-exhaustive list:

R (H) v Mental Health Review Tribunal for the North and East London Region and Secretary of State for Health [2001] EWCA Civ 415; McR’s Application for Judicial Review [2002] NIQB 58; International Transport Roth GmbH v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2002] EWCA Civ 158; R (Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2002] UKHL 46; R (D) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2002] EWHC 2805 (Admin); Blood and Tarbuck v Secretary of State for Health, unreported, 28 February 2003; Bellinger v Bellinger [2003] UKHL 21; R (M) v Secretary of State for Health [2003] EWHC 1094 (Admin); A and others v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2004] UKHL 56; R (Sylviane Pierrette Morris) v Westminster City Council & First Secretary of State (No 3) [2005] EWCA Civ 1184; R (Gabaj) v First Secretary of State, Administrative Court, unreported, 28 March 2006; R (Balai and others) v Secretary of State for the Home Department and another [2006] EWHC 823 (Admin); R ((1) June Wright (2) Khemraj Jummun (3) Mary Quinn (4) Barbara Gambier) v (1) Secretary of State for Health (2) Secretary of State for Education & Skills [2006] EWHC 2886 (Admin); Smith v Scott [2007] CSIH 9, Registration Appeal Court (Scotland); Nasseri v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2007] EWHC 1548 (Admin); R ((1) F (2) Angus Aubrey Thompson) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2008] EWHC 3170 (Admin).

(23) Information about each of the 26 declarations of incompatibility is set out in an annex to the above-mentioned report. See Ministry of Justice (n 21).

(24) [2004] UKHL 56.
(25) Ministry of Justice (n 21). For an appraisal of declarations of incompatibility, see A and Others v United Kingdom, App no 3455/05, 19 February 2009 (Grand Chamber), para 158.

(27) Andreas Zimmermann, ‘Germany’ in Blackburn and Polakiewicz (n 11), 337–8 with further references.

(28) Basic Law, Art 20(3).

(29) Papier (n 26), 1.

(30) Ibid 3.

(31) Philipp Cede, ‘Report on Austria and Germany’ in Martinico and Pollicino (n 7), 65.

(32) Basic Law, Art 1.

(34) BVerfGE 41, 88, at 105.

(35) Cede (n 31), 65.

(36) Papier, (n 26), 2.

(39) On this important decision see Section III.3 below.

(40) Catherine Dupré, ‘France’ in Blackburn and Polakiewicz (n 11), 313ff.

(41) Ibid 316.

(42) Ireland v United Kingdom, 18 January 1978, Ser A no 25.

(43) Ibid para 239.

(44) Dupré (n 40), 316.

(45) Martinico (n 7).

(46) Maria Fartunova, ‘Report on France’ in Martinico and Pollicino (n 7), 207.

(47) Dupré (n 40), 318, 319.

(48) Fartunova (n 46).

(49) Cour de cassation (ch mixte), 24 May 1975, Dalloz, 1975, 497; [1975] 2 CLMR 336.

(50) Noëlle Lenoir, ‘The Response of the French Constitutional Court to the Growing Importance of International Law’ in Markesinis (n 33), 164.

(52) Dupré (n 40), 318.
(53) No 5699 (12-82.902), no 5700 (10-82.306), and no 5701 (10-82.051).

(54) I am grateful to Paul Harvey, lawyer at the Registry of the Court for valuable information and the translation into the English language of the principles decided by the Cour de cassation.

(55) Fartunova (n 46).

(57) Conseil d’État (ass), 30 October 1998, MM. Sarrahn, Levacher, and ors, and Cour de cassation (ass plén), 2 June 2000, Mlle Fraisse. Both decisions are mentioned by Fartunova (n 46).

(59) ‘Lorsque à l’occasion d’une instance en cours devant une juridiction, il est soutenu qu’une disposition législative porte atteinte aux droits et libertés que la Constitution garantit, le Conseil constitutionnel peut être saisi de cette question sur renvoi du Conseil d’État ou de la Cour de cassation qui se prononce dans un délai déterminé.’

(60) Fartunova (n 46), 217.

(61) Conseil constitutionnel, Dec no 2010-14/22 QPC (Daniel W et al).

(62) See eg Salduz v Turkey, App no 36391/02, 27 November 2008 (Grand Chamber); Panovits v Cyprus, App no 4268/04, 11 December 2008.

(63) Patricia Popelier, ‘Report on Belgium’ in Martinico and Pollicino (n 7), 83.

(66) Numerous examples are provided by Olivier de Schutter and Sébastien van Drooghentbroek, Droit international des droits de l’homme devant le juge national (1999).

(68) Popelier (n 63).

(69) Silvio and Phillipe Marcus-Helmons, ‘Belgium’ in Blackburn and Polakiewicz (n 11), 179.

(71) See for details Marc Uyttendaele, Précis de droit constitutionnel belge. Regards sur un système institutionnel paradoxal (2005), 587.

(72) Popelier (n 63), 93.

(73) App no 32772/02, 30 June 2009 (Grand Chamber).

(75) Ibid.
(76) Ibid.

(78) Opuz v Turkey, App no 33401/02, 9 June 2009.

(79) Ibid para 163.

(82) Ibid 192.

(84) Ibid 307.

(85) Ministry of Justice (n 21).

(88) Ibid para 20:

[Lord Slynns statement in Alconbury] reflects the fact that the Convention is an international instrument, the correct interpretation of which can be authoritatively expounded only by the Strasbourg court. From this it follows that a national court subject to a duty such as that imposed by section 2 should not without strong reason dilute or weaken the effect of the Strasbourg case law. It is indeed unlawful under section 6 of the 1998 Act for a public authority, including a court, to act in a way which is incompatible with a Convention right. It is of course open to member states to provide for rights more generous than those guaranteed by the Convention, but such provision should not be the product of interpretation of the Convention by national courts, since the meaning of the Convention should be uniform throughout the states party to it. The duty of national courts is to keep pace with the Strasbourg jurisprudence as it evolves over time: no more, but certainly no less.

(90) Al-Khawaja and Tahery v United Kingdom, App nos 26766/05 and 22228/06, 20 January 2009. This case is pending before the Grand Chamber pursuant to a referral.

(91) Salduz v Turkey, App no 36391/02, 27 November 2008 (Grand Chamber).

(92) Cadder v Her Majesty’s Advocate (Scotland) [2010] UKSC 43, per Lord Hope (with whom Lord Mance agreed).

(93) See eg concerning destitution of asylum seekers contrary to Art 3 of the Convention, R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex p Limbuela [2005] UKHL 66; concerning the margin of appreciation to be afforded to in respect of discrimination between married and unmarried couples (arrogation by the courts of this margin to themselves rather than to Parliament, Re G (Adoption: Unmarried Couple) [2008] UKHL 38; and regarding expulsion of individuals (a mother and a daughter) to a country where there would be a breach of the Art 8 rights,

(94) Metcalff (n 86), 10. See eg R (C) v Commissioner of the Police of the Metropolis [2010] WLR (D) 193. When faced with conflicting authorities from the ECtHR and the House of Lords (now the Supreme Court) on the indefinite retention of DNA profiles and fingerprints by the police, the Divisional Court held that they were bound to follow the House of Lords.

(95) Cede (n 31), 69.

(96) Ibid 70.

(97) Ibid 71.

(101) Unofficial translation by the Secretariat General of the German Federal Constitutional Court, revised by the editors of the Human Rights Law Journal.

(103) Richter (n 102), 65. Another example of multipolar fundamental rights relations occurred in the case of Von Hannover v Germany, App no 59320/00, ECHR 2004-VI. Hofmann (n 102) argues that the criteria developed in the jurisprudence of the First Senate of the FCC to balance conflicting fundamental rights in cases involving the right to privacy, on the one hand, and the freedom of the press, on the other hand, are finely tuned and indeed result in such equilibrium; but it must also be stressed that these criteria are not the only ones which achieve such equilibrium, which is also obtained by the criteria developed by the ECtHR in its judgment in the Caroline of Monaco Case. So, in a situation where the judgment of the ECtHR results in equilibrium, to leave it to the courts whether and to what extent they are prepared to accept a binding effect of an ECtHR judgment, and to open the risk of a clear violation of Germany’s treaty obligations, is not acceptable.

(104) Garlicki (n 4), 521 and in a similar vein concerning the difficulty of implementing Strasbourg judgments in ‘multipolar legal relations in connection with the fundamental rights issues’, Papier (n 26), 3.

(105) Meyer-Ladewig (n 102), 224.

(106) Ibid 222–5, and compare with Hofmann (n 102), who, as mentioned in n 103, finds it unacceptable that, in a situation where the judgment of the ECtHR results in equilibrium, to leave it to the courts to decide whether and to what extent they are prepared to accept the binding effect of an ECtHR judgment.

(108) See Section II.4 above, the three judgments of the Cour de cassation of 19 October 2010 (no 5699 (12-82.902), no 5700 (10-82.306), and no 5701 (10-82.051)).

(109) Bozano v France, 18 December 1986, Ser A no 111.

(110) Fartunova (n 46), 207.

(111) Following the judgment in Muller v France, 17 March 1997, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1997-II.

(112) Following the judgment in Mazurek v France, App no 34406/97, ECHR 2000-II.

(113) Following the judgment in Beaumartin v France, 24 November 1994, Ser A no 296-B.

(114) Following the judgment in Kress v France, App no 39594/98, ECHR 2001-VI (Grand Chamber).

(115) Fartunova (n 46), 207.

(117) Conseil constitutionnel, Dec no 80-127 DC, 19 and 20 January 1981 (Sécurité et liberté); Conseil constitutionnel, Dec no 89-260 DC, 28 July 1989 (COB). In this latter decision, the Conseil referred to the interpretation given by the ECtHR in Delcourt v Belgium (17 January 1970, Ser A no 11). Adde, Conseil constitutionnel, Dec no 2010-14/22 QPC, 30 July 2010 (Daniel W et al). See Section II.4 above.

(119) According to Fartunova (n 46), the Conseil has adopted a different approach to that of the ECtHR.

(120) Ibid 212.

(121) See Section II.4 above.

(122) Lenoir (n 50), 186–8.

(123) Marckx v Belgium, 13 June 1979, Ser A no 31.

(124) Popelier (n 63), 89, mentioning the Constitutional Court, no 81/2007, 7 June 2007.

(125) It should be noted that the Cour de cassation in early 1982 applied the Strasbourg jurisprudence not without difficulty. The judgment in Le Compte, Van Leuven and De Meyere v Belgium (23 June 1981, Ser A no 43) was not followed in two judgments of the Cour de cassation of 21 January 1982 (Pasicrisie belge, 1982, i, 623 and Journal des Tribunaux, 1982, 446). It was only after the judgment delivered in Albert and Le Compte v Belgium (10 February 1983, Ser A no 58) that the Belgian Supreme Court followed the principle established by the ECtHR as to the applicability of Art 6 in disciplinary matters. See two judgments of the Cour de cassation, 14 April 1983, no 6789, Pasicrisie belge, 1983, i, no 441 and Journal des Tribunaux, 1983, 607 and no 6785, Pasicrisie belge, 1983, i, no 442.

(128) Taxquet v Belgium, App no 926/05, 13 January 2009 (extracts). This case is currently pending before the Grand Chamber of the Court.

The Assize Court Reform Act of 21 December 2009 has introduced a requirement for the Assize Court to state the main reasons for its verdict.

Dean Spielmann
Dean Spielmann is Judge of the European Court of Human Rights, Strasbourg
This article begins by briefly reconstructing the intellectual history of militant democracy, starting with Loewenstein's work and moving on to the ways in which the doctrine of militant democracy was developed in post-war West German constitutional law in particular. It next compares varieties of militant democracy, mostly, but not only in different post-authoritarian countries, before touching on the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, which has developed its own perspective on militant democracy. It then returns to the normative core questions surrounding militant democracy and asks whether one might conclude that some strategies for defending democracy are clearly superior to others — and what their implications are for constitutional law.

Keywords: militant democracy, Loewenstein, West German constitutional law, European Court of Human Rights

... if my fellow citizens want to go to Hell I will help them. It's my job.

(Oliver Wendell Holmes, 1920)

One has to remain faithful to one's flag, even when the ship is sinking.

(Hans Kelsen, 1932)

A constitution is not a prescription for suicide, and civil rights are not an altar for national destruction.

(Aharon Barak, 2002)
contesting elections in order to abolish or at least decisively (p. 1254) weaken liberal democracy once they had gained power. The paradigmatic example was Germany, where Joseph Goebbels infamously gloated after the Nazis’ legal ‘seizure of power’: ‘it will always remain one of the best jokes of democracy that it provided its mortal enemies itself with the means through which it was annihilated.’

It was also in (West) Germany that a doctrine of militant democracy was not just comprehensively developed by legal scholars, but also officially adopted by the Federal Constitutional Court in the early 1950s. The Court held that the Constitution had made a ‘basic decision’ in favour of a substantive (as opposed to formal) understanding of democracy, a set of values that had to be defended against its declared enemies. In other words, enemies of the constitutional order should be repressed before they had a chance to enter public office—as opposed to finding that a party’s ideas are unconstitutional ex post facto, as with judicial review. However, there are many other countries—in particular those which regained democracy after more or less protracted authoritarian episodes—where at least some instruments of militant democracy (if not the expression itself) can be found in the constitution or at least in ordinary law: the 1958 French Constitution, for instance, empowers the President to defend the institutions of the Republic, while the 1978 Spanish Constitution requires that political parties are democratically organized (the assumption being that parties not democratically organized will be hostile to liberal democracy in general).

It might seem somewhat surprising, then, that there exists no general legal or, for that matter, proper normative theory of militant democracy—a theory, that is, which could solve, or even just address, what is often referred to as the ‘democratic paradox’ or the ‘democratic dilemma’, namely the possibility of a democracy destroying itself in the process of defending itself. To be sure, there are many related discussions, of tolerance and state neutrality for instance, or of legitimate limits on free speech and of the abuse of rights—but there is no ‘model’ of militant democracy that might straightforwardly be adopted by a newly consolidated democracy, and there exist no clear general normative guidelines as to how liberals should take their own side in an argument without ceasing to be liberals.

This absence is arguably best explained by deep differences among the historical experiences of different countries—and, even more so, deep differences in what lessons were drawn from a history of authoritarianism, and, furthermore, which particular policies such lessons implied. For instance, an experience with authoritarianism could give rise to a heightened willingness to engage in party bans—but it could also have the opposite effect, that is to say, a demand to be exceptionally tolerant even vis-à-vis potentially extremist parties, as banning parties is itself seen as a typically authoritarian measure: an example of the first is Germany; Spain by and large constitutes an instance of the second. In fact, even in the abstract, many political philosophies (p. 1255) might well mandate militant democracy and its exact opposite: anti-communism, for instance, could justify militant democracy (‘We have to fight the enemies of liberal democracy!’) and non-militant democracy (‘We do not want to be like them and destroy pluralism!’). John Rawls essentially threw up his hands when confronted with a ‘practical dilemma which philosophy alone cannot resolve’. I will argue further below that partly for philosophical, but above all, for historical, reasons a convergence on a shared understanding of militant democracy even within at least partially shared political spaces such as the European Union is unlikely.

Apart from this absence of a general theory of militant democracy, the justifications for militant democracy even within individual countries have often remained unclear or, for that matter, highly contested. Nearly all participants in the debates on the meaning of (and appropriate measures associated with) militant democracy are aware of the democratic dilemma, but of course not everyone agrees how democracies trying to defend themselves can avoid eroding their own foundations. In one sense, this danger was a clear and present one during the twentieth century’s intense ideological competition—what the historian Eric Hobsbawm has famously called ‘the Age of Extremes’ (and the Cold War in particular). From the 1920s to the early 1990s, enemies of democracy, or so it seemed, could easily be recognized by their relationship to totalitarianism, whether fascism or Soviet Communism (and, after 1945 specifically, their relationship to the fascist past and the Soviet Union in the present). But this seeming clarity could also give rise to McCarthyism and other illiberal excesses.

Less obviously, during the Age of Ideologies even totalitarian movements often invoked the language (and values) of democracy, thereby contesting and directly competing with liberal democracies: many Communists promised to realize full, participatory ‘people’s democracy’, as opposed to the merely ‘formal’ democracies of the capitalist West; but even fascists sometimes claimed that their version of the national or racial community constituted ‘real democracy': for instance, Giovanni Gentile, the foremost philosopher of Italian Fascism, held that ‘the Fascist State ... is a people's state, and, as such, the democratic state par excellence’. In other words, parties and movements subject to militant democratic measures were not just openly competing within democracies—they also often quite openly contested liberal democracies in the name of allegedly ‘real democracy’.

With the end of the Cold War, definitions of the supposed enemies of democracy have become much more diffuse and difficult to establish: ‘populism’ remains a notoriously vague concept; while attempts to link present-day parties to the totalitarian past—as with the German National Democratic Party (NPD) or post-communist parties in Central and Eastern Europe—often feel forced (and have in fact often fallen foul of the courts). For a while at least, it seemed that the paradigm of militant democracy was being replaced with that of the preventive, security-oriented state which mainly searches for effective measures against terrorists. In other words, the new, post-Cold War enemies of liberal democracies were said not to be competing for power within democracy, but to try to subvert it through spectacular and shocking acts of violence from without. The preventive state might also restrict rights and ban associations— but unlike militant democracy proper, which openly confronts what it deems to be antidemocratic parties and associations—much of its work is likely to be clandestine.

Terrorism is clearly a different tactic than subverting democratic values through contesting elections. It is not, I would argue, an object of militant democracy as traditionally understood. But there is one other area of highly contentious contemporary politics where militant democracy has again been invoked more frequently in recent years: challenges to secularism. Countries with a strict separation of church and state, such as France and Turkey, have constrained certain types of religiosity—whether practised individually or organized collectively—as threats to democracy as such. The European Court of Human Rights has often followed them in this assumption, without even going quite so far as to claim that secularism is an indispensable part of liberal democracy. Conflicts with religious actors—who do not necessarily organize in parties, but who might publicly invoke individual rights (again, in a manner that terrorists generally do not)—is a new and complex terrain for militant democracy, so much so that it remains contested whether democratic self-defence should really be practised against religious actors at all (who often have no intention of wielding the levers of government power). It is arguably the area where today democratic dilemmas—and the temptations of illiberalism—are most acute.

Given these general dilemmas, past lack of clarity and present-day uncertainties, this chapter proceeds in three steps: I first briefly reconstruct the intellectual history of militant democracy, starting with Loewenstein’s work and moving on to the ways in which the doctrine of militant democracy was developed in post-war West German constitutional law in particular. Subsequently, I compare varieties of militant democracy, mostly, but not only in different post-authoritarian countries, before briefly touching on the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, which has developed its own perspective on militant democracy. In the last, briefer section, I return to the normative core questions surrounding militant democracy and ask whether one might conclude that some strategies for defending democracy are clearly superior to others—and what their implications are for constitutional law.

II. A Very Brief Intellectual and Constitutional History

Militant democracy was first defined by Karl Loewenstein in 1937. Loewenstein was a lawyer by training, but had wide-ranging interests in political science and sociology: he studied with Max Weber in Munich just before the latter’s death. He left Germany in December 1933 and re-trained himself as an American political scientist. Loewenstein published extensively on political and legal developments in Europe. In two articles in the American Political Science Review in 1937 he argued that democracies were incapable of defending themselves against fascist movements if they continued to subscribe to ‘democratic fundamentalism’, ‘legalistic blindness’, and an ‘exaggerated formalism of the rule of law’. They should not, he insisted, tolerate ‘Trojan horses’ using elections to destroy the very core of democracy.

Loewenstein was not arguing with straw men. The constitution of the Weimar Republic, which Loewenstein had witnessed going down to defeat, had set no limits to political and legal changes enacted by the legislature. Leading constitutional lawyers claimed that Article 76 allowed transformations of the structure of the state (eg from federalism to a unitary state), and even a shift from democracy to dictatorship. Even the foremost democratic theorists among constitutionalists tended to assume that democracy was necessarily associated with relativism. Gustav Radbruch held that in a democracy power would have to be ceded to a majority, no matter what, since ‘no political view could be proven or disproven’; and Hans Kelsen explicitly argued that democracy, to remain faithful to its own principles, should allow all forces to develop, even those bent on the ‘annihilation’ of democracy.15

To be sure, there had been some legislation during Weimar designed to protect the Republic from violent political movements: the Republikschutzgesetz envisaged the prosecution of those preparing the assassination of political figures, as well as those supporting associations which had as their goal the subversion of democracy. On a more symbolic level, disparaging the republican flag was criminalized. Still, none of these democratic self-defence measures were constitutionally entrenched and virtually all of them were only applied in a very half-hearted way. For instance, from 1923 onwards the Nazi Party was banned in the Reich, but it was allowed to be re-founded in 1925; the political police in Prussia kept an eye on the Nationalsozialistische Deutsche Arbeiterpartei (NSDAP) until 1932, but never decisively weakened the party.

Partly as a reaction to these failures, a number of constitutionalists began to move away from a relativistic conception of democracy—though it was in general too little too late. Carl Schmitt was one of the first to argue that Article 76 did not allow for a transformation of Weimar’s political form (eg into a monarchy or a soviet republic) through super-majorities in the legislature; only the pouvoir constituant could do so. In his 1932 Legality and Legitimacy Schmitt warned that a ‘value-neutral’ interpretation of the Constitution could turn into ‘neutrality until suicide’ (Neutralität bis zum Selbstmord). In other words, a fundamental change in political principles enacted by the legislature might appear legal—but it would be not be legitimate.

Other European countries in the 1920s and 1930s were implementing measures consistent with Loewenstein’s conception of militant democracy more successfully, in particular banning parties and associations.16 However, many of these anti-extremist measures were ad hoc (and often only legitimized through ex post facto legislation), and no constitution contained anything resembling a real doctrine of democratic self-defence.

Part of the new challenge posed by interwar anti-democratic forces was that, according to Loewenstein, fascism had no proper intellectual content, relying on a kind of ‘emotionalism’ with which democracies could never compete. Implicit in Loewenstein’s argument about the ‘suppression of constitutional government by emotional government’ were many of the assumptions of ‘crowd psychology’, according to which ‘the masses’ who had entered European political life for good with the end of the First World War, were incapable of thinking; all they could do was feel or be guided by instinct. Hence they were easily swayed by demagogues and charismatic leaders appealing to their emotions and instincts.

Argument in favour of liberalism, then, would lead nowhere. Consequently, according to Loewenstein, democracies—which was really to say, elites who still believed in democracy—had to find repressive answers to anti-democratic forces, such as banning parties and militias. (p. 1258) They should also restrict the rights to assembly and free speech, deny individuals access to public office and even threaten the loss of citizenship.17 As Loewenstein put it, ‘fire should be fought with fire’; and that fire, in his view, could only be lit by a new, ‘disciplined’ or even ‘authoritarian’ democracy.18 Loewenstein made it absolutely explicit that, rather than practising unlimited tolerance and therefore potentially end with their ‘self-abnegation’, democracies should defend themselves ‘even at the risk and cost of violating fundamental principles’. He also thought they should establish a special institution—a kind of political police—for that very purpose.

Loewenstein’s idea of militant democracy subsequently became highly influential in the Federal Republic of Germany.19 The country’s Constitution itself (the so-called Basic Law, or Grundgesetz) contained a number of articles meant to guarantee liberal democracy in perpetuity. First of all, the so-called ‘eternity clause’ of Article 79(3) stipulated that the federal and democratic nature of the German state cannot be changed at all, and neither can the protection of human dignity and human rights laid out in Article 1 of the Basic Law. As Martin Klamt has pointed out, the Basic Law cannot prevent a revolution—but it renders a legal revolution impossible.20

Secondly, the Basic Law,—unlike the Weimar Constitution—constitutionalized the role of political parties in ‘forming the will of the people’—but it also allowed for the banning of parties deemed unconstitutional. An application for a party ban can only be brought by a political organ (the parliament, the upper house, or the executive); a decision on banning a party can only be made by the Federal Constitutional Court—a provision to ensure that government parties would not simply start outlawing their competitors. As a further safeguard against abusing party bans, no political disadvantage must be created for a party on which a decision is pending, but which has not been declared unconstitutional. Other associations deemed unconstitutional can be dissolved by the interior ministries, according to Article 9(2) of the Basic Law. In other words, parties are distinctly privileged, in the sense of being especially protected from bans (what in Germany is known as the Parteienprivileg).

The Grundgesetz also made explicit provisions for restricting the rights to free speech and assembly for those deemed to pose a danger to democracy. In other words, the Basic Law envisaged militant measures against institutions, but also against individuals, who could forfeit their rights. Conversely, Article 20(4) also gave any citizen the right to resist those trying to abolish the liberal democratic order. In practice, neither of these articles has played any significant role in German politics: there have been only four applications to the Court concerning forfeiture of rights. All of them were unsuccessful. Both articles concerning what one might call individualist militant democracy are now generally interpreted as fulfilling a mere symbolic function: they are a prominent political warning more than anything else.

However, the Federal Constitutional Court did draw on the principles of militant democracy for two far-reaching decisions restricting political activity, namely the banning of the quasi-Nazi Socialist Reich Party (SRP) in 1952 and the German Communist Party (Kommunistische Partei Deutschlands, KPD) in 1956. In both cases, the Court appealed to the need to protect the freiheitlich-demokratische Grundordnung (liberal democratic basic order), a phrase that appears no less than six times in the Basic Law. In 1952 the Court famously defined this order as one which excludes any form of tyranny or arbitrariness and represents a governmental system under the rule of law, based upon self-determination of the people as expressed by the will of the existing majority and upon freedom and equality. The fundamental principles of this order include at least: respect for human rights given concrete form in the Basic Law, in particular for the right of a person to life and free development; separation of powers; responsibility of government; lawfulness of administration; independence of the judiciary; the multi-party principle; and equality of opportunities for all political parties.

The Court also affirmed that the Constitution entailed a ‘basic decision in favour of militant democracy’ (streitbare Demokratie). There is considerable controversy as to whether this basic order is identical with the principles explicitly protected in Article 79—in other words, whether strident opposition to the specific federalist and parliamentary conception of democracy in the Federal Republic of Germany ought to be subject to the measures of militant democracy, or whether what is at stake is hostility to basic democratic values as such. Legal opinion nowadays tends towards the latter interpretation: the democratic order in general, not the specific institutional set-up of the German polity, is to be protected.

In addition to opposition to the liberal democratic basic order parties have to exhibit what the Court, in the decision on the KPD, called an ‘actively fighting, aggressive attitude’. This vague formulation has been subject to much controversy. In particular, it has often been pointed out that the Court explicitly denied that the likelihood of a party actually toppling the political system is relevant, thereby putting the emphasis almost entirely on what appear as ultimately subjective mentalities of party members and, in particular, a party leadership. The importance of investigating subjective attitudes also increased the role of institutions that are mandated to ‘observe political parties’, including through undercover work, wiretapping telephones etc., in particular the Verfassungsschutz (Office for the Protection of the Constitution), which is completely separate from ordinary German police and also from secret services dealing with threats emanating from outside the country (in a sense, the Verfassungsschutz is the political police for which Loewenstein had been calling).

Five applications to have parties banned have been filed so far. Only two of them were successful. An application by the Hamburg Senate to have the constitutionality of the Nationale Liste verified in 1994 failed, as did an application by the Federal Government and the Upper House with regard to the Freiheitliche Deutsche Arbeiterpartei. Both were rejected by the Federal Constitutional Court, because they were deemed not to be real parties trying to gain political power. The last application—to ban the NPD—was filed in 2001 and failed in 2002—on which more below. However, these small figures are somewhat misleading in that many more associations (Vereine) have been banned: up until the 1964 law on associations 328 extremist Vereine had been banned; more than 80 have been outlawed since. As said above, while only the Federal Constitutional Court can ban parties, the Interior Ministry can outlaw simple associations. The criterion is the same, however: associations have to exhibit an ‘actively fighting, aggressive attitude’ vis-à-vis the basic liberal-democratic order.
Militant Democracy

As Peter Niesen has pointed out, the approach of the Federal Constitutional Court in the 1950s and beyond was anti-extremist: the dangers to democracy were not associated exclusively with the anti-democratic movement and the regime against which the political identity of the Federal Republic defined itself—that is to say, National Socialism; rather, threats were deemed to emanate from the extreme right and the extreme left.25 In other words, the Court’s approach to democratic self-defence mirrored the theory of totalitarianism (with its implied ‘equidistance’ to extremist movements); and the SRP decision in fact explicitly identified the threat of the ‘total state’.

Critics charged from the very beginning that anti-extremism could easily be instrumentalized against legitimate opposition (especially left-wing opposition); as Ulrich Preuß has claimed, its justification was ‘an obscure combination of civil religion and “constitutional patriotism” which has been operating as a substitute for the traumatized national self-esteem of West Germans, and which at times has entailed a reduced capacity ... to endure dissent.’26 At the same time, critics have argued, anti-extremism did little to help to deal with the Nazi past. If anything, its implicit equation of Soviet Communism (and its alleged foreign agents) and Nazism seemed to relativize the specific evil of Nazism. Such criticisms became even louder in the 1970s, when individuals associated with radical left-wing causes were barred from holding public office—including rather innocuous ones like working in the Post Office (which, like posts for school teachers, comes with the status of Beamter, that is to say, tenured civil servant).

The prohibition of extremists holding certain state positions actually went back to the early 1950s, when it had been directed mainly at former Nazis. In the 1970s, then Chancellor Willy Brandt and the heads of the federal states underlined in a declaration of principles concerning the employment of ‘enemies of the constitution’ by the state that membership in a party or organization deemed hostile to the Basic Law was sufficient reason to exclude individuals from the civil service (the so-called Radikalenerlass). The principles were above all aimed at members of the Deutsche Kommunistische Partei (DKP), the re-founded German Communist Party.

In a highly controversial 1975 decision the Federal Constitutional Court clarified that lack of loyalty to the liberal democratic basic order justified exclusion from the civil service. But it did not endorse the notion that membership in a certain type of organization was sufficient proof for such a lack of loyalty. Within Germany, the issue died down by the 1980s, though exactly 20 years after the Federal Constitutional Court’s decision, the European Court of Human Rights ruled that the dismissal of a DKP member from the civil service (as opposed to the refusal to employ a DKP member in the first place) had indeed violated the rights of the plaintiff.

Germany developed the most explicit—and the most far-reaching—theory of militant democracy. But developments in Germany fit into a larger West European trend: the idea of (p. 1261) constraining democracies—and in particular parliaments—through unelected bodies such as constitutional courts. In a sense, Europeans used a Kelsenian instrument (the constitutional court) to pursue a Schmittian strategy (of denying all political contestants an equal chance of gaining power). Militant democracy—the thing, not the word—was not limited to Germany and was one expression of what Peter Lindseth has called a new post-war ‘constitutionalist ethos’, which reflected a deep distrust of popular sovereignty (akin to Loewenstein’s contempt for ‘the masses’).27 By contrast, the United States, even at the height of anti-communism remained exceptional, as political prohibitions were largely enforced through the criminal code against individuals (with no provisions to relax a robust presumption in favour of free speech in the electoral arena, and no special constitutional provisions for democratic self-defence).28

In Italy, the Christian Democrats, Alcide de Gasperi in particular, sought to establish a form of ‘protected democracy’—una democrazia protetta.29 The Transitory and Final Provisions of the Italian Constitution had already explicitly prohibited the re-establishment of the Fascist Party and placed restrictions on the political activity of former fascist leaders; Article XII stated:

It shall be forbidden to reorganize, under any form whatsoever, the dissolved Fascist Party.
Notwithstanding Article 48, the law has established, for not more than five years from the implementation of the Constitution, temporary limitations to the right to vote and eligibility for the leaders responsible for the Fascist regime.30
Militant Democracy

In 1952 the Italian Parliament enacted the ‘Scelba Law’, which reinforced these goals: associates of the Fascist Party would be removed from the active and passive electorate for five years. The law applied in particular to the group Ordine Nuovo (which, however, never gained any parliamentary representation with or without militant measures). In 1956 the Italian Constitutional Court upheld the principles of the Scelba Law, when it deemed the promotion of fascism as violating the legal and constitutional order. Later on, the parties of the so-called ‘constitutional arch’ collaborated effectively to exclude the MSI from government (although the party—rebranded as Alleanza Nazionale—did form part of Silvio Berlusconi’s first administration in 1994 and has since been absorbed into his party Il Popolo della Libertà).

Italy thus exhibited what Niesen has termed ‘negative republicanism’—the self-definition of a militant democracy in contrast to a particular authoritarian past, in a way that differs markedly from the abstract and quasi-universal German approach of anti-extremism. Negative republicanism is a specific instance of what Kim Lane Scheppele has called ‘aversive’—as opposed to ‘aspirational’—constitutionalism: an attempt to craft a constitution against the background of a negative past, not in terms of positive projects for the future. It is noteworthy that in Italy negative republicanism came into effect after the process of dealing with the fascist past had been officially (and, many critics would say, prematurely) concluded—that is to say, after the Act of Amnesty of 22 June 1946; unlike in the German case, democratic self-defence and the process of dealing with the legacies of dictatorship were not to be mixed.

(p. 1262) Interest in militant democracy waned after the 1970s. However, some of the new liberal democracies in Central and Eastern Europe adopted militant democracy and, in particular, militant democracy on an anti-extremist basis: the new orders were defined against communism as much as against fascism, and parties—or sometimes just symbols—associated with the great totalitarian movements were subject to bans.

Meanwhile, in Germany interest in militant democracy surged again around the turn of the millennium. In 2001, both houses of the German Parliament and the Interior Ministry applied to the Federal Constitutional Court to have the NDP banned. The applications followed a series of racially motivated acts of violence, which politicians connected to the rise of right-wing extremist movements and parties (not only the NPD), and which was to be countered with both the traditional instruments of militant democracy and a comprehensive mobilization of democratic civil society (the so-called Aufstand der Anständigen, or ‘uprising of decent citizens’). In 2003, the case was discontinued, because an insufficient number of judges thought it possible to proceed, once it had been revealed that a significant group of politicians and activists in the leadership of the party were in fact acting as informers for the Office for the Protection of the Constitution (Bundesverfassungsschutz). Meanwhile, scholars both in law and political science—not just in Germany—began to advocate a shift from militant democracy, with its emphasis on repression, to a new paradigm of ‘defending democracy’—a more comprehensive approach which included more positive efforts to protect democracy through civic education and an engagement with (and even mobilization of) civil society, as well as strategies to take seriously the grievances of supporters of extremist parties and split off potential moderates who might be included in democratic deliberation. The emphasis here was less on constitutional provisions, and more on a kind of public pedagogy and deliberative engagement. Outright party bans were now often dismissed as relics of the Cold War and the Age of Ideologies. Some scholars advocated abandoning the term ‘militant democracy’ altogether.

Thus the arsenal of democratic self-defence became enlarged—but so, in fact, did the potential targets of militant or defensive democracy. From the mid-1990s onwards, courts across Europe began reviewing more and more decisions to ban or restrict the actions of actors broadly speaking inspired by religion. Decisions at the nation-state level were frequently upheld by the European Court of Human Rights—always with reference to proportionality, but also sometimes with reference to the doctrine of ‘margin of appreciation’, and sometimes, much more controversially, with arguments that seemed to suggest that secularism is necessarily a part of democracy.

III. Varieties of Militancy

How can one meaningfully compare and classify different types of militant democracies? As should have become clear, very few countries explicitly employ the language of militant or defensive or self-protective democracy. But many do have provisions to deal with threats other than crime, foreign aggression, or terrorism. I suggest that these can best be understood along (p. 1263) two axes of analysis: on the one hand, one can chart to what extent, if at all, such provisions are constitutionally entrenched, or merely a matter of ordinary law. On the other hand, one can distinguish different kinds of militant democracy according to the underlying conceptions of what constitutes a threat triggering repressive measures. Here Frankenberg's and Niesen's dichotomy of anti-extremism and negative republicanism is helpful: Does a democracy work with a relatively open or even universal understanding of 'extremism', where threats can emanate from different parts of the political spectrum, or is militancy more particularist, so to speak, and thus essentially aimed at preventing the return of a specific, highly problematic historical past?
Militant Democracy

In such a matrix, Germany, the paradigmatic case of militant democracy, occupies a unique position: militancy is clearly enshrined in the constitution, and anti-extremism has been most clearly developed as the underlying doctrine justifying militant measures. This particular constellation owes a great deal to historical context: on the one hand, it was a useful fiction that Weimar had foundered because of the deficiencies of the Constitution (as opposed to a rueful lack of citizens prepared to defend democracy), and that, by contrast, a militant constitution could 'guarantee' democracy (even when it was doubtful how many genuine democrats could be found in 1950s and 1960s West Germany). On the other hand, anti-extremism fit the Cold War and the age of totalitarianism theory. Not surprisingly, anti-extremist justifications of militant democracy have become attenuated after the end of the Soviet Union: the German Parliament's application to ban the NPD in 2001 was framed in the language of negative republicanism. It sought to demonstrate 'essential affinities' between the party and the NSDAP, that is to say, the main party-political institution of the negative past against which the liberal-democratic basic order defines itself in the present. In the language of Günter Frankenberg (one of the authors of the Bundestag's application to ban the NPD), the 'learning sovereign' had adapted to different times and based its perceptions of threats and potential pre-emptive measures on new foundations. A less high-minded way of putting the point would be to say that militant democracy can never be divorced from political (though not necessarily party-political) considerations—which is not to say that it is political through and through and that all arguments and reasons marshalled in debates on militant measures are mere smokescreens to hide power.

Many other countries have been militant in the sense of banning parties and associations—but most have not done so with the help of constitutional provisions or, even if they have constitutional provisions, anything like an overarching constitutional principle of militant democracy (as with the Grundgesetz). The reasons for banning organizations and the restriction of individual liberties have generally centred, in the helpful schema developed by Nancy Rosenblum, on actual violence, on incitement to hate, on foreign support or even control (or, more generally put: the insufficiently democratic and self-determining nature of a party), and, lastly and most controversially, on existential threats to national or, in many cases more accurately, constitutional identity. The first of these seems straightforward, but has often been hard to handle in practice: very few party leaders engage in violence themselves, and often parties could only be banned, because the state enlarged the definition of what counted as 'violent behaviour': a failure to condemn violence can be interpreted as preparedness for violence and hence justifiable grounds for banning. This is essentially the basis for the early calls to ban the Batasuna party in Spain. To be sure, things are easier when parties mimic military (p. 1264) organizations or in fact have paramilitary units. In Germany and Spain the inner life of parties must be structured along democratic principles; and France, Spain, and Italy ban organizations of a military character outright.

Incitement to hatred is arguably even harder to define. Some countries prohibit any political mobilization for elections in terms of race or ethnic identities; others are prepared to ban parties whose leaders advocate the removal of certain parts of the population: India and its banning of 'corrupt practices' is an example of the former, the prohibition of the Israeli Kach Party an instance of the latter. In Israel Amendment 9 (to s 7A) of the Basic Law of the Knesset names three criteria for disqualifying party lists, inciting racism among them (denying the character of Israel as a state of the Jewish people and denying the character of Israel as a democracy are the others). Foreign control was a particular concern during the Cold War, when fear of Moscow-sponsored 'fifth columns' gripped publics in the West. The charge that the American Communist Party was not really a party at all (and thus de facto unresponsive to its own members), but an instrument of world communism as directed from the Soviet Union, was central to calls for banning it altogether. To be sure, concerns about remote-controlled parties and associations have resurfaced in recent years, as groups like the Muslim Brotherhood and its various offshoots have grown in Western states—though the worry here is less that they could contest (or even win) elections than that they serve as incubators for extremism and, ultimately, political violence.
Militant Democracy

Both the criteria of violence and of incitement fall clearly within an anti-extremist framework. Threats to national or constitutional identity might do so as well, but they can also be viewed through the lens of negative republicanism. Arguably, the latter is more plausible when it comes to understanding (though not necessarily justifying) recent bans of parties and restrictions on the liberties of individuals who are deemed to have violated principles of secularism. Even the most ardent defenders of secularism will not claim that a complete separation of church and state is a prerequisite for liberal democracy. But secularism is clearly an integral part of some democracies’ particular constitutional identity—Turkey and France being the prime examples. The preamble of the current Turkish Constitution announces that ‘as required by the principles of secularism, there shall be no interference whatsoever by sacred religious feelings in state affairs and politics’. In France, the 1905 law comprehensively separated church and state (with the exception of Alsace-Lorraine, which remains a special case). Both countries have banned religious symbols in the public realm, with Turkey enforcing a ban on headscarves in schools and universities, and France, since 2004, banning headscarves in schools. The Turkish Constitutional Court has also outlawed parties and associations—most prominently the Refah (Welfare) party in 1997, when Refah was actually the main governing party. The Court justified the ban with the argument that the party sought to introduce shariah. It could be argued that the Court was not employing a general anti-extremist framework, but a negative republican reasoning: while all religions were potentially a threat to Turkish secularism, the specific concern was the return of a pre-republican, pre-Kemalist past, in which religious leaders exercised state power. Militant democracy here was about protecting a particular constitutional identity against a particular threat which had to be understood against the background of the country’s history.

(p. 1265) The European Court of Human Rights reviewed the decision and held that the ban was justified (though only in the face of an ‘imminent threat’). The judges argued that Refah was attempting to introduce a form of legal pluralism on the basis of different religious and secular beliefs, thereby, in the words of the Court, doing ‘away with the State’s role as the guarantor of individual rights and freedoms and the impartial organizer of the practice of various beliefs and religions in a democratic society.’ At the same time, the European Court did not commit to the notion that secularism is necessarily part of democracy; it merely affirmed that secularism was ‘in harmony’ with democracy. In Şahin v Turkey, the Court, with similar reasons and stressing the particularity of Turkish historical experience, upheld the banning of the headscarves in universities—thereby allowing not just restricting parties with particular agendas and individuals abusing political rights, but the civil freedoms of citizens held to be in disagreement with substantive values of the constitutional order. The Court explicitly affirmed that ‘upholding the principle of secularism ... may be considered necessary to protect the democratic system in Turkey’.

From a supranational European perspective, then, militancy in the name of secularism can be subject to the margin of appreciation and proportionality testing; precisely because it is a form of negative republicanism and hence more particularist, it can be condoned, even if the measures justified in its name would appear as outright intolerance in other contexts (which is to say: against the background of other constitutional identities). The same is not true of separatist movements, where the European Court has made it clear that parties and movements that do not advocate violence or are linked to organizations perpetrating violence should be part of legitimate political debate. In other words—and perhaps paradoxically—there can be legitimate particularism among nation-states about (universalist) secularism, but not about defending territorial integrity (and, by implication, national identity). Or, put more simply: militant secularism is generally acceptable, militant anti-separatism is only so if the advocates of separatism can be linked to political violence.

It is harder to argue that French militant secularism is really a form of militant democracy based on negative republicanism. To be sure, French political culture was for centuries split between clerical and anti-clerical forces; and the Republic (or, more accurately, the five republics) defined themselves against the return of a particular past—that of the ancien régime, with its prominent political role for the Catholic Church. But the actual justifications for banning religious symbols associated with Islam in recent years have little to do with traditional republican anti-clericalism: the Stasi Commission, whose work led to the 2004 ban on headscarves, stressed the need to combat threats of violence from family (especially older brothers) against girls who refuse to wear the headscarf; while French constitutional identity played an important role in the background, a highly specific policy consideration based on an empirical investigation was said to be decisive. In the eyes of critics, however, there has been a worrying drift towards intolerance in the name of democracy (or perhaps more accurately: liberalism), a situation where democracy becomes opposed to religion in the abstract, but—in the particular case—always to aspects of Islam. More disconcertingly still, it is a particular form of democracy or even explicitly national identity that is turned into the basis for militant (p. 1266) measures. Here the particularism of negative republicanism is retained—but the more universalist aspects are gone; the final outcome could be not a variety of militant democracy, but a form of militant culture.43

It is thus important to remember that national identity and constitutional identity are not the same (the term ‘political identity’ often runs them together in a profoundly unhelpful way).44 Threats to the latter can legitimately be subject to militant democratic measures, although constitutional identity can be interpreted more or less narrowly and therefore give rise to more or less tolerance vis-à-vis parties and movements. As we saw above, the narrow definition of the liberal democratic basic order to be protected by German militant democracy would imply that advocates of a unitary state or of constitutional monarchy might automatically be classified as ‘extreme’—whereas on the more capacious (and more plausible) reading of the basic order as one of general democratic values (and not the specific institutional arrangements and interpretations of human rights codified in the Basic Law) their views would be perfectly reasonable (if unlikely to be realized in practice).

IV. Contesting and Constraining Militant Democracy

Only a few basic points in the debate about militant democracy are beyond contention. It makes little sense categorically to distinguish militant and non-militant democracies: under certain circumstances any democracy might engage in vigorous acts of self-defence; it is a question of political will, rather than pre-existing provisions for self-defence. Secondly, such provisions—no matter how deeply entrenched constitutionally—cannot save a democracy which lacks a sufficient number of citizens with firmly democratic convictions. Thus, thirdly, virtually all legal and political theorists nowadays tend to advocate complementing legal measures with educational ones, as well as engaging the legitimate concerns of voters turning to populist or extremist parties. They do so not least because, fourthly, all measures of militant democracy are at risk of being abused for political purposes (or for purely symbolic, which is to say ineffective, politics along the lines of ‘something has to be done!’). It does not follow from this that militant democracy is always merely politics by other (legal) means; but extremely careful attention has to be paid to safeguarding against such abuse.

And which vision of militant democracy is least likely to be subject to abuse? Clearly, it helps if the decisions about militancy are removed from day-to-day decision-making by executives and legislatures. Giving the monopoly of banning to an institution relatively isolated from political pressures (the paradigmatic example being the German Federal Constitutional Court) still seems the most justifiable arrangement—even if, as many studies have shown, in times of genuine (or just genuinely felt) threat and emergency courts tend to defer to the executive.

Does the framing of militant democracy as, broadly speaking, anti-extremist or negative republican make much difference? Many German writers have been wary of ‘anti-extremism’—partly because they associate it with an outdated Cold War mindset, partly because they (p. 1267) hold that anti-extremism is systematically biased against the Left.45 By contrast, negative republicanism has been credited with ‘particularist self-restraint’, because its militant measures will be directed against the recurrence of very specific political phenomena, as opposed to a potentially scattershot approach associated with anti-extremism.

There is, however, also a peculiar danger associated with negative republicanism: it may give rise to militant measures as a form of symbolic self-affirmation of the political community vis-à-vis a discredited past, by focusing on supposed manifestations of that past in the present which are not really any substantial threats to liberal democracy. This is one way of reading the application to ban the NPD in 2001; the fact that the party has continued to operate ever since seems to have done no serious damage to German democracy, nor has it led to a steady rise in racism (the particular concern of some proponents of a ban) or other pollutions of the political culture (and the public sphere in particular). More generally, negative republicanism is subject to all the problems associated with thinking in historical analogies: its parameters might lead to distortions of political judgment in the present, because in order to do something about a threat to democracy, that threat always has to be framed as somehow a replay of the past.

Does it follow, then, that anti-extremism is preferable as a normative basis for militant democracy? The problem is of course that determining thresholds for extremism will depend on answering the question: Extreme in relation to what? A narrow definition of a set of democratic core principles (as proposed, for instance, by an identification of liberal democracy with Article 79(3) of the Basic Law) could lead to highly illiberal outcomes; but a wide one would... leave the door open to supposed extremists claiming that their understanding of democracy is just radically different—but still recognizably democratic or even liberal.

Still, even short of anything like clear and present danger, attacks on core democratic principles are recognizable as such, if one or more of the following apply:

- the proponents of extremist views seek permanently to exclude or dis-empower parts of the democratic people (this is a different agenda than separatism, whose advocacy—without violence—should not be subject to militant measures);
- the proponents of extremist views systematically assault the dignity of parts of the democratic people. Such a notion will be fanciful in legal systems with very robust free speech traditions, but not in those that find it legitimate to erect restrictions on free speech because of specific historical experiences (an obvious example of such a ‘dignitarian’—as opposed to the primarily American libertarian—approach is legislation on Holocaust denial);
- the proponents of extremist views clearly clothe themselves in the mantle of former perpetrators of ethnic cleansing or genocide;\textsuperscript{46}
- and, finally, and probably most controversially: the proponents of extremist views seek to speak in the name of the people as a whole, systematically denying the fractures and divisions of society (in particular those associated with the contest of political parties) and systematically seek to do away with the checks and balances which have come to be associated with all European democracies created after 1945 (as the clearest result of the (p. 1268) particular post-war constitutionalist ethos). This taking of a part for the whole, the attempt to have and speak for a people in plenitude fully identical and reconciled with itself (and, for that matter, transparent to itself), is often associated with the concept of populism—though it actually conforms more closely to Claude Lefort's conceptualization of totalitarianism as the inevitable shadow of modern democracy.\textsuperscript{47}

These criteria are intended to be context-sensitive; they concede the basic insight of negative republicanism that militant democracy’s legitimacy will depend on specific historical background conditions. This also means, however, that they risk the kind of illiberalism associated with a narrower, more particular understanding of democracy. Yet that risk is containable, I would submit, because the criteria outlined above emphasize that whatever the supposed enemies of liberal democracy are doing—they have to do it systematically (with the exception of adopting the symbols of a former regime—which is empirically verifiable in a fairly straightforward way and explicit calls to strip certain people of the basic rights of citizenship, which also can be observed directly). In other words, this approach looks for arguments (or, more precisely, the structure in which arguments hang together), and not so much attitudes, as in the German Federal Constitutional Court's potentially highly subjective test for ‘fighting attitudes’.

These are of course contestable criteria, but in conjunction with giving the monopoly over banning and other militant measures to a politically insulated institution they might stand a good chance of guarding against abuses of militant democracy. As argued throughout this essay, however, it is highly unlikely that Western democracies will converge on such an approach in constitutional law anytime soon.

Bibliography

Bibliography

Martin Klamt, ‘Militant Democracy and the Democratic Dilemma: Different Ways of Protecting Democratic Constitutions’ in Fred Bruinsma and David Nelken (eds), \textit{Explorations in Legal Cultures} (2004)

Karl Loewenstein, ‘Militant Democracy and Fundamental Rights I’ (1937) 31 \textit{American Political Science Review} 417
Karl Loewenstein, ‘Militant Democracy and Fundamental Rights II’ (1937) 31 American Political Science Review 638

Markus Thiel (ed), The ‘Militant Democracy’ Principle in Modern Democracies (2009)

Notes:

(*) For comments and suggestions I am indebted to Giovanni Capoccia, Peter Niesen, and Kim Lane Scheppele.

(1) On constitutionalism in illiberal polities, see further Chapter 5. On democracy more generally, see Chapter 11.

(2) In the original: Das wird immer einer der besten Witze der Demokratie bleiben, daß sie ihren Todfeinden die Mittel selbst stellte, durch die sie vernichtet wurde.

(3) For the distinction between formal and substantive definitions of democracy and the implications for militant democracy, see in particular Gregory H. Fox and Georg Nolte, ‘Intolerant Democracies’ (1995) 36 Harvard International Law Journal 1. Fox and Nolte further distinguish between militant and tolerant democracies, thus leaving us with a matrix of four types—though the distinction militant/tolerant has rightly been criticized as insufficiently clear-cut. See Markus Thiel, ‘Comparative Aspects’ in Markus Thiel (ed), The ‘Militant Democracy’ Principle in Modern Democracies (2009), 379–424.

(4) Taking up Robert Frost's supposed claim that a liberal is ‘a man who cannot take his own side in an argument’.

(5) Austria is also exceptionally non-militant—though the picture is complicated here by the fact that after 1945 Nazism was often presented as an invasion from without, and not a ‘properly Austrian past’ that might return if not properly guarded against.

(9) Of course, this is not an entirely hard-and-fast distinction: after all, terrorists could also be said to abuse civil liberties and the normative guarantees of the rule of law in order to subvert liberal democracy. And sometimes terrorists have electoral wings, so to speak. Still, there is a good argument to be made that what Giovanni Capoccia has called ‘“peaceful” extremism’ requires a particular repertoire of measures and responses, even if there is overlap with an anti-terror strategy. Loewenstein himself insisted that fascism’s success was ‘based on its perfect adjustment to democracy’; it would be rather hard to argue that terrorism is ‘perfectly adjusted to democracy’. See Giovanni Capoccia, Defending Democracy: Reactions to Extremism in Interwar Europe (2005), 232.

(10) On the European Court of Human Rights more generally, see Chapter 59.

(13) Loewenstein (n 11), 424.

(16) See Capoccia (n 9) for examples drawn from a number of European countries.

(19) Another influence was the sociologist Karl Mannheim, who called for a militant democracy in his 1943 Diagnosis of Our Time; the 1951 German edition contained the expression ‘streitbare Demokratie’ which was adopted by the German Federal Constitutional Court. Part of the Mannheim's 'diagnosis' was also the rise of 'mass society', which posed radically new challenges to democratic politics—and democratic self-defence.

(21) BVerfGE 2:1 and BVerfGE 5:139.

(22) This is usually translated as ‘free democratic basic order’. But freiheitlich is not just free—it implies a more extensive commitment to freedom and values associated with it (such as self-development). It is the equivalent for ‘liberal’ chosen at a time—the 1950s—when party-political liberalism was often seen as discredited, or even as having paved the way to totalitarianism.

(23) BVerfGE 2, 1, 12–13, in Walter F. Murphy and Joseph Tannenhaus (eds), Comparative Constitutional Law (1977), 603; with the translation amended.

(24) Papier and Durner (n 14), 356–8.

(31) Ibid 212.

(33) A shortened version of the Bundestag's application can be found at http://www.extremismus.com/dox/antragbt.htm.

(38) See (http://www.knesset.gov.il/laws/special/eng/basic2_eng.htm).

(39) For the idea that constitutional identity is always formed through historical experience—fairly obvious in general, but difficult to specify in detail—see Gary Jeffrey Jacobsohn, Constitutional Identity (2010).

(41) To be sure, the European Court has not always accepted negative republican justifications: in Vajnai v Hungary the Court did not uphold the arrest and conviction of the vice-president of the Workers’ Party for wearing a ‘totalitarian symbol’—the red star.

(43) For an example of sliding from constitutional to national identity, see John Finnis, ‘Endorsing Discrimination Between Faiths: A Case of Extreme Speech?’ in Ivan Hare and James Weinstein (eds), Speech and Democracy (2009).

(45) See eg Claus Leggewie and Horst Meier, Republikschutz: Maßstäbe für die Verteidigung der Demokratie (1995).

(46) I owe this modified version of negative republicanism—one less vulnerable to abuse—to Peter Niesen.

(47) I am reluctant to attribute redemptive potential, or at least the power to politicize a supposedly post-political settlement (allegedly based on a rationalist liberal—Habermasian or Rawlsian—consensus) to populism in the way it has been suggested—with due caution and hedging—by theorists as different as Margaret Canovan and Ernesto Laclau. See Margaret Canovan, ‘Trust the People! Populism and the Two Faces of Democracy’ (1999) 47 Political Studies 2 and Ernesto Laclau, La razón populista (2005).

Jan-Werner Müller

Jan-Werner Müller is Professor, Politics Department, Princeton University
This article seeks to bring to the foreground the factors that surround the meeting of transitional justice and constitutionalism within the wider perspective of viewing each as a means towards a common end. Constitutional processes and norms weave themselves intricately into the matrices of transitional justice, which are heavily influenced by evolving norms in international law, even though they are to be implemented domestically. This interaction between two normative frameworks and spheres of influence — one domestic, the other international — has become increasingly evident, highlighting the need for further examination.

Keywords: transitional justice, constitutionalism, international law, constitutional norms

I. Introduction 1270
II. Transitional Justice Obligations and Constitutional Norms 1273
    1. Truth-Telling 1274
    2. Prosecutions 1275
    3. Reparations and DDR Mechanisms 1280
    4. Institutional Reform and Non-Judicial Sanctions 1281

III. The Relation of International Standards Embodied in Transitional Justice to Constitutional Norms and Processes 1282
IV. Conclusion 1285

I. Introduction

In 2001, the international community was forcibly awoken to the ways in which local and global security issues were threatened by the socio-political situation in Afghanistan. As foreign states and international organizations began in earnest to consider how to alleviate these tensions, it quickly became apparent that the Afghan system of law and governance had seemingly collapsed under the weight of centuries of conflict. A robust drug trade, along with Soviet occupation, buffeted by decades of tribal conflict, and the harshness of Taliban rule had left generations of Afghans with the belief that the only law that existed came in the form of Kalashnikovs and blood money. In December 2001, a UN-facilitated meeting resulted in the [p. 1271] Bonn Agreement on Provisional Arrangements in Afghanistan Pending the Re-establishment of Permanent Government. Part of this agreement called for the establishment of a commission mandated to work towards a new constitution, as well as giving the UN the mandate to investigate human rights violations during the interim period. Since early 2002, the Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission has, among its other activities, collaborated with other organizations to conduct surveys and develop policies in order to pursue a transitional justice process. However, after millions of dollars and the well-intentioned efforts of thousands of legal practitioners and scholars from many standing democracies, the impact of efforts at reform, and in particular at transitional justice, have been slow, and unclear at best.\(^7\)

As the country undergoes the delicate process of rebuilding a judicial backbone from the dust of violent conflict,\(^8\) Afghanistan provides a provoking example of the question this chapter attempts to explore: How do communities emerge from the rubble and make for themselves a new legal space? Transitional justice, offering as it does a basket of international tools and approaches through which to view this endeavor, confronts—directly and powerfully—the traditionally domestic enterprise of constitution-building. And while this confluence has been dissected in detail with respect to specific situations, there has not been much analysis on broader terms that may support a theory of cooperation, or at least harmony between the two processes. This chapter seeks to bring to the foreground the factors that surround the meeting of transitional justice and constitutionalism within the wider perspective of viewing each as a means towards a common end.

Transitional justice is a set of methods through which communities that have suffered gross and systemic violations of fundamental human rights seek to distance themselves from that past and move forward in a manner consistent with the need for justice for those who have suffered.\(^9\) A 2004 Report of the UN Secretary-General to the Security Council uses the term ‘transitional justice’ as encompassing ‘the full range of processes and mechanisms associated with a society’s attempts to come to terms with a legacy of large-scale past abuses in order to ensure accountability, serve justice and achieve conciliation.’\(^10\) The objective, then, is to repair and rebuild, within the confines of the rule of law. This is usually broken down into four obligations: (1) to tell the truth and distill an authoritative account of the history of the conflict;\(^(p. 1272)\) (2) to prosecute those responsible for the violations; (3) to offer reparations to the victims; and (4) to conduct institutional reform to dismantle extant systems which promote the perpetration of abuse.\(^11\) These four actions are state-driven and ‘official’, but their impetus is to affirm memory and reject denial or oblivion, and in that sense they nurture and reinforce other efforts by civil society and by the national culture to emphasize remembrance of human rights crimes as a means of ensuring non-repetition. Reconciliation is not a specific mechanism to be applied separately from the previous four (except for the need for inter-communal conversations when the crimes have had a very specific ethnic or religious dimension), but reconciliation is definitely the ultimate objective of all policies and practices of transitional justice.\(^12\) Recent years have seen the expansion of the scope of activities associated with transitional justice, and many in the fields of development, conflict prevention, and post-conflict reconstruction have seen significant overlaps between their own areas of focus and issues located within the ‘transitional’ framework.\(^13\)

Constitutionalism, as it will be used here, refers specifically to the processes undertaken by a community to set forth a fundamental law upon which all other laws will stand.\(^14\) The Secretary-General's Report referenced above emphasizes that the processes circumscribed by transitional justice, whether judicial or non-judicial, must be integrated, to the furthest extent possible, with existing national capacities, and that this is ‘best served by the definition of a national process, guided by a national justice plan and shepherded by specially appointed independent national institutions.’\(^15\) While many of the actual means for fulfilling transitional justice obligations will fall under more specific laws or administrative decisions, constitutions born in the aftermath of conflict nevertheless bear the first steps towards building the institutions necessary to address the need to afford remedies for past abuse. These constitutions—whether of an interim or more permanent character\(^16\)—also contain a framework for the administration of transitional justice specific to that community's context and become the mandate against which the legitimacy of transitional justice mechanisms and initiatives will be measured. Indeed, the initiation of proceedings aimed at justice is often the first assertion of a newly constituted legal system and, as such, an important foundation for further legal and social development.

Constitutional processes and norms thus weave themselves intricately into the matrices of transitional justice, which are heavily influenced by evolving norms in international law, even though they are to be implemented domestically. This interaction between two normative frameworks and spheres of influence—one domestic, the other international—has become increasingly evident, highlighting the need for further examination.

\(^{(p. 1273)}\) II. Transitional Justice Obligations and Constitutional Norms

Measures of transitional justice (prosecution, truth-telling, reparations, and institutional reform) on occasion depend for their legality on the interpretation of constitutional principles. If they are considered mandatory, it is generally not because of a constitutional imposition, but rather as an obligation established by international law. Contemporary developments in international law have seen the emergence of affirmative State obligations with respect to legacies of mass atrocities, particularly if under the circumstances those atrocities are deemed to constitute torture, war crimes, or crimes against humanity. In the sense that many constitutions establish some status for treaties (and in some cases also for customary international law norms) the transitional justice measures may be seen as constitutionally mandated.\textsuperscript{17}

By and large, however, prosecutions for human rights violations, truth-telling exercises, reparations schemes, and institutional reform initiatives are a matter of policy. Their implementation often requires some legislation or statutory or administrative authority. If so, their legality will depend on constitutional norms of separation of powers. In transitional periods, their very legitimacy and credibility with the citizenry will also hinge on the degree to which such orders are well within the functions and powers attributed by the constitution to the branch of government from which they emanate. For example, under some legal frameworks, it is a constitutional infringement for the President to order the prosecution of certain individuals. In other countries, in contrast, such orders are not unconstitutional as long as prosecutors retain a measure of professional autonomy and their actions are reviewable by an independent and impartial judiciary. In the last quarter of a century there have been many occasions when the highest courts of various countries have had to decide on the legality of transitional justice measures as they may be affected by constitutional provisions.\textsuperscript{18}

The intersection of transitional justice with constitutional norms, therefore, varies greatly with each country's legal order and the historical moment in which the legacies of past abuses are attempted to be reckoned with. Nevertheless, some classification may be possible. First, even if the transitional justice measures are seen largely as policy choices, the constitution may impose significant constraints on the manner in which those measures will be carried out. Secondly, the constitution may in fact include a mandate to conduct transitional justice initiatives, or at least contain some explicit enabling norms to that effect; such is the case of interim or transitional constitutions like the one South Africa enacted as part of the negotiations to put an end to apartheid. Another example of a transformative constitution that specifically addresses what must be done about past abuses is the Rwandan Constitution enacted after the 1994 genocide. Thirdly, constitutions may be silent on transitional justice but the state understands that international law obliges the state to avoid impunity for major international crimes. In this case, the manner in which the constitution incorporates international law into the domestic jurisdiction is crucial to understand both the imperatives the constitution may impose to deal with the past, and the restrictions on how to do so. The existence of potential conflicts between the mandate and the restrictions will be resolved by an analysis of how the constitution integrates treaties into the domestic legal order.

\begin{itemize}
\item 1. Truth-Telling \end{itemize}

The creation of Truth Commissions and similar bodies does not generally affect a constitutional norm, since investigatory bodies of various kinds are frequently used either by the legislative or the executive branch and their powers are delegated by Congress or the President. Much care needs to be exercised in devising the mandate and attributes of the Commission so that it does not infringe on powers of a separate branch of government. For example, human rights organizations have demanded that such Commissions be able to compel testimony from public officials and other witnesses that can be expected to be hostile (especially if they are suspected perpetrators of abuse). This applies equally to the legal ability of the Truth Commission to obtain documents from official sources and archives that are not generally made available. Unarguably, the success of an investigatory commission would be greatly enhanced if it were bestowed with such powers. Nevertheless, in most examples of Truth Commissions—and after some debate—the authorities have chosen not to grant them subpoena powers for fear that they could be seen as invading the sphere of judicial functions. For the most part, Truth Commissions are instructed to convey their materials to the appropriate courts or prosecutors' offices as soon as they encounter evidence that a crime has been committed or of the likely criminal liability of a person named.\textsuperscript{19} In some cases, there have been attempts to incorporate prosecutors or legislators in the composition of the Commission, with the express purpose of allowing them to exercise subpoena or search-and-seizure powers inherent to their offices or that can be delegated to them. Such solutions, however, still present separation-of-powers problems as they suggest that institutions with subpoena powers would share them with individuals who do not have them. In addition, they could distort the real function of a truth commission.
Another challenge to the practice of Truth Commissions that could have constitutional repercussions is the issue of whether they should ‘name names’ in their final report. Even if they mention the names of presumed perpetrators while expressly refusing to pass judgment on their guilt or innocence, the naming carries a very public stigma and could be interpreted as an official or semi-official condemnation. On the other hand, if the Commission comes across evidence pointing to certain individuals and yet suppresses that part of what it has learned, it could be accused of telling only part of the truth. If there are ongoing criminal investigations or they will start soon after the Truth Commission finishes its work, it is best for it to withhold names in the final report and simply pass on the relevant leads or information to courts or prosecutors. However, if under the circumstances there is no likelihood of prosecutions for serious crimes, revealing names in the final report will be a condition of credibility for the whole exercise. In those cases, the Truth Commission will have to follow some rules to ensure impartiality and thoroughness. In the first place, a serious effort should be made to ensure that all potential culprits are investigated for this purpose, and not only those belonging to one party to the conflict or to some specific branch of government while others are spared. The South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) was the only one of its kind empowered to offer amnesty (indemnity from prosecution) to perpetrators who came forward and revealed the truth of what they knew. Precisely because of the delicate constitutional issues that such powers raise, the Truth and Reconciliation Statute made it clear that a special panel of the TRC consisting only of judges would hear individual petitions for amnesty. In addition, the truth investigators must show that they have made efforts to corroborate the evidence they have received and to evaluate it for relevance, probative value, and credibility. Thirdly, the persons to be named have to be afforded an opportunity to rebut or to give their own version. These rules are derived from generally accepted principles of due process that, in most cases, would have constitutional underpinnings. And even if the process that is due before inclusion in a truth commission report is not as strict as would be required for a criminal conviction, it nevertheless is a condition of fairness that has bearing both on the legality and the legitimacy of the truth-telling exercise. Similar constitutional concerns govern the question of powers assigned to truth commissions beyond those related to investigating and disclosing information that is hidden. If they are going to be asked to disburse reparations to victims, they must be given appropriate budgets and, more importantly, statutory authority to make such determinations.

In general, however, Truth Commission reports generally focus on a description of the circumstances surrounding abhorrent practices resulting in severe human rights violations, often including an assessment of ‘root causes’ found in the recent history of the country. They also formulate recommendations addressed to the appropriate authorities in the areas that are logical follow-up to their findings: prosecutions, reparations to victims, protection of witnesses, educational programs, social and economic policies. It is clear that those recommendations are not mandates, so they do not present constitutional problems, even if there is a reasonable expectation that their implementation will be taken seriously by those in position to execute them.23

2. Prosecutions

Fulfillment of the obligation to investigate, prosecute, and punish mass atrocities is a central part of any program of transitional justice. In this view, truth-seeking, reparations, and institutional reform are never to be conceived of as ‘alternatives’ to prosecution, but rather as non-judicial measures to complete and supplement the inevitably limited reach of prosecutions. Whether accompanied by non-judicial measures or not, criminal prosecution of violations of human rights committed on a widespread or systematic basis is always the hardest task to accomplish. In most cases, the potential targets of such prosecutions retain an important measure of political power and influence, and their comrades-in-arms and political allies can exercise considerable pressure over political leaders, prosecutors, judges, and members of civil society to assure the suspects of impunity. Such political pressures notwithstanding, there are times in the life of a country emerging from repression in which the impulse to break the cycle of impunity does succeed in opening space for some criminal proceedings against persons suspected of human rights crimes. At that time, potential defendants will exercise their right to a fair trial (ironically, the right they denied their victims of prolonged arbitrary detention, extra-judicial execution, torture, or disappearance) and constitutional issues will come to the fore.

It is a condition of legitimacy of all programs of transitional justice that every measure adopted must respect human rights standards. In the matter of prosecutions, such standards include all of the guarantees of fair trial and due process of law. These are principles that are well established in the international law of human rights and they are also enshrined in most modern constitutions. All guarantees that form the nucleus of due process of law are frequently brought up in the course of prosecutions or at the indictment stage.

If they are members of the military (and in some countries also of the police) defendants will raise the argument that they should be tried by courts of military jurisdiction and not by ordinary criminal courts. They invoke the principle that has been called of juge naturel, consisting of the right to be tried by a regularly constituted court established before the prosecution. This challenge to the jurisdiction of ordinary criminal courts has been resolved as a constitutional issue at the highest courts in many countries undergoing transitional justice prosecutions. Military court jurisdiction has been found not to be applicable to these cases because military jurisdiction is not a privilege to be enjoyed by military men because of their status, and because criminal jurisdiction of these courts is limited to offenses of a specifically military nature. The ‘functional crimes’ that they can hear are those that cannot be committed by civilians, like disobedience to orders, breach of discipline, cowardice in front of the enemy, and the like. In times of war these courts can also try more serious breaches of the laws of war, but only if committed in combat situations. Major human rights crimes like murder, torture, and abduction are not ‘functional crimes’ and, because of that, the ‘natural judges’ to try military officers for human rights crimes are the same courts that would try ordinary citizens for similar acts. To be sure, military courts are valid instruments of justice if they are surrounded by guarantees of independence and impartiality; in reality, in most countries they are not. In fact, especially in Latin America, military courts have been a pretext for impunity. If they have claimed jurisdictional primacy at all it has not been to prosecute human rights crimes in good faith but as an effort to wrest jurisdiction away from ordinary courts. Their efforts have resulted in prolonged delays in processing these cases, even though in the end the higher courts have almost always ruled in favor of ordinary courts. In some egregious cases, military courts have operated almost in secret to process a case without participation of the victims or access by public opinion in order to create a ‘fraudulent res judicata’ that a military officer can then invoke if he is investigated by a regular court.25 This principle nullifying bad faith (p. 1277) pseudo-prosecutions has been incorporated in the 1998 Statute of Rome for an International Criminal Court.26

Prosecution of past human rights crimes also faces challenges emanating from de jure obstacles to prosecution. The most common are amnesty laws (or pseudo-amnesty laws that are not called amnesties) that have the purported effect of preventing investigation or prosecution of these crimes. These laws are sometimes called blanket amnesties because they cover whole categories of crimes and potential defendants and are absolutely unconditional. In contrast, some amnesty laws exclude the most serious crimes that are also considered international crimes, or—like in South Africa—are made conditional on some affirmative act of confession and atonement from its beneficiary. ‘Self-amnesty’ laws are those passed by the dictatorships themselves in order to shield their operators from prosecution. Military dictators in Latin America have enacted them before leaving office; the most recent examples are the twin laws passed by the Fujimori-dominated Congress in Peru in the 1990s, after the revelation of the existence of a clandestine unit in the Armed Forces that committed the notorious massacre of Barrios Altos and the disappearance of students and a professor in the La Cantuta University.27 Supreme courts have voided these self-amnesty laws, generally following decisions by international human rights courts.

A more complicated picture is that of amnesties promulgated by democratically elected governments after the end of dictatorships, like the Ley de Caducidad in Uruguay and the laws of Punto Final and Due Obedience in Argentina. Politically, those laws were almost literally extorted from the legislatures at the point of a gun when the military establishment flexed its muscle in the early days of a fledgling democracy. Yet formally they were unimpeachable. In both those countries, the legal effect of those laws was to prevent prosecution of major crimes for very long periods. Lately, however, courts have found ways around them at first and then have declared them inapplicable. In October 2009, the Supreme Court of Uruguay declared the Caducidad law unconstitutional as contrary to treaty obligations.28 The Argentine Supreme Court had ruled the same way in 2005.29 The constitutional argument in these decisions is based on the fact that treaties occupy a special place in the constitutional hierarchy of the juridical order, either as incorporated into the constitution or occupying a position below the constitution but above statutes and decrees, as in the so-called ‘Kelsen pyramid’.30 Human rights treaties have been found to establish the obligation to investigate, prosecute, and punish human rights violations that amount to crimes against humanity.31 In that sense, if those laws were enacted at the time those treaties were in force for the country, or if they are deemed to violate a jus cogens obligation, they are—according to the Supreme Courts of Argentina and Uruguay—unconstitutional ab initio.

The Argentine Supreme Court later used similar reasoning to declare pardons (promulgated by President Carlos Menem in 1989 and 1990 to favor the highest ranking leaders of the military dictatorship) also unconstitutional and therefore not an obstacle to renewed criminal (p. 1278) prosecutions.32 Other forms of clemency may not be contrary to international law and therefore not unconstitutional. Pardons decreed after trial and conviction and based on humanitarian reasons (because the convicted felon is infirm or in seriously ill health) and commutations and reductions of sentences do not infringe the affirmative obligation to investigate, prosecute, and punish, as long as they come after the judicial process has run its course and the end result is not a bad faith effort to make a mockery of justice. International law may require that punishment be proportionate to the seriousness of the crimes committed, but neither international law nor judicial practice has yet determined with any certainty what quantum of penalty is proportionate.33
Constitutionalism and Transitional Justice

In some cases, the legislative branch of newly democratic governments has attempted to repeal or nullify amnesty laws. The gesture is eminently political and therefore symbolic; the legal effect is dubious at best. A repeal will not erase the legal effect of the amnesty because, under the rule of lenity, criminal defendants and even convicted offenders enjoy the benefit of the ‘most benign criminal law’ that can be applicable to their acts from the moment of commission on. In that sense, an amnesty that erases the criminality of the act is precisely that kind of ‘most benign criminal law’ and must be applied even after repeal. The declaration by Congress or Parliament that an amnesty is ‘null and void’ is meaningless: Congress can repeal but not nullify prior enactments and, in any event, the nullifying statute may not be enough to overcome the rule of lenity. In Argentina, Congress has attempted both courses of legislative action at different times and under different administrations (and different parliamentary majorities). It is significant that in the judicial decision mentioned above, the Supreme Court did not rely on those pieces of legislation but rather, as stated, on the unconstitutional nature of laws that, at enactment, violated international obligations of the state. In this regard, those decisions found ample support in the several pronouncements of the Inter-American Commission and Inter-American Court of Human Rights since 1988.34 In Chile, without a formal declaration of unconstitutionality, the highest court has for many years refused to apply Pinochet’s self-amnesty law using the same arguments (under Chilean law, judicial pronouncements have no stare decisis and are valid only for the case under study). The Inter-American Court has recognized this line of judicial decisions but has insisted that Chile must take the self-amnesty law off the books.35

Other obstacles to prosecution are presented by the application of statutes of limitation, especially if political circumstances have allowed a long time to elapse since the commission of the crimes. Defendants and their lawyers insist that the accused has a due process right to have time computed in his favor. This may be true and perhaps this right is of constitutional rank; but the notion of crimes against humanity establishes a clear exception: murder, torture, enslavement, and other acts, when committed on a widespread or systematic basis, are not subject to statutes of limitation.36 The role of the courts, therefore, is to examine the evidence and see whether the specific acts are part and parcel of a pattern of widespread or systematic violations; if they are, the statute of limitations does not apply.

The European Court of Human Rights has repeatedly interpreted Article 7 of the European Convention (‘No punishment without law’) as not constituting a bar to prosecution of human rights crimes even though sanctioned by the state at the time of commission, beginning with the ‘German Border Guards’ case, a Grand Chamber decision approved unanimously.37 More recently, the European Court has held that the evaluation of whether a Hungarian captain was guilty of crimes against humanity had to be assessed on the basis of the prevailing understanding of that category of crime at the time of the acts committed.38 During the same year, a similar judgment was reached against Latvia, finding that the war crimes conviction of a former Soviet soldier violated his right to ne bis in idem. However, in 2010, a subsequent Grand Chamber decision on the case at the request of the Latvian government reversed this holding, reasoning that it had been sufficiently clear at the time of commission that the acts of the applicant had amounted to war crimes. This jurisprudence indicates that the issue of ne bis in idem is the central focal point of analysis in the validity of these prosecutions.39

Much has been said about whether similar principles should apply to the actions of insurgent forces that, contemporaneously with the human rights violations, also committed murders and other violent acts. In several countries (South Africa, Argentina, Uruguay, El Salvador, Guatemala) potential defendants who were members of rebel forces benefited at times from different amnesties enacted to encourage them to lay down their arms and join the peaceful political process. In fact, crimes against humanity can be committed by members of an organized group of non-state actors, as long as the crimes are also widespread or systematic and they are part of a general attack on the civilian population.40 There would be no obstacle, therefore, for a court to prosecute a member of the insurgent forces for such crimes even overriding an amnesty or a statute of limitations. But this is conditioned on the existence of a factual pattern that does indeed elevate the specific crimes charged to the category of crimes against humanity. It must be noted that international law does not prohibit every kind of amnesty: on the contrary, amnesties that are truly meant to put an end to armed conflict are actually encouraged by international law.41 This norm, however, applies to the domestic offenses of sedition, rebellion, or treason; not to actions that constitute grave breaches of the laws of war, whether committed by state or non-state actors.
Constitutionalism and Transitional Justice

Prosecution of past crimes can be vulnerable to constitutional challenge in one significant area: the right to a speedy trial. The complexity of the crimes investigated, the large number of defendants, victims and witnesses, and the fact that the judicial infrastructure is almost always inadequate to handle these cases have resulted in long delays in bringing them to trial or to a final resolution. If the accused is actually in custody during those lengthy proceedings, his constitutional rights are certainly violated. It must be noted that, in general, courts are sensitive to this issue and frequently release defendants on bail or transfer them to house arrest after a certain time has elapsed without a determination.

(p. 1280) 3. Reparations and DDR Mechanisms

Under international law, the concept of reparations is inextricably linked to the concept of state responsibility for violations of obligations owed either to individuals, collectives, or other states. This forms the bedrock for the mandate governing the inclusion of an effective and prompt reparations process in the transitional justice paradigm. In 2005, the United Nations General Assembly adopted Resolution 60/147,42 which laid out basic principles on reparations to victims of gross human rights violations. While this resolution is not binding and does not reflect customary international law, it nevertheless outlines key aspects of the nature of reparations that transitional justice tools have sought to implement. Under the resolution, ‘effective and prompt’ reparations include the equal and effective access to justice, and access to information concerning reparation mechanisms.43 Unlike the concept of reparations under ordinary domestic procedures, transitional justice reparations are not often truly compensatory. While many of them involve the transfer of something material to account for a loss, the material—whether money, property, or some other similar token—is more a symbolic act of atonement rather than an attempt at restoring the status quo ante. Thus reparations can, among others, take the form of monetary restitution such as that usually awarded by the Inter-American Court of Human Rights; apologies or other such public acknowledgment of responsibility such as those given by Japan and Germany after the Second World War; collective reparations for gross violations, including those paid by Germany to Israel, that paralleled individual reparations to Jews, slaves, and the Roma; or the granting of preferred treatment, as in the government aid programs and education benefits awarded to descendants of the direct victims.

Reparations usually come at the end of a long-drawn-out process of assigning blame and establishing lines of accountability. Moreover, reparations are not paid by one individual to another, but rather by the state held accountable for the past abuse to the community as a whole, even in instances where the beneficiaries may in fact be certain identifiable persons. In many cases, the question arises as to who takes the place of the original victim and is thus entitled to claims for reparation, and who precisely is responsible for paying and distributing the award. Transitional justice adopts the ‘political persecution’ principle, which allows those involved to differentiate between claims connected with past conflict for reparatory purposes, and those that are not. However, this is not always easily done. In the Philippines, for example, the monetary award granted to the victims of the Marcos regime has yet to be distributed because the identity of many of the claimants is under dispute.44 There is also a larger question as to whether the present administration, heavily backed by political and financial support from the Marcos heirs, has the political will to pursue the distribution of compensation awarded to nearly 10,000 identified recipients and prosecution of the graft cases that are pending to this day before Philippine courts.45

In addition to reparations, successor regimes often implement measures that are repressive in nature, although not exactly compensatory, as a way of returning stability to the state. These include DDR (demobilization, disarmament, and reintegration) mechanisms, often utilized (p. 1281) in areas where large parts of the population had become militarized. The Democratic Republic of Congo, Sierra Leone, and Liberia are just three instances where DDR was a critical part of the transition process and re-establishment of the rule of law.

In both reparations and DDR, constitutional questions of due process can be implicated, specifically with respect to groups that have previously been divided. Strong due process and equal protection guarantees would go far in the effort to accord these groups with similar rights and privileges as citizens of a common state and stakeholders in the common democratic enterprise. The identification and processing of claims, as well as the corresponding recognition of complicity in past abuse, calls for constitutional norms that protect the individual from pre-judgment, summary punishment and further alienation and that ensure the protections of a fair trial.

4. Institutional Reform and Non-Judicial Sanctions

Efforts to reform the state institutions that in the past have served as the instruments of repression do not generally present constitutional problems, as long as the reform complies with separation of powers arrangements. There is one area of reform that does raise constitutional problems in execution: the ‘vetting’ or disqualification of officials of state institutions known to have abused their powers in them to violate human rights. The constitutional problem is not so much in the decision itself of purging institutions of wrongdoers; in fact, it may be argued that international human rights law actually requires it among the measures to ensure non-repetition of atrocities. But the manner in which in which disqualification processes are conducted can indeed raise constitutional problems. Vetting or disqualification is in itself a sanction and therefore it cannot be applied without due process guarantees. It is not a criminal sanction and therefore it may not require the full-blown guarantees of fair trial associated with criminal punishment; but it is a serious action against employment and reputation of the targeted person. In that sense, vetting processes must incorporate some elements of due process before the decisions are arrived at. Persons to be separated from their official jobs must be given notice, an opportunity to be heard and to rebut accusations against them, and the ability to seek judicial review of the administrative decision.

At the end of the Cold War, many East European countries enacted ‘lustion’ laws that allowed the authorities to disqualify persons found to have collaborated with the Communist regimes of the recent past from serving in a variety of capacities. These laws went beyond institutional reform in that they were not only applied to former officials who had abused their authority in institutions, but also to citizens whose names appeared in records of intelligence services as having rendered some form of covert support to illegal surveillance and spying. It is not possible to generalize because the statutes in each country were different in some material aspects, but some of them would certainly have raised constitutional issues. In the first place, the activities that triggered the sanctions may well have been legal at the time when they were performed, so the sanction could offend the norm against ex post facto imposition of penalties, also known as the ‘principle of legality’ or nullum crimen sine lege. In addition, these sanctions were imposed by an administrative authority and not a judicial one, which raises an obvious separation-of-powers issue. In those cases where the law did not contemplate any form of notice, hearing, petition for review, or appeal to the courts, the process affects constitutional rights to due process of law. Indeed, the European Court of Human Rights has issued a number of judgments on lustration laws in post-Communist states. In multiple cases against Lithuania, the European Court found that the application of the KGB Act to former members of the KGB many years after they left that group should not be allowed to prevent them from accessing private sector employment because this would constitute a violation of their right to private life. This jurisprudence, along with a subsequent case against Latvia, underscores that lustration laws must be finely tuned in their scope and cannot endure indefinitely. Responsibilities for oppressive behavior may well be widely shared, but sanctions cannot be collective nor applied to categories of persons (such as all officials of a certain level, as done in Iraq post-Saddam Hussein). Punishment of any sort should only be personal and linked to specific behavior.

In contrast, laws that regulate access to files of the previous regime in an orderly and transparent manner are not only constitutional but actually necessary to fulfill the state’s obligation to investigate and disclose the truth. They are also an embodiment of the right of citizens—enshrined in human rights treaties and also in several modern constitutions—to have access to information contained in government files, especially if they affect them personally, but also as a general state obligation towards transparency and publicity of the acts of government. Some East European laws have actually established procedures by which individuals can correct wrong, false, or misleading information about themselves included in such files. In these cases, such measures are not only permissible on constitutional grounds but may actually be responsive to constitutional mandates to preserve honor and reputation of citizens, to guarantee their presumption of innocence, and to protect them from being the subject of sanctions without due process.

III. The Relation of International Standards Embodied in Transitional Justice to Constitutional Norms and Processes
What can be seen from much of the foregoing discussion is that international standards are the foundation for transitional justice. As they interact with the domestic processes of reparation, prosecution, institutional reform, and truth-telling, these international standards begin to inform the propriety of the efforts by the state in transition as against the yardstick of international law. Thus constitutions that embody such standards as a means of dealing with the aftermath of conflict are not only formative, but transformative as well.\(^52\) Transformative constitutions are founded upon a need to break with the past, and form a thick line between what was, and what will be. This stands in contrast to constitutions that, as Sunstein emphasizes, are more preservative of tradition; for transformative constitutions, the point is disassociation rather than continuation of norms.\(^53\)

(p. 1283) In fact, the impact of transitional justice initiatives on constitutional processes in countries that have made the transition from dictatorship to democracy is both ‘backward-looking and forward-looking, retrospective and prospective, continuous and discontinuous’.\(^54\) In Latin America, the process can be seen, at least in general, as an effort to restore constitutional precepts that were always part of the countries’ legal traditions, after a period in which they were trampled upon by military dictatorships or by autocratic leadership. In South Africa, the effort was more self-consciously transformative, because it was meant not only to redress past wrongs but also as ‘an enterprise of inducing large-scale social change through non-violent political processes grounded in law’.\(^55\) In spite of this initial difference, however, the constitutional processes influenced by transitional justice in both continents tend generally to adopt transformative features.

A constitution may be considered transformative both in process and in product. Engaging in a process of participatory constitutionalism involves ‘a conversation, conducted by all concerned, open to new entrants and issues, seeking a workable formula that will be sustainable rather than assuredly stable.’\(^56\) This type of constitutional process serves to bring in marginalized populations and to empower healing and reconciliation through dialogue aimed at forging a new consensus for the future.\(^57\)

The constitution produced through a participatory process may have two particularly transformative consequences. First, interpretation of constitutional norms will favor ones that uphold this dissociative intent. Judicial review will be exercised not against a backdrop of precedent, but against the desire to create new norms antithetical to what past practice may have been. Take, for example, section 39(1) of the new South African Constitution, which explicitly states that when considering interpretations of fundamental rights, courts ‘must consider international law’.\(^58\) This has resulted in several decisions by the Constitutional Court that have largely repudiated long-standing traditional practice.\(^59\) Many recent amendments to Latin American constitutions assign a special place to the international law of human rights, and that trend is directly related to the experiments with transitional justice, because most obstacles to justice, truth, reparations, and reform were removed with support from international standards embodied in human rights treaties and in decisions of international courts.

A second consequence of the dissociative character of transformative constitutions is found in the source of their legitimacy.\(^60\) Unlike preservative constitutions that anchor their legal legitimacy in the weight of previous practice and acceptance, transformative constitutions are founded in the socio-political wake of gross violations of human rights; for that reason, they affirm norms established during the period of reconstruction that immediately preceded their creation. If, during the transformative process, these norms have included affirmations of international law and standards on freedom, democracy, and the rule of law, the constitutions (p. 1284) subsequently formed will incorporate international human rights treaties, to the extent that they were critical to the transformation process.

Three general points can thus be made with respect to the manner through which international norms can mesh with the domestic processes of constitutional law. One is that the constitution becomes a codification of the standard itself, which contributes to the crystallization of norms at the international level. The development of customary norms of international law requires this evidence of state practice, and states that are willing to embrace international standards and ‘domesticate’ them within their constitutions because of the need for transitional justice end up—albeit often unconsciously—adding to the strength of human rights norms.

Another point is that international standards operate as a factor in subsequent judicial review of laws enacted pursuant to the constitution’s mandates. Constitutions that contain formulations of international standards easily lend themselves to constructions that incorporate the corpus of international law. Corollary to this is that even in constitutions that may not expressly provide for its incorporation, international law can nevertheless be utilized through statutory constructions informed by it. In Bosnia-Herzegovina, the Constitution commits the government to ensuring the ‘highest level of internationally recognized human rights and fundamental freedoms.’ Beyond this general reference to international human rights principles, the Constitution goes further and states that the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, as well as its protocols, applies in Bosnia-Herzegovina and has priority over all other law. Argentina’s new Constitution, enacted in 1994, provides that treaties have an elevated relationship to legislated provisions in the country’s legal hierarchy. The Constitution references a number of regional and international legal instruments including, inter alia, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights as well as the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights that explicitly acquire this constitutional hierarchy.

Lastly, the inclusion of international standards informs the state’s ‘constitutional journey’, thus becoming an integral part of how that legal regime builds itself in relation to its past and the standards it wishes to set for its agents in the future. South African jurists and commentators stress the deliberative and participatory nature of the approach to the dialogue and contestation through which new norms emerge in a democratic society. Trials and Truth Commissions in every country have been characterized by active, organized, and concerned participation by victims and independent organizations of civil society, and that attitude towards adjudication spill over into similar processes of intense public interest that are not necessarily legacies of a repressive past but important to the agenda of the newly democratic arrangements. States with constitutions that have strongly incorporated international standards based on transitional justices paradigms will find it harder to justify to both their citizens and the international community at large any future action departing from these norms and, especially, any attempt to ignore or cover up egregious abuses committed in the recent past.

Even if the ideal of social change was not explicitly contemplated in Latin American transitions, it is possible to state that where transitional justice has gone the farthest, the impetus towards a more open, tolerant, egalitarian society has also been the strongest. In the wake of trials and truth-telling, the young democracies have also produced impressive change in matters like privacy rights, institutions to protect citizens against discrimination, removal of censorship and broader freedoms of expression and association, greater transparency in government processes, and even same-sex marriage. Though perhaps without a deliberate plan—and perhaps in a non-linear, messy way—Latin Americans are engaging in the type of transformation described by Chief Justice Pius Langa, of the South African Constitutional Court:

Transformation is a permanent ideal, a way of looking at the world that creates a space in which dialogue and contestation are truly possible ... and in which change is unpredictable but the idea of change is constant.

As defined in the South African context, constitutional transformation is a long-term project of enactment, interpretation, and enforcement directed at achieving large-scale social change. A transformative constitution, then, is not concerned simply with the document itself and how it facilitates healing in the aftermath of atrocities, but also with how the provisions can be applied in a way that is responsive to emerging injustices. Thus, the constitution facilitates more than mere ‘transition’ in the sense that may be most intuitive to scholars of transitional justice. Instead it serves as the framework for the construction of ‘a new political, social, and economic order based on democratic values, social justice, and fundamental human rights.’

This understanding of the transformative capacity of constitutions may do much to further reconciliation between parties, perhaps more than transitional processes that lean more towards healing through truth-telling than towards judicial redress. In Latin America, there may have been more emphasis on criminal prosecutions, although truth-telling and reparations have also been central to the transitional justice agendas. Providing redress for those who have been victimized by violations is a necessary component of true reconciliation. It is certainly true that redress should come in comprehensive, integrated forms; but the absence of justice for egregious human rights violations will leave the job only half done. In this respect, a constitution should provide a structure that enables the victims, or the state acting on behalf of victims, to pursue justice. While the constitution need not explicitly spell out an obligation to prosecute, it should be sure not to pose barriers that obstruct the state from fulfilling its international obligations to bring perpetrators to justice.

IV. Conclusion

In the point of rupture between the old regime and the new, the embarkation upon constitutional and transitional justice processes provides an important milestone in a community's history. A redrawing of norms is taking place, and the idea is to engage in transforming the legal landscape in order to make it inhospitable to violations by the state and agents of fundamental human rights, both past and future. At the same time, the post-conflict constitutional process provides the perfect opportunity for a direct injection of international standards into the machineries of domestic law, and thus can contribute to the development and crystallization of important norms. While constitutional processes and norms will not provide the nuts and bolts for the fulfillment of obligations to punish, record, repair, and reform, they are nevertheless important components of it. This coincides with the commentary of Ruti Teitel, who suggests that transitional justice, as it solidifies into an important building block for democratic institution-building in the twenty-first century, will necessarily move towards a more nationally textualized approach.

The circumscription of judicial power, the delineation of due process, the provision of balancing tests between the rights of the accused and the accuser, and the inclusion of affected groups in the deliberative enterprise can provide touchstones for the transitional justice effort in a given state. On the flip side, transitional justice measures such as commissions and international bodies established to prosecute perpetrators of abuse are important paving stones for the constitutional process itself. Without these mechanisms, it would be difficult, if not impossible, for a community devastated by generations of conflict to build the capacities to take the complex steps towards nation-rebuilding and reconciliation.

Bibliography

Ruti Teitel, Transitional Justice (2000)

Notes:

(*) I gratefully acknowledge comments on an earlier draft by Prof Hermann Schwartz of the Washington College of Law, and an opportunity to present ongoing research on the matter afforded by the faculty of the same law school. I am also grateful for the research assistance of Kavita Kapur (JD Candidate, 2011) and Nayna Malayang (JD 2009, LLM, 2010) of the Washington College of Law.

(3) Agreement on Provisional Arrangements in Afghanistan in Pending the Re-establishment of Permanent Government Institutions (Bonn Agreement) (2001).
Constitutionalism and Transitional Justice

(4) Ibid IV.

(5) Ibid Annex II.

(8) The categorization of Afghanistan as a fully post-conflict state remains questionable as violence continues even at the time of writing. Nonetheless, the types of nationally and internationally facilitated processes of state-building under way in the region are the focus of this analysis. While continued instability complicates the success of these efforts at constructing a fresh legal framework, Afghanistan still provides an important example of how seeking justice for past abuses is integrally related to establishing constitutional rule of law.

Transitional justice is a response to systematic or widespread violations of human rights. It seeks recognition for victims and to promote possibilities for peace, reconciliation and democracy. Transitional justice is not a special form of justice but justice adapted to societies transforming themselves after a period of pervasive human rights abuse.

(15) UN Secretary-General (n 10), para 37.

(16) Ruti G. Teitel, Transitional Justice (2000), 196:

Constitution making ... often begins with a provisional constitution, predicated on the understanding of subsequent, more permanent constitutions. Despite prevailing notions of constitutional law as the most forward-looking and enduring of legal forms, transitional constitution making is frequently impermanent and involves gradual change.

(17) See Constitution of Argentina, Art 75(22).

(18) See eg Azapo and Others v President of the Republic of South Africa 1996 (4) SA 672 (CC).

(19) Such were the powers conferred on Argentina’s National Commission on Disappearance of Persons in 1983, and on the Chilean Truth and Reconciliation Commission in 1989.

(20) In Sierra Leone, the Truth Commission was prevented by the Special Court (both organs created under the UN-brokered peace process) from obtaining testimony from individuals facing prosecution. In a more extreme case, the Supreme Court of El Salvador refused to cooperate in any manner with the UN-sponsored Truth Commission, despite the commitment made to it by the state in signing the peace accords with the insurgents.

(21) The Truth and Reconciliation Commission created in Indonesia had similar powers, and in that case amnesty was not discretionary but automatic. The Supreme Court of Indonesia struck it down as unconstitutional because of the state’s obligation to investigate, prosecute, and punish international crimes.
(22) Promotion of National Unity and Reconciliation Act 34 of 1995. In addition, the statute contained objective criteria on how the indemnity panel was to exercise its discretion. The question whether those criteria complied with international standards has been debated. See John Dugard, ‘Reconciliation and Justice: The South African Experience’ (1998) 8 Transnational Law and Contemporary Problems 217; Juan E. Mendez and Garth Meinjes, ‘Reconciling Amnesties with Universal Jurisdiction’ (2000) 2 International Law Forum 2 (agreeing in principle with Dugard but arguing that, ‘as applied’, some decisions to grant amnesty violated South Africa’s international obligations). It may well be that in 1994 the TRC Statute complied with international standards; today it may not, since international law has developed rapidly in this area, especially after the promulgation in 1998 of the Rome Statute for an International Criminal Court (UN Doc A/Conf.183/9, 1998).

(23) Despite this clear difference between truth-seeking and prosecution, the issue of constitutionality of non-prosecutorial inquiries has also been raised in the context of a hearing at the US Congress on the need for a commission of inquiry about allegations of arbitrary detention and torture in the so-called ‘global war on terror’. David Rivkind, a former official in the George W. Bush Administration, argued that a commission of inquiry would violate the due process rights of officials who could potentially be defendants in criminal prosecution under the same set of facts. He did not, however, call for prosecutions.

(24) Zalaquett (n 12).

(25) An example of this is the dismissal, in the waning days of the dictatorship, of charges by an Argentine military court to benefit Navy Lt Alfredo Astiz for the death of Swedish teenager Dagmar Hagelin. The Supreme Court eventually declared that dismissal void and therefore not an obstacle to Astiz’s prosecution in ordinary courts.

(26) Rome Statute, Art 17(2)(a).

(27) ‘The Judgment Against Fujimori for Human Rights Violations’ (2010) 25 American University International Law Review 657, 697 (partial transcript translated by Aimee Sullivan). The second law simply said that the previous one was unreviewable by courts and had been prompted by the decision of a judge to go on investigating the La Cantuta disappearances.

(28) In re Nibia Sabalsagaray (2009). In October 2010 the Supreme Court ratified this decision.

(29) Simón, Julio Héctor y otros s/ privación ilegítima de la libertad, Case S 1767 XXXVIII (14 June 2005).

(32) Riveros (2006). President Menem’s pardon of General Santiago Omar Riveros was issued pre-trial, while General Jorge R. Videla and other Junta members were pardoned for crimes for which they had been convicted in 1986. They are again facing prosecution, Videla for crimes other than those for which he was originally convicted.

(33) In La Rochela v Colombia, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights hinted, in dicta, to this requirement of proportionality but left open the question of whether, as applied, a law offering reduced sentences to paramilitary groups in exchange for demobilization and confessions was consistent with the American Convention on Human Rights. On proportionality, see further Chapters 33 and 34.

(34) Reports 28 (Argentina) and 29 (Uruguay) of the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights, 1992; and Inter-American Court decisions in Velasquez-Rodriguez v Honduras, 1988 (on the affirmative duty to investigate, prosecute, and punish crimes against humanity); Barrios Altos v Peru, 2000 (on the invalidity of amnesties with this effect).

(35) Almonacid-Arellano, 2006

Constitutionalism and Transitional Justice

(38) Korbely v Hungary, ECtHR App no 9174/02, 19 September 2008.

(39) Kononov v Latvia, ECtHR App no 36376/04, 17 May 2010.

(40) Rome Statute, Art 7.

(41) Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and relating to the Protection of Victims of Non-International Armed Conflicts (Protocol II) (1977), Art 6(5).

(46) Joinet Principles (n 36), 40–2.

(47) De Greiff and Mayer-Riekh (n 13).

(49) For different approaches in Germany, Bulgaria, and the Czech Republic, see the essays by Joachim Gauck, Dimitrina Petrova, and Karel Schwarzenberg respectively in Alex Boraine, Janet Levy, and Ronel Scheffer (eds), Dealing with the Past (1994). For a more extreme form of lustration in latter-day Poland, see Adam Michnik, ‘The Polish Witch-Hunt’ in (2007) New York Review of Books.

(50) Sidabras and Džiautas v Lithuania, ECtHR, App nos 55480/00 and 59330/00, 27 July 2004; Rainys and Gasparavičius v Lithuania, ECtHR App nos 70665/01 and 74345/01, 7 April 2005.

(51) Ždanoka v Latvia, ECtHR App no 58278/00, 16 March 2006 (Grand Chamber).

(54) Teitel (n 16).

(55) Klare (n 52).

(57) Ibid.

(59) The outstanding example would be the case of State v Makwanyane, 1995 (3) SALR 391 (CC), the Constitutional Court struck down the use of the death penalty as a viable punishment, despite the use of it prior to the assumption of the ANC and the still overwhelming evidence of public support for it under the circumstances.

(61) Constitution of Bosnia-Herzegovina, Art II(1), General Framework for Agreement for Peace in Bosnia and

(62) Ibid Art II(2).

(63) Constitucion de la Nacion Argentina, Art 75(22).

(64) Albie Sachs, Justice of the Constitutional Court, in his vote in Minister of Health NO v New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd (Treatment Action Campaign as amicus curiae).

(67) Ibid 27.

Given tensions present in the administration of transitional justice in its second phase, the principles of justice associated with [the previous phase] were increasingly questioned. ... Accordingly, the move away from judgment associated with international justice reflected a shift in the understanding of transitional justice, which became associated with the more complex and diverse political conditions of nation-building.

Juan E. Méndez
Juan E. Méndez is Visiting Professor, Washington College of Law and UN Special Rapporteur on Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment
Abstract and Keywords

Amidst a planet-wide array of crises, three are central: the AfPak arc, which includes Pakistan, Afghanistan, India (and the surrounding countries in Central Asia as well as Iran); the Iranian Revolution (which, in addition to Pakistan and Afghanistan, impacts directly on Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States, and the so-called Shi'i crescent, comprising Iraq, Syria under the Alawis, a small Shi'i sect, and Lebanon); and Israel, with its own crisis radiating across the Middle East and beyond. In all these arcs of crisis, Islam as religion-civilization is vying to define an alternative constitutional order. In this complex framework of three persistent arcs of crisis, the fracture occasioned in the constitutional ordering of the world can be approached through a dual prism. One is international: depending on where the analyst positions herself, the matter is of an Islamic universal call for domination, or one of self-defence. The other is internal, and challenges the constitutional order within the nation-state in its Westphalian characteristics as best summarized by Max Weber: the state’s exclusive right to use force over a given territory. Both international and national perspectives dovetail significantly in the modern world of constitutionalism. This article provides international perspectives on Islam and the constitutional order, and then offers an appreciation of Islam within a primarily domestic constitutional set-up.

Keywords: Islam, constitutional order, Pakistan, Afghanistan, India, Iranian Revolution, Israel

I. The Setting: Three Arcs of Crisis

II. International Perspectives
   1. The Personal Logic of Islamic/Middle Eastern Law 1291
   2. ‘The Shi‘i International’ 1293
   3. Sunni Internationalism 1295

III. Domestic Perspectives
   1. Constitution and Symbols 1298
   2. Islam in Constitutional Courts 1298
   3. The Personal Logic of Middle Eastern Law, Again 1300

IV. Epilogue: Emerging Hopes

I. The Setting: Three Arcs of Crisis

With nominal Muslims second in the world in number to nominal Christians, Islam matters as a constant mirroring image of the West in recorded history, originally across the Mediterranean, and now increasingly worldwide.

In the words of French historian Lucien Febvre, Islam ‘created’ Europe by splitting what was until then a united Mediterranean world. Building on a remark by his colleague Marc Bloch about ‘the birth of Europe when the Roman Empire died’, Febvre showed how the rise of Europe could not be understood without the irremediable ‘loss’ of half of the Mediterranean to the (p. 1288) Muslim conquests starting in the seventh century CE. 2 The success of Arab-Muslim conquests in the eighth century established a southern European frontier that did not previously exist, with lasting inroads in Spain, Sicily, and the Balkans and counter-offensives illustrated in the ebb and flow of crusades over the following centuries. 3 From this perspective, the crime against humanity committed in September 2001 in New York, similar massacres in London and Madrid, 4 and the subsequent Western wars in Iraq and Afghanistan, are the latest epiphenomena of a ‘longue durée’ perspective in a millennium-long antagonism in which ‘Islam and Europe’, then ‘Islam and the West’, have been the two main poles. 5

While less well recorded, the conflict also operated on the farther Eastern side of Muslim conquests, where the contemporary prolongations of an equally millennial unrest loom large: from the main socio-political fracture of India, to long-standing rebellions in southern Thailand, to a Malay-Indonesian Muslim archipelago in which Indonesia stands as the most populous country in the Muslim world, to the Uighur rebellion in China, the constitutional order of key Asian countries is challenged by the rise of political Islam. While the battle has not disrupted the established post-colonial order in these countries in the dramatic way that shook up Iran in 1978–79, the challenge is structural and long-standing. Mutatis mutandis, this is true at the southern frontier of the Muslim world in Africa, where, from the Sudan to Senegal, a battle of religions seems to be developing chiefly between the Muslim and Christian Gebiet. 6 Other fracture lines are taking place around Muslim immigrant communities in Europe and the Christian West at large. 7 A zeitgeist has been steadily developing over the past four decades, displacing the world division from socialism versus capitalism, poverty versus wealth, and classic nationalistic disputes in favor of religiously defined dichotomies. The late (p. 1289) Samuel Huntington put it in the most eloquent terms as a clash between world civilizations. 8 In fact, rather than Confucianism or any of the five or six other religions/civilizations he identified, the concern has since been almost exclusively fixated upon Islam: in China, the United States, Russia, the Middle East, Central Asia, India, and Africa, the clash has Islam as a religion/civilization at its center.

Considering the immense span of time and space, an order of priorities is needed for analytical purposes. Between the Eastern and Western frontiers of Islam, the constitutional order is under assault over an almost continuous territorial stretch of the planet from Morocco to Indonesia. In addition to the various challenges on a national level, three largely unsettled arcs of crises emerge, one of which is now over half a century old, the second over one-third of a century old, with the last arc of crisis having persisted now for over a century. The first arc runs from Iran to India, from the brutal partition of Pakistan from India in 1947–48, to the secession of Bangladesh from Pakistan in 1971, through Afghanistan's occupations and wars, where the violent crises have gone uninterrupted since 1978–79. 9 The Central Asian republics, and the Russian Muslim-majority areas of the Caucasus are intermittently but durably affected, but the heart of the crisis consists of the so-called AfPak complex, 10 with inevitable extensions to India and Iran. 11

Iran, which is also part of that AfPak constellation, is at the center of the second arc of crisis. Since 1979, political Islam's aggiornamento has been carried first and foremost by the Islamic Republic of Iran. The Iranian Constitution bears some of this hallmark, by considering the country to be responsible for the cause of Muslims worldwide. 12 In practice, the matter is more nuanced, and a cyclical ebb and flow of militant Islam shows decade-long shifts between (p. 1290) aggressive, strident militancy, and the longing for a less exuberant and revolutionary foreign policy. Between 1979, when the Revolution toppled the Shah, and 1989, when Khamenei died, Iran lay at the heart of a turmoil characterized by an eight-year-long devastating war with Iraq. In the next decade, until 2005, the Islamic Republic turned far more moderate in its international activities, and the presidency of Mohammad Khatami succeeded in keeping the country shielded from the surrounding violence and international isolation. Since the accession to the presidency of Mahmoud Ahmadinejad in 2005, the cycle is back to militant, outreaching politics, including immense repression at home after the rigged presidential elections of summer 2009. With revolutionary Islam in Iran seeking regional leadership by way of a foothold in the Mediterranean, and finding it in the Palestinian (Hamas) and Lebanese (Hizbullah) similarly motivated Islamic constituencies, the 1979 Islamic Revolution meshed with the third and most enduring arc of crisis, the one represented by the Israeli–Palestinian conflict.

It is in Israel–Palestine that the deepest running violent conflict in modern history continues to threaten world order. In the Middle East, the Israel–Palestine arc of crisis is over a hundred years old. There, colonization has left its heaviest mark since Zionist settlers adopted the European-style constitutional yearning in the late nineteenth century, and created in 1948 a Jewish nation-state in a Palestine where the large majority of the inhabitants were Several narratives compete for the depiction of the Israel-centered crisis: in Zionist lore, it is a return home for the Jewish diaspora after two millennia of forced exile, and an ingathering for the Jews of the world under aliyah (lit: elevation, ascent). For the Palestinians, it is a nakba, a catastrophe of massive displacement from their homes by an alien colonizer. Beyond the hard to reconcile narratives, the enduring Israel–Palestine crisis varies from its depiction as a hundred-year-long civil war to the continuation of the Western crusades in a Jewish form.

For the purposes of this chapter, this arc of crisis elicits a sectarian logic that essentially pits two communities, Jewish and Muslim, against each other, both claiming a territory which each considers its own exclusively as a matter of right.

To sum up: Amidst a planet-wide array of crises, three are central: the AfPak arc, which includes Pakistan, Afghanistan, India (and the surrounding countries in Central Asia as well as Iran); the Iranian Revolution (which, in addition to Pakistan and Afghanistan, impacts directly on Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States, and the so-called Shi'i crescent, comprising Iraq, Syria under the ‘Alawis, a small Shi'i sect, and Lebanon); and Israel, with its own crisis radiating across the Middle East and beyond. In all these arcs of crisis, Islam as religion-civilization is vying to define an alternative constitutional order.

In this complex framework of three persistent arcs of crisis, the fracture occasioned in the constitutional ordering of the world can be approached through a dual prism. One is international: depending on where the analyst positions herself, the matter is of an Islamic universal call for domination, or one of self-defense. The other is internal, and challenges the constitutional order within the nation-state in its Westphalian characteristics as best summarized by Max Weber: the state’s exclusive right to use force over a given territory.14

(p. 1291) Both international and national perspectives dovetail significantly in the modern world of constitutionalism. Section II provides international perspectives on Islam and the constitutional order. Section III offers an appreciation of Islam within a primarily domestic constitutional set-up.

II. International Perspectives

1. The Personal Logic of Islamic/Middle Eastern Law

Classical Islamic law had far less to say about the constitutional order than about war as a collective aspect of mobilization when society or religion are endangered. One testimony among many is Ahmad ‘Isa ‘Ashur’s, a middle-of-the-road proselytizer in Egypt from the Muslim Brotherhood, who describes jihad (just war) as ‘the fight against unbelievers for the victory of Islam and the defense of the nation’.15 In this popular primer on Islamic law, originally published c. 1972, he repeats the basics of jihad in classical law: just war is considered a necessary duty incumbent on all Muslims when in defense of their territory, and an individual duty for all free male Muslims at least once a year.16

The issue of war underlines a paradox. On the one hand, Islam is an eminently personal law. A Muslim is bound by Islamic law wherever he or she finds himself or herself. Yet Islam does not cover the entire planet, and classical jurists divided the world into ‘war’ or jihad territory (dar al-jihad), and ‘Muslim’ or ‘peace’ territory (dar al-islam, or dar al-silm). Personal rules could not therefore always prevail, and a mixed set of legal rules developed around the concept of religious communities/sects, together with regulations affecting Muslims who found themselves in alien/enemy territory, as well as non-Muslims in Islamic territory. The latter rules were easier to implement, naturally, and a fully sectarian system ensued: Christians, Jews, and other tolerated minorities could live and work under Islamic rule, but they were not considered equals in rights or duties to their Muslim compatriots. A whole array of discriminatory practices was developed to ensure that their subaltern role would be consecrated, especially in peace time through the payment of a special poll tax called jizya. In a thorough examination of jizya practices in the Geniza archives, Samuel Goltein persuasively undermined the received notion that the tax was benign.17

On the other side of the accommodation to the reality that Islam had to contend with land it did not control, jurists had far less to say. Muslims were expected to carry on their normal duties, to the extent possible, in the so-called ‘territory of compromise’ (dar al-sulh).18 (p. 1292) ‘Compromise’ was needed in enemy territory when it was not at war with Islam, and forms of reciprocity were engineered by the jurists. A complicated picture remains in a long and complex history. Capitulations (treaties originally meant to secure the religious integrity of Muslims in foreign land against a reciprocal rule for non-Muslim foreigners in Muslim land) developed over time as leonine extraterritorial arrangements that worked only in one direction—namely to protect Westerners from the reach of local law. Regardless, capitulations provide a strong illustration of the logic of personal versus territorial law. As definers of the peace in between wars, a more careful examination of their operation over the centuries shows the powerful and elusive logic of the personal versus territorial dimension of international relations in a world chiefly defined through the prism of religion. Religion as the political marker of a group or a community is not circumscribed to a region or a country in human history. In the contemporary world, however, it is chiefly Middle Eastern.
Islam and the Constitutional Order

This characteristic of a dominant religious definition of individuality, known also as sectarian, confessional, communal, or communitarian, may be as old as the Middle East.19 The scheme operates internationally and domestically. The domestic dimension, the more disturbing one in terms of the constitutional order, is addressed more fully below. The international dimension is more elusive, but its importance has increased in recent years with the planet-wide violence associated with the late twentieth century rise of Islamic militancy.

Nor are communities straddling several states a novelty to constitutionalism. The actions and perceptions of say, German communities in mid-twentieth century Mitteleuropa, were a major factor in the instability that led to the Second World War, and the Basque community straddling France and Spain remains a lingering issue of concern, as does the Protestant-Catholic divide in Ireland or the Balkan mosaic. In the Middle East, injustice towards the Kurds in the division of their land in between five countries is probably the most conspicuous example of the disjunction between community and nation-state.

Within the world of Islam, the logic of sectarianism is also pervasive. The large divide between Sunnism and Shi'ism partakes of the same border-related unease, but operates sui generis for the constitutional order. Shi'is are the second largest Muslim community, with estimates at 10 to 15 percent of the Muslim population, against over 80 percent Sunnis. This divide is probably the most important within the logic of religious sectarianism which has slowly engulfed the Muslim world since the Iranian Revolution in 1979. Sunnism is associated with orthodoxy, and Shi'ism represents the main religious schism in the history of Islam, akin to Catholicism and Protestantism in the Christian Church, with the followers of Shi'ism giving a special status to ‘Ali, the Prophet's cousin and son-in-law, and to the descendants of ‘Ali and Fatima, the Prophet's daughter. The divide did not stop there, and subdivisions in various countries became sharper with the presence of smaller sects. The majority of Shi'is follow 12 descendants of the Prophet starting with ‘Ali, and are therefore known as ‘Twelvers, ithna `asharis’. Smaller Shi'i sects are the Zaydis in the Yemen, who acknowledge seven such descendants, while Isma'illis, known in India as Bohras, stop at five. Smaller Muslim sects include the Druzes in the Levant, and of more recent divide, Babis and Baha'is, whose eponyms date from nineteenth-century Persia. Amongst the Sunnis, the most internationally active sect is constituted by the Wahhabis, whose eponym promoted a purist version of Islam in eighteenth-century Arabia, and whose followers are closely associated with modern Saudi rule.

Unlike national/ethnic groups, the response of the respective Sunni and Shi'i communities and their numerous offshoots to nation-state boundaries is specific in two ways. In the first place, there has been by and large no attempt to redraw the boundaries of nation-states along a Sunni-Shi'i configuration. This means that Sunnis or Shi'i leaders or communities at large, even when they assert their identities as Sunni or Shi'i, have never requested the division of their countries along such lines. This does not mean that ethnic cleansing has not taken place where the fault lines have operated historically; indeed, the formation of modern Iran is premised on large-scale ethnic cleansing of non-Shi'is by the dominant Shi'i power since the Safavid dynasty took over Persia at the beginning of the sixteenth century and established Shi'ism as the official, and therefore exclusive, state religion/sect.20 In that perspective, ethnic cleansing was a de facto, as opposed to a de jure, response to the uneasy coexistence between Muslim communities.

A different phenomenon developed de jure, which is more easily identifiable for Shi'is than for Sunnis on the constitutional plane. The transnational legal structure of the two communities is a distinctive aspect of the Sunni-Shi'i divide. Let us consider the allure of their respective internationalism in turn.

2. ‘The Shi'i International’

Shi'i projections beyond the nation-state I have called ‘the Shi'i International’.21 Although occasionally displaced by Qum in Iran, the Shi'i international's epicenter was Najaf, in Iraq, the oldest place of learning in the Shi'i world. Its characteristic trait is the educational dimension in which it has developed, and the transnational legal structure under which it operates.

At the origins of the Shi'i international is a complex historical development. Shi'i law saw in the early modern period a battle between two schools of thought. One was literalist, the Akhbari school, the other, the Usuli school, was contextualist. Usulis prevailed in the late eighteenth century, and this meant that the jurists became a necessary intermediary between God and people. Shi'i as people are divided in two categories, that of the normal, individual Shi'i, and the scholar. Individuals are muqallids, imitators or followers, of the learned class of ayatollahs who are mujtahids, the Shi'i scholars who are legal experts and exponents of the law.

The divide bears significant consequences in the modern world: traditionally, the individual as ‘follower’ had a personal relation to the scholar he chose to imitate, and the system was fluid. Followers would support a particular scholar, but the relationship was not codified, nor was it coercive. A follower may choose whomever he or she wished to emulate, and much of the shape and intensity that emulation could take. Most important was the personal devotion in the form of questions and answers to the scholar on points of law, more often than not of a ritual nature—for example, how does one perform the fast when traveling? How are ablutions to be carried out before prayer when water is scarce?

Of importance also was the financial support contributed by the follower directly to the scholar, or to an institution or a charity that the scholar preferred, which included or augmented the tax owed as ‘the share of the Imam’ (sahm al-imam) whom the scholar represented on earth. The top scholars, who reach the summit of the learned pyramid by a combination of peer recognition and the importance of their pool of followers across the world for the quality (p. 1294) of their legal standing, tend to be preoccupied with arcane fields of Islamic legal theory. They do not have the means to enforce decisions or legal choices they make, and they cannot use the state to coerce tax out of the public. The system has one main characteristic, which prevails to date: it is completely voluntary. This phenomenon attests to the special type of civil society where the public creates, outside the realm of the state, autonomous spaces for a whole array of meaningful social relations. The main characteristic of that operation appears in the lack of coercive violence, constituting forms of democratic participation at work in the Shi'i community.

Also characteristic is the international dimension of the system. As a Shi'i from Lebanon, or Pakistan, or India, the follower is part of a personal law-based community that does not know state boundaries, and it was and remains common for him or her to follow a scholar from Qum or Najaf. The individual Shi'i, male or female, can choose the scholar they prefer, and they generally do not limit themselves to their local religious leader. Many Lebanese and Iranian Shi'is follow Sayyed ‘Ali al-Sistani, the top scholar in Najaf, Iraq. With the ease of communication and the rise of religious fervor, the international phenomenon has become important in the modern world.

With that prevalence come a number of tensions. The most obvious is the disjunction between the nation-state and the Shi'i international. The choice of the most important scholars by their followers operates across the borders, with Najaf and Qum scholars at the heart of the international system. The more renowned scholars stand out by sheer reputation within a given college where they congregated in both cities. Since their direct involvement in the political world in the Iranian Revolution of 1978–79, and their recognition as ‘leaders’ by the Iranian Constitution, no less, the picture has become more complicated. Two poles have emerged since 2003, when Iraq was freed from single-party sectarian dictatorship. In Iran, the top scholars, and since a constitutional amendment of 1989, one top scholar, are chosen by an assembly of peers (called the Assembly of Experts): Ruhullah al-Khumaini between 1980 and 1989, ‘Ali Khameini’s since. In Iraq, the prominence of Najaf is not constitutionally noted, save for a passing reference on the need to preserve the autonomy of the religious places from state encroachment. The top scholars keep their traditional appellation of marja’, plural maraje’, literally ‘reference’. In Najaf, there were four recognized maraje’ in 2011: ‘Ali al-Sistani, who is generally considered primus inter pares, Muhammad Sa’id al-Hakim, Bashir al-Najafi, and the Afghani-born Ishaq al-Fayyad.

Shi'i scholars, in turn, act through a large number of channels, least obvious amongst them the unique network of intermarriage amongst the most famous scholars’ families and the prominent families of merchants and landowners. Other channels consist of ‘representatives’, wakils, who speak in the name of the important maraje’. Since the 1990s, offices of leading maraje’ are openly transnational, and the Khu’i Foundation, for instance, has retained beyond the death of Abul Qasem al-Khu’i in 1992 an educational operation ranging far and wide, including London and New York. With the politicization of Islam since the Iranian Revolution, the channels dovetail with the foreign policy of Shi’i Iran, less so in the case of Iraq after the fall of Saddam Hussein because of the particular set of circumstances in which the Shi’i majority overhauled the domination of the former sectarian Sunni government. While the weight of transnational Shi’ism radiating from Iraq has steadily grown in 2003, it never had the assurance or the stridency of its Iranian counterpart.
Islam and the Constitutional Order

The case of the Shi’i international is peculiar in terms of the working of the law. It is not that transnational channels were adopted in a codified shape, for there is no recognition by international law of this specific format of civil society articulated around the scholars. Unlike other aspects of the internationalization of civil society like the human rights movement, the Shi’i International is reflected de jure merely in the domestic sphere, and so far exclusively in Iran. The most famous instance of this reflection was made by Ruhollah al-Khumaini in his pamphlet, written during his long Najaf exile, as a treatise on ‘Islamic government’, also known as ‘the rule of the jurist’. While constitutions continue to be coextensive with domestic law, albeit religious law, legal developments within countries that have a sizeable Shi’i population can hardly be understood outside the reality of the Shi’i International. The power and appeal of the top scholar is never limited to the nation-state in which he lives.

3. Sunni Internationalism

Altogether different is Sunni internationalism. The differences with Shi’ism are structural, and can be summed up in a number of characteristics. Sunnis constitute a massively majoritarian community in the Muslim world, and the international dimension of Sunnism has tended to function in a very different way from that of the Shi’i minority. In countries with a Sunni majority, Muslim constituencies tend to adhere to the nation-state as such, and conduct their policies within their boundaries. When ‘exported’, Sunnism has been closely associated with Egypt and Saudi Arabia, respectively the largest in population and the richest in oil amongst the Arab states. The scholars in Egypt or Saudi Arabia have always been very much part of the fabric of government in their countries, and they rarely act without the blessing or tolerance of their respective governments in Cairo and Riyadh. The international expression of violence carried out by mostly Saudi nationals in September 2001 was shorn of any scholarly blessing. Although it set a worldwide trend that has turned into a self-fulfilling Sunni International (p. 1296) called al-Qa’eda, the legal parameters in which it takes place are profoundly different from the tight structure of the scholar-led Shi’i International.

Sunnis internationalism took various forms initially, none particularly violent or over-militant. In the same way as clusters of countries came together under forms of regional organizations, countries with a sizeable number of Muslim inhabitants formed the Organization of Islamic Conference (OIC), which had grown since inception in Morocco in 1969 to 57 member states in 2010. Few tangible effects resulted, and the OIC remains a parleying forum with even less influence than other similarly ineffective institutions like the League of Arab States. More effective forms of internationalism were mass political movements like the Muslim Brotherhood and its Pakistani correspondents, most prominently the Jama’at-i Islami. By and large, these movements were non-violent on the international scene, and shared nonviolence with wide membership organizations where the political dimension of Islam was significantly muted, like the various Sufi orders. Unlike Sufism, the Muslim Brotherhood contributed an important set of leaders who shared a committed political world-view and developed transnational networks of various importance in the formation of governments and in mass predication. Abu ‘Ala’ al-Mawdudi in Pakistan, Hasan Banna and Sayyed Qutb in Egypt, later Yusuf al-Qaradawi, turned into household names with large followings and occasional success in government.

Before the spectacular espousal of violence by al-Qa’eda, forms of Sunni internationalism challenging the domestic constitutional order in various countries were muted by the closeness between national Sunni scholars and the government, which invariably pays scholars’ salaries as civil servants and supports their institutions. In Rabat, Tunis, Cairo, Damascus, Riyadh, Islamabad, Jakarta, and other major capitals, Sunni scholars have long been enmeshed with the governing elites. Armed rebellion which developed in all these countries was generally the expression of disenfranchised Muslims in the poorer strata of society, and scholars who spoke for them belonged to the lower rungs of the Islamic legal establishment. When the process of internationalism was afoot, it only rarely operated outside the purview of the ruling government. Saudi Arabia is a case in point, where petrodollars were used massively to build mosques and support networks of Wahhabis—a small schism in eighteenth-century Islam which would have remained insignificant without the staggering flow of money to the Saudi state coffers since the 1950s. Such networks could occasionally slip into unruly challenges to local governments. On the whole, conservative governments avoided supporting firebrand Muslim leadership in the rest of the world, in large part for fear of boomerang effects.

But boomerang effect there was, and we have in the Jordanian-born Abu Mus‘ab al-Zarqawi an important illustration of the new scope of the Sunni International when it turned violent, and a theory that supports its legal and political mode of thinking.

The Zarqawi phenomenon is illustrative of Sunni internationalism in two ways. First is the significance of Zarqawi’s representativeness in the elusive network building around al-Qa‘eda. The second is the legal underpinnings as articulated in a message from Zarqawi to ben Laden.36

Until his violent death on 7 June 2006 in Baghdad, Jordanian-born Zarqawi, who had been arrested and jailed for a long period in Amman, was the most prominent leader of Sunni international militancy in Iraq. He embodies ruthless forms of violence, culminating in civil war and ethnic cleansing on an unprecedented scale in a modern Iraqi history where the amount of brutality is considerable already. Fanned by an increasingly violent US occupation, including torture in the jails of Abu Ghreib by members of the US military, Zarqawi’s vindictiveness against the new order was immense. Much violence was predictable, considering the ways Sunni militants hiding on the northern side of the Iran–Iraq border at the outset of the war were pulverized in the first days of the war by a relentless bombing that went by and large unnoticed. Anti-Americanism, therefore, was well established in Zarqawi’s circles, and had been fuelled in his own case by a long period in jail in Jordan, America’s ally in the region. Those two traits—deep antagonism towards the West that considers all its behavior as a mere extension of the crusades, and hatred and violence against local governments—fuse in the persona of Zarqawi the basics of the challenge to the prevailing order in the Middle East and beyond.

The legal justifications that this internationalism adopts are the more intriguing aspects of the world-view of Zarqawi and his group. By 2003, he had developed close links with Osama ben Laden, and was the anointed leader of al-Qa‘eda in Iraq, in Arabic al-qa‘ida fi bilad al-rafi‘ayn (the land of the two rivers). The carrier of a message allegedly sent to ben Laden from Zarqawi was arrested in Iraq in January 2004. The long missive he was transmitting reads as a textbook for militant Sunni internationalism world-view. It carried a strong anti-Shi‘i sectarian message, and it called for a policy of extreme ethnic cleansing and the burning to the ground of any opposition to the establishment of an Islamic state ill-defined, except for being strictly ‘ruled by Islamic law’.

Even in the case of the Afghanistan and the ‘Afghans Arab mujahidin’, an important expression of the Sunni International, it may be useful to keep in mind that the master executioner of the US–Saudi combined anti-Soviet armed policy was none other than the much decried Osama ben Laden. Sometime in the mid-1990s, when his usefulness was spent, all US and Saudi government contacts with him were severed, resulting in a suddenly disenfranchised leader who turned his anger against both governments with a vengeance. In his major biographies,37 the contrast surfaces occasionally between a once-adulated anti-Soviet freedom fighter (p. 1298) who was organizing Saudi recruits in a register (qa‘eda), and his overnight abandonment by those who had raised him to the pinnacle. One question deserves a more thorough answer than the current overview allows: would there have been a ben Laden or a Zarqawi in the first place if their respective Saudi and Jordanian governments had been even minimally democratic, and allowed them a political voice in their respective societies?

Sunni internationalism should therefore be studied from the viewpoint of domestic actors who ‘go international’, without losing sight of the domestic legitimacy of their nemesis, the rulers of the countries to which they belonged. This is equally true of the Shi‘i International. In Khumaini’s founding book of 1970, the transnational perspective is all but absent. Even in the later iterations of the Islamic Republic, the attempt to seize power, mostly in Iraq and Lebanon where the largest relative presence of Shi‘is is found, was never premised on the Shi‘i International as such. The domestic-international dialectic is complex, but the prevailing term in the constitutional order is domestic.

III. Domestic Perspectives

1. Constitution and Symbols
Domestically, the patterns of challenge to, and interaction with, the constitutional order are less elusive than their international counterparts. One way to approach the constitutional order within is to apply a modified Kelsenian pyramid.

At the top of the pyramid stands the official name of the country concerned, the flag adopted, and the explicit reference to Islam or Islamic law in the constitution. There are a large variety of appellations (eg Republic of Indonesia, State of Qatar, Kingdom of Morocco). Most Muslim countries do not refer to Islam in their title. Jordan and Saudi Arabia's names refer to their ruling families. Only Pakistan, Iran, Mauritania, and Afghanistan are officially ‘Islamic republics’. The green color, which is considered in the modern world as the color of Islam, has been adopted by a number of Muslim states on their flags, and both Saudi Arabia and Iraq have adorned it with founding Islamic phrases—‘There is no God but God, and Muhammad is his Prophet’, in the case of Saudi Arabia, and ‘God is Great’, in Iraq, while Iran includes the name of God, in Arabic, in an elaborate calligraphy.

However powerful socially, symbols and titles remain of limited institutional importance. What matters is the logic they force on the constitutional system. In a country like Afghanistan under the Talibain, or Saudi Arabia under the house of Saud, foreigners are equated with non-Muslims, and Shi‘is equally unwelcome. The logic of religion morphs quickly into a logic of sectarianism, which is by nature exclusive of citizens who happen to belong to the wrong sect—Christians and Jews in many Middle Eastern countries, Christians and Muslims in Israel, Shi‘is in the Sunni-dominated system under Saddam Hussein, and Sunnis in the ‘Alawi (a small branch of Shi‘ism)/Asad-dominated Syria. The sectarian logic can be excessive—such as the destruction of other symbols like the Buddha statues of Afghanistan, the systematic wasting of non-Hanbali symbols in Saudi Arabia; and in the full course of 60 years since the emergence of the State of Israel, the literal bulldozing of Arab qua non-Jewish villages and orchards in Palestine.

2. Islam in Constitutional Courts

The picture is not invariably that excessive, and the roads to the incorporation of religious tenets within the system can take more felicitous, more circuitous, and less exclusive shape. (p. 1299) Within the constitutional texts emphasizing Islam, important points of contention pit a now familiar controversy which initially jelled in Egypt's amendment of its 1971 Constitution. To assuage activist Muslims at a time when such associations were perceived to bolster his position against challenges from the more secular left, then president Anwar Sadat introduced in 1980 an amendment to Article 2 of the Constitution to read: ‘The principal source of legislation is Islamic law.’ Previously, Islamic law was mentioned as ‘a’, and not ‘the’ principal source of legislation. This coincided with the rise of the Egyptian Supreme Constitutional Court, which was tasked with interpreting legislation in accordance with the Constitution. Inevitably, the Supreme Constitutional Court would have to consider whether legislation stood in conformity with Islamic law. Its subtlety and hard work in this regard were impressive.

First, Egypt, like Pakistan when it came to its financial legislative edifice, parsed the Islamic supremacy clause in a way that did not eventually blow the received system asunder. When the argument that Islamic law did not comport with the Islamic prohibition of interest risked destroying key provisions for debtors in the Egyptian Civil Code, the Court decided that Article 2 would not apply retrospectively to every single piece of legislation that Egypt passed in the twentieth century. The article would apply merely prospectively, said the Court. And when the Court saw it appropriate to apply the clause, it made sure that it would not be done vindictively and without due process, namely without paying attention and deference to the legislative process as the presumed expression of the people’s general will. There was no reason to presume that the legislator would antagonize the Islamic tradition. Mostly, the Court showed that an elaborate, scholarly, and sound reading of the tradition did not mean that it was perforce ‘backward and medieval’. Contrary to the excessive description of the whole of Islamic law as ‘incompatible with the fundamental principles of democracy’ by the European Court of Human Rights, the Supreme Constitutional Court succeeded in reading the Islamic legal tradition in a progressive, humanist manner that salvaged in the process Islamic law’s better import and philosophy, one that associates interpreting divine rule with a legal process that facilitates people’s lives. The Qur’an repeatedly mentions ease, facilitation, the Arabic root word yusr,.

The reading could also go in a different, intolerant way. ‘Readings of the Qur’an, ..., as of any Bible, can support the most diverse glosses.’ Disturbing practices are mostly encountered in repressive countries that claim their ideology in an allegedly literalist interpretation of Islamic law. In countries like Iran, Saudi Arabia, Somalia, Sudan, the Indonesian province of Aceh, and some Northern Nigeria states, criminal law is codified and applied by courts in ways incompatible with universal human rights standards.\textsuperscript{45} Women in particular are victimized by an inegalitarian and coercive reading of the tradition.

The battle over interpretation has long been joined. In my preferred reading of the legal tradition, Islamic law (and the Middle Eastern legal tradition at large, Jewish, Christian, Babylonian, Zoroastrian) provides a formidable wealth of documents, especially in Arabic, that deserves to be given its rightful place in modern society. The debate whether Islam, Islamic law, or Islamic principles is or are ‘a’ or ‘the’ main reference in the legal order appears increasingly stale if such a larger humanist prism is adopted. The better question is how to fuse in scholarship Islamic and other Middle Eastern legal traditions with the most advanced principles of law elsewhere on the planet. For that, only scholarship of the highest order is needed, and there is no shortcut.\textsuperscript{46} Here also, the Murr Supreme Constitutional Court has forged ahead, as have the less known UAE Federal Supreme Court and to some extent Pakistan’s high courts.\textsuperscript{47}

3. The Personal Logic of Middle Eastern Law, Again

We have discovered in the personal dimension of Islamic/Middle Eastern law an essential basis for various forms of Islamic internationalism. The personal logic of Middle Eastern law is equally central to the understanding of the central conundrum of Middle Eastern constitutionalism.

In the Middle East, the Christian, Jewish, or Muslim individual is defined by law as primarily such: Christian, Jewish, or Muslim. He is only secondarily a citizen in a given country. This trait continues to be at odds with the secular logic of individual equality at the basis of modern Western constitutionalism.

The two mutually exclusive logics—citizens as strictly equal, and citizens as part of unevenly rights-endowed communities—survive to date, most apparently in the problems of conflicts of law and jurisdiction when it comes to such central family transactions like marriage, (p. 1301) divorce, custody, and inheritance. A person who gets married is bound, irrespective of her beliefs, by the rules of her religion. As the application of Islamic law receded under colonial occupation, that area of personal law escaped the logic of a constitutional order defined by the equality of the citizens. Instead, religious tribunals belonging to a person’s sect apply the specific traditional family laws in case of dispute, as in Lebanon or Israel. Often, as in Egypt or Iraq, the national tribunals have taken over, but they apply sect-based laws sometimes couched in national terms.

The individual is therefore subjected to several competing legal logics: as a religiously defined person, he is bound by the laws of his religious community. The sectarian logic is so pervasive that the ‘community’ does not stop at the overall distinction of Muslim/non-Muslim. The Muslim community itself gets sharply divided into sub-components, of which the most significant are Sunnism and Shi’ism, but the offshoots are many: Druze, ‘Alawis, Zaydis, Isma’ili, Babis, and Baha’is, ... Similarly, Christians and Jewish communities were subdivided following historically formed clusters: Greek Orthodox, Greek Catholic, Maronite, Protestant, Nestorians, Copts, etc for Christian, conservative, or reformist and other subdivisions for Jews.\textsuperscript{48} For the constitutional order, these divisions mean far more than the set of conflicts developing around the main areas of family law. The picture that emerges is that of a constitutional order where religiously defined communities act as constitutional agents for their members.

Here lies the main problem of Middle Eastern constitutionalism, which projects also beyond in Indian ‘communalism’, in several countries of East Asia and sub-Saharan Africa, and in the Muslim minorities in the West. In the Middle East and elsewhere, accommodation of sects as constitutional agents is particularly difficult. Mere occultation of the problem in dictatorial systems like Syria and Iraq under the Ba’th party leads to privileging the dominance of a minority sect over the system: this is the case of the Sunnis under Saddam Hussein and ‘Alawis under the Asads. At the opposite pole is the Lebanese ‘confessional’ system, which openly acknowledges the communities as bearers of collective rights that trump the individual citizen's rights. Seventeen or eighteen religious sects are therefore acknowledged in law, with Christian Maronites, Muslim Sunnis, and Muslim Shi’is apportioned a set of government positions in an inevitably complex conundrum that renders governance almost impossible. As soon as one of the three major sects considers a matter to be essential to its well-being, the constitutional system grinds to a halt. Majoritarianism is powerless in such a context.

Between the two poles (total ignorance and dominance of one minority sect under dictatorial systems, and impossibility of governance when a sect is given veto power) appear a number of variations specific to each country depending on the size of its communities and changing historical conditions. Jewish communities have been decimated across the Middle East and in much of the Muslim world. In Egypt and Iraq, where a once thriving Jewish community has all but disappeared, Christians and Muslims coexist in difficult mode, as the logic of sectarianism similarly undermines the Christian minorities. Iraqi Christians are a small minority, and their power in government is practically nonexistent. Their struggle, in the face of immense adversity carried on by a long string of regional and domestic wars, is one of survival. Yet the main fracture takes place between Sunnis and Shi’is, the latter constituting a much larger community. Shi’i dominance, in turn, is checked by the national division in Iraq between Arabs and Kurds. In Egypt, the national movement that prevailed between the two world wars carried a strong message of equality, and the Christian nationalist leaders refused quotas by arguing their total ‘Egyptianhood’ as equals in rights and duties with all other Egyptians. Since the dictatorship took hold in the wake of the military coup of 1952, the scene has receded dramatically for Egyptian Christians. Within the narrowed participation in government dictated by military takeover, their representation in government has been at best symbolic, while sectarian issues repeatedly come to the fore. The case of Israel bears its own peculiarity, but its constitutional conundrum is similar to other countries in the region, except that the Jewish community plays the dominant, if not exclusive, role in the country’s governing leadership.

IV. Epilogue: Emerging Hopes

With the deadlock occasioned by constitutional structures that fit uneasily with the sectarian logic, domestically and internationally, the Middle East and the Islamic world generally appear as an exception on the planet. Violence on a large international scale, adding to the domestic and regional strife, has become the hallmark of the region. If one were to reduce it to a single structural factor, the personal as opposed to territorial character of the law may provide the most useful clue to the dominant clash of two legal logics: the nation-state and its protection of the individual citizen, and the religious-sectarian state of communities that operate as constitutional agents irrespective of the individual.

In a less bleak vision, conviviality actively seeks novel modes for the constitutional order. Federal arrangements, notably in the Iraqi Constitution, try to accommodate sectarian and national divisions by a less crude mode than in a tripartite Kurd/Shi’i/Sunni constitutionally regulated division of spoils. More generally, the discourse of human rights, both for individuals as such and individuals as part of a group, together with the demand for increased political participation in government, appear as more promising routes for the constitutional order, domestically in the first place, and in its international projections. Universal rights can operate both to transcend the limitation of the logic of territorial law and that of personal law. Considering the weight of historic atavisms, however, any such constitutional project will require the full span of the twenty-first century to take root. It may have started in Tunisia in January 2011.

Bibliography

Bibliography

Islamic and Middle Eastern Law, general

Norman Anderson, Law Reform in the Muslim World (1976). Precise legal information on Islamic legislative reforms before the aggiornamento of Islamic law in 1979 Iran

Eugene Cotran and Chibli Mallat (and other subsequent co-eds), Yearbook of Islamic and Middle Eastern Law (1994). Includes an annual survey of legislative and judicial developments in several Middle Eastern jurisdictions (p. 1303).

Noel Coulson, A History of Islamic Law (1964). Despite scholarly shortcomings, the most readable introduction to date in the field

Wael Hallaq, Shari’a: Theory, Practice, Transformations (2009). Competent, but belabored and uneven treatise by a non-lawyer
Islam and the Constitutional Order

Chibli Mallat, ‘Comparative Law and the Islamic (Middle Eastern) Legal Culture’ in Mathias Reimann and Reinhard Zimmermann (eds), Oxford Handbook of Comparative Law (2006, paperback 2008), 609ff. Summary of previous entry

Chibli Mallat, Introduction to Middle Eastern Law (2007, paperback edn with new preface 2009). Provides a mapping of the field with attention to historical and comparative law, and an emphasis on court decisions

Joseph Schacht, An Introduction to Islamic Law (1964). Arid but competent treatise on Islamic law by noted Western scholar of Islamic law in the twentieth century

Encyclopaedias

The Oxford Encyclopedia of the Modern Islamic World (4 vols, 1995). General editor John Esposito, provides good choice of entries on key concepts, individuals, and countries

The Oxford International Encyclopedia of Legal History (6 vols, 2009). General editor Stanley Katz, Islamic law editor Baber Johansen, puts Islamic and Middle Eastern law on the map of international legal scholarship

Notes:

(*) I completed this work at Harvard Law School as Custodian of the Two Holy Places Visiting Professor of Islamic Legal Studies in 2011, and am grateful to Bill Alford, Martha Minow, and Frank Michelman and to the colleagues in the Faculty Workshop at HLS for their comments, to Judge Andrew Allen in London, and to Tanner Strickland Lenart SJ Quinney College of Law 2011, for their thorough review of the chapter. I am particularly grateful to Michel Rosenfeld for his comments. All mistakes and shortcomings are exclusively mine.

(1) ‘2.039 billion Christians, 32% of the world (dropping), 1.57 billion Muslims (22% (growing))’, table at (http://www.religioustolerance.org/worldrel.htm).

(2) Lucien Febvre, L’Europe. Genèse d’une civilisation (1999), 87, citing Bloch, ‘L’Europe a surgi très exactement quand l’Empire romain a croulé’ and at 107:

Or un tel monde, ainsi axé, centré sur la Méditerranée, un tel monde est devenu impensable aux temps carolingiens, pour beaucoup de raisons, mais d’abord pour celle-ci: la fermeture de la Méditerranée par les Arabes.

(3) Alphonse Dupront, Le mythe de croisade (4 vols, 1997) (monumental work on the European perception of the crusades across the ages).

(5) Albert Hourani, Islam in European Thought (1991), and Europe and the Middle East (1980), are solid introductory works.

(6) The scholarly literature seemed to be running behind events as I was completing the present study, with South Sudan formally voting the division of Sudan into two independent states along the Christian–Muslim fault line between South and North. For a good choice of books in English on the Sudan, see the interview of Richard Cockett on the FiveBooks site at (http://fivebooks.com/interviews/richard-cockett-on-sudan).
(7) In a large literature on growing Muslim minorities in Europe and the United States, and the concomitant rise of distrust, in which vituperative sound vibes dominate the debate, see the thoughtful book by Sumbul ‘Ali-Karamali, The Muslim Next Door: the Qur’an, the Media, and that Veil Thing (2008). For Muslim minorities vying for recognition in various parts of the globe, in particular their family/personal status laws, see an early comprehensive collection in Chibli Mallat and Jane Connors (eds), Islamic Family Law (1993) (esp chapters on Muslim minorities in China by A.R. Dicks; in Europe by Riva Kastoryano, Sebastian Poulter, and Dima Abdulrahim; on ‘Khawek, Moro, Rohingya’ in Thailand, the Philippines and Burma, by Andrew Huxley; and in India by Werner Menski and Tahir Mahmood). The literature has grown significantly since, including case law on female dress code, state constitutional amendments banning Islamic law in the United States, and an expansive political and legal scholarship.

(10) Then presidential candidate Barack Obama emphasized the word during his campaign, which underlies the importance of Pakistan for the future of Afghanistan, and the resulting complexity in dealing with two large countries with significant Muslim populations, some 30 million people in Afghanistan and 170 million in Pakistan.

(12) Iranian Constitution, Art 3:

> The government of the Islamic Republic of Iran has the duty of directing all its resources to the following goals: … (p) the formulation of the foreign policy of the country on the basis of Islamic criteria, brotherly commitment to all Muslims, and the unstinting support of all oppressed and deprived people throughout the world.

(13) In 1948, approximately one-third of the population of historic Palestine was Jewish (600,000), against two-thirds non-Jewish, Christians, and Muslims (1.2 million). About 850,000 non-Jewish Palestinians fled or were driven from their homes in what became Israel. The most important book on the period is Benny Morris, The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem Revisited ([1988] 2nd edn, 2004). In 2010, there is almost population parity in historic Palestine between Jews and non-Jews.

(14) Weber’s famous statement on ‘the monopoly of legitimate physical violence’ by the state appears in his lecture on ‘Politics as vocation (Politik als Beruf)’ in 1918.

and was a companion to historic figures in the Muslim Brotherhood, Hasan al-Banna and Sayyed Qutb. Banna was assassinated in 1949, probably by agents of the Egyptian monarchy. Qutb was hanged by the Naser regime in 1966.

(16) Ibid ch on jihad, 299–305.

(22) Imam is generally the leader of the prayer. Although there are no capital letters in Arabic, Imam rendered with a capital I represents the 12 Imams of the Shi‘i tradition, the ahl al-bayt (people of the house [of the Prophet]). With a small i, an imam is a religious leader generally.

(23) Arabic usul al-fiqh, roots or principles of jurisprudence. See Mallat (n 19), ch 1 and literature cited.

(24) Argument developed in chs 1–3 of Mallat (n 21).

(25) rahbar, leader, Arts 5 (historic and religious leadership transformed into constitutional leadership) and Arts 107–12 (election, powers and duties).

(26) Persian majlis-e khubregan, Iranian Constitution, Arts 107 and 108 (modality of Leader’s election by the Assembly of Experts).

(27) Iraqi Constitution, Preamble (historic leadership role of scholars), Art 10 (Protection of Holy Places), Art 41 (freedom in choice of personal status), Art 44 (freedom to practise collective rituals).

(28) An early presentation of these interlocking channels between the merchants and the scholars on the eve of the Iranian Revolution can be found in Michael Fischer, Iran: From Religious Dispute to Revolution (1980), 80–95. A current illustration is found in the Sadr family, where marriage, education/scholarship, and to some extent business relations are key to understanding the family leadership in Iraq (the late Muhammad Baqer al-Sadr and Muhammad Sadeq al-Sadr, assassinated by Saddan Hussein in 1980 and 1999 respectively); Lebanon (Lebanese Shi‘i historic leader and Iranian-born Musa al-Sadr, ‘disappeared’ in Libya by military dictator Mu‘ammar al-Qaddafi in 1978); and Iran (former president Muhammad Khatami, married to Musa al-Sadr’s niece). See Raffaele Mauriello, Descendants of the family of the Prophet in contemporary history: a case study, the Shi‘i religious establishment of Al-Nagaf (Iraq), Supplementi alla Revista degli Studi Orientali, Pisa 2011, and extensive biographies of some prominent family members in ‘Abd al-Hussein Sharafeddin, Bughiyat al-raghibin (2 vols, 1991).

(29) Khumaini’s influential lectures in Najaf were published in Arabic and Persian alternatively as Al-hukuma al-islamiyya (Islamic government) and wilayat al-faqih (velayat-e faqih in Persian, the role of the jurist). Translated in English and annotated by Hamid Algar, Islam and Revolution (1981), 27. In a large scholarly library on Iran, the works of Said Amir Arjomand provide an excellent departing point for comparative constitutionalism. See eg his After Khomeini (2009).
This is the case in Syria, Saudi Arabia, Afghanistan, Pakistan, India, Kuwait, and Lebanon, where important Shi'i communities can be found without constituting an absolute numerical majority. In Iran and Iraq, Shi'is form a clear majority, constituting over 80 percent and 60 percent of the population in conservative estimates. Small Bahrain has also a large Shi'i majority ruled by a quasi-absolute Sunni dynasty.

Note that the term al-Qa'eda (which has several meanings in Arabic including rule, as in legal rule, and basis, as in the basis of the pyramid) is not the original term which ben Laden and his colleagues chose publically for their movement. The word was reportedly chosen by ben Laden in the late 1980s to mean the register of names (sijill al-qa'eda) or roster of those who had joined the fight against the Soviets in Afghanistan, in order to facilitate queries made by their families to him as one of the prominent leaders of the anti-Soviet ‘Arab mujahidin’ in Afghanistan. This was in 1988, see Kamil al-Tawil, Al-Qa'eda wa akhawatuha (Al-Qa'eda and its sisters) (2007), 31. When ben Laden formally launched the movement as an international organization, he chose the more telling 'al-jabha al-islamiyya al-‘alamiyya li-qital al-yahud wal-salibiyyin' (the Islamic international front to fight the Jews and the Crusaders), which was announced in a press conference in Khost, Afghanistan, on February 23, 1998. English annotated translation of the Front's manifesto in Gilles Kepel and Jean-Pierre Milelli, Al Qa'eda in its Own Words (2008), 53 (original French Al-Qaida dans le texte (2005)).

See Mallat (n 19), 151–4 and references cited.

On Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood, the works of Robert Mitchell and Olivier Carré stand out; on the more recent scene of political Islam in Egypt, see Gilles Kepel, Muslim Extremism in Egypt: The Prophet and Pharaoh (French 1984) 2003). On Pakistan's Jama'at-i Islami, see eg entry by Seyyed Vali Reza Nasr in Esposito (n 18), vol 2, 356–60 and bibliography.

See the various entries on Sufism in Esposito (n 18) vol 4, 102–33. Over the immense stretch of movements, schools, and practices across history, association of non-violence with the mystical trends in Sufism and in the traditional Sunni political movements needs to be of course qualified.

All these figures are prolific writers, and numerous studies have also been devoted to each. For a selection of modern political writings, see John Donohue and John Esposito (eds), Islam in Transition: Muslim Perspectives (new edn 2006).

Full text of the letter, with comments, in Chibli Mallat, Iraq: Guide to Law and Policy (2009), 365–77, 390–2. In contrast to the Ben Laden manifesto of 1998 (n 31), the focus of the fight was for Zarqawi the Shi'i community and the government of Iraq, rather than the US forces.

This ‘supremacy clause’ is called the ‘non-repugnancy clause’ in Pakistan. Pakistani Constitution, Art 227(1):

All existing laws shall be brought in conformity with the Injunctions of Islam as laid down in the Holy Quran and Sunnah, in this Part referred to as the Injunctions of Islam, and no law shall be enacted which is repugnant to such Injunctions.

SCC, Year 1, Case 20, decided 4 May 1985, SCC 3, 209–28, translated in English as ‘Supreme Constitutional Court (Egypt)—Shari’a and Riba’ (1985) 1 Arab Law Quarterly 100. Confirmed in several other decisions, starting with SCC, Year 4, Case 47, decided 21 December 1985, SCC 3, 274–86. Supreme Constitutional Court decisions were published in ten volumes carefully edited by the presidents of the Court until 1998. In Pakistan, two significant decisions on the legality of interest, in late 1991 absolutely prohibiting it from the financial system, Mahmood-ur-Rahman Faisal v Secretary, Ministry of Law, PLD 1992 FSC 1 (Federal Shariat Court) and in 2002 by the Supreme Court reversing the decision in Bank Limited v Farooq Brothers and Others, PLD 2002 SC 800. See discussion in Mallat (n 19), 338–45.

See cases and discussion in Mallat (n 19), 196–207.
Islam and the Constitutional Order

(41) ECtHR, Refah Partisi (The Welfare Party) and others v Turkey, App nos 41340/98, 41342/98, 41343/98 and 41344/98, 13 February 2003, available at (http://www.unhcr.org/refworld/country,,ECHR,,TUR,,3fe7097e4,0.html) (prohibition of party advocating Islamic law by the Turkish Constitutional Court valid as in conformity with the need to protect democracy under the European Convention on Human Rights, see especially para 123 of the Grand Chamber decision).

(43) ‘fa nazratun ila maysara’ (‘give attention to ease’ Q.2: 280); ‘yassir li amri’ (‘make it easier on me’ Q. 20:26); ‘nuyassiruka ill-yusra’ (‘we make it easy on you to be at ease’ Q. 87:8). I have counted over thirty explicit references to yusr as facilitation of people’s lives in the Qur’an. For standard concordances to the Qur’an see in Arabic Fu’ad ‘Abd al-Baqi, Al-mu’jam al-mufahras li-alfaz al-qur’an al-karim (‘Lexicon of the Qur’an’) ([1935–39] 1987); in English Hanna Kassis, A Concordance to the Qur’an (1983) under tripartite Arabic root /y s r/.

(46) An example of such needed scholarship is the recent study of federalism by Najaf scholar Hasan Bahr al-‘Ulum, al-Islam wal-fidiraliyya (‘Islam and federalism’) (2010).

(47) Developments in Mallat (n 19), 191–207 (Yemen, UAE, Egypt) and 338–45 (Pakistan).

(48) Elaboration of the argument and references in Mallat (n 19), 171–80.

(49) I am grateful to Professor Frank Michelman for drawing my attention to this perspective.

Chibli Mallat

Chibli Mallat is Presidential Professor and Professor of Middle Eastern Law and Politics at the University of Utah and EU Jean Monnet Professor of European Law at Saint Joseph’s University, Beirut
Comparative legal studies have much to offer, at both conceptual and normative levels, for thinking about legal borrowing in general. Understanding the many dangers associated with borrowing in the constitutional context — dangers involving misunderstanding, exclusion, or limitations of self-government and democratic experimentalism — is enhanced by recourse to the traditions and formative debates of comparative law. Perhaps more than anything else, such recourse can help to infuse the field of comparative constitutional law with a much-tested comparative sensibility — that ‘usefully enabling condition of intellectual activity’. This article is organized as follows. Section II discusses terminology. The choice of metaphors is central to comparative private and constitutional law and should be the starting point for an overview of the topic. Section III introduces the transplants debate in comparative private law and discusses the distinction between private and public, specifically constitutional, law. Section IV is a prolegomena to an anatomy of constitutional transplants that draws, whenever possible, on the resources of comparative private law. It includes an analysis of the object of constitutional transplants, their timing, motivations, and patterns. Section V discusses the justification of constitutional patterns in the context of the use of foreign law in constitutional adjudication as a specific form of constitutional borrowing. The article concludes with a brief meditation on the topic of constitutional convergence.

Keywords: comparative constitutional law, metaphor, comparative private law, constitutional law, foreign law, constitutional adjudication, constitutional borrowing

I. Introduction 1304
II. Terminology: The Battle of Metaphors 1306
III. The Missing Legacy of Comparative Law 1309
   1. The Transplants Debate in Comparative Law 1309
   2. Transplants in Private and Public Law 1311
IV. The Anatomy of Constitutional Transplants 1313
   1. Object 1313
   2. Timing 1315
   3. Motivations 1317
   4. Patterns 1319
V. The Justification of Constitutional Transplants: The Case of Foreign Law 1321
VI. Conclusion: The Problem of Convergence 1325

I. Introduction
All fields of knowledge are shaped by ideas that travel in time and space. From history to economics to the natural sciences, the circulation of ideas is both ‘a fact of life and a usefully enabling condition of intellectual activity’. Law is no exception. As Roscoe Pound remarked in The Formative Era of American Law (1938), the ‘history of a system of law is largely a history of borrowings of legal materials from other legal systems and of assimilation of materials from outside of the law.’ The development of the English common law, the Roman-Canonic jus commune, and the advent of constitutionalism in the second half of the twentieth century are examples of phenomena in which the circulation of legal norms and ideas changed not only legal systems but also the course of history.

The study of legal transplants in comparative law aims to understand how the complex dynamic of cross-jurisdictional legal transfers brings legal systems into contact and eventually causes them to change. For most of the twentieth century, comparative legal studies focused almost exclusively on rules of private law. Constitutional norms, and public law generally, were perceived as too enmeshed with politics to allow for the same rigorous and systematic treatment that could be applied to the study of contract or property law.

And yet, instances of constitutional borrowing are now everywhere. Not only has the idea of a (written) constitution spread to virtually every corner of the world but constitutions are gaining recognition as enforceable legal documents, rather than mere declarations. The institution of judicial review, the principle of the separation of powers, and the enactment of a bill of rights have become fixtures on the world constitutional map. As one scholar noted, ‘Reading across any large set of constitutional texts, it is striking how similar their language is; reading the history of any nation’s constitution making, it is striking how much self-conscious borrowing goes on.’ Much the same can be said about borrowing at the subsequent stages of constitutional application and interpretation. Courts around the world, from Israel to Brazil and from South Korea to Canada and Hungary often consult the work of their foreign peers in interpreting similarly worded constitutional provisions. Faster means of communication, the ease of travel, and the globalization of legal education contribute to the intensification of constitutional borrowing. As Sujit Choudhry has recently noted, ‘the migration of constitutional ideas across legal systems is rapidly emerging as one of the central features of contemporary constitutional practice.’

These developments make it all the more surprising that constitutional borrowing as a standalone topic has been rather marginal in comparative constitutional law. While scholars in the field study various aspects of how constitutional systems interact, the mechanics of cross-constitutional interaction rarely receive comprehensive treatment. As late as 1990, a bibliographical study concluded that the literature on cross-border influence was ‘virtually inexistent’. More recently, Ran Hirschl noted that ‘from a methodological standpoint, we have yet to encounter a coherent theory of inter-court constitutional borrowing.’ Nothing resembling the transplants debate in comparative private law can yet be found in the field of comparative constitutional law.

At one level, this should not necessarily cause concern. The transplants debate in comparative private law became deadlocked in a polarized contest between scholars arguing that transplants can be found everywhere and other scholars who proclaimed legal transplants impossible because law is embedded in culture and cultures cannot be transplanted. That debate obscured as much as it illuminated the relationship between law and its broader environment. Moreover, as we will see, the field of comparative constitutional law is already developing on its own rich ways of conceptualizing the interplay between (constitutional) law and (constitutional) culture.

Nevertheless, comparative constitutional law is comparative law. And comparative legal studies have much to offer, at both conceptual and normative levels, for thinking about legal borrowing in general. Understanding the many dangers associated with borrowing in the constitutional context—dangers involving misunderstanding, exclusion, or limitations of self-government and democratic experimentalism—is enhanced by recourse to the traditions and formative debates of comparative law. Perhaps more than anything else, such recourse can help to infuse the field of comparative constitutional law with a much-tested comparative sensibility—that ‘usefully enabling condition of intellectual activity’.

This chapter is structured as follows. Section II discusses terminology. The choice of metaphors is central to comparative private and constitutional law and should be the starting point for an overview of the topic. Section III introduces the transplants debate in comparative private law and discusses the distinction between private and public, specifically constitutional, law. Section IV is a prolegomena to an anatomy of constitutional transplants that draws, whenever possible, on the resources of comparative private law. It includes an analysis of the object of
II. Terminology: The Battle of Metaphors

Alan Watson’s Legal Transplants (1974) brought this concept to the centre of comparative legal studies.\(^10\) A scholar of legal history, Watson’s study of the English common law and of the reception of Roman law in continental Europe led him to conclude that foreign transplants are the main mechanism by which private law evolves. Because legal rules are largely autonomous from the larger social and cultural surroundings, their transplant across jurisdictions is ‘socially easy’.\(^11\) Comparative law properly so called should therefore study the interaction between legal systems through the mechanism of legal transplants.

(p. 1307) As we will see in the next section, the mechanistic overtones of ‘transplants’ have not travelled well to comparative constitutional law. ‘Borrowing’ is the analogous metaphor used to capture the phenomena of constitutional transplants. The inaugural symposium of the premier peer-review journal in the field, the International Journal of Constitutional Law, was dedicated to constitutional borrowing.\(^12\) However, critics have argued that ‘borrowing’ is a deceiving metaphor. Leading the charge, Kim Lane Scheppele has pointed out that borrowing signifies a voluntary exchange among equals whereby the borrowed good will be returned unmodified, after a determined period, to the lender who remains its owner. That description does not apply to constitutional transfers. Unlike consumer goods, constitutional norms are not owned by particular legal system. They can be modified in the process of transfer and are not to be ‘returned’ at term. Finally, borrowing implies consent when in fact not all instances of constitutional transfer are voluntary.\(^13\)

The proposed alternative to constitutional borrowing is constitutional ‘migration’.\(^14\) The fluidity of this new metaphor is said to capture more accurately the complex dynamic of cross-constitutional exchanges. By contrast to the misleading linearity of borrowing, migrations describe all movements across systems, overt or covert, episodic or incremental, planned or evolved, initiated by the giver or receiver, accepted or rejected, adopted or adapted, concerned with substantive doctrine or with institutional design or some more abstract or intangible constitutional sensibility or ethos.\(^15\)

Interestingly, the shift from borrowing to migration mirrors a similar shift in comparative law from transplant to ‘circulation’.\(^16\)

The battle of metaphors is not ‘transcendental nonsense’. Only a sufficiently transparent and capacious lens can capture the complexity of cross-constitutional interactions.\(^17\) Consider, for example, the rejection of foreign models. If comparative law aims to understand the interaction between constitutional systems, then instances of rejection of foreign norms are presumably just as relevant as when such norms are incorporated.\(^18\) One learns as much about Poland from its rejection of an American-style structure of government model in 1919 (p. 1308) as one does from its adoption of a French-inspired constitution two years later.\(^19\) Proponents of the migration metaphor worry that these sorts of constitutional interactions are less visible when one looks for instances of borrowing: ‘the traditional focus of cross-constitutional influence only on ‘constitutional borrowings’ tends to highlight the positive models and hide negative ones.’\(^20\)

At one level, this is an odd claim since nothing prevents scholars from examining, as some have,\(^21\) instances of non-borrowing. But it is true that such projects are few and far between. So a deeper shift is at work here, and it has to do with the comparative agenda itself. The exclusive focus on borrowing, just like a focus on transplants, is primarily concerned with the mechanics of constitutional transfer and the interaction among constitutional systems. By contrast, non-borrowing reveals as much about a given constitutional order as it does about the dynamic between systems. The shift from borrowing to migration, or circulation, takes some of the emphasis away from the interaction itself and toward the deeper causes that lead systems to interact or to refuse interaction. As one author put it, interaction becomes an 'interpretative foil' for exposing a constitutional system's deeper normative structures.

Nevertheless, the significance of the choice of metaphors should not be exaggerated. First, constitutional phenomena are so diverse that no single metaphor can aptly capture them all. For all its advantages, migration is too amorphous a metaphor for the political scientist who sees cross-jurisdictional borrowing as choices of institutional design. Secondly, the shaping role of metaphors is limited. It is true that using the wrong lens can mislead the comparativist's audience and maybe confuse the comparativist himself. But that danger is limited. Metaphors are important, as all words and images are, but they are just metaphors. Moreover, their meanings often overlap. Far from describing constitutional borrowing in mechanistic terms, its proponents see it as a 'complex and somewhat open-ended phenomenon that, at its greatest reach, embraces influences of various kinds that cross constitutional borders.' This definition is strikingly similar to that of constitutional migrations. The same is true for legal transplants. Alan Watson defined the object of transplants as legal rules, but by rules he meant ideas. ‘What is borrowed’—or, what migrates, we may add—'is very often the idea'. This is hardly a linear or mechanistic process.

Since disagreement about words does not suspend the need to use them, in the rest of this chapter I use the metaphors of borrowing and transplants, interchangeably. When that lens is too limiting, as it will be at times, I switch to the migration lens. The section headings refer to transplants, for consistency purposes. I do not use the migration metaphor as the default in order to emphasize the continuity between the study of interactions in private and public law. The next section turns to this topic.

(p. 1309) III. The Missing Legacy of Comparative Law

1. The Transplants Debate in Comparative Law

Alan Watson argued that, in Western private law, jurist-initiated legal transplants have been 'the most fertile source of development'. Their success is partly explained by the fact that the transplant of legal rules is ‘socially easy’ so that ‘the recipient system does not require any real knowledge of the social, economic, geographical and political context of the origin and growth of the original rule.' Longevity is a salient feature of legal rules, which is understandable since rules remain largely unaffected by changes in their surroundings. Jurists transplant foreign rules whenever the(ir) need for coherence and consistency demands it. In Watson's view, comparative law is the study of the interaction of legal systems through the voluntary transplant of private law rules.

The transplant approach to comparative legal studies clashes with the 'mirror theory of law' which, from Montesquieu to Hegel and Savigny, understood the legal system to reflect in its letter the spirit of the community — each society reveals though its law the innermost secrets of the manner in which it holds men together. Drawing on the hermeneutics of legal meaning, Watson's most outspoken critic, Pierre Legrand, linked the existence of a rule to its intersubjective meaning in the community of interpreters: 'the meaning of a rule is ... a function of the interpreter's epistemological assumptions which are themselves historically and culturally conditioned.' Since meaning is an essential part of a legal rule and because meaning cannot travel, it follows in Legrand's view that rules—and legal norms more generally—do not travel. Meaning changes between the points of origin and destination on a scale of magnitude that radically transforms the so-called transplant. While Watson acknowledged that rules are altered in the process of transmission, Legrand argued that Watson's formalistic, rule-centred approach led him to downplay the scale of transformation. Law's rich 'nomos' makes convergence impossible.

(p. 1310) So this spectrum has at one end Watson's account of convergence based on the ubiquity of legal transplants and, at the opposite end, Legrand claim that transplants are flat-out ‘impossible’. But framing the choice as between convergence through transplants or divergence through fidelity to culture is, to use Rodolfo Sacco's measured but stern warning, 'too simple'. Much of the value of the transplants debate and its relevance to comparative constitutional law derives from subsequent qualifications that present a more nuanced and multilayered relationship between law and the broader culture. For instance, scholars have (re)interpreted Watson to argue for a ‘weak isolation thesis’ that the relationship between law and society is complex, not inexistent. Understanding legal transplants requires case-by-case approach. Similarly, the binary choice between general culture and legal rules can be enriched by intermediary terms such as ‘legal formants’ that capture some of law's institutional dimension. At the other end of the spectrum, James Whitman has praised Legrand's emphasis on law's larger cultural context while also calling for a dynamic approach to legal culture. Cultures change and law's role in those processes of change must be on the comparativist's agenda.

The relationship between law and its outside environment or culture is central to the transplants debate in comparative law. One of its most interesting aspects has been how homogeneity—cultural or otherwise—breaks down under the pressures of social differentiation. The same year as Watson's publication of Legal Transplants, Otto Kahn-Freund noted the differential impact of developments such as industrialization, urbanization, and the development of communication on political as compared to non-political factors (environmental, cultural, or social). Departing from an approach that clusters together all these factors, he argued that rules organizing political power are ‘organic’ and resistant to transplantation, whereas other rules are ‘mechanical’ and can be transplanted. Would-be reformers must thus ask, ‘How far does this rule or institution owe its continued existence to a distribution of power in the foreign country which we do not share?’

Kahn-Freund's framework can be helpful for thinking about constitutional borrowing and perhaps also about the related but distinct issue of convergence. Factors such as globalization have arguably brought about political assimilation and have facilitated constitutional borrowing. Finally, the transplants debate offers a further twist on Kahn-Freund's framework. Gunther Teubner has argued that a study of legal transplants must go beyond political differentiation to consider a greater ‘fragmented multiplicity of discourses’ in areas such as health, science, or technology. Legal transplants are ‘irritants’ that trigger reactions from within each social subsystem, not only from within legal culture. The norm transplanted changes in that process just as it changes the culture(s) of the host system. Mutual irritation is the name for ‘assimilatory modification’ of travelling legal norms in advanced industrialized societies.

2. Transplants in Private and Public Law

Since the transplants debate is limited to Western private law, its relevance to comparative constitutional law is uncertain. Even authors sympathetic to Watson's approach have found his claims about private law not defensible in a public law context. William Ewald has contrasted the American Revolution's dramatic impact on public law with its ‘very little direct effect’ on the system of courts and on private law generally, concluding that "the private law ... displays the inertness and stability predicted by Watson's theory—a stability that persisted even in the face of volatile changes elsewhere in the legal order." A similar conclusion could be reached about the survival in Eastern Europe of nineteenth-century civil law codes in altered but recognizable form throughout the Communist regimes which had profoundly changed the constitutional and administrative structure of the state.

However, this distinction between private and public norms is not universally embraced. Montesquieu himself did not distinguish, at least not in this context, between ‘les lois civiles’ and ‘les lois politiques’. In his view, rules of contract and property are just as embedded in the spirit and soil of a place—and therefore unmoving across space—as rules about political power. Contemporary scholars sometimes make no distinction between private and public and public norms. On what grounds can such a distinction rest?

There is, first, a widespread perception that rules of private law are more technical than constitutional rules. The latter structure and channel political power, whereas private law rules are politically neutral and regulate the interaction among individuals in their private capacity. As Watson argued, the ‘indifference’ of political rulers gives jurists leeway to transplant rules of private law that do not affect their office. In this view, constitutional transplants remain possible but they depend on the alignment of the rulers’ interests. Their study is highly contextual and varies case by case. It follows that transplanting private law rules is ‘socially easy’ whereas the transplant of public law rules is less common, albeit not impossible, and, in any event, not easy.

Now, it is true that some property and contract rules are more technical than, for instance, notoriously open-ended bill of rights provisions. But their technical nature should not obscure their political stakes. Conversely, even open-ended constitutional provisions are not self-evidently at the mercy of political factors, lest they should not be recognized as ‘law’. Secondly, the above explanation ignores the existence of periods of intensive constitutional borrowing when the ideological and/or reputational interests of political elites are sufficiently stable to make the transplant of public rules predictable and ‘socially easy’.

Another interpretation of the distinction between private and public rules underscores their different radiating ranges. In this view, ‘contract and tort law, for instance, only determine the way in which we should behave in some sort of bracketed interactions. But constitutional law has a deeper impact.’ This ‘deeper impact’ can be interpreted as a reference to the expressive function of constitutional norms. Constitutional norms are more complex signifiers than private norms, which regulate the transactional or non-transactional relations among individuals. Constitutional norms represent the will of the ultimate sovereign: the people. In some historical circumstances, ‘the people’ may want to borrow from a foreign system precisely for expressive reasons. But self-determination and the expressive nature of constitutional norms do explain why constitutional transplants can be more onerous than the transplant of more technical rules, such as, for example, legal rules regarding bankruptcy. The problem with this interpretation lies elsewhere. In many legal systems, the expressive dimension of constitutional norms is much less poignant than in the United States, for instance because their constitutions are easily amendable and/or their endurance is nowhere near that of the US Constitution. Furthermore, in some legal systems rules of private law can have as much if not greater expressive value. It is a well-known saying that the Code civil is France’s ‘real’ Constitution.

(p. 1313) Finally, private and public law norms can be distinguished as to their transplantability by reference to legal history of the kind on which Watson relies. But such arguments will likely leave unexplained the post-Second World War worldwide spread of constitutionalism. Another ground for distinction refers to disparities in the ease of implementation. The literature on the ‘transplant effect’ emphasizes the need for institutional structures to ensure the interpretation of a norm. Since institutional structures themselves do not migrate, the effects of the transplanted rule in the receiving system will be different from those in the system of origin. While such a conclusion requires empirical support, it might be the case that the support system that constitutions require is more extensive than that of private law rules.

My aim in questioning the distinction between private and public law norms in this context is not to imply that claims about the transplantability of private rules apply equally in the context of public, and specifically constitutional, norms. Rather, it is to suggest that the transplants debate in comparative law could be of use, heuristically and beyond, in the context of comparative constitutional law.

IV. The Anatomy of Constitutional Transplants

1. Object

The study of the object of constitutional transplants begins with constitutional text. The smallest unit of transplant can be a rule of constitutional structure—for instance the ‘constructive no confidence’ procedure borrowed from the German Basic Law into the 1992 amendments to the post-Communist Polish constitutional arrangement—or an institution, such as the Ombudsman. Fundamental rights provisions can also be the result of borrowing—or non-borrowing. Sujit Choudhry has documented the decision not to include in the Canadian Charter of Rights a US-style due process clause for fear that the judiciary might use it to usher in Lochner-like laissez-faire constitutional doctrines.

But an exclusive textual focus on discrete and insular constitutional provisions is problematic. Like legal formants in comparative law, discreet constitutional norms are often interrelated—in obvious or less than obvious ways—with other provisions, doctrines, or larger institutional structures. Mark Tushnet refers to this characteristic as ‘modularity’. He gives as example how legislative standing in the United States is related to provisions which authorize judicial review, and generally to the overall structure of the separation of powers. The overall structure of implementation can also be part of modularity, broadly understood. In the case of hate speech, the choice between a US-style protection and a system that does not extend such protection is at least partly correlated with the degree to which the enforcement of criminal law is centralized. Centralization affects the possibility of abusive restrictions on speech and thus the level of constitutional protection for speech.

An even larger unit of migration can be the regime itself. Examples include the borrowing of US presidentialism in Latin America and the borrowing of mixed, or semi-presidential, systems in Eastern Europe from the French Fifth
Constitutional Transplants, Borrowing, and Migrations

Large structure borrowing is almost always subject to assimilatory modifications such that the final results are often a pastiche. For instance, the 1991 Romanian Constitution borrowed the French mixed regime of the Fifth Republic but, for historical reasons having to do with its recent period of dictatorship, it limited the powers of the president by not borrowing the powers of the French president to dissolve the legislature.69

In addition to overlooking modularity, an exclusive focus on constitutional text glosses over the difference between constitutional text and constitutional practice. The necessity of looking behind text is perhaps greater with constitutional norms than with rules of private law.70 The phenomenon of ‘constitutions without constitutionalism’71—constitutional text that lacks political and cultural traction—is known beyond the ambit of African post-colonial constitutions for which it was coined. Since the standard reference to the phantasmatoc generosity of the text of the 1936 Soviet Constitution is no longer available, we will have to settle for the ‘rights’ provision of the North Korean Constitution.72 Now, of course, structural discrepancy between text and practice is also known, mutatis mutandis, to constitutional democracies, (p. 1315) especially when there is a hierarchy within constitutional provisions whereby some norms—for instance, social and economic guarantees—are ‘under-enforced’.73

Constitutional method too can be the object of migration. The most notable contemporary example is the proportionality method which migrated from its origins in nineteenth-century Prussian administrative law to many national and supranational courts around the world. As Alec Stone Sweet and Jud Mathews have argued,

By the end of the 1990s, virtually every effective system of constitutional justice in the world, with the partial exception of the United States, had embraced the main tenets of proportionality analysis ... [It has become] a foundational element of global constitutionalism.74

So fast and far has proportionality spread that one scholar has called it the ‘most successful legal transplant of the twentieth century’.75

Two final points are in order. First, connecting the dots of the smaller-scale units (rules, methods, regimes, institutions, doctrines, discourses), entire legal paradigms can be the object of constitutional migration. Lorraine Weinrib has described the post-war juridical/human rights paradigm that characterizes liberal democracies as including elements such as the proportionality method, fundamental rights, judicial review, and a certain understanding of constitutional values.76 Secondly, the object of migration can also be a constitutional insight or a contrasting image that shows foreign peer courts adopting solutions that the host legal system rejects as unfathomable. The South African constitutional equality jurisprudence has been invoked to such effect in US constitutional law.77

2. Timing

‘No one begins writing a constitution from scratch’78—at least, not anymore. But tracing the origins of the first draft, so to speak, is more important for a constitution than for rules of private law. Writing about the latter, Alan Watson noted that ‘however historically conditioned in (p. 1315) their origins might be, rules of private law in their continuing lifetime have no inherent close relationship with a particular people, time or place.’79 Not so with (written80) constitutions. The distinction between voluntary and involuntary transplants is especially important in this context. At one end of the spectrum, we find examples such as foreign inspiration of the American Founders or the borrowing between the states in the pre-revolutionary period in America.81 At the other end are the post-war Japanese Constitution,82 the German Basic Law, and the post-colonial constitutions of African nations.83 External influence on the 1995 Bosnian Constitution, the 2005 Iraqi Constitution, and the 2004 Constitution of Afghanistan places them closer to the same end of the spectrum.84 There are other situations wherein voluntariness is harder to ascertain. For instance, East European countries, which were in principle free to disregard, in the constitution-making process after the fall of Communism, the myriad recommendations of the Council of Europe and the European Community regarding the borrowing of specific constitutional institutions, but at the unpalatable price of being denied membership in these organizations.85

Constitutional borrowing can also occur at the interpretative stage in the life cycle of a constitution. Judges around the world are reading, citing, and generally ‘engaging’, as Vicki Jackson put it,86 the decisions of their foreign peers. Over the past few decades, the dialogue of constitutional courts has become a major venue for the migrating of constitutional ideas.\textsuperscript{87}

It would be interesting to compare judges’ roles in this context with the roles that Watson argues jurists played in the legal transplants of private law rules. Among the factors contributing to the creation in the constitutional context of a ‘global community of courts’\textsuperscript{88} are, in addition to domestic legal developments, external developments including the increased availability online of foreign materials, the globalization of legal education, and the ease of travel and communication which have set the conditions for an epistemic community of constitutional decision-makers.\textsuperscript{89}

The frequency of foreign citations varies across space and even in time within the same jurisdiction. For instance, D.M. Davis has argued that, after an early period when the South African Constitutional Court drew heavily on foreign law, over time the number of references decreased.\textsuperscript{90} This is noteworthy considering that section 39(c) of the South African Constitution provides that courts interpreting the Bill of Rights ‘may consider foreign law’. The lack of similar authorization has made the legitimacy of judicial borrowing the subject of intense debate in US constitutional law and politics. Even though the number of cases wherein the Supreme Court has cited foreign law is small by comparison to other jurisdictions,\textsuperscript{91} controversy has engulfed courts, the academy, and even Congress.\textsuperscript{92} Critics such as Justice Antonin Scalia have acknowledged the legitimacy of drawing inspiration from foreign models at the constitutional drafting stage, but have argued that the migration of foreign constitutional ideas at the interpretative stage erodes democratic self-government.\textsuperscript{93} To some extent, this is a surprising position. The authority of foreign law in constitutional domestic interpretation is not content-independent. Rather, it depends on how persuasive a judge finds a particular legal idea.\textsuperscript{94} Contrast this to the precedential authority of the US Supreme Court decisions in Argentina under the 1853 constitutional regime, which had largely copied the US Constitution. Judicial decisions interpreting the US Constitution received precedential authority as if they were the decisions of an Argentinean court.\textsuperscript{95} But, as the next section shows in the broader context of the justification of transplants, no such argument has been advanced in the contemporary debate.\textsuperscript{96}

3. Motivations

Voluntary constitutional borrowing has no single or simple motivation or set of motivations. One possible classification of the different motivations discussed in the literature mentions functionalist, reputational, normative, sociological, and, finally, ‘chance’ borrowing.

\textsuperscript{(p. 1318)} The first motivation is that the proposed ‘cost-saving’\textsuperscript{97} transplant ‘works’ in the host system. Rather than reinventing the wheel, a particular system should, in this view, borrow solutions that have already been tested in other systems. Similar functionalist motivations have been advanced in private law where the motivation for legal transplant has been ‘the quality of a given foreign solution’.\textsuperscript{98} One difficulty with these accounts is how to define what ‘works’. Given the importance of constitutional modularity at institutional, doctrinal, and perhaps even professional levels, understanding constitutional function requires tools that functionalism itself cannot provide.\textsuperscript{99}

A second motivation is reputational; borrowing has ‘legitimacy generating’\textsuperscript{100} effects. For example, it can signal to the world community the breaking with an undemocratic past.\textsuperscript{101} When courts are the agents of borrowing, they can import traditions that are lacking in their own systems and on which judges can then build ‘local’ doctrines over time.\textsuperscript{102} Moreover, judicial borrowing helps courts to deliver decisions that appear objective and impartial, which is particularly valuable to newly establish constitution courts. Engagement with foreign peers can also boost the external prestige of courts even when it leads to the rejection of foreign approaches.\textsuperscript{103}

Reputational effects also accrue on political actors and motivate borrowing at the constitutional drafting stage. Lee Epstein and Jack Knight have studied borrowing in the context of the choices of institutional design that constitutional drafters must make. They have argued that political actors seek to maximize their own preferences and reputation when exercising those choices. The authors analyze borrowing—institutional choices, really—as a bargaining process among relevant political actors, with their decisions reflecting their relative influences, preferences, and beliefs at the moment when the new institution is introduced, along with (and critically so) their level of uncertainty about future political circumstances.\textsuperscript{104}
Similarly, Ran Hirschl has explained the worldwide migration of the idea of judicial review of legislation as a mechanism by which disadvantaged elites promote their political self-interest. Hirschl writes that the current global trend toward judicial empowerment through constitutionalization is part of a broader process whereby self-interested political and economic elites, while they profess support for democracy and sustained development, attempt to insulate policy-making from the vagaries of democratic politics.105

Other authors interpret the interests of elites somewhat more broadly. For instance, David Law has identified among the forces of conversion toward what Hirschl calls ‘new constitutionalism’ the state’s competition for investment capital. Because capital is free to move wherever it sees fit, attracting it—and thus securing the basis for economic development—requires that constitutional systems offer investors property rights protected by an independent judiciary.106

At least two more kinds of motivations deserve mention at this stage. Normative universalist motivations see the spread of liberal constitutionalism—both constitutional structure (separation of powers, checks and balances, independent judiciary) and bill of rights—as the recognition of a universal set of principles for organizing political power in a way that protects individual freedom in the modern state. Writing in the context of the constitution-making in post-Communist Eastern Europe, Richard Epstein has argued that it is little surprising that virtually all new modern constitutions are slight variations on a common theme.107 There are also sociological motivations, of the kind discussed above in the context of judicial dialogue.

Finally, it is an interesting question what role ‘chance’ borrowings, that is, borrowings that lack any motivation, play. The process of constitutional borrowing seems fraught with dangers of misunderstanding.108 Consider the possibility of mistaken interpretation of foreign law. Watson intriguingly claimed that ‘foreign law can be influential even when it is totally misunderstood’.109 How accidental are such mistakes? That answer turns on whether the comparativist’s approach to legal culture has any room for the possibility of accidents.110

4. Patterns

Patterns of migration require an assessment of constitutional proximity. Rarely is such proximity a function of physical distance. More commonly, culture, history, reputation, politics, and ideology shape perceptions of constitutional space and determine the direction of constitutional migrations.

Let us first begin by distinguishing on the y-axis between vertical and horizontal constitutional migrations. Vertical migrations occur between different jurisdictional levels, for instance between national and subnational levels, such as the units comprising a federation. For example, the drafters of the Russian Constitution were reportedly inspired by state constitutions in the (p. 1320) United States.111 The most common vertical migrations originate from the supranational toward the national level, as when the state must implement at the constitutional level human rights obligations assumed under an international treaty.112 But these can also be complex migrations. One example is the spread of the proportionality method from national to supranational jurisdictions such as the European Court of Justice, from which it travels to a national system that had not been on the receiving end of horizontal migrations from the initial source.113

Horizontal migrations occur between similarly situated jurisdictions. The United States, Germany, the United Kingdom, and France are models of constitutional structure and the source of most worldwide borrowing. An interesting phenomenon, related to the reputation of constitutional models, occurs in situations of repeated borrowing which create ‘transplant biases’. As Alan Watson explains it, transplant bias refers to situations when a system’s receptivity to a particular outside law, which is distinct from acceptance based on a thorough examination of possible alternatives. Thus, it means for instance a system’s readiness to accept Roman law rules because they are Roman law rules, or French rules because they are French rules.114

At first glance, it seems that constitutional borrowings are somewhat insulated from the dangers of transplant biases. To the extent such biases rely on ‘habits’,115 their relevance is mitigated by the low frequency of opportunities for constitution-drafting. There are, however, opportunities for repeated borrowing at the interpretative stage.
The formation of transplant bias assumes accessibility, hence a process of socialization in which legal education and legal culture make particular foreign sources intelligible.\textsuperscript{116}

Language plays an essential role, although the spread of English tends to obscure its importance. As we will see, the use of a lingua franca heightens the dangers of nominalism and creates an appearance of constitutional convergence that can be misleading. The contrast between comparative constitutional law and comparative law is particularly stark in this respect, in the sense that language and translation are among the grand topics of comparative law but are virtually inexistent in the constitutional field. A second aspect of intelligibility and accessibility involves the question whether ‘legal families’\textsuperscript{117} have an impact on constitutional borrowing. Stephen Gardbaum’s work on the Commonwealth model of constitutionalism shows the shaping effect (p. \textit{1321}) of legal traditions.\textsuperscript{118} Similarly, Tom Ginsburg has shown that the 1992 Constitution of Mongolia rejected the American and Japanese-style systems to decentralized constitutional review partly because of Mongolia’s civil law origins in a Soviet-inspired legal system.\textsuperscript{119} A comprehensive study of the impact of the civil law/common law legal traditions on constitutional borrowing remains to be conducted.

History is of course a central factor that shapes perceptions of constitutional proximity. Scholars have studied how English-speaking Africa used the Westminster model and bicameral legislatures, separation of powers, judicial review, and bill of rights; French-speaking Africa adapted a French model.\textsuperscript{120} As far as geographical proximity is concerned, this factor plays a limited role in phenomena of voluntary constitutional migration. To take only one example, there are relatively few African influences in the South African Constitution.\textsuperscript{121} By contrast, the post-Communist constitutional arrangement in Albania was influenced by neighbouring Greece and Italy.\textsuperscript{122}

\textbf{V. The Justification of Constitutional Transplants: The Case of Foreign Law}

Comparative law is law.\textsuperscript{123} As law, it must address the normative justification for constitutional borrowing, and more broadly the conditions for its success. This section maps normative approaches to constitutional borrowing in the context of a particularly controversial type of borrowing, already described in the previous section, namely the use of foreign law by US courts in the process of constitutional interpretation. I use this debate not because it is representative of global trends—in fact, the opposite is true—but rather in order to exhibit the richness of the normative debate about constitutional borrowing, especially with regard to the relationship between law and its outside cultural, social, and political environment.\textsuperscript{124} The comparative law transplants debate has had little impact on the constitutional realm.

Judicial references to foreign law in the constitutional context have been roundly criticized in the United States as haphazard, lacking in method, and for being an unprincipled tool available for use whenever and however judges wish. Critics worry that fundamental methodological questions remain unanswered. For instance, to which jurisdictions should courts refer? How can judges be prevented from picking and choosing the jurisdictions that support their own choices? How does foreign law affect the integrity of the judicial process and how should the accuracy and relevance of foreign citations be checked? etc.\textsuperscript{125} These are undoubtedly important questions. They are also questions which reflect the fact that constitutional borrowings are not perceived to occur within what comparativists call a ‘legal family’, that is, within a community of legal systems that share fundamental methods and assumptions.\textsuperscript{126} But perhaps even belonging to a legal family would be insufficient given the special role of the constitution as a charter of self-government. In the context of constitutional borrowing, unprincipled means ‘undemocratic’.\textsuperscript{127}

To understand what makes borrowing undemocratic, recall that in comparative private law transplants are considered the most fertile source of change. A similar claim in the constitutional context would be an overstatement (revolutions are more ‘fertile’ than legal transplants ... ), but at least it identifies the normative pedigree of opposition to change. Thus, changes must be resisted as undemocratic unless they originate organically from within the body politic and, according to the self-referential logic of the constitution, they follow the mechanisms provided for in the constitutional text.

This position allows for a number of variations. One variation, call it a normative universalist claim, is that change via judicial constitutional borrowing is undemocratic under any version of constitutional self-government, save when the sovereign people have authorized it. A different, more culturally specific, position singles out factors such as history, politics, and the environment which make constitutional self-government incompatible with the practice of judicial borrowing. For instance, Jed Rubenfeld has contrasted American democratic constitutionalism, which sees the constitution as ‘the product of a national participatory political process, though which people commit to writing the fundamental values or principles that will govern their society’, with European self-government where national participatory processes are less important than the protection of human rights, including the rights of minorities and the establishment of the rule of law.

On its face, this is a descriptive approach. It does not take a position on whether cultures can change, whether these particular constitutional cultures can change, or whether they should change. Now, presumably change is possible. After all, these cultures have been shaped by history and history has not yet come to an end. So the critical question is how cultures change.

A strong culturalist approach to constitutional law argues that cultures cannot change intentionally. Paul Kahn has forcefully argued that ‘the rule of law is a cultural practice’, and thus ‘a cultural approach begins by bracketing off the study of law from the practice of reforming the law’. To try to change legal culture is to misunderstand legal culture. Hence, comparative constitutionalism, when aiming at reform, including through but not limited to constitutional borrowing, misunderstands—or worse, it instrumentalizes—constitutional culture. The point of comparative law is to understand, not to reform. A particularly illuminating analogy comes from Alan Watson who compared the purported comprehensiveness of constitutional law with that of a religious faith. Just as one need not—indeed, may not—reach out for answers to other faiths, so here one should not reach beyond the ambit of the US Constitution, as the foundation of America’s civic religion.

Culturalism’s emphasis on constitutional self-government coupled with its anti-functionalist methodology explain its appeal and relevance. In a different context, scholars of African constitutionalism have made the argument that constitutions must ‘grow’ organically. Invoked in this context is the survival of the ‘presidentialist character of Africa’s constitutional politics’ despite the textual provisions of many postcolonial constitutions in many Sub-Saharan constitutions. The justification of transplants depends on how one conceptualizes that relationship between law and culture. How, then, is judicial borrowing defended?

In the context of foreign law, functionalism in comparative constitutional law can take the form of crude instrumentalism or more sophisticated pragmatism. While crude instrumentalism has no defenders, as long as the use of foreign law lacks a methodology, judicial borrowing will be criticized as an inherently unprincipled tool that can be used strategically. The pragmatist justification reverts to the ‘it works’ rationale. Foreign law can shed an ‘empirical light’, in Justice Breyer’s words, on issues of constitutional structure such as federalism as well as fundamental rights.

Among other defences of foreign law, Anne-Marie Slaughter has proposed a broader explanation of inter-court borrowing as the outcome of the disintegration of states into networks of judges, legislators, and executives that reach across to their foreign peers. Both professional and sociological factors contribute to the creation of a global community of courts. Slaughter’s account is compatible with a dialogical model. According to this model, the use of foreign law is a means by which a constitutional system or culture engages with the outside world. The outcome of such engagement is to better understand the presuppositions of one’s own constitutional culture and legal system and, presumably, to change whatever aspects one does not like and has a mandate to change. Since the national judge is always a filter, foreign law as having persuasive authority and its usage is therefore not undemocratic.

Stronger views of the authority of foreign law are also possible. Jeremy Waldron has argued that foreign law is new jus gentium (the law of nations). Referring specifically to situations of emerging world consensus, such as the ban on the death penalty for juvenile offenders, Waldron argues that, just like in science, consensus provides ‘an established body of legal insight, reminding [one] that the particular problem had been confronted before and that they ... should think it through in the company of those who have already dealt with it.’ Common answers form an area of ‘overlap, duplication, mutual elaboration, and the checking and rechecking of results that is characteristic to true science.’ This theory provides a strong justification for the use of foreign law, but one that is limited to situations of emerging world consensus. More recently, it has been argued that the cosmopolitan ideal in constitutional law can justify constitutional borrowing by judges without regard to the existence of consensus.
VI. Conclusion: The Problem of Convergence

Reflecting on the history of comparative law, Rudolf Schlesinger noted that periods of ‘contractive comparisons’, when the emphasis is on differences between legal systems, alternate with periods of ‘integrative comparison’, when the focus is on similarities. It is perhaps too soon to tell if the same evolution will shape the field of comparative constitutional law. It is clear, however, that a debate is under way on whether and on what scale constitutional migrations are leading or can lead to constitutional convergence. At one level, at least some degree of convergence seems unquestionable. The world constitutional map looks drastically different today than it did half a century ago. The complex phenomenon of globalization makes further convergence all but inevitable. At the same time, recent empirical studies cast doubt on whether constitutional systems are converging. Moreover, convergence might not be desirable if it stifles democratic experimentation and shuns local expertise and traditions.

In this context, the pervasiveness of the English language in the comparative constitutional materials shapes the comparative landscape and somewhat artificially enhances the perception of congruence. Unlike comparative private lawyers, who are trained to reflect on the problem of translation, the comparative constitutional lawyer has few such concerns. The trap of nominalism becomes particularly worrisome. This is the trap that similar-sounding concepts share an identical meaning. Even when these legal concepts are the outcome of constitutional borrowing, we have seen that their meaning changes in the course of borrowing. A healthy dose of comparative sensibility helps at this stage.

Comparative constitutional law as a field can benefit from engaging with the transplants debate in comparative law, in particular with respect to topics such as convergence and divergence, the relationship between law and culture, and the importance of language and professional culture. Conversely, that debate, and comparative law more generally, can benefit from a study of constitutional borrowings and from the normative finesse that define comparative constitutionalism. This mutually beneficial dialogue also lays the ground for an integrative account of legal transplants, borrowings, and migrations.

Bibliography

Lee Epstein and Jack Knight, ‘Constitutional Borrowing and Nonborrowing’ (2003) 1 International Journal of Constitutional Law 196

Constitutional Transplants, Borrowing, and Migrations

Louis Henkin and Albert Rosenthal (eds), Constitutionalism and Rights (1990)

Morton Horwitz, ‘Constitutional Transplants’ (2009) 10 Theoretical Inquiries 353

Notes:

(*) I am grateful to the Clough Center for the Study of Constitutional Democracy at Boston College for a grant that supported research for this project.

(3) See Alan Watson, Legal Transplants (1974).

(4) This chapter discusses exclusively comparative constitutional law; it does not integrate other forms of comparative public law, such as comparative administrative law. For a recent overview of that field, see Susan Rose-Ackerman and Peter L. Lindseth, Comparative Administrative Law (2010). For a discussion of cross-jurisdictional influence, see Tim Koopmans, ‘Globalization of Administrative Law—The European Experience’ in Gordon Anthony et al, Values in Global Administrative Law (2011), 400ff.

(8) Ran Hirschl, ‘On the Blurred Methodological Matrix of Comparative Constitutional Law’ in Choudhry (n 6), 43.

(9) See also Michele Graziadei, ‘Comparative Law and the Study of Transplants and Receptions’ in Mathias Reimann and Reinhard Zimmermann (eds), The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Law (2006), 443ff.

(10) It took comparative law as an academic discipline a little over seven decades, counting from the 1900 Congress of Paris, to turn to the question of transplants. See Graziadei (n 9), 442ff.

(11) Watson (n 3), 95.

(14) See generally Choudhry (n 6).

(17) See also Günter Frankenberg, ‘Constitutional Transfer: The IKEA Theory Revisited’ (2010) 8 International Journal of Constitutional Law 563, 566:

These [metaphors] … are not ‘only words’ but signifiers of rather different theoretical approaches and interpretations, at times deployed casually, at others defended with religious zeal.

(18) It has been argued that type and intensity of rejection is also relevant. Kim Lane Scheppele has distinguished situations when foreign options are considered and rejected in favour of alternatives must be differentiated from cases where the foreign models are perceived as so abhorrent as to endanger the very identity of the receiving system. See Scheppele (n 13), 303ff. See also Heinz Klug, ‘Model and Anti-Model: The United States Constitution and the “Rise of World Constitutionalism” ’ (2000) Wisconsin Law Review 597.

(20) Scheppele (n 13).

(22) Choudhry, ‘Migration as a New Metaphor’ (n 6), 22.

(23) Epstein and Knight (n 21).

(27) Watson (n 3), 95.

(28) Watson (n 25), 81.

(29) As Watson later put it (ibid), upon reflection on the main point [he] was trying to make in Legal Transplants’, his point is that ‘however historically conditioned in their origins might be, rules of private law in their continuing lifetime have no inherent close relationship with a particular people, time or place.

(30) There are different ways of understanding the nature of that need. It can be understood as the jurists’ own need for authority, see Watson (n 3), 57ff, 88ff, and Wise (n 16), 5. Alternatively, the need can be understood as having deeper roots in the ‘normative self-reference and recursivity [that] creates a preference for the internal transfer within the global legal system’, in Gunther Teubner, ‘Legal Irritants: Good Faith in British Law or How Unifying Law Ends Up in New Divergencies’ (1998) 61 Modern Law Review 11, 18.

(32) Roberto Unger, Law in Modern Society (1976), 47.

(34) Watson acknowledged that ‘with transmission or the passing of time modifications may well occur, but frequently the alternations in the rules have only limited significance’, Watson (n 26). But by drawing attention to the direction of change, Legrand makes clear the political stakes of comparative method. See generally David Kennedy, ‘The Method and Politics’ in Pierre Legrand and Roderick Munday (eds), Comparative Legal Studies: Traditions and Transitions (2003), 312ff.

(37) This debate replicated in substance an earlier debate between diffusionists and evolutionists in anthropology. See Wise (n 16), 16.

(39) Ewald (n 31), 500ff.

(40) Similarly, Edward Wise shares the ‘weak’ reading of Watson’s claim. In Wise (n 16), 3:

To deny that law merely reflects its social context is not to say that exogenous factors are entirely irrelevant. But social and economic factors have a much more limited and attenuated effect than is indicated by the a priori assertion that law mirrors society.

(43) See also Choudhry, ‘Migration as a New Metaphor’ (n 6), 21: ‘given the centrality of migration to the contemporary practice of constitutionalism, the truly interesting question is why and how such changes take place’.

(46) Teubner (n 30).

(48) It has been argued that the transplants debate can no more apply to public law than it can apply beyond the ambit of European legal systems. See Ewald (n 31), 503.

(51) The question of the transplantability of private versus public law rules is related but not identical to the question whether there is a substantive difference between private and public law. Whatever the answer to the latter question, it remains possible that the rules of contracts or property are different—in a way that affects their transplantability—from norms of administrative or constitutional law.

(52) The equal treatment of all laws was, as Kahn-Freund put it, ‘decisive for Montesquieu's entire political and jurisprudential thinking and determining his place in the history of ideas’, Kahn-Freund (n 44), 7. Unsurprisingly, Alan Watson argued that ‘Montesquieu badly—very badly—underestimated the amount of successful borrowing which had been going on, and was going on, in his day’, in Watson (n 25), 80.

(54) Alan Watson, cited in Ewald (n 31), 501.

(58) For instance, Brenda Crossman has studied how cultural representations travel in the context of constitutional interpretations of equality striking down the ban on same-sex marriage. Brenda Crossman, ‘Migrating Marriages and Comparative Constitutionalism’ in Choudhry (n 6), 209ff.

(66) Tushnet, ‘Returning with Interest’ (n 65), 330ff.

(67) See Mark Tushnet, ‘Some Reflections on Method in Comparative Constitutional Law’ in Choudhry (n 6), 76ff. For another discussion of the importance of institutional structure, specifically the centralized versus decentralized judicial review, see Michel Rosenfeld and András Sajó, ‘Spreading Liberal Constitutionalism: An Inquiry into the Fate of Free Speech in New Democracies’ in Choudhry (n 6), 174ff. On the migration of centralized judicial review, see Victor Ferreres Comella, Constitutional Courts and Democratic Values (2009), 3ff. On the question of free speech, see Michel Rosenfeld, ‘Constitutional Migration and the Bounds of Comparative Analysis’ (2001) 58 NYU Annual Survey of American Law 67, 76ff.

(69) The substance of the assimilatory modification depends also on borrowing within a jurisdiction, so to speak. These are cases of borrowing over time. Eg many post-Communist constitutions in Eastern Europe borrowed from their own pre-war constitutions. See Jon Elster, ‘Constitutionalism in Eastern Europe: An Introduction’ (1991) 58 University of Chicago Law Review 447, 476.

(70) For a discussion of the difference between ‘law in the books’ and ‘law in action’ in the constitutional context and its implications for constitutional transplants, see Morton Horwitz, ‘Constitutional Transplants’ (2009) 10 Theoretical Inquiries in Law 353, 547ff. This is a topic much discussed in the context of African constitutionalism. For a study of the gap between Kenya’s postcolonial constitutional text and constitutional practice, see J.B. Ojwang,
Constitutional Transplants, Borrowing, and Migrations

(72) To pick randomly, Art 65 of the North Korean Constitution provides that ‘citizens shall have equal rights in all spheres of the state and social life’.

(76) See Lorraine E. Weinrib, ‘The Postwar Paradigm and American Exceptionalism’ in Choudhry (n 6). Weinrib argues that US law does not partake in this paradigm, even though its origins go back to the Warren Court era. For a mention of the role of the Canadian legal elite in bringing the Warren Court model to Canada, see Horwitz (n 70), 547ff.

(78) Osiatynski (n 19). One can go even further back and identify the global migration of the American Declaration of Independence of 1776. For a study, see David Armitage, The Declaration of Independence: A Global History (2007).

(79) Watson (n 25).

(80) For a discussion of the idea of a written constitution as a constitutional transplant, Horwitz (n 70), 540ff.

Constitutions can flourish and succeed only if they are firmly planted in the cultural soil from which they gain legitimacy. Thus, growing constitutions embodies the not so novel idea that constitutions and laws should reflect and be derived from the cultural norms in which they must endure. Constitutions that are not firmly grounded in the cultural mores of the society in which they operate are destined to fail, become irrelevant, or be shaped and adapted to meet the needs of the culture and society in which they are situated. Indeed, most postcolonial constitutions in the Sub-Saharan Africa have largely succumbed to irrelevance and debacle.
Constitutional Transplants, Borrowing, and Migrations

(85) Osiatynski (n 19), 249.

(89) Anne-Marie Slaughter, A New World Order (2004), 65ff.

(91) See eg Atkins v Virginia 536 US 304, 316 n 21 (2002) (Stevens J) (referring to the opinion of the world community that executing the mentally retarded is wrong), Lawrence v Texas 539 US 558, 571–3 (2003) (discussing the values of Western civilization regarding homosexual conduct), Roper v Simmons 543 US 551 (2004) (Kennedy J) (mentioning the ‘stark reality’ that the United States is the only country in the world that gives official sanction to juvenile death penalty).

(92) The latest legislative proposal introduced in the 112th Congress (2011–12) is HR 973 IH–Proposal To amend title 28, USC, to prevent the misuse of foreign law in federal courts, and for other purposes, available at (http://www.gpo.gov/fdsys/pkg/BILLS-112hr973ih/pdf/BILLS-112hr973ih.pdf).

(95) On the ‘borrowed statute doctrine’ in this context, see Rosennkantz (n 57), 275.

(97) Miller (n 53), 854ff.

(98) Jorg Fedtke, ‘Legal Transplants’ in J.M. Smits (ed), Elgar Encyclopedia of Comparative Law (2006), 434: ‘The decision to draw on the ideas found in other legal systems is ... often justified by the quality of a given foreign solution’.

(100) Miller (n 53).

(103) eg Hungarian and South African constitutional courts engaged—and rejected—the US Eighth Amendment doctrine in cases of the constitutionality of capital punishment. See State v Makwanyane SA 391 1195 (4) BCCR 605 (CC) (1995) (South Africa); 107 1990 MK, UT, 1, 1 (Hungary, 1990).

(104) Epstein and Knight (n 21), 200.

(106) Law (n 45).

(108) One reason why avoiding mistakes can be difficult is that they it requires knowledge of how a particular constitutional mechanism functions in the host country. For a discussion of the transplant of constitutional complain guarantee in the German Basic Law, Art 93(1), as an (in)effective protection of fundamental rights, see Frankenberg (n 17), 572.

(109) Watson (n 3), 99.

(110) As Lawrence Friedman describes his approach in A History of American Law, the book presents the American system not as a kingdom unto itself, not as a set of rules and concepts, not as a province of lawyers alone, but as a mirror of society. It takes nothing as historical accident, nothing as autonomous, everything as modelled by economy and society.

(114) Watson (n 26), 327.

(115) Wise (n 16), 7:

borrowing from a particular foreign system tends to become a habit: a bias develops in favor of treating that system as the primary quarry for legal rules whenever local law is silent.

Isaac I. Dore, ‘Constitutionalism and the Post-Colonial State in Africa: A Rawlsian Approach’ (1997) 41 St Louis University Law Journal 1301, 1304ff:

Having been designed abroad, there was a fundamental mismatch between the values of the people of Africa and the western values which inspired the drafters of the new constitutions.

Elster (n 69), 477.

Whitman (n 42), 343:

Legal systems are normative systems. ‘Law’ is not best thought of as a rooted set of cultural facts that can be ‘understood’ only in cultural context. ‘Law’ is best thought of as an activity that aims at normative justification of certain human acts and of the exercise of the authority of some humans over others.

The central lesson is that the dynamic between constitutional text and constitutional culture is essential for understanding the success of constitutional borrowing. Rosenfeld and Sajó (n 67), 174ff. See further Chapter 64 on the use of foreign law in constitutional interpretation.

See also Joan L. Larsen, ‘Importing Constitutional Norms from a “Wider Civilization”: Lawrence and the Rehnquist Court’s Use of Foreign and International Law in Domestic Constitutional Interpretation’ (2004) 65 Ohio State Law Journal 1283, 1327:

This ‘everyone’s doing it’ approach to constitutional interpretation requires explanation and justification. Yet, to date, neither the Court nor the academy has offered a justification that satisfies. Until they do, it seems we are better off to abandon this particular use of foreign and international law.

The reason is perhaps not the lack of a family as such (eg liberal constitutional democracies could be such a family) but rather the perception that US law belongs to a family of one—the old saga of US exceptionalism. See generally Michael Ignatieff (ed), American Exceptionalism and Human Rights (2005).

For Rubenfeld’s answers to these questions, in the analogous context of the US approach to international law, see ibid 2020:

Democracy is not the only value in the world. International law could be worth supporting even if it is undemocratic. The point is a matter of candor. To support international law is to support fundamental constraints on democracy.

efforts to create and give meaning to norms, through a language of rights, often and importantly occur outside formal legal institutions such as courts. ‘Legal interpretation’, in this sense, is an activity engaged in by nonlawyers as well as by lawyers and judges.

(131) This is what Günter Frankenberg calls the ‘IKEA’ theory of constitutional (and legal) transfer. According to this theory, global constitutionalism is created by or rather emanates from processes of transfer and functions as a reservoir or, for that matter, a supermarket, where standardized constitutional items—grand design as well as elementary particles of information—are stored and available, prêt-à-porter, for purchase and reassemble by constitution makers around the world.

(132) See also Sacco (n 41), 2: ‘the effort to justify comparative law by its practical uses sometimes verges on the ridiculous’.

The long absence in postcolonial Africa of a tradition of parliamentary autonomy has severely handicapped Africa’s legislature in defining or protecting their institutional interests and prerogatives. Despite new openings and opportunities to assert a meaningful role for parliaments in Africa’s post-authoritarian constitutional politics, contemporary legislature-executive relationships continue to be defined by conventions established under the executive-dominated ancient regime.

(136) For a discussion of functionalist explanations of constitutional transformation, see Hirschl (n 105), 34ff (discussing functionalist, evolutionary, and institutional economic theories of constitutional transformation); Tushnet (n 67), 76ff (discussing functionalism in the context of constitutional structure).

(140) Washington v Glucksberg 521 US 702, 770 (Rehnquist Cj) (discussing the experience with the legalization of physician-assisted suicide in the Netherlands in the context of a possibility of abuse).

(141) Slaughter (n 89).

(144) Perhaps the strongest view, grounding the authority of foreign law in natural law has not yet found supporters in the literature. For a discussion of what such an argument might look like, see Roger P. Alford, ‘In Search of a Theory for Comparative Constitutionalism’ (2005) 52 UCLA Law Review 639, 659–73.

(146) Ibid 133.

(147) Ibid 139.

(151) See also Mark Tushnet, ‘The Inevitable Globalization of Constitutional Law’ (2009) 49 Virginia Journal of International Law 985, 987 (pointing out that convergence is not tantamount to uniformity). See also Sacco (n 41), 2 (discussing the difference between uniformization and unification).

(153) See Walker (n 15), 317.

Vlad Perju
Vlad Perju is Associate Professor, Boston College Law School
The Use of Foreign Law in Constitutional Interpretation

Gábor Halmai

The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Constitutional Law
Edited by Michel Rosenfeld and András Sajó

Print Publication Date: May 2012
Online Publication Date: Nov 2012
DOI: 10.1093/oxfordhb/9780199578610.013.0066

Abstract and Keywords

This article analyzes the use of foreign law in constitutional interpretation. It discusses the three broadly defined positions in the scholarly controversy over the uses of comparative constitutionalism: scholars supporting the idea of the use of foreign law legitimate this practice with the sameness of both the problems and solutions of constitutional law for all constitutional democracies; the second position's starting point is that although the problems of constitutional law are the same for all democratic countries, the solutions to should differ from one constitutional system to another; and the followers of the third position claim that neither the constitutional problems nor their solutions are likely to be the same for different constitutional democracies. The article then identifies some criteria that can explain why particular judges and courts decide to use or, conversely, not to use foreign materials. Four case studies are selected to address the more empirical questions of the use of foreign materials, namely to what extent does it happen, and where?

Keywords: foreign law, constitutional interpretation, judges, foreign materials

I. Introduction: The Migration of Constitutional Ideas 1328
II. Normative Underpinning: Is It Legitimate? 1330
III. Jurisprudential Aspects: Why It Happens? 1333
IV. Case Studies: How Far and Where It Happens? 1336
1. Germany 1336
2. Israel 1339
3. Hungary 1341
4. South Africa 1344

V. Conclusions: Transnationalization of Constitutional Interpretation? 1346

I. Introduction: The Migration of Constitutional Ideas

Judicial use of foreign law is a product of globalization of the practice of modern constitutionalism: it has been made possible by a dialogue among high court judges with constitutional jurisdiction around the world, conducted through mutual citation and increasingly direct interactions. This growing ‘constitutional cross-fertilization’ can prove to be not only a tool for better judicial judgments, but eventually also for the construction of a ‘global legal system’.\(^1\) The globalization of constitutional law means that constitutionalism is no longer the privilege of the nation-state, but it has instead become a worldwide concept and standard.\(^2\) Globalization is especially encouraged by advances in transportation and communications, and by the deepening of political, economic, cultural, and legal ties.\(^3\) Since economic globalization includes competition among nations for investment and human capital, these globalization processes are limited to countries that compete internationally for investment... and human capital. At least for those among them which use foreign law. As discussed below, constitutional courts do not rely on foreign law. The US Supreme Court seldom cites foreign court decisions, those which do not use foreign law but do not do so explicitly (eg Hungary), and those which do so explicitly (eg South Africa). According to some scholars, the explicit and non-explicit reference to judicial decisions in other jurisdictions can lead to a convergence among them and their exporters’ constitutional systems, even if this globalization does not entail uniformity.

Before going further, we should clarify that ‘using’ foreign law in this chapter will typically mean the use of national law in another national jurisdiction. (In some cases we will also deal with the use of international law in national jurisdictions, and national law in international jurisdictions.) The use to which this foreign law is put is in the context of the interpretation of a domestic legal provision, and not of a direct application of the foreign law in the domestic court’s jurisprudence. Thus the focus is here on foreign law used transnationally. As we will see, cited foreign cases can have different degrees of influence. The less influential is when judges merely mention foreign law, the next step is when they actually ‘follow’ such cases as some form of authority, and also ‘distinguish’ them. With the exception here of some rarely discussed uses of binding international law, the authority of cited foreign law is only persuasive in the process of judicial interpretation.

There are different types of use of comparative materials, which can be characterized through metaphors. One is ‘legal transplant’, which consists of transferring rules between legal systems. Another is its counterpart, ‘constitutional borrowing’. The users of the third metaphor, the ‘migration’ of constitutional ideas argue that only this approach encompasses a broader range of relationships between the recipient jurisdiction and constitutional ideas, and takes both constitutional difference and comparative engagement seriously; the latter not necessarily directing courts towards constitutional convergence.

The subject of this chapter, the use of foreign law in constitutional interpretation, is only one example of the migration of constitutional ideas across legal systems, which also includes the use of foreign constitutions as models in the process of constitution-making. After looking at the normative basis of the use of citations I will investigate the questions why and where these uses takes place.

II. Normative Underpinning: Is It Legitimate?

It is generally agreed that the notion that foreign materials should be used for constitutional interpretation is gaining currency, and that the migration of constitutional ideas has been identified at a descriptive level. But many scholars complain that the basic conceptual issues, the methodology of migration, as well as the normative underpinning are lacking, and yet proponents of this practice cannot offer a theoretical justification for it. While some scholars argue that constitutional theory is just a vehicle for making sense of a constitutional practice, others raise the even more general question about the legitimacy of constitutional comparativism, and whether comparativism is simply a methodology employed for a judge’s particular theory, or alternatively whether a special comparative constitutional theory is possible. This theory is profoundly procedural in seeking a particular comparativist methodology, but also substantive in that it maintains the existence of universal norms. One, less convincing, methodological reason for a comparative theory is that a parochial methodology places the countries that follow it (eg the United States) at odds with international norms and creates diplomatic tensions with foreign allies. Another explanation is to enhance transnational dialogue and the global rule of law through a ‘global jurisprudence’. Among the substantive reasons are the maintenance of the existence of universal norms, avocacy of the internalization of international norms into the constitutional jurisprudence, together with the ability to promote political democracy and substantive justice by respecting a morally defensible set of individual rights.

In the scholarly controversy over the uses of comparative constitutionalism, especially judicial recourse to foreign law, there are three broadly defined positions:

(1) Scholars supporting the idea of the use of foreign law legitimate this practice with the sameness of both the problems and solutions of constitutional law for all constitutional democracies. One of the representatives of this position is David Beatty, who claims that the ultimate goal of all constitutional adjudication is to subject constitutional controversies to resolutions according to the dictates of the principle of proportionality, which Beatty describes (p. 1331) as the ‘ultimate rule of law’. This test for justification of rights’ limitations articulated by many constitutional systems is a component of ‘generic constitutional law’, which offers a formula for limiting rights. This position tends towards national identification with transnational and international legal norms, towards constitutional universalism. This means that the representatives of this model claim a process of transnational norm convergence.
The Use of Foreign Law in Constitutional Interpretation

(2) The second position’s starting point is that although the problems of constitutional law are the same for all democratic countries, the solutions to should differ from one constitutional system to another. This position, which is advocated by Mary Ann Glendon, highlights differences and tries to explain how different one constitutional system is from another, and why they differ. This is also the idea behind Vicki Jackson’s engagement approach, considering foreign or international law without a presumption that it necessarily be followed. In other words, the engagement model does not treat foreign and international law as a binding source. Jackson argues that the appropriate posture for the US Supreme Court to take would be one of engagement.

(3) The followers of the third position claim that neither the constitutional problems nor their solutions are likely to be the same for different constitutional democracies. This is called a resistance posture by Vicki Jackson. This position goes back to Montesquieu’s observation that ‘the political and civil laws of each nation … should be so appropriate to the people for whom they are made that it is very unlikely that the laws of one nation can suit another.’ This other extreme position concludes that comparisons are likely to be arbitrary, and that comparativists’ choices are driven mostly by ideology. For instance, Günther Frankenberg criticized comparativists for imposing Western hegemonic approaches, not being able to avoid acting as colonialists, and characterized constitutional comparativism as ‘a postmodern form of conquest executed through legal transplants and harmonization strategies.’ Another objection, raised by Otto Kahn-Freund, is that constitutional law is much less amenable to legal transplant from one country to another than is private law.

Richard A. Posner claims that the citations of foreign decisions by US Supreme Court Justices, such as Antony Kennedy, is related to moral vanguardism. Posner labels Justice Kennedy as a kind of ‘judicial Ronald Dworkin’ and (as he does Professor Dworkin) as a natural lawyer, arguing that the basic idea of natural law is that there are universal principles of law that inform and constrain positive law. Indeed, some proponents also argue that the citation of foreign law is best understood as an application of natural law or postmodern natural law; while according to others only a theory articulated in terms of ius gentium, that is, ‘the (p. 1332) accumulated wisdom of the world on rights and justice from the decisions of judges and lawmakers’, in other words, a consensus among ‘civilized,’ or ‘freedom-loving’ countries, justify the citations.

The different normative arguments concerning the relevance of foreign materials in constitutional cases, especially in US Supreme Court practice, can be followed in a conversation between Justice Antonin Scalia and Justice Stephen Breyer. They both agreed that the use of comparative law is not ‘authoritative’, that is, that it is not binding as a precedent. But, as Scalia noted, such citations are neither legitimate nor useful, while for Justice Breyer, they are useful and legitimate as long as they are considered for their insight and not regarded as authoritative. Breyer offered a pragmatic rationale, suggesting that foreign courts have problems that often, more and more, are similar to our own. … If here I have a human being called a judge in a different country dealing with a similar problem, why don’t I read what he says if it’s similar enough? Maybe I’ll learn something. …

In Scalia’s originalist view, foreign law ‘is irrelevant with one exception: old English law, which served as the backdrop for the framing of the constitutional text.’ Scala also stated that judges using foreign materials cite comparative law selectively, such that ‘when it agrees with what the justices would like the case to say, we use the foreign law, and when it doesn’t agree we don’t use it.’ This means that the citation of comparative case law ‘lends itself to manipulation’. For Justice Breyer, one of the justifications for citing the case law of other national courts was to consolidate judicial review in transitional democracies. As Justice Breyer emphasized in the discussion, even where there are no apparent firm convergences, human beings across cultures and national borders confront many of the same problems. What is at stake in these situations is a ‘dialogue’ (à la Choudhry) or ‘engagement’ (à la Jackson) with foreign decisions, which does not necessarily mean any disposition towards endorsement or adoption of particular foreign approaches.

Scalia’s and Breyer’s positions can also be seen as the dichotomy of American exceptionalism, that is, the refusal by many US courts and justices—including those of the Supreme Court—to engage in comparative interpretation, and the ‘postwar juridical paradigm’ of rights protection, a common constitutional model found in a variety of liberal democracies. As (p. 1333) Scalia’s arguments demonstrate, the starting points of American exceptionalism are that constitutional judicial review is undemocratic and illegitimate, and consequently views the use of foreign law as a form of judicial activism, which further undermines the legitimacy of judicial review. The post-war juridical paradigm model views judicially enforced constitutional rights as subjects of comparative constitutional interpretation.

III. Jurisprudential Aspects: Why It Happens?

In this section, I try to identify some criteria that can explain why particular judges and courts decide to use or, conversely, not to use foreign materials. Christopher McCrudden lists the following factors that seem to lead judges to engage with foreign materials: (1) the type of political regime in which the foreign court is situated, (2) a pedagogical impulse to look at more established democracies, or warning not to use certain laws, (3) their audience, (4) the existence of common alliances, (5) filling the vacuum of a temporary absence of (preferred) indigenous jurisprudence, (6) the perceived nature of the constitution as transformative or conservative, (7) theories of law and legal interpretation, (8) foreign law empirical fact, (9) perceived judicial competence in the area of foreign law in issue, and (10) differences in constitutional structure. But the most important criterion common in all these factors, is to look for good persuasive ideas in other national jurisprudence, which would help to solve similar constitutional problems through interpretation. As the number of liberal democratic countries is constantly increasing, the migration of constitutional ideas within this community cannot be a one-way process: some courts always being ‘givers’ of law while others always ‘receivers’. Of course the courts in the countries of the ‘postwar juridical paradigm’ (Weinrib) of rights protection use more case law from the courts of older and more established democracies, like that of the US Supreme Court. As Justice Albie Sachs of the South African Constitutional Court writes:

If I draw on statements by certain United States Supreme Court Justices, I do so not because I treat their decisions as precedents to be applied in our Courts, but because their dicta articulate in an elegant and helpful manner problems which face any modern court dealing with what was loosely been called state/church relations. Thus, though drawn from another legal culture, they express values and dilemmas in a way which I find most helpful in elucidating the meaning of our own constitutional text.

But the growing interdependency also means that courts with long records of constitutional interpretation, like the US Supreme Court, should also ‘learn something’ as Justice Breyer said in the discussion with Justice Scalia. Before we discuss in the next section the practice of some national courts, which after their transition to liberal democracy have the most frequently cited foreign law in constitutional interpretation, let us observe the slowly changing development of the US Supreme Court from the exceptionalist approach of the majority of the Justices to some recent decisions in which the majority did refer to foreign and international case law.

Justice Frankfurter, from the 1940s onwards, drew on the opinions of other countries in the Anglo-Saxon tradition ‘not less civilized than our own’ as reflected in their statutes, decisions, and practices. In Adamson v California, for instance, he based his interpretation on ‘those (p. 1334) canons of decency and fairness which express the notions of justice of English-speaking peoples’, a view he repeated in Rochin v California, and for which he became increasingly marginalized by his fellow Justices—for instance by Justice Black who not without irony asked ‘Why we should consider only the notions of English-speaking peoples to determine what are immutable and fundamental principles of justice?’ In the Furman v Georgia case, which was a major decision of the Supreme Court on the death penalty, Justice Thurgood Marshall argued that the abolition of capital punishment would enable the United States to ‘join the approximately 70 other jurisdictions in the world which celebrate their regard for civilization and humanity by shunning capital punishment.’ For Justice Powell, in dissent, the comparative experience pointed to the opposite conclusion. But despite the different outcomes of the opinions, both in favour and those against used comparative arguments. In Thompson v Oklahoma, Justice Brennan argued in the majority judgment that to allow the execution of a criminal who was less than 16 years old at the time of the offence would offend civilized standards of decency, and this ‘is consistent with the views that have been expressed ... by other nations that share our Anglo-American heritage, and by the leading members of the Western European community.’ Justice Brennan also cited as evidence the brief of Amnesty International. In his dissent, Justice Scalia not only disagreed with the ruling, but also with the use of the comparative approach itself: ‘we must not forget that it is the Constitution for the United States that we are expounding’. In Stanford v Kentucky, this dissenting view... became the majority. Despite the dissent's reliance on comparative arguments, Justice Scalia, writing this time for the majority, said that it is ‘American conceptions of decency that are dispositive, rejecting the conception of petitioners ... that the sentencing practices of other countries are relevant.’ In Knight v Florida, where the question was whether 20 years on death row was cruel and unusual punishment under the Eighth Amendment, Justice Thomas for the majority observed that ‘Were there any support in our own jurisprudence, it would be unnecessary for proponents of the claim to rely on the European Court of Human Rights, the Supreme Court of Zimbabwe, the Supreme Court of India, or the Privy Council.’ Justice Breyer in his dissent emphasized that the US Supreme Court has a history of looking at ‘the way in which foreign courts have applied standards roughly comparable to our constitutional standards in roughly comparable circumstances.’ In another dissenting opinion, Justice Breyer also cited The Federalist Paper, no 63, in support of the idea that ‘attention to judgement of other nations’ is useful. Not only in cases of rights, but in those concerning the relevance of foreign constitutional experiences in the context of federalism was Justice Scalia rejective. In Printz v United States, he said that ‘comparative analysis [is] inappropriate to the task of interpreting a constitution though it [is,] of course, quite relevant to the task of writing one.’ Justice Breyer's dissent admitted that ‘we are interpreting our own constitution, not that of other nations and there may be relevant political and structural differences’, but nonetheless ‘their experience may ... cast an empirical light on the consequences of different solutions to a common legal problem’.

(p. 1335) However, around the beginning of the new millennium, many observers noted that ‘the Court's manifest awareness of other constitutional systems is on the rise’. One early sign was Washington v Glucksberg, where the Court referred to experience in foreign jurisdictions in its first decision on the constitutionality of assisted suicide. In Atkins v Virginia, Justice Stevens referred in a footnote to the opinion of the ‘world community’ in support of what he called a ‘national consensus’ against the execution of the mentally retarded. The reference was sharply criticized in dissents by both Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Scalia, who stated that the Prize for the Court's Most Feeble Effort to fabricate ‘national consensus’ must go to its appeal ... to views of assorted professionals and religious organizations, members of the so-called ‘world community’, and respondents to opinion polls.

But the decisive steps were the Lawrence and the Roper cases. In Lawrence v Texas, the Court struck down the criminal prohibition of sodomy, departing from its earlier decision in Bowers v Hardwick. In the majority judgment, Justice Kennedy cited the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Dudgeon v United Kingdom to illustrate ‘that the reasoning in Bowers has been rejected elsewhere’. One commentator went so far as to state that the citation ‘suggests that constitutional courts are all engaged in a common interpretative enterprise’. But Justice Scalia’s dissent shows that there is no agreement on this within the Court. He first made it clear that the

*Bowers majority opinion never relied on values we share with other civilization’, and secondly emphasized that*The Court’s discussion of ... foreign views [ignoring of course, the many countries that have retained criminal prohibitions on sodomy] is therefore meaningless dicta. Dangerous dicta, however, since this Court ... should not impose foreign moods, fads or fashions on Americans.*

In Roper, both the debate on the juvenile death penalty and on the migration of constitutional ideas continued. Justice Kennedy, arguing for the majority about the unconstitutionality of capital punishment for juveniles, reviewed a range of foreign sources and stated that they ‘while not controlling our outcome ... provide respected and significant confirmation for our own conclusions’, and went on to say that in this general praise for the use of foreign law:

These doctrines and guarantees are central to the American experience and remain essential to our present-day self-definition and national identity. Not the least of reasons we honor the Constitution, then is, because we know it to be our own. It does not lessen our fidelity to the Constitution or our pride in its origins to acknowledge that the express affirmation of certain fundamental rights by other nations and peoples simply underscores the centrality of those same rights within our own heritage of freedom.

(p. 1336) Justice Scalia’s dissent again attacks the Court's comparative approach by accusing the majority of holding the view ‘that American law should conform to the laws of the rest of the world’—a view which ‘ought to be rejected out of hand’.

Page 5 of 20
IV. Case Studies: How Far and Where It Happens?

This section discusses the more empirical questions of the use of foreign materials, namely to what extent does it happen, and where? For this purpose, I have selected four case studies, which all fall under Lorain Weinrib’s ‘postwar juridical paradigm’: Germany, Hungary, Israel, and South Africa. The explanation for this selection is that American exceptionalism, discussed in the previous section, is partly based on the fact that, until the end of the Second World War, the US Supreme Court was the only constitutional court that did enough to warrant studying by the emerging new democracies, such as Germany or Israel. But from the beginning of the 1950s onwards, when the German Federal Constitutional Court was established, it also became an important source of migrating constitutional ideas for other new constitutional states, such as Hungary. At the beginning of the 1990s, other states governed by the rule of law emerged, such as South Africa, whose Constitutional Court's decision on the unconstitutionality of the death penalty used US, German, and also Hungarian case law; needless to say, the decisive one was that of the US Supreme Court.

1. Germany

The constitutional law of the Federal Republic of Germany after the Second World War was definitely influenced by American constitutionalism, but the Basic Law of 1949 cannot be labelled as an imposed constitution. Although the constitution-making process was set in motion by the occupying Allied powers, and the final product was subject to Allied approval, the actual drafting was essentially a German process drawing on German models and traditions. References to American constitutional ideas and principles in the Parliamentary Council covered a variety of subjects, for instance issues of federalism and a bill of rights, and scholars of German constitutional theory and practice also paid close attention to American constitutionalism. The same can be said concerning the jurisprudence of the German Federal Constitutional Court: there were some important decisions at the very beginning which were influenced by US Supreme Court rulings, but the number of directly cited decisions decreased after the Federal Constitutional Court established its own jurisdiction. However, the influence of American constitutional thinking was always present among the various constitutional court justices, such as Gerhard Leibholz, Konrad Hesse, Dieter Grimm, Wolfgang Hoffmann-Riem, and Brun-Otto Bryde. This explains why there are no fundamental objections against referring to international and foreign sources in the German Federal Constitutional Court. For discussions such as the one taking place in the United States to form the background of their argument would be plainly unthinkable in Germany. One German constitutional scholar even advocates making comparative law ‘the fifth method of interpretation’ in constitutional law, alongside text, context, history, and policy.

There is an important difference between the German and the American attitude towards international law which, at least, makes the use of rules of international law much easier in Germany. According to Article 25 of the German Basic Law (Grundgesetz), the generally recognized rules of public international law are part of federal law, and they have priority over national law. In disputed cases, the Federal Constitutional Court is entitled to interpret these rules. In 1982, for instance, the Court added a further criterion for the examination of cases, in which an accused is sentenced in his absence, that is, the minimum procedural requirement of public international law. The Court referred to the decisions of three European countries to show that the application of such standards is justified. In other cases, where the Court interprets procedural guarantees which are not spelled out in the Basic Law, for example the presumption of innocence, they deduce this right from the rule of law; but since it had no textual basis in the Basic Law, it cited the words of the European Court of Human Rights and drew heavily on the case law of the Strasbourg organs in its jurisprudence.

One of the first rulings of the Court to cite foreign materials was the dissolution of the Kommunistische Partei Deutschlands (KPD) case of 1956, when the Court banned the West German Communist Party, by partly distinguishing the Federal Republic of Germany from its Western neighbours:

The constitutional logic of these [Western] democracies ... lies in the fact that citizens are free or, as under the Italian Constitution of 1947, even encouraged to form political parties without limitation. ... Recent developments, have however, shown that free democracies can equally not ignore the practical and political problems of excluding parties from public life which are hostile to the constitutional order if the threat to the State reaches a certain level of intensity. ... The Communist Party was thus prohibited in France and Switzerland in 1939 and 1940 by government regulations. In the United States the party was required to register in order to allow public authorities to effectively monitor its activity as a subversive organization.\textsuperscript{75}

(p. 1338) One of the leading cases on freedom of expression, and one of the Court's most important decisions overall, is the \textit{Lüth} case of 1958,\textsuperscript{76} in which the Court cites both the French Declaration of Human Rights, in French, and Justice Cardozo of the US Supreme Court, in English, on ‘the matrix of indispensable condition of nearly every other form of freedom’.

In the famous \textit{Spiegel} decision of 1966, four judges out of the eight members of the Senate referred to papers presented at an international conference on the legal position of the press in criminal proceedings concerning the question whether members of the press can refuse to give evidence in criminal proceedings involving treason and opted against such a right.\textsuperscript{77} This argument was rejected by the other four judges, but on substantial reasons, and not because of the use of comparative law.

As Justice Bryde states, despite the mentioned hidden background influence, there are relatively few open references to foreign law.\textsuperscript{78} He mentions the following examples. When the Court decided, against popular opinion (both on the matters of animal rights and of xenophobia), for a Muslim halal butcher, it found it helpful to point out that the Austrian Constitutional Court had reached the same result.\textsuperscript{79} In establishing the constitutionality of same-sex unions, it also put on record in how many countries such unions have become accepted practice.\textsuperscript{80} In another case, the Court also referred to international human rights jurisprudence for the difficult task of reconciling the rule of law regarding retroactive punishment with the avoidance of impunity for crimes committed under a non-democratic regime.\textsuperscript{81} Ulrich Drobnig refers to some other concrete decisions, such as the one regarding interpretation of Article 4(3) of the Basic Law, which deals with the right of conscientious objection to military service. In this case, the Court was looking for help from foreign legal systems, but found no common ground either on the international level or in the Western democracies.\textsuperscript{82} Another case concerned the interpretation of the notion of ‘political treaty’ in Article 59(2). The Court found in the laws of several Central European countries a uniform understanding of that concept and used this as a basis for its decision.\textsuperscript{83} A similar result was reached by the Court concerning the interpretation of the term ‘home’, which Article 13(1) of the Basic Law declares as inviolable. The Court finding decisions in four countries which interpreted ‘home’ relatively broadly also used this approach.\textsuperscript{84}

Without concrete citations and even despite different arguments used, but seemingly considering decisions of the US Supreme Court, one can find decisions where the German Federal Constitutional Court has reached similar results to its US counterpart. One example is abortion rights, which were carved out by both Courts using different approaches.\textsuperscript{85} In the first case in each country, ruled in the 1970s, \textit{Roe v Wade} by the US Supreme Court\textsuperscript{86} and the Abortion \textit{I} case by the German Federal Constitutional Court,\textsuperscript{87} the two Courts struck almost the same balance between the pregnant woman’s right to obtain an abortion and the state’s interest in the protection of the fetus’s right to life—although the doctrinal analyses are in sharp contrast.\textsuperscript{88}

The same is also true in respect of communication rights: US law is more free in its individualism and more zealous in the protection of expression. For example, in \textit{RAV v St Paul} the Supreme Court protected the right of white individuals to express hatred by placing a burning cross late at night in the fenced-in yard of a black neighbour who lived across the street.\textsuperscript{89} In the \textit{Auschwitz Lie} case, the Federal Constitutional Court banned a demonstration intending to assert that the Holocaust never occurred, by arguing that ‘freedom of opinion by no means always takes precedents over protection of personality’.\textsuperscript{90} (This is why some US scholars call the German Basic Law a ‘constitution of dignity’ whereas the US Constitution is labelled a ‘constititution of liberty’.\textsuperscript{91}) It seems that the German Court here formulates its approach of the limitation of hate speech against the US one. This is called by Andrzej Rapaczynski a ‘negative influence’, a process in which a model (eg the American model) is known, considered, and rejected, or in which an experience perceived as undesirable is used as an argument for not following that example.\textsuperscript{92} But despite these different approaches based on different historical backgrounds and legal cultures, the right to communication is an equally essential aspect of both constitutional systems.\textsuperscript{93}

2. Israel

The uniqueness of the case of Israel concerning the use of foreign law in constitutional interpretation is the very fact that the state has no formal written constitution.\textsuperscript{94} This means that Israeli judges are engaged in an ongoing process of constitutionalization. In the \textit{United Mizrahi Bank} case,\textsuperscript{95} Chief Justice Aharon Barak,\textsuperscript{96} arguing for judicial review of constitutionality by the Israeli Supreme Court, besides referring to Hamilton (The Federalist Papers, no 78), H.L.A. Hart (The Concept of Law), John Rawls (Political Liberalism), and John Hart Ely (Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review), also evokes Marbury v Madison of the US Supreme Court. Legitimizing the test of the constitutionality of constitutional amendments, he mentions the opinion of the Supreme Court of India in the case of Kesavananda v State of Kerala,57 and quotes the following words of the German Federal Constitution Court:

   Laws are not constitutional merely because they have been passed, in conformity with procedural provisions. ... They must be substantively compatible with the highest values, and must (p. 1340) also conform to unwritten fundamental constitutional principles as well as the fundamental decisions of the Basic Law.98

Freedom of expression is probably the area of constitutional law where doctrinal developments in the United States have had the most influence in Israel.99 The first important decision was the Kol-Ha’am Co Ltd v Minister of Interior case.100 In 1953, the daily newspaper Ha’aretz reported that the Israeli Ambassador to the United States had stated that in the eventuality of a war between the United States and the Soviet Union, Israel would supply the United States with a military force of 200,000 troops. The newspaper of Israel’s Communist Party, Kol-Ha’am (The People’s Voice) published an editorial denouncing the ‘anti-nationalist policy of the Ben-Gurion government which profiteers in the blood of Israeli youth’. Four days later, the Minister of Interior suspended publication of the newspapers for periods of ten and 15 days. A unanimous panel of three Justices101 overruled the order. Justice Agnarat, writing for the Court, declared freedom of expression and freedom of the press to be basic principles of Israeli unwritten constitutional law by virtue of Israel’s commitment to democracy, concluding that given the components of the probable danger test, the suspension order could not stand. According to a commentator of the decision, the ‘probability’ test breaks ‘from the notion of “acceptable speech” and focuses on concrete harms to society’, which is very similar to the American test of ‘clear and present danger’.102

Another landmark case was Ha’aretz v Electronic Company, in which during a recession one of Israel’s largest government enterprises purchased a luxury car for its director general. Ha’aretz published an article asserting that the company against its former promise had no interest in selling the car. The company brought a libel suit. First, the Supreme Court’s ordinary panel of three Justices overruled the district court decision against Ha’aretz by a 2:1 (Ha’aretz I).103 Justice Shamgar, one of the majority, used the arguments of the US Supreme Court in New York Times v Sullivan favouring the free criticism of public officials.104 Four years later, the Israeli Supreme Court reversed its decision and reinstated the libel verdict (Ha’aretz II),105 rejecting the Sullivan test, and protecting the reputation of the public official.

The third major case is Kahane v Broadcasting Authority,106 in which Justice Barak used the ‘near certainty of a real injury’ test, when deciding the constitutionality of banning the broadcast of the radical Rabbi Kahane’s hatred speech towards Israeli Arabs, which was again similar to the American ‘clear and present danger’ test, used in the case of the prohibition of the march of the Nazis in the streets of Skokie, Illinois.107 Justice Barak argued that the Broadcasting Authority could not prevent Kahane’s broadcasts on the ground that this constituted an improper exercise of prior restraint. According to Justice Barak, however, not only was this blanket exclusion of Kahane (not including news coverage of his activities) unconstitutional, but he also maintained that the Broadcasting Authority could not impose a policy of excluding the broadcasting of racist views and sentiments on the basis of content alone. This position was criticized by Justice Gabriel Bach, who argued that the type of racist speech for which Kahane was known should be categorized as unprotected.108 Justice Barak cited 18 US cases (and 14 scholarly works), some of which provoked Justice Bach to say that ‘one should not apply these decisions to the case at bar, which deals with the right of public authorities to prevent broadcast of specific programs banned by an explicit law.’109 This debate was not about the use of foreign law, but over its limits. As we can see, US free speech jurisprudence—sometimes embraced, sometimes rejected—has been an important source in forming the praxis of the Supreme Court. As in the case of Germany, where historical circumstances very much influenced the use of the US Supreme Court’s free speech jurisprudence, the same has also happened in Israel, where communal integrity was a decisive factor in the implementation of US doctrine.

3. Hungary

During its transition to democracy, Hungary has chosen its own unique method of constitution-making, retaining—in name, if not in form—the Constitution from the beginning of the country’s Communist period, but radically changing its content in a process of comprehensive amendment in 1989. Like the High Court of Justice in Israel, the Constitutional Court of Hungary has also developed an activist practice of judicial review of parliamentary legislation.

The first nine-year cycle of the Hungarian Constitutional Court's proceedings came to an end in 1999. Those nine years will enter not only into Hungarian political and public law history as the era of the Sólyom Court, but—and what is at least as important to a genuine constitutional judge/court—into the legal textbooks as well. Judge László Sólyom was the president of the court during this time, and the Court's jurisprudence and style very much reflected his leadership. Especially in this period, the use of foreign law in the interpretation of the Constitution was a deliberate strategy by the Hungarian Constitutional Court, which merely designates the law of a foreign legal system without being bound by it in the same way as when a foreign law is incorporated, or international law ratified.

As Catherine Dupré's book on the import of the concept of human dignity shows, the judges first carefully chose the German model as a suitable model, and then instrumentalized it through a very activist interpretation of the Hungarian Constitution. On that basis, the Court developed its own autonomous concept of human dignity. The first sign of this active instrumentalization was in Decision 8/1990. This decision judged unconstitutional the pre-transition regulation of the Labour Code, which empowers labour unions to represent workers—even if they are not union members and perhaps even against their expressed will—without their separate power of attorney. The basis for nullifying this regulation was the principle of human dignity in the Constitution, which the Constitutional Justices (on the recommendation of Sólyom as the presenting Justice in the case) declared to be an expression of 'the general rights of individuals'. This right, which does not appear in the Constitution, is, according to Sólyom's view, 'carved out' from the right to human dignity, a 'birthright'; namely, it is a subsidiary of such a fundamental right that the Constitutional Court as well as all other courts in every instance can cite it in defence of individual autonomy if none of the specifically named fundamental laws apply to the case in question. Next, the justices determined in Decision 57/1991 that 'the right to self-identity and self-determination is part of the “general rights of individuals”'. Further, this right includes everyone's most personal right to discover their parentage. The following year, Decision 22/1992 declared unconstitutional the requirement that enlisted officers request permission from their superiors to marry, on the basis that the right to marry, as part of the right to self-determination, is such a fundamental right that it stands under constitutional guardianship. As Dupré also indicates, the Hungarian Constitutional Court elaborated another conception of human dignity, reading it in conjunction with the right to life as an absolute, and not allowing any limitations on it. The first and most prominent example of this concept is the Court's decision on the death penalty (23/1990). The next major examples of the Hungarian Constitutional Court's liberal understanding of human dignity are the decisions on abortion (48/1991 and 64/1998), which centre on individual and human autonomy, and are divested of human dignity's implication and impact on the community and society. Describing the genesis of a new legal system in Hungary, Dupré states that relying on law importation to develop its case law in the transitional period, the Hungarian Constitutional Court discovered new rights in the wake of human dignity and general personality rights.

The other main area of the use of foreign law as also in the case of both Germany and Israel, is freedom of expression, and especially hate speech. As we already have seen, US free speech doctrine was clearly more liberal than its German and Israeli counterparts. However, as Michel Rosenfeld and András Sajó observe, 'paradoxically, it may be that anti-liberalism towards authoritarianism may be a better weapon in the fight of liberalism against illiberalism in formerly authoritarian polities such as Germany and Hungary.' But assessing the free speech jurisprudence of the latter, they conclude that the Hungarian Constitutional Court in many regards adopted an absolutist theory of speech going beyond the US Supreme Court's position. The free speech practice of the Court can, rather, be characterized with the divide in the standards applied in US jurisprudence, which rejects all limitations, and those of a (Western) Europe inclined more towards resolute limitation based on the 'concept of militant democracy'. The Hungarian Constitutional Court first encountered the problem in examining the constitutionality of the provision in the nation's Criminal Code concerning public incitement. In Decision 30/1992, the Constitutional Court found the facts of the crime of incitement of hatred to be constitutional and annulled that form of defamation. Its reasoning was based on the notion that freedom of expression has a distinguished role among other fundamental rights guaranteed by the Constitution; that in fact it is a type of a 'mother right' of the so-called right to 'communication'.
According to the Justices, the right to free expression of opinion protects opinion without regard to its content in terms of value and truth, for this condition alone lives up to the (p. 1343) ideological neutrality of the Constitution. In confirming the constitutionality of the facts of the crime of incitement, the Justices apparently reasoned on grounds similar to US Supreme Court Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes's famous test of ‘clear and present danger’. At the same time, it must be said that the ‘danger’ attached by the Hungarian Constitutional Court Justices as a condition of constitutionality is more distant and contingent than the type their erstwhile American peers had in mind. Presumably, this is why the Constitutional Court elaborated on its decision by explaining that the ‘unavoidable social tensions of system-change’ (ie the post-1989 political-economic transition) notably increase the danger of incitement, before large public audiences, to hatred against certain groups. In contrast to US jurisprudence, the Hungarian Constitutional Court did not address the problem of the ‘scope’ of the facts, that is, whether the incitement provision can be applied even in the absence of a real possibility that hatred will develop. In other words, the Hungarian Justices did not set a constitutional standard that requires incitement to hatred actually to cause ‘clear and present danger’. This approach, along with citing the historical circumstances of the change of system, recalls not so much the US concept of justice in this respect, but that of Germany's Federal Constitutional Court, which likewise cites historical reasons in reacting to militant threats to democracy by limiting freedom of expression—namely, Germany’s interest in avoiding a repeat of the scenario that followed the collapse of the Weimar Republic. The main reason for declaring defamation unconstitutional was, however, that in this case the Hungarian Parliament had in fact made its qualification on the basis of the value content of the opinion expressed, in other words, with the violation of public peace attached to this only on the basis of presumption and statistical probability. Moreover, the Constitutional Court pointed out, not even the public peace is independent of the degree of freedom of expression that prevails in society. Indeed, in countries where people can encounter numerous different opinions, public opinion becomes more tolerant, whereas in closed societies particular instances in which people express opinions outside the norm have far more potential to disturb the public peace. Further, the needless and disproportionate limitation of freedom of expression has a detrimental effect on an open society. Indeed, in such a society those who use abusive language only mark themselves as 'slanderers' in the arena of public opinion. Criticism is the appropriate response to slander, not criminal prosecution, argued the Constitutional Court Justices. At the same time, they added that the need to protect the ‘dignity of communities’ may constitute a valid constitutional limitation on the freedom of expression. Thus the Court decision does not rule out the possibility that Hungary’s lawmakers might establish such protection under criminal law even beyond the scope of incitement to hatred. In the assessment of the Justices, however, the expansion of other legal instruments, for example non-pecuniary compensation, is also suitable for the effective protection of the ‘dignity of communities’. In other words, in deciding on the constitutionality of this particular element of fact in the statutory provision on incitement, the Justices looked to an American standard still being applied in the present day.

One of the key conditions of the new open society occasioned by Hungary’s change of system was the dismantling of the earlier inviolability of state authority and public officials and representatives—that is to say, the ban on criticizing them. With Decision 36/1994, the Constitutional Court annulled, with immediate effect, the provision of the Criminal Code referring to ‘the defamation of state authority or a person in public office’. This was the statutory provision based on which courts had condemned politicians and social scientists who had criticized heads of government ministries. As for the patterns that served as the basis for this decision, one is certainly the 1964 US Supreme Court decision of New York Times v Sullivan. The other pattern followed by Hungary’s (p. 1344) Constitutional Court Justices was the consistent jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights, whose most important decisions are indeed cited in the reasoning of the Hungarian decision—the best known among these being Lingens v Austria (1986). The Hungarian Constitutional Court's 1994 decision thus follows not only the jurisprudence of the US Supreme Court but especially that of Strasbourg in setting a lower threshold for criticism of politicians than is the case for criticism of private individuals, arguing that the reputation of such public figures must be balanced with society’s interest in ensuring the free and open debate of public affairs.

4. South Africa

The country’s transition from apartheid to a constitutional democracy was very much influenced by constitutional borrowings. Both the interim constitution under which the country was governed until the general election was held, and the final one, negotiated by the democratically elected representatives drew heavily upon comparative constitutional law, particularly the law of the United States, Canada, Germany, and the European Convention on Human Rights. One of the obvious reasons for this was the simple fact that South African lawyers had had no real experience of constitutional law or bills of rights prior to the Interim Constitution. The Constitutional Court established by the Interim Constitution was required to certify that the text of the final Constitution complied with the 34 principles of the Convention for the Democratic South Africa agreed by the negotiating partners. This new text for the first time in constitutional history enabled the Court to import international and foreign law: section 39 of the 1996 Constitution (indexed as Interpretation of the Bill of Rights) states that

(1) When interpreting the Bill of Rights,

a) a court, tribunal or forum must promote the values that underlie an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom;

b) must consider international law; and

c) may consider foreign law.

(2) When interpreting any legislation, and when developing the common law or customary law, every court, tribunal or forum must promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.

(3) The Bill of Rights does not deny the existence of any other rights or freedoms that are recognized or conferred by common law, customary law or legislation, to the extent that they are consistent with the Bill.

(p. 1345) From the very first decisions delivered shortly after its establishment in 1995, the Constitutional Court made extensive use of international and foreign law. In Zuma and others v State, the Court declared the provision of the criminal procedure code in force during apartheid, according to which a confession of guilt could be gathered even by police force members without it having to be repeated during the trial. The Court lists how the same issue was dealt with by the US and the Canadian Supreme Courts, analysing three US (Tot v US, Leary v United States, and Country Court of Ulster Country, New York et al v Allen et al) and two Canadian cases (Regina v Big M Drug Mart Lt and Regina v Oakes).

In its landmark decision in Makwanyane v State, the Court investigated the constitutionality of the provision of the Criminal Procedure Act on capital punishment in relation to sections 8 (equality before law), 9 (right to life), 10 (protection of human dignity), and 11 (unlawfulness of cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment and punishment) of the Interim Constitution. The Court engaged in a critical assessment of various countries’ constitutional jurisprudence on the death penalty. First the Court examined the US Supreme Court’s rulings that confirmed the constitutionality of the death penalty not being cruel and unusual punishment. The next subject for comparison was the 1949 Constitution of India and the jurisprudence of the Indian Supreme Court, which was also not considered to be compatible or useful for resolving the problem of the death penalty’s unconstitutionality under the South African constitutional system. On the contrary, reference was made to both the Canadian Supreme Court in Kindler v Canada of 1992 which defines the death penalty as cruel and inhuman treatment that damages human dignity, and also Decision 23/1990 of the Hungarian Constitutional Court declaring capital punishment as a violation of both right to life and human dignity.

In the De Klerk v Du Plessis case, the question was whether the constitutional guarantee of freedom of expression could serve as a defence to a defamation action, but the case also raised questions about the retroactivity of constitutional guarantees as well as the horizontal effect of constitutional rights to private actions. All the opinions in the decision devote considerable attention to analysing how other jurisdictions have approached the question of the relationship between private law and constitutional rights, as well as the question of retrospectivity. For instance, Justice Kentridge discusses in detail the US Supreme Court’s ruling in Shelley v Kraemer, as well as Canadian, Irish, and German case law, while Justice Ackermann analysed ‘Drittewirkung’, the German approach to horizontality. With the substantial influence of this German legal thinking, the Court finally opted for an indirect application of fundamental rights in the private sphere.

But the use of comparative law was not uncontroversial in Klerk v Du Plessis. In his dissent, Justice Kriegler emphasized the unique character of the South African constitutional arrangements and warned against too much reliance on foreign law, sometimes without an understanding of the legal system of the cited jurisdiction. He later repeated these concerns in Bernstein and Others v Bester NO and Others and in State v Mamabolo. In some cases, other Justices also joined his concerns. There were other decisions in which the majority (p. 1346) rejected the recourse to foreign law, one of which is Ferreira v Levine NO and Others, which dealt with the statutory duty of company employees to disclose confidential business information under specific circumstances. Justice Ackermann, after referring to the writings of Sir Isaiah Berlin and the opinion of Dickson CJC in the Canadian case R Big M Drug Mart, proposed to expand the protective scope of the Interim Constitution’s provision on human dignity to include a general right to freedom. Finally, the majority of the judges rejected Justice Ackermann’s approach, but not simply because it was strongly influenced by foreign law, rather, because it would have amounted to a full legal transplant, not just an expansion or development of the law on the basis of constitutional principles already enumerated in the 1993 text of the Interim Constitution. The other case, Sate v Solberg, was a decision that upheld a ban on the sale of certain alcoholic beverages on Sundays, Good Friday, and Christmas as not violating the freedom of religion provision of the Interim Constitution. In a concurring opinion, Justice Sachs relying on the US First Amendment’s Establishment Clause and its jurisprudence, for instance in Lynch v Donnelly, argued that the law did violate freedom of religion.

But despite these debates within the Court, the very extensive use of comparative judgments means that the Court insists that the migration of constitutional values throughout the legal systems is absolutely vital, and it also draws heavily on comparative and international law in reaching this conclusion.

V. Conclusions: Transnationalization of Constitutional Interpretation?

We can conclude that despite the different postures towards use of foreign law, constitutionalism and judicial review have ‘gone global’, and there is definitely a growing horizontal communication between constitutional systems; and given this dramatic development, the traditional neglect of the study of comparative law is becoming harder to justify. This means that there are more and more countries engaging with foreign and international—that is, transnational—norms. The expanding universe of law through the internet also makes it much harder nowadays to avoid taking a position on the role of international or foreign law. Whether a consequence of this development will be the emergence of a ‘transnational constitutionalism’ or the international community becoming a constitutional community, is yet to be seen. It is even more difficult to foresee whether this movement will lead to a convergence towards a liberal democratic constitutional model as universalist followers of the convergence posture predict or even claim for the current situation. For instance, T.R.S. Allan sets out a constitutional theory framed around ‘the basic principles of liberal constitutionalism’ which is ‘broadly applicable to every liberal democracy of the familiar Western Type’. Also, Lorraine Weinrib states that the migration of constitutional ideas has already led to the emergence of a constitutional model and a convergence of constitutional analysis across different jurisdictions. In contrast with this assessment, other scholars argue against the existence of convergence, or even raise doubts whether convergence would be a good thing at all, since significant variations necessarily continue to distinguish different liberal constitutions.

Another interesting, but also still open, question of the use of comparative constitutional law, is how far can international law be the source of migration of ideas. The real question behind this is whether current international law is really able to serve the aims of transnational constitutionalism. In some fields it definitely does not. As Kim Lane Scheppel proved in the case of the post-9/11 war on terror, international law can be a source of anti-constitutional ideas. Therefore the even more challenging perspective of the extensive use of comparative constitutional law is when and how this conceptual lens of constitutionalism will migrate to international law.

Bibliography

Sujit Choudhry, ‘Migration As a New Metaphor in Comparative Constitutional Law’ in Sujit Choudhry (ed), Migration

Page 12 of 20
of Constitutional Ideas (2006)

Vicki C. Jackson, Constitutional Engagement in a Transnational Era (2010)

Sir Basil Markesinis and Jörg Fedtke, Judicial Recourse to Foreign Law (2006)

Michel Rosenfeld, ‘Constitutional Migration and the Bounds of Comparative Analysis’ (2001) 58 NYU Annual Survey of American Law 67

Michel Rosenfeld, ‘Principle or Ideology? A Comparativist Perspective on the US Controversy Over Supreme Court Citations to Foreign Authorities’ in Zsuzsa Gaspár and András Hanák (eds), Sajó 2009 (2009)

Anne-Marie Slaughter, A New World Order (2004)

Notes:

(1) See Anne-Marie Slaughter, A New World Order (2004), 65–103.
The Use of Foreign Law in Constitutional Interpretation

(6) This is also the approach of McCrudden's study. See ibid 510.

(7) Ibid 512.

(8) The rise of persuasive authority is the most important factor of ‘constitutional cross-fertilization’. See Slaughter (n 1), 75–8.

(9) In his early work, Alan Watson claimed that the discipline of comparative law should be oriented toward the study of transplants. See Legal Transplants: An Approach to Comparative Law (1974). In his critique of Watson, Pierre Legrand states that legal transplants are impossible, and he calls for difference in response to the urge for convergence. See ‘What “Legal Transplants”?’ in D. Nelken and J. Feest (eds), Adapting Legal Cultures (2001).

(16) Slaughter (n 1), 78.

(20) See Mark Tushnet, ‘Comparative Constitutional Law’ in Mathias Reimann and Reinhard Zimmermann (eds), The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Law (2008).

(22) See Jackson (n 11).

(27) See eg Alford (n 14).

(28) Catherine Dupré, ‘Globalisation and Judicial Reasoning: Building Blocks for a Method of Interpretation’ in Andrew Haldin and Volker Roeben (eds), Theorising the Global Legal Order (2009).

(31) Ibid 522.

(32) Ibid 525.

(33) Ibid 521. Also McCrudden mentions as one possible explanation that the use of foreign judgments is simply result-drive: that advocates and judges simply use the foreign decision that supports the result they want in the particular case before the court. He even raises the suspicion that the selective use of foreign judgments is inevitably associated with a rights-expanding agenda. But then he rejects this by referring to Justice Frankfurter, who was consistently the US Supreme Court Justice most favourably disposed towards citing foreign cases, and was certainly not pursuing a rights-expanding agenda. See McCrudden (n 5), 527.

(34) Ibid 531.

(35) Sujit Choudhry criticizes this justification as crude, overblown, and real politik, as well as his failures to respond Scalia’s challenges and explain why courts should cite comparative case law. See ‘Migration As a New Metaphor’ (n 11), 4–10.

(36) See this contrast of models in Lorraine Weinrib, ‘The Postwar Paradigm and American Exceptionalism’ in Choudhry, Migration of Constitutional Ideas (n 11).

(37) See McCrudden (n 5), 516–27.

(38) S v Lawrence, S v Negal, S v Solberg (4) SA 1176, 1223 (South Africa 1997). Quoted by Slaughter (n 1), 77.

(39) 332 US 46 (1947).

(40) 342 US 165, 169 (1952).

(41) Ibid 176.

(42) 408 US 238 (1972).

(44) Ibid 869.

(46) Ibid 370.

(47) 528 US 990 (1999).

(48) Ibid 990.

(49) Ibid 997.

(50) Foster v Florida 537 US 990 (2002).

(52) Ibid 921 n 11.

(53) Ibid 977.

(56) 536 US 304, 316 n 21 (2002).

(57) Ibid 337.

(60) 45 ECtHR (1981).

(64) Roper v Simmons 543 US 551, 1200 (2005).

(65) Ibid 1226.

(67) See Schauer (n 12), 908–9. Schauer states that although the drafting in the shadow of the necessary approval by an occupying power undoubtedly had an effect on the process, it was less than the Allied powers had hoped for, and certainly much less than existed in Japan.

(68) See Helmut Steinberger, ‘American Constitutionalism and German Constitutional Development’ in Henkin and Rosenthal (n 66), 212–16.

(69) There is no comprehensive analysis of comparative constitutional law used by the German courts. Of the sparse statistical data, one study in 1974 counted 24 decisions of the Federal Constitutional Court which had recourse to comparative law. See Jörg Martin Mössner, ‘Rechtsvergleichung und Verfassungsrechtsprechung’ (1974) Archiv des öffentlichen Rechts 193. Another analysis can be found in Ulrich Drobnig, ‘Rechtsvergleichung in der deutschen Rechtsprechung’ (1987) Rabels Zeitschrift für ausländisches und internationales Privatrecht 610–30. The latest survey refers mainly to the court practice of the Federal High Courts, including the Federal Constitutional Court in the years 1950 to 1990. Approximately 70 of the reported cases were handed down by the Federal Supreme Court (Bundesgerichtshof), another 25 cases originate from the Federal Constitutional Court. In contrast, the other Federal High Courts have used comparative law in only a few instances. See Ulrich Drobnig, ‘The Use of Foreign Law by the German Courts’ in Sir Basil Markesinis and Jörg Fedtke (eds), Judicial Recourse to Foreign Law (2006).
The Use of Foreign Law in Constitutional Interpretation

(73) BVerfGE 59, 280, at 283 and 286.

(74) BVerfGE 35, 311, at 320, BVerfGE 74, 102, at 121, BVerfGE 74, 358, at 370, BVerfGE 82, 106, at 114.

(75) BVerfGE 5, 85, at 135–6.

(76) BVerfGE 7, 198.

(77) BVerfGE 20, 162, at 229–31.

(78) According to Drobnig, important as some of the decisions citing foreign law are, their share of all the published decisions amounts to no more than 1 per cent. See Drobnig (n 69), 141.

(79) BVerfGE 104, 337, at 349.

(80) BVerfGE 105, 313, at 315.

(81) BVerfGE 95, 96, at 133.

(82) BVerfGE 28, 243 at 258.

(83) BVerfGE 1, 372, at 382.

(84) BVerfGE 32, 54, at 70.

(85) See for this example Rosenfeld (n 18), 190–1, but also in Richard E. Levy and Alexander Somek, ‘Paradoxical Parallels in the American and German Abortion Decisions’ (2001) 9 Tulane Journal of International and Comparative Law 109.

(86) 410 US 113 (1973).

(87) BVerfGE 39, 1.

(88) See Chapter 51 in this volume.

(90) BVerfGE 90, 241, 148.

(91) Donald P. Kommers argues that ‘in the American view [as contrasted with the German], the community has no valid claim upon the individual person, particularly in the domain of mind and morals’: ‘The Jurisprudence of Free Speech in the United States and the Federal Republic of Germany’ (1980) 53 Southern California Law Review 678, 694.

(95) United Mizrahi Bank Ltd v Migdal Village, Supreme Court (Israel), CA 6821/93, 49(4)P.D.221 (1995).

(97) AIR 1973 SC 146.

(98) BVerfGE 6, 32.

(99) This is the very reason that Gray Jeffrey Jacobsohn, in his book on the comparison of constitutionalism in Israel and the United States discusses the Israeli Supreme Court's embrace of the American free speech doctrine. See (n 96), 177–227.

(100) 7 PD 871 (1953).

(101) Israel's highest court typically sits in a panel of three. In this case Justice Agranat was joined by Justices Sussman and Landau.

(103) 31 (2) PD 281 (1974).

(105) 32 (3) PD 337 (1978).

(106) 41 (3) PD 255 (1986).

(108) Kahane, 41 (3) PD at 312.

(109) Ibid 316.

(111) As one German scholar observed, the influence of the German Federal Constitutional Court was decisive on the jurisprudence of political and civil rights. See Andreas Zimmermann, ‘Bürgerliche und politische Rechte in der Verfassungsrechtsprechung mittel- und osteuropäischer Staaten unter besonderer Berücksichtigung der Einflüsse der deutschen Verfassungsgerichtsbarkeit’ in Jochen Abr Frowein (ed), Grundfragen der Verfassungsgerichtsbarkeit in Mittel- und Osteuropa (1998), 89–124. In the same volume, the then President of the Hungarian Constitutional Court and his advisor acknowledge this use of German law in constitutional interpretation. See László Sólyom, ‘Anmerkungen zur Rezeption auf dem Gebiet der wirtschaftlichen und sozialen rechte aus ungarischer Sicht’, 213–27 and Gábor Halmai, ‘Bürgerliche und politische Rechte in der Verfassungsrechtsprechung Ungarns’, 125–9.

(112) See Dupré (n 110), 70ff.

(113) Michel Rosenfeld and András Sajó, ‘Spreading Liberal Constitutionalism: An Inquiry into the Fate of Free Speech Rights in New Democracies’ in Choudhry, Migration of Constitutional Ideas (n 11), 149.

(114) Ibid 159.

(117) Emphasis added. Section 35 of the Interim Constitution of 1993 contained a similar provision, but with the phrase removed from the final text that the use of international and foreign law is an obligation only ‘where applicable’.

(118) Scrutinizing Supreme Court and Constitutional Court judgments between July 1994 and August 1998, there were no less than 1,258 references to the decisions of US, Canadian, British, German, European, and Indian courts. See Jörg Fedtke, Die Rezeption von Verfassungsrecht. Südafrica 1993–96 (2000), 446.

(119) CCT 5/94.

(120) CCT 3/94.

(121) CCT 3/96.

(122) CCT 4/96.

(124) See eg Sir Sydney Kentridge, ‘Comparative Law in Constitutional Adjudication’, in Markesinis and Fedtke (n 69), 334.

(125) CCT 1/96.

(126) See Markesinis and Fedtke (n 69), 95.

(127) CCT 10/97.

(128) See Michel Rosenfeld, ‘Constitutional Migration and the Bounds of Comparative Analysis’ (2001) 58 NYU Annual Survey of American Law 67. Rosenfeld focuses on Justice Sachs’s opinion rather on that of the Court’s majority.

(131) See this argument in Jackson (n 11), 5–6.

(133) See Weinrib (n 36).

(134) Cf Rosenfeld and Sajó (n 113).

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Gábor Halmai</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Gábor Halmai is Professor of Law and Director, Institute for Political and International Studies, ELTE Faculty of Social Sciences, Budapest</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Index

Oxford Handbooks Online

Index

abortion
bioethics 1143, 1146, 1150–1
citizenship 1058, 1060, 1069, 1073, 1077
constitutionalization 1057–77
constitutional law 1060–4 counselling 1059, 1070–2, 1075–7 criminalization 1060–75
dignity and autonomy 380–1, 387–8, 391–2, 1057–60, 1064–5, 1069–73, 1077
Europe 1057–77
European Convention on Human Rights 1237–8 foundational frameworks 1064–71 fundamental rights 387–8
gender 415
identity 771
indications legislation 1060–4, 1066, 1068, 1071–5
judicial review 808 periodic legislation 1072–3 politics 1060–4
privacy 1066
protecting life/protection women 1073–5 protecting life/respecting women 1075–7
religion 1063, 1071, 1146
socio-economic rights 1031–2 values 1059, 1062–3, 1065, 1067–72, 1075–7 absolutism 105, 637–8, 653, 659–60 access to information 899–900, 1282
accountability
democracy 1167, 1179–80
executive 663–4
independence of the judiciary 834, 839, 843, 855, 861
internal accountability 861
internationalization of constitutional law 1179–80
judiciary 861–2, 865–9
parliamentary systems 663–4
reparations 1280
Ackerly, Brooke A 1144
Ackerman, Bruce 63, 103, 228, 320, 445, 559, 656, 679–80, 1345–6
Adenauer, Konrad 475, 768
administrative procedures 678–82
affirmative action 990–2, 1124–40
constitutionalization 1129–35
cultural rights 1128
European Union 1128, 1135–7
gender 1128, 1130–1, 1135–7 identification of disadvantaged 1131–5 indirect action 1125–6 non-constitutionalization and side effects 1135–40 outreach 1126–7 politically dominant, economically disadvantaged groups 1129–31 positive discrimination 1126–9, 1136
quotas 1126, 1132–6
race 1125–6, 1129–39
religion 1125, 1130–1
side effects of constitutionalization and non-constitutionalization 1129–40 tie-break rules 1126, 1132, 1135
Afghanistan 1270–1, 1289–90, 1297–8
Africa
African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights 933, 996–7 colonialism 636–8
development 636–8
impoverishment 156–66, 168
presidential systems 638, 644, 647
agencies 673–8, 682–5
Agranat, Simon 1340
Aguirre Anguiano, Sergei 1097
Ahmadi-Nejad, Mahmud 1290
Alexy, Robert 725, 730, 741, 746
Allan, TRS 1346
Allende, Salvador 641
Allison, JWF 316
al-Qa’eda 1296
Althusius, Johannes 494
amendment or revision of constitutions 9, 420–1, 437–40 adjudication, theory of 364 authority 431
‘difficult amending system’ concept 439 eternity clauses 439 flexibility 110, 421 fundamental change 421, 437
implied limitations 440
interpretation 690, 698, 704, 708–9
judicial review 440
limitations 439–40
margin of appreciation 364 popular initiatives 433 process and meaning 438–9
referendums 438, 509
rigid or flexible constitutions 110
sovereignty 363–5
stability 439
super-majority 110–11, 438
unamendable provisions 111, 437–40
American Convention on Human Rights 933
amnesties, pseudo-amnesties or clemency 1274–5, 1277–9
Anderson, Benedict 758
Anderson, Elizabeth 1139 animals and nature, dignity of 384, 391–2 anonymity, super-injunctions and 133–4, 206 Arab Charter of Human Rights 985
area studies 56–7
Arendt, Hannah 265–6, 767, 949, 1011
armed forces see military service Asia see also individual countries colonialism 636–8
development 636–8
human rights 17–18
impoverishment 156–62, 165–8
presidential systems 638, 647
values 17–18, 157, 160
associative rights 948–64 see also freedom of assembly; freedom of association
Ataturk, Kemal 219
Austin, John 363
Austin, Stephen F 635
Australia
elections 531–2, 539–40
executive 564
Index

freedom of expression 892
interpretation 694–6, 700–1, 703, 707, 709–17
judicial appointments 710–12
mixed constitutionalism 175
privacy 974
separation of powers 564
usages and conventions 230
authoritarianism see illiberal regimes
autochthonous constitutions 218–21
autocracies see illiberal regimes autonomy see dignity and autonomy
Avino, Graig 848
Bach, Gabriel 1341
Bagehot, Walter 652
Baines, Beverly 65
Baldouin I, King 803
Balla, Steven 675
Banna, Hasan 1296
Barak, Aharon 724–5, 779, 781–2, 1339–41
Baranger, Denis 270
Barendt, Eric 106
Bastid, Paul 472
Baubock, Rainer 486, 1013
Beattie, John 939
Beatty, David M 725, 1330–1
Beauchamp, Tom L 1145
Beaud, Olivier 422–3, 426–7
Beccaria, Cesare 938
Bednar, Jenna 596
Beers, Daniel 849
Belgium 1241–2, 1249–50
Bellamy, Richard 574
Ben-Gurion, David 1340
Benhabib, Seyla 992
Bentham, Jeremy 285
Beran, Harry 484–5
Bergasse, Nicolas 940
Berlin, Isaiah 284, 1346
Berlusconi, Silvio 1261
Bernhardt, Rudolf 1234
Beyleveld, Derrick 1154
Bienenfeld, FR. 932
Bierling, Ernst Rudolf 285
bills of rights
Bill of Rights 1689 251, 466–7, 661, 950
Index

Canada 179–90
constitutional courts 176–7, 179–80
group rights 1107
(p. 1351) interpretation 707–8
procedural justice 339–41
South Africa 1344–5
truth or consensus constitutions 115
United States 109, 119, 212–13, 273, 1344–5
Bingham, Tom 1244–5 bin Laden, Osama 1210, 1297–8
bioethics 1142–60
abortion 1143, 1146, 1150–1 beginning of life 1148–9
biomedicine 1145–6
Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU 1145 cloning 1144–5, 1147 common European approach 1145
dignity and autonomy 1145–7, 1154–5, 1159–60
DNA 1143, 1156–9
end of life decisions/euthanasia 18, 1154–6
European Convention on Human Rights 1143, 1145–50, 1155, 1158
Europe, end of life decisions in 1154–5 freedom of science 1147
human rights 1142–50, 1155, 1158
human tissues and cells, extension of basic rights to 1156–9 informed consent 1150 jurisprudence of core questions 1148–59
justice 1145
national constitutions 1146–8 normative bioethics 1144–5 patents 1152–4, 1158–9
privacy 1157–9
procreative liberties, concept of 1150–1
religion 1146
reproductive rights 1148–50, 1159–60 research on human embryos and embryonic stem cells 1151–4, 1158–60
subsidiarity 1145
Universal Declaration of Human Rights 1144–5
Bismarck, Otto von 125, 955, 1021
Black, Hugo 901, 1038, 1334
Blackstone, William 44, 207–8, 212, 551, 1086
Blais, Andre 534
Bloch, Marc 1287
Böckenförde, EW 912
Bodin, Jean 193–4, 203–4, 350, 354, 359
Index

Bolingbroke, Henry St John 208–9, 211
Bolívar, Simon 634
Bomhoff, Jacco 66
Bonaparte, Napoleon 940
Bork, Robert 348
borrowing, transplantation and migration 13–18, 1304–26
autochthonous constitutions 220–1 bias 1320 chance borrowings 1317, 1319
citizenship 1010–12 consent 1307 convergence 1309–11, 1320, 1325–6, 1329
cost-savings 1318
culture 1306, 1310, 1320–1, 1323–4, 1326
definition of constitution 220–1
due process 14–15
foreign law 1317, 1321–5, 1328–30, 1346–7
functionalism 1317–18, 1324
geographical proximity 1319–21
globalization 1305, 1325
interpretation 13–14, 1305, 1309, 1319, 1321
judicial review 1305, 1313, 1315, 1318–19
justification 1321–5
language 1320–1, 1325
legal education 1305, 1317, 1320
motivations 1317–19
non-borrowing 1308
norms 1312–15, 1317, 1319, 1321
object 1313–15
patterns 1319–21
private law 1305–9, 1311–18, 1322, 1325
proportionality 1315, 1320
public/private law distinction 1311–13 rejection 1306–7 reputational motivation 1317, 1318
rule of law 1322–3 terminology 1306–8, 1329–30
timing 1315–17
transnational constitutionalism 76, 86
vertical and horizontal migrations 1319–20
boundaries of constitutions 221–6
Bracher, Karl Dietrich 887
Bracton, Henry de 242, 660
Brancati, Dawn 604
Brandeis, Louis 588
Index

Brandom, Robert  291
Brandt, Willy  1260
Brazier, James E  674–5
Brennan, William J  959, 1334
Breslin, Beau  137, 143
Brewer-Caraí, Allan Randolph  55
(p. 1352)  Breyer, Stephen  457, 679–80, 682, 1323, 1332
Brezhnev, Leonid  638
bricolage  1079–80
Brilmayer, Lea  487
Brinks, Daniel M  167
Brown, Darryl  942–3
Brown, Gordon  468, 668
Brownsword, Roger  1154
Bryce, James  4, 506, 658
Bryde, Brun-Otto  1337–8
Buchanan, Allen  486, 1105
Buchanan, James  342–3
Budge, Ian  507
Burdeau, Georges  278
Burger, Warren E  44, 1086
Burgess, Michael  581, 583
Burke, Edmund  79–80, 662, 786–7
Bush, George W  46, 451, 458, 565, 1153
Cairo Declaration on Human Rights in Islam  984–5
Calabresi, Steven  559
Calhoun, John C  497 campaign finance  539–43
Campbell, Naomi  905
Canada
abortion  1060–1
Charter of Rights and Freedoms  179–90
citizenship  1003, 1007–8, 1011, 1017
economic rights  1049–51, 1053
elections  532
equality and non-discrimination  986–7, 994, 999
federalism  594
freedom of expression  895–6, 898, 903, 906
gender  405–6, 408
identity  761
interpretation  694–6, 698–700, 707–17
judicial appointments  711–12
judicial review  798–9
language  1106
notwithstanding clause  713, 798–9
Index

parliamentary sovereignty 798–9
political parties 538
proportionality 723, 727, 743
Quebec 495–500, 761, 1106
secession 495–500
separation of powers 552
Canes-Wrone, Brandice 683
Capitant, Henri 5,10
Cardozo, Benjamin 595, 787, 891–2, 1338
Carey, John 559
Carré de Malberg, Raymond 353–4, 362, 365, 503
Cartabia, M 1042
Cassin, René 956
censorship 894, 900–2
certification, process of 436–7
Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU
bioethics 1145
economic rights 1052
equality and non-discrimination 984, 997
European Convention on Human Rights 1233, 1250
European Union 1198, 1204–6
petition, right to 949
Chase, Samuel 698
Chávez, Hugo 630
checks and balances
constitutionalism 210–11
democracy 254, 257–8
efficiency 796, 805
executive 567
guardians of the constitution 800
internationalization of constitutional law 1181–2
judiciary 860–1
parliamentary systems 561
procedural justice 341–2
separation of powers 211, 550, 574
state sovereignty 351
Cheibub, José A 669
Childress, James F 1145
China 128–9, 846, 848, 1110
Chirac, Jacques 879
choice theory 484–6
Choudhry, Sujit 59, 62, 604, 1088, 1305, 1313, 1332
Cicero 195–7, 200, 250, 549 citation of foreign law see foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of citizenship 1002–18
Index

abortion 1058, 1060, 1069, 1073, 1077 becoming a citizen, legal dimension of 1005–16 birth place 1005–8
borrowing 1010–12
ceremonies and tests 1013–14 convergence thesis 1011
(p. 1353) cosmopolitanism 1017
culture 1009–10, 1012–16
dual nationality 1010–13
elections 532–4
equality 1004, 1007–8, 1014–15
European Union 1016–17
future 1016–18
gender 1007–8, 1015
group rights 1100, 1119
habitual residence 1007
identity 1004, 1014
immigration control 1014–17
integration 1014, 1017
jus sanguinis principle (parentage principle) 1006, 1008–10, 1017 jus soli principle (territoriality principle) 1005–10, 1017–18
language 1014
loss of citizenship 1010–12
marital status 1007 nation states, determination by 1004 naturalization 1005–6, 1012–16
parentage principle 1006, 1008–10, 1017
religion 1014–15
residency 532–3
secession 483–4, 487, 493
territoriality principle 1005–10, 1017–18
civil and political rights
group rights 1101–8
International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 489, 930, 932, 943, 958, 984–5, 993–4
socio-economic rights 1020, 1022, 1025, 1033
socio-political rights 949–62
civil law and common law 50–2, 55, 846, 850–2 civil servants see public service classificatory work 54, 55–8, 60
Clinton, Bill 562, 680, 866, 1153 closed shops 960–1
Cockburn, JS 939
codified constitutions 106
Coffin, Frank M 726 cognitive constitutionalism 202–4
Index

Cohen, Linda R 682–3
Coke, Edward 930, 970, 1006
Cold War 7, 47, 158–9, 464, 491–3, 636, 1255–6, 1263–7 collective rights 1043–6, 1048, 1050, 1052, 1103–5
Collier, Paul 161
Colombia 1030, 1033
colonization
Africa 636–8
Asia 636–8
decolonization 91–2, 422, 431–2
development 636–8
foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of 51, 1331
hegemony 12
making constitutions 422, 431–2
Middle East 636–8
post-colonial constitutional model 762–3, 765–6
presidentialism 636–8
time 91–2
common law and civil law 50–2, 55, 846, 850–2 communitarian constitutionalism 137, 142–7 Confucius 135, 144
conscientious objection to military service 920
conscription 465, 920
consensus constitutions 114–15 consequentialism 62–6, 835–6, 839–40
conspiracy 963–4
Constant, Benjamin 4, 440 constant/static and living constitutions, difference between 99–100 constituent assemblies 423, 426–9 constitutional conventions 652–3
constitutional courts 7–8, 816–29
abstract review 818, 823–4, 829
appointment and composition 818, 824–5
centralization 817–18
concrete review 823–4, 828
constitutionalization 827–8
contracts, constitutions as 821–2 decentralized American model 817–20, 823–4 delegation theory 820–2 democratic transitions 826–7, 829 design and functions 820–5 diffusion 817–20
doctrinal demands, self-reflection and expressive comparison 68 efficacy 796–7, 804–13, 817, 819, 825–6, 828–9
European centralized model of review 816–19, 823
Index

(p. 1354) federalism 821
functionalism 67–8, 820–2
fundamental rights 818–19, 821, 829
independence of the judiciary 833
individual constitutional complaints 823, 828 insurance model of judicial review 820–1
inter-disciplinarity 817 internationalization 1174–6
Islam 1298–300
judicialization of politics 827
judicial review 796–7, 807–13, 816–29
jurisdiction 822–4
lawmaking 827–9
legitimacy 816–17, 819, 821, 825, 827–9
methodologies 67–8
models 817–20
negative and positive legislators 819 ombudsmen 823–4
origins 817–20
parliamentary sovereignty 796–9, 818, 820
parliamentary systems 818–19
reasons for decisions 825
scholars and courts 68
separation of powers 817–18, 828
constitutionalism 189–215, 304–16
abdication, insulation through 204–5
checks and balances 210–11
cognitive constitutionalism 202–4 communitarianism 137, 142–7
corruption 205–6, 210–11
counter-majoritarianism 189–91
democracy 94, 189–92, 200, 207–11, 215 drill and discipline 194–8 dualism 304–12, 314–15
elites 190–5, 198–200, 214–15
emergency, states of 443, 446–7, 452, 460
equality and non-discrimination 987–8, 999
European Union's constitution 1189–1205
form and substance of constitutionalism 92–4 generic constitutionalism 133–4 illiberal constitutionalism 133–49
impoverishment 153–68
internationalization 1168–9
Islamic constitutionalism 139–42 joint agency and corruption 205–6, 210–11
judicial review 212–14
legal constitutionalism 170, 173–6 legislation, unconstitutionality of 207–10, 212–13 liberal constitutionalism 134–6 limited power, paradox of 198–200
macro-constitutionalism 175–6
methodologies 75–97
micro-constitutionalism 175–6
mixed constitutionalism 137–8, 175
monarchical constitutions 200–2, 204–5 parliamentary immunity 193–4, 203–4 particular constitutionalisms 133–4 political constitutionalism 170, 173–5
proportionality 291
pseudo-constitutionalism 108
public international law, internationalization of 1213, 1229 realism and idealism 191–4
religion 138–42, 148–9, 911–12, 923
restraints 190–6
secular constitutionalism 138–40, 142, 267, 922–6 semi-constitutionalism 109
state constitutionalism, legacy of 1189–90
thin constitutionalism 1195–203
total constitutionalism 170, 172, 174–6
traditional constitutionalism 87
transitional justice 1270–86
transnationalism 75–97
constitutionalization
abortion 1057–77
affirmative action 1129–35
capability approach 155–6
constitutional courts 827–8
European Union 773
international organizations 1219–22
internationalization 1166
national and international constitutions 130–1 partial constitutionalization 1219–29
public international law, internationalization of 1213, 1219–29
secession 495–7
side-effects 1129–35
World Trade Organization 1217 constitutional law 169–85 see also internationalization of constitutional law
abortion 1060–4
bills of rights 176–7, 179–80
(p. 1355) constitution and constitutional law, difference between 111
Index

definition of constitutional law 170–3 European Union’s constitution 1188–94
horizontal effect 177–81
judicial review 177, 185
‘large/big-c’ constitutions 170–3
legal constitutionalism 170, 173–6 legal system, in 169–85
macro-constitutionalism 175–6
micro-constitutionalism 175–6
mixed regimes 175
political constitutionalism 170, 173–5 positive rights 181–5 private sphere 177–81 rights versus structure 176–7 ‘small-c’ constitutions 171–3 social and economic rights 181–5 specific parts of legal system 175–85 thin constitutionalism 1195–203
total constitutionalism 170, 172, 174–6 vertical effect 177–80
constitutional rights
democracy 253, 284–5, 289
freedom of expression 892–3, 897–9, 904, 907
proportionality 291–2, 297
rights and liberties 288–97 rules 291, 292–7
state sovereignty 357
values and principles 291, 292–7
constructivism 26–8, 35–6 context 55, 66–8, 71–2, 949–62
contracts, constitutions as 821–2 convergence 12–13, 1166–9, 1172–3, 1309–11, 1320, 1325–6, 1329
Cooley, Thomas M 217, 930
corporations 383, 1037
corruption and bribery 205–6, 210–11, 872 cosmopolitanism 265–6, 383, 1017
Costa, Jean-Paul 1243
cost-benefit analysis 678–82
Cottu, Charles 941 councils of state 799–800, 806
counter-majoritarianism 189–91, 258
courts see constitutional courts; individual courts crime 112, 1275–9
abortion 1060–75
amnesties, pseudo-amnesties or clemency 1277–9
corruption and bribery 205–6, 210–11, 872
due process 935–46, 1276, 1278
fraud 434, 534, 536–7
impunity 1273, 1276–7
international courts 361 international crimes 1272–84
military courts 1276
no punishment without law 1279
pardons 1278
proportionality 719–21
prosecutions 1275–9
sex crimes and gender 398–9, 411–13, 415
sodomy, criminalization of 44–5, 51, 970–1, 1081, 1083–8, 1335
state sovereignty 361
transitional justice 1272–84
Critical Legal Studies 17, 233, 310–11
Croall, Hazel 936
Cromwell, Oliver 768
Cross, Frank 675, 1023
culture
affirmative action 1128
borrowing, transplantation, and migration 1306, 1310, 1320–1, 1323–4, 1326
citizenship 1009–10, 1012–16
dignity and autonomy 376–7, 383, 394
equality and non-discrimination 1000
ethnic groups 1101–2
foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of 1329
gender 403–7, 411, 414
group rights 1101–2, 1105–6, 1108–14, 1123
human rights 373–5
identity 757–9
illiberal constitutionalism 142–7
independence of judiciary 834, 837, 840–50, 853
International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights 958, 984, 996, 1022
interpretation 694, 709–14
naturalization 1012–16
politics 712–14
religion 912, 916, 918
secession 485
sexual orientation 1088, 1096
universalism 375
values and principles 786, 790
Currie, David 184
(p. 1356) custom dualism 1212
equality and non-discrimination 984
gender 400–1, 404, 412, 414
internationalization 1212
jus cogens 130, 524, 1213–19, 1224–5, 1277
transitional justice 1284
UN Charter 1218
Dahl, Robert 465–6, 593
Dahlerup, Drude 410
Darwin, Charles 196
data protection 973–4, 976
Davies, Malcolm 936
Davis, Dennis 167
Davis, DM 1317
de Beauvoir, Simone 1061
de Figueiredo, Rui 596
de Gasperi, Alcide 1261
de Gaulle, Charles 424, 429, 435, 645, 821, 882 de Vergottini, Giuseppe 270
death penalty
dignity and autonomy 381–2, 394
foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of 15, 43, 50, 1334–5 juveniles 15, 43, 50, 1334–5 declarations of incompatibility 798, 1234–5
defamation 662, 896–7, 904–5 defensive democracy see militant democracy
definition of constitution 217–31
absolutism 105
autochthonous, whether constitution must be 218–21 basic laws 100
borrowing 220–1
boundaries of constitutions 221–6 constitution outside the constitution 224–5 descriptive constitutions 226–7, 230–1 ethnicity 219–20 fundamental laws 100–1
hierarchy of norms 103–4 modern constitutions 100–5
national and international constitutions 131 operative and sham constitutions 225–6 popular consent and public power 102–5 positive law 102–3
religion 104–5
revolutions 102–5
separation of powers 102
social contract 102
southernity/supremacy  218 stability of constitutions 226–30
written/unwritten constitutions 223–6 delegation 366, 671–5, 820–2
democracy 250–67
accountability 1167, 1179–80
autocracies 251–2, 254–6
Bill of Rights 1689  251
checks and balances 254, 257–8
civil society 253, 256–9, 262, 265
constitutional courts 826–7, 829
constitutionalism 94, 189–92, 200, 207–11, 215
constitutional rights 253, 284–5, 289
contestability of decisions 258
cosmopolitanism 265–6
counter-majoritarianism 258 dangers and precautions 256–64 deliberative democracy 255–6
demos 250, 252–3, 266
dignity and autonomy 380–1, 388, 393
direct democracy 252–3, 254, 366–7 dispersion of power 258
economic rights 1049–50
e-democracy 264–5
elections 258, 529–30, 535, 542–3
emergency, states of 260–4
equality 251, 253
European Union 120–1, 668, 1179–80
experimentalism 261, 264, 266
federalism 587–8, 591
feminism 253
franchise, extension of the 251
fundamental rights 119
gender 400, 409
globalization 265
group rights 1104 histories of democracy 250–2
human rights 265–6
illiberal democracies  657
impoverishment 157, 160–6
institutions 262, 265
international institutions/organizations 265
internationalization of constitutional law 1167, 1179–80
Islamic states 256–7, 266–7
(p. 1357) liberal democracies 116–22, 253–6, 1049–50
Index

liberal non-democratic constitutions 119–22
local democracy 266
Magna Carta 251
making constitutions 430, 434
mass democracy 429–31, 955–6
militant democracy 538, 1253–68
non-liberal democratic constitutions 122–4
parliamentarism 251, 254–5, 653, 656–7, 666–7
parliamentary sovereignty 251
pólis 250–3
political extremism 259–61
presidential systems 629–31, 639–47
proportionality 723, 735–6, 739, 741, 745–6, 749–51
public/private divide 253
radical democracy 122
referendums 501, 505–9
religion 256–7, 266–7 representative democracy 253–5 revolutions 118–19
rule of law 258
secession 483–7, 491, 493, 499–500
secrecy 262–4
secular states 266–7
self-determination 487, 491, 493
social contract 117–18
social democracy 1041–3
socialist constitutions 128
sovereignty 366–7
state structure 380–1, 388, 393 transitions 1, 6–7, 46, 257, 266, 826–7, 1047–8 truth or consensus constitutions 115
tyrranical majorities 257–8 varieties of democracy 252–6 Descartes, René 938–9
descriptive constitutions 106–7, 226–7, 230–1
design of constitutions 446–51 despotic regimes see illiberal regimes detention 442, 452–60, 1235–6 development 142–7, 156–62, 636–8 devolution 577, 612, 615, 620, 1169–70
Díaz, Porfirio 635
Dicey, AV 4, 217, 224, 235–7, 239, 241–2, 247, 270–3, 276, 447, 459, 503, 624, 652, 656
Dickson, Brian 904, 1346
Diderot, Denis 194 differences/divergences 16–18, 42, 48–9, 269–70, 404–9, 662–8
dignity and autonomy 370–95
abortion 380–1, 387–8, 391–2, 1057–60, 1064–5, 1069–73, 1077 animals and nature 384, 391–2 bearers of rights 384
beginning, diachronical continuity and end 386, 391–2
bioethics 1145–7, 1154–5, 1159–60
communitarianism 142
concretization 379–83, 391 content 379–90
corporations 384
cosmopolitan framework 383
culture 376–7, 383, 394
death penalty 381–2, 394
definition 390
democracy and state structure 380–1, 388, 393
equality and non-discrimination 371, 380, 388–9, 393–4
European Convention on Human Rights 374–5 fundamental rights 374, 379, 385, 387–8, 392–3
gender 408
history 375–8
horizontal effect 384–5, 391
human rights 371–5, 388, 391, 394–5 instrumentalism and objectivization 378–9, 389–91, 394
international courts 383
legal positivism 371
legitimacy 389–90
limitations and justification 387–8, 392, 394 material preconditions of human life 380 modern constitutional orders, in 370–95
norms 375–9, 383–6, 393
objective element of law 384, 390–1 particularism and universalism 393–5
personal integrity 380 personal scope 390–1 political order 388, 392–3 positive duties and rights, procedural elements of 385, 391
positive law 371, 385
privacy 968–9, 975
procedural elements 385, 391
(p. 1358) religion 377–8, 395, 913–16, 919, 923–5 scope of dignity 379–86 secular humanism 393–4
self-determination 372, 375, 378, 380, 390, 393
slavery 371, 381, 385, 391
social expression of human worth 380–1
Index

social rights 391
socio-economic rights 1029, 1033
subjective rights 383-4, 390-1 torture 388, 392
UN Charter 371–2
Universal Declaration of Human Rights 371–2
universalism 373–4, 384, 389–90, 393–5
disability 988, 990, 997–8 discrimination see equality and non-discrimination Dixon, Rosalind 67
DNA 1143, 1156–9
doctrinal constructivism 26–8, 35–6
Dorn, James 343
Douglas, William O 44, 901
Dreze, Jean 168
Drobnig, Ulrich 1338
droit administratif 623–5
Dzemczewski, Andrew 1241
dualism 56, 103, 304–12, 314–15, 1211–13
dual nationality 1010–13
Dubber, Markus 935–6
Duchacek, Ivo 580–1
due process 929–47
adversarial due process 930, 938–47
African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights 933
American Convention on Human Rights 933 borrowing and transplantation 14–15
clauses 930–3
crime control model and due process model 935–6 criminal justice 935–46, 1276, 1278
economic rights 1038
European Convention on Human Rights 930, 932, 934, 943–4
European Union 944
foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of 43–4, 52 global revolution 943–7
history 930–3
human rights 930, 932–4, 943–4
International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 930, 932, 943
International Criminal Court 943–4
justice 933–4, 947
Magna Carta 930–2
procedural due process 930–4
prosecutions 1276, 1278
rule of law 934, 944–5
sexual orientation 43–4
Index

substantive due process 931
truth commissions 1286
Universal Declaration of Human Rights 932
values and principles 785, 787–8
Duguit, Léon 5
Dupré, Catherine 1237, 1341–2
Durkheim, Émile 912
Duverger, Maurice 646
Dworkin, Ronald 29, 244, 293–4, 297, 320–2, 343, 459, 868, 780–1, 1331
Eastern Europe and former Soviet Union 555, 638–9, 1047–9 see also Cold War; individual countries Ebert, Friedrich 874, 886 economic rights 1036–53 see also socio-economic rights
Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU 1052 collective bargaining 1044–6, 1048, 1050, 1052
due process 1038
Eastern Europe, new democracies in 1047–9 enforcement 1025–7, 1030–3
Europe 1037
European Convention on Human Rights 1037, 1050, 1052
European Union 1051–2
expropriation 1038–43
freedom of association 1045, 1049–50 labour rights 1037–45, 1049–53 liberalism 1037–9, 1049–50
neoliberalism 1037
new democracies 1047–9
objections 1023–5
private property 1037–43, 1052–3
(p. 1359) public interest 1038, 1048 public policy 1037
relief 1025–7
social democracy 1036, 1041–4, 1048
social or welfare state constitution 126–7 stronger forms of rights and relief 1030–3 trade union rights 1043–7, 1048–52 transnational corporations 1037 weak rights/weak review 1027–30
Weimar Constitution 1039–41, 1047
economics 91–2, 143–4
e-constitutions 421
efficacy 795–815
checks and balances 796, 805
constitutional courts 796–9, 804–5, 807–13, 825–6
design 795–6
Index

guardians of the constitution 800–5, 813–14
head of state as co-guardian of constitution 803–5
judicial review 796–9, 805–29
legal character of constitutions 106–7 legislation, preparation of 799–805 non-judicial methods 799–805
parliamentary sovereignty 796–9
parliament as guardian of the constitution 800–3 promulgation of legislation 803–5 refusal to sign bills 803–4
rule of law 237–8
writing 795–6
egalitarianism 336, 343–4
Eichenberger, Reiner 581
Eisgruber, Christopher 788
Elazar, Daniel 580, 603
elections 529–43
age restrictions 531–2 alternative vote 876, 879
ballotage 876, 878–9 bicameral legislatures 530
campaign finance 539–43
citizenship and residency 532–4 date of elections 652
democracy 529–30, 535, 542–3 designing elections 530, 876–81
d’Hondt formula 876–7
Downsian logic 878–9
European Union 533–4
executive 530
federal states 531–4
first-past-the-post 529, 876
franchise, extension of the 251
fraud 534, 536–7
freedom of expression 892
gender 409–10
group rights 1114–19, 1122
identification laws 535–7 legislative elections, designing 876–7
legitimacy 879
local elections 533–4, 880 majorities, manufacture of 876
making constitutions 433–4 mental capacity 532
one-person, one-vote 530
parliamentary systems 529–30, 880–1
political parties 537–9, 876–81
presidential and semi-presidential elections 529–30, 553, 559, 877–82 prisoners’ right to vote 534–5, 999
proportional representation 529, 538, 876–7
right to participate 531–7 Sainte-Laguë method 876
sovereignty 366
trade unions, contributions from 542 unicameral legislatures 530
Elizabeth II, Queen 637
Elkins, Zachary 65
Elster, Jon 190
Ely, John Hart 465, 867, 1339 embryos and embryonic stem cells, research on 1151–4
emergency, states of 442–61
civil society 262
constitutionalism 443, 446–7, 452, 460
control orders 457
democracy 260–3
derogation model 451–60 design of constitutions 446–51
detention 442, 452–60
equality and non-discrimination 984
executive 442, 445–58, 566–7 habeas corpus 442, 453, 458, 460
human rights 454–6, 459–60
internal emergencies 449
judicial review 450, 457, 459
judiciary 442–4, 446, 449–50, 452–9 legality 443, 451–2, 455–6, 460
legislative powers 566–7
(p. 1360) liberalism 443–4, 452
martial law 447, 451
militant democracies 260–2 negative republicanism 261–2
operative and sham constitutions 226
parliamentary sovereignty 451
parliaments 443–4, 446, 450–1, 460, 566–7
political extremism 261
practice 446–51
proportionality 456, 459–60
Rechtsstaat 444
security services 263–4
Index

Special Immigration Appeals Commission 453–7, 460
state sovereignty 444 suspension-as-legalization 458–9 terrorism 264
Weimar Constitution 446–8
written constitutions 443, 445, 451
Engels, Friedrich 124 England see also United Kingdom
citizenship 1006
Crown, legal concept of the 280–1
definition of constitution 100
due process 930–2, 938–43
Glorious Revolution 101, 549–50
independence of the judiciary 549 Instrument of Government 101 monarchical state 278–9
petition, right to 950
popular sovereignty 101–2
referendums 503, 510
religion 909–10, 923–4
separation of powers 549–52
state, conception of the 270, 272
supremacy 101
entrenchment 121–2, 226–30
Eötvös, József 4
Epp, Charles 714
Epstein, Lee 1318–19
equality and non-discrimination 982–1001
affirmative action 990–2, 1124–40
African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights 996–7
age 997–8
Arab Charter of Human Rights 985
arbitrariness 986–7 binding force 1000–1
Cairo Declaration on Human Rights in Islam 984–5
Canada 986–7, 994, 999
Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU 984, 997
children and families 1000
citizenship 1004, 1007–8, 1014–15
constitutionalism 987–8, 999
content of right 986–93
Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) 402, 409, 986, 1000
culture 1000
custom 984
democracy 251, 253
difference 984–8
dignity and autonomy 371, 380, 388–9, 393–4
disability 988, 990, 997–8 diversity 987–8, 992 dominance 988
egalitarianism 336, 343–4
dependency, states of 984 equal access 995–6, 1000
European Convention on Human Rights 985–9, 995
European Union 991–2, 995, 997, 1000, 1136–7 generations concept 995–6
group rights 1100, 1105–7, 1110–14, 1120, 1122
human rights 291, 983–5, 988–9, 993–1000
International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 984–5, 993–4
International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights 984, 996 justice 982
key guarantees 983–5
language 993–4
minorities 611–12, 988–9, 991–4
neutrality of state 320–9, 331–2
political representation 992–3, 999–1000
positive discrimination 1126–9, 1136
prisoners’ right to vote 999
private actors 1000–1
proportionality 730, 732–3, 753
race 321, 983, 987, 989, 991–2, 997–8 rationality 986–7, 990, 994, 998
(p. 1361) religion 140, 332–4, 911–14, 917–24, 985, 987, 994
secession 1105
sexual orientation 989, 997–9, 1091–2 social or welfare state constitutions 124–6
social rights 994–6
socio-economic deprivation 993, 997, 1000
socio-economic rights 1022
status of right 985–6 test 994–6
transsexual, intersexual and transgender persons 998–9
Universal Declaration of Human Rights 983–4
Erasmus, Desiderius 992
erga omnes obligations 1213, 1215–19, 1224–5, 1227
Eskridge Jr, William N 682
Esmein, Adhémar 5, 503, 940
Ethiopia, impoverishment in 162–5, 166, 168
Index

ethnicity see race and ethnicity
EU law see European Union Europe see also European Convention on Human Rights; European Union; particular countries
abortion 1057–77
bioethics 1154–5
constitutional courts, centralized model of 816–19, 823
economic rights 1037 end of life decision 1154–5
federalism 276–7
institution, state as an 280
parliamentarism 653–4
petition, right to 950
scholarship, development of CCL 25–36
'seizing the Crown' metaphor 30–1
social rights 347
state, conception of the 271–2, 282
state sovereignty 274–7
transnational constitutionalism 765
European Convention on Human Rights see also European Court of Human Rights
abortion 1237–8
Belgium, status in 1241–2
bioethics 1143, 1145–50, 1155, 1158
caseload 812, 944
Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU 1233, 1250
dignity and autonomy 374–5
due process 930, 932, 934, 943–4
economic rights 1037, 1050, 1052
equality and non-discrimination 985–9, 995
European Union 1233, 1250
exhaustion of local remedies 812 fair hearing, right to a 932, 943–4, 1210
France, status in 1237–41
freedom of assembly 952–3
freedom of association 958–60
freedom of expression 900
Germany, status in 1236–7
identity 769–70
implementation 1233–42
internationalization of constitutional law 2, 1168, 1174–5
judicial review 31, 812
liberty and security, right to 932 living instrument principle 1146
lustration laws 1282
marriage, homosexuals and 1091 military, homosexuals in the 1081, 1083–5
Index

no punishment without law 1279
privacy 967–9, 975–7
proportionality 723, 731–2
prosecutions 1279
public international law 1210, 1227–8 public law (ius publicum Europaeum) 35
religion 916–18, 920–1, 926
scholarship, development of 31
sexual orientation 1081, 1083–7, 1091
sodomy, criminalization of 1086–7
sovereignty 361, 1236–7
status in national systems 1233–42
UN Security Council resolutions 1228
United Kingdom, status in 1234–6
European Court of Human Rights 1231–50
Belgium, status and implementation of judgments in 1249–50
decentralized enforcement 1227
France, status and implementation of judgments in 1248–9
Germany, status and implementation of judgments in 1246–7 independence of the judiciary 364–5
internationalization of constitutional law 2, 1166, 1178, 1182
militant democracy 1256, 1260, 1262, 1265
pilot judgment procedure 1244
precedent 1243
(p. 1362) secularism 1256, 1265
status and implementation of judgments 1242–50
United Kingdom, status and implementation of judgments in 1244–6 European Union see also Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU; European Union's constitution affirmative action 1128, 1135–7
agencies 676–7
bioethics 1145
centralization 802
citizenship 1016–17
constitutionalization 773
democracy 120–1, 668, 1179–80
due process 944
economic rights 1051–2
elections 533–4
equality and non-discrimination 991–2, 995, 997, 1000, 1136–7
European Convention on Human Rights 1233, 1250
Europeanization within European Legal Area 31–6
federalism 587, 589, 591, 594, 599–600
gap-filling by European Court of Justice 9–10
gender 1136–7
Index

internationalization 1166, 1171, 1173, 1180–2
judicial review 570, 803, 811
motto 774–5
national and international constitutions 130–1
parliamentary systems 665–6, 668, 802–3
proportionality 720, 732
public international law 1209–10, 1212–13, 1219, 1222–3, 1228 public law 18, 35
regulatory state 681
state sovereignty 351–2, 357–61
subsidiarity 802–3
supremacy 367–8, 570
terrorists and asset-freezing 1209–10, 1212–13, 1219, 1222–3, 1228 transnational constitutional model 765 European Union's constitution 1185–207 anthropological dimension 1200
area studies 57
big ‘C’ and small ‘c’ projects 1186–90, 1194–7, 1204–5
centrality of law 1200–2
Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU 1198, 1204–6
costitutionalism 1189–1205
constitutional law 1188–94 democracy-oriented constitutions 120–1 enlargement 1204
exhaustion of legal paradigm 1202–3 formal sub-register 1191, 1195–7, 1200 framing the modern constitutional polity 1190–2 future 1204–7
globalization 1188–9
identity 769–70, 773–5
ideological dimension 1200–1 institutional register 1191, 1199–200 instrumental dimension 1200–1 integrative sub-register 1191, 1198–9, 1200 jurisdictional sub-register 1191, 1197–8, 1200
liberal non-democratic constitutions 120–1 non-state polity 1185–8 philosophical dimension 1200 political register 1191, 1200
referendums 1186
rule of law-oriented constitutions 120–1 socio-cultural register 1191–2 specific, relational, and general 1188–9 state constitutionalism, legacy of 1189–90
Index

structural dimension 1200–1 thick constitutionalism 1192, 1194, 1198–9, 1204–5
thin constitutionalism 1192, 1195–203
written/unwritten constitutions 1186–7 euthanasia 18, 978–9, 1154–6
Ewald, William 1311
exceptionalism 1, 15, 39, 48, 52
exclusive or inclusive constitutions 113–14
exclusivism 47–52, 773
executive 472–9
accountability 663–4
administrative versus legislative regulation 563–4 appointments and removal, judicial review of 560–1, 562 branches of state 621–3
checks and balances 567
civil servants, hierarchical structure of 625–6
(p. 1363) constrained parliamentarism 556–7
droit administratif 623–4
elections 530
emergency, states of 442, 445–8, 566–7
federalism 562
foreign affairs 565–6
forms of government 657–60
group rights 1117–18
hierarchical structure 625–6
horizontal structuring 553–67
hybrid or semi-presidential systems 557–8
judicial review 560–1, 569–71
judiciary 568
legislative power 553–67
making and unmaking governments 663–5
ministers 651–2, 654, 661, 663–4, 667–8 ministries and departments 622–3 mixed government 549–50
organization 621–3
parliamentarism 553–67, 621–3, 657–60, 663–4, 668–9
presidential systems 553–67, 630
public authorities 624–5
resignation 664
semi-presidential systems 553, 562–3
separation of powers 553–67, 621–3
sexual orientation 1081–2
Sozialer Rechtsstaat 623–4 subdivision of legislative and executive power 562–3 unitary executive 562
Index

war powers 466–9, 566
expressivism 66–8, 71–3, 1079, 1086–92, 1094–7
expropriation 1038–43
extremism and fundamentalism 259–61, 538–9, 913, 1253–68
fair hearing, right to a 457, 932, 943–4, 1209–11, 1276
Falcone, Giovanni 853 families of law 55–6
Fartunova, Maria 1239–40, 1248
Favoreu, Louis 8
al-Fayyad, Ishaq 1294
Febvre, Lucien 1287–8
federalism 18, 576–608
benefits of central power 588–92 benefits of local power 586–8 circumstantial causation 585 competitive federalism 601 confederation 581–2 conservation of powers principle 591 consociationalism 603
constitutional courts 821
costs savings 589
democracy 587–8, 591
demos-constraint and status quo 598–602 dual federalism 276–7
elections 531–4
Europe 276–7
European Union 587, 589, 591, 594, 599–600
executive 562
expertise 587
functional overlapping competing jurisdictions 581
gender 412–13
global governance 606–7
group rights 1112–14, 1121
inter and intra-jurisdictional difficulties 589–92
internationalization of constitutional law 1169–70 joint rule, multiple rule, and separate rule 600–1, 607
judiciary 568–9
methodologies 71
origins of federal systems 583–5
parliamentary systems 561, 659, 802 policy and polity stability 597–604
political parties 596–7
presidential systems 641 risk management 587–8
secession 486, 494, 496–9
separation of powers 277
space 89–90
state sovereignty 274–7, 355, 359
subsidiarity 585–6, 592–5, 607, 802
territory 580–1, 603, 605 transnational governance 577 unitary state 274–7
Ferejohn, John 682
Ferreres-Comella, Victor 63–4, 181
Ferri, Enrico 940
Feuerbach, Anselm 11
Fillipov, Mikhail 597
Findlay, KA 942
(p. 1364) Finkel, Jodi 844
Fisher, George 941
flexible constitutions 110–12
food and water 167, 1027–9, 1031–4
foreign affairs 206, 565–6 foreign authorities see foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of 39–40, 43–51, 1328–47
background of judges 1177
borrowing, transplantation, and migration 1317, 1322, 1329–30, 1346–7
case studies 1336–46
colonialism 51, 1331
culture 1329
death penalty for juveniles 15, 43, 50, 1334–5
due process 43–4, 52
exclusivism and universalism 47–52
freedom of expression 13
functionalism 47
Germany 1175–8, 1336–40
globalization 1328–9
Hungary 1341–4
internationalization 1175–9
Israel 1339–41
judicial review 1332–3, 1339, 1346
jurisprudential aspects 1333–6
legitimacy 1330–3
migration of constitutional ideas 1328–30
natural law 1331–2
norms 1330–3, 1346
observers and participants 30–41, 43, 49
persuasiveness 1329, 1333
proportionality 1330–1
sexual orientation 39, 43–52
Index

sodomy, criminalization of 44–5, 51, 1335
South Africa 1344–6
translators 43
transnational constitutionalism 1346–7
transnationalization of interpretation 1346–7
unenumerated rights 43–4, 48–9, 51
United States 1, 39–52, 1175–9, 1317, 1322, 1329–45
values and principles 789–90
form and substance of constitutions 92–4, 108–9 former Yugoslavia 491–2, 495–6 Forsthoefl, Ernst 292–3 foundational or modifying constitutions 108 France
abortion 1237–8, 1061–4
agencies 677
aggressive wars, prohibition of 485
amendment or revision of constitutions 363–5, 438–40
anticlericalism 1265
burqa ban 921, 1014–15
citizenship 1004–9, 1013–15
constituent assemblies 423, 426–9
Declaration of Rights of Man 365, 435, 551, 911, 931, 939, 984
definition of constitution 100, 102
democracy 118–19, 251–2
due process 931, 939
emergency, states of 445, 451
equality and non-discrimination 984, 993, 996
European Convention on Human Rights 1237–41, 1248–9 effective 472–3, 562–3, 565, 623–4
federalism 577
foreign affairs 565
freedom of association 953–4, 956
hybrid or semi-presidential systems 557–8
identity 762, 763, 767–8
judiciary 568, 571–2
law making 563
legal education 8
legal positivism 5
liberal non-democratic constitutions 119–20
making constitutions 420, 423–40, 434–6
members of parliament, status of 662
Napoleonic constitutions 119–20
parliaments 561, 563, 621–2, 653, 655–6, 662, 664
popular sovereignty 366–7
President as commander-in-chief 472–3 presidential or semi-presidential systems 472–3, 553, 557–8, 645–6 Prime Minister 557
privacy 968, 974–5, 977
referendums 503, 509–10, 512–14, 523–4, 526
regions 619–20
regulatory state 672
religion 219, 921, 924–5, 1013–15, 1256, 1264–5
revolutionary constitutions 3–4, 102, 420, 427–9, 436
(p. 1365) rigid or flexible constitutions 111
secularism 219, 924–5, 1013, 1256, 1264–5
separation of powers 551–2, 568
socio-economic rights 1020–2
stability of constitutions 226
state, conception of the 270
state sovereignty 353–4, 358
territoriality 613–14
trade unions 956
unitary state 610–11
war powers 472–5, 479
Francia, Jose Gaspar de 635
Franck, Thomas 574
Franco, Francisco 764, 769, 819, 847
Frank, Jerome 934
Frank, Thomas 8
Frankenberg, Günther 15, 17, 66, 1263, 1331
Frankfurter, Felix 716, 788, 933–4, 1333
fraud 434, 534, 536–7
freedom of assembly 951–3
European Convention on Human Rights 952–3
freedom of expression 951–2 historical background and constitutional foundations 951
Human Rights Act 1998 951
physical dimensions of assemblies and constitutional implications 951–3 prior notification 952 private spaces 953
freedom of association 953–64
closed shops 960–1
conspiracy 963–4 constitutional origins 953–5
economic rights 1045, 1049–50
European Convention on Human Rights 958–60 factual state interferences 961, 964 guarantees on international level 957–8 guarantees on national levels 956–7 historical conditions 953–6
Index

International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 958
International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights 958 intimate and expressive associations 961–2 legal design 961 legally imposed membership 961–2 modern mass democracy and society of organizations 955–6
political parties 955–7, 962
public service, restrictions for the 962–4 restrictions 961 scope 959–62
trade unions 955–63, 1049–50
Universal Declaration of Human Rights 957
freedom of expression 891–907, 1340–3 advertising 896–7
Australia 892
balancing 899, 902–6
censorship 894, 900–2
chilling effect 905
clauses 893–902
constitutional rights 892–3, 897–9, 904, 907 constitutional significance 891–3 defamation 896–7, 904–5
elections 892
European Convention on Human Rights 900
foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of 13
freedom of assembly 951–2 freedom of information 899–900
hate speech 895, 903–4
Holocaust denial 903, 904
Human Rights Act 1998 893
injunctions 901–2
Internet 907
interpretation 892–3, 895–902
legitimacy 891–2
limitations 894–6, 900–7
national security 902
obscenity 896, 906
personality rights 898–9
petition, right to 949–50
political expression 892, 896–7, 902, 907
pornography 895, 906
positive rights 897–9
press freedom 893–4, 899, 905, 907, 978
prior restraint 900–2
privacy 893, 904–5
receive and impart information, right to 894, 899
religion 922
reply, right to 898–9, 907
treaties 892, 900
war propaganda 895
Freidenvall, Lenita 410
(p. 1366) Frey, Bruno 581
Friedan, Berry 1062–3
Friedrich, Carl 504, 579
Fujimori, Alberto 881, 1277
Fuller, Lon 237–42, 248 function and identity 18, 19
functionalism
borrowing, transplantation, and migration 1317–18, 1324
case studies 64–5
consequentialism 62–6
constitutional courts 67–8, 820–2
constitutionalism 80, 84, 94
differentiation 84
foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of 47
human rights 64
identity 17–18
independence of judiciary 841
large-N studies 55, 63, 65–6
methodologies 17–18, 55, 60, 62–8, 72 positive and normative 62–6
public/private divide 312–16
scholars 68
separation of powers 549–51
sexual orientation 1079–86, 1088–94
transnational constitutionalism 80, 84, 94 fundamentalism and extremism 259–61, 538–9, 1209–11, 1276 fundamental rights see also human rights
abortion 387–8
constitutional courts 818–19, 821, 829
dignity and autonomy 374, 379, 385, 387–8, 392–3
illiberal constitutionalism 134–5
liberal-democratic constitutions 118–19
political order 388, 392–3
positive law 374
proportionality 730, 753
radical democracy 122–3
religion 829
socialist constitutions 128–9
state sovereignty 357
supremacy 110
theory of fundamental rights 374
Galileo Galilei 938
Gandhi, Indira 167, 784
Gandhi, Rajiv 167
Gardbaum, Stephen 1320–1
Gardner, John 222–3
Garlicki, Lech 1232, 1244, 1247
Garofalo, Raffaele 940
Garoupa, Nuno 851
GATT 1220
Gauri, Varun 167
Gearty, Connor 1234
Gellner, Ernest 26
gender 397–416
abortion 415, 1058–67
affirmative action 1128, 1130–1, 1135–7
citizenship 1007–8, 1015
coercion and consent 409–12
Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women 402, 409, 986, 1000
culture 403–7, 411, 414
custom 400–1, 404, 412, 414
democracy 400, 409
difference and dominance 404–9 dignity 408
elections 409–10
European Union 1136–7
federalism 412–13
feminist movement 253, 310–11, 1058–67
group rights 1106–7
guarantees of equality 399, 401–7 horizontal and vertical rights 412 Islamic constitutions 406–7 morality and politics 407, 413–16
parliaments 399–400
politics 400, 404, 409–16
positive law 412
public international law 408–9
public/private divide 310–11, 403–4, 412–13
quotas 410–11
relative freedom 403–4
religion 400, 404, 414–15, 1106–7 sameness and difference 403–9 sex crimes 398–9, 411–13, 415
sexual orientation 408
terminology 398, 404, 406–7
Gentile, Giovanni 1255
Gerken, Heather 605
Germany see also Weimar Constitution
abortion 808, 1057–61, 1063–77, 1338–9
(p. 1367) agencies 677
Chancellor 556–7
citizenship 1010, 1014
Civil Law Code 5 criminal courts 817–19, 823–4, 826, 828
criminal law 174–6, 179–82
constrained parliamentarism 556–7
dignity and autonomy 379–80
emergency, states of 442, 446–51
e-petitions 950–1
equality and non-discrimination 985, 990, 992–8, 1000–1
European Convention on Human Rights 1236–7, 1246–7
executive 475–6, 623–4
federalism 561, 581–2, 600, 659
foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of 1175–8, 1336–40
freedom of association 954–6, 959, 962, 964
freedom of expression 891, 894, 896–7, 899, 901–2, 907
Holocaust denial 771–2, 1339
Hungary 1341–2
identity 762, 763, 768, 771–2
internationalization 1167, 1174–8, 1181–2
interpretation 695–6, 701–3, 708, 710, 712–14, 1336–9
judicial review 112–13, 797, 808–9
judiciary 476–7, 710–11
law making 801–4
making constitutions 420, 424, 429, 432
members of parliament, status of 662
militant democracy 1254–64, 1266, 1268
military 475–7
mixed constitutionalism 137–8
NATO 475–6
parliamentary systems 556–7, 560–1, 659, 662–5, 667
political parties 537–8, 874–5
President 556–7
privacy 967–8, 970, 972–3, 976, 978–9
promulgation 803–4
proportionality 721, 723, 727–30, 746 proportional representation 538
Index

public international law 1337
Rechtsstaat 4, 61, 351, 357, 444, 623–5, 730
regulatory state 672, 678
separation of powers 564
socio-economic rights 1021, 1027–9
sovereignty 358, 1236–7
state, conception of the 271
territoriality 614
total constitutionalism 174–6
United States 1336–9
values and principles 778, 785
war 465, 474–7, 479, 768
Wissenschaft (freedom of science) 27–8
Ghai, Yash 135, 165
‘ghost’ conjecture 304–12
Gierke, Otto 280, 615
Gilbert, Jeffrey 938
Ginsburg, Ruth Bader 458
Ginsburg, Tom 65, 820–1, 825, 843–4, 847–8, 851, 1321
Glaeser, Edward 851
Glendon, Mary Ann 1331
Glenn, H Patrick 86
globalization 265, 606–7, 1170–1, 1178, 1188–9, 1305, 1325, 1328–9
Glorious Revolution 101, 549–50
Gneist, Heinrich Rudolf 615
Goebbels, Joseph 1254
Goitein, Samuel 1291
Goldberg, Arthur 44
Goldsmith, Jack L 606
Goldstein, Leslie 602
Goldsworthy, Jeffrey 65
Goodhart, AL 7
Gorbachev, Mikhail 638
Gosepath, Stefan 988
Greaves, Harold 582
Greenawalt, Kent 64–5
Grier, Robert Copper 469
Griffith, John 936
Grimm, Dieter 726–7, 734, 1337
Grodzins, Morton 579–80
Groppi, Tania 825–6
Grote, Rainer 449–50
Grotius, Hugo 278, 992
group rights 1099–123
bills of rights 1107
citizenship 1100, 1119
collective rights 1103–5 compelled identification and association 1122–3 constitutive function 1100
culture 1101–2, 1105–6, 1108–14, 1123
democracy 1104
(p. 1368) diverse set of groups, rights demanded by 1112–13
elections 1114–19, 1122
equality and non-discrimination 1100, 1105–7, 1110–14, 1120, 1122
ethnic groups 1100–2, 1108–12, 1116–17, 1120, 1122–3
executive 1117–18
federalism 1112–14, 1121
gender 1106–7
identity 1100, 1102, 1104, 1109, 1112, 1117–19, 1122–3
indigenous peoples 1101, 1103–8, 1112, 1123
individual rights 1100–1, 1105–9, 1119–23
institutionalization 1104–5
integrity 1100–2, 1105, 1111, 1114, 1123 internal minorities 1104–8, 1120
land 1108
language 1104–5, 1106, 1108–13, 1117 liberal and corporate approaches 1117–18
national minorities 1101–3, 1105–6, 1112, 1120–1, 1123
parliamentary systems 1117
political representation 1111, 1115–16, 1120–2 political theory 1101–9, 1123 procedure for exercise of rights 1104 public services, access to 1109, 1110–11
regulative function 1100
religious minorities 1101, 1103–8, 1110, 1122–3
representation 1113–19
secession 1104–5, 1112–13, 1121
self-determination 1104–5, 1117
self-government 1105, 1109, 1113, 1123 specific groups, held by 1102–3 territoriality 1101, 1103, 1105, 1109, 1112, 1123
under-inclusiveness 1120–1 guardians of the constitution concept 112–13, 800–5, 813–14
Gunther, Gerald 754
Gurvitch, Georges 1042
habeas corpus 442, 452, 458, 460
Habermas, Jürgen 35, 219–20, 294, 339–40, 774, 1102
Hadfield, Gillian 851
Hahm, Chaihark 149
Halberstam, Daniel 1113–14
Halbertal, Moshe 1103
Hale, Matthew 938
Harding, Andrew 825–6, 824
Harlan II, John Marshall 44, 788
Hart, HLA 222, 223–4, 237, 362–3, 780, 933, 1339
Hastings, Warren 786
hate speech 771–2, 895, 903–4
Hawkins, William 930
Hayek, FA 246–7
heads of state
efficacy 803–5
existence of a sovereign 362–5 guardian of the constitution, as 803–4 hereditary heirs 803–4
promulgation 803–5
refusal to sign bills 803–4 representation of state 279–81
separation of powers 803–4
health, right to 1021, 1026–7, 1030–1
Hegel, GWF 218–19, 1309
Held, David 606, 992
Hellegers, André E 1144
Helmke, Gretchen 845, 854
Henkin, Louis 107, 160
Hesse, Konrad 1337
Hickman, Tom 459–60 higher or ordinary law 109–10
Hill, Christopher 1037
Hill, Jeffrey S 674–5
Hirschl, Ran 64, 140, 1305, 1318–19
historical background
associative rights 949–62
democracy 250–2
dignity and autonomy 375–8
due process 930–3
freedom of assembly 951
freedom of association 953–6
history of CCL 2–9
horizontal structuring 548–52
methodologies 55, 58–60
migration of constitutional ideas 58–60
militant democracy 1254, 1256–62
presidentialism 631–9
referendums 512–13
Index

transitional justice 1271
(p. 1369) Hobbsawm, Eric 1255
Hoffmann-Riem, Wolfgang 1337
Hogg, Peter 699, 715
Hohfeld, Wesley Newcomb 286
Holmes, Oliver Wendell 594–5, 716, 892, 1150, 1343
Holmes, Stephen 244–5
Holocaust denial 771–2, 903–4 homosexuals see sexual orientation
horizontal structuring 547–74
Horowitz, Donald 603
Hostettler, John 939 housing 1021, 1023, 1026, 1029, 1033
Howard, AE Dick 60
Hugenberg, Alfred 887
human rights see also bills of rights; Charter of Fundamental Rights of the EU; European Convention on Human Rights; fundamental rights; Human Rights Act 1998 (United Kingdom)
African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights 933, 996–7
American Convention on Human Rights 933
antinomy of human rights 373–6, 394
Arab Charter of Human Rights 985
Asian values 17–18
bioethics 1142–8
Cairo Declaration on Human Rights in Islam 984–5
culture 373–5
democracy 265–6
dignity and autonomy 371–5, 388, 391, 394–5
due process 930, 932–4, 943–4 default, states of 454–6, 459–60
equality and non-discrimination 291, 983–5, 988–9, 993–1000 freedom 291
functionalism 64
generations of rights 995–6, 1020–2, 1034 global triumph of rights-based discourse 1171–2
International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 489, 930, 932, 943, 958, 984–5, 993–4
International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights 958, 984, 996, 1022
internationalization of constitutional law 2, 1167–74, 1180–2
interpretation 694, 704, 707, 713 judicial incorporation 1168
justification 290–1, 394
liberty and security, right to 932
moral character 290 national constitutions, in 1167–8
Index

national minorities 612
positive law 374
privacy 967
proportionality 745, 749–52
scholarship, development of 30–1
secession 489–91
socio-economic rights 1020–34
theory of fundamental rights 374
transitional justice 1283–5
UN Charter 1225–7
Universal Declaration of Human Rights 371–2, 932, 956, 1022, 1144–5, 1171–2
universalism 11, 62, 373–5
Human Rights Act 1998 (United Kingdom)
constitutional law 171–2, 180
declarations of incompatibility 798, 1234–5
emergency, states of 454–6, 459–60
freedom of assembly 951
freedom of association 957
freedom of expression 893
judicial review 570
parliamentary sovereignty 570
privacy 975
remedial orders 1235
status of judgments of ECtHR 1244–6
human tissues and cells, extension of basic rights to 1156–9
Humboldt, Wilhelm von 11
Hume, David 144
Hungary
dignity 1341–2
foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of 1341–4
freedom of expression 1342–4 hate speech and freedom of expression 1342–3
judicial review 1341
United States 1342–4
Huntington, Samuel 148, 1289
(p. 1370) idealism 2–3, 191–4
identity 756–75
abortion 771
acquiescent constitutions 761
citizenship 1004, 1014
culture 757–9
difference and identity, balance between 17
ethno-national identity 136, 138
European Convention on Human Rights 769–70
exclusivism 773

group rights 1100, 1102, 1104, 1109, 1112, 1117-19, 1122-3 internationally grounded model 770-1

interpretation 771-3

making constitutions 766-71

methodologies 17

militant constitutions 761, 1260, 1263-6

minorities 760, 764

models 762-71

national identity 14, 18, 46-7, 72, 136, 138, 483-4, 487-9, 758, 773

pacted transition model 769 place and function 760-2

post-colonial constitutional model 762-3, 765-6

religion 332-3, 760, 772

revolution-based model 766-7

supranational constitutions 773-5

transnational model 769-70

United Nations 770, 773

universalism 772-3

war-based model 768

illiberal regimes 133-49

absolutism 105, 637-8, 653, 659-60

category, as 133-8

communitarianism 137, 142-7, 148-9

constitutionalism 133-49

cultural imperatives 142-7

democracy 251-2, 254-6

development priorities 142-7

ethno-national identity 136, 138

fundamental rights 134-5

generic and particular constitutionalism 133-4

horizontal structuring 550-1

impoverishment 161-2

independence of judiciary 840, 846-8

liberal constitutionalism 134-6

militant democracy 1253-68

mixed constitutionalism 137-8

non-liberal democratic constitutions 123

parliamentary systems 657

possibility and limits 148-9

presidential systems 630-1, 639, 642

religion 136, 138-42, 148-9

rule of law 234, 237-8

separation of powers 551
Index

typology 138–47
immigration control 1014–17
impartiality
borrowing, transplantation, and migration 1230
independence of judiciary 833–4, 838–9, 856–7, 862–5, 869–71
judiciary 833–4, 838–9, 856–7, 862–5, 869–72
presidential systems 630
impeachment 654
impersonalisation of power 279–80
impoverishment 153–68
inclusive or exclusive constitutions 113–14
independence of judiciary
accountability 834, 839, 843, 855, 861
appointments 842, 857
authoritarianism 840, 846–8 civil and political society, commitment in 848–50 civil law versus common law 846, 850–2 commitment theory 844–5, 857
consequentialism 835–6, 839–40
constitutional courts 833
constitutional virtue, as 567–8, 831–57 contested concepts and solution concepts 835–8, 856–7 contexts 846–52
corruption 872
culture 834, 837, 840–50, 853
European Convention on Human Rights 364–5
functionalism 841
impartiality 833–4, 838–9, 856–7, 862–3, 869–71
institutions 835, 843–6, 852–5, 857, 861–2 insurance theory 840, 843–4 integrity 834, 852, 854, 856–7
interpretation 834
judicial review 843–4, 848–9
limits 840–2
methodology 835–42
norms 835–6, 839, 848
presidential systems 630–1
rule of law 834, 845–6, 855
self-interest 832, 844–5, 853–5 self-restraint 807–8, 813–14, 847
separation of powers 549, 568–9, 856, 864–5
tenure 845
threats to independence 834 value 835–6, 838–40 virtue 833–4, 838–42, 852–3, 857
Index

India
affirmative action 1131–5
amendment or revision of constitutions 440
borrowing and transplantation 14–15
food, right to 167
identity 766
impoverishment 162, 165–8
interpretation 694, 704, 707, 713
judiciary 166–7
socio-economic rights 1022, 1032–3
sodomy, criminalization of 1088
values and principles 784–7, 789
indigenous peoples 1101, 1103–8, 1112, 1123, 1169–70
individual complaints 807, 811–13, 823, 828
individual rights 915–16, 919, 1100–1, 1105–9, 1043, 1119–23
institutions
democracy 262, 265
design 835, 843–6, 852–5, 857
group rights 1104–5
impersonalization of power 279–81
independence of judiciary 835, 843–6, 852–5, 857, 861–2
international institutions/organizations 265
new institutional economics 91–2 perpetuation or institutionalization of power 278–9
political parties 875–6 reform 1272–3, 1281–2, 1286
rule of law 235–8, 242, 247
socio-economic rights 1024
state as an institution 278–81
transitional justice 1272–3, 1281–2, 1286
International Court of Justice (ICJ) 1215–17
International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 489, 930, 932, 943, 958, 984–5, 993–4
International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights 958, 984, 996, 1022 international crimes 1272–84 see also international criminal courts International Criminal Court (ICC) 943–4, 1216–17 international criminal courts 361, 943–4, 1216–17 international law see public international law international organizations, constitutionalization of 1219–22 internationalization see internationalization of constitutional law; public international law, internationalization of internationalization of constitutional law 1–2, 5, 7, 13, 1165–83
autonomous regions 1169–70
checks and balances 1167, 1181–2
constitutional courts 1174–6
constitutionalism 1168–9
Index

constitutionalization 1166
convergence and divergence 1166–9, 1172–3 democratic accountability 1167, 1179–80 democracies in transition 1173–4
devolution 1169–70
divergent practices 1173–9 driving forces 1170–3
European Convention on Human Rights 2, 1166, 1168, 1174–5, 1178, 1182
European Union 1166, 1171, 1173, 1180–2
federalism 1169–70
foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of 1175–9
globalization 1170–1, 1178
human rights 2, 1167–74, 1180–2 indigenous rights 1169–70
making of constitutions 431–2
national and international constitutions 129–31
non-governmental organizations 1172–3, 1180 partial internationalization 1176–8 persistent national reticence 1178–9 prospects 1182–3
public international law 1209–29
regionalization 1167, 1173–6
(p. 1372) rule of law 1167, 1180–1
transnational constitutionalism 1172–3, 1222–4 treaty-becoming constitutions 1169–70
trends 1167–70
Universal Declaration of Human Rights 1171–2
World Trade Organization 1171, 1182
Internet 907, 950–1
interpretation 689–717 see also foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of activism 697–8, 700–1, 707–11, 713–15, 716
amendments to constitution 690, 698, 704, 708–9
bills of rights 707–8
borrowing, transplantation, and migration 13–14, 1305, 1309, 1319, 1321
case studies 1336–46
context 706
culture 694, 709–14
‘felt necessities of the time’ 715–16
foreign law 1328–47
freedom of expression 892–3, 895–902
human rights 694, 704, 707, 713
identity 771–3
independence of judiciary 834
judicial appointments and homogeneity 710–12
jurisprudential aspects 1333–6
Index

legal culture 709–11
legal education 710–11
legalism 690–1, 696, 700–1, 703, 707–10, 713–16
legitimacy 693, 698, 1330–3 literal approach 698 living instrument concept 698–9, 701
methodologies 689–716
migration of constitutional ideas 1328–30 nature and age of constitution 707–9 normativism 691–2, 698–708, 710, 715–16, 1330–3 originalism 691–2, 695, 698–9, 701–2, 706–7, 714, 716
political culture 712–14
political power 690
positivism 691–2, 699–705, 710, 713
precedent 696–7, 703, 709, 715 progressive or dynamic approach 699
proportionality 694–5
public policy 696
purposive approach 695, 701, 706
rule of law 689–94, 706
separation of powers 690, 716–17
structural principles 696–7 textual interpretation 694, 706
transnationalization of interpretation 1346–7
uses of CCL 9–10
values and principles 779
Ipsen, Hans 1202
Iran 140–1, 1289–90
Iredell, James 212, 698
Ireland 777
Islam 1287–302
accommodation 1291–2
Afghanistan 1289–90, 1297–8
AfPak complex 1289–90
al-Qa'eda 1296
Arab Charter of Human Rights 985
burqa ban in France 921, 1014–15
Cairo Declaration on Human Rights in Islam 984–5
constitution and symbols 1298
constitutional courts 1298–300
constitutionalism 139–42
constitutional order 1287–302
democracy 256–7, 266–7
domestic perspectives 1298–302
dress 267, 786, 920–1, 1014–15, 1264–5
Index

gender 406–7
human rights 984–5
internal perspectives 1290–1 international perspectives 1290–8 Israel-Palestine 1290, 1298 militancy 1289–90, 1292, 1297
militant democracy 1264–6
nation states 1292–5, 1302
Organization of Islamic Conference 1296 personal logic of Islamic/Middle Eastern law 1291–3, 1300–2 pluralism 864
political parties 538–9, 958
public order 142
sectarianism 1290–2, 1298, 1301–2
secularism 219, 786, 924–5, 1256, 1264–5
September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks on the United States 1288
Sunnis and Shi'ites 1290, 1293–8
terrorism 1288, 1296
(p. 1373) theocratic constitutionalism 139–42 three arcs of crisis 1287–91 violence 1289–90, 1292, 1294–7, 1302
war 1291
Westphalian system 1290
Israel
emergencies, states of 567
foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of 1339–41 freedom of speech 1340–1
independence of judiciary 844
judicial review 570–1, 1339
militant democracy 1264
mixed constitutionalism 138
Palestine 1290, 1298
proportionality 733–4 racist hate speech 1340–1
targeted killings 574
United States 1339–41
values and principles 781–2
written/unwritten constitutions 106, 222
Italy
making constitutions 430
militant democracy 1255, 1261, 1264
referendums 508, 510–14, 523–6
regions 618–19
territoriality 614
Jackson, John 943
Jackson, Robert H 564
Jackson, Vicki 18, 1316, 1331–2
Jacobsohn, Gary 67, 758–61
Japan defence 478, 479
elections 542–3
executive 478–9
identity 768
self-defence forces 477–8
UN peacekeeping operations 478–9
war 477–9, 768
Jasanoff, Sheila 1146
Jay, John 578
Jefferson, Thomas 229, 340, 346, 437, 632–3, 572, 911
Jellinek, Georg 5
Jennings, Ivor 424
Jiang Zemin 149
Johnson, Andrew 633
Johnson, Chalmers 156
Johnson, Lyndon B 633, 882 joint agency 205–6
Joppke, Christian 1014
Joseph II, Emperor 911
Jospin, Lionel 879
judicial review
abortion 808
abstract review 805, 807, 808–9, 814, 818, 823–4, 829
activism 808, 812–14
amendment or revision of constitutions 440
borrowing, transplantation, and migration 1305, 1313, 1315, 1318–19
centralized model 570, 813–14
concrete review 805, 807, 810–11, 823–4, 828
constitutional courts 796–7, 807–13, 816–29
centralized model of review 816–19, 823
centralized model of review 816–19, 823
European Convention on Human Rights 31, 812
European Union 570, 803, 811
ex ante review 805, 806–7, 808, 820–1 ex post review 805, 807–15, 822
executive 560–2, 569–71
foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of 1332–3, 1339, 1346
guardian of constitution, concept of 112–13, 813–14
hierarchy of norms 797
impeachment 560–1
independence of judiciary 843–4, 848–9
individual constitutional complaints 807, 811–13
insurance model of judicial review 820–1
international organizations 1219–22 judges, appointment and selection of 806, 818, 824–5 legislation 30–1 minorities in parliament 805
parliaments 560–1, 569–71, 660, 796–8 preliminary reference 810–11
reasons for decisions 825
referendums 514–27
(p. 1374) regulatory state 671–3, 680, 682–4
scholarship, development of 30–1
self-restraint 807–8, 813–14
separation of powers 569–71, 805–7, 813–14
stability of constitutions 227
state organs, disputes between 809–10
supremacy 112–13, 570, 796–8
transitional justice 1283–4 treaties, ex ante review of 809
United Nations 1221–2
weak-form 185 judiciary 476–7, 859–74 see also foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of; independence of judiciary; judicial review
accountability 861–2, 865–9 activism 697–8, 700–1, 707–16, 747–8, 781, 808, 812–14
advisory opinions 571–3
appointments 568, 710–12, 735–6, 806, 818, 824–5, 842, 857–61, 866–7, 870–1
checks and balances 860–1
constitutional courts 824–5
corruption 872 discipline 860
emergency, states of 442–4, 446, 449–50, 452–9
executive 568
federalism 568–9
homogeneity 710–12
horizontal structuring 567–74
human rights 1168
impartiality 862–3, 869–72
impoverishment 166–7
internal accountability 861
interpretation 710–12
judicial limitation clause 740
jurisdiction and justiciability 571–4 ‘least dangerous branch’ 567–74, 660, 871 legislators, judges as 747–8
legitimacy 862–4, 866–9, 871–2 normative foundations 862–71
observers and participants 39–41
parliaments 568
political question doctrine 573–4
proportionality 735–7, 740, 747–8
public prosecutors 859–60, 866
removal 568
rule of law 273, 624, 832, 844–6, 853–5, 862–3, 866–9, 871–2
separation of powers 551, 567–74, 861–7, 871–2
sovereignty 862–4, 869–71
state, conception of the 273
statehood 869
tenure 859–60 training 860
jurisdiction 571–4, 589–92, 822–4, 1197–8
\textit{jus cogens} 130, 524, 1213–19, 1224–5, 1277
\textit{jus sanguinis} principle 1008–10 \textit{jus soli} principle 1005–8 just cause theory 486–7
justice 336–49
bioethics 1145
due process 943–4
egalitarianism 336, 342–4
equality and non-discrimination 982
libertarianism 336, 342–4
politics and law 19
procedural justice 336–42, 344–6
proportionality 741–2
republicanism 344–9
social rights 347–9
substantive justice 342–4
transitional justice 1270–86
Kaas, Ludwig 887
Kahn Freund, Otto 1041, 1310–11, 1331
Kahn, Paul 115, 118, 1323
Kamenka, Eugene 246–7
Kantorowicz, Ernst 280–1
Katz, Stanley 135, 148
Index

Kaye, Judith 1092
Kennedy, Anthony 45–8, 50, 52, 457, 1086–8, 1331, 1335
Kennedy, John F 202
Kent, James 930
Kentridge, Sydney 705, 1345
Khamene‘i, Ali 1294
Khatami, Muhammed 1290
Khilnani, Sunil 166
al-Khumaini, Ruhollah 1290, 1294–5, 1298
(p. 1375) King, Preston 581
Klamt, Martin 1258
Klug, Heinz 705–6
Knight, Jack 1318
Koch, Charles 850–1
Kohl, Helmut 476
Kommers, Donald 60, 573–4, 702, 708, 710, 783, 785, 1065
Kompetenz-Kompetenz 355
Koselleck, Reinhart 80
Kötz, Hein 96
Kramer, Larry 596
Kriegler, Johann 1345
Kuchma, Leonid 880
Kukathas, Chandran 1107
Kumm, Mattias 181
Kymlicka, Will 1102, 1104, 1108 labour rights 1037–45, 1049–53 see also trade unions Lambert, Édouard 5, 10
Lamer, Antonio 898
land 1108
Landes, William 682–3, 844–5
Landsman, Stephan 939
Langa, Pius 922, 1285
Langbein, JH 939, 942
Langer, Máximo 946
language 13, 43, 70, 993–4, 1104–13, 1117, 1320–1, 1325
La Porta, Rafael 845
Lassalle, Ferdinand 128
Latham, John 700, 915
Latin America
caudillos 635, 641
due process 933
executive and legislative power 554–5
independence of judiciary 844, 847, 849–50
Index

launching constitutions 425–34
non-liberal democratic constitutions 123
presidential systems 554–5, 558, 634–6, 641, 643, 645, 647
law, constitution as 105–15
lawmaking and legislation boundaries and overlap 563–7 conflicts over policy 564–5
constitutional courts 827–9
efficacy 799–800
emergency powers 566–7
executive 553–67
judges as legislators 747–8
judicial review 30–1
parliament, legislative function of 665–7 preparation of legislation 799–805
promulgation 803–5
refusal to sign bills 803–4
regions 1173–6
unconstitutionality 112, 207–10, 212–13
war powers 566
Le Divellec, Armel 656
Lee Kuan Yew, Harry 157, 219
Lefort, Claude 255, 1268
legal character of the constitution 105–7
legal constitutionalism 173–4
legal education 8–9, 710–11, 1305, 1317, 1320
legality, principle of 443, 451–2, 455–6, 460, 630, 1282
legal positivism 4–5, 29, 371
legislation see lawmaking and legislation legislatures see parliamentary systems
legitimacy
constitutional courts 816–17, 819, 821, 825, 827–9
dignity and autonomy 389–90
elections 879
foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of 1330–3
freedom of expression 891–2
interpretation 693, 698, 1330–3
judiciary 862–4, 866–9, 871–2
law, constitution as 114–15
making of constitutions 421, 422–6, 433
neutrality 323–4
political parties 537
politics and law 19
presidential systems 629
proportionality 722–3, 725–6
Index

reason or will 115
secession 484–5, 487–8
sovereignty 362
truth or consensus constitutions 114–15
UN Charter 1226–7
United States 115
Legrand, Pierre 12–13, 1309–10
Leibholz, Gerhard 1337
Lenaerts, Koen 583, 585
Lenin, VI 488, 494–5
Lenoir, Noëlle 1238, 1248
(p. 1376) Lepsius, Oliver 450
Lévi-Strauss, Claude 1079–80
Levy, Jacob 1105
Lewinsky, Monica 562
Leyland, Peter 824–6 libel 662, 896–7, 904–5
liberalism
constitutionalism 134–6 democracies 116–22, 253–6, 1049–50
economic rights 1049–50
emergency, states of 443–4, 452
group rights 1117–18
illiberal constitutionalism 134–6
liberal-democratic constitutions 116–22
liberal non-democratic constitutions 119–22
neutrality 318–20, 322–5, 330–1
procedural justice 338–42
libertarianism 336, 342–4
liberties see rights and liberties liberty and security, right to 932
lifespan of constitutions 230
Lijphart, Arend 603, 1116–17
Limbach, Jutta 1236
limited power, paradox of 198–200
Lincoln, Abraham 469
Lindseth, Peter 1261
Linz, Juan J 558, 559, 669
living and constant/static constitutions 99–100, 1146
Livingston, William 579, 581
Llewellyn, Karl 70
‘local habits’, finding constitutional meaning in 785–9
Loewenstein, Karl 6, 107, 114, 646, 1256–9, 1261
Index

Loughlin, Martin 279
Louis XII, King 941
Luhmann, Niklas 78
Lund, Michael 484
Illustration laws 1281–2
Machiavelli, Niccolò 3, 193, 196–7, 205
MacIntyre, Alasdair 290
MacKinnon, Catharine 988
Macpherson, CB 506
Madison, James 68–9, 197, 205–6, 208–10, 257, 340–3, 425, 469, 551–2, 578, 585–7, 592–3, 595, 598, 632, 913, 931, 954
Magill, Elizabeth 683
Magna Carta 251, 764, 930–2
Maine, Henry 117
Maitland, FW 280–1
Majone, Giandomenico 1202
majoritarianism
counter-majoritarianism 189–91, 258
non-liberal democratic constitutions 122
republicanism 345–6
tyranny 257–8, 502, 505–6, 656
making of constitutions 1, 9–10, 13–14, 419–40 amendment process 420–1, 433, 437–40
authority 421, 425
'by the rules' 433–4
certification and ratification, process of 436–7 committees 435–6 constituent assembly 422–30, 434–5 decisionist theory 423
de-colonization 422, 431–2
de-constituent acts 423, 429 democratization 430, 434 drafting process 434–6
e-constitutions 421
elections 433–4
ex nihilo creation 421–3, 426–33
flexibility 421
fraud to the constitution 434
identity 766–71
international effort, constitution-making as an 431–2
launching constitutions 425–34
legitimacy 421, 422–6, 433
mass democracy 429–31
methodologies 54–5, 68–9
mixed constitution making in times of mass democracy 429–31 models of ex nihilo creation 426–33 nation-state-building constitutions 421–2, 431–3 post-conflict constitutions 422, 432
power 422–5
process and substance 419–40 public participation 419, 424–7, 433–4 referendum, emergence of the 429–31
revolutionary constitutions 3–4, 420–3, 426–31, 464, 440
(p. 1377) self-constitution 423, 427, 435
stability 421, 439
state sovereignty, state-building as an act of 431 transition model 422
Malaysia 142, 1129–31, 1140
Mandal, BP 1133
Mandela, Nelson 1027, 1034
Marcos, Ferdinand 638, 1280
Margalit, Avishai 483, 1103, 1104–5
Marshall, John 212, 277, 569–70, 573, 698
Marshall, TH 1021–2, 1042
Marshall, Thurgood 1334
martial law 447, 451
Martinico, Giuseppe 1232
Marx, Karl 42, 124, 128, 136, 232, 247, 254, 310
Mashaw, Jerry 675, 683
Mason, Anthony 701
Massicotte, Louis 534
Mathews, Jud 1315
al-Mawdudi, Abu ‘Ala’ 1296
May, Allyson 939
Mazowiecki, Tadeusz 881
McCarthy, Joseph 1255
McCrudden, Christopher 1333
McCubbins, Matthew D 674
McGarry, John 1117–18
McGee, Robert 484
McIlwain, Charles Howard 195, 243, 930
McIntyre, William 989 media
freedom of expression 907
freedom of the press 893–4, 899, 905, 907, 978
Internet 907, 950–1
parliamentary systems 666–8
Melton, James 65
members of parliament, status of 651–2, 661–3
Index

Menem, Carlos 1277-8
Merkel, Angela 1014
Merryman, John 552
Metcalff, Eric 1244
methodology 16-18, 53-72
challenges 69-72
classificatory work 54, 55-8, 60
consequentialism 62-6
contextualism 55, 66-7, 68, 71-2 courts 67-8 differences across systems 77, 84
European public law 18
expressivism 66-7, 68, 71-3
federalism 71
form and substance of constitutionalism 92-4
functionalism 17-18, 55, 60, 62-8, 72, 80, 84, 94
hegemony 17-18
historical approach 55, 58-60 identity and difference, balance between 17
independence of judiciary 835-52
interpretation 689-716
making constitutions 54-5, 68-9
migration of constitutional ideas 76, 86
national identity 18, 72
norms 16, 55, 70-1, 77-8, 88, 93
originalism 16
post-national, post-territory, post-state 84-92 self-reflection 66-8 similarities and differences 16-18 societal constitutionalism 94-7
space 79, 87-92
time 79, 90-2
traditional constitutionalism 87
translations 70
transnational constitutionalism 75-97
typologies 75-97
United States 16, 18
universalism 60-2, 70
Westphalian system 84-5
Meyer, Georg 357
Meyer-Ladewig, Jens 1247
Middle East and development 636-8 migration see borrowing, transplantation, and migration
militant democracy 1253-68
authoritarianism and extremism 1253-68 contesting and constraining militant democracy 1266–8
emergency, states of 260–2
emotionalism 1257
European Court of Human Rights 1256, 1260, 1262, 1265
historical background 1254, 1256–62
identity 761, 1260, 1263–6
Islam 1264–6
negative republicanism 1261–3, 1266–7 political parties and organizations 538, 1263–4 (p. 1378) preventive state 1255–6
religion 1256, 1262, 1264–6
secularism 1256, 1264–6
terrorism 1255, 1262–3 varieties of militancy 1262–6
military service
conscientious objection 920
military courts 1276
sexual orientation 1080–6
Miller, David 484, 1102
Miller, Jonathan 221
Mill, John Stuart 4, 49, 154, 165, 257, 483–4, 593, 652–3, 666, 892
Milošević, Slobodan 940
ministers 651–2, 654, 661, 663–4, 667–8
ministries and departments 622–3 minority groups
equality and non-discrimination 611–12, 988–9, 991–4
identity 760, 764
indigenous people 1101, 1103–8, 1112, 1123, 1169–70
internal minorities 1104–8, 1120
judicial review 805
land 1108
national minorities 611–12, 1101–6, 1112, 1120–1, 1123
parliamentary systems 800–1, 805
presidential systems 629–30
referendums 523–4
religious minorities 760, 910–12, 917–19, 922, 1101–10, 1122–3
secession 482–97
Minow, Martha 988
Mirkine-Guetzevitch, Boris 5, 504, 527, 655
Mitterand, François 474, 880
mixed systems 137–8, 175, 429–31, 549–50
Mobutu Sese Soko 161 modifying or foundational constitutions 108
Mohammed, Mahathir 157
monarchical constitutions
Index

abdications of power 204–5
constitutionalism 200–2, 204–5
horizontal structuring 550
perpetuation of power 278–9
presidential systems 628–9, 634 succession, order of 201–2
monism 56, 360, 1211–12
Monroe, James 635
Morrison, Trevor 458–9
Mosca, Gaetano 506
Mosk, Stanley 1158
Mott, Rodney 930
Moustafa, Tamir 820, 825, 847
Mubarak, Hosni 265, 638
Murphy, Walter 134–5
Nagel, Thomas 330
al-Najafi, Bashir 1294
nation states
citizenship 1004
civic and ethnic conceptions 610–11
conception of the state 269–82 definition of the state 350–1, 609–10 general theory of the state 278–81
identity 14, 18, 46–7, 72, 136, 138, 483–4, 487–9, 758, 773
ILC Draft Articles on State Responsibility 1216–17
Islam 1292–5, 1302
making of constitutions 431–3
national minorities 611–12, 1101–6, 1112, 1120–1, 1123
neutrality 272 presupposition of the constitution, state as a 271–2 relationship between constitution and state 271–3
rule of law 272–3
rulers as representatives of states 279–80 security 263–4, 902, 1080–1, 1083–4 state as presupposition of the constitution 271–2 state, relationship between constitution and 271–3 state responsibility 1216–17, 1280 traditional statehood, erosion of 130 unitary state, internal ordering of the 610–12
universalism 773
violence, state's monopoly on use of 116–17, 306, 323–4, 351, 361, 582
Westphalian system 84–5, 265, 351, 359, 482, 992, 1290
without the state, constitutions 272–3
(p. 1379) national constitutions and international constitutions, distinction between 129–31
Index

national identity 14, 18, 46–7, 72, 136, 138, 483–4, 487–9, 758, 773
national minorities 611–12, 1101–6, 1112, 1120–1, 1123
national security 263–4, 902, 1080–1, 1083–4 naturalization 1005–6, 1012–16
natural law 1331–2
Neuman, Gerald 64, 1065
neutrality
accessibility test 330–2
equality and non-discrimination 321–2, 325–9
foundationalist view 320 intent, neutrality of 319–20 justificatory neutrality 319–20 legitimacy principle 323–4 liberal neutrality 318–20, 322–5, 330–1, 334–5 non-discrimination 320–2, 324–9, 331–2 outcome test 319, 328–9 paternalism 321–2
politics 319, 325
principle of state neutrality 318–35
procedural justice 336
race discrimination 321 reasonable disagreement concept 323, 325, 327–30 reason-neutral 319 recognition test 331–2
religion 332–5, 912, 919–21, 924–6 shared reasons, as 322–4, 329–32
state, conception of the 272
Newton, Isaac 938
Nickel, James 1104
Nicol, Danny 1052
Niesen, Peter 1260–1, 1263
Nijsten, Machteld 1064
Nixon, Richard 471
Nkrumah, Kwame 637
no confidence votes 651–2, 655, 664, 668
no punishment without law 1279
Noll, Roger 674
nominal constitutions 107
non-governmental organizations (NGOs) 1172–3, 1180 non-liberal constitutions see illiberal constitutionalism Norman, Wayne 486
norms
bioethics 1144–5
borrowing, transplantation, and migration 1312–15, 1317, 1319, 1321
definition of constitution 103–4
dignity and autonomy 375–9, 383–6, 393
foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of 1330–3, 1346
Grundnorm 362–3
hierarchy 103–4, 355, 358, 365, 368, 797, 1213–19, 1222–3
interpretation 691–2, 698–708, 710, 715–16, 1330–3
judiciary 835–6, 839, 848, 862–71
legal character of constitutions 107
methodologies 16, 55, 70–1, 77–8, 88, 93
positive law 103
presidential versus parliamentary systems 558–60
public international law, internationalization of 1213–19, 1222–3, 1229
sub-constitutional norms, limitations of 739–54
transitional justice 1273–85
transnational constitutionalism 77–8, 88, 93, 1273–85
Nozick, Robert 347–8
Oates, Wallace 589, 591
Obama, Barack 1154 object-fields 300–4
obscenity 896, 906
observers and participants 9–10, 12–15, 30–41, 43, 49
O’Connor, Sandra Day 457, 1139
O’Leary, Brendan 1117–18
ombudsmen 823–4
operative and sham constitutions 225–6
Ordeshook, Peter 597
O’Regan, Kate 999
Orgad, Liav 1014
originalism 16, 50, 691–2, 695, 698–9, 701–2, 706–7, 714, 716
Ortiz, Daniel 683
Packer, Herbert 934–7
Paine, Thomas 207–9, 345, 424
Palestine 1290, 1298
(p. 1380) Paley, William 207
Palombella, Gianluigi 243–4
pardons 1278
Pareto, Vilfredo 292, 506
parliamentary systems 650–69
absolutism 653, 659–60
accountability of executive 663–4 administrative versus legislative regulation 563–4 bicameral systems 530, 561, 651 British origins 650–3
checks and balances 561
constitutional courts 796–9, 818–20
constrained parliamentarism 556–7, 644, 656
Index

controlling functions 667–8 decline of parliamentarism 668–9
definition 654–6
democracy 251, 254–5, 653, 655–7, 657, 666–7 differences and analogies within systems 662–8 dissolution of parliament 664–5
efficacy 800–3
elections 529–30, 560–1, 876–7, 880–1
emergency, states of 443–4, 446, 450–1, 460, 566–7
Europe 653–4
European Union 665–6, 668, 802–3
executive 553–67, 621–3, 663–4, 668–9
federalism 561, 659, 802
foreign affairs 565–6
forms of government 657–60
gender 399–400
government, forms of 657–60
group rights 1117
guardian of the constitution 800–3
horizontal structuring 553–67
illiberal democracies 657 immunity 193–4, 203–4, 661
impeachment 654
judicial review 569–71, 660
judiciary 568
legislative function 665–7, 801–2
majority tyranny 656
making and unmaking governments 663–5
media 666–8
members of parliament, status of 651, 661–3 ministers 651–2, 654, 663–4, 667–8 minority rights 800–1, 805 mixed governments 561
multilevel governance and subsidiarity 802–3 no confidence votes 651–2, 655, 664, 668
norms 558–60
organization 621–3
parliamentarism 650–69
parliamentary privilege 660–1
political parties 876–7
presidential systems 553–67, 630–1, 640–6, 657–60, 666–9
prime ministers 553, 556–7, 651, 655, 663
proportionality 747–8, 752
resignation of executive 664
separation of powers 556, 621–2, 653–4, 657–60
sexual orientation 1081
sovereignty 108, 251, 451, 570, 652, 796–9, 818, 820
subdivision of legislative and executive power 561–3
subsidiarity 802
supervision 800–1 territorial distribution of power 659 unicameral systems 530, 561 war, authorization of 464–6, 473–5
Westminster model 556, 656, 663, 665 worldwide diffusion of parliamentary system 656–7 Parra-Vera, Oscar 1031
participants and observers 9–10, 12–15, 30–41, 43, 49
particularism and universalism 393–5
Pateman, Carole 506
paternalism 321–2, 375
Peerenboom, Randall 158, 166, 846
Perelman, Claim 719
Perot, H Ross 881 personality rights 898–9
petition, right to 949–51
Pettit, Philip 241
Philips, Anne 1119
Philpott, Daniel 484
Pimentel, David 852
Pinochet, Augusto 641, 825, 1278
Pizzi, William 942
Plato 3, 797, 982
plebiscites, definition of 501–2
(p. 1381) Pocock, JGA 80
Pogge, Thomas 153, 155, 992
Poinsett, Joel Roberts 635
political parties 874–87
bans 538–9, 1263–4 consitutional dynamics 883–4
elections 537–9, 876–81
extremist parties 538–9
federalism 596–7
freedom of association 955–7, 962
group rights 1111, 1115–16, 1121
institutionalization 875–6
Islam 538–9, 958
leadership, fostering party-based 881–3 legislative elections, designing 876–7
legitimacy 537
militant democracy 538, 1263–4
parliamentary systems 880–1, 883–4
party space 875–83
presidential and semi-presidentialism systems 877–84
proportional representation 538
Weimar Constitution 538, 874, 884–7
politics see also civil and political rights; political parties
abortion 1060–4
affirmative action and politically dominant groups 1129–31
associative rights 949–62
centralization 275
constitutionalism 170, 173–5
culture 712–14
delegation, political economy of 673–5
dignity and autonomy 392–3, 399
extremism 259–61
freedom of expression 892, 896–7, 902, 907
fundamental rights 388, 392–3
gender 404, 409–11, 413–16
group rights 1101–9, 1123
ideas, constitutions as expressions of political 115–29
independence of judiciary 848–50
institutional design 843–6
interpretation 690, 712–14
judiciary 573–4
justice and legitimacy, criteria 19 morality 413–16
neutrality 319, 325
political question doctrine 573–4 political science 6 representation 409–11, 992–3, 999–1000, 1111, 1115–16, 1120–2
separation of powers 573–4 socio-political context 949–62
Polybius 196, 549
Pompidou, Georges 526
Ponthoreau, Marie-Claire 270
popular consent and public power 102–5
pornography 895, 906
positive discrimination 1126–9, 1136
positive law
definition of constitution 102–3
dignity and autonomy 371, 385
gender 412
hierarchy of norms 103
human rights 374
interpretation 691–2, 699–705, 710, 713
legal method 28–30
positive rights 181–5, 385, 391, 897–9
Post, Robert 758, 771
Potter, Van Rensselaer 1143–4
Pound, Roscoe 1304 poverty 153–68
Powell, Lewis F 1135, 1138–9, 1334
precedent 13, 40, 45, 47, 61–2, 696–7, 703, 709, 715, 1243 prescriptive constitutions 106–7
presidential systems 628–47
absolutism 637–8
Africa 638, 644, 647
Asia 638, 647
colonialism 636–8
constrained presidentialism 644
democracy 629–31, 639–47
development, challenges of 636–8 dictatorships or authoritarian governments 630–1, 639, 642 Eastern Europe 555, 638–9
elections 529–30, 553, 559, 877–82
emergency, states of 659
executive and legislative power 553–67, 630
federalism 641
fixed terms 631
history and evolution 631–9
impartiality 630
independence 553, 630–1
judicial independence 630–1 judicial review of executive appointments and removal 560–1 legality, principle of 630
legitimacy 629
limit on terms 630–1
minorities 629–30
monarchies 628–9, 634
normative arguments 558–60
parliamentary systems 553–67, 630–1, 640–6, 657–60, 666–9
political parties 877–84
promulgation 804–5
renewal of presidency 630–1
republicanism 628–9
semi-presidential or hybrid systems 529–30, 553–63, 631, 642–5, 647, 657, 877–84
separation of powers 553–4, 558, 629–30, 639, 641, 645, 657
superpresidentialism 558
Index

veto power 642, 804–5
war powers 472–3
press freedom 893–4, 899, 905, 907, 978
Preuß, Ulrich 1260
Primary Rights Theories 483, 486–7
prime ministers 553, 556–7, 651, 655, 663 principles see values and principles prisoners’ right to vote 534–5, 999
privacy 966–80
abortion 1066
assisted suicide 978–9 autonomy 968–9, 975
bioethics 1157–9
data protection 973–4, 976
definition 969–74
drugs 978–9
European Convention on Human Rights 967–9, 975–7
freedom of expression 893, 904–5
freedom of the press 893, 905, 978
Human Rights Act 1998 975
human rights treaties 967
libel 904–5
limits 978–9 negative and positive obligations 976–7 protection of right 977–9 public interest 978
public places 971–2 relations 972–3 scope 975–6
self-determination 970
sexual orientation 972, 974–5, 1086–7, 1096
sodomy 970–1
sources of right 974–5
space 971–2
subject matter 973–4
private property 1037–43, 1052–3 procedural justice 336–42 see also due process
bills of rights 339
checks and balances 339, 341–2
equal participation 337–8 imperfect procedural justice 336–42
liberalism 338–42
perfect procedural justice 336–42 political liberalism 338
pure procedural justice 337
Index

republicanism 344–6 process and substance of constitution-making 419–40
amendment process 437–40
‘by the rules’ 433–4
certification and ratification, process of 436–7 constituent assembly, idea of 427–9 drafting process 434–6
international effort, constitution-making as an 431–2 launching constitutions 425–34
legitimacy 422–5
mass democracy 429–31
mixed constitution making 429–31
models of ex nihilo creation 426–33
nation-state-building constitutions 431–3
power 422–5
referendum, emergence of the 429–31 revolutionary version 426–31
state sovereignty, state-building as an act of 431
promulgation of legislation 803–5
proportionality 718–54
activism 735–6
alternatives 752–4
assessment 749–54
balancing 721–3, 724–5, 730, 734–6, 739, 742–54
borrowing, transplantation, and migration 1311–13
(b. 1383) burden of proof 733–4, 740
Canada 723, 727, 743
categorically prohibited means 722
competing interests 740 constitutional foundation 729–31
constitutionalism 291
constitutional rights 291–2, 297
criminal law 719–21
criticism and responses 749–51
democracy 723, 735–6, 739, 741, 745–6, 749–51
distribution of principle 731–2
emergency, states of 456, 459–60
equality and non-discrimination 730, 732–3, 753
European Convention on Human Rights 723, 731–2
European Union 720, 732
evolution of principle 728–9 external or internal considerations 745–6
fitness or suitability 722
fundamental rights 730, 753
Germany 721, 723, 727–30, 746
human rights 745, 749–52
importance 749
interpretation 694–5
judges 735–6, 740, 747–8
judicial limitation clause 740
justice 719
legal sources 741–2
legislators 747–8, 752
legitimacy 722–3, 725–6 level of particularity 726
limitations 739–54
margin of appreciation 748
necessity 292, 724–9, 735, 739, 742, 744–5 negative and positive rights 742 optimization 292 principles 291–2, 747 proper purpose, limitations for a 739, 742, 743–7
public interest 743–5, 748–9 rational connection 739, 742, 743–4 reasonableness 742–3
Rechtsstaat 730
rule and principle construction 291–2, 297 scope of rights and limitations 739–42, 744–7
separation of powers 748, 751
social importance of purpose 744–7 standardization 736 strength of rights and freedoms 732–5
sub-constitutional norms, limitations of 739–54
universalism 729
prosecutions 1275–9
amnesties, pseudo-amnesties, or clemency 1277–9
due process 1276, 1278
European Convention on Human Rights 1279
fair hearing, right to a 1276
impunity 1276–7
international crimes 1275–9
jus cogens 1277
military courts 1276
no punishment without law 1279
pardons 1278
public prosecutors 859–60, 86
transitional justice 1272–3, 1275–9, 1286
Proudhon, Pierre-Joseph 578, 607
Przeworski, Adam 158
pseudo-constitutionalism 108
public international law classical international law 359–61
constitutionalism 1213, 1229
corporatist constitutionalism 1213, 1219–29 customary international law 1212
decentralized enforcement 1227–9
dualism 1211–13
erga omnes 1213, 1215–19, 1224–5, 1227
European Convention on Human Rights 1210, 1227–8
European Union 1209–10, 1212–13, 1219, 1222–3, 1228 fair hearing, right to a 1209–11
gender 408–9
hierarchy of norms 1213–19, 1222–3, 1229
international organizations, constitutionalization of 1219–22
internationalization 1209–29
jus cogens 130, 524, 1213–19, 1224–5, 1277
monism 1211–12
partial constitutionalization of international legal order 1219–29 regional courts 1228
self-determination 486–93
state sovereignty 360–2
terrorists’ assets, freezing of 1209–13, 1219, 1222–3, 1228
UN Charter 1213, 1215, 1218–19, 1224–7
whole, constitutionalization of international legal order as a 1224–9 public law doctrine 18, 34–6
public participation 678–82
public power, specialization in regulating 108–9
public/private divide 298–316
borrowing, transplantation, and migration 1311–13
British constitutionalism 314–16
Critical Legal Studies 310–11
democracy 253
dualist constitutionalism 304–12, 314–15
federalism 412–13
feminist legal scholarship 310–11 functional and taxonomic comparison 312–16
gender 403–4, 412–13
‘ghost’ conjecture 304–14 left-right scalar cross-country comparison 312–15 legal realism 310–11
object-fields 300–4
reality 304
relative autonomy of law 312–14 types of laws 299–300
United States 303–4, 309–11, 313–14
public prosecutors 859–60, 866
public service
freedom of association 962–4
group rights 1109, 1110–11
language 1111
religious minorities 1110
trade unions 962–3
vetting of officials known to have abused powers 1281–2
Weimar Republic 625–6
Pufendorf, Samuel von 353, 356, 389
al-Qaradawi, Yusuf 1296
Qasem, Abul 1295
quotas 410–11
Qutb, Sayyed 1296
Rabin, Yitzhak 535
race and ethnicity 213–14
affirmative action 1125–6, 1129–39
communitarianism 147
culture 1101–2
definition of constitution 219–20
equality and non-discrimination 321, 983, 987, 989, 991–2, 997–8
ethno-national identity 136, 138
group rights 1100–2, 1108–12, 1116–17, 1120, 1122–3
illiberal constitutionalism 136, 138
nation states 610–11
treaty-based constitutions 1169–70
unitary state, conceptions of 610–11
Radbruch, Gustav 1257
radical democracy 122–3
Ramseyer, J Mark 845, 851
Randolph, James 585–6, 592–3
Rapaczynski, Andrzej 14, 1339
Rasmusen, Eric B 751 ratification, process of 436–7
Ratzinger, Joseph 912
Rawls, John 135, 142, 318, 322–5, 329, 334–8, 348–9, 934, 992, 1102, 1110, 1255, 1399
Raz, Joseph 239, 243, 244, 330, 483, 1102, 1104–5 realism 191–4
reality 29–30, 304
reason or will, legitimacy and 115
Rechtsstaat 4, 61, 351, 357, 444, 623–5, 730
Rector, Chad 584
referendums 501–27
amendments to constitutions 438, 509
Index

country profiles 523–7
democracy 501, 505–9
European Union's constitution 1186 existence of provisions in constitutions 509–10
history 512–13
initiatives 508–11, 513
judicial review 514–27
juridicization 514–22
jus cogens 524
majority tyranny 502, 505–6
making of constitutions 429–31 mandatory referendums 508–11, 513
minorities 523–4
optional referendums 508, 510–11
plebiscites, definition of 501–2
(pop. 1385) popular sovereignty 502–3
state sovereignty 503, 526 theory of referendums 502–7 types 510–12
typologies 508–9
variations 509–10, 522
regions 612–20
autonomy of local government 615–16
democracy 266
devolution 577, 612, 615, 620, 1169–70
elections 533–4, 880
internationalization of constitutional law 1167, 1173–6 legislative powers in unitary states 617–20
public international law, internationalization of 1228
regionalization 1173–6
Spain 275–6, 612, 614, 618–19, 764, 1169–70
state sovereignty 273–4
treaty-based constitutions 1169–70
United Kingdom 577, 612, 615, 620 regulation administrative procedures 678–82
agencies 673–8, 682–5
comprehensive regulation 109
cost-benefit analysis 678–82
delegation 671–2, 673–5
judicial review 671–3, 680, 682–4
law, constitution as 109
public participation 678–82
public power 108–9
regulatory state 671–85
specialization 108–9
technocratic analysis 678–82
Rehnquist, William 214, 1335
Reid, John Philip 242 religion 909–26 see also Islam
abortion 1063, 1071, 1146
accommodation 919–22
affirmative action 1125, 1130–1
anticlericalism 911, 924
autonomy 913–16, 919, 923–5
bioethics 1146
blasphemy 922
citizenship 1014–15
collective dimension 909, 912, 915
communitarianism 147
conscientious objection to military service 920
constitutionalism 138–42, 148–9, 911–12, 923
culture 912, 916, 918
definition of constitution 104–5 definition of religion 915–16
dignity and autonomy 377–8, 395
equality and non-discrimination 140, 332–4, 911–14, 917–24, 985, 987, 994
European Convention on Human Rights 916–18, 920–1, 926
freedom of expression 922
freedom of religion 267, 909–26
fundamentalism 913
fundamental rights 829
gender 400, 404, 414–15, 1106–7
group rights 1101, 1103–8, 1110, 1122–3
homogeneity 910, 912
identity 332–3
illiberal constitutionalism 136, 138–42, 148–9
individual rights 915–16, 919
manifest religion, right to 917–18
militant democracy 1256, 1262, 1264–6
minorities 760, 910–12, 917–19, 922, 1101–10, 1122–3 models of church-state relations 922–6 neutrality of state 332–5, 912, 919–21, 924–6
nomic communities 334
non-liberal democratic constitutions 123 persecution 909–10, 913–18, 922 proselytism 918
protected, what is 916–18
public order 142
public services, access to 1110 reasons and justification for freedom of religion 912–14
rules 293
secularism 138–42, 219, 267, 393–4, 772, 786, 922–6, 1256, 1264–6
sovereignty 356, 919
theocratic constitutionalism 138–42, 148–9, 266–7 tolerance 909–16
truth or consensus constitutions 114
universalism 913
values and principles 785–6
Remedial Rights Theories 483, 486–7
Renner, Karl 435
Rensi, Giuseppe 506
reparations 1272–3, 1280–2
(revised) repressive regimes see illiberal regimes reproductive rights 1148–50, 1159–60
republicanism 261–2, 344–9, 550, 628–9, 1261–3, 1266–7
Ress, Georg 1243
revision of constitutions see amendment or revision of constitutions
revolutions
definition of constitution 102–5
democracy 118–19
dualism 103
identity 766–7
secession 481
Richter, Dagmar 1247
rights and liberties 283–97
balancing 294–5, 297, 734–5 burden of proof 733–4 collective good 284 concepts, as 283–97
constitutional rights 288–97
enforceability of rights 285 exclusion of reasons 732–3
human rights 290–1
legal liberty, concept of 287–8 legal positions and relations, rights as 284–8 powers 288
reasons for rights 284–5 something, rights to 285–7 state’s interests 732
strength of rights and freedoms 732–5 system of basic legal positions and relations 285 three-stage model of rights 284–5 unenumerated rights 43–4, 48–9, 51
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Topic</th>
<th>Page(s)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>will and interest theory</td>
<td>284</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>rigid constitutions</td>
<td>110–12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Riker, William</td>
<td>580, 584, 592, 602</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roach, Kent</td>
<td>936</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roberts, John</td>
<td>1097</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Robertson, David</td>
<td>707, 713</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Robespierre, Maximilien</td>
<td>427</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rodden, Jonathan</td>
<td>596, 600</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roh Moo-Hyun</td>
<td>560</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Romania, democratization in</td>
<td>430, 435</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roosevelt, FD</td>
<td>125, 126, 347, 633, 805, 1042</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roosevelt, Theodore</td>
<td>633</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rosanvallon, Pierre</td>
<td>613</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rosenblum, Nancy</td>
<td>1263</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rosenbluth, Frances</td>
<td>845</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rosenfeld, Michel</td>
<td>61, 134–5, 240, 1342</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ross, Alf</td>
<td>279</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rossi, Pellegrino</td>
<td>582</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rousseau, Jean-Jacques</td>
<td>122, 253, 356, 463–4, 502, 634, 953, 983</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roux, Theunis</td>
<td>854–5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rubenfeld, Jed</td>
<td>1322</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rubio Marin, Ruth</td>
<td>65</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>rule of law</td>
<td>233–49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>administrative state</td>
<td>246–7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>arbitrariness</td>
<td>235–6, 240–3, 247</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>authoritarianism</td>
<td>234, 237–8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>borrowing, transplantation, and migration</td>
<td>1322–3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>character of laws</td>
<td>235, 237, 246</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>constraint on power</td>
<td>244–7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>contexts</td>
<td>247–9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>democracy</td>
<td>258</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>due process</td>
<td>934, 944–5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>efficacy</td>
<td>237–8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>European Union's constitution</td>
<td>120–1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>impoverishment</td>
<td>157–8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>independence of judiciary</td>
<td>832, 844–6, 853–5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>institutions</td>
<td>235–8, 242, 247</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>internal morality of law</td>
<td>237–8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>internationalization of constitutional law</td>
<td>1167, 1180–1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>interpretation</td>
<td>689–94, 706</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>judiciary</td>
<td>273, 624, 832, 844–6, 853–5, 862–3, 866–9, 871–2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>nation states</td>
<td>272–3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>negative or positive views</td>
<td>242–6</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>procedures</td>
<td>239–40</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table> public affairs, simple government of 272–3 rule by law 234
social contract 116–18
socialist constitutions 128–9
state, conception of the 272–3 welfare state 246
rules
constitutional rights 291, 292–7
construction 292–4
making constitutions ‘by the rules’ 433–4 principles and rules 291, 292–7 recognition, rule of 222–4 (p. 1387) religion 293
rule of law 237–8
Russia 430, 435, 558, 562–3
Rwanda, transitional justice in 1273
Sacco, Rodolfo 1310
Sachs, Albie 1333, 1346
Sadat, Anwar 1299
Saddam Hussein 638, 1282
Sadurski, Wojciech 823, 827
Sager, Lawrence 1026
Sajó, András 1342
Sandel, Michael 339
Sarkozy, Nicolas 474
Sartori, Giovanni 507, 875
Sassen, Saskia 94
Sathe, SP 710, 713
Saunders, Cheryl 64
Savigny, Friedrich Carl von 1309
Scalia, Antonin 13, 45, 48, 50–2, 348, 458, 868, 735, 789–90, 919, 1087, 1139, 1317, 1332–6
Scharpf, Fritz 591
Schauer, Frederick 222–3
Scheppele, Kim Lane 61–2, 829, 839, 1261, 1307, 1347
Shleifer, Andrei 851
Schlesinger, Rudolf 1325
Schlink, Bernhard 294 scholarship 25–36, 68, 358, 361
Schopenhauer, Arthur 378
Schröder, Gerhard 477
Schumpeter, Joseph 506–7
Schwartz, Bernhard 7
Schwartz, Thomas 674
Schwarzkopf, H Norman 1083
secession 481–500
choice theory 484–6
citizenship 483–4, 487, 493
conservative dimension 481
constitutionalization 495–7 cultural distinctiveness 485
democracy 483–7, 491, 493, 499–500
equality and non-discrimination 1105
federalism 486, 494, 496–9
group rights 1104–5, 1112–13, 1121
human rights 489–91
International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 489
just cause theory 486–7
justification 483–7
legitimacy 484–5, 487–8
minorities 482–97
nationalism 483–4, 487–9
Primary Rights Theories 483–4
public international law 486–93
recognition 481, 491–2
Remedial Rights Theories 483, 486–7 revolutionary character 481
self-determination 482–4, 486–93, 494, 1104–5
stability 482–3
state-building 481–2
state sovereignty 483, 494, 497
statehood 483
universalism 485
secrecy 262–4 sectarianism 1290–2, 1298, 1301–2
secularism
constitutionalism 138–40, 142, 267, 922–6
democracy 266–7
demos 219
dignity and autonomy 393–4
European Court of Human Rights 1256, 1265
Islam 219, 786, 924–5, 1256, 1264–5
religion 138–42, 219, 267, 393–4, 772, 786, 922–6, 1013, 1256, 1264–6 theocratic constitutionalism 138–40, 142
truths 114
Seidenfeld, Mark 684
‘seizing the Crown’ metaphor 30–1 self-constitution 423, 427, 435
self-determination 487–93
Index

democracy 487, 491, 493
dignity and autonomy 372, 375, 378, 380, 390, 393
group rights 1104–5, 1117
human rights 489–91
International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 489
minorities 482–4, 486–93
nationalism 487–9
privacy 970
public international law 486–93
recognition 491–2
secession 482–4, 486–93, 494, 1104–5
United Nations 491
(p. 1388) self-reflection 66–8
Selznick, Philip 244, 248 semantic (instrumentalistic/ritualistic) constitutions 107 semi-constitutions 109, 119–20 Sen, Amartya 155, 159–62, 164, 168, 249, 1024
separation of powers
advisory opinions 571–3
checks and balances 211, 550, 574
constitutional courts 817–18, 828
definition of constitution 102
despotic governments 551
executive 553–67, 621–3
federalism 277
functionalism 549–51
Glorious Revolution 549–50
hereditary heads of state 803–4
horizontal structuring 567–74
independence 568–9, 856, 864–5
interpretation 690, 716–17
judicial review 569–71, 805–7, 813–14
judiciary 549, 551, 567–74, 856, 861–7, 871–2
jurisdiction and justiciability 571–4
mixed government 549–50
parliamentary systems 556, 621–2, 653–4, 657–60
political question doctrine 573–4
presidential systems 553–4, 558, 629–30, 639, 641, 645, 657
proportionality 748, 751
semi-presidential models 657
socialist constitutions 128–9
stability of constitutions 227
state sovereignty 356–7
transitional justice 1273
sexual orientation 1079–97
bolognese 1079–80
bricolage 1079–80
culture 1088, 1096
due process 43–4
equality and non-discrimination 989, 997–9, 1091–2
European Convention on Human Rights 1081, 1083–7, 1091
executive 1081–2
expressivism 1079, 1086–92, 1094–7
foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of 39, 43–52
functionalism 1079–86, 1088–94
gender 408
marriage and relationship recognition 1089–97
military service 1080–6
national security 1080–1, 1083–4
privacy 972, 974–5, 1086
religion 1086–7, 1096
sodomy, criminalization of 44–5, 51, 970–1, 1081, 1083–8, 1335
sham constitutions 225–6
Shaplov, Meir 1340
Shapiro, David 459
Shapiro, Martin 63, 840, 869–70
Shepsle, Kenneth 598, 601
Shinar, Adam 567
Shklar, Judith 242–3
Shugart, Matthew 559
Shvetsova, Olga 597
Sieder, Rachel 849
Sieyès, Emmanuel Joseph (Abbe Sieyès) 103, 207, 259, 427, 763
Simeon, Richard 1117–18
Simpson, AWB 447
Simpson, OJ 940
Singapore, communitarianism in 143–7
al-Sistani, Sayyed ‘Ali 1294
Skach, Cindy 558–9
Skelly Wright, James 853
Skowronek, Stephen 229
Slaughter, Anne-Marie 1324
slavery 371, 381, 385, 391
Smith, Adam 92, 117, 342
Smith, Rogers 1003
social contract 102, 116–18
socialist constitutions 128–9
social or welfare state constitution 124–8, 246, 348–9 social rights 126–7, 347–9, 391, 949–52 see also socio-economic rights societal constitutionalism 94–7
socio-economic rights 1020–34
abortion 1031–2
civil and political rights 1020, 1022, 1025, 1033
constitutional law 181–5
dignity 1029, 1033
enforcement 1023–4, 1025–7, 1030–4
equality and non-discrimination 993, 997, 1000, 1022
feasibility 1024
food and water 1027–9, 1031–4
(p. 1389) generations of rights 1020–2, 1034
health, right to 1021, 1026–7, 1030–1 housing 1021, 1023, 1026, 1029, 1033
institutionalization 1024
International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights 958, 984, 996, 1022
objections 1023–5
relief 1025–7
stronger forms of rights and relief 1026–7, 1030–3
transitional justice 184
Universal Declaration of Human Rights 1022
weak rights/weak review 1026–30, 1033
socio-political rights 949–62
sodomy cases 44–5, 51, 970–1, 1081, 1083–8, 1335
Sólyom, László 1341–2
South Africa 1, 7–9
affirmative action 1129–31
bills of rights 1344–5
constitutional law 170, 172, 174–6, 179–83
constrained parliamentarism 556–7
dignity and autonomy 383
equality and non-discrimination 989–90, 996–9
foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of 1344–6
interpretation 695–6, 705–8, 710–14, 717, 1344–6
judicial appointments 711–12
making constitutions 436–7
parliamentary systems 557
president 557
proportionality 742, 746
public/private divide 311–14
socio-economic rights 102
United States 1344–5
values and principles 777–8
Souter, David 458 sovereignty/supremacy 350–4 see also state sovereignty amendments to constitution 110–11, 363–5 constitutinal law and constitution, difference between 111 criminal law 112
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Index</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Declaration of the Rights of Man 365</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>definition of constitution 218</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>delegation 366</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>direct democracy 366–7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>elections 366</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>enforcement 112–13</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>essence and exercise of sovereignty, distinction between 365</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>European Convention on Human Rights 1236–7</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>European Union 367–8, 812</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>fundamental rights 110</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>general will 365–8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Grundnorm 362–3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>hierarchy of norms 365</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>higher or ordinary law 109–10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>holder of sovereignty in the state 365–8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>inclusive or exclusive constitutions 113–14</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>judicial review 112–13, 570</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>law, constitution as 109–15</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>legitimacy 362</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>obedience, habit of 362</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>parliamentary sovereignty 108, 251, 451, 570, 652, 796–9, 818, 820</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>parliamentary systems 108, 652, 796–9</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>public power 108</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>religion 919</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>representation, theory of 365</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>rigid or flexible constitutions 110–12</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>sovereign, existence of a 362–5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>state, sovereignty in the 362–8</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>truth or consensus constitutions 115</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>space 79, 87–92, 971–2</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Spaemann, Robert 1064</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Spain</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>identity 762, 764–5, 769</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>militant democracy 1254–5, 1263–4</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>pacted transition model 769</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>regions 275–6, 612, 614, 618–19, 764, 1169–70</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Special Immigration Appeals Commission (SIAC) 453–7, 460</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Spence, David 675</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Spitzer, Matthew L 682–3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>stability of constitutions 226–30, 421, 439</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>standards 736, 1282–5</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Starr, Kenneth 562</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>state of nature 116–17</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>(p. 1390) state sovereignty 353–62</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Anglo-American tradition 274 below, from 94
checks and balances 351
classical international law 359–61 conceptions of the state 274–7
constitutional rights 357
criterion of state, sovereignty as 274–6 definition of the state 350–1 dual sovereignty 355
emergency, states of 444
Europe 274–7
European Convention on Human Rights 361
European Union 351–2, 357–61
external sovereignty 359–62, 368
federalism 274–7, 355, 359
fundamental rights 357
hierarchy of norms 355, 358, 368
independence 352
internal sovereignty 354–61, 368
international criminal courts 361
Kompetenz–Kompetenz 355
making of constitutions 431
monism 360
national and international constitutions 130 political centralization 275
popular sovereignty 354
positive law 351–2, 355, 358
private law, regulation of 357
public international law 360–2
Rechtsstaat 351, 357
referendums 503, 526
regional states 273–4
religion 356
scholarship 358, 361
Security Council (UN) 361
self-perception 94
separation of powers 356–7
societal constitutionalism 94
state-building 431
state, conception of the 274–7
treaties 358–9, 361–2
tropism of unitary state 274–6 unitary states 274–7 validity 360
violence, monopoly on the use of 351
Index

Westphalian system 351, 259
state, sovereignty in the 362–8 states see nation states states of emergency see emergency, states of status quo practices 227–9
Stepan, Alfred 583, 585
Stevens, John Paul 458
Stone, Harlan F 595
Stone, Lewis M 497
Stone Sweet, Alec 572, 852, 1315
Story, Joseph 930
Strauss, David 99–100
strike, right to 1046–7, 1049
Subba Rao, Koka 705
subsidiarity
bioethics 1145
European Union 802–3
federalism 585–6, 592–5, 607, 802
legislation, preparation of 802–3
parliamentary systems 802
substance of constitution-making see process and substance of constitution-making substantive and formal constitutions 108–9 Suharto 638
Sukarno (Kusno Sosrodihardjo) 145
Sumner, William Graham 788–9
Sunstein, Cass 183–4, 224–5, 1024, 1282
supranational constitutions 773–5
supremacy see sovereignty/supremacy Switzerland, referendums in 502, 506, 508, 510–12, 514, 522–4 symbols 107, 1298
Tamanaha, Brian 247
Tamir, Yael 1102–4
targeted killings 574
Tay, Alice Erh Soon 246–7
Taylor, Charles 333
Taylor, Jane 936
Teitel, Ruti 17, 1286
territoriality
centralist tendencies and prefects 613–15
citizenship 1005–10, 1017–18
federalism 580–1, 603, 605
group rights 1101, 1103, 1105, 1109, 1112, 1123
Italy 614
jus soli principle 1005–8 local government, autonomy of 615–17
index

national minorities 611–12
organization 613–20
parliamentary systems 659
secession 481–500
unitary state, internal ordering of the 613–20
terrorism
asset freezing 1209–13, 1219, 1222–3, 1228 detention without trial 1235–6
european union 1209–10, 1212–13, 1219, 1222–3, 1228
fair hearing, right to a 1209–11
islam 1288, 1296
militant democracy 1255, 1262–3
public international law, internationalization of 1209–13, 1219, 1222–3, 1228
September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks on the United States 1288
Teubner, Gunther 1311
theocracy see Islam; religion
Thomas, Clarence 458, 1334
Thomas, George 942
Thompson, EP 247
Tiebout, Charles M 590, 604
Tiede, Lydia 852–3
Tierney, Stephen 504 Tilly, Charles 992
time 79, 90–2
tocqueville, Alexis de 4, 79, 255, 266, 587, 610, 949, 954
tomkins, Adam 457
torture 388, 392
totalitarianism 6–7
trade unions 1043–7, 1048–52
closed shops 960–1
collective bargaining 1044–6, 1048, 1050, 1052
economic rights 1043–7, 1048–52
elections 542
European Social Charter 1047
freedom of association 955–63, 1049–50
new democracies 1048
public services, restrictions on 962–3
strike, right to 1046–7, 1049
Universal Declaration of Human Rights 956
transformative constitutions 1282–5 transgovernmental networks, constitutionalization through 1222–4
transitional justice 1270–86
access to information 1282
Index

constitutional courts 826–7, 829
constitutionalism 1270–86
customary international law 1284
demobilization, disarmament, and reintegration (DDR) 1280–1
democracy 1, 6–7, 46, 257, 266, 826–7, 1047–8
economic rights 1047–9
history of conflicts 1271
human rights 1283–5
impunity 1273, 1276
institutional reform 1272–3, 1281–2, 1286
international crimes 1272–84
internationalization 1173–4
international standards 1282–6
judicial review 1283–4
legality, principle of 1282
lustration laws 1281–2
making constitutions 422
non-judicial sanctions 1281–2
norms 1273–85
processes 1282–5
prosecutions 1272–3, 1275–9, 1286
reconciliation 1272
reparations 1272–3, 1280–1, 1282
separation of powers 1273
socio-economic rights 184
trade unions 1048
transformative constitutions 1282–5
truth-telling 1271, 1273, 1274–5, 1284, 1286
vetting of officials known to have abused powers 1281–2
transnational constitutionalism
differences across systems 77, 84
European transnational constitutional model 765
foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of 1346–7
form and substance of constitutionalism 92–4
functionalism 80, 84, 94
identity 769–70
internationalization 1172–3, 1222–4
methodologies 75–97
migration of constitutional ideas 76, 86 networks 1222–4
norms 77–8, 88, 93, 1273–85
(p. 1392) post-national, post-territory, post-state 84–92 societal constitutionalism 94–7
space 79, 87–92
time 79, 90–2
Index

traditional constitutionalism 87

typologies 75–97

Westphalian system 84–5

transplantation see borrowing, transplantation, and migration treaty-becoming constitutions 1169–70

Trechsel, Stefan 933

Treisman, Daniel 599

Tribe, Laurence 470, 780

Triepel, Heinrich 796

Troper, Michel 274, 621, 759–60, 771

Truman, Harry 564

truth

amnesties 1274–5

commissions and similar bodies 1274–5, 1284, 1286

consensus constitutions 114–15
due process 1286

secular truths 114

socialist constitutions 129

transnational justice 1271, 1273, 1274–5, 1284, 1286

Turkey

Islam 137, 539, 786, 864, 921, 924–5, 1256, 1264–5

militant democracy 1256, 1264–5

political parties 538–9, 958

secularism 219, 786, 924–5, 1256, 1264–5

values and principles 785–6

Tushnet, Mark 7, 14, 59, 63, 67, 181, 183, 566–7, 695–8, 708, 711–16, 781, 1027, 1079–80, 1313

Tyminski, Stanislaw 881 types of constitutions 98–131

law, constitution as 105–15

living and constant/static constitutions 99–100

national and international constitutions 129–31

object, identifying the 100–5 political ideas, constitutions as expressions of 115–29 problems with typologies 98–100

typologies 75–100, 138–47, 508–9

Uleri, Pier 510

UN Charter 1221–2

customary international law 1218
dignity and autonomy 371–2

enforcement 1224

erga omnes 1218–19, 1225

hierarchy of norms 1218–19

human rights 1225–7

identity 773
Index

jus cogens 1215, 1218–19, 1225
legitimacy 1226–7
public international law, internationalization of 1213, 1215, 1218–19, 1224–7
war powers 464
unenumerated rights 43–4, 48–9, 51
Unger, Roberto 246–7
unitary state 609–26
civic and ethnic conceptions 610–11
droit administratif 623–5 executive, organization of 621–3
federalism 274–7
internal ordering 609–26
national minorities 611–12
regions 273–4
state, definition of 609–10
state sovereignty 274–7
territorial organization 613–20
United Kingdom see also England; Human Rights Act 1998 (United Kingdom) affirmative action 1126
agencies 677
Bill of Rights 1689, 1689251, 466–7, 661, 950
bioethics 1154, 1156, 1158
citizenship 1006–7, 1011, 1014
Civil War 651
Constitutional Committee of the House of Lords 802
constitutional conventions 652–3
constitutionalism 173–4, 314–16
constitutional law 171–4, 177, 179–80
Crown as sole decision-maker on war 466–7 declarations of incompatibility 1234–5
democracy 251
devolution 577, 612, 615, 620
dignity and autonomy 938–43
dissolution of parliament 665
due process 930–2, 938–43
elected assemblies 620
(p. 1393) elections 534–5, 652
emergency, states of 446, 451–60
European Convention on Human Rights 1234–6
European Court of Human Rights 1244–6
euthanasia 1154
executive 466–8, 556, 564, 624–6
freedom of association 957, 961
freedom of expression 893, 905
identity 762, 764, 767–8
independence of the judiciary 568
interpretation 703, 707, 709–10, 712, 715
judicial review 466, 570
judiciary 568
Magna Carta 251, 764, 930–2
ministers 651–2, 663–4
MPs 651, 660–1, 663
national minorities 612
no confidence votes 651–2, 664
parliamentary sovereignty 570, 652, 797–8
parliamentary systems 466–8, 556, 564, 650–7, 661–8, 802
prerogative powers 466
Prime Minister 556, 651
prisoners’ right to vote 534–5, 999
privacy 970, 974–6
public authorities 624–5
public/private divide 314–16
regulatory state 672
remedial orders 1235
rule of law 624
separation of powers 549–52, 556
stability of constitutions 226
state sovereignty 274
terrorist suspects, detention without trial of foreign 1235–6
war powers 466–8
Westminster model 556, 564
written/unwritten constitutions 106, 221–4
United Nations (UN) see also UN Charter 1221–2 International Court of Justice, judicial review by 1221–2
national and international constitutions 130–1 peacekeeping operations 478–9 resolutions 770, 1221–2, 1228, 1280 Security Council 361
self-determination 491
state sovereignty 361
war powers 464, 465, 473–4, 478–9
United States
abortion 771, 808, 1057–72, 1151, 1338–9
Administrative Procedure Act 672–4, 680–1, 684 affirmative action 991–2, 1125–6, 1133–40
agencies 673–6, 682–5
Bill of Rights 109, 119, 212–13, 273, 1344–5
bioethics 1143, 1147, 1150–1, 1153, 1155–9
borrowing, transplantation, and migration 14–15, 1312–14, 1316–17, 1320–3 bribery and corruption 206, 210–11
Index

checks and balances 210–11, 341–2
citizenship 1005–8, 1011–12, 1018
Civil War 494–5
closed shops 961
cognitive constitutionalism 202–3
Cold War 7, 47, 464, 491–3, 636
colonization 12, 51
constitutional courts 817–20, 823–4
constitutionalism 190–1, 193, 195–7, 202–3, 206, 208–14
constitutional law 170–2, 175, 177, 184
cost-benefit analysis 679–80
death penalty 15, 39, 43, 50, 1334–5
definition of constitution 100, 102
delegation 563, 671–4
differences 42, 48–9
dignity and autonomy 381–2
due process 14–15, 43–4, 52, 929–45
economic rights 1036–9, 1049, 1052–3
Electoral College 553
elections 530–1, 533–6, 540–1
emergency, states of 442, 445–6, 451, 457–8, 460
eminent domain 1038–9 end of life decisions 1155–6
equality and non-discrimination 343–4, 984, 987, 990–4, 997–9
euthanasia 1155–6
exceptionalism 1, 15, 39, 48, 52, 208, 779, 1333
exclusivism 46–52, 773
executive 468–9, 560–6
federalism 276–7, 578–9, 585–6, 588–95, 606–7, 659
foreign affairs 206
foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of 1, 39–52, 1175–9, 1317, 1322, 1329–45
freedom of assembly 951, 953
(p. 1394) freedom of association 954, 961–3
freedom of expression 13, 891–904, 907, 949, 1340–3 Germany 1336–9
hegemony 12, 46
homosexuals, rights of 39, 43–50, 52
human rights 7, 62
Hungary 1342–4
identity 42, 46–9, 757–65, 771–4 ideology 41–3, 47, 49, 51
impeachment 560–1
independence of judiciary 568, 845, 854–5
individual complaints 812
internationalization 1167, 1169, 1175–9, 1181
interpretation 693–8, 702, 708–16
Israel 1339–41
judicial review 112–13, 212–13, 569–70, 672–3, 680, 682, 807–14
judiciary 568–9, 571–4, 710–11, 865–8, 871
just or good principles, search for 60–2
law making 563
legal positivism 5, 29
legal realism 710
legislature 468–9, 553–4, 561, 564–5, 632–4
legitimacy 115
liberal-democratic constitutions 118–19
libertarianism 342–4
making constitutions 420, 424–6, 431, 436
marriage and same sex relationship recognition 1090–5
methodologies 60–2, 70
militant democracy 1261, 1264, 1267
military, homosexuals in the 1080–6 national bias 42–3, 49
non-delegation doctrine 671–2
observers and participants 39–41, 43
originalism 16, 50, 694, 696–8, 714
petition, right to 949
political parties 875
political question doctrine 573–4
presidential systems 553–4, 559, 631–7
privacy 967–8, 970–3, 975, 978–9
proportionality 720–1, 729, 731, 733, 735–6, 752–4 public choice analysis 342–3
public participation 680
public/private divide 303–4, 309–11, 313–14
Randolph Plan 585–6
referendums 502–3, 510, 512, 523–5
regulatory state 671–5, 678–84
religion 772, 910–11, 914, 916–17, 920, 924–5
republicanism 345–6
revolution 3–4, 102
rigid or flexible constitutions 111
secession 494–5, 497–8
separation of powers 211, 551–4, 562, 572–4
September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks on the United States 1288
sexual orientation 39, 43–50, 52, 1080–95
similarities and differences 42, 48–9
social or welfare state constitution 125–6
socio-economic rights 1020, 1022, 1025
sodomy, criminalization of 44–5, 51, 1086–8, 1335
South Africa 1344–6
standing, doctrine of 572–3
state, conception of the 270–1, 273
state sovereignty 274
targeted killings 574
universalism 41, 46–52, 772–3
uses of CCL 38–42
values and principles 779, 789
war powers 468–71, 479
white supremacy 213–14
written/unwritten constitutions 221–4
Universal Declaration of Human Rights 371–2, 932, 956, 1022, 1144–5, 1171–2
universalism 10–11, 12
culture 375
dignity and autonomy 373–4, 393–5
exclusivism 47–52
foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of 47–52
human rights 11, 62, 373–5
identity 772–3
particularism 393–5
paternalism 375
proportionality 729
religion 913
secession 485
United States 41, 46–52, 772–3
values and principles 778–87, 790 unwritten constitutions see written/unwritten constitutions Uprimny, Rodrigo 850
usages and conventions 223–4
uses of CCL 9–10, 38–42, 229–30
(p. 1395) Valencia Carmona, Salvador 635–6
values and principles 6–7, 777–90
abortion 1059, 1062–3, 1065, 1067–72, 1075–7
activism 781
Asia 17–18, 157, 160
constitutional rights 291, 292–7
construction 291–7
culture 786, 790
due process 785, 787–8
foreign law in constitutional interpretation, use of 789–90
independence of judiciary 835–6, 838–40
interpretation 779
irrationality 294
just or good principles, search for 60–2
Law of Balancing and Weight Formula 294–5 level of generality 781 local habits, constitutional meaning in 785–9 optimization requirements 291 practical accommodations 779–85
proportionality 291–2
religion 785–6
rules 291–4
tradition 788
universalism 778–87, 790
Van Alstyne, William W 105–6, 113
Vasak, Karel 1022
Vattel, Emer de 102, 278
Vedel, Georges 364, 472, 474
veto power 642, 804–5
vetting of officials 1281–2
Vico, Giambattista 28
Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties 361–2, 1214–15
Vile, Maurice 346
violence, state's monopoly on use of 116–17, 306, 323–4, 351, 361, 582
Voltaire 910, 914
von Bogdandy, Armin 18 von Hindenburg, Paul 448 von Papen, Franz 448 von Schleicher, Kurt 448
Wade, HWR 280
Waldron, Jeremy 239–42, 348–9, 836, 913–14, 1324–5
Walesa, Lech 881
Walker, Graham 133, 137
Walzer, Michael 484
war aggressive wars, prohibition of 475 authorization 464–6, 473–5
conscription 465
executive 466–9, 566
international organizations, deference to 465–6
Islam 1291
legislative powers 566
parliamentary consent 464–6, 473–5 post-conflict situations 422, 432
powers 463–79
presidential systems 472–3 propaganda 895
UN Charter 464
Warren, Earl 697, 711, 714, 716, 941
Index

Washington, George 807 water 1027–9, 1031–4
Watson, Alan 1306, 1308, 1309–13, 1315–17, 1319–20, 1323
Watts, Ronald 581
Webber, Grégoire 752
Weber, Max 240, 351, 374, 583, 681, 874–5, 877–8, 882, 884, 887, 933, 937, 1290
Weiler, Joseph 1200
Weil, Patrick 1009
Weimar Constitution
civil servants, hierarchical structure of 625–6
economic rights 1039–41, 1047
emergency, states of 446–8
making constitutions 429, 434
militant democracy 1257–8
political parties 538, 874, 884–7
radical democracy 122
social or welfare state constitution 126
socio-economic rights 1021
Sozialer Rechtsstaat 623–4
Weingast, Barry 590, 596, 600, 674
Weinrib, Lorraine 1315, 1333, 1336, 1346–7
Weinstock, Daniel 495 welfare state constitutions 124–8, 246, 348–9
Wellman, Christopher 484–5
Westphalian system 84–5, 265, 351, 359, 482, 992, 1290
Wheare, Kenneth 276, 579
(p. 1396) White, Byron 994, 1086–7
Wibbels, Erik 600
Widner, Jennifer 65–6 will and interest theory 284
Williams, Roger 340, 910
Williams, Ryan 929
Willoughby, Westel 271
Wilson, Woodrow 488, 633
Wissenschaft (freedom of science) 27–8 workers’ rights 1037–45, 1049–53
World Trade Organization (WTO) 1171, 1182, 1217, 1220, 1223
Wright, Quincy 1022
written/unwritten constitutions 221–4
boundaries of constitutions 221–3
definition of constitution 223–6
emergency, states of 443, 445, 451
European Union’s constitution 1186–7
legal character of constitutions 106
operative and sham constitutions 225–6 prescriptive/descriptive constitutions 106 rule of recognition 222–4
usages and conventions 223–4
Yamin, Alicia Ely 1031
Yerushalmi, Yosef Hayim 90
Yeltsin, Boris 430, 560, 880–1
Yoshinaka, Antoine 534 al-Zarqawi, Abu Mus‘ab 1297–8
Ziblatt, Daniel 584, 603
Ziegler, Katja 464
Zoller, Élisabeth 270
Zwart, Tom 683–4
Zweigert, Konrad 96